He laughed, folded one leg over the other, and hooked his arms onto the back of the couch. Beatrice did love to show off, more than most women. He loved that. She liked showing off her tattoos, her piercings, she liked showing off her muscles, her ripped stomach and lean figure, and now that she was comfortable with him, her teeth.

A little effort and mental focus, and the blush of life flowed through his dried veins, reigniting the warmth, the heartbeat, and the natural arousal that came with. Staring at her ass was always a guaranteed erection, and with the combat boots, it was a spice that teased him just right. Like her teeth did.

She grabbed one of the chains off the table, and turned to face him. A collar was in her hand, a dog collar, but big enough for a human.

“Always struck me as odd, how empowering it was to wear a collar.” Smirking, she put the black thing around her neck. And it looked so damn perfect on her, against the white of her tank top, and the myriad of piercings dangling from her ears, eyebrows, and nose.

“Well, it does really make you look really ... really fuckable,” he said, and she laughed with the word. “Puts the power in your hand, when you make anyone hard just looking at you.”

“Yeah, I get that. But at the same time it is a sign of submission, isn’t it?” She walked up to him, and slipped her tank top off, exposing all the tattoos along her body, especially the snake that ran from her mons, along her abs, and up to her breast where the snake bit into her nipple. Her nipple piercings were simple little silver rings, much like the ones in her eyebrow, her nose and lips, her ear. She was wearing a couple tiny silver chains that connected her ear to her nose piercings too. Silver wasn’t her usual color; she normally wore gray. Maybe she was trying to look fancy for him, in her own way.

“If I had to guess,” he said, “it’s because it represents owning your sexuality.”

“Makes sense.” She climbed up to his lap and straddled his legs, her knees to the couch. Sitting on him, she took the chain and hooked it to her neck with a bolt snap hook, like a pet leash might have. The chain came down between her breasts and split into two smaller chains, each with normal chain-link hooks at the end that she then hooked into the piercings of her nipples.

Julias did everything in his power to keep his hands at his sides.

“Sometimes,” she said, “a girl really does just want to give over control though. Get told what to do, taken for a ride, pinned down, have no say in the matter. Just give in, let the man take charge.” She slid in closer until the crotch of her thong rubbed against where his erection was pressed hard to his pants. Her body came forward, and she pressed her hard nipples against his suit jacket as her claws drifted along his waist. “Think you can handle that?”

He’d bedded plenty of girls who loved to be told what to do in bed. A lot of them found it freeing, allowed them to let loose and enjoy things they might not otherwise. Beatrice never needed the encouragement; she always told him exactly what she wanted.

But tonight she was different. She was feeling helpless in the dangerous circumstances that were pouring over them. And maybe she just wanted to feel protected.

He kissed her, and smiled. “Go get that plug that we didn’t use last time. And some lubricant.”

A tiny growl rumbled in her throat, and she kissed his neck as she purred. “Yes sir.” She slid off his lap, strutted back to the table, and grabbed two things. One, a bottle of lubricant that they’d both come to enjoy for its long lasting properties, and the other was a dildo with a plug end. Her grin had only grown when she came back to him, and set them into his awaiting palms.

“Turn around,” he said.

She shivered, and did as ordered.

He set the large dildo upon his lap. A bendable, somewhat soft creation, colored blue and rather thick and large; a larger toy compared to what the two of them normally used. He looked forward to it.

He set both hands on her ass cheeks, and squeezed. Beatrice, chuckling and squirming, pushed her ass back toward him, and he responded with kneading fingers. Hard muscle, with just enough fat on it to keep its round shape. Perfect. He took the lubricant into one hand, and used his other hand to pull her thong aside.

“Bend over.”

Chuckling all the more, she did as requested, and stuck her ass out toward him as she put her claws on her knees.

He placed the tip of the bottle along the crack of her glorious ass, and let the thick liquid drip down and onto her skin. She shivered; liquid was a bit cool compared to her body temperature, since she was blushing life. But in no time, it warmed as the fingers of his other hand pressed against the rose of her ass, and started to massage it into her skin.

The reaction was strong. Triss started to shiver some more, and she spread her legs another few inches as she got comfortable, still bent over, and glancing around her leg to smile at him. Her eyes rolled upward when he eased two of his fingers into her to the first knuckle, and started worming them around, insuring each not only began to soak her muscle with the lubricant, but also start to stretch her open.

Once her entrance was thoroughly lubricated, he set the bottle down, and placed his now free hand between her thighs. Getting warmer, and her folds were starting to glisten with a trace of wetness. And as he started to caress her clitoris with his newly freed set of fingers, Beatrice’s shivering grew.

“Been at this three minutes and you’re already wet.” He eased his two fingers into her ass to the next knuckle, and spread them apart, opening her and stretching the tight muscles within. All the while, his fingers upon her clit moved in a gentle, circular massage.

“Yeap.” One of her hands held her knee for support, while the other reached back to pull an ass cheek to the side, to expose more of herself to him, as her long tongue dangled out of her crocodile mouth.

He sank his two fingers deeper into her ass, to the last knuckle, and pressed down. The Nosferatu groaned, squeezed on his fingers for a moment before relaxing, and took a deep breath between her growing pants. Her squeezing resumed all the more as the two fingers on her clit offered a few soft strokes of her piercing dangling from her clit hood. It was the downward presses of his fingers inside her ass that earned the loudest groans though, made her legs shiver and her sphincter squeeze. She started to move her ass toward him, finding the rhythm of his fingers, and he reciprocated with a consistent pace, reaching deep into her and pushing down toward her belly while his other hand continued to caress her swelling clitoris.

He stopped.

“Wha? H-Hey, I was really getting off on that.” She peeked her head over to the side, and frowned at him. Paired with her begging eyes, the frown was comical.

He kissed the cheek of her ass, and slid his fingers out of her clenching muscles. Well lubricated, and slightly stretched; perfect. He grabbed the large dildo, and set its bulbous tip against the rose of her ass. Large indeed; pressing against her clenching hole met with no progress, and Triss laughed as she started to relax her muscles. Laughter turned to familiar moans as her wet muscle spread open on the dildo’s tip, and inch by inch, Julias slowly sank the object into her ass.

“Damn,” he said as he watched her muscles clench and unclench with each passing inch. Bumps and grooves lined the toy, and every so often, slipping one of the thicker parts into Triss made her shudder, and mewl. Once it was in to the end, her anus tightened around the thin part before the flared tip. Secure.

He kissed her ass cheek once again, and slid her thong off her body down to her boots. She stepped out of it without missing a beat, despite her shivering legs, and kicked it to the side.

“God that’s ... fucking ... thick. Deep.” She turned around to face him, grinning large and exposing her many teeth. Once was a time where she wouldn’t do that, but as she quivered and struggled to hold still, her jaw opened inhumanly wide, and she moaned. Girl couldn’t hold still.

“Get one of your small chains, and come sit on my lap.”

“Ooh, ok.” She turned around and walked for the table again, making sure to sway her ass with every step so the blue plug’s end was on full display. “Weird as fuck walking around with this thing inside me.”

“Should have stolen one of the vibrating ones that come with a phone app to turn them on or off. Different vibration settings too.”

“... they make those!?” With a tiny chain in hand, she turned around and beamed at him, as if he’d given her the keys to happiness. “God bless technology.”

He had to admit, much as technology caused their kind many woes, it had brought many possibilities for an expanded sex life. Maybe he’d get her one of those toys, and perhaps other more modern, larger ones, with motors.

His eyes caught onto her body as she straddled his legs once more. Damn that body, the way her abs flexed and crunched when she shifted around, the way the chain pulled on her hard nipples as she got comfortable. He reached for it, and pulled down on the chain, earning a small groan from the Nosferatu as she leaned in with his pulling, and put her lips to his.

“Put on the chain,” he said.

Claws found the jewelry, worked it along the pierced hood of her clit, and hooked it on. It was a few inches long, enough that each movement either of them made forced it to rub along the engorged nub.

Julias undid the fly of his pants, and pulled out his cock through the flap of his underwear. Hard to do with Beatrice fighting for all the room on his lap, but she worked with him, and groaned her animal growls when he held his length in his grip.

“Sit.”

Giving her orders was a dangerous game. Too much and he'd make her angry, ruin the mood. But she was going along with it, and judging from all her purring and smiles, she was enjoying being on the receiving end of some orders, a lot more than he thought she would. She slid forward and lowered herself, until the dripping wet folds of her pussy found the head of his cock. With her claws braced on his shoulders, body leaning back, she started to ease herself down onto him.

“Oh ... fucking ... god that is tight,” she said.

Julias couldn't say anything. He struggled to keep his hand where it was, instead of grabbing her hips and forcing her down. She was right, it was tight, much tighter than usual. So tight that it was almost painful how her taut entrance gripped and squeezed along his glans as she slowly sank herself down onto him. Her clit chain dangled over his length and nudged against his fingers holding his cock; wet already.

“Fuuuck that’s ... hitting me ... right ... fucking there.” She leaned in and hugged him, weight still on her knees so she didn’t sink down any faster. Still going slow, still taking her time, she started to wriggle her hips left and right as she clenched the top half of his cock, each squeeze leaking more of her juices onto his girth until he could feel her wet warmth along the base of his member.

He let go of his shaft and set his hands on her hips instead. They roamed, kneading the meat of her buttocks with one, the other tickling up and down her naked spine. Her spine was a weak point, and he exploited it mercilessly, fingertips tracing it, dancing along it, making her shiver and squirm.

“Keep going,” he said when she stopped.

“Trying, just ... don’t got any fucking room left.”

He could feel that, feel how the huge toy inside her was fighting for room, making everything tight, making every inch she managed to take of his cock a tight heaven of wet muscle milking him. So, with a kiss on her neck and one hand holding her thigh for support, he slapped her ass.

“Hey!”

God damn she squeezed hard, and Julias winced as her pussy gripped down tight like a vise. She sat up too, and frowned at him with her snake eyes. But a second slap wiped it away, replaced it with a dropped jaw and wide eyes, an expression he knew all too well.

She liked it.

“All the way,” he said, winking.

The Nosferatu managed to find her composure, and moaned at him as she started to lower herself down again. Clenching muscles managed to relax for a moment, before they started again as the glans of his cock found her depths.

A little whimper sneaked its way out of Triss, and she blocked it off quick with sealed lips and clenched jaw. But she didn't stop lowering herself, and she groaned in her throat as a couple more inches of girth fit into her, stretching her inward. The tightness of her furthest depths along his glans was euphoric for him, but he could see being penetrated so deeply hurt Triss's insides. Her groans told him she loved it. And he knew she would, she always did. Girl got off on a little pain.

He put both hands onto her bare hips, and pushed down.

"Fuuuuuck." She hugged him as she devoured him to the hilt, and once she put a kiss on his cheek, she leaned back and hooked her legs around behind him. He had to slide forward a bit for her to fit her legs, but it was a big couch, more than enough room for her to get cozy on his lap.

"So you'll be my slave for the night, hmm?"

"Ha, yeah." She leaned in again and put another quick kiss on his lips before she leaned back, hooked her claws on his neck, and started to gently rock her body back and forth. "I'm a naughty girl and I need to be punished."

She did love to play games. And, the more he hung out with her, the more he enjoyed playing them. Before with the kine, his meals, the games were always fleeting things that rarely meant something to him. To have a night of silly, sexual fun was for the human to find joy, and for him to leech off of it. But with Triss, it was different, it was ... genuinely touching. It was like he'd regressed to a love sick boy, ready to rub noses and speak in baby talk. Not that he'd ever talk baby talk to her; she'd hurt him if he tried.

With her leaning back, he got to watch her body, her handful, amazing breasts, and hard nipples that held the chain connected to her collar. He reached out for the chain, and tugged on it, holding it in a spot to make sure the weight mostly tugged on her neck, but a little on her nipples too. It earned a chuckle, and something close to a tiny mewl from the beautiful monster.

“Slow down,” he said.

“Slow down? Come on, I’m fucking soaked, I got a giant dildo in my ass, and I got you fucking balls deep. You have no idea what this feels like. So. Damn. Full.” She did know her dirty talk.

“Slow down.” Again, he tugged on her leash, enough to make her breasts jiggle with the shaking chain. It forced her to a stop, and earned another mewl. “I want to take the time to enjoy this.” While his one hand held the chain connected to her collar and nipples, his other reached down for her clitoris, and he lifted the small chain connected to its hood. Touching the chain forced Triss to tremble, and shaking it made her squeal, a noise he smirked upon hearing.

“Come onnnnn, please?” she said, eyebrows raised with blatant need. Her claws tightened around his shoulders before one slid down to find his tie. He was still fully clothed after all, while she was completely naked. The tie, she loved the tie, and she ran her claw up and down it before her claws came to the end to tug on it in a similar way to his tugging on her chain.

He tugged on hers harder, and she meeped, let go of his tie, and put both her claws on his shoulders again to hold on.

“Bad girl. You deserve to be punished.” He reached up, and put his hand around her throat. Her eyes went wide, and she moved her grip from his shoulders to his arms as he started to squeeze. Not enough to hurt her, but enough to establish a firm grip around her neck, enough so she’d feel the strength of his hand. “Hold still.”

His other started to play with her clit, hard. He moved the chain, twisted it, shifted it left and right. Triss was reduced to a trembling mess of groans, and her insides squeezed in spasms that made Julias groan as well, deep in his chest. He could feel everything. So tight, so damn ridiculously tight in her with his cock fighting for room, every shift of her weight was divine, soaked insides milking at his length.

She came in moments. Muscles clamped down, and her body froze into an arched position, breasts pushed toward him for the few moments she stopped moving. Once movement came back to her, she started to pant and groan, and looked at him half-glazed eyes as her more of her juices leaked onto the base of him. Spasms, random and quivering, massaged his girth as she trembled upon his lap, until she started to settle.

“You ... you do this thing with your meals often?” she said as he let go of her neck. “Never really pictured you choking a girl.”

“Never really pictured you wanting me to.”

“Hey, a girl can want to try different things in the bedroom. Woman’s prerogative. Feel like ... I dunno, just ... really not controlling anything tonight.”

“Any Ventrue would be hard as a rock hearing those words from their lover. We love controlling things.”

He chuckled, she did too, and he set both hands on her waist to help stand her back up. The sensation of her boiling hot insides squeezing along his length was euphoric, enough to send sparks of bliss down between his legs as her muscles clenched along the ripe head of his cock, before he was free of her.

“New position?” she said. “We just got started.”

Smiling at her, he set his fingers around her neck again, and started to walk forward. She had to walk backward to keep to his pace, and she raised a brow at him as her ass came to rest against the edge of one of the fancy tables. His pants fell as he walked, and he stepped out of them casually, not breaking pace as he pushed her down onto the table.

She wanted him to be rough with her tonight, to hold her down and have his way with her. She didn't want to have to think about anything tonight, just let him take control; because she trusted him. God he loved her; knew just how to drive a Ventrue crazy.

He stood beside the table, and grinned down at his woman. Such a lovely creature, lean and fit, and her many piercings and tattoos accented the curves of her athletic body so well. She was lying on the table from head to buttocks, with her legs below the hip hanging off the table. Perfect.

He reached out with one hand, and again took her by the neck. His other hand slid down her perfect body, her breasts, her hard stomach, down the snake tattoo, and down until they were between her thighs. Took a lot of willpower to not grab her by the hips and get his cock back inside her; fuck he really really wanted to. But not yet. He wanted to prepare her properly.

He sank his fingers into her dripping insides, and pressed them up against her g-spot.

“Oh! Fuck, fuck ... god ... damn.” Her feet raised off the floor for a moment before she got comfortable lying on the table. One of her hands held onto the table edge, while the other grabbed the wrist of his choking hand. Trying to stabilize herself. It wouldn't be enough.

He started to finger her. Hard. With his index and ring finger inside her, palm pointed upward, he brought them up to slap against her insides, hard enough to hear the wet sound of flesh.

“Fuck!” She mewled, loudly, and began twisting and squirming. “Slow down!”

He squeezed her neck harder. Her eyes opened wide when she realized she was truly pinned, and unable to speak anymore. Kindred wouldn't asphyxiate, but it meant she wouldn't be able to communicate with him, tell him to stop or slow down or anything. It meant she had given him total control, whether she wanted to or not.

He smiled down at his prey, and continued to finger her, hard. Every so often, he slowed his hand down, and took the time to press long and deep up against her g-spot, forcing her back to arch and her muscles to clench down. And once she'd begun to settle down, he resumed the upward rapid slapping of his fingers, fast and hard enough to make her ass raise off the table an inch with each impact.

She stared at him, eyes wide, almost panicked, as the orgasm hit her. Her muscles clamped down, and she arched her back once again, eyes closing as her pussy squirted onto his palm. Her legs pressed together, thighs trapping his wrist, before they spread again as another muscle clench of her cunt forced another gush of her cum to splash over his hand. Between her clenches, he gently pressed upward toward her belly, earning groans in her throat that struggled to escape his choking grip.

But it wasn't long before he started fingering her again, harder still. Her eyes shot open, and this time the hand holding the table reached across to grab his wrist. She was strong, but in her predicament, she couldn't get the leverage she needed to do anything more than squeeze his wrist, and stare at him with begging eyes. In return, he gave her his Ventrue smile, and continued to finger her, even as her thighs squeezed around his hand to try and stop him as well.

It was hypnotic, watching her body writhe and squirm, watching how she arched her back before pulling it down when her ass raised high. One of her legs lifted, feet still in her army boots, before it came back down as her back arched again, as the fluids started again. And this time, he didn't stop fingering her.

She tried to keep her eyes open. In all her fighting and writhing, she tried to look at him, to get something across with her glazed gaze, but as the climax worked through her, her eyes rolled upward and closed as both her hands fell to the table edges to hold on. He watched, unable to look away from how her breasts jiggled, how her nipple chain bounced, how her muscles contracted with each spasm as she again came all over his fingers. The small chain that dangled from her clit hood rattled against his palm as he forced his fingers to slap upward against her insides, despite her clenching, despite her groans and writhing, despite how her cum was dripping off his fingers. He kept going, until her grip on the table loosened, and eventually her arms and legs began to dangle from the table.

Only when she stopped writhing did he remove his fingers from her, and let go of her neck.

She didn't say a word, just lay there, quiet moans coming out now, no longer being choked. Her whole body was vibrating, trembling, and her legs remained spread as her soaked thighs dripped juices until lines of the moisture ran down to her ankles. A small pool of her cum had grown on the table, but much of it had splashed up onto her legs and stomach from his forceful fingering. Her abs were soaked in her juices.

He started to disrobe. "Feel good?"

"F ... fuck ... too ... too much."

He chuckled warmly, and threw his jacket, shirt, boxers, shoes, tie, everything onto the nearby couch, before he came around to stand between the exhausted woman's legs.

“Just lay there, relax. I’ll take care of everything.”

“W ... wait...”

He reached down for her hips, and turned her over. Gently of course; it was a table, not a bed. And he doubted Beatrice was paying very much attention to the exact placement of her limbs so as to catch herself. So he went slowly, and turned her over so she was lying on the table on her stomach, and her legs again dangled off of the table edge.

Her ass was on full display. Large, toned, connected to thick legs of muscle, and the dildo still embedded deep inside her with its flared end between her two cheeks. He put one hand onto her ass, lightly kneaded the beautiful mound, while his other guided his cock at a subtle downward angle to find the entrance of her pussy.

Absolutely drenched. He groaned as he slowly sank his swollen glans into her clenching muscles, and reveled in the sparks of bliss her dripping, hot flesh sent down his length. Deeper, and deeper, each inch a struggle as her body clamped down, and what little room inside her was split between him and the large insertion in her ass. And each inch forced his love to groan into the table.

Once he’d sunk himself balls deep into her wet insides, he slapped her ass. Hard enough to make a sound, to make it shake with the impact, to make Triss stir from her post orgasm bliss.

“Hey...”

He slapped her ass again, and a couple more times. Each pulled a small mewl from the exhausted Nosferatu, and each made her cunt clench down on his cock until he felt new juices, hot and slick, start to leak onto his testicles.

Only when Triss started to push against the table with her hands to stand up, did he start thrusting.

“Wait! Need ... a break man ... please. I ... fuuuu...”

She set her head back down on the table, and went limp as he started to fuck her. Every thrust was met with resistance, tightening muscles that fought to stop him, to get control of the situation. And every thrust was met with the limited space of her insides. He could feel the plug filling her ass, fighting for room, making every stroke tighter than normal. He had to have more.

He grabbed her hips, and started to pound into her. Each thrust caused his balls to slap against her lips and the chain that dangled from her clitoris. Each thrust forced her to grunt, and shake with the impact. Each made her ass jiggle against his pelvis, before he slowly withdrew almost every inch of his length, and slammed back into her again.

She started to shake, her knees began to knock together, and her legs started to give out. With her body still laid out along the table, her sudden surrender to gravity made her boots spread outward along the floor. The table kept her torso horizontal, and her ass at a perfect height for him to hold her hips, and continue thrusting.

When warm gushes of liquid started to drip from his testicles, he slowed down. Triss's noises had reduced to tiny whimpers, and her body was stuck permanently trembling. But each time he pulled her hips toward him, and he pushed his own forward until the length of his cock was stretching her deeper, a gush of heat and wetness soaked the underside of his length at the base. She was squirting, a lot, far more than she normally did, with enough volume and force that he felt her cum dripping from his testicles to splash on the floor.

He buried himself to the hilt, and with one hand still holding her hips, he raised the other and slapped her ass.

“Nnnn ... please...” She stirred, head lulling side to side, and her hands started to press against the table again. Trying to get up.

Well he certainly didn't want that. He slapped her ass again, hard enough for a red blemish to spread over the cheek, hard enough for it to make a satisfying sound, hard enough for the girl to put her head back down, and squeeze her cunt until it was Julias's turn to groan. So god damn heavenly inside her trembling, soaked, boiling insides. The pleasure sparks were starting to build between his legs, along his length and testicles, demanding release.

Triss started to get up again, but he reached out with both hands, and took her wrists.

“S ... stop ... need ... break.”

“No you don't.” He brought both of her hands into the small of her back, and pinned them there by the wrist with the grip of one of his hands. “If I had known you'd get this sensitive from this sort of play, I'd have indulged a lot sooner you know.” She squirmed, struggled, tried to free her hands from his, but he kept a solid grip around both of her wrists with his one hand, snug to her back. And his other hand took her hip once again as he slammed his hips forward.

“Didn't ... think you'd ... like ... getting rough.” She lifted her head enough to peek over her shoulder at him. Eyes half closed and glazed with a subtle shine of tears. Maybe he was being too rough? But, there was no denying how tightly she was squeezing on his girth, how much she was soaking him, and there was a tiny smile on her lips, the mischievous sort she sported when she was happy.

He gave her ass another slap. She moaned and set her head back down, and her wriggling lessened. Surrender.

He growled down over his prey, and started to thrust hard once again. With one hand holding hers down to her back, his other holding her hip, he started to pound into her. The blossoming waves of pleasure demanded release, and each stroke of his cock along her gripping insides grew almost painful with the rising bliss. His glans was swollen to the point of bursting, and each time he forced it into his love until her insides had to stretch inward to fit him, he felt another wave of his cum pooling inside him, preparing.

Before he came, she did. Her voice came out again as whimpers, and her insides clamped down as another warm gush of fluids splashed against his testicles. This time, he didn't slow down. Her whimpers turned into guttural grunts as he rammed into her squeezing pussy, and another wave of her cum splashed against him as her clit chain bounced and jiggled with each plunge.

So tight, it was making his eyes roll upward as well. Each time he slammed his hips forward, impaled her until he felt her lips around the hilt of him, felt her squirt and drench their connection, his cum started to build in his length, and he had to flex his pelvic floor to keep it from escaping. Not yet, just a few more strokes.

As the pleasure became too much, he sank himself into her hot flesh, and stayed there. He kept her pinned as he ground his hips into her, and let the clenching spasms of her muscles milk the pleasure from him, until his cum started to pour into her.

“F ... fucking ... finally,” she said between her quietened mewls.

Julias closed his eyes for only a moment, as the first gush of his thick fluid squirted from his shaft. He forced his eyes open, and stared down at the woman's ass, how the large shape was pressed tight to his body, how he could still see the flared end of the large dildo that penetrated her. He could still feel it too, fighting for room inside her, stretching her insides and pressing against his cock.

He started to fuck her again, but slowly, tenderly. His glans had grown so sensitive, each inch he managed to work sent almost painful waves of bliss down his length, until another wave of his cum flooded Triss's depths. Each gush of his warm fluid was a wave of pleasure through his body, and he let out relaxed, sighing groans as he felt the tension of muscles melt away. Slow, gentle strokes were met with more of her squeezes, and soon, his cum started to trickle out of her and down his testicles. He let go of her hands, and set both of his to the table. A final squirt of his cum met her taut flesh, and he pushed himself balls deep into her to enjoy the wet warmth of it around his girth.

“Ok,” Triss said, and she put her hands to the table as well before she pushed herself up. The table shook with the quivering of her arms. “Ok, that ... maybe ... need ... a fucking break.”

He leaned over her and set his lips upon her ear as he continued to gently, lovingly fuck her. More moans, from both of them as they both shivered in post-orgasm bliss. And unable to stop himself, he reached out for her, and pulled her up to stand against him, ass pressed to his body and only kept level by her boots where he was now barefoot. And he hugged her, wrapped his arms around her, and set his chin to her neck. His cock softened, fell from her leaking body, and the woman purred as their juices trickled down her legs.

“You alright?” he said.

“Definitely. Fucking definitely, just ... tenderized now. And ... still tingly.”

“You soaked me quite a bit.”

“Yeah well, you know I do that, and ... you kind of caught me off guard, pinning me down and choking me and stuff. Didn’t think you’d go that far.”

“Seemed like you liked it.” He kissed her ear, her neck, and his hands drifted up her body to her nipple chain, underneath it, and to her nipples to lightly caress them. He cupped her breasts, wrists at a cross along her stomach, and massaged them with soft fingers along their undersides.

She melted into him, enough so when he took a step back, she went back with him. A few more steps back and they were back to the couch, and he sat down. She joined him, sitting between his thighs and leaning back into his chest, so he could resume massaging her body. The toy was still inside her, and she trembled with each adjustment of her position.

“Fucking loved it,” she said. “Just, uh, let’s not do this every night. Bit intense.”

“I see.” He switched to the other side of her neck, and sighed contentment into her ear before he kissed her earlobe and the chains that dangled from it. “Then perhaps next time, I’ll light some candles, massage your whole body, and then we can spoon in my bed. Tender, slow, gentle.”

She sighed, a not-so-content sigh, and laughed. “I mean, if we’ll get one of those wireless anal vibrators you were talking about, sure.”

---

---

~~Natasha~~

It was a change, such a change, such a huge, weird, fun change.

Natasha sat up from Jessy’s bed, and looked over at her friend. The girl was on the floor, still between her two ghouls, and getting a rough pounding from them. At the same time. One underneath her, one behind her and holding her shoulders, hitting her hard enough to make her ass jiggle with each thrust. Way too hard for anal, way too hard! But Jessy seemed to enjoy it, to the point Natasha could hear the slap of flesh on wetness.

The little Mekhet looked over at the other two ghouls. They were satisfied, each having cum inside her; nothing as adventurous as Jessy though. But, she’d still enjoyed several orgasms while two men had taken turns in her. She’d encouraged them to indulge in positions they wanted to try, again nothing crazy, but at the same time, she kind of preferred it when she let them pick the position.

Considering their stamina, ghouls and sex drugs and all that, they'd tried many positions, and by the end of the night, both had cum inside her sex, twice each. Both were spent, and both were smiling even as they struggled against the allure of post-orgasm sleep. She pat Chris on the chest, and he smiled up at her from the bed before his eyes drifted closed. Vincent too, though far more exhausted as she'd taken a drink of him. Jessy would have probably forced them to do some push ups or something. Natasha was content to bask in the afterglow of a belly full of blood and a good, long bout of sex with two beautiful men.

“Jessy,” she said.

“Y-Yeah?” Jessy put her hands on her ghoul's chest, and sat up a little straighter. Her breasts bounced up and down with the impact of ghouls, each thrust earning a quick, small groan from the Gangrel.

“What ... what do you do ... w-when men flirt with you?”

“Ooh, someone interested in you?” Without skipping a beat, Jessy reached behind her to hook an arm over her shoulder and behind Isaac's head. She combed his hair as she turned her head to meet him, kiss him, and suckle on his neck; no Kiss yet though. Knowing Jessy, she'd do that after.

“I ... m-m-maybe ... the Uratha.”

“Oh, details!”

Natasha had no idea why she was having this conversation now, just after she'd finished with two ghouls, and Jessy still busy with two more. Something about the setting, the blatant sexual openness of it unlocked Natasha's barriers. She found she could talk about things she normally couldn't. It was hard to stay shy about as simple a matter as flirting when looking at someone being doubly penetrated by her sex slaves. And Jessy seemed to enjoy conversation mid-sex anyway. Maybe in fifty years of similar sexual conquests, Natasha would be able to talk in the middle of intercourse. Probably not.

“Well, when they captured me, t-two of them kept an eye on me, guarded me while I slept. And ... and ... I d-drunk one of them.” And, despite herself, despite the fact she was bringing this up in the middle of an orgy, she blushed at the memory.

“Damn girl. Did they taste good?”

“ ... very good. And ... v-v-very ... revitalizing.”

“Any sex with that meal?”

“W-What? No! I'd only ... just ... met him.”

“And you know he was flirting?”

“He ... they.”

“They? Oh ... nnnng.” Jessy's hands fell back to Brad's chest, and she sank her weight into them as Isaac took her hips and slowed down. He started to thrust a little slower, deeper, each motion a long and full stroke that made Jessy's whole body shake. Brad's hands found her breasts, and he held onto them as Jessy started to shake. Between index and thumb, he tweaked her nipples, far harder than Natasha would think pleasurable, but Jessy was a whole different beast. What Tasha thought was way too rough, Jessy seemed to melt from.

Tasha leaned in closer from her perch on the bed, and watched as Jessy came. The girl's body, all that lean muscle highlighting a feminine ratio, it was a visual treat she couldn't look away from.

Isaac knew his master well, and he continued to fuck her ass as she climaxed, each deep thrust making her large buttocks bounce and jiggle. Each thrust making the girl cream over Brad's cock, until visible drops of her cum were pooling and trickling down his hips.

Girl didn't even blush as she soaked Brad. Just came, came hard, not a care in the world or slightest sense of insecurity. Made Natasha jealous. To just let go like that and focus on the moment was very, very much not in her programming.

"Ok," Jessy said, "you said they? Was it more than one werewolf?"

"Y-Yeah. I drank from the one named Arturo, b-b-b-but ... but Matthew, his friend, he was there too. And, and they ... they were both ... nice to me."

"Nice?"

"More than n-nice, you know? Like ... like ... Art said I ... w-was cute ... and sexy."

Jessy grinned at her. "Sounds like flirting to me."

"Y-Yeah." Yeah, it did! He'd been flirting with her, genuine flirting, the sort of flirting she could reciprocate, if she didn't want to stab him. He was very stab worthy, after all. "And his friend Matt, he kept ... kept smiling at me t-too. The same way ... Art was."

"You mean this way?" Jessy used her hand to point Isaac's head her way. He'd set his chin on Jessy's shoulder, and he smiled at Natasha as his hands started to roam up and down Jessy's body.

"Yeah, that ... that was it." She blushed, horribly, as Isaac continued to smile at her, grin at her, even wink once, as one of his hands took Jessy by the hip, while his other reached down between her thighs. She couldn't see with his hand in the way, but Tasha could see the response from Jessy's body as her ghoulish no doubt started to caress her undoubtedly very swollen, very sensitive clitoris.

“Sounds like they both definitely wanted to fuck you then.” She nodded, like it was no big thing, like it was perfectly normal. It wasn’t normal! Men didn’t give her those eyes.

Or did they? She never looked for them, never actually opened her eyes to see what sort of looks guys — or girls — were giving her. Always better to keep that sort of stuff in the background, ignore it, and focus on ... whatever. Bleh, what a stupid excuse. She was being dumb, and now, she had absolutely no excuse for not noticing these things, not after the sexual hazing Jessy had given her.

“ ... maybe I should ... pursue this?” she said.

“Maybe. Do you like them?” She lowered herself down to Brad’s chest, and kissed her ghou, tugging on his lips with hers before settling into a proper kiss. Never mind that Isaac continued to fuck her ass; it didn’t affect Jessy at all.

Tasha lay upon the sheets of the bed, and got comfortable on her stomach before reaching for a pillow and hooking it under her cheek, head turned to face Jessy, one arm dangling off the bed’s edge.

“I b-b-barely know them.”

“Well, sex is a good ice breaker.”

“I don’t want to have sex with them! N ... not ... not so soon.”

“Then I suggest you try a classic date. Dinner and a movie. Dinner, being them.” Jessy winked at her, leaned down, and bit into Brad.

God, the sight of the big man squirming with orgasm, with the Kiss, with his blood being drained while Jessy milked his cock of cum, it was too damn much. If she hadn't already had her fill for the night, the sounds alone would have sent Tasha right back to the ghouls for more. But, she was content to watch this time, just watch, and admire the sight of Jessy milking her ghoul of both fluids.

“So I should ... try t-to see them again?”

“Maybe. Not like we're at war with the Uratha.” Jessy sat up, wiped the blood from the corner of her mouth, and leaned back into Isaac's awaiting embrace. Now that his master wasn't drinking Brad anymore, Isaac resumed fucking her ass, even as Brad's cock was still hard inside the woman, and his cum leaked out of her. Tasha didn't try to hide she was staring at the connection, at the mess. And Jessy didn't try to hide it. If anything, she put herself on display for Natasha, spreading her legs more and pushing her hips forward.

“Then I ... I should ... t-t-t-talk to them again ... at least. He said I was cute, and sexy, and ... and Matt looked at me with the same eyes.”

“Then I fully endorse pursuing this. Just don't let it get in the way of your new job with the Prince. S'long as that's fine, I suggest testing those waters.”

“Y-Yeah, maybe I should,” Natasha said.

Jessy smiled, nodded, and got back into the rhythm of sex with her one remaining conscious ghoul.

“ ... that ... that doesn't hurt?”

“What?”

“What Isaac’s d-doing. That’s ... he’s ... thrusting kinda hard.” For all her experimentations over the decades, for all her toys and the different things she’d done with her own body, anal was always a delicate thing. Any attempts at hard or fast were painful, no matter how much lubricant she used. But Isaac was fucking her with all the enthusiasm of a young man who couldn’t control himself.

Burying his face into his master’s neck, he started to cum. He let out a low groan, and hugged Jessy tight to his chest as he started to climax inside her. Jessy reached behind her with her hands, one over her shoulder to stroke the man’s hair, one by her hip to hold his. And she pushed herself toward her ghoul, no doubt milking him, purposefully squeezing and drawing out every drop of his pleasure and his cum.

It was beautiful to watch.

“It used to, long fucking time ago when I was just getting into this.” She pat Isaac on the cheek, and crawled off of him and onto Brad’s chest. Poor man, she sat on his chest and got comfortable, arms up and stretching herself out. “But with some practice, I learned what muscles to squeeze, relax, or push on. Why, want to try some anal with the boys? We can keep it super gentle.”

“No! No, um ... no.” Way too much for so soon. She shouldn’t have asked; now Jessy was probably piecing together what sort of masturbation habits Natasha had developed. Woman was smarter than she let on.

“Well, I think there’s a kinky little woman inside you,” Jessy said. She crawled over to the bed, and sat down beside it, big wicked grin on her face as she set her chin on the sheets. Her left hand found Natasha’s naked back, her butt, and the Gangrel teased her skin with caressing fingers.

“Hey, d-don’t...”

Rolling her eyes, Jessy continued to caress Tasha's back, her spine, the curve of her shoulder blades, the dip of the small of her back, where her buttocks met her hamstrings. "Admit it, you're really happy you finally joined me for a feast with the ghouls."

Tasha, cheek on her pillow, still lying on her stomach, and arm dangling off the bed, looked at Jessy. The Gangrel was giving her that look again, that hungry look. Her eyes were devouring her, her naked body, and where her hand was tracing her butt. Not just tracing, squeezing too, a little.

"... I am happy. That I d-d-did, I mean." She blushed, but didn't stop Jessy's rather curious fingers.

In this bout, just like last time, Jessy had spent a lot of time watching her have sex. She didn't join her or anything, which Tasha was thankful for; she liked Jessy but she wasn't ready for something like that. But then, it seemed to satisfy Jessy just to watch Natasha have sex. Sexual satisfaction by proxy, maybe?

"You really have an amazing body, you know. So tiny, but you got this sweet little ass and it's just so damn cute."

She almost asked if Jessy wanted to have sex with her, just to satisfy her curiosity about Jessy's desires. Don't sleep with your friends! And besides, Natasha didn't find herself sexually attracted to women ... usually.

"Th-Thank you ... you uh ... you really do look ... amazing, when you're ... y-you know."

Jessy brought her face closer to hers, almost touching noses, and winked. "Damn right I do." With a chuckle, the Gangrel stood up, stretched herself out a few more times, and clapped her hands thrice. "Ok boys, get the fuck outta here."

Natasha watched, giggling, smiling. The close encounter with Jessy settled her a little; seemed like Jessy didn't want to actually do anything to her, just watch things get done to her. Which was an innocent enough kink to satisfy, and Tasha had to admit, she really enjoyed having sex with Jessy's ghouls. They knew what they were doing, and they were very fit. Maybe not as big and strong as the werewolves, but she doubted anyone looked as big and strong as them.

The four men left, two of them getting dragged out by their two companions, drained as they were. But all of them were smiling, and they saluted their boss before they left.

"Umm..." Tasha pushed herself up to sit on her hip, and she watched Jessy walk around, getting dressed. "I ... wanted to tell you. I'll b-b-be getting a new apartment soon, d-different building."

"Yeah, figured that'd happen." Jessy slipped on her thong — always with the thongs — and then her jeans with all the grace of an ox, falling onto her ass on the bed and getting her legs up so she could pull the jeans on from above. "Surprised Maria or Michael haven't forced you to move out yet."

"I ... I guess, yeah." She hadn't really thought about it. She was the wounded party, but it was their prerogative to force her to move out of a building generally considered Invictus territory. "B-But! But ... I ... still..."

"Girl, you know we're friends. I'll visit you wherever, you visit me wherever, wasn't even a worry." Jessy, topless and shameless, turned on her hip and butt to look at her. "And I do hope we can continue these little orgies of ours. Watching you ride the boys? Or giving them blowjobs? So hot, little you handling big dick like that."

The girl was absolutely carnal! Lascivious to the point of corruption, like she was possessed by a succubus. A real one, not a Daeva.

“The boys like you too,” Jessy went on, “and not just cause of the blowjobs; which is a major treat for them by the way. Normally I don’t cause I prefer to save their energy for fucking.”

“Oh, oh um ... I-I ... uh...” No idea what to say to that. She just ... liked doing it. It was nice, seeing the boys squirm in pleasure like that. Made her feel good, made her feel ... sexy. “I ... would like to keep d-doing ... these visits too.”

“Fucking yeah!” Jessy slid closer and gave her a punch in the shoulder. Such a tomboy. Tasha rubbed her wound and frowned, or tried to, but Jessy’s smile broke it easily. “Though, I mean don’t feel like you can’t go fuck someone else. One of those wolf boys tries to get into your pants? Bone him, bone him hard. And bring me all the details.” Naturally, Jessy’s distaste for the wolves went out the window the moment sex was involved.

Natasha rolled her eyes, slipped off the bed, and walked around to get her clothes; as expected, Jessy watched her every moment of her search.

“Th-Thanks ... again. And, uh ... I ... I mean, maybe?” Art was really cute, but he seemed like a devious bastard too. Matt was really cute as well, and he seemed so much nicer, and ... bigger. Giant big. “So, I should just ... ask one ... on a d-d-date?”

“Only if they don’t ask you first. When they do, play a little shy, a little coy; should be easy for you.”

“H-Hey!”

“And then bat your eyelashes, agree to do whatever they want, laugh at their lame jokes, and when they ask if you want to go back to your place or their place, you say yes. Don’t forget the yes part, it’s important to the process of getting laid.”

“B-But, what if ... what if they ... d-d-d-don’t ask?”

“I doubt Uratha are the shy type. But if you’re getting along, and they aren’t asking, just ask them. Give them the innocent-young-girl eyes too, and they’ll be on you in seconds.”

Once she’d gotten some pants and a shirt on, Natasha facepalmed, and groaned. Jessy’s dating advice, as antiquated as oil lamps. Not that Natasha had any right to judge. The thought of a date, a genuine date, had her feeling more jittery than having an orgy with Jessy and her ghouls ever did.

---

Back at her apartment. Still a few hours until sunrise, but Antoinette didn’t have another day scheduled with her until tomorrow night. For now, she had nothing to do. If Daniel had been around, she’d be with him, either being tasked with learning about the occult from ancient, often dead cultures, or trying to chat with him. But chatting with him was like trying to get blood from a stone.

Who was he before he came to America? How many childes did he have before her? How did he and Antoinette meet, and become members of the Ordo Dracul? How long have they been in the covenant? Did the man ever have a romantic partner?

There were rumors about him and someone named Athalia. But the details of that relationship were nonexistent. Maybe she should just ask him about it, or ask Antoinette.

Laptop on in front of her on the kitchen counter, she was researching ancient Egypt and the various rituals they performed. The way they treated their dead, especially the royal dynasties, was fascinating, and normally she would have been very absorbed in her reading. The mummification process, canopic jars, the various positions and roles involved in the ceremony. And of course, the most grandiose of displays for their dead, the great pyramids. Not an insignificant amount of Antoinette’s collection of artifacts came from Egypt’s ancient world, and knowledge of their origins was important to Tasha’s new role. The problem was everything she was reading also came with nightmarish imagery from her imagination, given new powers of torture by the Prince's device.

Just looking at pictures of the things they found inside old tombs was making her dead stomach churn. No doubt, putting old mummy wrappings or canopic jars or such under Antoinette's chandelier of blue would reveal nasties she'd prefer not knowing existed.

She'd be chasing the spider lead as Antoinette had asked, if she had a lead anymore. The Uratha calling the tunnels in Devil's Corner off limits meant—

Knock knock.

She raised a brow, and hopped on over to the door to peek through the hole. Two men waved, no doubt able to see her shadow underneath the door.

Arturo, and Matthew.

Shit! Shit, what should she do? She looked down at herself; jeans and a t-shirt. Change? No no, the Uratha didn't care about that. She jumped around a few times and spun around. Were they here to take her away again? No, they had no reason for that, with Jack as their new middleman. They had no reason to show up at her place at all.

Calm down calm down. Arturo and Matthew were the two that treated you nicely ... ish. They smiled at you, let you feed, flirted. Maybe you could just let them in? They were either here for business, or just to say hi. Either made her shaky.

After a few deep, useless breaths, she opened the door.

“H-Hello...”

“Hey there.” Art stepped in enough to get in the door frame, and he leaned against it, hands in his pockets. “Hard tracking you down. You jump rooftops all the time?”

“I ... oh. My scent. You tracked m-m-my scent.”

Matt stood behind Art, hands up and pressing against the doorframe. “Don’t worry, you smell perfectly lovely.”

She frowned at him. “I’m a vampire. I ... don’t smell.”

They both laughed. They were teasing her. The whole conversation reeked of high school, and she was suddenly tempted to get surly and slam the door. But, this wasn’t high school, and she wasn’t a silly little girl. Teasing was supposed to roll off of you as nothing more than a fun way to talk, and say that you like the person you’re teasing. If she got cranky, she’d be the one getting immature, not them.

She stepped back, and motioned for them to come in.

“Thanks,” Art said, and he followed her in. “Cozy place you got here. Room alone?”

“Y-Yes.”

Matt whistled, wiped his shoes off at the door, took them off, and sat down at one of the stools at her counter. Art kept moving forward, until Matt yanked him back by the collar. “Dude. Shoes.”

Art rolled his eyes, before he acquiesced. Once in his socks, he walked through her apartment, and offered a similar whistle to Matt.

“You Invictus really do like to splurge.” He gestured to the wide open living room, the various furniture, the enormous television, the large windows, the laptops.

“I’m ... I’m not Invictus, not anymore. But ... I still have the m-money.” She managed a tiny grin as she pulled herself up onto the stool next to Matt. Calm, no need to worry. “Money is ... rarely a barrier for Kindred.”

“That so? Sitting on a fortune?” Art said.

“ ... yes. A s-s-small one.” It was true, after all, she had a small fortune. She didn’t need to live in an apartment, but she liked the small space. Well, small-ish, considering how nice an apartment it was. “But, you d-didn’t track me down to ... t-talk about money.”

“No.” Matt put an elbow to the counter and rested his chin on his palm. He seemed quite calm. That was good right? “Much as we’re cool with Avery and David’s choice about Jack, Art and I wanted to talk to you about this.”

“Me? W-Why me?”

Art shrugged and joined them at the counter, opposite side, and leaned onto it with his elbows. “Instinct.”

“Instinct,” she said.

“Yeap,” the two men said in unison, and nodded in unison.

“Instinct?”

“Echo in here?” the two men said in unison, again.

She looked between the two of them with something between surprise and a frown; apparently, this was normal behavior for them.

“What d-d-did you want to tell me?”

Art nodded. “Well maybe we can do a little question trading? You were skulking around in our hunting ground, and we’d really like to know why.”

So that’s how it was. They just wanted information. She shook her head and sat up straight as she folded her arms across her chest.

“N-No deal.”

“Come on.” Matt leaned in a little closer, elbows sliding along the counter. “Avery told us about how things went down last time, and we don’t want that. Last thing we’re hoping for is some Kindred getting killed on our hunt.”

“Yeah.” Art slid around the counter and sat down in the third stool. “Antoinette keeps calling shit in from the other side, and that Minerva girl bit off more than she could chew. We’re just trying to keep shit from getting out of hand again.”

“Antoinette is ... is d-d-doing this?”

“Mmhmm,” Matt said. “She fiddles with the Gauntlet. Things keep slipping through; mostly harmless, if a bit vice oriented. But she increases the risk of particularly nasty things from leaving the Shadow and coming over.”

“Gauntlet? Shadow?” Oh god, what was Antoinette doing? Wait wait, don’t let them know you work for her, not yet. They had information, and she needed that information. But if Antoinette was the reason these problems were even happening, if she’s the reason the Uratha were here at all ... what did any of that mean?

“Mmhmm,” Art said, the same way Matt did. “Avery doesn’t want us telling you vamps the details. Afraid another Minerva situation will happen. But she’s generalizing, afraid. She’s really changed from the girl Jacob and Antoinette knew, since her pack got wiped out.”

“P-Pack ... wiped out?”

“Yeah.” Matt turned around in his stool, and leaned onto the counter with his back to it. The two men got very comfortable very quickly. “Lost her old pack, her old totem, and ... things are very different now. We didn’t know her before then, but now we’re here, and judging from what Avery told us, you guys really hate her. Or at least your bosses do.”

“Understandable,” Art said, “given what happened. Avery told us everything. Nasty shit, when a host festers in the world, and Avery wouldn’t stop to bring one of those infestations down, now or then.”

Hosts? Totem? Minerva? So many questions.

“W-Why are you telling me all this?”

“Cause,” Matt said, “we’re not your enemies. We’re here to clean up a mess someone made, probably Antoinette. We can clean it up before it gets insane, thanks to David.”

She didn’t like how much they were accusing her boss. She didn’t like how much she agreed with them. The things that she’d seen, the strange ghosts, the objects, the weird symbols and laboratories the Prince ran, it all reeked of the sort of madness the wolves seemed to be hinting at.

“I ... I can tell you ... I can ... t-t-tell you ... I ... I do work ... for Antoinette.” Of all the knowledge she had to share, that was the only thing that was genuinely not a secret. They’d find out eventually.

“Oh ... well then.” Matt scratched the scruff of his chin, then his head, then the back of his neck, like he was embarrassed or something. “I guess you already know a lot about what we’re telling you.”

“N-No ... no, I don’t. Elders keep their secrets, for good reasons ... Like Uratha keep their secrets.”

Matt smirked, but nodded. “I guess that explains what you were doing in the tunnels then.”

“It ... d-d-does?”

“Yeah, to an extent. Antoinette would want you looking into the shit she might be causing. Sent you to the tunnels to investigate the disappearances, and the spider traces.”

That couldn't be it. They were warned about the spiders; it couldn't have been Antoinette's doing. But ... the disappearances, the spider webs. They ... they were after Fiona then. But that made no sense either, why would they be hunting a Begotten? They weren't a major threat, according to Antoinette. They didn't fit the bill of what Uratha would hunt, not according to what Matt was telling her. Or did they?

Something wasn't adding up.

Chapter 33

~~Natasha~~

Art got up and started to look around her apartment, fingers dragging along her counter tops, her couches, her tables, her laptop. They stopped on the laptop in particular when his eyes found the screen.

“Researching ancient Egypt mm?”

“I ... I uh...” She reached over and closed it. Didn’t want them gleaming any more than they needed. Or at least that was the plan, but the two wolves were telling her a lot. Maybe she should reciprocate a little? “Why ... why are you t-telling me so much?”

Matt shrugged. “Like we said, we’re not your enemies. Besides, you seem nice.”

“Shit load nicer than the Kindred in Tijuana,” Art said.

“You came from T-T-Tijuana?” Art did look like he could have come from Mexico.

“Half the pack,” Matt said. “Clara, Art, Stephanie, Teresa, and Javier did. Avery drifted around the world after she lost her pack, so she tells it. Met some of us further North, met a bunch of us in Tijuana, and we’ve sort of wandered around.”

“Which no one likes.” Art ambled to her couch in front of the large TV, and he sat down with a bit of a bounce. Her poor couch; Art was a big guy. Not as big as Matt, but still, the man was big enough to make her couch creak with the impact. “We’re Meninna. We don’t want to drift around, we want a home.”

“A home? You mean ... D-D-Dolareido?”

Art shrugged, and started looking around the couch and the end table. “Maybe. Most of the pack is used to city living. You got a remote for this colossal thing?”

She blinked at the man, and pointed to the remote on the kitchen table. He fetched it, and immediately started one of the streaming apps on the television. Making his home already.

“What’s Meninna?”

“First Tongue word for the Hunters in Darkness, our tribe,” Matt said. “Sort of like your covenants. The Meninna don’t like to drift; we want a home. We were in Tijuana, and weren’t getting along with the Kindred there at all. Got to the point it was going to be war, so ... Avery decided to leave.”

“Leave? D-Doesn’t ... sound like something an Uratha would do. Thought y-you would fight for your t-t-t-territory.”

“We would have,” Art said, “if Avery was the person you all suspect she is, that Jacob suspects she is. Much as David guided us here, I’m sure Avery agreed partially cause she wants to fix the shit she stirred here.”

“I ... I know she got some Kindred killed, during the hunt. But how’s J-Jacob fit into this?”

Art looked over the couch shoulder at her, and raised an eyebrow. “Avery killed Minerva, Jacob’s sweetheart. More than sweetheart, from what she says.”

Natasha winced. She’d started putting that picture together, but to hear it put so directly was chilling. Jacob had someone he loved, and Avery took her away. Brutally, if Tasha’s own encounter with the wolves was any indication.

“Jacob is ... a dangerous man, Arturo. If he wants Avery d-dead, he’ll ... he’ll make it happen.” No getting around that.

Art shrugged, scratched his neck a couple times, and returned to watching TV. “He can try. Wouldn’t be the first elder we’ve had to put down.”

Natasha shivered again. These wolves had so much confidence, but the man seemed quite serious, and Matt nodded with his friend’s words. And worst of all, Natasha could feel the strength they radiated; the beast in her gut felt like a pup in comparison.

“Hey, how old are you?” Matt said. “Can never tell with vampires.”

“Me? I ... I was in my early twenties when I was embraced. That w-was ... about fifty years ago.”

Both men whistled in unison, with the same pitch. How long had these two been friends? Must have been decades to be so in sync.

“Art and I both experienced our first change when we were in our late teens. Must have been thirty years ago.”

That pulled a smile out of her, despite herself. She was older than them, but she looked younger. Werewolves seemed to age, albeit slower than humans. But, for all their strength, they weren’t immortal, the one advantage Kindred seemed to have over the Uratha. And it was quite the advantage, when you lived to be as old as Jacob or Antoinette, when you had multiple fortunes in funds, and dozens of loyal agents skulking in the shadows.

“The first change? What w-was that like?”

Art winced and looked back to the TV. Uh oh. She looked over at Matt, and the man winced as well as he looked down at the counter top.

“Tough question,” Matt said. “Some people just go nuts and destroy their gym, like I did. Some people can end up killing nearby bystanders, like Art.” He tilted his head to his friend. When Natasha looked back to Art, the man wasn’t looking their way anymore. He had his eyes on the TV, but she could see the side of his face, and the small frown he held. But he turned down the TV volume, and turned on the captions; nice of him.

“Y-You lose control?”

Matt nodded. “Yeah. After that, we’re Uratha. See the world differently, see it like wolves. Learn the First Tongue like a scene from the Matrix, injected straight into the brain. Some of us start hearing and seeing things, like David. And we’re all changed in unique ways. I became Rahu; Kindred in Tijuana called us warriors ... and barbarians, when they felt like being jerks. Art became Irraka; Kindred in Tijuana called them assassins.”

Art laughed, and rolled his head back to look over his shoulder at them again, frown replaced with a smirk. “I’m sure they were trying to insult me too. Not much of an insult, saying I’m good at my job.”

Natasha tilted her head and looked at the man. Art was an assassin? She could ... understand that way of thinking.

She touched her chest. “I’m Mekhet. We ... we’re ... sneaky.”

The two wolves laughed. Big, hearty laughs, and nodded. “Yeah, you are.” Again, in unison.

“I ... I don’t t-t-talk with Kindred in other cities ... almost ever. We keep to ourselves, usually. What were they like? In T-T-Tijuana.”

“Brutal,” Art said, “nothing like how Avery said Dolareido is. Much as shit ended badly last time she was here, she had nothing but good things to say about the Kindred situation. Other than the Prince messing with the Gauntlet.”

“D-Does her messing with the Gauntlet make her your enemy?” She had to talk to Antoinette about the Gauntlet. Did she know what that meant? The Prince must have, if she dealt with the Uratha in the past. But whatever happened with the Uratha back then, it wasn’t stopping Antoinette from experimenting with the occult.

“No,” Matt said. “It would, if she was causing some serious imbalances. But, honestly? I’m surprised. Despite Avery’s concerns, despite David’s warning, things aren’t bad here. Not yet.”

“That’s ... good then?”

“Maybe,” Art said, “maybe not. The hosts are sneaky fuckers, sneakier than any Mekhet. And we haven’t been here long enough to have scouted the whole city. Other things from the Shadow are hiding in the city too, we know that. And other things again.” The man sighed, ran his fingers through his black hair a few times, and motioned for the two of them to come to him. “Sit, watch. My favorite show has two new seasons I haven’t been able to watch, and I plan to binge.”

She blinked at him, got up off her stool, walked over to him, leaned toward his face, and blinked at him a few more times from close range. “Excuse me? This is m-m-my place!”

“What, you don’t like Game of Thrones?”

“I ... I do, but—”

“Come on.” He reached out for her, took her two shoulders, and picked her up like she was weightless. She squeaked and started squirming, but all it did was land her on the couch beside Art. “I sense an impending sex scene and I don’t want to miss it.”

She blinked a dozen more times, looked down at herself, then at the TV, then at herself, then over at Matt. The big guy winked at her and came over to sit on the couch as well, trapping her between the two men.

Welp, self conscious didn't begin to describe what she was feeling. She had so much information to share with Antoinette, so much information she needed to filter through to see what was even safe to share with her boss. Too hard to focus on that when she was sitting between two huge wolves, and a combination of deadly circumstances and very hard nipples were on the television screen.

And to make everything worse, when she glanced at Art, he caught her glance and sneaked in a wink before she could snap her head back to the television. When she glanced Matt's way, he did the same thing! These two ruthless predators acted like a couple of silly buffoons.

Good god what had she gotten herself into.

~~Damien~~

Someone was looking for him.

Damien listened close, eyes closed, ears as open as he could manage, and he filtered through the quiet hum of the tunnels. At this depth in the tunnels, the sound of the traffic above still made noise, but barely more than a gentle purr. What made more noise was the whirr of ventilation, and computers. His current hiding spot was an old maintenance room off a functioning subway tunnel, for no other reason than sometimes, he wanted to hear nearby people.

Someone was walking down the tunnel to his little hideaway. The trot of high quality shoes on the concrete. Invictus probably. Knock knock.

He opened the door, and eyed the man standing before him. A tall man, dark skin, shaved head, very well dressed. And alive.

“Madam Maria Turio of the Invictus, of the council and triumvirate of the First Estate, would like to speak to you, Mister ... Damien.”

Mister Damien. What a joke. Damien sighed and looked the man up and down. Judging by how he carried himself, he was wearing a vest holster under his suit jacket, probably with two different pistols within if he remembered correctly; and he usually did. A high caliber pistol meant for punching holes through barriers, large holes. And likely the fully automatic pistol Invictus occasionally sported. Perfect for reducing a target to mulch. He'd seen the ghouls switch to such armaments not long after the Uratha became a known presence.

Course, they didn't know that he knew. He was very good at what he did.

“And you are?” Damien said.

“Mister Smith.”

“... sure.” Invictus had the imagination of bricks. “Do I need anything, to speak with the elder Maria?”

“No ... except, in the Invictus, we generally refer to people by their last name ... Damien.”

And of course Mister Smith didn't know his. Damien couldn't help but smirk at that, before he got up and shrugged off his shoulders. For all his cockiness, he was going to be talking to an elder. To Maria Turio. She had two centuries of Kindred life on him. She was an ancient entity, and he was a child next to her, a child who'd avoided other Kindred his entire second life.

It was going to be a weird encounter.

---

The Grand Cathedral. Such a magnificent display, such beauty, such imposing brutality. The angels crushing demons, the cross, the virgin Mary. Standing before the enormous building filled him with awe, reverence, and fear.

“This way, Mister Damien ... I must say, it is not customary for Invictus to address each other so formally.” Mister Smith walked up the stairs, and pushed open the grand doorway. He made each step slowly, with weight and impact, as if his very walk was a ceremony to the grandeur of Lucas’s work. “Do you not have a last name we can address you with?”

“ ... been living in holes and tunnels for half a century, Mister Smith. Barely said a word to anyone in that time. Last names are...” He put his hand up to his face and shook his head. Dramatic, Damien. You don’t have to hide in tunnels anymore, so stop acting like the victim. “Burksen. It’s Burksen.”

“ ... very good, Mister Burksen.” The ghoul nodded, adjusted his tie, and stepped into the cathedral.

The nave of the huge building. Majesty and powerful elegance, it pulled at his memories and made his insides ache for the comfort of what used to be certainty, what used to be the simple joy of trusting someone else to guide your life. Candles were usually lit, back when he visited the cathedral when Lucas used it. And he saw such candles still existed, but were not lit. He knew Maria slept within the church, but not where.

His gaze lingered on the enormous pipe organ in the far back of the Cathedral. If God’s voice could be given sound, it would be the pipe organ.

Mister Smith waited for him halfway down the aisle, and after a moment to recollect himself, Damien walked after him. The empty pews struck another memory chord, each time he passed one, and he had to shrug the pain off. You’re a new man now, let it go.

By the pipe organ, there was a door. It looked like wood, and a crucifix adorned its face, but as Mister Smith opened it, the weight of its metal bulk became apparent. Damien had never seen the door opened before, but now he could tell it was most definitely meant to be a true barrier, something strong enough to stop Kindred—or at least explosives. Mister Smith took one of the nearby candles, lit it, stepped into the darkness past the door, and motioned for him to follow.

A stairway through darkness lit only by the candlelight of his escort. Every step fought to make him smile; such was a home he could agree with. The weight of the building above and around him felt less a cage, and more a foundation, of structure, of something he could lean his weight on knowing it'd support him.

Just delusions, Damien. You have a lifetime of beliefs to reevaluate, stop falling back on old views.

The stairway opened to a hallway of concrete bricks, not dissimilar to many of the tunnels beneath Dolareido. But this hallway was massive, easily fifty feet wide, twenty feet tall, and lined with candles that hung from braziers on chains, braziers with spikes that jutted from their bottoms, and small ones that lined the sides. Gates of a similar style blocked the tunnel at certain intervals, thick gates, closely knit, spiked bars, a formidable barrier to any humans that might try and break into the elder's sleeping grounds come daybreak.

Kindred were safe from each other during the day; they were not safe from each other's ghouls and subservients. It was not unheard of for ambitious — or stupid — Kindred to attack each other during sleeping hours using their servants. Sometimes it worked, but usually Kindred important enough to risk attacking were well guarded in such hours, like Maria.

There were other ghouls walking the underground tunnel, suits, each with a gun in hand; they had shotguns, and he was sure the pistols in their vest holsters were fully automatic. A single bullet was of little danger to a vampire, but a hail of them was a problem.

At each gate, a ghoul on the inside had to open it for them to continue. And not with some old fashioned lock and key or bolt, but with some heavy duty electronic, thick, tri-bolt locks with digital security keypads. The security keypads were subtle at least, likely to preserve the Gothic feel of the tunnel. He could understand; Lucas would have done the same.

With time and many gates behind him, the large tunnel opened into a larger room. Shaped like a dome, the huge room was lined with hanging drapes that covered where the curved concrete met the floor. Each drape was adorned with powerful imagery of history, of men with swords cutting down swaths of people, of victims being hanged by tree branch, of men riding into battle on horseback with bows and arrows. There was a painting of Jesus and the crucifixion, of Longinus stabbing him with the spear, and the following days of torment for Longinus.

Damien stepped closer toward the back wall where Maria was no doubt waiting for him, but his eyes continued to drift toward the decor. More of the hanging braziers with lit candles, but also many tables with various scatterings of objects: knives, swords, metal ornaments of similar intent. Other tables held shrines, more candles lit with tiny pictures surrounding them. But the center of the room and toward the back, it was open space save for a coffin stood upright against the the back wall, and a grand piano beside it.

Maria sat at the piano, dressed in a white nightgown that ran long, spilling over the floor in waves. Upon the piano were more candles, sitting on tiny metal skulls. One man, an ugly fellow with a hunched back and mangled face, slowly walked the room and swept, adjusted the candles, the drapes, everything.

He came close to Damien, and looked down at him from his great height. Big ghoul, one arm larger than the other, and one half of his face drooping so a touch of drool wet his lip. He wiped it away, nodded, made a tiny groan sound, and moved on.

“Forgive Matthias,” Maria said, raspy voice cutting through the quiet, “I rescued him from a mob two hundred years ago. He has since forever been my loyal ghoul and companion.”

“Two hundred years...” Damien managed a small nod for the sauntering man, before he walked past him and toward the ghost woman at the piano. The lighting was dim, even with a hundred candles, and the scattering of light sources made a thousand little shadows dance along every surface.

“Is that so long?” she said. Her fingers were on the keys of her piano, but she wasn’t playing anything yet. No music book either.

“It’s ... hard, to think about that long a life.”

“You spent half a century skulking around in the tunnels of this city, Damian Burksen. Half a century with only yourself for company. You are well aware of how long life can be, and how much longer that is when you are alone.” Her fingers started to move. Gentle sounds came from the piano, slow, deep, heavy waves that blanketed the room in the quiet tune. Deep and gentle? Quiet and heavy? Damien didn’t get music, but he knew enough to feel the emotion of the piece. “Frédéric Chopin’s March Funèbre.” Not a name he recognized, but the tune was a little familiar.

He watched and listened for a time, and looked around while the music’s gentle but depressing tone filled the room. March Funèbre indeed.

“You ... wanted to speak to me, Madam Turio?” She wasn’t his enemy, no need to make her one. Use her title and maybe this can go smooth.

“You understand this is the first time I’ve seen you in person, Damien? Impressive, considering how long you’ve been in the city. Very impressive.”

“ ... thank you.”

“You waited fifty years before you felt it was time for Lucas’s return. Patience is another trait I admire, Damien. But your ability to hide and your patience are not why I have asked you here. You are here because Mister Mire has brought your proposal to the Primogen. Or rather, it was brought up by Garry Tones before he was ready to speak of it; the mutt has his eyes and ears everywhere.” She smirked, and stopped playing as her eyes drifted from keys to him. “But, that would be hypocritical of me.”

Damien tried to not stare too much. But Nosferatu had disfigurements, and getting used to them was always a challenge when it was a new Nosferatu. He’d dealt with plenty in his small stint as bishop for Lucas; not enough time to become comfortable with them the way other Kindred had. And Maria’s disfigurements were not subtle. Such ruined skin; he’d seen fire logs that looked better. And the little bits of white mist that dripped from her clothes reeked of ghostliness.

“So ... everyone knows then, about Mister Mire’s idea.”

“Indeed.” Maria chuckled, a weird sound coming from her raspy, destroyed voice. “Needless to say, Mister Tones and the Prince are not thrilled with the idea.”

“I imagine not.” Damien looked down at the piano keys when Maria’s gaze became too much.

Seemed she got the hint, and started playing something different. When Damian raised a brow, she leaned into the piano a little to emphasize a note.

“Do you not recognize this piece?”

“It ... I recognize it, but that’s it.”

“Claude Debussy’s Suite bergamasque, third movement. Light ... of the moon.” She closed her eyes, and fell into each soft note. A very delicate piece of music, like floating on clouds. “Quite the famous piece, played everywhere and used in media all over the world.”

“I’ll have to take your word on that, Madam Turio. The past fifty years left little in the way of exposure to media.”

“ ... did you hide in a hole the whole duration of your secrecy, Burksen?”

“Mostly. I realized Devil’s Corner was usually ignored by Kindred, and the tunnels beneath it. So I hung out there a lot, but even then, I mostly stuck to the shadows.”

The elder nodded. “And that is where much of my concern lies. You were chosen by Lucas before such hardships, when you were a young kine, devoted and ... moved, by the enthusiasm Lucas carried.”

“ ... enthusiasm is an understatement, Elder. Lucas had the royal power of Ventrue and the suave wit of Daeva.” He winced as he looked down and let the memories come back. Easier to keep them buried and not think about it, but Maria didn’t seem to share that sentiment.

“He was also a tyrant.”

Again he winced, and not subtly either. Maria caught it, tilted her head to the side with his obvious discomfort, and waited.

“Yes, he was,” he said after a few far-too-long minutes of silence. “I ... regret that I did not see it in him, when he chose me, embraced me. Perhaps I could have done something to change him. But...”

“But?”

“I was just an ideological child when he embraced me. And before I could learn the reality, the purge began. We had to disappear into the tunnels, far into the depths, into tunnels only he knew about. Before I could learn what sort of man he really was, he went into torpor, to sleep until ... better times.”

Through it all, Maria didn't stop playing. “He trusted you with his life, Burksen. I remember, before Antoinette began the purge, before your embrace, Lucas told me about you. A bright young pupil, and loyal, and eager to read the full Testament of Longinus.”

“All too loyal. Yes, I was fascinated with the views found in the abridgment, and I devoured the full testament. I was ... so eager, to join the Sanctified. So eager to serve God, to ... please the Archbishop, and serve his goals.”

“Gaining the loyalty of the young is a common tactic of dictators, tyrants, and war mongers.” At last the elder stopped playing, tapped her chin a few times, and started playing once again. Started innocently enough, somber and slow, but soon her left hand was playing a complicated arrangement, while her right hand was a blur of notes, flighty, almost whimsical, before it descended into heavy steps spiraling downward without losing speed. And then back up again. Good god it was like watching a spider dance along the keys.

“How ... how long did that take to learn to play?”

“Days, but then, I was practicing the piano since 1823, Damien Burksen. Chopin, and this piece, Fantaisie Impromptu, is ... precious. The Archbishop first introduced me to the power of Frédéric Chopin. He...” She spoke without missing a single note, and there were a lot of notes. “It might interest you to know, that Archbishop is not a title Lucas earned.”

“It wasn’t?” Damien came in closer, and put a hand on the piano’s body as he watched the ghost woman play, if it could be called playing. To play at that speed and without pause while she talked, the ghost woman may as well have merged with the piano and considered it a part of her. “I ... I knew he called himself Archbishop, as did the other bishops. And even the Prince called him that.”

“He became the most powerful bishop in the city within days of his arrival. And soon after, nearby smaller cities recognized his power. He took the title Archbishop to recognize his position, a title normally saved for a Sanctified Prince.”

“ ... arrogant of him.”

Maria smiled at him. “I enjoyed his bravado. I enjoyed his confidence, his wit and intelligence. He enjoyed mine.”

Damien’s hand fell from the piano, and he looked away. In all the chaos, past and present, it was easy to forget Maria and Lucas were romantic with each other. Easy to not realize this wasn’t just about her getting to know him, but him meeting the love of the man, the tyrant, he’d planned to serve faithfully.

“It ... is a shame,” he said, “that ... that everything ... fell apart. That ... the Prince and Daniel had to kill him.” One word, one name, and the man responsible for Lucas’s death would be a dead man. He could feel the J on his lips. Just say the kid’s name, and the boy’s death would be certain. He got into your skull, made you kill your fellow Kindred, made you cut off your sire’s head.

No. He wasn’t that much of an idiot. And he didn’t lie to Jack either. He hoped.

“How familiar are you with the Testament of Longinus, Damien Burksen?”

“Quite familiar, Madam Turio. The Malediction, the Torments, the Rule of Golgotha, the Sanguinaria, and Book of Eschaton. I have read them all ... hundreds of times. I still have the extended edition that Lucas owned, with thousands of interpretations of passages by various Archbishops.” Not that any of their interpretations had ever truly helped him find meaning in the book. The passages themselves carried weight, but ... tainted, colored by Lucas’s words. He had work to do, to undo that damage.

After a few minutes of music, she stopped playing and got up. He took a step back; didn’t mean to or try to, but he couldn’t help it. Having a near three-hundred-year-old vampire who looked like a ghost walking within a few feet of you was not something he was used to. She frowned at his mistake, and he forced himself to step back in toward her.

“And you feel comfortable teaching the word of Longinus?”

“ ... does any bishop feel comfortable teaching it?”

Maria smirked at him. “True enough, Burksen.” Trying to interpret the journey of Longinus was difficult. Trying to interpret the rules more difficult. Trying to interpret the prophecies into valuable wisdom nigh impossible. “If you become a bishop, and the Prince allows it, your job will be twofold. You will have to teach the Testament of Longinus to those who will listen, and that will be far more difficult without Tony’s old lair and its ... unnatural influence. But even more importantly Burksen, you will be a keeper and chronicler of history. What Garry has not yet managed to destroy, what I managed to salvage, you will maintain.”

Oh. He’d expected this meeting to be about his ability to teach the Testament of Longinus, not about becoming a chronicler. That was actually kind of uplifting.

“I have more faith in my abilities to manage books and—”

“It’s 2017, Burksen.” A frown followed, but not a harsh one. She almost seemed amused. “You won’t be living inside books by candlelight anymore. You will have to get used to managing a combination of the old and the new.” She stopped by some laptops sitting on a table, plugged in.

Electricity in such a Gothic setting; offensive, or at least that’s how Lucas would have felt about it. Old fashioned to a fault. Damien never held Lucas’s distaste for technology, but at the same time, the explosion of commercial computers, laptops, tablets, smartphones, much of it had slipped by him.

God he wished he could be back in his tower, watching the city with his telescope.

“I think I can handle that,” he said. Maybe he could ask Natasha for help.

Natasha. He still had to visit her, without Jack in the way. Still had to apologize. That was going to be painful.

“Good. The digital era has brought with it a means for our kind to save our records in ways it could not before. But the digital world abandoned the soul of things, so you will have to hold the objects of the past in high regard as well. Preserve the soul with ways of old, and preserve the knowledge with ways of new.” She gestured to the paintings, the drapes, the various artifacts that sat around on many of the tables. Old knives, old books, crosses, swords and staves, chalices, shrines of gold, and carvings of skulls made of metal.

“Am ... am I to understand that ... you’ll be my goto in this pursuit, Madam Turio?”

“With all the bishops dead, Lucas dead, and the remnants of the Lancea et Sanctum in tatters here in Dolareido, do you have a better idea?”

“ ... no, I don't.”

“Do you have an issue with me as your ... partner, in this endeavor, Burksen?”

“No ma'am.”

“Good.” She moved on, scarred fingers tracing along the tables she walked past before her journey took her toward the massive drapes that hung from the walls, and the enormous pictures weaved into them. “Have you encountered any of the Begotten or Uratha in the city, Burksen?”

Interesting direction to take the conversation. What was she driving at?

“I have not, Madam Turio.”

“Come now Burksen, understand that since we've been aware of your existence, all the covenants are keeping an eye on you in some fashion or another. The Invictus know you've talked with Fiona Young.”

Damn.

“I ... thought it best to leave Fiona out of this. She's young, and naive.”

“Hmmm. Maybe. That may change and change drastically once she talks with Azamel, as she no doubt will.”

“I wonder how that conversation will go,” he said.

“As do I.”

“You ... you wish I accompany Fiona, when she goes to meet Azamel.”

“Smart man.” Maria walked to the other side of the table, and smirked at him as she started to rummage through some more electronics on the table, tablets and such. “You’re not Invictus, so this is not an order. This is a partnership. I provide you with resources, both of the Second Estate’s property and the First Estate’s funds, while you provide me with information. Since ... since Natasha Vola’s departure, I have lost a rather talented set of eyes and ears.”

The delightful links between Maria and Damian continued to show themselves. Their love for a psychopath, and their connection to Natasha.

“I’m afraid I can’t replace Natasha as a right hand of the Invictus.”

“No, you can’t. But some information goes a long way, Burksen. Keep an eye and ear open for me, and I will support your role as bishop. To the Prince, as well.” After digging through a small shelf of what sounded like an array of tablets, she pulled out a smartphone and tossed it his way. “Here’s your new phone number. Do we have a deal?”

“ ... deal.”

“I have no doubt you will also run into the Uratha at some point. Take care with Avery, Damien Burksen. She may not have Simon leading her this time, but last time ... Be careful, she is all too willing get physical. Stay out of the Devil’s Corner tunnels, for now.”

---

That went much better than he thought possible. First encounter with Maria Turio, and she seemed to like him, maybe even trust him a little.

Being called Burksen twenty times in a conversation was not fun though. Invictus and their obsession with last names grated on him, but it was a small price to pay for her support. If it could be called that. Contractual obligation? He was going to be Maria's new eyes and ears. God, if only she knew about Jack.

He started the walk back to his normal hideout; knew the shortest route, and he slipped into the old subway tunnels as easily as kine breathed. The metal door still a ways down the tunnel, he stopped as he heard the knock knock of knuckles against it, and the clop of boots against the tunnel's concrete base.

“Fiona?”

“Damian! Been looking for ye. Wanted some help in the tunnels down ‘ere, under Devil’s Corner.”

Of course, where Maria didn't want him going. “You sure, Fiona? The Uratha have given orders to Kindred to stay out of there.”

“Aye well, I'm nae Uratha, and you're a sneaky, fast fucker, aye?” She hopped over to him, beamed up at him, and put her hands together in front of her, complete with squishing her breasts together with her biceps. Very blatant I-need-your-help-and-aren't-I-hot tactic. Made him chuckle.

“I'm serious Fiona.”

“Me too. There werewolves might be hunting me; I'm needing to clear my name.”

“Clear your name?”

“Aye! The werewolves are hunting for something in a place I frequent. And with the spiderwebs and the disappearances—one of which is nae my doing! There's something going on Damien, and I'm wanting to investigate.”

“I ... I don't think it's a good idea, Fiona. Better to just stay out of sight for a while, and—”

“I have to ken what's going on, Damien. How come werewolves hunting me? I haven't done anything that'd make them want to hurt me, I think?”

“For all we know, the—”

“Na na no!” She started turning around in spot, stomping her feet and waving her arms. “We have to go to the tunnels beneath Devil's Corner! The answer is there, it has to be!”

“... don't you contain some very ancient monster entity inside you?” You're acting like a child. Best to not say that out loud to the ancient monster acting like a child.

“Aye, I do, so ye better nae say na to me. And ... and that might have something to do with what the wolves want with me. If it's me! So I'm going down to the tunnels to see what's going.”

“You haven't been down there as of late?”

“Nae since we saw Jack, since he said Kindred were investigating those tunnels. Then when I heard about the Uratha hunting something, I ... something's going on. We're gonnae find out what. And besides, ye owe me for not killing ye when ye invaded my lair!”

Shit. This was a dumb idea. Very very dumb idea.

But the girl was giving him obviously manipulative, pouty lips and breast squishing and swishing her shoulders from side to side; it was too adorable. And she really was liable to get herself killed if he didn't help her. Girl was strong in her dream world, but in the real world, her tricks were nothing he couldn't handle. And if he could, the Uratha could.

Damn it, it was too easy to like her.

---

Shouldn't be doing this. Shouldn't be doing this. Shouldn't be doing this. Your new boss specifically told you to not do this. And yet he was doing it.

Not your boss. Partner. Hard to think of it as a partnership considering how the conversation with Maria had gone down; elders never engaged in conversations with younger Kindred unless they could control it. He was the submissive in that conversation, because had to be. Didn't like it, but it was kind of nice talking to a Kindred old enough to be in charge, to be powerful enough to handle their affairs without the Prince bullying them.

Focus. You're in tunnels the whole damn city is up in arms about, pay attention.

Fiona was walking, or marching like a toy in the Nutcracker play. Every so often she smiled at him, kicked her feet out as she walked, bounced a few times, and got ahead a few steps. There were far less lights in this part of the tunnels, but it was enough to see by. Which was enough for Fiona to feel comfortable goofing around, apparently. Girl could see in total blackness if his first encounter with her was any indication.

"You're awfully comfortable," he whispered.

"Aye. Spend a lot of time in the dark." She shrugged at him, hooked her hands in her jean pockets, and started walking backward. Not easy to do with every step a potential for tripping on the tracks, but she managed. "I came to Dolareido cause my online friends said my home town was dull, boring. And they were right, compared to Dolareido anyway."

"Your friends live in Dolareido?"

“Aye. There’s Zoe and Jen and Chloe. Right trio of sluts they are. But then Dolareido seems to bring that out in folk doesn’t it? Everybody ‘ere seems ferr comfy getting high and fucking in parked cars or clubs or the back of theaters.”

Yes, yes they did, much as he disliked it. Not God’s path for the kine; but then, if you considered the weight of a sin, fucking around always ranked pretty low on his list compared to theft or murder.

“The Prince and the others created this city to be a prime feeding ground for Kindred, among other things. So, vices like sex or drug abuse are ignored, and sometimes encouraged. The police are pretty tough on major crimes like murder, but people getting high on whatever drug, and fucking in each other in whatever place? The police ignore them. And they’re easy marks for a hungry Kindred.” And, he had to admit, he’d had his fair share of meals from such circumstances. Course he used the opportunity to try and guide them toward the church, a little scare here, a bible there.

“Beatrice tells me yer Lancea et Sanctum group dinnae like sex?”

He chuckled and shook his head. “The rules of God are for kine, not the Kindred. If I wanted to, I could indulge in every sin and not violate the beliefs of my order, as long as I encouraged the humans to look for faith in God.”

“Strange beliefs.”

“Yes, they are. And ... after Lucas died, I question them more and more every day.” Undoing brainwashing was a painful process. Ticks, habits, views ingrained into his very subconscious that he had to question. “I sometimes wonder if I understand my religion at all. Lucas’s views about many things were beyond strict.”

“Strict? So nae sex for ye?”

“Not with kine—humans, no.”

“Ah, that’s a shame.” She got in closer and started walking normally again, but not without the occasional nudge of her shoulder against his arm. Flirtatious, this girl. At least in human form. “Beatrice told me humans really get off on being sucked. Like, cum their brains out if ye touch them during the Kiss.”

“I ... wouldn’t know.”

“Nae with humans na. How about with Kindred?”

“No.”

“ ... at all?”

“ ... no.”

“Haven’t ye been a vampire for fifty years?” She raised a brow at him, like it was the most absurd thing in the world that he hadn’t had sex. “And ye were alive a good while before that. Nae even a quick lay then?”

“ ... no. When I was human, it was a ... weird time in my life. Then I was a fugitive and forced to hide for fifty years. Sex never came up.”

“That is buggered. Are ye still gonnae follow those super strict beliefs?”

He sighed and pulled some of the hair out of his eyes. Still wearing the half-shaved head look, front to back, so half of his head had black hair down to his shoulder.

“I ... think it is time for a change. If I’m going to be in charge of the Lancea et Sanctum in this city, I can’t ignore how much the world has changed in fifty years, and how wrong Lucas was about many things. And the Prince has bred this city to be different from others; I can't deny her approach has led to less violence than other cities."

Fiona burst into laughter and punched him in the arm. "Ye won't be celibate anymore?"

"I was never voluntarily celibate, Fiona. It just ... never came up."

Again, more laughter, and another punch in his arm. "In my home town, my neighborhood, folk are kind of prudish. Just a wee bit. But 'ere, I've been 'ere one year and I've seen folk fucking in public places or in the window, almost every week! The folk in this town are so loose! Shameless!"

"Yes, Lucas felt he had much work to do, and that work evaporated in the fifty years he slept." And Damien didn't feel like that was a bad thing anymore. Not necessarily good either. God, every day for him was frustrating without a simple guide, simple direction to follow. The pains of being forced to use his brain and think about things. Ugh.

"Well if ye'r looking to expand yer boundaries, I do suggest ye get laid. In fact, from what Triss says about the Kiss, you could go to a club's back room, and just swim in sex!"

"... you are a demon," he said. Half serious, half kidding, but Fiona didn't seem offended at all.

"I was a bit prudish, before Vrall and I become one. I can see memories drifting, hazy images, folk in groups, naked, touching and fucking and smoking herbs and drinking strange liquids. Folk that ... worshiped me."

"Wait ... what?"

"Aye! Strange isn't it? But I can definitely remember it. I can remember the jungle, the heat and sweat, the moans. I can remember folk locking legs in front of me and spilling juices. I can remember Vrall, eight legs and all, being bathed in sex.”

Well, he could see how someone could be attracted to Vrall. She was a monster, but a lot of her monster figure was an accented form of human curves.

“Did she eat any of these worshipers?”

“Na. Far as I can mind, she never hurt any of them. She hunted local tribes who didn’t believe her. Found the mean ones, the ones that bullied or killed other tribes. Fed on them. She had a body, like I do now, and she’d leave the dream, leave her orgies and followers, and pretend to be an innocent lass. Other tribes would be more than willing to rape her, capture her, hurt her, and she’d feast on them.”

Ok, maybe not such a naive young girl. But at the same time, she was. Having another’s memories inside your mind was not something he could understand.

“And now?” he said.

“Wha?”

“You said you were prudish, before Vrall came to you.”

“Oh! Damien Damien, aren’t ye nosy?” She beamed up at him, and wiggled her eyebrows. “I admit, in my hunts I’ve come across a few interesting corners of the town. Told myself I was just looking for more minging folk, got involved in some places where bastards might be. But often times, it was a perfectly innocent hole in the wall filled with sex. I may have stuck around to watch ... a few times. Maybe did a wee more than watch once or twice. Maybe I’ll take you sometime? Found strange places, unusual places just ... overflowing with sex. Unnatural even, folk just throwing themselves into these orgies. Felt like the sort of place Vrall used to hang out in.”

“Unnatural?”

“Aye! Folk just donder into the room, and like they passed through a magical, invisible gate, they take off their clothes and join the arms and legs. And I admit, it worked on me. Felt ... familiar too, like something Vrall had enjoyed.”

Damien ran his fingers along the bald half of his head before combing his long hair down the haired side. “That ... sounds familiar. Tony, and then Lucas, used a place where a leader’s voice was compelling. More compelling than it should have been. The Prince said the same. Maybe another place exists, with similar influence?”

“Na leaders there, just a lot of legs.”

“Still, the way you describe it sounds similar. Hidden influence.” Sex holes were a thing, he knew that. Fifty years skulking around South Side and mostly Devil’s Corner, he’d stumbled upon such places. He let them be, never went into them. Of all the sins he would punish kine for, guide them away from, people having sex with each other never seemed like one worthy of such treatment. Or, seeing people together like that just made him too uncomfortable to approach.

He never told Lucas that.

“Hidden influence. There could be something to that, aye. We should investigate later! I’ll get ye laid in the most glorious way.”

God help him.

“Like you did?”

“Hey! Just a couple times. Vrall had orgies in her past! And she’s me.” She giggled and jumped around in front of him. Ancient entity, or silly young girl? Leaning far more toward silly young girl when she was outside of her lair. “It’s been a long while since I’ve been in these tunnels. I wonder if something’s happened since I left.”

“Maybe.”

“Aye. Maybe something’s happened down ‘ere since then, and that’s why the werewolves came?”

A coincidence? No chance in Hell. But, he nodded, and continued on.

“Have you fed since last time?”

“Na, nae since the Prince said I need to lighten up. I am very hungry. I can feel myself, Vrall, clawing at the walls, looking for food. I—”

He stopped. She stopped. They glanced at each other, and then back to the darkness ahead of them. It wasn’t totally dark yet; the black tunnels were still a ways ahead. So as the group of men and women came out of the darkness, the glares and frowns on their faces were obvious. Very obvious. Six people dressed in typical street clothes, some ripped jeans and shirts and tank tops, some tattoos and some piercings. They looked normal. They did not feel normal.

“Who are you two?” A black woman came forward, long black hair, slightly tall, and sharp features. And like all the members of her group, she looked very fit; the jeans and tank top left little to the imagination.

Fiona gulped, loudly, and leaned up to Damien’s shoulder. “That’s them.”

Yeah, he figured.

“I’m Damien. This is Fiona.” His sword was along his back under his coat; a quick flick of the wrist and arm and he’d have it out, but he kept it sheathed for now. Far as he could tell, the werewolves carried no weapons, and their clothes offered little place to hide any. They were confident in their hand-to-hand combat then.

“Stephanie.” She came closer, and closer, swagger to her step and curvy hips. An attractive woman to be sure, confident, and her dark brown eyes stared into him with all the intent and aggression of an animal whose territory had been violated. “You a vamp? Don’t smell human.” She came closer again, until she was only a few feet from him, and took a long sniff. “Definitely a vamp.”

“Then you must be the werewolves I’ve heard so much about,” he said. Fiona said nothing, but she’d drifted closer to his side, until her shoulder was nudging against his arm.

“We’re famous? Sweet.” She looked over her shoulder to her pack. “Hear that Mason? Fucking famous.”

Someone in the back shrugged and leaned against one of the concrete walls of the tunnel. “Suppose that makes you happy,” the man said.

“Careful,” another man said. “Careful with ... with them. With her.”

Damien leaned around Stephanie a little to get a glimpse of the new talker; another tall, muscled man like many in their pack, but this one refused to make eye contact with Damien, or with anyone around him. His eyes drifted and snapped around on the tracks beneath him, but never at anyone’s eyes.

“David says be careful with you.” Stephanie leaned down toward the short Scot, and tilted her head to the side. “Why’s that?”

“I dinnae ken.” Fiona looked up at the wolf, then around her and at the squirming man in the distance. “Looks pure barry.” Sarcasm dripped from her tongue.

Everyone raised an eyebrow at her, Damien included. The fuck did pure barry mean? Fiona smirked, catching onto everyone’s confusion; and refused to enlighten anyone.

Stephanie took a long sniff, and a sneer started to form, along with some growl sounds. “You’re not human, and you don’t smell like a dead girl.”

Another of the wolves walked up from the pack. Normal height, with tanned skin and box braid hair. “I’m Clara,” she said. Where Stephanie gave them nothing but sneers and growls, this Clara person seemed to at least offer a smile. “You’re awfully close to our hunting grounds. And I assume you’ve been told about them, so no excuses. Leave.”

“Clara ... you in charge?” he said.

“Second in charge.” She shrugged and folded her arms across her chest. So casual for someone in such a position. “Avery isn’t here.”

“Clara then. We aren’t under Devil’s Corner yet, not quite. We haven’t violated your demand.”

“Demand, heh.” Stephanie stepped in closer to Fiona again, and glared down at her. “I’m more interested in why David’s got a problem with her. You don’t smell like a vampire, but you don’t feel like a human. And,” she took another long whiff, “you smell ... weird.”

“And ye smell rank.” Fiona took a step back. Or she tried to, but Stephanie’s hand snapped out to grab her wrist and yank her back toward her.

Fiona punched her.

Damien jumped as Stephanie fell backward ten feet. Fiona hit hard. It wasn't just the little girl punching the big bad wolf, it was the thing inside her too. Vrall. For a moment, just a second or two, the colossal shape of the enormous spider goddess appeared, gargantuan legs erupting from Fiona's back as her fist collided with Stephanie's chest. And along with her human fist was Vrall's open palm, three claws, that slammed into the werewolf and sent her flying.

"What the fuck!" Clara jumped back over to Stephanie, and the rest of the pack joined her. They picked the woman back up to her feet, and Stephanie took a moment to get her bearings. But she had no balance, not with spiderweb wrapping her arms tight to her torso.

Fuck.

"Dangerous! Dangerous. Spider, she-spider." David came closer, and the others came with him. "Spider, she-spider."

"Damien," Clara said, and she came up to him with a growl and sneer just like Stephanie's. "Get away from her."

"What? Why? She's no threat to you." He started to back up, and drew his sword as he did. The blade grabbed their eyes for a second, but only one, before their gazes fell back to the little woman beside him. She even hid behind his arm, but when he looked down at her, she had her own sneer on her face. If she was afraid, he couldn't tell; she looked more excited than anything.

"Because," Stephanie said as she waddled over to them, arms still trapped in the webbing around her, "she's Azlu."

And then her arms were no longer trapped. Damien's eyes went wide, and he drew his pistol in his other hand. But he continued backing up, and his eyes continued to widen, as the werewolves began to transform.

Fur overtook their clothes, and their clothes disappeared in the growing, overwhelming mass of muscle. Claws replaced their fingernails. Their hair changed, warped, turned into manes of different sizes along their enormous necks. Some of them had a couple beads in braids dangling from their manes. Others kept necklaces of string with teeth or talons dangling from their now enormous necks. All of them now with wolf heads twice the size of any wolf's.

He kept backing up. Fiona had frozen, but he pushed against her with his sword arm. Keep going, keep going. Slowly.

They were getting taller. The large muscles they'd already sported were now gargantuan walls of meat and strength. Some were eight feet tall, some nine, one of them ten. Their ears rose into points, and their mouths elongated into snouts with teeth bared. All semblance of their human gaze faded away, replaced with animal eyes, wolf eyes.

Fiona gulped again. He did too.

"Go. Kindred. Leave." The one that was Stephanie towered over them, and made a few attempts to brush off the webbing stuck to her arms. She wasn't bound anymore, but it was sticky stuff. "Leave girl here." Her voice was a snarled mess of deep growls and heavy slurs.

Good God, she was massive. She was haunched forward, like she'd start running on all fours at any moment, and a few drops of drool fell from her chops.

Run. Get the fuck out. The beast in his chest freaked, screeching in all the blind fear he expected of a scared, tiny animal before the wolf. Vitae jolted through his limbs, demanded he run. His weight pressed into the balls of his feet, and he forced himself to stop shaking as he took another step back.

All of them had changed, and all of them were glaring at Fiona. The light caught in their eyes, reflected it slightly. Twelve eyes in the dark coming closer, and closer.

“What is Azlu?” he said. Should be running. Could he run with Fiona next to him? Mekhet were fast, but Fiona probably wasn’t. Probably.

“No talk! Azlu. Must. Kill.” Clara, or what was left of Clara, stomped toward them, in close, and growled as she lowered her head. A giant wolf’s head to match her absurdly massive body. “Go.”

He gulped. Like staring into a volcano. Way too close, way way too close.

“Wait, please,” he said, “Fiona’s done nothing to harm you. You have to explain why—”

Claws came down toward him, massive. For a flash moment, he thought he was looking at Jessy, and those enormous claws she’d attacked him with a lifetime ago. Claws big enough to cleave him into pieces. And this time they had what must have been six hundred pounds of muscle and strength behind them.

He jumped back. Her claws crashed against the concrete beneath him and tore through the metal of the tracks. The tunnel rumbled with the heavy impact, and the following roar of anger vibrated his bones and skin as it echoed. She was fast. He was faster.

He used his sword hand to grab Fiona’s jacket, and threw her back as the other wolf Stephanie jumped at her. The wolf’s immense body slammed both sets of claws against the tracks beneath them, and she tore through the metal and concrete with all the rage of Goliath.

“Stop! We must speak!” he said, but they weren’t listening. The other four werewolves broke into sprints, each of them a hulking mass of death and snarls.

He glanced behind him. Poor Fiona, he’d thrown her a good distance, some ten feet, and she’d landed in a roll over the tracks. Hopefully she didn’t break a bone.

Mistake, glancing back. Clara followed her swipe with another, and this time he wasn’t so fast dodging. Or she was getting faster. How could something that huge move that quickly? He’d danced around Jessy when she had gone full Gangrel psycho on him—no, not entirely true. Jessy had managed to cut into him. And Clara managed to cut him too, her claws finding his chest and tearing through it skin deep.

And just like Jessy’s monstrous claws, the werewolf’s claws did more than just cut cleanly, they burned. Like fire. Like fucking acid. He screamed as he jumped back to land beside Fiona, and grabbed at his chest. It was worse than Jessy’s claws, more like someone had taken a chainsaw to his ribs. Four long gashes ran down the chest of his shirt. His thick, Kindred blood held to Clara’s claws, but there was enough of it for a couple large droplets to splatter on the dark concrete beneath them.

The six beasts charged.

Fiona got back to her feet. He reached out for her to try and grab her, turn, run, get the fuck away, but she pushed his hand aside, and swiped her palm across the air.

In a flash of spider limbs, an eruption of white covered the wall. Damien jumped back again, gasping, eyes snapping left and right as the thick vines attached like living ropes to the tunnel walls. And when they tightened, they made a sound like metal.

A spider web.

The wolves crashed into it, and it stopped them. All of them, all six of them came to a halt as their fangs, claws, and mass collided with the wires of white. Some of the white wires yanked on the concrete bricks that lined the tunnel walls, and several of the bricks ripped free of their holds where the spider webbing was attached to them. The werewolves howled and roared, clawed and bit at the webbing, but they weren't going anywhere.

Or at least, they weren't for a few seconds. Clara snarled at Fiona, stared straight at her, and opened her palms wide before her claws began to glow a subtle crimson. Struggling against the white rope that stuck to her fur and wrapped around her the more she struggled, her claws found the webbing, and began to cut through it.

What the fuck.

“Come on!” Fiona grabbed his wrist, and started running. “Ye ken the way down to the maintenance tunnel below ‘ere? We can get back to my lair from there!”

Lair? Lair! He scooped the tiny girl up into his hands, and started running. The werewolves wouldn't be able to get into her dream lair. Probably.

---

---

~~Antoinette~~

It was the third night since the meeting. The third night without talking to Jack, her love and joy. It was killing her.

The Primogen meeting had gone about as well as expected, at least until the Fiona girl came in. All of Antoinette's hatred for Azamel rose to the surface rather suddenly when the beast in her gut had jumped up and bared its teeth at the monster. The reaction had been abrupt, and she wasn't prepared for it, the strange presence of a Begotten, the way they dripped of something primordial and unknowable.

She had not been kind to Fiona, none of the Primogen had. And she saw how it upset her love. Fiona seemed like the friendly sort, the sort to shatter ice with her warm personality and joyful voice, and it had worked on Jack all too well. Manipulation? Unlikely, given her young age, but it did not change that Jack had become friends with the Begotten. And that terrified her.

Antoinette sat in the depths of her tower, the chandelier of blue flames lit, and her table covered in objects and laptops and devices calibrated to see ephemera, once lit by the blue. It was difficult to focus on her research and resume delving into the secrets hidden in Twilight. Twilight, a silly word to describe the hidden things in their world. She hated it, hated such dogma, hated how the Uratha held such things as sacred or as secrets to be kept. Knowledge of the world should be shared.

Fools. They would never understand how important it was for them to work together and share what they knew. In a hundred years when human kind would be colonizing Mars, when space stations would become vast cities, and the Earth could no longer hide their kind easily, what would rigid beasts like Uratha do? Let alone the Begotten, and their hungers.

“P-Prince.” Natasha stepped into the laboratory, dressed in her usual business suit. Though, instead of pants, she wore a skirt that stopped at the knee, some pantyhose to darken her legs, and her suit jacket actually sported some cleavage. It looked delightful on her small body and tiny curves. Perhaps someone or something had awakened her sexual awareness, or appetite.

“Vola, you look charming.”

“I d-do? Thank you, I ... I uh, have been ... trying to expand m-my wardrobe.”

“Oh? Then please, if you ever wish for aid in such matters, I would be glad to provide assistance. You are a dragon now, Vola, which means I can help you in many ways. And your sire has as much interest in fashion as a rock.” Antoinette could — and did — dress her ghouls in many fashions for fun, but to play such games with a Kindred, one with many decades under her belt, could prove especially fun indeed.

“D-Daniel is ... yes, he is ... trench coat man,” she said. The two of them laughed; it was true after all. Natasha looked around a few times, no doubt coming to terms with her sire’s absence once more. If she knew where Antoinette had sent him, she would have been upset. Best to keep such matters a secret, even from her new student.

“Did you bring the object I asked for?”

“Yes Prince. It ... it took some thinking, t-t-to find what you wanted. But I found an old necklace, one that I wore a lot in ... that time. A gift from ... my parents.” Vola walked over to her and set the necklace down on the table in front of Antoinette. “It holds a lot of memory. Reminds me of that time ... b-b-before the embrace.”

Perfect.

“Thank you, Natasha. Your necklace will be unharmed, I am sure, but be prepared for the unexpected. What we are about to do is dangerous.”

“D-Dangerous?” Her brows furrowed, and she looked across the table of objects and devices, the room and its symbols drawn into the floor, and toward the center of the symbols where she no doubt anticipated her necklace would be placed.

“Indeed. Come.” Antoinette picked up the necklace with all the care of a great artifact, one tablet as well, and walked toward the center of her laboratory. “The ghostly images we expose with the help of these devices from the Ordo Dracul are ephemera. Ghosts, though more often, the shadow of them and their passing.”

“Those s-scary occult objects are possessed by ghosts?”

“Not exactly. These tools allow us to see the scars. You could think of them as the echoes of events, in much the same way ghosts are the echoes of people.” Such wonder and terror the Ordo Dracul had shown her long ago when she joined the order, centuries ago in Europe. All a blur now, faded hazy memories.

“Daniel discussed ephemera with me, but I’ve ... I don’t know. These words feel weightless. I just see ... images of things. They respond, s-s-sure, but—”

“Yes. You are a skeptic, Natasha Vola, and I appreciate that. I value that.” She pat the tiny girl on the shoulder, smiled down at her, and took the final steps into the center of the enormous symbol upon the floor. “Come.” Sitting down on the floor on the side of her leg, she set the necklace upon its center as Natasha sat next to her.

“I d-don’t understand. My necklace, I ... it’s just a necklace.”

“From your parents. And your parents, they cared for you?”

“ ... yes. They ... my disappearance, it killed them.”

The dark side of being embraced. Many thought it was becoming an immortal blood leech doomed to never see the sun that drove many Kindred to depression. But the harshest reality was the life you had to leave behind. Many left a cut in the world, others left a crater.

“I am sorry for your loss, Vola, I truly am. But, perhaps, this will provide you with a ... comfort, of a sort.”

“You’re n-not going to show me my p-p-p-parents, are you?”

“No, nothing so macabre.” She pulled the tablet onto her lap, and used it to dim the lights, increase the power of the chandelier, and begin resonance level: light. Nothing to startle Natasha, not yet.

A quiet hum filled the room, a gentle and soothing sound. A familiar sound. She smiled as the hum filled her, and Natasha, and as the Mekhet made her own smile similar to Antoinette's, the Prince set the tablet aside. At level light, the resonance level was far from dangerous despite what she told her subordinate, but it was wise to instill caution in the woman.

“Are we w-w-waiting for something?”

“Oui.” She pat Vola on the shoulder, and resumed waiting, smile on her face unwavering. It took time, sometimes hours, but she doubted it would take as long this time, not for something as simple and powerful as what Natasha's necklace held.

The room was a constant blue, and even with the chandelier at full power, the room was dim. Bright enough for Kindred though. And more important, dim enough for the subtleties to show through.

“We d-don't need the filter lens?” Natasha said.

“It would spoil the surprise. Just wait.”

And wait they did, thirty minutes at that. Natasha did not seem to believe anything would happen without the device to look through and the filter it provided. If Antoinette fetched it now, no doubt it would have exposed the swirling ephemera growing, and the essence that filled the room that began to resonant since she turned on the resonance device. There was far more to the vibrations than mere kinetic vibration, but those were secrets for another time for her little assistant.

Color. Movement. Natasha gasped as a flutter of orange trickled through the air before vanishing, leaving behind a small cloud of glowing amber dust that faded moments after. But, as Natasha stared at the tiny spark of color in the dark blue of the room, another appeared. It fluttered again for a few moments, moved through the air several inches above the necklace, before disappearing again.

“What ... w-what’s...”

“I do not know what will come through the Gauntlet, Natasha. But I can open the door, and unique to these wisps of ephemera, make the door more appealing to ... certain manifestations. That is what your necklace is for.”

“My n-n-necklace? I ... oh!” The wisp appeared again, and fluttered its wings a couple times before settling upon the necklace.

A butterfly. It glowed amber, orange, and varying shades of red against the blue of their surroundings. It was a small thing, only an inch in size, but its wings glowed with a subtle brilliance that covered several feet around them in its light. Its wings’ patterns changed and swirled with time, slow and gentle, and it fluttered its wings in a leisurely dance, each beat causing the swirling designs to change faster between its motions, only to slow down when it stopped.

“Beautiful,” Antoinette said.

“Wh ... what am I ... looking at?”

“Something alive, in its own, unique way.”

“ ... n-not a ghost?”

“No. Indeed, it is not.”

Another butterfly wisped into existence, larger than the other, and set itself to the floor near the necklace. Antoinette smiled down at the lovely creature, and reached out with her hand before setting her fingers down on the floor beside it. It did not react, at first, but eventually, it fluttered its wings a few more times, and hovered over to her knuckles. And from there, it turned to face her, its body and face of gentle flickering amber without features, only subtle, swirling lines of black within the glow.

She felt it, a soft warmth, as if the glow it emitted was a blanket to wrap around her and cocoon her. Such silly, poetic thoughts, and yet those were the thoughts that flooded her as the creature turned around a few times on her hand. Another butterfly of amber appeared, as large as the one before, and it fluttered close to its friend. But, with her free hand, Antoinette blocked its path with a slow and soft wave, and ushered it toward Natasha.

The poor girl was stunned. Her eyes were wide and jaw dropped. She'd have asphyxiated for lack of breathing were she human.

“These creatures were beckoned by your necklace, Natasha.”

With shaking limbs, the girl raised her hands palm up and together, and stared at the butterfly of waving reds and oranges as it settled onto her hands. She gasped once it touched her, as if life had just forced its way into her chest.

“It ... it's ... warm! And I f-feel ... it...”

“I have summoned several entities with this technique. But never have I summoned something as ... gentle, and loving, as this.”

“My necklace ... I ... this...” Natasha brought the butterfly closer to her, hands cupping it like a large bowl. It did not fly away. As it came closer to her, it fluttered its wings, and several waves of amber filled the air around her, wisps of color that fell over Natasha and again earned a gasp from her. “It's ... it's the ... the same f-f-feelings I ... in my memory, when Mom and Dad ... gave me the necklace.”

“Can you describe the feeling?” She felt it too, but it was a feeling so long forgotten she could not describe it as anything more beyond a warm cocoon.

Natasha lowered her hands, and looked at her with the heaviest eyes. “It’s ... it’s hazy. So long ago, b-b-but ... it’s ... the feeling ... when you’re in bed, and you’re going to sleep, and your parents come in. They ... they tuck you in, kiss you goodnight, and ... and...”

“You miss your parents.”

“ ... I do.”

Antoinette sighed, and motioned forward, back to the center of the symbol. The butterfly left her hand and rejoined the smaller one by the necklace. “I must apologize, Natasha. I could not be sure what was summoned, and this was ... perhaps, painful.”

“No! No no, this is b-beautiful, and ... it’s ... it’s so—”

Giggling cut her off. Natasha blinked at her, and Antoinette her in return, before the two of them looked back to the circle.

Another wisp of color appeared in the blue over the necklace. And with it, another giggle, childlike. The butterflies started to hover around the necklace, and their colors shined all the brighter as they circled it and each other. Until another wisp of color, something white and golden, swallowed them up.

“W-What?” Tasha backed up, sliding her butt across the floor. “What’s going on?”

Antoinette peered into the growing streaks of gold and white, squinted for a moment as a burst of light flooded them, and then pulled back a couple feet like Tasha as light began to settle “Hello,” the light said. A girl’s voice, maybe six years old. Bright. Innocent.

“ ... hello,” Antoinette said.

“Hello,” it said again. No longer just a sheen of light, it looked like an orb, perhaps made of glass and only a few inches in diameter, glowing white. From behind the orb, two wings were flapping in slow, deep waves, angel wings that glowed gold, each maybe three feet long.

Tasha got onto her palms and knees, and crawled forward a little to get in closer to the hovering orb. “I ... what ... who are you?”

The orb drifted closer to Tasha, and flapped its wings hard enough to make her hair move with the gentle breeze. “I’m Safe.”

“Safe?” Tasha said.

“Safe.” The orb hovered around Tasha, over her, and bits of golden dust fell from its wings onto her body. They faded, but only once they glowed extra bright upon contact. “Do you feel safe?”

“I ... yes ... that’s the word. That’s the word I needed t-t-to ... describe ... the feeling.”

Safe. This creature was Safe.

“Hello!” it said. “Please, be safe. I’ll keep you safe.”

“You are a young spirit, are you not?” Antoinette smiled at the unusual creature, and reached out to poke its glass-like body. It was not glass, but something warm, and somewhat soft.

“I am! And this place, I’ve seen this place. Before it was different, and there were different things here. Not safe. Now it’s safe. Are you safe? Big walls here, must be safe.” It hovered over Antoinette as well, and over her, large wings covering her in its glow. “I’ll keep you safe. Do you feel safe?”

She did. A long forgotten sensation to feel safe, and one paranoid Kindred often never felt, ever, even in the depths of underground tunnels surrounded by metal and vault doors and security. But under this creature’s radiance, she did feel safe, to an unnatural degree. The entity made her feel safe by proximity then, or was it the strange glowing dust that fell from its wings? Or was it all a mere trick of the light?

“I do. Thank you, Safe.”

“That’s good!” Again it giggled, and started to drift around the two women in a slow figure-eight. “In the Hisil, this area is not safe! It’s tall, and big, and strange, and chaotic. But then you did something, and I came.”

Antoinette smiled. Chaotic indeed. Her experiments must have unbalanced the world in the other realm every time she performed them.

“Is ... is this the first time ... you’ve s-s-summoned something that’s talked?” Tasha said.

“No. I have encountered other such spirits.”

“Spirits ... spirits ... I ... it’s hard t-to...”

To accept that spirits exist. Such thoughts were long past for Antoinette, but there was a time long ago when she felt the same.

“The wolves would keep this world secret from us.” She reached out for the spirit, and it fluttered over her hand. The strange orb landed upon her palm, and giggled again. It was not just Safe, it was something slightly different, or perhaps more specific. Something her city contained, something the necklace resonated with.

The safety a child felt with their parents. Were the spirit older, it would not have been something as simple and delightful as the little angel sitting on her hand. Perhaps it would develop into a monstrous size, with six wings, and the sphere of its body would grow strong, and envelop all it wished to keep safe.

But for now, Safe was simple little thing, and adorable.

“It pleases me that such spirits exist within my city.” It was a haven for Kindred after all, and other monsters apparently. For such spirits to exist perhaps reflected on the state of her city, or nearby areas. That well of knowledge, all beyond her reach. She could do nothing but prod at it with her experiments, and hope to stumble upon new secrets.

“Yes yes! The blood tower is strange! It can be spooky and scary, but sometimes not. I can’t keep things safe here! Normally. But tonight it’s safe. Are you safe?”

“I ... I’m safe,” Tasha said. “W-Why did ... what called you here?”

“Blood tower changed! The locus here is very small, and weird, and it disappears and changes. Today it’s new! And warm. And safe. I must become bigger, keep it safe. Don’t change it! I can feed here, and keep it safe and get bigger and keep it safe.”

Antoinette sighed, long, heavy, and ushered the beautiful angel toward Tasha again, who put out her hands to catch it. The little girl’s eyes were wide with wonder now, no longer shocked, absorbed in the beauty of what she was holding, the expression so clear on her face it reminded Antoinette of Jack.

“I am sorry, Safe, but the locus will disappear soon. You will have to go back to your realm.”

“ ... ok. But stay safe!” Its wings settled as the spirit nestled into Natasha’s hands, and it pressed them to her chest. “You too? You seem nice. I'll protect you."

From how Tasha was looking at the lovely creature, if she had been blushing like she would have cried a river of tears.

"D-Don't worry ... I'll be safe."

Oh, poor Vola. Antoinette would have cried as well if she were blushing, just for the proximity to such eyes. No doubt the spirit was stirring her memories, as it was her necklace, carrying her emotions embedded upon its body due to years of wear. Perhaps Antoinette's request for a personal object was misguided.

But, Natasha was smiling.

Antoinette reached over for the tablet, and disabled the resonance. As it began to fade, Safe began to fly higher, and giggled its sweet little sound, before it too faded away as the hum completely silenced.

"This was perhaps an error on my part, Natasha Vola." She got up, fixed her skirt, and walked back to the wall by the main equipment to turn the lights back on. Only her, her subordinate, and the necklace in the laboratory. "This equipment is a gift from the Ordo Dracul to pursue the secrets I yearn to discover, but there are many unknowns, forces you could even describe as magical. Such a disgusting word, but here we are, summoning creatures from beyond the Gauntlet and our understanding. So, in my infinite ignorance, I test it, and test what lies beyond. Your ... your necklace, summoned something that existed in that place, Natasha. And it was quite beautiful."

"Wow." The little Mekhet got up, grabbed her necklace, and held it in her hand with all the delicacy of holding one of Antoinette's ancient relics. Like a precious flower. "It ... it was ... wow."

“Your eyes remind me of Minerva’s eyes, the first time I brought her here. She would say you are cute as a button.”

“Minerva? I never did learn about her, b-b-but she’s ... I hear ... things.”

“It is a sensitive topic for Jacob, so we let him share the information if he wishes, and otherwise do not spread it. But, I must warn you since you are now a member of the Ordo Dracul and working for me, that ... she was an overzealous member of the order. She spent many years in this room when these tools were still new, experimented, desperate to understand things.”

“I d-don’t understand. Some Uratha told me ... that Avery k-killed Minerva, and that ... Jacob and she were an item. B-B-But I ... what happened?”

“Minerva found a way to pursue these interests outside of my tower. I do not know how; the Uratha destroyed the evidence. She tried to stop them...” She sighed, and sat down at the table to begin examining the many artifacts before her. “She was Jacob’s lover, Miss Vola, and I believe they could have lived centuries together, in love, if fate had been on their side.”

Better for everyone she not bring up how she had tried to stop Minerva, encouraged her to only practice such dangerous experiments in the safety of the tower where they could control the parameters, to stay with Daniel or Antoinette who were much older and stronger than her. The girl’s death was partly Antoinette’s own fault; do not speak ill of the dead.

“Oh...” Vola sat down across from her, head lowered, shoulders heavy, and she slipped the necklace back into her pocket as her eyes drifted over the objects in much the same way Antoinette’s did. “The Uratha are ... brutal, and m-m-mean ... some of them.”

“Some of them?” Antoinette leaned in closer and eyed her little helper. Cute as a button indeed, Natasha looked down, up, left and right, every direction except the Prince’s. “Judging from how you described your encounter, I had expected you to consider them all quite vicious.”

“They were! A-And they were ... terrifying. But Arturo and Matthew were nice, after.” A tiny grin sneaked its way onto her face, only to vanish once Natasha shook her head, no doubt realizing Antoinette could see it.

“Natasha, if I did not know better, I would think you found these two werewolves intriguing.”

“I ... I uh ... I t-told you they let me feed, right? I ... didn’t tell you, that they ... um...”

“Natasha Vola, did you Kiss a werewolf?” For all her attempts at being serious about the matter, the line sounded too silly to keep a straight face even for her, and Antoinette chuckled with its conclusion.

“I ... did. They offered! Sort of. And ... Art was ... r-r-really ... really tasty.”

Drinking the blood of an Uratha. She had to admit, she had never done such a thing. Her interactions with wolves were limited; they rarely came to Dolareido, and Antoinette had spent nearly half her life in the city. Before, hundreds of years ago, she had interacted with the Uratha, but she could not for the unlife of her remember the details. Always a blur, always a haze memories from such a time. But, if she had Kissed a werewolf, she would surely have remembered it.

“I see a twinkle in your eye, Miss Vola.”

“T-Twinkle?”

Antoinette rolled her eyes, leaned in, and set her elbows on the table before setting her chin on her knuckles, fingers netted together. “Yes, the twinkle a young woman gets when her mind wanders, and she imagines a certain person presenting her with flowers, or a love poem, or in this modern era, a text.”

Aha. The girl twitched, and her gaze cast down even as her shoulders came forward and her arms wrapped around herself. Defensive, no doubt feeling exposed. Then Antoinette had struck a chord, and Natasha’s imagination had indeed been pondering someone.

“Come now Natasha, I am five hundred years old and have dealt with romance in all its forms.”

“ ... all?”

“All.” The Prince smiled over her hands at her little assistant. “While I do not enjoy the implication this story of yours carries, it is true that the previous pack of wolves to arrive in my city were under a different leader. If what Jack tells me is true, only Avery is the returning party, so whoever it is that has attracted your flights of fancy, I do not know them. And, as you say, they let you feed from them. I must consider that perhaps they are not the angry dogs I dealt with before.”

“They ... they’re b-b-brutal, and d-dangerous! Their claws felt like f-fire on my skin, and their speed and strength ... their animal hunger. It was ... t-t-t-terrifying. But, after, when they calmed, Art and Matt, they ... they were ... they flirted with me.” A confident statement from her shy, stuttering little friend.

“Flirted? That must have been ... thrilling.” Antoinette set her hands down and leaned in closer. “In truth, Miss Vola, it has been decades since I have had a friend to speak with about simple, fun, silly things, such as flirting. Minerva was the last.” And she did miss her, but it had been many decades since the woman’s death.

Antoinette had moved on. Jacob had not. And as much as Antoinette loved her precious ghouls, they were not Kindred.

“Are ... are you ... asking me t-to be ... your friend?” Natasha’s eyes were wider than the Prince thought possible.

“Oui ... why does that shock you so?”

“B-B-B-B-B-Because you’re the Prince, and you’re ... you!”

Antoinette laughed and shook her head before leaning back. She pulled much of her hair over her shoulder, and combed its long, white waves with her fingers over her chest.

“You and Jack have much in common, Miss Vola.” Shyness and jitteriness among them. “Both of you view me as a monolith. And that is my own doing; I am to blame. I must be such to be the Prince of this city, to rule its denizens and protect them from their bloodlust. But do not forget I am Kindred, as you are, and a woman, as you are.” She smiled with the word, woman, knowing full well Natasha viewed the Prince as her total opposite, mentally and physically. Such a comparison was inaccurate, lacking nuance, and perhaps she could show her little friend the error of her ways.

“W-What ... would you ... want to uh ... t-talk about?”

“Why you of course. My ghouls are a delight to gossip with, but it is not the same as speaking with fellow Kindred.” Again she combed her hair, as the motion seemed to draw Natasha’s eyes, and settled her fidgeting. Normal women played with their hair, not monolithic Prince’s that decided the fates of Kindred every day. “I am not Daniel, and you will find me a delight to speak with if you wish to.”

“Gossip, gossip ... um ... uh...”

“I will start, if you are still nervous.” She had only one thing on her mind after all, and she ached to speak of it. “I am very worried about Jack, Miss Vola. His new role as intermediary for the Uratha has put him in a prime position to be hurt, or suffer from the anger of the wolves, or mine. And his friendship with Fiona, a Begotten, is another strain.” She sighed, and used a thick group of hair to tickle her chin with its soft ends.

“I hang out w-with Jack, sometimes.”

“Truly?”

“Yeah. And ... and I know you have nothing t-t-to worry about, Prince. He really ... loves you.”

Like someone had taken the weight of worlds from her shoulders. Antoinette sighed, long, content, and resumed combing her hair as she folded one leg over the other.

“I do hope you are right, Natasha, about not having to worry. And if you are becoming his friend, then please, keep an eye on him would you, for me, s’il vous plaît? I trust him, but ... well, you were there when Lucas attacked. The boy has a habit of getting in the middle of things.”

Natasha giggled, and smiled a mischievous little smile. “He does.”

“So, Natasha Vola, you believe some rather dangerous, and I assume fit, powerful, handsome werewolves have been flirting with you?”

“Y-Yes. And ... and they visited me, last night.”

“Visited by the wolves. Do tell.” A little push for her little subordinate, to loosen her tongue.

“Well, Arturo and M-M-Matthew visited ... and they like to flirt with me. I thought they were t-teasing me, but ... I don’t know now.

They ... they smile at me and look me up and down and Art is a sneaky b-bastard and Matt a gentle giant. They're close friends."

Two wolves flirting with Natasha, two friends at that. Antoinette smiled and nodded. A similar situation to Ashley and Julee then, perhaps.

"B-But," Vola continued, "they um ... had more to t-t-t-talk about, and ... warn me about."

If only gossiping with a new friend could remain a fun and silly, relaxing activity, not devolve into more Kindred affairs. C'est la vie.

"What did the wolves say?"

"They s-said you were messing with the Gauntlet ... w-w-which, I guess is true. They said that, what you're doing is d-d-dangerous, but not a problem ... yet. They said ... hosts are sneaky."

"Hosts? I believe Simon mentioned the word, but not in a way to give context. If what you say is true, then the word does indeed carry meaning. Hosts."

"B-But if we stay out of the werewolves' way, everything will be fine, right?"

Another sigh, another painful memory. "Perhaps, Miss Vola, perhaps. So, these two beasts came to your apartment to warn you?"

"Warn me, and ... w-w-watch television." She squirmed again, and smirked. "They're funny guys."

"Please, go on." Perhaps listening to the young woman talk about her interesting new friends would take Antoinette's mind off of Jack.

~~Jack~~

His buzzer rang. Almost a shock, considering how many people liked to circumvent the elevator. He hopped up from the couch and pressed the button. “Yello.”

“Jack, may I come in?” Antoinette’s voice.

Jack did a double take at the buzzer. Guess she didn’t feel like circumventing tonight. “Yes, please.”

He pressed the button and waited by the door. Going to be a weird conversation. Maybe a painful conversation.

A minute later, he opened the door for her, and she offered a nod before stepping into his place and setting her suit jacket aside. Still in her power suit skirt and white blouse, she sat down at his couch, folded one leg over the other, and pulled her beautiful hair over her shoulder to begin combing it with her fingers. If he replaced it with a white cat in her arms, it’d have been hard to tell the difference.

“I ... am not sure where to begin,” she said.

He sat down on the couch across from her, leaned forward with elbows on his knees, hands dangling, and shrugged. Definitely a painful conversation. “Me neither.”

“You must have questions.”

“I do. Just ... figured you wouldn’t want to talk about the meeting. That was the deal, wasn’t it? We’d leave the business world at the office.”

She smiled her beautiful smile, and her heavy eyes fell down to her combing fingers. “Perhaps that was naive. I know you left the meeting upset, and I could not help but feel responsible.”

“ ... yeah, I was upset.” Time for a real conversation, a real-talk sort of conversation. The sort of conversations they had in romance dramas when the music stopped and the silence between words pulled the air tight with tension. “I understand having the Uratha in Dolareido again is making the Primogen upset, and I get that having to go through me with no choice in the matter is going to make everyone pissed. But the fuck did Fiona do?”

He almost yelled the last bit; it was enough to make both of them blink in surprise.

“ ... you have become friends with her, quite quickly.”

“Yeah.” He rubbed his buzzed head and let it hang from his neck like a stone. Stop being a jackass. “She’s really nice, sociable, even with someone like me. Kind of reminds me of my sister.”

“Your sister.” Antoinette got up, and came to sit beside him. One of the few times she’d ever done that; normally he’d join her. “You do not speak of your family often, my love.”

My love. Good, good there was still that. Course it’d take more than a rocky meeting to break that, stop being so stupid.

“I told you about my mom, my dad, my sister. Just ... not much to tell.”

“I ... still would like to hear more,” she said, and she reached out to put an arm over his shoulders. “Later. For now, you must understand why I was harsh, why we were all harsh in the meeting.”

“Julias told me. Described the Begotten, scared me with talk about their hungers, warned me about Azamel and told me to avoid her. And ... I’m only half sold, Antoinette. A lot of what he said applies to Kindred too, especially elders.” Poking the bear, comparing Kindred to Begotten. Poking the bear with a hot iron poker, specifically comparing to elders.

“That may be true, but Begotten are ... difficult to gauge, little Ventrue. Athalia has done little to disturb the Masquerade, but Azamel and her hunger have caused destruction beyond my ability to hide. Until I can understand this new friend of yours, I am afraid I must be strict with her. And intimidating. A deterrent.”

“A policy of deterrence. I remember a cold war nearly coming to a very explosive end, due in no small part to that.”

“It is not the same my love. Please understand, I have ruled this city for a long time, and the beasts that roam it need to be controlled. Forcefully sometimes. Julias understood this, and he laid the truth at her feet with no illusion or room for debate, so she would know how deathly serious the Masquerade is.”

Yeah, he got that, but that wasn't the whole issue. “The moment she stepped into the room, I could tell you all thought of her as scum.”

“ ... that ... is perhaps true. I would not use the word scum, but it is a reality that we in Dolareido hold no love for the Begotten. They are slaves to their hunger, and many of them have hungers that are ... barbaric.”

He sighed, but nodded. It hurt hearing it, but when a prejudice was backed up by real examples, it was hard to dismiss it.

“So, if she's not a problem, like Athalia, your opinion of her will change?”

“Indeed it will.” Antoinette's embracing arm hugged him tighter, and her hand started to rub his hair in that soft way against the grain he loved so much. “Unfortunately, I do not have the option to risk leniency.”

She made him feel like a child, and for good reason. A city to rule, with risks to take into account with every decision, and centuries of experience to guide her; that included a dislike of monsters. All he had was first impressions of Fiona, the first monster he'd ever met.

“Suppose I failed pretty hard at this,” he said.

“What do you mean?”

“Just ... always took myself for an impartial guy, good at being logical about things. That meeting really got under my skin.”

“Jack, would you care to know a secret?” She leaned in and put her forehead to his temple, complete with some gentle nudges and soft sighs.

“I think so.”

“Those meetings grate on me as well. I must be a harsh, ruthless as you said several nights ago. People know me as such because I must be, to be Prince of this city. Please do not think of me as such when ... when we are together, alone.”

He sat up straight and looked at her. It really bothered her that he might think of her as such. And hell, after seeing and hearing how they acted in their Primogen meetings, he had to admit, he gained a new appreciation for the cycled stories among neonates that the Primogen were giant assholes.

“I'm overreacting.” He leaned in toward her, and she met him with her own lean further down, so they could put their foreheads to each other. “Sorry, I'm being an ass, and a kid.”

“Perhaps. But your observations about our distaste for Begotten were accurate, little Ventrue. I do hope your observations about Fiona are accurate as well.” Her hands slipped down over his arms to find his, and she brought them together before bringing them to her lips for a kiss. “We will clash in that room in the future, no doubt, and there will be sides of each other neither of us will enjoying seeing. We were naive to think it would not follow us home, but, with soft words, we may be able to soothe our tempers and worries.”

“ ... you really are too damn good with words. Put me to shame.”

She kissed his knuckles again, and then his nose. “You will learn. Now, lie down.”

“Oh, ok.” He turned a bit more so he could face her, and she pushed him so his back fell to the couch, and his head rested on the couch arm. Helpless and staring up at a deadly creature—not a deadly creature. Those weren’t the tiger eyes he was used to seeing when she was looking for sex, or any of the eyes she sported when angry, or feeling playful, or commanding.

They were soft eyes tonight.

The goddess put her weight onto her elbows around his chest against the bed, and lay on top of him. So much taller than him, he could see her feet were pointed up from bent knees, and much of her body was between his legs. Her breasts pressed to his chest, and with her elbows tucked in at his sides and ribs, she was free to slide her fingers over his chin, his lips, his neck and earlobes.

“I spoke with Natasha Vola today,” she said, and kissed him. “You were a topic.”

“Uh oh.”

She chuckled and kissed him again. “She told me you would love me no matter what occurred.”

“Well ... yeah.” Her worried about him not loving her, him worried about her not loving him. A couple of idiots at this point.

“Forgive a Kindred her paranoia, little Ventrue.” She let her weight collapse down on him, and buried her face in his neck. “Moments of joy are sand in my fingers.”

Ah, the old sand between the fingers parable.

“You can clutch me tight as you want you know, I’m not going anywhere.”

“ ... you are too good to me, my love.”

“Ha, me too good to you?” He brought his hands up to hold her, hug her tight, rub her back and squeeze the tall, voluptuous goddess to his body. “You spoil me constantly.”

“I do enjoy to spoil.” She raised her head again, and grinned down at him, her dangerous eyes returning. No matter how many times he saw those eyes, it always sent a thrill up his spine. “Shall I spoil you now?”

“I uh, I don’t have anything planned tonight. Julias might text me with a new contract I need to negotiate, but—”

“Then, since you have the time, I would very much like to spoil you some more.” She pressed her body down on him harder, purposefully squishing her breasts to his chest. Blouse and bra and his shirt couldn’t stop the wonderful feeling of her body on his. “So often we make love in my tower. We should enjoy your abode more often.”

“W-Well, I mean, my apartment isn’t nearly as majestic as the Elysium Tower.”

“But there is something comforting about an apartment, little Ventrue. A small home that feels complete.”

“Yeah, I guess there is.” That was true after all. A grand tower always felt more like visiting a mansion, than something homely.

Antoinette sat up on her knees, still between his legs, and began to undo the buttons of her blouse. In seconds, her black bra was exposed, and Jack groaned at the sight of her huge breasts contained within.

“Perhaps tonight, we can find different places for you to rest your cock between my breasts? Enjoying sex upon a bed does get old, with time. Possibly here? I could kneel on the floor, trap your cock within my bosom, and slowly bring you to orgasm over many minutes, until your white warmth drips down over my body. Or perhaps by the window? I could lie down for you on my back beside it, and you could straddle my chest, lean over me, and fuck my breasts until your cum coated my neck for everyone watching to see.”

Why was she so damn good with words? God he was going to explode in his pants and he wasn't even blushing life yet. He—

The door opened, and a short, older woman stepped in. Avery.

The werewolf smirked, animal eyes looking the Daeva up and down. “Nice rack.”

Chapter 34

~~Jack~~

If there was one way he was going to die, it'd be between two dangerous women.

Antoinette's tiger eyes returned, with all the ferocity and rage of when Lucas had crashed her ball. Like a crushing storm, being so near her shook him to his core as the rage poured off of her, buried him in rolling thunder that vibrated his bones and pulled his gut up into his throat. She wasn't looking at him anymore, thank god; her eyes would have bore holes through his body and couch otherwise.

The love of his life got up from the couch, stood up, and stared at the intruder.

"You have nerve, Avery."

"Hey, I'm just here to talk to my middleman. Didn't think he'd be here boning his girl, let alone boning the Prince." Avery stepped in nice and close, and looked up at the woman over a foot taller than her, with something between a grin and smirk on her face. "Kind of young for you don't you think?"

"Kindred do not see years as you do, wolf. He is an adult, as am I."

Jack sat up, but stayed sitting, and quiet. Getting up would imply he wanted to get involved in the conversation, and he wasn't that stupid. Not yet at least.

"Right, sure." With a snort, Avery walked around Antoinette, exposed her back to her, and started to explore Jack's apartment. Every step dripped of confidence, but where Kindred would make subtle jabs at each other, a lot of passive aggressiveness, Avery's jabs were blatant, aggressive, direct, and honest. Sort of. “Had a couple tips that you two were an item. Had to see it to believe it.”

“Is that why you have come to my love’s home?” Antoinette turned to face Avery, but the werewolf didn’t seem to mind having the elder watching her exposed back. “To insult me, pry into m—”

“Nope. Dead serious, came to talk to my middleman. Who’s doing a piss poor job right now.” Her fingers found his other couch, window, counter tops, his fridge, cupboards, and continued to glide until she found his hallway before disappearing into the bathroom. “God damn you Invictus love to waste money. This is a nice place.”

Oh god if Avery joined the group of people who kept randomly visiting his apartment, he’d have to move.

Jack looked at Antoinette. Safe to talk? A tiny glance from her suggested otherwise, but with a few more seconds, she let out a long, annoyed sigh, and sat down on the other couch while doing up her blouse’s buttons. Ball in Jack’s court then.

“You uh, wanted to talk to me, Avery?”

“Yeap.” The small, brutish woman poked her head out from the bathroom, smirked, and walked back down the hall to join them in the living room. “No wonder this building only gets one apartment per floor.” Once in the living room, she looked down from the enormous window nearly the size of his wall, and then around the curve into the other hallway. A short-lived hall that opened to his very, very large bedroom. “A Ventrue and a Daeva, bet you two brainwash dozens of humans to be your sex slaves.”

He frowned and said nothing. Neither did Antoinette. The wolf’s prodding wasn’t worthy of a response, and it was blatant instigating.

“So,” she said at last, “a few hours ago, half my pack were scouting the area near Devil’s Corner, and ran into some Kindred guy named Damien. Don't know him. He was with some girl named Fiona."

Oh shit. He looked to Antoinette, and she looked at him. Hard to read her expression, solid and flat as it was except for a slightly raised eyebrow. Her silence was like a green light for him to handle the situation, and he was really hoping for a red light.

"... I know them," he said.

"Do you?" Avery came back to join them in the living room again, and she leaned against the wall as she wiped her bottom lip with her thumb. "Want to fill me in?"

He steeled himself, folded his arms across his chest, and looked at her. Antoinette was right behind him, if shit went badly. But then, she wasn't on his side either, not really. She'd keep him from getting killed, but she'd also take advantage of any information she heard for her own gains. Walk carefully Jack.

"Damien is a Kindred of the Lancea et Sanctum."

"Is he now? Thought they were done with Lucas gone."

Jack nodded. "Damien is trying to revive the covenant."

Antoinette scoffed, more than loud enough for Avery to understand her annoyance with Damien.

"Right," the werewolf said, "black sheep then. And Fiona?"

"... a young Begotten." Not like he could lie and say she was Kindred; the Uratha would find out he was lying. He couldn't lie and say she was human either, they'd figure that out too.

"Begotten? You mean a monster? Been fucking decades since I've run into one of them. The fuck kind of hole city you running here, Ann?"

The Prince stared daggers into the wolf, but said nothing.

Jack put up a hand. “What’s Damien and Fiona got to do with the Uratha? You said your pack were near Devil’s Corner, not directly under it, so it doesn’t sound like Damien was violating your rule.”

She snorted and walked over to his window. Not a care in the world, she put her hand against the glass. Smudges, ugh. He kept his mouth shut as he ground his teeth.

“Azlu are sneaky fucking things. Weird tricks up their sleeve—in their webs. David thinks one of those fucking spiders has set up a home here in Dolareido; that’s why we’re here. So, cats out of the bag, we’re here for a host, Azlu.”

Jack looked over his shoulder at Antoinette, but the Prince looked as confused as he did. “Um ... Azlu? Host?”

“Yeah I’m telling you more than I should. But, after poking around and getting a feel for the city, I have to say I’m pretty happy with how things are here. You”—she spun around and pointed at Antoinette—“are still a fucking hazard and are going to bring hell down on this city if you keep fucking with the Gauntlet. But, things seem fine at the moment; only reason I’m telling you any of this. We think you might have an Azlu infestation.”

Antoinette’s gaze was ice, but again when Jack checked to see what she’d say, she tossed him a quick glance and green light.

“What do Damien and Fiona have to do with any of this?” he said. Spiders, she said spiders. Shit.

“Azlu are a problem. One of them has grown, and they’re skulking around in your fucking maze of tunnels.”

“My tunnels are much of the reason Dolareido is the haven it has become for Kindred.” Antoinette switched and refolded her legs as she leaned back and hooked her arms on the couch's back. But, once she opened her mouth, ready to snarl, she sighed instead, closed her lips, and looked back to Jack.

Trapped between the two most powerful women in the city, in the world for all he was able to figure. God damn.

“Yeah, I know. Good for you Ann, you put together a nice city for vamps. You also put together a nice city for nasty shit to hide. I'm not your fucking janitor. I—”

Jack got in her face. Again. Just like with Jacob, except now it was Antoinette, another Kindred elder, another person Avery seemed perfectly content to piss off. No wonder she wanted a middleman, if she treated everyone this way. Classic case of knowing she was trouble and not being able to help herself, maybe?

“Damien and Fiona,” he said, “what do they have to do with this?”

Avery snorted as she met him, eye to eye. Don't cower, don't show any fear. Like dealing with any animal, don't act afraid and don't run. Maybe he should have lay down and pretend to be dead? He was tempted.

“The girl is dead. Just a corpse walking around, possessed by an Azlu.”

“ ... she didn't seem dead,” he said, “didn't feel dead.”

Avery reached out and poked him in the shoulder. It was enough to make him take a step back, and the touch of her finger on his body sent a jolt of panic through his limbs. He suppressed it; he was a Ventrue after all. Didn't change that the touch of her fingers on his body made him want to bolt, shot vitae through his fingers and toes, ready for a fight. Made the beast in his gut growl and back up. Better than curling up in a ball on the ground at least.

Antoinette almost moved to intervene. Almost.

“Azlu are sneaky. I gotta repeat myself over, and over? None of you understand the threat this poses. The woman stopped my pack with a spiderweb. A fucking spiderweb. Think that’s a coincidence?”

“So they escaped.”

“Fucking vanished.” She snapped her fingers, hand outstretched and held beside his ear so the resounding snap was enough to hurt his hearing. Mean. “Running in the direction of Devil’s Corner at that. She’s hiding in there, fucking with the Wall. She’ll begin eating and absorbing people now, if she hasn’t already.”

Jack stood his ground. “She’s not Azlu, she’s Begotten. Damien said so and I believe him.”

“What, you think it’s just coincidence that the Azlu show up, and there happens to be a Begotten with a form like a spider, with abilities like a spider?”

“Or there are no Azlu,” he said.

Avery snorted and got in closer. “You don’t see what we see kid, don’t see what’s on the other side of the Gauntlet. You—nah, fuck it. I said my piece. You see that Fiona girl, avoid her.”

And with that, the werewolf left. No glance back, no check for confirmation, no further instructions, just a door slam to mark her exit. Did she want him to tell her if he saw Fiona, or Damien? Woman’s communication skills were horrible.

But then, he doubted she was the leader of her pack for that. Probably the leader cause she knew how to make smart choices on the hunt, and because she was strong enough.

“I am sorry for her ill manners, my love.” Antoinette stood back up and came to him, hugged him, and rubbed his hair in that perfect way again. “But, I must act. If what she says is true, I will need to investigate. Shall we continue this another time?”

Damn. Cock blocked, as Beatrice would say.

“Yeah sure. I’ll see you later then?”

“Indeed.” She took his chin, aimed it up to her, and smiled with her red eyes as she leaned down to kiss him.

“Love you,” he said.

“I love you, mon amour.” But of course that wasn’t enough for the busty goddess, and she took his hand to press it against her chest, to cup her breast through the blouse and bra. “And Avery may have upset our date, but do not think I have forgotten what I said. Next we meet, hopefully, we may resume.”

He melted.

---

Knock knock.

“Oh my fucking god, someone kill me.” He stepped away from his once again clean window, and peeked through the peep hole. Beatrice. He smiled; someone he could get along with in a normal way, sort of. He opened the door. “Come in.”

“Yo, Jack. Seen Fiona around?”

“No. But Avery tells me the werewolves are hunting her. They say she’s Azlu.”

“Azlu? Fuck is that?” She walked over to the window and leaned against it, both hands to the glass. God damn it, the smudges.

“I don’t know. Some monster, I guess? Not a Begotten, but ... something else? Avery said it was a spider, or they were spiders? Just ... arg, that bitch refused to explain anything.”

“Yeah seems like that’s her shtick. Reminds me of Jacob.”

Jack reached out and grabbed the Nosferatu’s hand. Half to get her attention, half to get her claws off the glass. “Please tell me you didn’t tell Jacob that.”

“Fuck no. Kid you think I got a death wish?” Chuckling, she hopped over to the couch and sat down, as if she’d sat there a million times before. “So you were talking to Avery again?”

“Yeah. Seems like some of her pack ran into Damien and Fiona. And now they think Fiona’s this weird Azlu thing, so now they’re hunting her. She escaped with Damien into Devil’s Corner, but she’s vanished according to Avery.”

“Fuck. Hope the dogs don’t catch her, I like her.”

“Yeah, I do too.”

“She even likes metal music. You know how hard it is to find someone who likes metal? Like, quality good metal, long songs with good singers and shit.”

He blinked at her. She blinked at him. He tilted his head to the side, and so did she.

“ ... favorite band?” he said.

“Uh, not sure. Tough question. Probably Symphony X. Love the heavier sounds of their new albums.”

Jack’s jaw dropped, and he sat down on the couch across from her. “I. Fucking. Love. Allen’s voice, and Romeo’s solos? Orgasmic, fucking orgasmic.”

“Fucking yes!” Beatrice slammed her claws down on the table in front of her. It shattered. “ ... shit.”

God damn it.

---

Him and the Nosferatu, in the tunnels, with flashlights. Seemed to be the ‘in’ thing to do these days, go into the tunnels like they were exploring god damn ancient, abandoned tombs. In truth, there may have been such hidden secrets, considering the history of the tunnels and who used to lived in them, but he was perfectly content to leave them forgotten and lost.

But, he wanted to know what was going on, and so did Beatrice. If he asked Julias, his sire would have forced him to stay above ground. If he told Antoinette, she’d have probably locked him in her tower.

He was in a suit, Beatrice was in a black t-shirt cut short above the navel, and some torn up blue jeans and combat boots. An unlikely pair, doing unlikely things.

“Favorite guitarist?” she said.

“Tough call. I like Petrucci’s sound, but prefer Romeo’s solos. And if I’m in a heavy mood I prefer Loomis.”

“Fuck yes love me some Loomis. Your turn.”

“Favorite singer?”

She tapped a claw along her extra teeth as she shined her flashlight down the tunnel. “Probably Jørn. Can always rely on him for consistent belting power.”

“Yeah, I listen to a lot of Jørn, but doesn’t sing much of the heavier prog metal I like.” Jack rubbed his head as he let his mind wander over his favorite songs, singers, bands. “Personally I love Kelly Sundown.”

“Love me some Sundown too. That new album from Adagio? Some amazing shit in that album.”

“ ... so, I know you’re dating my boss and sire, and I’m dating the Prince, but I think we should dump them and hook up.”

She looked down at him and raised a brow, and he met her glance with the most steel, dead serious expression he could muster. Sure enough she broke into laughter, and stopped walking to reach out and lean against a wall.

“Maybe in the future kid. For now though I think they deserve a chance. Maybe we can convert them to the metal loving ways of our clearly superior musical taste?”

“Ha, maybe.” Probably not. Antoinette was into classical music, and a little of the modern era’s electronic movement; getting her to join him in loving metal was likely never going to happen though. “You got a plan about this, Beatrice?”

“What’s to plan? We’re just going to talk with Azamel.”

“Who I was expressly told to avoid, by Julias.”

“Yeah well, Julias is too protective. You’ve proven you got skills kid, Julias said as much. Said you had some interesting ambassadorial skills too. And besides, I’m here to protect your ass.”

He rolled his eyes. Triss was strong for her age, but she was no ancilla like Tasha or Jessy. If shit hit the fan, Jack had his large knife and his pistol, but neither would be of much use against the Uratha, and likely not useful against the Begotten. But maybe? For all he knew, putting a bullet between their eyes would kill them.

He kind of wished they'd turn around and go get Tasha, but he could see Beatrice wanted to do this with just him. Bonding moment? Nah, she wanted him with her cause she trusted him; and apparently people were starting to value his skills as an ambassador. Which was really weird.

"I kind of miss the days," he said, "where I was just trying to stay afloat in this crazy new world, and trouble found me. Now I'm actively seeking out the trouble?"

"Not trouble! Bad way of looking at this, come on. More like, being proactive. We both know shit is about to explode, and now we know Fiona has something to do with it. So before Jacob and the wolves butt heads, let's see if we can gleam a little information first."

"Gleam? ... you want to spy on her, don't you?" Nosferatu could hide like Mekhet, but Beatrice wasn't Natasha.

"Maybe a little."

"Don't you have people in the Circle who'd help you with this?"

"Eh we all kind of do our own thing unless Jacob gives us an order, and Jacob's gone silent psycho mode. Half the reason we're doing what we're doing. The wolves are hunting Fiona, and Azamel knows something about it. I want to learn about that, help Fiona, and maybe stop Jacob from doing something he'll regret in the future. You said you were hanging out with him not too long ago?"

"... yeah." Memories of Clara's split mouth were not pleasant. One punch from the old man was devastating. Not even a punch, a backhand. "He can handle himself."

“I’m not so sure. He told me what it’s like, when these wolves go full war mode kid. Fucking terrifying.” Triss shivered and rubbed her arms a few times. “So, Avery says Fiona is an Azlu, some sort of spider thing?”

“Yeah, says she’s fucking with the Gauntlet, whatever that is.” And that Antoinette was also fucking with the Gauntlet. Ordo Dracul business no doubt, and if he asked, she’d tell him such. “ ... we sure we don’t want to go ask Tasha or Jessy to come with us? Or if not some Invictus, how about Othello or Aaron?”

“Like I said, doing their own thing. As for your buddies, you can tell them what we learn when we’re done. Sorry if I don’t trust them. I’ve been dealing with them longer than you have.”

“Ever get into a fight with Tasha or Jessy?” He never really considered that. Hard to imagine that these people had been getting into scuffs with each other for years before he ever learned of vampires.

“Not really. Back then it was the trio, the right hands of the Invictus, always together and getting in the Carthians’ way. Garry would ask me to go check out a new building the Invictus were showing interest in, I’d show up and they’d be at the doors, preventing my access. Or they’d be in the tunnels blocking my access to areas Garry wanted some info on cause he thought the Invictus were spying on him in the area.” She laughed again. “Good times.”

“I ... I suppose it must have been. Just a few covenants to worry about, and only one of real opposition. Then Lucas returned, and then he died and things were fine for a whole five seconds before monsters and werewolves showed up.”

She laughed again and pat his shoulder. “I got to admit, over half a year now since you’ve been embraced, and it’s been the most crazy year for Dolareido in a long time. Coincidence?”

“... fuck I hope so.” Tony, Viktor, Lucas, why the fuck did all the crazy shit come flying his way? What did he do to deserve such a role in their lives? Other than having a bad habit of putting his foot in his mouth, and putting the same foot into business he should have avoided. “So, where is this Azamel?”

“Aaron says there’s been some unusual people hanging out deep beneath Morning Street. He didn’t get close, but he says they’re just hanging out there, and one of them is an old woman. Sounds like it could be her.”

“Sounds like it could be a few human squatters too.” And he kind of hoped it was. He wanted to go back to Antoinette, get back to being underneath her, feeling her huge breasts pressing on him, her lips tugging on his. This whole trip was likely to put another problem in her lap, and he didn’t want to do that.

Maybe it was his Ventrue blood coming through. Maybe it was his natural curiosity. Maybe it was just Jacob being correct, and he really did have some sort of unpredictable tenacity. He kind of liked Jacob’s appraisal, insults aside; it stroked his ego, and all Ventrue loved to have their egos stroked. But if his actions meant being a pain in the Prince’s ass, he didn’t want to do that. But then, if he ever stopped pursuing his personal or Invictus goals, even the ones that got in her way, Antoinette would likely think badly of him for it. And he would too.

“So, Jack, you get laid on a pretty regular basis now right? The Prince, and her ghouls too right?”

“... you are worse than Jessy. Yes, I do, with Antoinette. Sometimes her ghouls join us, sometimes they don’t. Didn’t we talk about this before?” The Jessy comparison was enough to make the Nosferatu sneer.

“Yeah just, I dunno, you’re still young and your opinion on this is valuable. You think it’s weird? Kindred just fucking everything and everyone all the time?”

“Um, not sure what you mean.”

“Yeah uh ... nevermind, forget it.”

He raised a brow as he looked at the deadly woman next to him. What was on her mind? No need to push though, not with Triss. If she wanted to talk about it, she'd talk about it.

It took a little while to get down to the tunnel beneath Morning Street. They passed some Nosferatu on the way, but no one Jack didn't know. A small nod was enough for him to go by with only an innocent question or two from them. It meant Julias and the others would know he was down here, with Triss, but that was inevitable. Besides, he wasn't doing anything wrong, he was nowhere near Devil's Corner.

Julias would have words for the two of them later, no doubt. But it was easier to ask for forgiveness than permission. That philosophy seemed to come up a lot lately.

They turned off the flashlights as they got closer to their destination, and Beatrice covered them in the cloak of night. An invisible force that made his skin tingle as he felt his new partner's vitae extend its influence out and over him. Like that force, they were now invisible. From a distance people would not be able to see them. From close, their eyes would pass over them like shadows. Not as strong as Tasha's, much stronger than Amanda's. Hopefully strong enough to let them approach the beast.

Humming. A voice. A quiet, gentle hum. Jack raised a brow and looked at Triss, but she shrugged and pushed on. The tunnels opened into a large room, and the two Kindred poked their heads out from around the wall into the enormous cavern.

A stage of concrete. Furniture. Some very ugly, old furniture that belonged in his grandfather's home. No bed, but there were some drawers and a cabinet, and a changing curtain on a rod. A horrible, ugly green recliner, color faded and stained and covered in equally dingy red and blue flower prints. Good god if he sat in the chair, he was sure he'd find cigarette burns and smell cat.

But there was no nearby cat in the huge room. Just concrete walls, old lights, and an older woman sitting in the chair. Eyes closed, faded silver hair, short with the way age could make you shrink, and skin hanging off of her withered frame.

It was like Grandma had moved her living room and bedroom — minus the bed — into the Dolareido tunnels.

“Two children have come to my little home. Come closer, before I kill you.”

Welp, fuck. Every time he thought he had his bearings, something flipped them. Antoinette and Avery were the deadliest women in the city, but just a peek, just a glance, just a single fucking moment of voice, and this woman joined the list. How quickly he was reminded that he was an insect before gods.

The old woman's voice was exactly what you'd expect from a old woman, complete with the history of smoking and screaming at children to get off her lawn. Her eyes were open but only a sliver, and she wasn't even looking in their direction. As comfortable with her surroundings as an old woman in her living room.

Sighing, Beatrice stepped out from around the corner, and turned off the cloak. “Yeah, sorry. Kindred habit, you know?”

“Yes, I know all too well. I'm Azamel Venastroth, as I'm sure you're aware.” Grandma leaned up from her chair and blinked her worn eyes at them, skinny and wrinkled fingers clutching at the arms of her recliner. “I said come closer.”

“Closer, right.” Shrugging off her shoulders, Beatrice started the walk toward the woman’s stage, and Jack fell in behind her. “I’m Beatrice, and this is Jack.”

“Little vampires that scurry and roam.” The old woman shrugged and brought a hand up so she could lean down, and rest her chin on her knuckles. “It was bound to happen with those dogs causing chaos above, I imagine. I wonder what they’re up to.”

She talked like a super villain, vaguely referring to things and letting their imaginations fill in the blanks; she knew more than she was letting on. The feeling in his gut as he got closer and closer to the old woman suggested as much, if not more, like instead she knew everything that was going on. Every step toward her felt like a step toward something terrible and vicious. Beatrice could feel it too; Jack could see her shivering a little as they came closer.

Begotten could see the beast in other creatures, according to Fiona. Kindred couldn’t, but they could feel something, they could feel an aura, something inhuman, some with hunger inside other Kindred, in the Uratha, and in Begotten. It was like trying to describe something you could only touch, its shape hidden in total black. You could feel something like teeth, feel something like bones and spikes and talons and claws and muscle and fur. You could hear the rumbling voice, silent but to the beast within. You could feel the heat of its breath, and taste the blood in it too.

This tiny, frail old woman’s beast felt like some lost, ancient deity, long buried in the desert, unearthed by curious explorers who didn’t know when to quit.

“Come then, speak little leeches, why have you come to my tiny hole in the Earth?”

Triss frowned and adopted a classic fuck-you-I-won’t-do-what-you-tell-me stance, arms across her chest and one of her feet out to the side. “We wanted to talk about Fiona.”

“Fiona.” Azamel shrugged, and sat back up straight in her chair. Her feet, complete with slippers, pushed against the concrete stage in a slow rhythm to get her chair rocking back and forth. Squeak. Squeak. “Why do you think I would know anything about her?”

“So ... she hasn’t come to speak to you yet then?” Jack said.

“Not yet, no. I’m sure she will, as all Begotten should.” The old woman started to cough, the deep gargling kind that came out of the lungs. “And if she did, why would that matter to a couple of young Kindred?”

“We’re her friends,” Triss said, “and we’re hoping to stop the Uratha from killing her.”

“The Uratha are hunting Fiona?”

Jack nodded. “We were hoping you’d know why.” And he doubted her ignorance was genuine.

Azamel stroked her spotted chin, and looked down as she contemplated. Such an odd scene, an old woman god thing, sitting in Grandma’s chair, in abandoned tunnels beneath a city.

“The Uratha,” she said, “are hunting spiders, as they are wont to do. Vermin according to them, relics from an era long gone, when their so called Father Wolf prowled the lands of flesh and spirit. Abominations, as they are. The wolves will not stop until the spiders are gone. I warned Antoinette these vermin would call attention to Dolareido.”

Jack came in closer, and stepped up onto the stage. A bit presumptuous maybe, but she did say come closer. “You knew the wolves would come?”

“Of course. It is in their nature. And if I had known those spider vermin were making their nest in the city, I would not have come.”

Triss raised a brow and came up to the stage, but not onto it. Defiant just to be defiant. “Why don’t you leave?”

“I have plans.” Grandma coughed a few more times, and gestured to the dresser near her. “Fetch my cigarettes.”

Jack shrugged, slid open the drawer and got her cigarettes, a lighter too, and handed them to the deadly monster.

She snapped them up, but her efforts to pull a cigarette from the pack took time. Arthritis maybe. Naturally, the old woman refused to ask for help, and with time managed to pull one from the pack and light it herself.

“Now,” she said as she balanced the lit cigarette on her lips, “you two either have a lot of courage or lack of brains to come visit me. And you Nosferatu are walking on thinner ice with each moment, so zip it.”

Jack choked down his desire to chuckle, and Triss lowered her arms with a grimace.

“I like to think we’re somewhere between,” he said. “We want to help Fiona, and we were hoping you could give us information about this mess of a situation.”

“Your goal to help Fiona is misplaced.” Azamel took a long drag of the cigarette, and tapped its ashes into the ashtray that sat upon the recliner’s arm. “But before I answer any questions, why should I help you? What does old Azamel get back for this?”

“An opportunity to help a fellow Begotten?” Triss said.

The old woman frowned at Triss, since she refused to ‘zip it’, but shrugged. “She’s not part of my plans.”

Plans plans. This Begotten sounded like a Kindred.

Jack scratched his buzzed head. The conversation was going well, surprisingly well. Just like talking to Grandma. “If the Uratha are hunting Fiona, they—”

“As I said, they hunt the spiders. What do Fiona and the spiders have in common?”

“Way Damien tells it,” Jack said, “Fiona’s monster half is very spider-ish.”

“Interesting.” Azamel nodded, took another puff, and blew the smoke toward Jack. “What else?”

“Uh ... um ... I don’t know? I mean ... wait, Fiona mentioned something about there being an extra disappearance in Devil’s Corner that she says she’s not responsible for.”

Azamel chuckled, coughed her lungs raw, and continued to rock. “If this extra kill is being attributed to her, then it must have happened around the same time, in the same area.”

The longer the conversation went on, the less she seemed like some unknowable monster, the more she seemed like a perfectly reasonable person. Maybe Antoinette and Julias were overreacting. They had a lot of hate for the Begotten, and so far he couldn’t see why. Kindred had fuckups too, draugr vamps and such, let alone the nasty bastard elders like Viktor, Tony, and Lucas. This old woman deserved a chance. Right?

Triss started to pace. “So these strange spider things show up in Dolareido, and ... the wolves show up to hunt it. There just happens to also be a Begotten here that is also a spider-like thing? So ... these spider things are—”

“Sneaky.” Azamel tapped the cigarette fresh of its ashes once again, before setting it down to rest. “They are not mere spiders. They can act with far more intelligence than such creatures should be able to. And no doubt, they have been drawn to Dolareido, as its landscape has changed dramatically in a small amount of time.”

Jack winced. To say the Azlu coming to Dolareido was his fault was a scary thought, but at the same time, three elders dead at his hand was probably what Azamel was talking about.

“So they’re smart enough to take advantage of power vacuum?” he said.

“Nothing so political, I imagine. No, they took advantage of the chaos, and when they realized Fiona was here, they saw an opportunity to create confusion.”

“... fucking smart for spiders,” Triss said.

“I said they’re more than spiders, stupid girl. Would you ... it’s ok Athalia, these two children are just curious about the Uratha.”

Athalia? Jack looked around, but didn’t see anyone. For a second he thought maybe the woman was senile, but after underestimating crazy shit enough times, you learn to stop underestimating crazy shit. Someone else was in the room.

A woman stepped from a nearby wall. She hadn’t been there before, and as she came off the concrete, her whole body emerged from black. It faded with a few moments, and soon became a beautiful woman of dark skin, slender and somewhat tall, with long black hair and soft features. Looked a bit like that Stephanie wolf now that he looked at her, but a kinder face.

Kinder face on the monster. Fitting metaphor, or a mask?

Triss frowned at her. “What are you supposed to be?”

Athalia shrugged, climbed up onto the stage, and sat down in one of the wooden chairs. “The two of you have a lot of guts just randomly coming down here.”

“I guess,” Jack said, “but we didn’t think you guys would attack us or anything. We’re all friends here, right?” Athalia and Triss both snorted, and Azamel coughed. Ok maybe not. “We’re confused as hell and we’re trying to save Fiona.”

Athalia turned the chair so she was sitting facing its back, and she folded her arms across it as she shifted eyes between Jack and Beatrice. “Give me one reason to believe you.”

“What?” the two Kindred said.

“Give me a reason to believe you. Kindred here don’t like us. Your Prince and Primogen would prefer we didn’t exist. Daniel and Jacob ... So, you have to convince us that you two are genuinely trying to help out a Begotten. If what you say is even true, and the Uratha are hunting her, which makes no sense.”

Jack looked to Triss for some sort of help, but she looked at him with as much confusion.

“Uh...” He hopped down next to the Nosferatu and turned to look at Athalia, his palms against the stage edge. “Fiona has come to me on multiple occasions, looking for help getting used to Dolareido. I was the one that introduced her to the Primogen, at my choosing.”

“And,” Triss said as she came up to stand beside Jack, putting her hands on the stage edge in the same way, “I don’t give a rat’s ass about Begotten, none of us do. The Primogen and older Kindred may have something up their ass about you guys, but Jack and I didn’t even know your kind existed a month ago. Far as I’m concerned, this Fiona is a fun gal with a big appetite.”

“Big appetite?” Athalia said.

Jack nodded. “Yeah, she’s eaten twelve people in less than a year, and I get the impression she could have doubled that number if she feasted as much as her hunger told her to.”

“ ... then, perhaps we should speak,” Azamel said, “sooner, rather than later. If she does not learn to eat without killing her prey, she’ll attract more attention than the Azlu and Uratha. Athalia, bring her to me.”

“Fine.” Athalia got up, tilted her head until her neck made a rather disgusting crack sound, and started walking. Without them.

“I suggest,” Azamel continued, “that you two go back to the surface, and wait. Stay out of the way, and perhaps, the deaths will be minimal.”

Minimal deaths. Not exactly the peaceful solution he was looking for.

---

---

~~Natasha~~

Natasha opened her door, and did her best to hide her smile. Better to not let the two wolves know she enjoyed their visits; if they knew that, she’d lose the power. Or so Antoinette suggested as a means of seduction. Playing hard to get. Did she want to seduce one of them? She had to admit, as her conversation with the Prince had gone on, she’d found herself opening more and more to the idea.

Little her, seducing the big bad wolf. Antoinette had also suggested she wear a red dress with a hood, just to see if they’d get the joke. Look at her being all fun fun. She hadn’t played around and laughed and been silly about things since Julias and her were close friends.

She had to visit him sometime. It’d been so long since they talked.

“Hey Tasha,” Art said, sneaky bastard smile on his face. Matt was behind him, and the big guy offered a wave.

“Hi. What’re you guys d-doing here? I could have been gone; you should t-t-texted me instead.” She stepped back and motioned for the two werewolves to come in. Less stuttering finally, even when looking up at two frustratingly handsome, very dangerous men.

“We’re still working on the phone situation,” Matt said. As per usual, Art forgot to take off his shoes, and Matt stopped him from getting her floor dirty.

“Officially we’re here because we convinced Avery that you provide us with valuable insight into the Kindred situation.” Art shrugged, and slid onto a stool at her counter. “But we’re really just here for the TV.” He gestured to the enormous device against the wall.

“You know,” she said, “if you wanted, it’d b-be easy to get you a better place ... t-t-to stay than those old buildings in North Side. I c-could even get you a TV.” It’d be easy, very easy.

“Heh, maybe!” Matt took a chair from her living room table; easier to fit his body than a stool. “We still don’t know what’ll happen after we catch our prey. I’d love to stay, so would Art, but Avery seems to think Jacob will make life hard for us. Not worth dealing with according to her.”

They’ve loved to stay! She smirked and slid off the stool. Blood in the fridge awaited her, and she poured herself a glass as she struggled to contain her smiles. It was silly and dumb to get so happy just because a couple of guys were showing up at her apartment, but it was a first, and she wasn’t used to it. It made her giddy.

“Blood out of a fridge?” Matt said.

“Mmhmm. Not n-nearly as effective as drinking it out of someone, b-b-but this works enough to tide Kindred over for a couple d-days.”

“How do you get it?”

“The Prince owns many of the companies in D-Dolareido, including the hospitals. We p-pay kine to donate blood, handsomely. They d-d-don’t know where a lot of it goes.”

Art laughed and reached out to take her glass. She let him, and grinned as the man held it in front of his face and tilted it to watch the thick liquid move and dip. Satisfied, he gave it back.

“Cozy situation,” he said. “In Tijuana the vamps had nothing so symbiotic. Kindred killed humans without mercy.”

“That ... is sad.” She took another sip of the liquid, and stared into the crimson life. “I remember every kine I’ve ... k-killed. Sometimes, when we’re so hungry we can’t stop ourselves, w-w-we drain a human dry. But the P-Prince doesn’t like that, and ... and most of us agree.”

“What if they deserve it?” Art added, eyes darkening as a strange, subtle grin marked his face.

“Some Kindred take it on themselves t-to kill kine who deserve it, b-b-but I never ... did it on purpose, I guess.” Her kills were specifically only on kine who deserved it, but also only when she was so hungry she couldn’t resist; which was the typical approach for Kindred outside a few vigilantes. Her answer seemed to satisfy Art.

“The bloodlust in Dolareido is very low. Interesting feeling, being surrounded by Kindred but not worrying about a sniper bullet to the skull everywhere I go. Don’t see vamps fighting vamps in the streets, don’t see humans being torn up on a regular basis, don’t see any of the violence in Tijuana. I guess those three elders dying really agreed with Dolareido.”

“It has.” Though, from what they were describing, Tijuana was a far more dangerous place than Dolareido ever was, even before the purge. “The w-worst you’ll find here is ... sex holes and d-d-drug abuse.” Not entirely true of course. Kine had their own ring of crime, but nothing worse than found in most cities.

“Sex holes?” Matt said.

“Y-Yeah.” She poured herself another glass of blood. “I—wait, did ... I uh, you t-two want food? I d-d-don’t have, uh, any meat.” Putting something other than blood into her fridge? She frowned at the thought, then laughed at the irony.

“Nah.” The giant shook his head. “We ate before coming over ... so all these cupboards are empty? You don’t put spices in your blood? I’m sure honeyed blood would taste pretty sweet.”

She snorted, something between a laugh and a groan. “Ick.” Another sip, and she started to walk around, the way she did when she was talking on the phone. “Sex holes are ... a f-frequent feeding place for Kindred. They’re clubs, sometimes just t-t-tiny rooms in the back of bars or similar, where kine show up for d-drugs, and sex.” Not exactly the sort of feeding ground she used, but the more confident Kindred, Daeva in particular, used them frequently.

“Man,” Art said, “Avery was right about that.”

“W-What did she say?”

“That the younger Kindred take every opportunity to get laid, as often as possible, and basically fuck all night every night.”

Natasha frowned, but the frown faded as she thought of Jessy and her squad of delicious ghouls. “Some of us ... d-do things like that.”

Art smirked, a knowing smirk, an evil smirk. Maybe he could smell the ghouls on her? She showered, but werewolves were an unknown quantity. Maybe they could smell all sorts of embarrassing things? But without the blush of life, she could be twenty sorts of embarrassed and not give it away with blushing. Her averting, fidgety gaze though, she couldn't help that.

Matt reached out from his seat and gave his friend a hard smack on the leg. "Dude, uncool."

"N-No, it's ok." She shrugged, swallowed her fear, and resumed walking around her apartment. It settled her. "We all have our vices. Uratha m-m-must have some?" Not that sex was the only Kindred vice, but it was definitely one the younger Kindred gravitated toward.

"Yeah." Matt pointed at Art, big smile on his face. "Some of us like to hang out at bars, just to cause trouble."

Art shrugged and slid off the stool. "Sometimes, it's just really satisfying to punch a bastard in the face."

"Or stab them," she said.

"Still looking to stab me?" Art came up to her, sly grin and evil eyes looking down at her from his great height. "Recreate a scene from Game of Thrones?"

She froze, and stared up at the big man as he came near. As Art got closer, his smile drifted between dark and sinister, to playful and fun, like he might start pulling on her non-existent pigtails. A nervous glance Matt's way showed he wasn't going to interfere. If anything, the gentle giant seemed intrigued, eyes watching her with as much intensity as Art; but at least Matt's intensity didn't also look like he might attack her.

“You ... y-you ... you’re not as scary as you think.” She put down the glass, and pushed at Art with her two hands. Of course, Arturo was a very tall, very athletic man, and likely weighed over twice as much as her very very short self did. Attempts to push him back were frustratingly futile; all she did was push herself away from him.

Which sent both wolves into howls of laughter, and Art leaned onto the counter with both elbows to catch his breath.

For a moment she wanted to be angry; they were laughing at her. But she caught Matt’s eyes, and even Art’s when he managed to recover from what was apparently a night deadly laughter. They weren’t laughing at her, they were just laughing. She started to chuckle too, and pushed Art again in the arm, though not nearly as hard this time.

“You t-two would like Jessy,” she said.

“That the Gangrel girl, works for the Invictus?” Matt said. “Clara didn’t have anything good to say about her. Said she was a bitch.”

“W-Well ... yeah, she can be. But she’s my best friend, and she ... reminds m-me of you two.”

Both men frowned and looked at each other.

“Should we be offended?” Matt said.

Art shrugged. “You can be a huge dick.”

“Me? You’re the asshole.”

“How you figure?”

“You’re the one that keeps hiding Stephanie’s shit.”

“She deserves it. And you? Pointing Mason at her.”

“Not pointing you dumbass, just—”

“You’re going to make things worse, dumb—”

“You’re the one ma—”

“Boys!” She stomped her foot down. Light or not, it was enough to make a thud, and both men silenced as they turned to look at her, eyebrows raised. “I didn’t mean you’re d-d-dicks, cause Jessy isn’t. B-But you can be ... boyish. Like her. Very...” Now that she thought about it, how could she describe Jessy? What was it about her that made her and Natasha friends? What was it about these two that reminded her of her friend? “V-Very ... fun.”

“Fun?” they said together.

“Y-Yeah. Fun, as in outgoing, and ... comfortable t-talking, and being upfront and fun about things.” Everything she wasn’t. She was trying to change, and succeeding according to Jessy, but it didn’t change that Jessy, and apparently Matthew and Arturo, were boisterous, jovial, aggressive, and confident in ways she’d never be.

They blinked at each other, until Matt shrugged, and Art pulled himself up to sit on her counter.

“Tasha,” Art said, “the only thing separating you from being as stupid and loud as Matt and me is alcohol.”

“I ... oh.” She looked down at her glass again, and tried to picture it as wine. No good. A lifetime as a Kindred had long destroyed any taste she had for human food. If she blushed life she could reawaken her old taste buds, but she couldn’t drink or eat human food; unless she wanted to vomit it all up later. “I’ve n-never been drunk.”

“Yeah?”

“Mmhmm.”

“Well,” Matt said with a small slap of one hand to the other, “that’s the problem. You don’t know what it’s like to turn off your brain. Which, I think, is perfectly fine.”

“Nah.” Art shook his head, reached out, and took her glass of blood again, only to set it down away from her, further along the counter top. “It’s healthy to turn your brain off every once in a while. Even Uratha aren’t in hunt mode twenty-four seven. We relax, get drunk, goof around.”

“Dude.” The gentle giant shook his head, and slid the glass back toward her. “You’re a fucking Irraka.”

Art smirked over his shoulder at his friend, and shrugged. “Yeap, so she has no excuse. Come on, want to go out?” he said looking to her. “We could go to a club, city seems to be swimming in them. Dance or get drunk. Or in your case, full on fresh blood with a very high alcohol concentration.”

“You sure you’re Irraka?” Matt didn’t look too convinced, and he got up to join them in the kitchen, butt to the counter as he leaned against it. “Aren’t your types normally anti-social?”

“H-Haven’t you two been friends for years?” Tasha said.

Art rolled his eyes. “Ignore Matt, he’s just being a dumbass. In Tijuana we didn’t exactly have the luxury of high living solitude. No offense.”

High living solitude. An interesting way to phrase her life. She giggled as she thought of a monk, living a life void of Earthly desires, and having Wi-Fi.

“You t-t-two might think I’m all nerdy and boring, b-b—”

Art put up his hands, palms out in surrender. “Ha, sorry. Nerdy, yes, but boring? You were exploring that tunnel alone, and the way you managed to put up a fight, gave us all a big chase. Certainly not boring.”

She beamed. That was true, she had done that all alone. “B-But I ... I was terrified, exploring that darkness alone.”

“You and me both.” Art shuddered and gestured to Matt. “Only a dumbass like him wouldn’t be afraid. Fucking Rahu.”

“Hey.” Matt looked down. The gentle giant looked genuinely hurt, but a moment later a smile blossomed, and he looked at Natasha. “Even Rahu get afraid. But we use the fear to fuel us. I—”

A buzz stopped them, and they all looked down at Natasha’s pocket. She pulled out her phone and quickly checked the text.

From Jack: Avery hunting Damien and Fiona. Thinks Fiona is something called Azlu.

Oh god damn it.

“Looks serious,” Matt said. “You went pale ... well, you know, you would have if you weren’t dead.”

Natasha winced and put the phone away, grimacing. “Apparently, Avery ... she ... she s-says you guys are ... hunting Fiona.”

Art got off the counter, and the two wolves looked at each other with a raised brow each.

“Fiona?” they said.

“A monster, a B-Begotten. Avery thinks she’s ... Azlu?”

“ ... a host,” they said again, each bringing one hand up to their face to cradle it as they groaned in pain.

“But she’s not! I’ve b-b-been with her, t-talked to her, she’s a ... she’s ... I’ve seen the monster inside her. That’s Begotten.” Shit shit, she shouldn’t have said anything. Ugh she was starting to act like Jack, saying things when she shouldn’t, giving away information. Used to be so good at information control, now she was acting like a child.

“It also describes Azlu pretty damn well. Come on.” Art pat his friend on the arm, and turned around.

“Sorry,” Matt said, “but if she’s Azlu, then ... she’s not your friend. You’ll thank us later.” He nodded, and followed after Art toward the door.

“W-Wait! I ... I can’t believe that. I saw her w-with my own eyes, and she ... she was a person. A n-n-normal person ... normal for a B-Begotten anyway.”

The two wolves looked at each other as they put their shoes back on. It was easy to see they didn’t believe her, and were trying to find a delicate way to break the news to her that they’d likely be killing Fiona. Or at least it was easy to see on Matt’s face; Art was better at hiding it.

“If Avery says we hunt them, we hunt them,” the Irraka said, and he opened the door without a glance back. “Sorry.”

She dashed past Matt, under Art’s arm, and into the hallway outside her door. Little her before the mighty wolves; they looked shocked. Good. She reached out with both hands and pressed against Art’s chest — which she had to aim up to even reach — to push him back into the apartment, before closing the door behind her.

“You t-two, you’re going to make it happen again!”

“What?” they said.

“What happened last t-t-time! Avery killed Minerva, and that ... p-probably could have been avoided! You have to—”

“Tasha, listen.” Matt came up behind Art, but couldn’t get around him with the tiny amount of space around her door. So the giant peeked over his friend’s shoulder, and shook his head with a sigh. “We have to act fast, or this problem is going to escalate, in ways you don’t realize. It could—”

“No!” She stomped her foot, and folded her arms across her chest. “You will n-not behave rashly, and make things worse. The P-Prince lost a friend because of Avery, and J-J-Jacob, he...” What to say about Jacob? She never interacted with him; she knew better. Stay away from the old man, from his games. But in her fifty years as Kindred, he’d never done anything to make her want him to suffer.

She could imagine the eyeless man, sitting in his cave, surrounded by bones and scary, creepy things, while he wallowed in misery after the death of his love. Antoinette had painted quite the picture, and let Natasha’s imagination fill in the blanks. Her imagination did love to exaggerate, but even knowing that, she couldn’t help but feel for him.

And she didn’t want Fiona to die.

Art, wincing, reached up to scratch the back of his neck. “Well Avery hasn’t contacted us yet, but we have to get back to the base by sunrise. And no doubt, she’ll want us hunting after we get some sleep.”

Damn it damn it. They could move in the sunlight, she couldn’t. She had to do something now while the sun was down and she had time to interfere.

“D-Damien ... could get hurt too.”

“Damien?”

“A Kindred. He was the one t-to d-d-discover Fiona was a Begotten. He ... he’s probably with her now ... and...” And she didn’t want him to die either.

“Our hands are tied,” Matt said.

“ ... no. N-No, we’re going to go find this thing now!” Again, she stomped her foot.

“Find the Azlu? Now?” The gentle giant looked down at Art as his friend looked over his shoulder at him.

“Well, if we can find the host and prove it’s not this Fiona girl, I’m sure Avery will listen to us.” Art elbowed his big friend in the gut, and smirked. “Think you can stop being a momma’s boy for five or six hours and come scouting with the two sneaky beasts?” Beasts? She was sneaky, all Mekhet were, and so were Irraka if the werewolves were telling her the truth. Calling her a sneaky beast was a strange but welcomed compliment. “Got your weapons with you Tash?”

“Y-Yeah, uh ... give me a second.” Finally, some progress. She slipped past the two titans crammed into her door’s little hallway, and went into her bedroom to get her spare gear.

“Not sure this is a good idea,” Matt said, loud enough for her to hear. “But, if you two idiots are going, I’ll come too. Keep your dumbasses alive.”

She came back with a sword and pistol, vest holster, and the appropriate suit jacket to hide them. “I can t-take care of myself.”

“You can at that,” the big guy said, grinning at her, and winking too.

---

The tunnels once again. Still a little ways to go before before they reached the area under Ronder Street, but the lights were already starting to become sparse, fewer and fewer of them functioning and lit. And the old chill of its dark, awaiting lengths crawled up her spine again.

But this time she had back up, two big bad wolves, she shouldn't be afraid. Then again, if it was an entire pack's job to hunt down this thing, and they were normally thirteen, would two be enough?

"I thought about asking if you had a flamethrower," Art said, hands in his pockets. "We could really use one for this prey."

"... a flamethrower. Um, n-n-no, I have nothing like that. Kindred, we d-don't like fire." She wasn't even sure if they had such weaponry in the Invictus storage. Maybe her new boss did, but she doubted it. Sort of a rule of war for Dolareido, don't use fire. "W-Why would Uratha use a flamethrower?"

"We're going after Azlu." Matt came up on other side to walk beside her, eyes set on the darkness ahead. "Hosts, from before the Sundering. Abominations, half-spirit half-flesh nasty things. The Azlu are spiders. They crawl into people's skulls and eat their brains, take over their body, grow and mutate into monstrous ... monsters."

Natasha tried to not smirk at the man's poor vocabulary, especially as the image he was painting was not a pretty one.

"Uratha are half-spirit half-flesh too." Art shrugged and tilted his head to the side, until Natasha had to wince with the loud snap sound of his neck crack.

"Spirit..." She thought about the feelings the spirit Safe had bathed her in, the strange way it talked, the insanity that such a creature existed.

Matt poked her in the shoulder. "Interested in spirits?"

“I, uh ... you were r-right, about the Prince, experimenting with s-s-stuff. And ... some of the stuff I’ve seen d-d-does look ... interesting, and ... wonderful.”

Art didn’t look too happy about it. “The Hisil is just as fucked up and brutal as this side of the Gauntlet, Tash. Not sure what you and white hair have been up to, but don’t start trying to do ... well, what Minerva did, according to Avery.”

“C-Can you tell me what Avery was ... d-d-doing that—”

Art brought up a hand and shook his head. “No. Sorry.”

She sighed but nodded. “So, the Hisil, that’s ... I d-don’t really understand.”

“Better that you don’t,” the Irraka said.

“I disagree.” Matt reached down and pat her on the shoulder. “Some healthy curiosity in you. Avery doesn’t like it, but I think we can convince her to let us show you some things sometime.”

“Show m-me things?” She’d replace Jack as the intermediary at this rate.

“Art said it,” Matt continued, “we’re half-spirit. Maybe we could show you the Hisil sometime.”

“You’re a dumbass. Avery will never agree to that, and you’re going to get her killed.”

“She can handle herself, and she’ll be with us. You’re just as bad as her, thinking it’s the same as before, or like in Tijuana. Things are different here.”

“Lenny you moron. Shit will—”

She punched them, both of them, Art first then Matt. “We can talk about that stuff later. For now, w-we should be quiet, and f-f-find this thing.”

They chuckled, and nodded. “Yes Mom.” Again, in unison.

Art shook out his shoulders, and started to fall onto his hands. Matt stopped, and Natasha mimicked. What was going on, why stop, why fall? Why—

She jumped away as the man’s clothes began to vanish, only to be replaced by fur. Vitae jolted through her limbs and demanded she run away as the man began to change; she still remembered what it felt like to have those claws in her limbs and guts. But those beasts stood upright. Art was on all fours, and turning into a wolf. A really, really, really big wolf.

His hands became paws, but large, monstrous, with huge claws. His muscles showed through the fur as thick, hulking masses. He was four feet tall at the shoulder, and seven feet long, maybe eight. Ridiculously massive teeth jutted from his chops, head attached to a thick, powerful neck. More like a lion with wolf features. Her jaw dropped as the man came to end his transformation, and she gulped on nothing as she looked the unnatural creature from nose to tail.

“That uh ... w-wouldn’t pass ... for a wolf.”

Matt laughed and pat her on the back again, huge hand dwarfing her spine. “That’s Urshul form. We can go Urhan, Wolf form, but it’s not strong enough to deal with much.”

A form between the war titans she’d seen, and a normal wolf.

“W-Wait, this is ... when I first saw you in the tunnel, in the dark before you chased me. You were in this ... f-f-form.”

Art nodded his large wolf head, and stepped in toward her. She froze as the gargantuan mutant canine pressed his head against her arm, and then her shoulder.

Don't pet the gigantic wolf monster, don't pet the gigantic wolf monster, don't pet the gigantic wolf monster.

She pet the gigantic wolf monster.

Art crooned, a deep rumbling sound in his immense throat, and rubbed his head against her hand.

“Arturo Ibarra, you disgrace wolves everywhere.” Matt reached out and shoved the big beast's head away from her.

“Hey! D-Don't push him. He's ... he's so warm and ... fluffy.” Course he looked far more menacing than fluffy, with especially primal wolf eyes to match his massive, muscular wolf body. But that didn't change that he was, indeed, fluffy. The fur of his neck was particularly thick, almost like a mane, and she stepped in again to rub her fingers through the softness. Must touch the fluffy.

After what was probably far too long rubbing his ears and combing his fur, they started walking again, this time with Art out ahead of them. He was their scout evidently; probably why he transformed. And as she watched his shoulders shift with each paw's step, she realized she'd just spent five minutes rubbing Arturo's face and shoulders and back. He probably planned it, just so she'd feel awkward later. Evil bastard.

But, watching him prowl forward, she still wanted to pet him some more. She had to shake her head a few times to remind herself he was Art. Not a dog, not a wolf. But, maybe he could go full normal wolf mode, and sit on her couch, and let her pet his head? And Matt too? It'd been a long time since she'd owned dogs.

Werewolves, Natasha, they're werewolves, not wolves. Focus.

“Can you t-two see in the dark?” she said.

“Better than a human yeah, but nothing crazy. We were pretty surprised a vamp was exploring the dark; we had to go by our noses.”

“I can s-see b-b-better than most Kindred in the dark. But, m-maybe we should use a flashlight this time?” She brought one out, small enough to hold easily in one hand, and she held it reverse grip, pointed out toward the darkness. A quick snap of the other hand and she had her pistol out, held on top of the wrist of the other hand.

“Doesn’t look like the pistol model you used when you ran into us,” he said. They’d started walking, and sure enough the lack of lights would have left most Kindred totally blind in the absolute black, and the Uratha too.

“It’s n-not. We know these d-d-don’t do much, against werewolves. So now most Kindred who use p-pistols ... will use machine pistols. If we can’t bring a werewolf down with a few b-bullets ... a few hundred might d-d-do better.”

Matt winced, but laughed. “Yeah, they do. Tijuana taught us that.”

Course, machine pistols were the weaker choice over shotguns or sub machine guns. Or in the case of the Carthians, assault rifles. But it was easy to fit under the jacket, and unwieldy as a machine pistol was, Kindred strength made up for it.

They fell into silence as they continued along. Or at least, what Natasha thought would be silence, but something kept interrupting it every few seconds, a strange, straining noise of air.

Breathing. She was hearing the two werewolves breathe. Last time she was down here, the only sound was the rubbing of fabric from her movement, and her steps. Now she could hear the wolves breathe, and as their ears adjusted, she could hear their heartbeats. Big, powerful heartbeats.

How long had it been since she'd heard a heartbeat? She hung out with Kindred so often, and when there were humans or ghouls nearby, there was far too much city noise to hear the quiet things. Down deep in the Earth, she could hear them breathe, and swallow every so often; perfectly normal for a human or giant wolf, but so weird to hear. Felt like being on a hunt, hearing things so acutely, hearing life so acutely.

“W-What are we ... looking for?” she whispered.

“The Azlu will weave webs,” Matt said, “that often look normal, and then huge. But it'll also weave invisible webs in the Gauntlet, trapping any who crossover.” The giant shivered and rubbed his arms. “I do not enjoy the thought of being wrapped in webbing and having those vermin crawling on me.”

“Spiders ... are s-scary.”

“They are.” He smirked down at her, knowing full well she was talking about real spiders. But it was nice to see the huge guy express the same fears she had. “So we're looking for those webs where we found you last time.”

She wanted a shower just thinking about those webs getting into her hair.

They continued on for another thirty minutes, deeper into the old tunnels and through the abandoned depths. All the lights were out, the only source of light her flashlight. If it went out or broke, the best she'd see would be blurry silhouettes, and her two partners would be blind. But they weren't down here for a fight, they just needed to find the thing and prove it wasn't Fiona.

Did she want to prove Fiona wasn't their prey because she liked Fiona? She did, but she barely knew her. Maybe it was Damien; she wanted to help bridge the gap there. Or was it Jack? She liked him a lot, and Julias too. She wanted to help him.

Did she have her own reason for being such an idiot, or was she just drifting through her choices without knowing why she was making them. She'd ask Julias such an existential question, and he'd probably say something like: you're doing it cause you're the sort of person who tries to make everyone happy, at your own expense.

Silence and darkness really did make her mind wander.

As they went deeper, she had to check herself for any spider webbing that may have caught on her. More webbing, and more, bigger and thicker. Ahead, Art came to a stop. Matt and Natasha stopped behind him, and she pointed her light into the distance before them. She expected to see a giant web perhaps blocking their path, but instead found webbing that'd been cut.

Someone was there, a woman, walking around in the darkness.

"Two Uratha and one Kindred. Odd arrangement." The woman walked toward them and dusted some spiderweb from her shoulder. "What're you three doing down here?"

"We could ask you the same thing," Matt said. "Tunnels are off limits to Kindred."

"Good thing I'm not Kindred." She came closer into the light, and spent a little more time wiping webbing from her pants. Dressed like a Carthian, wearing some black jeans and likewise black boots, along with a white t-shirt. "Asked you a question, what are you doing down here?"

Natasha took a step back, and looked at the two wolves. “That’s ... n-n-not Fiona.”

“Nope, I’m not Fiona. Looking for her though. Can’t find her in the dream so I figured I’d come looking where everyone seems to think she is.” The woman was a bit tall, black with long, beautiful dark hair that made Natasha jealous; so lustrous. Skinny but fit, and her face had a softness to it that her eyes didn’t agree with; they seemed angry, and comfortable being angry.

“How ... c-c-can you see ... in this darkness?”

She shrugged and folded her arms across her chest. Whoever this girl was, confidence dripped from her as much as the air of creepiness around her. “Most Eshmaki can.”

“Are ... you Athalia?” she said.

“Hey, you know my name. Kudos.”

“I ... there were rumors ... about the sheriff and a Begotten.”

“Just rumors.” Athalia sneered and shook out her shoulders, like she was preparing for a fight. “So if you don’t mind, leave. Way I hear it, you dumbass wolves are hunting Fiona, which is pretty fucking stupid. She’s not a host or what-the-fuck-ever you call your prey.”

Matt came closer, as did the giant wolf beside him, but Athalia didn’t move. Didn’t even blink, far as Natasha could tell.

“We’re hunting the creature,” the big guy said. “If it’s this Fiona girl you’re talking about, then she’s already dead, and I’m sorry. So we’re—”

“Yeah I don’t think so. Get out.” Athalia took a step toward them, sneer unwavering.

Matt looked down at Natasha, blinked a few times, and looked back at Athalia. “I—”

“You fucking wolves love to bite first, ask questions later. So how about, no. Get out, before I make you.” Again, she came closer, and her dark brown eyes glared death into the three of them.

The colossal wolf took a step forward as well, snarling and growling, rumbling in his throat, primal and angry.

“W-Wait! Please.” Natasha lowered her pistol and came closer, light pointed at the tracks beneath them. “This is w-what I wanted to avoid. We c-c-can work together, communicate, and p-prevent any more fights when—”

“I trust you as much as I trust your wolf buddies to not chase a squirrel. I. Said. Leave!”

Natasha’s light began to flicker as Athalia raised her hands. It should have been stable, but the light cut the darkness in periodic flashes, like panicked heartbeats, and all three visitors took a step back as a wall of obsidian nightmare filled the air behind the beautiful woman. They could see nothing between the flickers, but when the light shined on the tunnel, movement subtle but chilling drifted around Athalia.

Whatever it was, it was crouched forward to fit itself in the tunnel, its head of bone and teeth and spiked, serrated horns looming closer. It had arms, each also covered in what looked like spikes jutting from its black flesh, black that bled droplets of onyx onto the concrete before they faded. Like a giant, human torso, with arms and fingers, a head, all covered in spikes that poked through its dark skin and bled devil’s blood. Gaunt, with bone showing through so its face looked more like an ancient mummy armed with a thousand shark teeth. Where its waist should have been, its flesh fell away and exposed a massive, dangling spinal cord that sat behind Athalia.

And it had wings. Black angel wings.

The colossal entity slammed its immense hands onto the concrete beside them, and for the brief second the death creature existed, it shook the tunnels enough to send vibrations up through Natasha's bones and into her skull. And then it vanished in an instant, leaving the angry woman standing there and glaring at the trio.

“Azamel says I should see the horror in each of us, and respect each other as different forms of beast, as different children of the dark mother.” She scoffed, and came closer again. “Each of you think yourselves dangerous creatures of the night, the moon, of blood and hunger. Pathetic. You Kindred are nothing but blood leeches, and you wolves are animals. Just simple-minded animals.” Again Athalia brought her hands up, and again in the flickering waves of white from Natasha's flashlight, the torso of Death appeared, struggling to fit in the tunnel, great maw open so they could see the endless darkness down its throat. It roared at them, but its voice was a screeching wind and no more.

When the light was off, the only thing Natasha could see, was two white, glowing dots where the horror's eyes were, like small white pupils in the empty eye sockets of a skull.

The horror faded away, and again, only Athalia remained.

This was a Begotten? Fiona had demonstrated a little of her power, and she'd seemed like some sort of spider entity. This Athalia, she felt sort of like Fiona, but sort of different, and her horror certainly looked different. Like something out of a far more modern, more twisted nightmare. Like something out of a horror movie a little kid shouldn't be staying up to see, a movie with slaughter and gore and death cries.

Natasha took a step back, and stared. But Art barked — more like roared — and came forward. Matt did as well. Certainly not fearless, not from what Matt had just told her about spiders, but they came toward her anyway.

“You’re the one starting a fight,” Matt said, “not us. Hell we’re here without our pack, just to see if Tash is right about Fiona. So ... so...” His voice died away as he looked past Athalia into the darkness beyond. Athalia turned around as well, and Art came closer to her. The opening was there, Art could take it any time he wanted, but instead the enormous creature stood near the other two, and stared into the black.

The little Mekhet walked over to join them, and in the dead black and cold silence, she pointed her light into the tunnel. There were more spiderwebs ahead, large ones, and they were moving, shaking a little, like someone was tugging on them. And now that she was listening again, it wasn’t cold silent anymore, there was noise, a distant rumbling sound. And scratching, like someone dragging stone on concrete.

Someone was out there.

“I ... w-what ... should w—”

The ceiling of the tunnel exploded. She had only enough time to point her flashlight up to see the webbing narrow with tension, and the sound of strings tightening like rope, before concrete slabs started to fall in. A lot of them. The rumbling rose to ear shattering, and an earthquake tore through the tunnel as more than just the walls of the tunnel fell apart, but the metal tracks ripped upward as well. For a split moment, the rails bent like a whip, before twisting into permanently bent coils that shredded everything around them, breaking like rope pulled too tight. And the four of them were on the tracks as they snapped.

“Fuck! Get back, get back!” Matt started to back away, arms out and up. Natasha managed a quick glance at him before every panic reflex she had had her turning around and sprinting at full Mekhet speed. Matt was getting bigger than before, taller, thicker. Some of his wolf was coming out of him, making hair grow longer, muscles bigger, everything. One of the giant blocks of rock crashed against his shoulder and tore through muscle, but Matt stayed standing as he turned around to join her.

She didn't get far. The tunnel ahead had webs as well, and the domino reaction of the collapse was tearing through the darkness faster than she could move. One of the tracks ripped up from underneath her, and snapped to the side with a loud crack. She went with it as it caught her, and the blackness engulfed her as she collided with concrete. First the ceiling, then the wall, each got a turn to remind her how hard concrete was compared to skin and bone.

Matt was running for her, so was a giant wolf next to him.

She reached up to touch her head. It was wet, and covered in dust and dirt. Couldn't see it with her flashlight on the tunnel floor and pointed away, but she could feel it. She could feel bone too.

Then the pain hit her. White flash, but not from the flashlight, and she coughed from the overload, searing fire launching through her extremities before settling in her skull. Vaguely aware of the noise around her, blurry movements, massive walls of concrete and metal beams ripping the world apart, the howls of pain from what sounded like wolves, and a dark-skinned woman running past them.

And spider legs.

Movement followed the chaos, and enormous legs stabbing into the shredded floor followed, eight of them, spindly and hairy and long and sectioned into many joints, just like spider legs, just like the legs Fiona displayed.

But this wasn't Fiona. A man, or at least his torso, sat upon the spider body where its head would be, its form mutated and lined with black discoloration to match the hairy, enormous, mutated spider body underneath it. Its face was a mess of ruin, spider eyes mixed in with human eyes, nose vanished, mouth expanded with a pair of fangs, and random patches of his—its hair and beard were gone, leaving bald, scarred flesh where they must have been before. Its arms didn't end in hands, but in giant bones that looked more like scythes or sickles.

It screeched at her, mouth opening and exposing a disgusting mixture of human teeth and spider fangs.

She tried to move, but her legs weren't working. Too hard to see what was happening to them in the black, with the flashlight still pointed away from her and sitting on the concrete before her, but the pain running through her limbs was buried by the pain in her skull. Again she tried to move, hands reaching out for the slabs of concrete sitting around her, still shaking as the giant spider before her yanked and pulled on its trap of web. More of the tunnel around them shattered and ripped open, like someone inside the belly of a snake making its body bleed around them. Damien would probably make a comparison to Jonah and the whale.

Athalia was gone, or at least Natasha couldn't see her; not that she could see much at all. She reached for her flashlight, and screamed out as the movement lit her body on fire. Her arms collapsed with a new weight, immovable, total and final, pinning them to her sides. Nothing on them, nothing holding them down, but she could no longer move them, dare not move them, even as the spider thing came closer to her, its many eyes blinking and hairy legs stepping over the flashlight.

A roar interrupted the rumbling of the tunnel's collapse. Claws and fur from a new source jumped across the light and against the spider titan, crashing weight against weight as a ten-foot giant of muscle landed onto the spider's side. The werewolf was mammoth in size, but the spider monster was taller, and five times longer and thicker with its grotesque monster body, and human, mutated half far larger than any human should be. More than large enough to fight the werewolf.

Another wolf leaped onto the monster, almost as large as the first one. Matthew, and Arturo, in their full werewolf form, towering beasts of strength and primal rage filled with snarls and roars, were both latched onto the creature. They bit into it, clawed and tore at its body, red and black gushed from wounds, and its screeching sounds threatened to rupture her ears. Like lions trying to bring down an elephant.

It raised a bone claw, and slashed one of them along his side. More blood poured, and animal roars followed. But the wounded beast didn't relent, he leaned in and kept his claws sunk into the side of the creature and bit into it. He thrashed his head from side to side, like a wolf tearing meat from a carcass, and the monster spun and twisted on its eight legs as it tried to stop the beast from shredding it.

It raised both claws again, and slashed as it spun. The speed and inertia of its enormous size was undeniable, and the two werewolves were thrown from its body onto the debris around them. They rolled, twisted, and almost flew as their weight crashed into the rubble, sickening crunches of bone and flesh following each impact.

She had to run. Flee, get away. The tunnel was collapsing around them. Buried alive. Buried alive and she was going to wither into a husk and her two friends were going to die.

The spider creature slashed the walls and pulled on more of the webbing, bringing down more of the concrete and metal and god knows what into the black. Art and Matt were already up, bleeding, broken bodies healing faster than Natasha ever could. They threw themselves back at the creature, but found only a crumbling ceiling of rock. What was once a tunnel of rubble became a wall, filled with steel bars and enormous slabs of concrete.

She looked to the right. Her flashlight, still on the ground in front of her, managed to light up the tunnel enough so she could see it, and the wall of rubble. She looked to the left and found the same thing, except with two giant wolves standing before the new barrier. The larger one was clawing at it, tearing at the mess and metal. His claws ripped through concrete one inch at a time, grating it down deeper and deeper until Matt dislodged a chunk. As the block fell to the floor, the tunnel rumbled, and more of the ceiling began to collapse around them.

“Stop! S-Stop before the t-tunnel caves in!”

He didn't stop. He continued to rip and tear, snarls and howling included, and more of the tunnel began to collapse as the beast shredded the barrier. Until Art grabbed his fellow werewolf and threw him to the ground.

“Enough!” Art said, or barked. “Look.” He gestured to the mess around them, barely lit by the flashlight.

Matt forced himself back to his feet, blood trickling over his fur, exposed wounds healing and closing, even as he turned and started back for the wall. “Must kill. Kill. Kill.”

“S-Stop!” Natasha tried to move again, but her body was rooted by pain and weight. Something was holding her down. “Stop please, you'll ... you'll g-get us all killed.”

A long time ago, maybe forty years, Natasha had a mission to kill a draugr, a Kindred who had succumbed to the beast inside. Much as Kindred liked to think of themselves as intelligent, superior to the humans they preyed upon, vampires had a beast inside them as mindless and bloodthirsty as a starving animal. It ate at the mind, the soul, and every Kindred fought against its desires to feast, to hunt and kill, or they'd destroy the Masquerade, and their self in the process. If they lost that battle, they become draugr, a revenant, mind and soul gone, just a body for the beast within.

She found a woman, not much older than her, who'd indulged her beast far too long, forgot she was once human, and bathed in the hunt, the kill. Natasha had to end her; felt like shooting a rabid dog. But she remembered the look in the woman's eyes, the total and utter lack of humanity, the primal, animal hunger and aggression. Chilled her to the bone.

Matt looked at her just like that.

Art grabbed his friend by the snout, and yanked him down to look him in the eye. "Peace! Kuruth devours you. Peace, shartha escape ... for now."

Matt looked ready to rip his friend apart; and he could have, considering their size difference. Art was a big guy and a huge wolf, but his friend was titanic. The tension in the dead air forced Natasha to stare at the two of them, even as searing agony filled her skull. If she coughed, she felt like Matt would snap, and tear Art in two.

But the enormous creature started to breathe deeper, slower, and he let his shoulders drop. Art let go of his snout, and the two beasts stared at each other as the silence settled around them.

They started talking, in a language Natasha didn't know. Kuruth came up again, something she'd heard before, but everything else was new, hard guttural words that fit their mutant wolf mouths far better than English. They nodded a few times, mentioned Azlu a few more, and Fiona once, before they both started to walk around.

Art found her, winced — if it could be called wincing from a giant wolf head — and reached down to pick up her flashlight. His hands struggled to handle the tiny thing, now that they were beast-like, and immense. But, he came closer to her, and knelt down with the flashlight. As he did he started to shrink, his features began to fade away, and not always with a smooth transition either, but sometimes with a disgusting crunch of what must have been bone. It didn't seem to bother the man, and he pointed the flashlight at her as he got smaller and smaller, until his clothes reappeared, and his dark eyes were human once again.

He shined the light along her body to her legs. Both were crushed under a metal beam, one of the tracks. But, there was more trouble than just her ruined legs, as she caught the man's obvious and loud wince and groan when he brought the light up to her head.

“You uh ... appear to be missing a chunk of your skull.”

She sighed, and nodded. “It'll heal ... g-get this ... thing off of me.”

Matt came over, and the two men scooped under the beam to lift it clear of her legs. And the pain came back with a vengeance, a thunderstorm with cracks of lightning that scorched her dried veins. If she were still alive and human, it'd probably have been better to leave the beam there or she'd bleed out, with how it had nearly cut through her shins. But Kindred blood was thick, powerful, and it stayed in her wounds as it began to heal them, reform the bones, bind muscle and skin, reattach tendons.

Or at least it tried, but she could feel her vitae struggle with the wounds. Missing a chunk of her skull, and probably her brain; probably why she couldn't lift her arms correctly, something inside her was damaged. She doubted her spine was intact either.

“S-So, we're ... we're trapped. Underground.”

“Looks that way.” Art stood up and pointed the light around them. Both sides of the tunnel buried, blocked off, and trapping them. “Fuck, with that Azlu fuck spinning its fucking webs on the other side, there's no way I can cross over. No locus around either.”

Matt sat down beside Natasha, and watched her like a doting father might, eyes reeking of pain and sympathy. Not her finest hour, being pitied by these two, but she'd been crushed by metal and concrete. At the moment, she didn't mind a little sympathy.

"Twice now we fucked you up pretty bad," Matt said.

She coughed, and groaned, almost screamed as the cough tugged at her muscles. "You d-didn't, that ... that thing ... that gross, h-h-horrible thing did."

"Unless Fiona is a man, I'm guessing that wasn't her. You could see the body of whoever it was before, yeah? Some poor sap the fucker crawled into, got into their head, literally, and did that to them with time." Matt shuddered and rubbed his arms. He'd said he didn't like spiders, but his behavior when in his werewolf body didn't betray any fear. "Looks like David was right."

Art chuckled. "Stephanie owes him an apology," he said, walking over to the rubble walls and running his hands along the concrete, guided by her light he carried. "We're trapped."

Matt shrugged. "For now. You know Avery's going to come here the moment she realizes we're missing. And they'll clear out the mess."

"M-Maybe." Talking didn't hurt as much anymore. When she looked down, she could see where her shins were starting to look like normal legs again; didn't feel it, but looked it at least. Her fingers were starting to work too. "If ... if the ... t-t-tunnel starts to collapse while they dig ... you might die."

"Heh, us? What about you?" Art said.

"Unless I'm ... crushed into paste ... I'll survive without f-food, or air ... or water." She looked around at the tunnel, the size of the space they had available, and sighed. "Dehydration is ... deadly."

Both wolves looked at each other, and sighed the same way she did. “What a way to go,” they said together.

She coughed again, and sobbed. The pain danced along the edges of her mind when she focused elsewhere, but something always brought it back like a sledgehammer. She set her head back, and sobbed a couple more times. Sick of pain, sick of getting ripped open or torn up or crushed. Sick of seeing her bones poking through her skin, sick of the sensations of muscles and cartilage rebuilding themselves with her vitae. Sick of how hungry she was every time it was done.

Matt reached out and set a hand on her, so softly and gently she barely noticed. “Need some blood?”

“ ... this ... is kind of ... l-like last t-t-time, isn't it?”

“Yeah. Starting to feel pretty guilty at this point.” Much as Matt tried to smile and laugh it away, every time he looked down at her ruined legs, the guilt was written across his face. If the pain hadn't been so bad, she might have wished he didn't feel for her, but there was no denying she was in utter agony. Jessy would say she was fine, if she'd been injured like this. Matt and Art probably would too. “Here.” He held out his wrist for her.

“ ... you ... sure? W-What if ... it comes back...” Not like she could fight it. Him. It. That thing. A fucking giant spider monster, hairy and gross and with giant bone scythe arms and a human, rotted, ruined half.

God, what the hell happened to their city?

“Don't drink me dry and I'll be fine.”

She blinked at his wrist, then at him. Well the man did probably weigh nearly three hundred pounds of muscle, more than thrice her weight; her stomach could only fit so much of that. She nodded up at him, and waited as he brought his huge wrist to her mouth. Too big, his wrist was half the size of her face, and he chuckled as he turned it so she could find a better angle.

She bit down, gently, slowly, and even that was painful for her head. But the pain vanished under the warmth of life flowing through her corpse.

Werewolf blood. Twice now she'd tasted it, and her eyes shot open as the memory mixed with the present, as the heat rushed through her from only the taste, the anticipation, the sweet misery of waiting for it to enter her stomach. And when it did, she purred into his wrist, and suckled. These wolves weren't human, or wolves, they were something else, something delicious that shot life through her dry husk and set her skin tingling. Vitae pumped through her veins like a shot of adrenaline to the heart, forced it start beating with the shock it, her body blushing life even if she didn't want it to. It was too good, so good.

Her hands reached up, and took his wrist. At some point her body had started working again, and the pain of moving her damaged limbs paled in comparison to the pleasure of the Uratha's life filling her. She could almost see sparks through her closed eyes as she drew more of the ambrosia into her body, until her toes began to wiggle, legs no longer shattered. A little more, and the crying ache in her skull faded away into no more than a little whimper. A little more, and her nipples started to harden.

Definitely time to stop. She drew away, and let out a quiet moan of satisfaction; perhaps a little more than just satisfaction. Stop it, stop it you stupid woman, you're trapped underground in a life threatening situation. Now was not the time to get horny.

Though, as she bathed in the glow of drinking Matt's blood, she couldn't help but grin as she remembered the noises he'd made. The big guy had let out a moan or two during the Kiss, deep rumbly sounds that went with his huge frame very well, very erotic and hot and—

Stop it. Focus.

“Th-Thank you.”

“You are welcome,” Matt said, his voice quiet and subdued. She almost couldn’t see him in the black, but the silhouette showed him leaning back so his head touched the concrete behind them. Breathing deep, and a few quivers showing through.

“Feels pretty good doesn’t it?” Art said, chuckling, but still walking around and shining the light at the rubble trapping them.

“D-Didn’t you ... ever ... I d-d-don’t know, make friends with any Kindred in T-Tijuana?”

Matt shook his head. “No. The best we ever managed was a very weak truce, and they were short lived.”

“A shame.” She tried to get up, but pain still ripped through her legs, and she fell back down. “ ... I ... I’ll still need time to heal. B-But thank you! I’ll heal much faster n-n-now.”

“Any time,” Matt said. “ ... really, I mean, any time. That was ... wow, no wonder humans just line up for that.”

She chuckled and pulled her knees up to her chest; at least she could do that without debilitating pain. “The Prince really tries t-to encourage feeding like that. We get t-to feed, our victim lives, often to come b-back to ... b-b-be fed on again.” Julias was a perfect example, with kine lining up for a chance to get Kissed. And fucked.

Art came over to them, and sat on the other side of Tasha. He found a bit of rock and rested the light against it so it pointed up, and provided a little light for everyone.

“Some of the Kindred in Tijuana had a similar setup,” he said. “Though, they were dealing in drugs as much as blood. And they weren’t as nice about it.”

Dolareido really had the Kindred spoiled she realized, the more the two wolves talked about their previous home.

“S-So, that ... that thing. That was an Azlu?”

The two wolves nodded.

“Well fed too,” Art said. “Probably killed a few people.”

Natasha nodded, hugged her legs, and set her chin on her arms. Jack said, of the thirteen disappearances reported in Devil’s Corner that fit the MO, only twelve were her doing. One of them had no claw marks or blood trail, now that she thought back to the report. It’d been directly around the others though, and the disappearance was of a person no one was really sad to see gone. She’d assumed—everyone had assumed it must have been a part of the same group. Stupid of her.

“I ... I wonder where ... it got m-more of its ... kills. Is it smart enough t-t-to ... cover its tracks, and get victims from various p-places?”

“Yeah,” Matt said, “some of them are. Azlu are a fucking nightmare to deal with.” He laughed, and set his hand against her shoulder. Her little shoulder disappeared into his gigantic palm. “But, certainly seems like your Begotten friend is off the hook.”

“She’s not ... I ... I suppose she sort of is my f-friend? She’s super friendly.”

Art leaned forward from his sitting spot beside her, and quirked a brow. “Putting your life on the line for a sort-of friend?”

“I ... I uh...” She sighed, and looked down. Damien, she was doing this for him. What the fuck was the matter with her? She wasn’t attracted to him, or at least, she never really found herself thinking about him that way, cute as he was. But there was something about him that made her want to help him, like maybe she could help change him from the angry assassin he used to be. Like he’d be a different man, if someone gave him some help every once in a while.

You’re such a stereotype, Natasha.

“I g-guess ... I just ... want t-to help people.”

“Too nice for your own good.” Art sighed, and leaned back the same way Matt was. “Anyone got any ideas on what to do while we wait for rescue?” Matt and Natasha both shrugged. “Wonderful.”

“I’d ... I’d worry about oxygen,” she said, “b-but ... dehydration ... will come sooner.”

Matt laughed and shook her by the shoulder a little. “You know, Uratha often think ourselves superior to Kindred. You guys are soft compared to us, turn to ash in the sun, go up like kindling if fire touches you, and there’s only one thing you can eat. But ... here we are, two big bad werewolves who’ll die to fucking lack of water, while you’ll live.”

She chuckled, a sad and heavy sound. “M-Maybe. If someone ... d-d-digs me up in the future, and does it in daylight?” Trembling worked through her body again, and she took a deep, useless breath. “I’d be ash.”

“Aha!”

Matt and Natasha almost jumped as they looked at Art. The man grinned at them, and held up his hand. A pack of cards, faded and worn. Must have kept them in a pocket.

“... whatever you do,” Matt said to her, “don’t play poker with Art.”

“Hey jackass, I can’t hustle her if you tell her I’m good at the start.”

“Man, you’re going to make enemies of everyone if you try that shit again. Remember what happened last time?”

“Hey! Those two jackasses needed to learn a lesson.”

“And the fuck you doing with a pack of cards in your pocket anyway?”

Natasha smiled, relaxed against the wall, and listened to the two boys argue.

Chapter 35

~~Beatrice~~

She slipped on her boots and stepped out of her alcove, her little cave in a cave.

“Going out?” Aaron said.

“Yeah, just to hang with Julias’s childe.”

“Right right, making friends with Invictus.”

She shrugged and gave the man a little push on the shoulder. “The Circle is small. Carthians and Invictus are huge. We’re not at war with them you know, make some friends.”

Aaron shrugged. He was sitting in a chair by the back wall of the cave, the one covered in bones like some sort of painting sculpture. Reading a book too, as per usual.

“Books are better friends.”

“Ha, fuck no man. Hey, I love a good story, and I love some fucking peace and quiet, but there’s something to be said for friendship. And no, I don’t mean a facebook friend you fucking cunt.” Head off that stupid joke before he made it. “A real friend, someone you can talk with all night.” Not that Jack necessarily fit the bill, but maybe.

“You’ve changed quite a bit the past year haven’t you?”

“Yeah, glad I’m did. Try it sometime.” She waved her claws at him, and started out of the cave.

Or at least, that was the plan. But some quiet moans drew her attention. Othello's alcove, with the door hang blanket pulled aside for all to see.

She hadn't heard anything a moment ago, when inside her room. Weird that she'd only hear the sex now. She looked at his little hole in the wall, then to the tiny tunnel leaving their enormous abode, then back to his room. Julias had said it was perfectly ok for her to watch. So, grinning, she walked over to his place, and leaned against the side of the opening.

"Hey Triss," he said.

"Heya."

"H-Hello," the woman said.

"Beatrice, I don't think I've ever introduced you to Madison. Madison, Beatrice."

The two women nodded at each other. Which would have been perfectly normal, except for the fact Madison was currently having sex with Othello.

Othello was lying down, and from the angle and position, Beatrice was basically looking straight down at his head, while the rest of him was pointed away from her. Which meant Madison, facing them, was on full display. She was riding him, her knees to the furs underneath them, and she was leaning back, holding onto Othello's legs with her hands to brace herself while she rode him.

Beautiful. A black woman with very dark skin, and short black hair, super short, maybe an inch at most, and super curly. She was average height, with luscious, thick lips, and a little meat on her bones. Not chubby, but with enough softness to give her body glorious curves, and her heavy breasts flattened to her torso as they drifted off the sides of her ribs with their natural size, and her leaning back angle. She had a gentle looking face too, complete with shy smiles and guilty glances.

No wonder. The girl was riding Othello in a slow, almost dance-like way, and with her leaning back so her body was on display, it was easy to see they were having anal sex — as Othello always did — and her smooth pussy was completely in view. The pink of her insides was just visible between her dark lips, and her trickling juices glistened in such an appealing way.

Beatrice didn't hear them earlier cause they were having the most gentle, sensual sex she'd ever seen Othello have. But judging from the liquids the girl was leaking from her exposed snatch over the vamp's pelvis, they'd been at it for a while. And since the sun had just gone down an hour ago, it meant the girl was here during the day. So she was one of Othello's ghouls. Or his only ghoul? She should ask about that.

“Enjoying yourself?” Triss said.

Madison, making a little shiver of pleasure, looked up from Othello to her. “Me?”

“Yeah you.”

“... I ... I am.” She was rolling her hips back and forth, a position Triss knew all too well. Leaning back like that when facing the man made the cock press up against the front walls, toward the belly. Fucking euphoric feeling, and this Madison girl was milking that pleasure right in front of Triss's eyes.

The Nosferatu looked down at the lazy Daeva. Bastard wasn't doing a thing, not moving his hips or touching her clit or anything. His hands were netted behind his head, so the man could just relax, and let her do all the work.

But judging from the woman's expression, her shivering body, and hard nipples, she was enjoying doing all the work.

Triss kicked Othello in the shoulder anyway though. "Dude, help her out."

The man laughed, but shrugged and reached out to hold onto the woman's hips with one hand, while the other sneaked between her thighs to press his thumb against her swollen clitoris.

Like fireworks. Girl was obviously already close, but she'd been struggling to stay quiet. All bets were off when people were watching, and Othello was massaging her sweet bud. The moans started, and so did the bouncing, angled in just the right way to no doubt push Othello's cock up toward her abdomen, hit the walls of sensitive flesh, get the whole body buzzing and tingling.

She came in seconds. Her new bouncing lasted only moments before it slowed, and she let her head fall back over her shoulders as the moans grew louder, mixed with mewls, and a little squeak every now and then. Her legs squeezed on Othello's sides as he massaged her clitoris, and her body shook as a little trickle of juices leaked from her pussy onto his body.

"Fuck..." Yeap, that was her and Julias right there. Madison didn't have any piercings or tattoos, but other than that the position was one of her favorites, riding, anal, controlling the angle so it hit those spots inside that melted her. "Now ... now sit up dude, get in there, kiss her tits, rub her back, come on." Beatrice blinked at herself. The fuck was she doing, giving sex directions. And why was it so fun?

Othello laughed again, so did Madison, and he sat up to put both hands on the small of her back. With her sitting on him and having anal sex, she had to wrap her legs around his waist and hook her feet behind his butt to keep the angle right, and she leaned back a little as she hooked her arms over his shoulders too. And when Othello craned his head down to start kissing her breasts, Madison sighed bliss, and cradled the back of his head with one hand.

Not a good angle for getting off, but a great angle for building up the pressure, getting more juices flowing, and it just looked really awesome. Her with her legs wrapped around him, leaning back, sitting on his lap, Othello leaning down to suckle on those huge tits and making a display of it. Dude was Daeva, he got off on being passionate; and being passionate with an audience must have stroked his ego in ways even Beatrice couldn't appreciate. But she knew it would, and sure enough, Othello was groaning into his meal's huge breasts as he kissed them, teased them, suckled on them hard enough to pull one away from her body a few inches, and then let it drop with gravity to jiggle lightly.

Madison enjoyed it just as much as Othello. Probably why Othello made her his ghoul, if the girl pressed all his buttons just right. Not that ghouls were always picked for sexual compatibility, but it was definitely a plus, especially to a Daeva. The woman squirmed and wriggled, and peeked over Othello's craning head to look at Beatrice, smile at her, and mouth 'thank you' silently.

Ok Triss, you're supposed to go meet Jack. Stop playing porn director.

... five more minutes.

"K, now, turn around, and Madison you get on your back. Othello on your knees, and hold onto her hips. Madison, put your legs over his shoulders.

Othello didn't even hesitate. Awesome. It'd probably lead to awkward conversations in the future, but for now, it was great how the man listened to her without skipping a beat, without her needing to ask, everyone was just going with the flow. Fun. This was fun. Holy fuck she was having legitimate fun with her fellow Circle members.

They got into position. Madison was on her back on the furs, with her legs hooked on Othello's shoulders. But since Othello was kneeling tall, her ass was a foot off the ground and held up by his hands. It not only highlighted Madison's beautiful body with a great curve to her stomach, and let her large breasts flatten to her chest and ribs in that heavy-and-real way, but it also made her pelvis angle upward, so Othello's cock pushed toward her belly again, hit those spots Triss knew well.

Cause apparently she missed her passion as a porn director.

"K, now ... start fucking her, Othello. Slow at first."

He did so, holding the girl's hips and keeping her ass off the rug, so none of the magic of the angle was lost. And since they'd rotated like she asked, now Madison was closer to Triss, and all the Nosferatu had to do to see all the juicy details, was look down at her.

Madison moaned, openly, loudly, and hugged herself under her breasts as she started to shift back and forth across the rug from Othello's deep strokes of his cock. She smiled up at her, full lips a slightly brighter shade of dark compared to her very dark skin, with a hint of pink from her lipstick. Othello really knew how to pick them; girl was gorgeous.

"You ... don't want to joint us?" Madison said between pants.

"Sorry, got a boyfriend."

"Mister Mire, right. Shame." Madison said. "Cause ... you ... you know ... the..." The girl's mouth opened, and her eyes closed as another long moan came out of her.

Othello didn't need any more direction. He started to fuck her a little harder, a little faster, and Madison started to whimper with each stroke. One of her hands reached down for her clitoris again, and she started to massage the bud, the other hand reaching down lower to find her cunt, and slip some fingers into her. All while Othello fucked her ass.

So much stimulation, the girl didn't last. She managed two more minutes before she came, and both her hands left her pussy to come back to her body, to grip the furs around her as Othello sank his cock into her ass. A small splash of her juices hit the man in his lower abdomen, joined by a rather loud groan from the beautiful ghoul.

"S-Slow down," Madison said. The sound of a girl trying to talk mid orgasm was such a turn on.

"Don't stop Othello," Triss said. Girl was at that perfect spot for a sustained orgasm, whether she realized it or not. And making a girl cum harder when she was asking for a break? Hell, Triss had gone through that just a couple nights ago with Julias. Intense, seeing white spots and the whole body just starts to tremble and shake, toes curl, sparks of pleasure going through the limbs until your cunt's squeezing like a vise. And in Triss's case, squirting like a fountain.

And Madison's too. Maybe not a fountain, but the girl was getting soaked nonetheless, and a tiny splash of her juices hit Othello's abdomen again. Othello continued to pump her through her orgasm, until Madison reached up to press against his stomach. Trying to stop him. Fucking god that was hot.

"W ... wait..." Another mewl, and her shortened breaths were reduced to nothing but pants. She kept pushing against Othello, but her hands were panicky, shaking, and doing nothing to actually stop the man from fucking her. And seeing her struggle to stop him, seeing her press her fingers to his abs, begging for him to cease, as she again leaked juices onto his body?

Good god in heaven Triss needed to get a camera and do this professionally.

Eventually Othello slowed down. A couple of his own tiny groans marked his orgasm, and the two vampires traded smirks as the man held the girl's ass to his body until he was balls deep, pouring his cum inside her. Madison was spent, sweating and panting and hands limp on the furs, a mix of pleasure and exhaustion on her face.

“Not hungry?” Triss said.

“Nah.” Othello reached down, and scooped his ghoul back up into his arms as he sat down on his butt. The girl really was beat, and she set her chin on his shoulder with her arms hanging at her sides. “Maybe tomorrow I'll drink her. Hey, you want I should wait tomorrow night for you? We can do this again, this was fun.”

“Yeah, it was fun.”

“And Madison really gets off when Kissed. Girl cums too easily.”

If she'd been blushing life, she'd be blushing red. Girl got off easily, and so did Triss, from the same sort of stuff apparently. Certainly not a bad thing, and she was happy to hook up with a Kindred with a sex drive as large as Julias's so she could indulge. The thought of a romantic relationship with one of those Kindred that loses their sex drive? Ugh.

“Uh, don't wait up. But if I'm around ... yeah, sure.”

“Great.” Othello's hands were drifting up and down the woman's back, massaging and caressing in that post-orgasm way that was ever so delightful when Julias did it to her. “Didn't think you were into this so much. Kinda thought you were uptight.”

“Uptight? Dude, just cause I don’t bang everyone in sight doesn’t mean I’m a prude. The fuck you think Julias and I are doing—”

Othello put up a hand in surrender, and grinned at her over Madison’s shoulder. “Point taken.” And, as he smiled at Triss, he put both his hands on Madison’s hips, and started to gently shift her up and down. She still had her pelvis pointed toward him, still had his cock buried in her bountiful ass, and as the man’s cum leaked out of her, he started to softly fuck her again.

Triss had to give it to the man, he had the sexual stamina to match his sex drive. Surprising given his age of nearly a century. Supposedly, according to her elders, many Kindred stopped caring about sex so much when they approached that age. Course there were exceptions, like Othello and Julias and especially Antoinette. Made it hard to define Kindred so easily.

Othello gave his ghoul a couple of rather seductive, almost endearing kisses on her ears and neck, before he set the quivering, whimpering woman on her back again, on the furs. Triss expected the man to go hard, to pound her, but Othello continued to surprise her as took Madison’s arm, gently turned her onto her side, and then curled up behind her.

He spooned his ghoul, snug and comfortable in the rugs, and resumed gently fucking, hugging, and massaging. On his side with his head propped up on his palm, elbow to the rug, his other arm hugged around the girl’s side, up her chest to her breasts, where he pinched and teased her swollen nipples. And he did it all while he slowly ground his hips toward her butt, staying inside her as he tenderly fucked her ass.

Poor girl was still recovering, and she melted into the furs. Nothing but a big puddle of bliss and juices by that point, more moans escaping her as Othello leaned down to kiss her ear a few more times.

Ok, enough was enough. Triss managed a tiny, claw-wiggling wave, Othello returned it, and she stepped out of the cave.

Finally, she was outside in the canyon, surrounded by jagged rocks, some dried bushes, and a hell of a climb. Easy for a vampire, but not so easy she could afford not concentrating.

And concentrating was fucking hard. If she'd been blushing life, her jeans would have been soaked. She smirked as she considered the memory, telling Othello what to do, how it had all worked very well on the ghoul. She must have been a ghoul, and must have been in the cave before. But Triss had been trying to avoid looking into Othello's room too much, afraid she'd offend Julias; probably why she never noticed the beautiful woman.

Ok, Julias may have been fine with her watching all the sex happening in the Circle, but directing it may have been a bit much. She'd make it up to him, take them out for the night, find a nice woman they could trap and Kiss and do things to.

But for now, time to see Jack.

---

Her catacombs. Well, not really, not since joining the Circle. She rarely came here anymore, and every time she did, she almost felt guilty, like she'd moved on and left an ex-boyfriend behind. And to make matters worse, this time she brought a guest.

Not Julias though. She'd feel extra extra guilty about violating her old lair if she'd done that. She brought Jack, Julias's childe. The thought made her snort on a chuckle; her step-childe if she married Julias. Marriage was very, very, very rarely something Kindred engaged in, for obvious reasons, and the image of her in a wedding dress — white of course — while Julias waited for her at the end of the isle, pulled more laughter out of her.

“What's so funny?”

“Nothing nothing, just thinking dumb shit. So, metal enough for ya?”

Jack smirked, and shined his light around at the skulls and bones. “Yeah, I have to admit, this is pretty badass. I wouldn’t sleep surrounded by bones or skulls mind you, Kindred or kine.”

“Bah, and you say you like metal.”

“I do! But I don’t moshpit or grow my hair three feet long and helicopter.”

Kid was just a kid. Still, kid had good taste.

“It goes deeper too, come on.” She moved along through the tunnels, where skulls and various arm and leg bones were jammed tight along small alcoves. Nothing as grandiose or insane as the catacombs beneath Paris, but still plenty of bones, plenty of death, plenty of artistic value. There were coffins too, and they matched the darkness like pillows matching the blankets.

“You used to hang out here?”

“Yeah. I did the stint in the abandoned tunnels, just the ones closest to topside, like the other Nosferatu hiding. And the Carthians have areas where Nosferatu can hang without kine stumbling in, seeing our fucked up shit. But I always liked it here more. Antisocial as all fuck.” Once they reached the bottom chamber, she reached out to lightly drag her claws along the skulls, soft enough to avoid scratching the bone. “You know how it can be when you’re young.”

“Yeah. I mean, I don’t have crocodile teeth and snake eyes to deal with, but I went through rough times when I was embraced.”

“Yeah. That news about someone named Pavala seemed odd; Julius told me about it later. Rough shit man, frenzy kill on your first night?” she said. Jack winced with the name, but Beatrice shrugged and flicked at one of her teeth. Kid likely had people treating the topic with careful tongues, like he was fragile or something. She knew better. Being treated with sympathy got old quickly, and insulting soon after.

“Yeah. Snapped back to awareness on a fucking roof with a body and ... had to figure out something. First fucking night as a vampire, no idea what was going on, no idea why blood was everywhere until I saw the fang marks. God that was ... sickening.” Kid squatted down by one of the lower shelves, and reached out to touch some of the skulls. “Suppose that was nothing, compared to waking up with a crocodile mouth, or extra eyes on the face, or looking like a corpse.”

Ah, corpse lady, his boss.

“Yeap. Lot of Nosferatu get pretty suicidal in the first few years. But like your boss has done, you can make the disfigurements a moot point. Who needs sex when you have the Kiss anyway?” She did. She needed sex. But, especially for older Kindred, the Kiss was everything, and provided all the satisfaction and bliss one could ever need.

He raised his hand. “I need sex.”

They both laughed. God damn it, why hadn't she hung out with this kid more before? She liked Julias, and if Julias liked Jack enough to sire him, there was a good chance she'd like him too. Or hate him.

“Get laid much before Antoinette?”

“Nope. She was my first.”

Damn she loved the kid's honesty. Dude said the truth like the idea of lying or twisting it never even dawned on him.

“First time you have sex is as a vampire. Not only as a vampire, but with the Prince of a huge city, with jugs that require custom-ordered bras to fit them. That is a strange bout of luck.”

“Yeah I guess my experience is weird. That said, may have been my first time having sex, but I masturbated like ... ten times a week for near a decade before then.”

Oh god. She fucking lost it, laughed until it filled the whole catacombs, and she had to sit down to keep from falling over. It was how the kid said it, like it was completely normal, like he was just sharing a fact, that had her almost doubled over.

“And you were friends with Julias before, for how long?”

“Several years. He was involved in some of the contracts my firm was negotiating, and I was just an intern at the time. We started talking, and hit it off.”

“Little kid like you talking to a big-n-bad-looking guy like Julias? Were you trying to get in with the mafia?” Cause, no two ways of looking at it, Julias looked like a mobster with his slicked back blond hair and suits.

“A little? Really I was just curious. He looked like a powerful man, and had this air about him, of ... confidence, but also ... dunno. Just seemed like someone that, if I asked him a question, a good one, a smart one, I could expect a real answer from him.”

Ah, the Julias effect. She knew it well. Man was good with his words, and unlike Antoinette, he seemed like someone you could talk to despite his obvious power and confidence. A classic leader of a sort. If only the others knew what he was like behind closed doors, sick of his Kindred life, depressed, attaching to kine to feed off their joy by proxy.

At least until they met each other. She smirked as she thought of the man, her stupid Superman, and what they did for each other, the changes they made for each other.

And of course thinking of him made her think about having her hands pinned to her back while the man fucked her hard from behind. Not really the norm for them, but damn it'd been awesome.

“You don't have any electricity here,” he said.

“Nah. Oh, fuck, good point. Let's go back to your place, I gotta recharge my laptop and phone and shit.”

“Sure sure, invite yourself over.”

She chuckled, got up, and got moving. “I'll try out some of your bands I haven't heard yet, as payment.”

---

A quick trip to the Circle to pick up her shit while Jack went home, and then she met him at his place.

“So,” she said while plugging in her laptop, the two of them in his living room, “what bands you think I haven't heard of? I've been into prog metal since before you were born, twerp.”

“Yeah but you're a girl.”

“... what the fuck, the fuck is that supposed to mean? You little—” She was ready to get up off his couch and teach the little fucker some manners, but Jack smirked at her, the way Julias did when he managed to catch her off guard. Oh, he was kidding. “Not all girls listen to pop and shit you know.” He better have been kidding.

“Yeah I know, sorry. My sister, god damn she listened to nothing but. If there was any more than fives notes to the melody, and god forbid more than four chords, she'd call it too boring and not catchy enough.”

“Sure she’s your sister?”

“Yeah, looks like me and everything.” He shrugged and got some blood from the fridge, and for her too. At least Julias had taught him some manners. The absurdity of her worrying about manners made her smirk as she took the drink. “I could say the same thing about my whole family though. I was the apple that fell far from the tree.”

“I get the impression Kindred often are.” She nodded and took a sip. Cold blood had such a different taste and texture than warm blood, and she doubted she’d ever get used to it like the Invictus did. But it was fun to drink from a glass every once in a while. “I—”

Jack’s phone buzzed, and buzzed again as he took it out of his pocket. “Julias.”

“Better answer it.”

Kid nodded and raised it to his ear. Started drifting around his apartment too; he was one of those types. “Yello ... really? You sure? ... shit, you really think she’ll do that? I mean—fuck, right ... yeah ... I don’t know Julias, something else is going on. Like I told you, she said one of those kills wasn’t hers. I’ll ... fine, I’ll stay out of the way.” With a frown almost comical, kid hung up and put the smartphone back in his pocket.

“Personal news? Or Invictus business?”

Kid let out a long sigh and sat down across from her. No table between them anymore; her fault. “Julias says more people have been reported missing from Devil’s Corner.”

“ ... shit.”

“Yeah, they think it’s Fiona.” Jack frowned, grit his teeth hard enough she could hear it, and slowly shook his head. “No blood or claw marks, but there's no ignoring the amount of disappearances. A few, in a week."

"That isn't good. Fuck that isn't good at all. You think—"

"Julias figures Antoinette's going to call a blood hunt on this girl if it really is all her."

Beatrice winced and leaned back. A blood hunt meant all the Kindred would be duty-bound to kill whoever was targeted. Course that didn't mean they had to do it, but it was a good bet the Prince would harshly punish any who didn't do as the blood hunt demanded. And a blood hunt was not called lightly; Kindred rarely disagreed with one when it happened.

Lucas would have had a blood hunt declared on him, if it'd been possible politically, Garry told her. But when a Prince can point at a single individual, and blatantly declare they are a menace to the Masquerade with evidence to prove it, no one would dare ignore the call.

Which was a problem if the person wasn't actually to blame.

"You don't think it's her making the kills?" she said.

"Do you?"

"I ... definitely not, not from the impression I got from her. Seemed nice, reasonable, intelligent. Seemed like she wanted to make the Prince happy, find a place to live here." Cause Dolareido was awesome. Shitty, and awesome. "Guess Azamel was right. There's something else going on."

"I—" Knock knock. Jack reached up and started tearing out his non-existent hair. "Might as well hang a sign on the door that says No Appointments Necessary." He got up and headed for the door, each step accompanied by Triss's laugh. People were showing up at his place a lot, and no one bothered with the stupid elevator when everyone visiting could bypass it easily.

“Who is it?” she said.

“ ... fuck, it’s Fiona and Damien.”

Well, fuck indeed.

“Hmm, ain’t no blood hunt call yet. Your call.”

Jack sighed, nodded to no one, and opened the door. “Hello.”

“Hi,” Fiona said. “Think we can come in?”

“ ... sure.” Jack stepped back, and motioned for them to step inside.

“I—oh, Triss! Hi.”

The Nosferatu smirked and nodded to the monster. Hard to imagine the girl going on a killing spree, slaughtering kine like they were going out of style.

Damien came in behind her, and miserable thoughts dripped from him like black ink. The brooding sort no doubt, like Julius; after what happened to him, she couldn’t blame him. Cute though, with the weird half-bald head look and shoulder-length dark hair.

“Damien,” she said.

“ ... Beatrice,” he said, some worry in his tone. Understandable, two of them barely ever said a thing to each other. First time she’d seen him was when she spied on him from the vents in Tony’s old fortress. Third time, he was surrounded by ash, including that of his sire.

“Right horrible things are happening,” Fiona said.

“Tell me about it.” Jack leaned against the counter as he watched the two newcomers sit on the couches, Fiona next to Triss. “Avery came by and told me about your run in with the wolves. Glad you two came out alright though.”

“Mostly awright.” Fiona gestured with her chin to Damien. “Poor Damien got cut up a bit.”

“That’s of no consequence,” the Mekhet said. “The problem now is that the Uratha say Fiona is something called Azlu, and they’re hunting her.”

“It’s nae true!” Fiona bounced her legs and pounded her tiny fists against her knees. “I ... I’m nae that. Vrall remembers Azlu, and she’s nae that.”

Jack nodded, and with a few seconds of silence, came over to sit beside Damien. Uncomfortable, to be sure. “ ... there are more disappearances in Devil’s Corner.”

“More?” Damien said.

“Yeah. If things keep going this way, the Prince will call a blood hunt on Fiona.”

“I’m being framed!” Fiona threw her hands up and went sandbag on the couch. Triss struggled to keep from smiling, but the girl was too damn cute.

“You did kill twelve people before,” Beatrice said.

“But nae thirteen! Or any more since the meeting. I’m starving. Vrall is starving. She’s stomping around in the dream right now, and ... I’m so hungry.” She leaned onto Triss and set her cheek against the Nosferatu’s arm. “Wish I could just feed on blood like ye.”

“We talked to Azamel,” Triss said. “She wants to talk to you. Might be able to help you out with the hunger thing.”

“You talked to Azamel?” Damien looked at the two of them like they’d grown extra heads. “Why?”

“Figured she knows what’s going on more than we do.” What, did he think he was alone in helping Fiona? If that was true, he wouldn’t have come here. “Says there are spider things where you like to hunt, girl. Says something’s there taking advantage of the situation.”

“I knew it, I am being framed.” She got up and started to stomp around, face scrunched up like a squirrel. “We need to clear my name! Let’s go to the tunnels.”

Jack put up his hands. “Whoa, Uratha specifically said don’t go there. And if I go there, they will be pissed as fuck.”

Triss nodded. “Kid’s got a point. They come to him to be their ambassador or whatever. He should stay out of this ... How about that Natasha girl, Jack? You know she’s probably working on this issue same as we are.”

“Yeah, probably. Hold on.” He took out his phone again and called her; actual calling instead of texting. Good to see kids these days still knew how to do that. “ ... no answer.”

“Phone off?” Triss said.

“Natasha? Not a chance.” Jack got up, started to pace, and folded his arms across his chest before stroking his chin. Kid probably had no idea how much he looked like Julias right there. A few flurry taps of his fingers and he’d sent the woman a text no doubt. And then another, and another. “Should I contact Jessy?”

She shrugged. “You think Jessy will know where she is?”

“Jessy and her have a buddy system. But ... I ... I don’t think we should contact her.”

“Why not?”

“Cause Jessy is as volatile as these wolves. If there’s confusion about Fiona and this Azlu thing, and if Natasha is in anyway involved, she’ll only make things worse.”

Yeah, that was very possible. Beatrice could still remember the chaos that had started in the tunnels last time with Jessy and Natasha, when they dealt with Damien, Triss hiding in the vents. “Maybe Julias?”

“He’ll be mad we talked to Azamel, and will probably lock me up ... and lock you up too.”

“Ha, true that.” Beatrice smirked as they went through their list of options. Not many, but far more than their two buds had. Well, bud. She didn’t know what to think of Damien, but Fiona seemed to trust him.

God damn it was too easy to trust Fiona. Girl next door with just a hint of party vibe.

“She probably went to investigate the tunnels beneath Devil’s Corner.” Damien sighed and let his head hang as he leaned forward to rest his elbows on his knees. “ ... wasn’t there a table here before?”

Beatrice shook her head. “You’re imagining things. So you think Tash went to investigate in the tunnels?”

The priest boy nodded. “I’ve seen her socializing with two of the Uratha. I’m guessing she saw an opportunity to prevent this matter from escalating. Or at least discover the truth of the matter, as the Prince has no doubt tasked her.”

“Where did you see her hanging out with Uratha?”

“ ... in her apartment.”

The Nosferatu raised a brow and leaned in to look closer at the man. “You were at her apartment?”

“No.”

“Then how do you know?”

Damien squirmed, and she leaned in harder, like putting weight on a rat. The man did have a certain sneakiness to him, an element of guilt hidden behind a calm face. She knew his type, spy types who could look you in the eye and lie, the sort that cracked when you put them under some pressure.

“ ... I’ve been in this city a long time, Triss. I observe everyone, all the time. It’s how I stayed alive, and how I know things.”

Fucking Mekhet.

“Spying on people?” she said.

“We all spy—”

“Until Lucas came back, the amount of spying had been steadily decreasing.” She gnashed her teeth a few times, just enough to make Damien wince and lean back away from her, like she was going to bite him. Tempted. “Way I hear it from Garry and Jacob, back in the day shit in Dolareido was a nightmare when Lucas was around, people spying on each other constantly, killing each other when someone let their guard down. You really are a relic from that age. Let it go.”

That’s what bothered her about him, that’s what got under her skin. The man was still treating everything like back then, like the days Garry used to warn her about, tell her scary stories about. Much as the Invictus and the Carthians still got into fights and tussles with each other, sometimes broke a few bones or burned a house or two, the killing was pretty much a thing of the past. Things were good now in Dolareido, except for this dick bringing it all back.

She liked that she could go visit the Carthians again whenever she wanted, Garry's temperament aside. She liked that she could date Julias despite him being in a different covenant, and they didn't have to deal with any Romeo and Juliet bullshit. She liked that the worse she had to worry about was pissing Jacob off. Course none of that was entirely, perfectly true, but true enough.

“ ... I am trying to—”

Jack put up his hand with a frown and shook his head. “Come on Triss, you don't know all the details about him or his circumstance. Believe me, things are different.”

She frowned but shrugged and looked at Fiona. Girl was smiling at Damien and then her; probably wanted the two of them to be friends. Fat chance, she never got along with Mekhet. “Fine, my bad. So, what're we gonna do?”

“ ... I'm worried about Natasha.” Jack sighed and held out his hands in front of him, palm up, like weighing his thoughts on a scale. “On one hand, we really should just stay out of the tunnels and let the werewolves do their thing; don't want a repeat of the last time Avery came to Dolareido. On the other hand, they might come topside thinking Fiona is this Azlu, and hunt her up here. And Nathasha might be down in the tunnels needing our help. And if we can prove Fiona isn't this Azlu thing the wolves are hunting, then all the better.” With each option listed, the hand on the right went further and further down. “ ... guess we should go to the tunnels. Fuck me we are so going to die.”

“Perhaps today is a good day to die,” Triss said as she got up.

Damien rose as well, and he blinked at her several times. “Oglala Lakota, American settlers history?”

She blinked at him just as many times. “Dude, Star Trek.”

Course, Jack laughed, little asshole. “You watch Star Trek?”

“Fuck no, but I had TV growing up you know. That shit was everywhere.” Guess Damien didn’t have that luxury. Poor guy.

~~Jack~~

If there was one way he was going to die, it’d be with a Scooby-Doo gang, going on a really stupid mission.

He could turn around, go back to Antoinette, slip under the blankets with her and spend the whole night having sex. A smile found him as his mind wandered. He’d be on his back, and Antoinette would be on her side beside him, pressing her breasts into his neck and chin, his mouth, letting him suckle on her beautiful perfect nipples while she stroked his cock. The softness of her bosom against his lips, and her perfect grip teasing the length of his member. Or maybe she’d have the ghouls over? She’d still be lying on her side, letting him kiss and lick her nipples, but instead of her hand, it’d be Ashley on her elbows and knees between his legs, giving him a blowjob in that super enthusiastic way she had. And maybe after a little encouragement, Julee would lean in from his other side, and start kissing on the head of his cock with Ashley. The two would switch between kissing each other, and kissing his glans, all while Antoinette would tease his stomach with her fingernails. And when he eventually came, the two girls would take turns suckling on the tip while the other would kiss and lick his length, and—

“Jack.”

“Wha—yeah?”

Damien frowned at him. Apparently he'd snapped his fingers in Jack's face at least once, given the position and shape of his hand. “Pay attention.”

“Yeah, sorry.” But no, none of that, no super awesome sex with his love and her pets. Instead he'd decided to go on a suicide mission, cause he was dumb like that.

He looked at his companions. The assassin priest who was trying to find a new lease on life. The badass vampire chick with the scary teeth. The young girl with the monster inside her. And him, the little guy. Well, Fiona was smaller than him, but not by much.

The four of them walked along through the tunnel, disguised under Damien's cloak of night, a step up from Beatrice's. It was enough so he felt comfortable whispering, even as the tunnels grew darker.

“You hide down under Ronder Street a lot, Fiona?” he said.

She shrugged and shook her head. “I cut through it sometimes, but I don't hang out there. I have a few places where I can tunnel into my lair, and I aft place webbing in those spots.”

The dream, tunneling into it, entering it like it was somewhere you could walk, somewhere you could set your feet down and touch it. He couldn't imagine it, couldn't—

“Aye, he felt the same way,” she said.

“Eh?”

“It's written on yer face, same way it was Damien when I told him where he was. Had to prove he was in a nightmare.”

He shivered and rubbed his arms. “So not even a dream, but a nightmare! Christ, I can remember the nightmares I had when I was younger, after staying up late to watch a scary movie. Things with hands grabbing you from under the bed.”

She smiled, almost crooned, and stepped in closer to him to touch her shoulder to his, similar as their height was. “Us Eshmaki love to do that.”

“ ... you ... you uh ... actually do that?”

“Me, nae. Well, maybe? I could learn. I’m new to this, and I can tell Vrall isn’t, and there’s a weird back and forth where she hits me with some memories, shows me how to catch flies in my web. Hiding in the dark, waiting for a body to trip along the webs, and then drag them into the darkness?” Her turn to shiver, though from what he could see, she was smiling. “Makes me feel ... whole.”

“That is a very strange thing to say about ... well, all that,” he said. Beatrice looked over her shoulder at him and smirked at him the same way Fiona did. The two of them had a monstrous side they could both probably bond over, though Triss was a menace to society when she was in a bad mood, and Fiona seemed too nice for that. Hell, Fiona seemed too nice for everything she was describing, like this whole nightmare monster horror thing inside her wasn’t real.

It was, he’d seen it, but to call it a nightmare?

“I—whoa.” Triss stopped, and turned on her flashlight. The tunnels ahead had gone black, completely black. But they weren’t near Ronder Street yet. Hell they had a good while to go.

And worse, there were spiderwebs around. Large ones, a few feet tall or wide, splattered along various parts of the concave walls and ceilings.

“I didnae make these!” Fiona jogged over to them and reached out. Just like regular spiderwebs, they stuck to her fingers and wrapped them as she ran her fingers through them; more like purposefully destroyed them. She frowned with each one, stomping her feet as she moved back and forth between walls, swiping off the webs and jumping up to try and reach the spiderwebs above, and failing horribly. “These are ... these are strange.”

“Weird how?” Jack said.

“I dinnae ken, they’re just strange. I can feel a strange ... weird ... I dinnae ken. It’s strange. Sort of reminds me of those werewolves. Feels ... sort of like that.” After she’d accumulated enough webbing on her hands, she rolled it up into a ball and dropped it. How she managed to get it to obey her commands like that and not stick to her anymore, Jack could only guess was because of her spider horror.

Damien looked down at the odd ball of webbing, grimace on his face, sword in his left hand and pistol in his right. “So, unless an army of huge spiders has been down here, there is indeed some sort of spider creature, something the Uratha are hunting.”

“Framed. Totally being framed.” She stomped around, destroyed a few more webs, and a few more, and started moving further ahead as she did. But the webs were becoming more and more numerous, along with bigger and bigger. Girl had no choice but to give up after a while. “Arr, I’m hungry.”

Strange direction for her to brain to go. Strange, and scary. Started giving Jack images of her turning into a giant spider monster right in front of them, ready to devour. But she’d said her horror feasted on punishing abusive people; closest thing they had to that in their group was Triss, and she really wasn’t that sort of person. Fiona had no one to feed on.

“Azamel might be able to help with that,” he said. “Maybe we should go talk to her?”

“Later. Let’s go find this thing. Let’s go kill this thing!” Fiona air boxed a few times, wiping off her lip with her thumb after every two punches. “Then we can aw be friends. I saw some of them werewolf boys, damn they were cute!”

Jack blinked at her, and looked at Damien and Beatrice. They both shrugged.

“Natasha,” Damien said, “has been getting quite friendly with the two I mentioned. Friendlier than I suspect she realizes.”

“Hope she bags one of them.” Fiona chuckled and came back to stand between the group as they walked along. “The tiny lass hooking up with one of those huge beasts? Hot.” She hugged herself and spun around a few times. “Nothing like fitting in the arms of a man so much bigger than ye. Triss knows! Julias is a big guy.”

“You know, I could take offense to this.” Jack frowned, but it was hard to keep frowning with the silly girl twirling around in front of them. Didn’t she realize how dangerous the situation they were in was?

Triss laughed and gave Fiona a shove of the shoulder. “She does have a point though. Julias holding me in bed, and I can fit into the nook of his arm, snug against his chest. Makes a heart melt.”

Fiona squealed and shook her hands like she’d been electrocuted. Damien shushed her, but she frowned at him and shoved him before turning back to Jack. “Well ye got a different thing going! Some girls want to have a man’s arms wrapped around them. Some girls want to pin their man down and spoil him, getting on top for lots of tit action. Sound familiar?”

“ ... aren't you and I the same age? You can't pull this 'I'm so wise' angle with me.”

“Aye, I can. I'm a lass, and we're smarter than wee jimmies.” She giggled as she got in his face, and giggled all the more when he shoved her. “Am I wrong?”

“I'll have you know sometimes I do do the ... what, 'alpha' male thing.” He quoted the word alpha, and combined it with the most painful sneer he could muster for such an idiotic term. “I—wait, why are we talking about this?”

“Cause Fiona has sex on the mind,” Triss said, laughing as she shone the light around. “Maybe these scary life threatening situations really turn her on? Like taking a girl out to see a scary movie, gets the adrenaline going, stimulates. Fine line between fear and arousal.”

“Ha, maybe!” Fiona started walking beside Triss again, so close they were almost touching shoulders, like they were best friends or close sisters or something.

And Triss put out her arm to set it on the small woman's shoulders. So buddy buddy. “Welp, vamps need to blush life in order to get physically stimulated. So be aware of that before you go trying to seduce any Kindred. We can just go nope, and not blush life.”

“Ye telling me if I go to Damien 'ere, priest boy in desperate need of a sex life, and—” Fiona reached out for his hand, grabbed it while Damien raised a brow, and pressed it against her leather jacket, against her breast. “Ye telling me I cannae get him hard?”

Jack facepalmed. This girl was his age? Simultaneously much more immature than him, and yet sexually confident. Definitely his sister.

Damien rolled his eyes and pulled his hand away. “Kindred are, ultimately, walking corpses.”

“Lot of sexual attraction and activity going around for a bunch of corpses,” she said.

Yeah, that was true. Triss nodded too, no doubt thinking what Jack was already thinking. Old Kindred were boring, but young Kindred were sex obsessed. How Antoinette had remained such a lover of the physical for so long, he could only guess.

“You know we’re in a dangerous situation,” Jack said. “Think you can take this seriously for a minute Fiona?”

“Fine.” Frowning until her nose scrunched up, she started walking again, and the four of them fell into a tiny formation with only a few feet between each of them.

Maybe that’s who he was in this Scooby-Doo gang: the voice of reason. Or he was just being Ventrue about it and thinking too highly of himself.

A few more minutes of walking and silence, and the four of them came to a stop. Up ahead, in the darkness, someone was sitting against the concrete wall, someone bleeding. The smell of blood had no where to go in the tunnel, and it spiced the air enough for all three vampires to smell it. Triss took a large sniff, and the two men did in follow, as they approached the woman sitting.

“... Athalia.” Jack ran over to her, and shined the light up and down her body. Woman was alive, awake, and frowning at him as she struggled to breathe deep. Her right shoulder was hanging out of its socket, but her flesh seemed intact; at least until he looked at her opposite leg. Blood.

“Fuck. Better you than the creature I guess.” She shrugged her good shoulder and coughed. “God ... fucking damn it. You, Fiona right? Get over here.”

Fiona squeaked, and jumped over to join her fellow Begotten.
“Who are you?”

“Athalia. Look, just pop my shoulder in and carry me out of here. We got to get back to Azamel before that thing finds a way over here.”

Jack and Triss looked at each other with raised brow, but Damien walked over to Athalia, put one hand against her collar, other hand around the wrist of her bad shoulder, and yanked forward. Not a pleasant sound, and neither was the grunt.

“... thanks.” She frowned at him, and looked back to Fiona, as if Damien hadn’t just popped her arm back into its socket. Woman really didn’t like Kindred.

“What happened?” Damien said.

“Ran into that fucking spider monster everyone seems so fucking obsessed with. Natasha and a couple of her wolf friends were down here looking for it when I ran into them. Fucking creature surprised us.”

Strange to hear a Begotten use the word monster like that, made Jack smirk. Smirk quickly vanished as he processed the words.

“W-Wait,” he said. “Natasha and the two Uratha. What happened?”

“I just fucking told you. Fiona, help me up, leg is broken. Been down here for what, twenty-four hours, and I can’t get back to my lair from here.”

“Oh, ye have a lair? Can I see it? I—”

Jack stepped between the two Begotten, and frowned down at the woman. “Details. What happened? Where are they? Why are you injured? Explain.”

“Like I—” Athalia went silent as she looked up, and found four people looking down at her, frowning. Even Fiona, comical as it was. “ ... fine. The creature had set up a trap; probably to catch some lone werewolves and kill them. Guess it worked. Couple miles down the tunnel from here, the webbing got crazy big and thick, and me, the vamp, and two dogs were talking when the spider thing pulled the trap. Made the tunnel collapse. Barely got out of there, but I can’t get any further with this leg.”

“The tunnel ... collapsed on her?” Damien said.

“I don’t know. When thousands of pounds of concrete are falling on your head, you bolt. Not like I was going to stay behind for them.” The woman shrugged her good shoulder and shook her head. “You going to help me or not?”

Damien got down on a knee and examined the woman’s leg. He lifted it a little, and Athalia’s groans of pain confirmed. “Broken.”

“Like I said.”

It’d take a young Kindred some time to heal a broken leg; big bones took time. Older Kindred could do it quickly, but Jack certainly couldn’t, not without someone pouring gallons of fresh blood down his throat. How fast would a Begotten heal?

“ ... Damien, can you set the leg?” he said. Man seemed knowledgeable of injuries, at least enough to know what to do for a dislocated arm.

“Her break is severe but simple. I can enough so that she’ll heal ... assuming Begotten heal better than kine.”

“Do it.”

Athalia glared daggers into the Mekhet, but they closed as a scream tore through her when Damien yanked on her leg. Jack would have to ask him where he learned to do stuff like that sometime.

“Fiona,” Jack said, “can you make her a bandage of some sort? With your webbing?”

“Aye, that I can.” She got down on her knees next to Athalia, and with her palms, started covering her leg in webbing. It just came out of her, out of some invisible hint of her horror showing through, something in her hands they couldn’t see.

“Creating ... webbing ... like this?” Athalia said, and she stared as Fiona wrapped her leg up where her femur had been broken. Pain blatant on her face, but it didn’t stop her from staring at the girl’s work. “That’s not normal.”

“It’s nae?”

“No. You’re summoning the horror’s physical form in a very subtle, controlled way, with a persistent effect. That takes ... that takes skill.”

“Cannae take the credit then. Vrall showed me how to do this.”

“Vrall?”

“My horror.” Fiona nodded and continued wrapping away, until the top half of Athalia’s leg looked like it was legit wearing a real cast. “She’s ... arr, she’s hungry.”

“Then let’s go talk to Azamel, and we can show you how to feed without attracting so much attention. Before more shit like this happens, or before some fucking hunters or heroes show up.”

Every word this Athalia spoke was angry. Venom dripped from her tongue and teeth. Every time she looked at him, he thought she was going to bite and kill him. Jack eyed her closely as she struggled to stand until Fiona helped her, half convinced the woman was going to attack them with how she glared.

He understood the risk of hunters. But heroes? What?

“I cannae leave yet! I have to find this thing. And ... and ye said it killed Natasha?”

“Didn’t say that. That’s probably what happened though.”

Fiona frowned at her fellow Begotten, and started walking down the tunnel toward their supposed cave in. “Come on then, let’s go find Tasha.”

Everyone smirked. It was too damn easy to like her.

Athalia stared at them, somehow summoning even more malice into her gaze. What kind of monster was she, what sort of abilities, what crazy horror could she summon? Summon was the wrong word, more like, embodied, or simply was. Not so easy to like her.

The woman sighed and started limping along back the way they’d come, hand out to the wall and hopping a foot at a time on her good leg. No doubt it’d be a really rough walk out of the tunnel, especially considering she’d been down here a day. Jack felt a little sad about leaving her to tend to herself, but only a little. Woman was mean.

The gang didn’t have to go far to run into the larger webs. In fact, far as Jack could see, they shouldn’t have run into webs so soon, but within fifteen minutes they found the larger webs, strings thick as a finger, some as thick as a wrist, and a lot of them. No one had to say anything, and when Jack looked at the others, the two other Kindred looked around, at each other, then him with knowing. Would they get crushed in a trap too?

Fiona stomped her foot, and glared at the webs. She pointed her hands up, and unleashed the monster. Just like before, for a flash moment, long, enormous spider legs that looked almost like swords shot out from the air around her, attached to a blur of mass. The three vampires jumped away as the little monster started to dismantle the webbing around them, each stab of her spider legs severing webbing from the walls, cutting it with the grace of a scalpel.

“I’m nae stupid,” she said. “Nae gonna let the same thing happen to us. And this is personal. This thing used me to hide its tracts, it framed me!”

“Azamel did say they were sneaky.” Triss nodded and came in a little closer. Dangerous getting near the woman as she walked, each step met with a stab outward from one of the huge, phantom limbs. But Fiona kept them from hitting her easily; hell, her precision with them was awe inspiring. And as everyone grew a little more comfortable with Fiona’s plan, they all started walking along while the spider monster undid the work of the other spider monster.

When did his life become about monsters? He kind of preferred it when it was politics and money and territory. Now he was underground in a tunnel with a monster that seemed only interested in death, and also with a monster that was intent on clearing her name. Next, there’d be gigantic wolf monsters causing chaos and making a bad thing worse.

You did not just jinx it, Jack.

Beatrice and Jack kept their flashlights out, though as they got deeper into the tunnel, Jack also withdrew his pistol. A machine pistol, since the Invictus had updated the threat level of the city with the arrival of the Uratha. He’d never fired it before outside of a few training sessions, but he was confident; Kindred strength made dealing with recoil manageable. Damien had his sword in one hand, pistol in the other, same make. Triss seemed comfortable with her bare hands, but she was a Nosferatu, and their insane strength justified it.

Fiona was the unknown quantity. How would she fight? What could she do? She had the weird spider limbs that stabbed like swords, and the ability to create spiderwebs, but was that it? Did she have other abilities? What happened if she took a bullet in the brain; Kindred would survive that, but would she? Learning on the field was not the Ventrue's preferred method.

"These webs are ... strong." Fiona stomped her feet a few times, frustrated, and cut some of the larger webs they came across with a little more impact, a little less subtlety. "I wonder if I can kick its ass, spider to spider."

"If this thing is as dangerous as Athalia says, as the Uratha think," Damien said, "we should focus on finding Natasha and getting out of here."

Triss laughed and shook her head. "Yeah but do you think it'll go like that? I mean, that's what I'd prefer too, hopefully prove Fiona's innocence in the process, but we're walking into this thing's world, its tunnels now. I'm guessing it's going on the defensive, and it's apparently smart enough to lay traps. Like a fucking spider." She laughed some more, then shivered as she tapped a claw against her crocodile teeth. "Keep cutting those webs though, and..."

Everyone went silent as they came upon a hanging cocoon. No denying what it was, given the shape and size: a person. Fiona sighed and cut the thread hanging it, and knelt down over the body.

"It even feeds sort of like I do." Her spider limbs struck out to split open the cocoon, and everyone groaned as the body inside showed itself. A corpse, with a withered face, dry of fluids.

"Looks like a mummy," Triss said.

“The mummification process does include using salt to dry the ins and outs of the dead.” Damien knelt down beside Fiona, and leaned over the face of the corpse. “But, this one is ... still quite wet on the skin, and the skin doesn’t show any serious discoloration. This corpse is fresh, maybe a few hours old.”

Jack took a step back, and pointed his light around along with his pistol. “I ... I guess it got cocky after dealing with Natasha and her two friends. Decided to start feeding. Julias sent me a message saying there were more disappearances. This must be why.” He left out asking why they thought it was a good idea to come down here. Complaining was only soothing for so long.

“Let’s keep going. But let’s be quiet from here on out.” Damien took a long, unneeded breath, and started marching once again. With the cloak of night to protect them, they were safe ... probably. The man was good, very good at hiding, and Jack was confident the Mekhet could keep them hidden.

But then, Natasha was his equal in that regard he figured. And she’d been discovered. She would have used a flashlight at this point, like them, and the cloak of night wasn’t going to cover a beam of light. But if this monster was just a mindless monster, it wouldn’t have launched a trap against some light with no source. Maybe it could see through the cloak?

Jack ran the possibilities through his head, analyzed them, even as the group walked through the webbing into the awaiting death tunnel. He had to plan this out, know what to do when shit hit the fan as it inevitably would.

But no plan was coming to mind, just regrets. Should have got Jessy, should have got someone. They were walking into black, just pure shadow, with dozens of feet of rock over their heads that was apparently collapsible by spider trap. One wrong step and they were going to be crushed, or trapped and left to wither over centuries.

A quiet rumbling sound started to fill the tunnel, like a distant train; no way a train was still running down here though. And in the endless dark, it almost seemed like the tunnel was breathing, the small rumbling sound the voice of the dying underpass, insides invaded by some arachnid. The webbing was thicker, and it crossed their paths with vines strong enough to strangle. Another body too, a smaller one, a decoration hung to adorn the spider's new home. And the deeper they went, the more the tunnel grumbled its discontent, until the grumbling sounded like rolling rocks.

The tearing sound of rubble crumbling and smacking into metal and concrete forced their little gang to creep along as best they could without touching anymore of the webbing. If it was ahead, they had no choice but to keep going; no branches in the tunnel yet, just a single path into the awaiting maw of darkness. He really, really didn't want to. Fuck he didn't want to. More sounds, growls and snarls, and rocks falling and cracking. A lot of rocks, being moved by a lot of hands. Spider legs? They couldn't see anything yet, and as they crept along they had to point their lights down at their feet to do their best at remaining invisible.

But when they rounded a sharp turn, it all fell apart.

Eleven men and women stood before a giant pile of rubble. The wall of debris, broken rock and metal and concrete reached all the way to the ceiling of the tunnel. No getting around it, over it, nothing. The eleven people were huge, utterly huge, seven feet tall on average, with muscles bulging through their shirts, and an unusual amount of hair coming off of them, their necks and arms.

They had a couple LED lanterns sitting around along the edges of the tunnel, and had cleared the area of the spiderwebs with all grace and care of raging animals.

He recognized some of them. Clara, Avery, Stephanie, David and his twitching. They were all bigger, like they'd gone halfway to werewolf mode.

They all turned around, and looked at the gang.

“ ... you have got to be shitting me. Get the fuck out here whoever you are.” Avery took a few steps toward them, and Clara followed after her. The others snarled a few times, but got back to digging. “Turn off that cloak of night shit before I make you.”

Damien looked at Jack. Not sure why he was looking to him, but Jack sighed and nodded. They couldn't sneak up on a werewolf, not one as strong as Avery anyway.

The four of them stepped out around the curve of the tunnel as Damien turned off the cloak, leaving them exposed. Fiona stood beside Beatrice, and glowered at the glaring Uratha, like she'd been personally slighted.

“ ... I suppose this is the Azlu,” Avery said, eyeing Fiona with the same sort of expression Fiona was giving her.

Fiona, tiny before the grown Uratha — unusually tiny considering all the werewolves looked to have grown a foot in height — stood her ground, and marched up to Avery. Right up to her, glared at her, and frowned a frown so adorable it was enough to make Avery smile. Too damn easy to like her, even for the werewolf pack's alpha.

“And if I am?”

“I know you're not.” Avery shrugged, and motioned around them. “Sorry about the rest of my pack, none of them have ever been near an Azlu before; other hosts sure, but not Azlu. They don't know how it feels, or the scents to smell for. Plus,” Avery gestured to the tunnel the gang had passed through, “by the point they're harvesting kills, Azlu no longer look human.”

“So...” Jack walked up to stand beside his friend, and tilted his head to the side to look up at Avery. “So you made a mistake?”

“Yeah, we did.” Avery nodded, and gestured to her fellow wolves. “Not that it would have mattered if you and your friends would have listened and stayed out of the way.”

Jack looked back at Damien and Beatrice, and they frowned with the same thoughts. The wolves were ok with killing an innocent when on their warpath.

Not good enough.

“And?” Jack said. “What, you would have killed Fiona, chalked it up to an accident when you realized she wasn’t your prey, and continued your hunt?”

Avery nodded, even as Clara beside her grimaced.

“Exactly. The hosts need to die, Kindred. I don’t expect you to understand, just like I didn’t expect that Begotten back there to understand.” Avery gestured back to the tunnel, talking about Athalia. “If that means some people get caught in the middle, that’s a risk I’m willing to take.”

What a bitch.

“You can’t seriously—”

“Look, Jack,” Clara said, “you should get out of here. We’re trying to find our two missing, we know they’re down here. But we can smell the Azlu, and it’s going to rip you guys to bits. Leave and get somewhere safe. We won’t hunt Fiona.”

Jack sighed as he looked Clara in the eye. At least they knew now that the wolves weren’t going to hunt Fiona anymore. Fuck, if they’d just let Avery see her earlier, the whole situation could have been avoided.

“But Natasha’s down here too,” he said. Maybe he shouldn’t have said it, with the hard glares the wolves gave him. They were pushing their luck, not listening, arguing.

Avery shrugged with all the compassion of a brick. “Yeah well, if —”

Everyone went silent as they turned to look back the way the gang had come from.

Athalia came running, or stumbling very quickly, each step carving agony into her face with a knife, but not enough to stop her from driving forward toward them. “It’s coming!”

And that was it. That was all anyone needed to hear to react. All the hate and rage and building aggression snapped like a guitar string tuned too tight, complete with the crack that cut skin.

The three vampires and the two monsters stepped aside as all eleven werewolves marched toward the tunnel, from where Athalia had been running. And as they marched, the beasts in them emerged. Jack’s jaw dropped and his body froze as the already unusually enlarged Uratha enlarged once again, getting taller, thicker, muscles threatening to burst through their attire; instead, fur overtook their clothes, and it vanished into their bodies. But no amount of fur could hide the almost grotesque size of their muscles, their power, their weight.

The pack of werewolves stepped forward, standing upright despite their titanic size. With their mutant wolf heads, Jack couldn’t help but picture the werewolves moving on all fours, but they walked upright, and their hands and feet weren’t paws, but monstrous appendages with claws, claws that scraped and scratched the metal and concrete underneath them through sheer weight and sharpness.

Holy fuck.

Fiona and Damien grimaced as they stared at the passing titans; they'd seen them before, but Jack hadn't, and neither had Beatrice. Jack's mouth was still open, and when he looked her way, hers was too, exposing all her extra teeth and wide snake eyes. No wonder people were afraid of these things, they were just like the beasts of legend, the giant wolf monsters that devoured and destroyed, unstoppable juggernauts. Mindless animals.

One of them wasn't transformed though. Still in his unusually enlarged human body, but at least still human looking. He came over to them, several huge duffel bags hanging from his also huge shoulders.

"... I remember you," Jack said. Saw him with the rest of the pack when he first met Avery.

"Surprised. Name's Mason." The big guy smirked, and set the bags down. After unzipping them, he started setting aside the contents. Bottles with rags in their tops, and some sort of large gun ... with a canister attached to its underside.

The three Kindred stepped away.

"Molotovs?" Beatrice said. "And ... a fucking flamethrower."

"Told you Kindred to stay out of this. Don't blame us if you get set on fire." The man shrugged, and pulled out a lighter. "But you're here now, stuck. Stay back here. Maybe try tearing down this wall while we're busy? Who knows, your friend might still be alive if she was down here with Art and Matt."

The gang was literally stuck between a rock and a hard place.

Athalia reached them at last, though the werewolves each gave her long, hard glares as she limped by, and more than a few snarls and half-roar half-barks. But eventually she got to her fellow Begotten, and she collapsed against the wall again, enough hate painted on her face to kill anyone stupid enough to touch her. Jack was half tempted to ask why she was so angry all the time. Not the time, definitely not the time.

Caught himself before putting his foot in his mouth. What do ya know, growth.

“Ye saw it?” Fiona said, getting down on a knee beside Athalia.

“Yeah, giant spider monster, just like these bastard dogs said.” She spat on the ground and cradled her bad shoulder with her good hand. “Must have been down here for months, hiding.”

“So ... what do we do?”

“We get out of here and back to Azamel when we can, before these idiot beasts get us all killed.”

Mason didn't like that. He turned to look at the sitting woman, and offered her a scowl. “You really have a stick up your ass, you know that? Just shut up, sit down, and wait.” Another snarl later, Mason walked off to join his fellow wolves.

Leaving the five of them sitting there, in front of a giant wall of rubble, while eleven werewolves disappeared around the tunnel turns.

“I ... guess we get digging?” Jack said.

Triss, laughing and shrugging, approached the wall of debris and started sliding down rocks. Damien and Jack watched on while Fiona chatted with Athalia about being Begotten, until the Nosferatu stopped and looked at them.

“ ... what the fuck, why am I the only one working?”

Jack put up a hand. “I’m a Ventrue, I’m a talker, not a doer.”

Damien put up a hand. “I’m a Mekhet, delicate hands.”

Didn’t expect Damien to make a joke, and Jack found himself laughing despite the scenario, despite everything. Even Triss laughed, and laughed as she walked closer, and put her hands on their shoulders. Then she squeezed, and everyone stopped laughing as she threw the two of them at the rubble.

“Fine!” Groaning and whining, Jack gave Athalia his spare flashlight, put his gun away, and got digging. Ventrue were hard to kill, sturdy, good at using the power of the blood to become almost invincible. They weren’t good at lifting heavy objects.

For just a moment, he forgot there was a giant spider monster behind them, and a bunch of werewolves between it and them. But then the sounds started. Shrieking. One time he looked up a video of what it sounds like when a fox cries; a bone-shrilling sound. It was sort of like that, louder, heavier, enough that it almost shook the walls with the curdling screams.

Everyone got digging except Athalia. The only one with the strength to make any real progress was Triss, and she lifted rocks easily a hundred pounds and rolled them away. Tossed a few of the bigger rocks when she managed to get her claws on them, hard enough so they cracked or broke on contact. More than once or twice, Fiona stopped to watch Triss pick up things that were as likely as heavy as Fiona herself, nearly as heavy as Jack, only for Triss to chuck them away ten or twenty feet.

“What?” Beatrice said. “Your Vrall horror thing can’t lift heavier? Seemed like it could.”

“Maybe, but ... picking up rocks like that is ... nae exactly how she—how I’d do it. She’d use webbing, from above, likely.”

“Yeah?”

“Mhmm. She’s done things like in her jungle lair.”

“Jungle lair?”

“Aye! There’s this jungle with two moons. It’s dark there, the canopy is thick, and there are many dead there, from well before I became Vrall.”

“Two moons?”

Jack raised a brow, and looked Triss up and down. She kept asking Fiona questions, and Fiona kept answering them, talking about her dream world, her scary lair, how she met Damien there as Vrallar’trakla of the Eight Blade Arach, whatever that was. She went on about feeding, biting to eat but needing to punish abusive people to get sustenance from it, about how she used to have dreams about being devoured by darkness, by things in the shadows with webs and fangs. Went on about what it was like being devoured in her own nightmare, accepting it, and waking up as this horror, this nightmare incarnate. Her true self.

With every sentence, Triss nodded along, asked a few more questions, and tossed a few more rocks. Seemed to be how she liked to work, talking like this. Jack could never do that. Jack wanted silence, or music, but Triss seemed to enjoy the conversation. Which of course meant Fiona was excited to talk; just like Mary would have been.

He smiled. Triss probably would have liked Mary, which was a very very weird thing to imagine. But there it was in front of him, the badass and once quite the surly woman, chatting — mostly listening — to Fiona talk, and enjoying it.

Jack looked Athalia’s way. She had a brow raised as she listened. Probably because they were talking like nothing was wrong despite death coming down the tunnel.

“Your horror,” Athalia said, “came with a name?”

Or maybe not.

“Aye. I guess that’s nae normal for Begotten is it?” Fiona stopped putting down rocks long enough to wipe some sweat from her brow and smile at the woman with the web-wrapped leg. “I—”

Another howl ripped through the tunnel, and everyone looked back toward the darkness. Mason had brought his two lanterns with him, but the light wasn’t rounding the bend of the tunnel where the wolves went. The Uratha were still out there then, a ways off, doing whatever it was they were doing. Every so often another roar filled the tunnel, distant but loud nonetheless, and Jack shivered as the strange animal sound filled his core.

Maybe that’s what Triss was doing, just keeping Fiona’s mind off of the terror behind them. Keeping all their minds off the madness happening behind them. Sounded like the sort of thing a Carthian would do; Invictus would just say ‘shut up and do it.’

“Careful,” Damien said as he climbed a few feet of the sloping hill of rubble. “The ceiling of this tunnel is a mess. More than the concrete caved in, but much of the earth as well.”

“Think Natasha survived?” Jack said. Dumb question. Foot in mouth again, damn it.

Damien sighed, and made a tiny wince as he started pulling down some of the smaller rocks from the top. “I have no idea. I hope so.”

“... you do seem to care about her.” He climbed up to join Damien closer to the top of the rubble, just a few extra feet off the ground, so they could start moving more of the higher rubble down to the bottom.

“Is that strange?”

“Yeah, it kind of is, considering what happened.”

Damien stopped digging long enough to glare at him. “You still doubt me?”

“No, no, you’ve proved you’re not the man I thought you were.” Jack shrugged and pulled down a rock, a big one, one Damien had to help him with. Perfectly timed to be nicely symbiotic; on purpose of course. “Just, you two seem to have this weird relationship. The way you glance at each other every so often, makes me think you’re old friends who had a falling out, you know? Sort of trying to ignore how much you hurt each other in the past.”

“You ... may have a point, Jack.” Another wince from the assassin before he grabbed another rock. “I owe her an apology, but I can’t seem—”

“Oh for the love of god!” Athalia threw up her good arm, eyebrows furrowed and dripping of more of that hate she seemed to carry around in infinite supply. “You understand the precarious situation we’re in? Stop gossiping, stop chatting, stop acting like a bunch of children, and do something!”

The four of them stopped digging, and stared at the woman. But, after a while, Triss started laughing, then Fiona, and everyone started digging again. Jack had half expected Beatrice to throw a rock at her, but the Nosferatu was smiling bigger than any of them; mostly because she had a crocodile mouth that could fit an unusually large smile.

“Let me have a go at something. Everybody get back.” Fiona put up her hands and motioned for the gang to step away. Once the three Kindred were behind, the little redhead motioned them even further back, until they were maybe fifteen feet away and spread out toward the walls.

Then the legs came out. Fiona pointed her hands at the rock wall, and eight of her enormous spider legs shot out from the air behind her. More than just her legs. Lit by their flashlights, the horror inside the little girl showed itself as it ... she stood behind and over Fiona, her immense legs striking out against the rock while she hovered. Jack could see where the legs connected this time, the body they were connected to, and his jaw dropped as he stared at the spider goddess Vrallar'trakla.

Goddess was the better word, now that he could see it. Her. She was wearing a dress of what looked like spider silk, dangling loose like a sash that hugged her curvy figure. Her very curvy figure, with a waist inhumanly tiny, but arms and legs of normal proportion. No feet, instead her legs came to sharp points an extra foot below where her feet should have been. No eyes, but giant horns that pulled back to join more horns that curved back from her skull. Her fingers and thumbs were three giant claws, and her skin was the color of dark steel.

The Begotten's horror's legs each stabbed at the wall, but also the ceiling above it, and stabbed, and stabbed, each leg sinking into rock and rubble. When they pulled away and stabbed again, webbing was left behind. Two webs began to form, one attaching a multitude of rocks together at the rubble while simultaneously pulling it down every so often, the other web covering the ceiling like a net. With speed and accuracy, Vrall reinforced the rock above them, web growing out and attaching to strong points along the ceiling to keep in the looser points, while she also pulled down the wall of rubble blocking their path.

“In her lair, she isn't separate from the horror's body,” Damien said, stepping over a couple times to stand beside Jack. “Truly terrifying.”

Truly terrifying indeed, but oddly attractive. Something about the way her human-like body held the silk dress, the way her tiny, ridiculously tiny waist accented the hips and other curves. Jack always was kind of into monster girls — too much internet — and he couldn't help but stare at the lovely monster before him. He'd half expected her to have the big abdomen of a spider, but she didn't, her human half was more like some sort of ancient demon woman, who happened to have eight gigantic spider legs jutting out of her back.

This was the thing he felt from Fiona whenever he was near her, this ancient, deadly goddess creature. Didn't seem like Fiona at all, like it matched her at all, and yet there it was.

With a hard tug Vrall yanked down a bunch of the wall, and everyone jumped back as the shattering concrete spread out around the tunnel. Athalia sighed and shook her head.

“You'll bring the whole wall down on us,” she said. “Be careful.”

Fiona nodded and resumed, more webbing, more layers, more nets above to try and reinforce what was probably a lost cause. But something was better than nothing, and if Vrall's webs could keep the tunnel from falling down on their heads, Jack was all the happier to let her do the work.

More roars filled the tunnel behind them, closer this time. He could hear the shattering of a bottle, and an ear-piercing shriek to follow. Molotovs. What would happen if one of those things hit an Uratha? For a Kindred it'd be instant death. Maybe an elder Gangrel or Ventrue could summon the defensive reflex of vitae to deal with it, but even in that circumstance, being lit on fire was usually guaranteed death. For him, or Triss or Damien? No chance, they'd be ash.

More roars came closer. Jack looked behind him, along with Damien, and the two stared at the curve in the tunnel where the werewolves had disappeared, where Athalia had said the monster was. They could hear it now, not just its shrieks, but the stab of its feet against the ground, each making a weird scraping sound like nails scratching concrete or metal.

“Um ... I think they’re coming this way,” he said.

Damien nodded “Plan?”

Jack sighed, gulped, and took a deep breath. He’d never get over that reflex, none of them would apparently. With a sigh, he drew his large knife and pistol. Damien did the same, sword and pistol, and the two of them waited for the oncoming chaos.

“Um ... can ye hear something?” Fiona said, still working at the wall.

“Can hear a lot of things right now.” Triss walked over to stand by the boys, off to the side though with her back to the tunnel against the inside of the turn. Maybe she’d try and leap out to attack whatever this thing was that was fighting off eleven titans and fire. Yeah, right.

“I mean, I think ... I think there’s something digging from the other side! Maybe it’s Natasha, or her two friends?” Fiona dug faster, more webbing coming out and yanking down the rubble wall as the spider goddess stabbed into the rock faster and faster.

Jack stepped back to get closer to Fiona, and peered at the rubble as Fiona peeled off the layers. “ ... yeah I can hear it too.” Scraping, claws maybe? Someone was on the other side for sure at least, someone strong enough to move rocks. Natasha did come down here with two werewolves, and Natasha was a Kindred herself; even Mekhet were far stronger than any normal human, strong enough to move some rocks. It could be her.

More rocks fell away, and more, until a small opening was created at the top. Fiona focused on that area, a host of webbing netting together against the rock and dragging it down together like a fishing net. And as the roars and tearing sounds from behind grew closer, she worked faster, getting clumsy and yanking down a lot of rocks at once.

“Ok, that’s enough.” Damien climbed up the rubble and stood before the dip in the pile where there was room enough for him to go through it, just below the ceiling. He didn’t though, thank god; man wasn’t a total idiot. He did peer through the darkness though, and tapped on the rocks a few times with his sword. “Hello? Natasha?”

No answer.

Damien held out his hand, Triss gave Jack her spare flashlight, and Jack climbed up to join the man before giving it to him. Still no answer, and as Damien shined his light into the black, both Kindred squinted their eyes to see what lay beyond.

Just more rubble and darkness. Then what was making that clawing sound?

A rock jumped from the rubble, a large one, one both Kindred had been leaning against. The giant mass catapulted outward from the pile, knocking both vampires down. Jack tried to stay upright and see what was happening, but all he could feel was the shattering of a few teeth as the rock collided with his jaw. He screamed on the way down, and gasped as the slab of earth cracked and fell apart a foot beyond his head.

Too fucking close.

Groaning, struggling to push himself back to his knees, he rolled over and clutched his mouth in his hand. God, his teeth, his fucking teeth. Some of them were cracked open, and the pain throbbed through his skull like fire. When he was alive, a love of candy had lead to an abscessed tooth, and the pain it had caused him was incapacitating, as if someone had poured acid into his skull.

But now he was Kindred, and those nerve endings didn't have the same sensitivity if he wasn't blushing life. And yet, he still fell over and clutched his head; felt like a pipe bomb had gone off between his temples. Every drop of vitae he had to spare went into his head to repair the damage, even as his ears picked up the sounds of falling rocks and a crumbling wall. Even as he heard the screeching of something breaking through the hole they'd made.

He looked left and right. The spare flashlight was broken, only the one Athalia had worked; at least she was pointing it at them and the tunnel at large. But her jaw had dropped, the same way Jack's had before.

Shit.

Jack looked up, and felt his body petrify. You'd think after a certain point, he'd be saturated on shock, unable to be surprised anymore by the grotesque or strange or unusual. But the spider monster before him proved otherwise as it forced its massive body against the hole, and through it, screaming at him with a mutant face of arachnid and human. Like someone had begun merging or transforming a human into a spider, but stopped halfway through, with a weird mess of multiple eyes and spider fangs sticking out of human mouth trying to fit too many objects.

Its arms clawed at the rock, ripped and tore through it like curved blades carving striations through concrete; it had no hands, just bone blade things coming from overly muscled forearms. Its waist was connected to some sort of enormous spider body, and the colossal creature struggled to force its hairy, long, gross legs through the hole they'd made. Like watching a spider force its way out of a dug hole too small for its body. Not far from the truth.

Jack managed a glance to the other side and saw Damien, standing there giving the same look as everyone else. He looked the other way, and sure enough Fiona was doing the same thing. Only Triss managed to react.

She threw herself at it.

Seeing a normal sized person land onto the spider's huge, hairy abdomen put the creature's size into a new perspective. Might as well have been a mouse trying to fight a house cat.

But Triss had arms and claws, and she used them to climb the beast's spider body with zero care that her claws were cutting, digging, and ripping it open. Small as she was compared to it, it must have felt like ant bites to the enormous arachnid, and ant bites hurt. The monster spun around again and again, faster, screeching until Jack covered his ears as he stumbled away.

"Someone get the fucking dogs!" Triss said as she held onto the creature. Like riding a bull, except the bull was the size of an elephant, and as it crashed around inside what was ultimately a tunnel barely big enough to hold its size when it stood up, its many legs and weapon arms destroyed everything around it.

A staccato cascade of harsh, loud snaps, along with a string of bright flashing lights snapped Jack's attention like lightning. Gunfire. Damien had his sword in his left hand, his gun in his right, and he was holding down the trigger, full auto. The recoil kept controlled by Kindred strength meant the man had little issue hitting his target, and a splattering of red and black liquids washed over the debris around them. Warm, and Jack threw himself back as more of its blood splashed against his face and body.

Not enough room. The thing was too huge, far too fast for its size, and its spider legs sliced into concrete as it thrashed, body hitting the walls again and again and again. It wasn't stopping, even as Damien's bullets peppered its exoskeleton. From the thunk sound Jack managed to catch between the loud pops of the gun, it didn't sound like the bullets were getting deep, despite the host of blood they unleashed. If anything, each bullet made the creature louder and angrier, until Triss's legs were being tossed into the air; only her claw grip sunk into its back where human and spider merged kept her from being tossed.

Rock and a hard place wasn't a good enough metaphor. Maybe between two monsters? Two nightmares? Jack managed a stupid, reality-defying smile for a split moment as he held down the trigger of his gun. Monsters and nightmares. Not even a year ago and he thought his sister was stupid for still being afraid to close her eyes when showering, afraid of ghosts or evil little girls standing outside the curtain to get her.

His bullets went everywhere, many missing and striking the walls as much as the creature, and he cursed as he walked backward from it. Practice went out the window the moment rubber hit the road. But each moment alive was a moment to aim better, and he grit his teeth as he tightened the ring onto the giant spider monster. Not easy to hit a big target when walking backwards along rubble and tracks and when the damn thing refuses to stop trying to kill everything around it.

It came at him, like a scorpion with its pincers. It wasn't going to pinch him though, it was going to slice him in half with one of those bone arms, and Jack threw himself to the side as the arm came down hard enough to sink half a foot into the tunnel floor. Fool him once, he wasn't getting cleaved like that again.

There were still sounds coming from behind him, and they were getting closer, more roars, more monster screams that sounded all too similar to the ones in front of him. More howls, and some whines you might hear if you kicked a dog, a really really big dog. He winced with each one, but he kept getting closer to them as he got up, only to throw himself back again as the monster brought its other hand down at him. And the other again, and again. Jack kept jumping back to avoid the claw coming down inches in front of him, but one jump too many meant his heel landed on a bit of rock the wrong way.

The world pulled out from under him like a rug as he fell onto his back. Everything flipped, and he was staring at the ceiling, more pain cutting through his skull. Biting down on half-regrown teeth was bad enough, but hitting his head against the metal underneath him hard enough to shake his brain in its bed was icing on misery cake. He tried to get up, to reorient himself before the creature brought its hand down to cut him in half, but feedback rippled through his limbs like tingling waves that held them still. He'd hit his head hard.

The creature was over him, screaming down at him with both hands brought to the air. Blood poured out of its human half, dripping off its waist and down onto the spider hairs of its underbelly, and onto Jack as the creature overstepped. Soon Jack was underneath it, and the world went crazy. The creature turned around again, reacting to more gunfire, and all Jack could see was the hard shadows of the light against the spider's body.

But he was underneath it, and he'd seen enough movies to know what to do. He yanked out his knife, and jammed it upward.

Like trying to cut through leather. Only his Kindred strength let him push the blade past the spider's exoskeleton, and even then only a couple inches in, enough to unleash a flood of black liquid onto his hands and chest. Sickly warm, and it did not smell like blood.

The gunfire stopped. Damien cursed and threw his gun aside before taking his sword into both hands. No more bullets probably, and Jack had heard him reload at least twice. The little Ventrue could see the man approach him, and the colossus turned to meet him. The Mehket became a blur of speed, and Jack had to squint his eyes to see the man move outward along the walls to try and catch the rampaging creature from the side.

No good. It turned to meet Damien's speed, and stabbed outward with one of its spider legs into Damien's oncoming body, its own speed a blur, like a samurai drawing his blade in attack. Momentum, combined with the spider's strike, forced the creature's limb through Damien's stomach. And out his back.

A second of silence hit them all as Damien dropped his sword, and looked down at the enormous limb. It wasn't a tiny sword or bullet hole piercing him, but a spider monster's leg, half a foot thick. And when the spider yanked the limb free, the dried insides of Kindred fell around Damien. Everyone stared at the massive hole in his stomach that shown clear through him, before the man fell over, and the bits and pieces of him that fell out of his insides faded to ash.

Chapter 36

~~Jack~~

“No!” Fiona got up from the corner by the rubble. In all the chaos and commotion, Jack hadn’t noticed, but she’d been hiding. Perfectly understandable, he’d be hiding too if he hadn’t nearly died twice before; already becoming jaded, ha. But Fiona, normally smiling and bouncing, ran over to Damien, and stood beside him as she pointed her hands at the monster. “Triss, get out of the way!”

Jack twisted around underneath the spider, and got to his stomach, facing Fiona, as the madness started. The spider goddess appeared, and all eight of her spider legs were pointed at the creature. It was enough to make the monster give pause as Fiona ran at the creature, tiny little Scot woman, frizzy red hair bouncing as she sprinted up to its waist where the beast’s human stomach met the spider body, and punched it.

The spider goddess that shared the same space as the little redhead punched as well, with all eight legs. From so close, Jack could hear the sickening crunch of flesh and exoskeleton being pierced by a host of sharp limbs. And the shriek that followed was just as sickening. For a moment he felt bad, like they were picking on some sort of animal that didn’t know better, didn’t know it was a menace, didn’t know it was being hunted.

Fiona didn’t seem to feel the same way. Screaming out, she punched the spider again, and again it stumbled, body almost collapsing on Jack as its many legs pushed and dug at the ground around him. Blood poured, trickling down its body, and splashed over Fiona, soaking her jeans and jacket in black and red. And she punched again, as if the very idea that she was taking this thing head on wasn’t a concern.

She took a few steps back, and pointed both her hands at the enormous spider. The demon woman appeared where she was, and Jack could see its many great horns, including the ones that jutted out and backward from where her eyes should have been. He could see the hovering body, the spider dress, the odd limbs, and above all could see the eight blades she sank into the animal.

The creature shrieked as its endless blood began to pour over the concrete. Jack couldn't see it, not in the dark and the flash of light from the one flashlight, but he could hear it, and feel it as the huge waves of disgusting black liquid splashed over his back and hands. In the flailing and swinging of limbs, the creature vaulted itself toward Fiona, and Jack froze as the titan ran over him at the small girl only three feet before him.

The beast leaned down and swung its arm outward at her, the bone scythe nearly as large as her whole body. It clubbed her with the back side thank god, but the small woman was still sent through the air like a rag doll. In the flickering black, it looked like nothing more than a ball of moving colors, until Jack heard the crunch of flesh on rock.

Fiona landed. She didn't get up.

"Fuck you! Die!" Triss, somewhere above him with the spider still between them, started tearing and clawing. He couldn't see it but he could feel the vibrations and weight, feel the rampage of the creature as it started throwing its body around to dislodge the Nosferatu. And the more she slashed and bit and screamed, the more the giant spider monster towering over Jack thrashed around.

Another minute and he was going to be paste. He picked himself up to a foot and knee, and threw himself along the tunnel path as best he could. Kindred legs sent his tiny body flying, and he landed with a hard bounce as rock and metal greeted his suit and bones.

Rolling, rolling, he came to a stop maybe twenty feet from the spinning monster, the Azlu now between him and his friends.

Triss was on top of it, on top of its grotesque and massive human half, with her claws around its neck and her crocodile mouth biting into its skull. Black blood gushed over her teeth and down her clothes, along with bits of spider, and bits of human flesh from the hybrid. Too hard to see, too hard to see a damn fucking thing in the darkness with only the one flashlight, but Athalia still had the light up, and was trying to get up as well.

“Athalia, stay down! Stay still!” he said. If she moved it might attack her, and maybe, just maybe, this thing would focus on the things dashing about instead.

He ran around and looked for his pistol. Nope, gone, he dropped it somewhere, where where. Fuck. Still had the knife though, better than nothing.

Not better than nothing. Running was better than nothing. In the chaos Jack had a moment to peek over at the body on the tracks, Damien’s body. He wasn’t moving, but he wasn’t ash. The monster had put a hole through him, actually through him, clean through his fucking body. There’d been a moment where Jack could see withered things fall out of him; withered was normal, they were Kindred, but to see the things fall out of him, spill, and turn to ash, was not the same thing as knowing they were there.

If Jack was still alive, he’d be vomiting. But he didn’t need to be alive to feel shock, to feel the muscles and brain refuse to work together. That moment of hesitation that’d get you killed, that—

Nope, fuck that, fuck that and fuck this. This thing wasn’t Viktor or Lucas, this thing was just a thing. A mindless, really big fucking scary thing, but just a thing. Just a fucking thing. Wake up and move!

He turned around, and sprinted down the tunnel. “Triss, keep it busy! I’ll go get the wolves!”

“What the fuck do you think I’m doing!?” A gargled mess of sounds came out of her mid yell; a mouthful of spider parts and human flesh. But as Jack looked over his shoulder at the raging monster, he could see the thing wasn’t slowing down even as the vampire started to get deeper into its meat.

They couldn’t kill this thing. Maybe the Uratha could.

He sprinted around the bend of the tunnel, toward the sounds of howling, roars, and screams. And fire. Mason had molotovs and a flamethrower, and both would be nigh-instant death if they got him. But a fucking spider monster straight out of a monster flick was behind him, ripping and tearing and killing his friends. He needed their help.

“Avery! Clara! Fucking someone!” The only answer he got was more wolf howls, deep and loud enough to echo in the tunnel and shake his brain in its skull. But there was some light around the curve, some orange and red, some fire light. “Someone, there’s another one of these fucking spider things! Someone I—”

The walls looked like a Jackson Pollock, covered in splatters of blood of red and black, and mixed with hundreds of immense claw marks. The subway tracks were gone, just shards of metal ripped up and tossed everywhere. The wolves still had their lanterns lying around, but they weren’t the biggest source of the light. The biggest source was Mason.

The wolves were still transformed, still in their Goliath bodies, except for Mason. The man’s sack of molotovs was empty, and he held the flamethrower in his hand. A stream of fire left the oddly shaped gun, and while it wasn’t the grand explosion of fire Jack had come to expect after seeing them in a hundred movies, that didn’t change that the rampaging creature they were dealing with was covered in fire.

Covered in fire and still not dead.

Even as the spider half — more like spider nine tenths — of the monster hybrid burned, the werewolves threw themselves at it, at its bone claw arms, at its spider legs, and one of the wolves threw themselves onto the flames of its back. Avery.

The pack leader sank her claws into its spider back, through the flames that flicked upward along her body, and deep through the exoskeleton. Where there hadn't been enough light to see anything before with the other spider, now Jack raised a hand to block out the flashing waves of amber that scarred his vision. Seeing spots with his eyes closed, and the death cries yanked them back open.

He was supposed to be doing something, supposed to do more than just stand there and gawk at the nine beasts unleashing hell underneath Dolareido, fire included. But, before the thoughts could break through the shock seared into his eyes, the creature started to move toward him. The giant creature currently covered in werewolves and fire was moving toward him.

He took a step back. It was all he could figure out, could muster, as the hellfire ran at him. But before the heat devoured him, Avery jumped onto its human half. Big as the creature's human, mutated half was, Avery was just as big in her werewolf body, and she sank her claws down and into the monster's shoulders and neck. Fire continued to spread over its body, over the Uratha, and many had to jump off to stop from catching fire themselves.

Not Avery. The fire enveloped her, over her, encompassed her as she bit down onto the creature's face. Her enormous, monstrous wolf mouth took the spider by the head, and sank its fangs deep. The cry of pain from the abomination mixed with the roaring flames, until it was enough for Jack to flinch. Flinch was good, flinch was a reaction, and he needed more of those. Get back, get the fuck back from the fire you idiot before it catches you. This isn't like with Viktor, there's no explosion to push you away, just pure flame.

As he took a few more steps away from the chaos, the creature fell onto its stomach with a loud crash, the weight of its body vibrating the tunnels and concrete. It'd fallen forward like someone had tripped it, and a glance around it showed multiple werewolves biting and clawing at its legs, enough of them to yank the creature down onto its stomach while Avery continued to wrestle with its human half. The bone scythe arms couldn't reach her, and thrashed around with less and less ferocity as Avery ripped, tore, and clawed at its shoulders.

Something. Supposed to be doing something, not watching. Fucking say something!

"There's another one!" was all he could manage before the rumbling behind him came to join the rumbling before him.

Several of the wolves got up from their death grips on the creature's thrashing legs, and stared at him with a weird mix of confusion and aggression, as if he'd dropped a water balloon on them in surprise. But their surprise turned to shock as the second spider came around the corner with all the grace of a steam train gone off the rails. The creature's mass, unhindered by the paltry damage Jack and his friends had done, crashed into the wall on the outside of the tunnel turn, but the spider pushed its legs against the wall as equally as the floor and catapulted itself toward the group of new targets.

Was Damien still alive? Where was Beatrice? She wasn't on the creature anymore. Was Fiona alive? Were any of them going to live through this insanity? Stop thinking and move!

Jack threw himself onto his stomach. The slam of his weight against concrete and metal was nothing compared to what would have happened if the creature hit him. And the creature ran over him toward the wolves, ignoring him, bleeding and hairy spider body flying over him. All Jack could do was stare on toward the wolves as the new creature bowled them over.

It didn't care about its companion, or the fire. It cared about killing, far as Jack could tell, and as the monster crashed into the body of its fellow monster, the werewolves did their best to compensate. But Jack could see it in their eyes, their movements, even Avery's as she jumped off the defeated and almost-still creature. None of them had expected this.

How Avery was not on fire, Jack couldn't tell, but the woman's claws had a strange glow to them, almost amber like the fire. And the glow vanished as the new monster ran her down, titan body colliding with hers and sending her flying backward until Jack heard her meat and bone crack and crunch against the tunnel floor.

The pack stood there for a second, and many of them cast quick glances at each other. A second too long, and the spider charged over them, feet and mass pushing aside the wriggling, burning body of the other. The new spider slashed out with its scythe arms while its giant legs shoved the flaming body of its companion aside, wreaking destruction like breathing. And sure enough, one of the werewolves didn't dodge.

The sound of blade cutting down through bone, muscle, organs and skin, all in the blink of an eye, was familiar. Jack had heard it before, when Viktor had cut him from forehead to crotch, sank a blade an inch through his body. Only reason he survived was because he was Kindred. But no Kindred could survive getting cut in half, not vertically. The wolf woman fell apart, two sides collapsing inward with the momentum and mass of the creature's blade arm, and splattering guts over the concrete.

The body parts began to transform back into a human, clothes and skin and organs and all.

The pack freaked. Howls turned into weird, half-roar half-scream mixtures. Their eyes opened wide and bloodied chops drooled havoc as they threw themselves at the new enemy.

Jack looked on. Hard to tell what was going on, with two spider monsters fighting for space, one nearly dead and on fire, but at least the far more lively one had gone past Jack and now stood between the wolves. Stood, spun, slashed, screamed, the creature was insane, ripping the walls apart as much as its new prey.

But the werewolves didn't care, they'd gone berserk. Blood filled the air, burnt flesh, ash, and it whipped everyone into a frenzy of bloodlust. Not the sort of bloodlust a Kindred had; Jack knew what that felt like. This was different, this was the bloodlust people got when every fiber of their being wanted to kill, was going to kill, when the primal instinct takes over and the whole of your existence focuses into a single thought and action. The slaughter.

Mason joined them, dropping the — now probably empty — flamethrower, and erupting into his transformation with all haste. Seven titans of claw threw themselves at the monster, two companions missing, Avery a broken mess in the darkness, and now a friend dead. It was not a good night for the Uratha, and it was only getting worse.

One of the wolves started to climb the creature's side, but the Azlu spun around and caught the wolf alongside the body with a claw. It cut deep, maybe six inches through flesh and bone, and sent the werewolf spinning through the air, adding to the red that decorated the lacerated walls. Another wolf jumped it, and again the creature spun. How could something so massive move so quickly? It got this wolf through the guts with its scythe arm, skewering them out through the back before tossing them aside.

The tunnel started to shake. Vibrations ripped through the walls and ceiling, cracked them like kitchen plates, sent dirt and rubble down on the madness around Jack. Down onto the pack and their target.

Like a whip crack for the brain. Get back, go find the others, see if Damien survived, if Fiona survived, see where Triss was.

He almost turned around, but a single step back summoned bad luck like a reaper to the door. The creature's frantic movement came his way again, spinning and turning, eight legs and two blade arms stabbing and crashing against the walls and ceiling. Each wolf that managed to get onto its back earned more death cries from it, and it responded with claws flinging wild, cutting deep into the concrete and metal. And it was all coming Jack's way.

The ceiling began to collapse. Rocks fell onto them, all of them. Gigantic slabs cracked open against the floor around Jack's feet, and the tiny Ventrue threw himself to the side as one bigger than him nearly crushed him. He was becoming intimately familiar with concrete, and sighed as again the hard surface greeted him with all the softness of ... concrete.

The creature turned to him. With all the wolves and chaos going on, how it noticed him and him specifically, Jack couldn't fathom, but in the tunnel barely wide and tall enough to fit the monster, it turned to look at little him sitting against the wall, and it screamed. But the ceiling was falling in, caving in, and the wall Jack had his back to started to collapse backward. The spider's arms raised again, and for a moment Jack thought it was going to slice him in half like that woman he'd seen before. But it tried to stop the ceiling instead, arms catching an immense chunk of rock the size of a car.

And it succeeded. Easily. But it was the chunk after that, and after that that beat the monster down, ripped into both its bodies, and made the creature fall forward toward Jack.

The world went black as it fell onto him. Something behind him gave way, but in the ear-splitting destruction and carnage, he couldn't hear it. He could feel something though, feel a wall crumble, feel the brick-shape of it fall backward, and him with it. And then the excruciating pain of having his back pressed to slabs of the hard material.

But it was enough to get moving, even as the spider collapsed and pressed its abdomen down against him, where the human and spider mutant merged. Heavy, oh god so fucking heavy. He poured his vitae into his limbs, and pushed, pushed until he thought his wrists would snap and his elbows would pop. But with some wiggling and shifting, he pushed against the monster's body hard enough to get himself out from underneath its stomach.

And into darkness. The wall collapsed; hell, everything was collapsing. And the flickering light from the fire was buried in rubble in moments. Only the lanterns the wolves had brought with them still lit the area, but all Jack had of that was minor reflections against stone. He was in a new area.

He kept backing up, a glance over his shoulder proving his fear. There was nothing, just black, just empty black. The ground beneath him wasn't level, no smooth surfaces, and as far as he could tell the collapsing tunnel was in front of him only, not in the new room he'd been pushed into. So, something carved into the earth then, dug out. Like a den.

Oh good fucking god he was in something's den.

He squeezed his left hand. Knife, the knife was there. Somehow he'd managed to pick it back up the half a dozen times he'd fallen. He put it into his right hand, and continued to back away from the large opening the spider creature was tearing through.

The wolves were relentless. They bit and chewed and clawed at the creature, even as rocks fell on them, even as the tunnel continued to crumble around them. Jack stared on as slabs of concrete and steel rods rained on them, crushed some of them, their limbs, their bodies. They didn't stop. They sank their fangs into the spider, and one of the large wolves managed to rip a leg twice as long as the werewolf was tall from the spider's body. The monster's shrieks echoed in the chamber Jack had backed into, that the monster was crawling into, that the werewolves were being dragged into.

Eventually Jack's back found rock and dirt. So much softer than concrete. He touched it with his open hand, and gulped as he felt something too soft. Spider silk. No need to look, not that he'd be able to see it in the darkness. But after having touched, tripped on, gotten stuck in, and unfortunately tasted spiderweb in this unfortunate and, as predicted, suicidal mission into the tunnels, he was starting to recognize it on contact.

And as a tiny ray of light managed to break through the crumbling walls, he noticed some white shapes, hanging from the ceiling. Cocoon shapes. Human bodies, wrapped in webbing.

The wolves hadn't predicted this had they? They seemed just as surprised and confused as he was. They'd expected a spider monster, but they hadn't expected two. Though they'd long given up caring about the confusion, far as Jack could tell, as the wolves threw themselves onto the monster and tore into it.

But the monster wasn't getting slower. Maybe that's why they needed fire? Jack had stabbed this thing, him and Damien had sunk easily a hundred bullets into it, and now it had half a dozen titans of carnage ripping into it, and it still wasn't going down. Worse, it was still heading toward him, slashing and cutting into the werewolves while dragging its enormous body through the rubble and rock toward the little Ventrue.

So he turned and kept moving. Occasional flashes of light from above exposed the dug tunnel ahead, bits of moonlight or streetlight maybe showing through some old drain pipes or cracks in old, abandoned tunnels that were still lit. Just enough light for him to see, if only for the split moment it occasionally streaked his surroundings. Nothing but rock, with the occasional bit of root or vine, the occasional worm, occasional insect.

A flicker of light let him see movement below him, and he stepped on it with a quick snap. A spider. For a moment, he expected to hear the animal shriek louder than it already was. Either it didn't care about a random spider, or its shriek volume was already maxed out.

More of the webbing greeted him, but in the dark he couldn't see shit, just shadows and dark colors. Enough to at least dodge a few of the webs, but others found his feet, his legs, and one cut across his chest, big webs, enough to give his body pause before his weight pushed through. The texture was all wrong, like nothing a spider would make, and touching it made him shiver worse than a spider crawling down his back. It was all wrong. What the fuck was this thing?

Shrieking yanked his head back, and he choked on a scream as the creature jammed its body into the dug tunnel. It fit, just barely, and from how it moved, it looked like it was familiar with the den tunnel, familiar with the pressing walls and the height of the ceiling. Guess it was the one that dug it then.

But the spider didn't get far. It cried out and turned its human half around as much as it could to slash out at the wolves biting and clawing at its body. One of them climbed over its spider back onto the human half, and did her best to grab its shoulders, pin it, shred and tear open its neck. She succeeded, and human flesh came off in chunks, only to heal. Not heal in seconds, but fast enough Jack could see the wounds close between each flash of light that managed to reach them.

“Go! Run!”

It was Clara. She barked at him, the words almost lost in the inhuman shape of her mouth.

“Where the fuck do I go!? I can’t see anything!”

“Try—” Her voice came to a sudden halt as the monster’s claw managed to reach up and over her, and come down, a giant trying to throw a pest off its back. It succeeded, and the titan wolf landed in front of Jack on her back, head closer to the creature than him.

She got up and turned to face it, backing up and snarling, barking, roaring at the spider as it came closer despite the host of wolves slashing and clawing at its body. But, at least now Jack had her between him and the animal coming to kill them all.

“Get back.” Her arm came out, and she reached down with her hand — fucking god a giant hand of claws and blood — to push back against his chest. “You found. Nest.”

“Wonderful! Fucking wonderful! I thought the nest was the tunnel we just came from!” He did as she asked, and kept backing up. The spider lunged at them, but the tunnel couldn’t fit the motion. Big enough for the creature to crawl through, but it was smaller than the subway tunnel, small enough to keep the creature from leaping.

Clara ducked the sideways slash, and stepped beside the following vertical slash. Big bad wolf was doing a dance, but Jack could only see freeze frames of it as they backed away through the tiny lights that managed to reach them.

The light! Fuck, the light coming from above meant there had to be some way to get to it, break through the layer, get up and out of the spider's lair. It had to mean that. Fucking had to. He was due some good luck right about now.

“Climb!” He reached out for the wall beside him, and fell.

A strange sensation when you reach for something expecting to go up, but you go down. Vertigo. Whole world flips upside down and you feel every instinct for what's up or down just vanish. Dizzy to the bone. And if you're falling for longer than you think you should, it's like the world has just imploded in your brain.

And it exploded when his back and skull collided with the ground, after cutting through a couple inches of water.

He sat up, panic gripping him, wrenching his heart up through his throat as he prepared to sink. But the water was genuinely only a couple inches deep, and he forced himself to stand as he looked around.

“ ... mother fucking hell.”

A waterway. A really, really, really big, old waterway. A vertical one that cut nearly a hundred feet up, like some sort of enormous drainage sewer, something that could handle flood levels of water if Dolareido ever got hit with that much rain. And as he stood, he turned around to look at their new area; like a fucking arena, round walls surrounding them, and a sky-high ceiling.

There were some tunnels that connected to the top of the vertical drain, way out of reach, with grating blocking them off no doubt. Course Clara would be able to open them, if they could climb up to reach them. The concrete bricks around them were smooth-ish, and not something he could climb, but werewolf claws could climb them probably, if she could sink her claws into the concrete.

His new partner in this chaos fell into the water with him, but at least she managed to turn and land on her feet. Like a cat. If he was Triss, he'd make the joke.

Triss. Fuck, Triss, was she alive?

“Did you see if any of my friends were alive?” he said.

Clara, still in her werewolf form, walked over to him, water and blood dripping down from her fur. He could see again thank god, now that the very old, very large manhole above cast some light down the massive tunnel hole to them. In the dark for as long as he'd been, a little light went a long way. And from so close, he did a double take on Clara's body. Much as she was a tall, muscular werewolf, she had the curves of a woman too. Weird thought to have, but there it was.

“No.” The she-Goliath stared up at the hole they'd fallen down from. The hole was ten feet up, something that'd been dug out of the wall, based on how weirdly the concrete was broken, and claw marks where the wall was opened up. “You. Escape?”

He pointed at the drainage holes around the base of the main drainage tunnel, near their feet. All of them were quite short. The grating covering them would be no problem for a werewolf to remove, but only a foot wide meant the small exits were just there to taunt them.

“Maybe the drains above us? They're much bigger, we can—”

Screams cut through their reprieve. The spider creature reached the tunnel exit, or entrance, and vaulted toward them. Or at least it tried to. Three of the wolf titans were at its side, and with claws wrapped around the beast's arms, they braced their feet against the walls to keep it from escaping the tunnel. Easier prey, Jack imagined, when the giant creature couldn't turn around very well.

Jack stared up at the menace trying to get them. Him. It was trying to get him. The fuck did he do? He did go into its nest, and he was the first one to do that, maybe that was why? The crazed monster's human eyes were staring death into him, and its mismatched arrangement of spiders eyes over its temples and forehead looked more like nebulae of obsidian death than eyes.

“Let's go.” Clara reached out, picked him up, and threw him onto her back like throwing on a book bag, with about as much grace as well. But the impact of his small body against her fur was surprisingly nice, compared to all the concrete he'd been hitting lately. Soft.

“Wait, your friends. Shouldn't you help them? I can take care of myself.”

“Idiot. Shut up,” she barked. The words were harsh, guttural, a struggle for her chops to say. But good enough to get the point across. The giant wolf ran up to the wall of the vertical tunnel furthest from the spider, and slammed both hands into the concrete. Inertia hit Jack hard enough to flatten him against Clara's back, and bounce, before the wolf started to climb. She got up a foot, and slammed her claws into the concrete hard enough to sink them into it an inch.

It was like a scene from a cartoon. She made a grunting sound for each foot she climbed, and they grew louder as she her feet lifted off the floor, and she had to carry all her weight and his weight on one hand at a time between each new hold she made. He'd half expected her to just jump, or maybe throw him up there first. But neither would have been a sure thing. Climbing up there was a sure thing.

The spider landed onto the sewer drain floor, its thrashing weight sending dirty water splashing along the walls and high up to where Clara was scaling the concrete. Werewolves jumped in after it, three of them. Not seven or six, just three. And those three were covered in blood, leaking it, even as their wounds were closing with some insane healing only an elder Kindred could match. Staring down at them, with his hands hooked around the werewolf's shoulders, Jack could only wince as the three remaining wolves shrank as Clara took him higher and higher.

Kindred generally lost their fear of heights after a while. You'd need to fall a couple floors to hurt an ankle, and a couple more on top of that to even risk injury. But the higher he and Clara went up, the more he found himself terrified of falling as the spider started crawling after them.

Again, it didn't get far. As its spider legs started to dig into the concrete, and its scythe arms cut into it like soft dirt, the three wolves still chasing it sank their teeth into its spider limbs. Big as the creature was, it wasn't strong enough to climb after him with three werewolves biting and clawing at its legs.

But the three wolves lasted only moments. The spider swung its legs outward, hard, and now with more than enough room in the huge drain tunnel, it put its weight into the throws. Each wolf landed against concrete with a thud hard enough Jack could hear the bones break. And each wolf slumped down onto the water like broken toys. Still in werewolf form though, and guessing from what happened to the one that'd been split in half, if they died they turned back into a human.

Memory whip cracked his brain. One of them had died earlier, split in half, like a fucking tomato under a knife. Fuck, this was bad. So bad, bad for so many more reasons than just him coming down into the tunnels.

Clara reached the edge of the alcove above them, and pulled them both up with a quick hop before setting him down. Sure enough there were metal grates blocking their path, but without so much as a skipped beat, Clara ripped them out of the tunnel walls and tossed the metal bars aside. Too hard maybe, as the bars broke apart and shattered over the small tunnel floor.

“Go!”

He started toward the tunnel. Typical sewer tunnel, which meant the city was above, which meant manholes and some ladders up ahead.

“What about you?”

“Must stay. Kill. Azlu must die.”

“It’s going to kill all of you!”

The titan stood over him, glared down at him with animal eyes, and set her blood-soaked hands on his shoulders. So fucking huge, she seemed more like a standing grizzly bear from so close.

“Our hunt. Go.”

“What about my friends? They might be dead! I have to go back and get them.” Because stupidity levels were sky high and any semblance of intelligent decision making was thrown out the window.

“Maybe. But if Azlu lives...” She sighed and shook her head before leaning down toward him. The breath of a werewolf; smelled like spider and blood. “Stay out of way.”

Another roar pulled both their attention back to the tunnel, and they looked down as another werewolf jumped from the hole the spider monster had carved. Avery. Her claws were glowing amber again, her eyes too, and she had a subtle flicker of red on the tip of her fur. And she threw herself up toward the spider already halfway up the wall.

Apparently being tossed hard and far enough to break every bone in the body wasn't enough to bring her down. She roared at the prey before landing on it, and her glowing claws sank through the shell of the creature's spider body like someone cutting metal with a blow torch. He almost expected to see flames as Avery's claws dug in, and started to drag down through the creature's body from her own weight, before at last stopping after a few feet of evisceration. The monster screamed the whole way, but did not stop crawling upward, toward little Jack and his new bodyguard.

“Um ... her claws look like they're on fire.”

Clara snorted, put her hand against his chest, and started pushing him down the tunnel again. “Go!”

“I can't just go! This thing is in the fucking tunnels, what the fuck happens if it escapes?”

Clara snarled and shook her head. “No time! Go! Tell Prince!”

The Prince could help, right? She'd march a hundred humans down here under her spell with torches, and they'd purge the whole damn place. Yeah, good plan, go get the Prince. And hope to god in the mean time his friends didn't die? It'd take the Prince a day at least to get that set up, and two of his three friends would be sleeping helpless during the day. He doubted the Azlu gave a shit about night cycles.

Clara shook her head and shoved him again. “Stop thinking. Can't save friends. Go!”

“And what about you? There's two of you left!”

She leaned in, put her werewolf face two inches from his, and licked him. Fucking. Licked him.

For an infinitesimally small amount of time, he wanted to laugh. A dog was licking him. Humor shattered as the snarling and roaring and screaming howls filled the background while the giant werewolf in front of him stood upright again, and pat him on the shoulder.

“Get Prince. Kill Azlu.”

And then she turned around, and jumped down. Her screams mixed with Avery’s a second later, but Jack was some ten feet down the exit, away from the tunnel’s opening where it connected with the drainage sewer the monster was in. Couldn’t see, could only imagine Clara getting ripped to shreds.

Leave. Do what Clara said. Everyone had gone haywire when a second monster showed up. Not one of the wolves looked even slightly prepared for dealing with a second one of these monsters. And it’d cost one of them their lives. Their hunt was ruined, and Jack’s attempt to find Natasha ruined along with them. Fiona being proved innocent was of little comfort at this point.

More screams yanked his eyes away from his exit, and back toward the main drainage shaft. Painful screams, from wolves, more than just two as well. Maybe some of the others had joined in from the subway? Or the Uratha the spider had thrown into the walls of the sewer were back on their feet? Judging from the sounds, they weren’t helping very much.

He crawled over to the tunnel edge that looked over the sewer. Literally crawled, on hands and knees, dirty water joining the mess of dirt and dust on his clothes. The suit was ruined anyway. He poked his head out over the edge, and bit down on his teeth. Fuck, his teeth! Pain racked his brain, and he squeezed his eyes shut until he forced it down. The teeth would regrow far better once he slept come the morning, if he lived until morning.

Four werewolves circled the spider. The three it had thrown into the walls were still down, but breathing, moving, struggling to get up. One of them managed, but his leg gave out from under him, shin bending almost ninety degrees in a spot very much not a joint. He tried again, and with an audible crunch, the leg snapped into place.

These fucking werewolves were practically immortal, healing in seconds and refusing to get beaten down. Barring getting split in half, how the fuck did you kill one of these things? Fucking silver?

Jack reached for his knife, and considered—where the fuck was his knife? He fumbled around for it, pulled back and crawled around on his knees through the dark, hands swiping left and right in the inch-deep water. Knife knife where the fuck was the knife.

Gritting his teeth—fuck his teeth! Not gritting his teeth, but grimacing hard enough to hurt his cheeks, he poked his head out over the edge of his escape route into the death pit below. Something was glimmering, shiny in the water, catching the rays of light that came in from above. His god damn fucking knife.

Avery waited until the spider turned to face one of her pack mates, and then she threw herself at the bleeding creature. But it was ready for her this time and her burning claws, and spun around to face her, back of its claw arm hitting her head. Or at least it looked like that, but the spider found itself unable to turn as easily as a werewolf dangled from his arm. The woman had taken the ridiculous blow in the mouth, the same blow that had sent her flying earlier, and bit down.

And Jack thought his mouth hurt. Hard to see from such a height, eighty feet up at least, but he was sure bits of her teeth shattered and went flying. But she bit down and didn't let go, even as the monster threw his arm around left and right hard enough to swing her like a cat latched onto a sleeve. She managed to get her hands around the weird bone weapon of the creature, but that was it, all she could manage as it rampaged around the base of the sewer.

The other wolves jumped in, going for its seven remaining spider legs. Maybe too shocked by the fact one of the wolves had latched onto its arm, the monster could only stomp around, and did little to stop the other wolves from latching onto its many limbs. They pulled at them with claw and tooth, and with enough legs yanked out from under it, the creature fell onto its belly.

The others continued to pull and bite, doing their best to try and rip more of its legs off; no good, whatever this monster was made of, it refused to break. But it was down, unable to stand, unable to spin and attack nearly as easily. Queue for Clara to jump the spider's side, and start digging into its hairy exoskeleton once again.

Avery couldn't let go of the arm though. Her claws and eyes glowed with that strange red that seemed to make her claws cut with fire, but she couldn't use them. Every attempt to slash and swipe at the monster's human half was futile as the spider creature kept her at arm's length. It was up to Clara to kill it, and she wasn't having the same effect Jack had seen Avery cause when she'd mounted the last one.

At least the creature had forgotten about Jack. Hard to enjoy as he watched the monster start to rip itself free of the werewolves, spider limbs tossing aside the wolves that clung to it, one beast at a time. Clara was on its back, trying to reach its human half, trying to get to its head to start clawing, but the creature bucked so much she had to latch onto its spider body with all four sets of claws. And the spider, perhaps getting smarter as the fight went on, slammed its captured bone arm against the sewer floor.

Water and blood splashed as Avery's body collided with the floor. When the water settled, she was still holding on, and her claws started to tear at the monster's bone arm. No good, even her glowing claws couldn't do much to whatever this creature's weapons were made of. And again, it slammed its arm down so Avery's body swung through the air before crashing into the concrete beneath her. And again, and again, and again.

The glow in her eyes vanished, and the glow of her claws soon after. When the spider lifted its arm again, the werewolf leader was no longer attached to it, and the arachnid screeched its triumph as it started to swing its human half around with full speed, full freedom.

First it went for the Uratha pulling on its legs. They were faster to dodge this time, now that one of their friends had died earlier to them. But faster wasn't fast enough to completely avoid this thing's ridiculous speed, and the first wolf took the slash down the side, almost halfway through the torso. The wolf fell away, half curled up in a ball in the sewer water, half dragging itself to a spot away from the rampage. Another wolf tried to replace Avery as anchor, and leaped for the bone scythe, but the spider spun its torso to catch the wolf in the back with the flat side of its other arm. The crack was audible, nauseating, and the wolf fell over like a bag of sand. And the other wolf still on its spider leg did her best to keep the creature from turning around completely. But the monster was too big, too heavy, too strong, and once back to standing on its seven other legs, had no trouble flicking her away and sending her into the concrete once again, again hard enough Jack could hear things break and see the concrete crack.

Only Clara was left, and she roared her frustration as she lunged for the human half of the body. She managed it this time, and got her claws into its back before trying to get her teeth into its skull. She really, really wanted to get its head.

But the monster was bucking around again and throwing itself against the walls. The werewolves may have had a hard time colliding with solid concrete at such velocities over and over and over, but it barely phased the spider. It crashed into the wall again, and then galloped into the wall on the other side with more speed, angling its human half so both it and the werewolf slammed into concrete, hard enough to crack, and dent it.

One final crush was too much for Clara, and the werewolf fell to the ground, on her back and butt against the cracked wall around her. She stared up at the spider, even as it glared down at her in return with its myriad of spider eyes, many of them cut open or destroyed, and regenerating in front of her.

The spider reached forward with two of its spider legs to pin the woman against the wall, limbs skewering through her shoulders and into the concrete behind her. She howled, a defeated sound, a whining dog sound that made Jack's heart fucking break, even if it was deeper and halfway to a roar. What the fuck was the spider doing though? It brought in the tail of its spider body's abdomen, and set it against the pinned wolf's stomach.

Oh god it was going to cocoon her and eat her.

Ok ok ok, what to do what to do. Fuck what to do. With Viktor and Tony, he'd just reacted, dragged his bleeding ass across the floor until he found something he could do to stop them. With Lucas, he'd just reacted, threw himself in front of Damien before the man could kill the love of his life. Blind luck had saved him with Viktor and Tony; they hadn't expected an explosion, hadn't expected fire. Blind luck had saved him with Lucas; Damien was a broken man before Jack laid eyes on him, and found the man easy to dominate. Try to avoid the blind luck approach this time.

He got up, and looked around. No knife, but Clara had ripped the bars that barred the tunnel path behind him. He ran over to them; yeap, totally broken apart. And one of the broken off parts was a good three feet long, a thin metal bar maybe an inch wide, with the ends jagged and sharp.

Best he was going to get. He picked up the bar and walked back to the edge of the tunnel. Clara was barking at the spider, but for all her struggling and wriggling, the huge creature was layering her in enough webbing to blanket her legs completely, and wrapped too. Just like Fiona had done to Athalia's leg, but in much thicker layers. And her howls turned into screams as the creature plucked its legs from the wall, but still skewered through her shoulders, and started to rotate her. Like a scene from the nature channel.

Last chance Jack. Do what she said, get out and tell the others.

Fuck that, the other Kindred would figure out what happened when a bunch of their members were gone, and so were the werewolves. They'd come to the tunnels, find all this crap, and take care of it. He didn't need to go back and tell them about it, Clara was just trying to save his life.

And if he left, Triss and Damien and Fiona and even that bitch Athalia were as good as dead. And so was Clara. And he really wanted to save Clara.

He touched his cheek where she'd licked him, and looked down at the drop. Sixty feet, seventy, eighty feet? Fuck it could have been a hundred feet for all he knew. He looked at the bar in his hand, squeezed it a few times, got a good grip on it. Him against this thing? This thing that'd been shot a hundred times, cut open, stabbed, bitten, clawed into, ripped and shredded and refused to go down. Even as it regenerated before his eyes, its regeneration wasn't enough to cover all the wounds, and the spider bled black and red everywhere it moved; still didn't go down though.

Maybe an ancilla could fight this thing in its wounded state. Maybe. Julias would probably get his ass handed to him; Ventrue were talkers, rarely doers. And here he was, with a piece of metal in his hand, about to do something really, really fucking stupid.

What happened to him? What happened to that kid that just wanted to go through life playing it safe? He could still remember the conversation he had with Julias, that night the man proposed to him the deal of a lifetime. What was he willing to do to destroy his enemies? At the time, the worst he could imagine doing to someone was ruining their life financially, leaving them broke and without an asset to their name. To his enemies? Maybe kill someone in self defense. Apparently he was willing to do a lot more, if it was for a friend.

Fuck, Antoinette was going to kill him if this monster didn't do it first.

He squeezed the metal bar a few more times, and looked down. The spider wasn't moving much, human half holding still as the spider half was raised up slightly, legs twisting and turning Clara over and over as he cocooned her. Now or never, now or fucking never.

He jumped.

On the way down, he remembered a conversation with Fiona. She'd been nervous about seeing the Primogen, and it had her in smiles. Said it was how she dealt with it, with anxiety and fear, like with skydiving.

Jack was most definitely not smiling on the way down. It was an interesting sensation, free falling. He'd expected his gut to shoot up into his throat even though he knew that wasn't how gravity worked. Instead, just weightlessness, and some air resistance against his wet suit as he plummeted down toward the spider. He'd been smart enough to manage his jump so he'd come down feet first at least, and he pointed the bar down at the spider as he plummeted, held between his feet like a pogo stick.

A whole two seconds. A fucking eternity. Don't move don't move don't move don't move don't move.

Every muscle in Jack's body tensed as the bar landed on the creature's head. He squeezed the bar with everything he had, every fiber, every ounce of blood he had into his hands, every bit of vitae he could pour into his grip, all into squeezing a bar, squeezing until his fingers felt like they'd break.

There was a moment of sickening crunch, and then there was chaos.

Jack's grip remained, even as every bit of his weight coming down at a pretty insane speed drove the metal down through his target, forcing his feet apart. Even as his hands ripped at the palm, dragging the dried insides of his vampire skin along the metal, he kept his grip tight. Even as the metal kept going down until his hands met the head of the creature, scalp pushing against his grip.

The shrieks were loud, only two feet away from his ears, as he held on for dear life while the spider freaked out. It bucked, screamed, twisted and stomped. It threw itself against the walls, human half swinging around in the air, and Jack holding on to the metal bar he'd stuck a couple feet down through its skull, neck, and into its chest. How it was still alive Jack had no idea. How he had managed to even hit the target, Jack had no idea. But there he was, holding onto a metal bar sticking out of the spider monster's skull, blood flowing and splashing everywhere, while it crashed itself against the walls.

And Jack held on. Fucking god he held on, even as the creature drove itself into a wall onto its side, and Jack felt concrete embrace him yet again. Something broke in his shoulder. Didn't matter, he held on. More screams, higher pitched, panicked, and another toss of its insane weight against the other side of the drain pipe. And Jack, swinging around like a tether ball, hands still squeezing the metal bar, crashed into the wall right along with him, breaking what Jack was sure was every rib in his torso. Didn't matter, he held on. The wall cracked, splits in the concrete rising a couple dozen feet; anymore of this lunacy and the creature was going to collapse the Dolareido streets above onto them.

But, after a couple more thrashes, it collapsed. The seven enormous spider legs gave out so the bloody mess of its hairy, fat, monstrous abdomen fell to the wet floor beneath it. The human half slumped forward, arms dangling, and Jack's weight pressed against the back of it. He still held on, squeezing, even as the agony shot through his broken shoulder for it. Didn't matter, still held on.

And then the platform Jack stood upon, the spider's exoskeleton and abdomen, gave way.

"Fuck!" He fell through it, the cloud of gray and black, the blackness that surrounded him for a brief moment before his body fell forward onto the leaning human half of the spider. He still held on, even as the angle forced him onto his side, holding the metal, and staring at a bag of skin. "Fuck me!" The pain of broken bones vanished as he stared at the corpse, the human corpse, red blood all over it, and its spider features gone.

And as he looked to the gray cloud, he froze. Not a cloud, most definitely not a fucking cloud. It moved, scattered, spread out over the shallow water, and poured out everywhere. Spiders, large spiders, tarantula-sized spiders and hundreds of them, crawling and swarming and running to the small drainage pipes connected to the main one Jack sat in.

"Kill ... Azlu..." Clara said.

Ok, sure, a couple hundred spiders, he'd get right on that. He groaned through his pain as he forced himself back up, and did his best to not stare at the mangled remains of a human's body. Ignore that he'd just skewered said human through the skull a couple feet into its torso; at the time it'd been a mutated monster and a couple feet wasn't much. But now that he looked down at where the bar stabbed through into the fleshy, ruined remains, he realized just how much he'd impaled his target with metal.

Ignore it, ignore it. Get up, squash some spiders. Pushing off his good hand and onto his feet, he stomped around after the spiders, and squished them under his foot, each stomp threatening to break his already broken ribs. Crunch and splash as his boots crushed arachnid, and they went splat with a stomach-turning sensation, the texture of an exoskeleton giving way to pressure. Like crushing hard grapes, so the guts came out from the impact. Very gross.

But after killing maybe twenty in a panic, the majority by far escaped through the small drain pipes that connected to the base of the main drainage shaft.

“Well fuck,” he said.

The other werewolves groaned, and Jack jumped around with a startle. They were awake, and looking at him, something between exhaustion and frustration in their animal eyes.

“You ... killed ... Azlu’s ... body,” Avery said. Even the pack alpha, beaten to a pulp and lying down on her side in the water, managed to force herself to sit up a little, palms to the water, enormous muscles struggling to lift her weight.

“That uh ... that was the plan, right? Kill it? I didn’t think it’d turn into a bunch of smaller spiders though...” He managed an awkward shrug, sucked in his breath between his teeth, and walked over to Clara. Holy fuck the holes in her shoulders were already closed; probably not fully healed, but not gushing blood anymore. Jack took the webbing and yanked on it with his good hand, but not only did it feel like trying to rip apart hard leather with the strength of a normal human, it also stuck to his hand. He had to put his leg to the wall to push himself away, abandoning Clara. Fuck his god damn fucking ribs. He screamed, and the werewolves laughed.

He walked around to the others, frowned at each of them for laughing at his pain — sorry he wasn’t a masochist like these wolves apparently were — and checked their injuries. Bones snapping into place, wounds closing before his eyes, many joined by sickening crunches of what must have been painful super healing. His broken arm and ribs would take hours to set, and a good day's sleep to heal right, young as he was. He'd wake up from his daily slumber fully restored, but still, it'd be nice to not be walking around in agony, with every step sending scorching misery through his ribs, his arm, his skull.

With time, the wolves got to their feet, and one of them walked over to Clara to rip her free. Once done, they all reverted back to their human form, clothes reforming, fur disappearing, sizes shrinking, and shrinking, and shrinking some more until Avery was once again her tiny self and Jack could feel a little better about himself staring down at her.

“The goal was to kill the Azlu, not its body,” Avery said. “It escaped in one of those spiders.”

Well. Fuck.

“Considering the circumstance,” she continued, “killing the body was the best any of us could have hoped for.”

Well. Not so fuck then?

“Kid, I told you to fucking leave.” Clara walked over to him, human again, and glared down at him with furrowed brows. But, Jack could see a smile break through the expression. She was a very pretty woman Clara, and he really did like the box braid hair and tan-colored skin.

He shrugged his working shoulder, and focused his blood into his bad one. Heal faster damn it. “Saw an opportunity. Had to take it.”

“Azlu could have stepped to the side one fucking foot and we'd all be dead, you included.”

“Seemed pretty focused on wrapping you up for lunch,” he said, smirking up at the woman.

“You should have run—”

“Someone would have come anyway, whether I ran for help or not! I needed to—”

“You could have gotten yourself—”

“I wanted to save my friends! Hell I wanted to save you too.”

Her dark eyes faltered, and she looked down as she grit her teeth. But before she could say anything, Avery walked over to them and pat Jack on the back.

“Things did not go as planned, Jack. As you no doubt guessed, we didn’t expect two fully evolved Azlu. These creatures don’t work together like this, or hide their tracks nearly so well; they’re mindless animals, instinct driven. All evidence suggested one Azlu, but it looks like another one was working with it, and probably feeding from a different section in the city. That ... that is not something hosts do.”

Jack sighed, but nodded. “Animals do have this nasty habit of evolving instincts complicated enough to suggest intelligence.”

“To imagine Azlu changing with time is a scary thought,” another wolf said, a man now in human form.

“So,” Jack said as he gestured to the small drain pipes at the base of the wall surrounding them, “it uh ... broke into a bunch of little spiders? And fled?”

Avery nodded again, and walked over to the tunnel-hole dug into the wall. She had to climb and jump a little to reach it, but she got up there and turned around to motion for them to join her. “It’s why we brought fire to kill the other one. It can't survive and spread if it's covered in fire."

"So I shouldn't have killed it, er, its body. The Azlu thing escaped in one of those spiders."

Avery shook her head. "It was either that or the pack dies. And Stephanie, she ... she..." The leader winced, closed her eyes for a moment, and took a deep breath. "Come on, let's go see if anyone else survived."

So it was Stephanie that died then. Fuck. Jack nodded, and walked over to the wall.

"Uh ... little help?"

Clara and the other wolves laughed, and helped him scale the wall, one acting like a step while the others pushed his feet and butt upward until Avery could grab his good hand.

"Much as I'm pissed at you for disobeying my order," Avery said as she turned around and started to walk the dark, dug tunnel, "I'm happy you did. If we'd had to fight both Azlu at the same time, we wouldn't have survived."

Well, big bad alpha woman wasn't too proud to admit fault or weakness. Kind of surprised him, he'd expected some defiance and denial.

"We wanted to find it, prove Fiona wasn't it, and when I called to see if Natasha would help, I couldn't get through to her."

"So you assumed she was down here?"

"Well, it is Natasha. She wouldn't turn her phone off, even at gun point. Too addicted to technology and schedules." She wasn't the social addict type, that was for sure. “And Damien said she’d been making friends with some Uratha.”

“Fucking Arturo and Matthew.” Avery sighed and shook out her shoulders while stepping around one of the cocoons. She’d probably have to get rid of the evidence, if the tunnels hadn’t been abandoned and blocked off from kine by the Kindred. “Yeah, we smelled all three of them, behind those rocks. Didn’t expect another fucking Azlu.”

The two of them stepped into the subway tunnel again, and found several other werewolves sitting around a corpse. Stephanie’s corpse.

Jack approached them, softly as he could, and winced as each of them offered him a glare, a blaming glare, but Avery stepped in and shook her head.

“We owe the boy our lives, all our lives. Show him some respect. And Stephanie some respect.”

And they did. A word from their leader and their glares broke, sadness replacing it, long faces as they looked down at Stephanie’s corpse, two pieces that someone had brought together. Guts, organs and all.

He didn’t say a word, not a single word. He had no idea what sort of death rituals they had, hell what sort of attitude they even had toward the death of a pack member. Foot in mouth enough times to know to shut up in this sort of circumstance.

He looked over at the burnt body of the Azlu. It too was just a husk of human flesh now, the top half a bag of skin, and the spider parts gone. All around it were the bodies of spiders, incinerated, some burnt to ash, most turned onto their backs with legs coiled inward, bodies burnt to a crisp. So that was the plan then, kill it while it was on fire. And if it'd broken into its smaller spiders while on fire, then the chances of catching the thing were higher.

So one of them was still alive, still in the city. Fuck fuck.

Noises from down the tunnel drew his eyes, and Avery nodded as she motioned to Clara.

“Go with him.”

“Right right,” Clara said, nodding and walking in stride with Jack as he made his way toward where his friends had been.

Still be alive still be alive please still be alive. Athalia dying would be an annoyance. Damien dying would suck. Fiona dying would hurt and hurt bad. Triss dying would hurt worse, and ruin Julias. Christ, he hadn't even thought of Julias in all this. What would the man do if he found out Beatrice was dead? If he found out it was Jack's fault? Bad, bad bad so bad. Bad—

Oh thank god they were alive. This far back in the tunnel, the wolves' lanterns didn't reach, but Athalia still had her flashlight, was still sitting against the tunnel wall near the rubble, and was still shining it around. Fiona was sitting beside her, injured, beaten, bleeding, and no doubt soon to be bruised, but alive, and smiling.

Triss was sitting over Damien, and as Jack approached, she pulled her wrist away from his mouth.

Shit.

Damien, unconscious, eyes closed and body slumped in Triss's arms, stirred and groaned. A giant hole still cut through his clothes, remnants torn and shredded over his stomach, but the hole in his guts was sealed.

Healing a wound like that would have taken a lot of blood, a lot lot of blood, and a good day's sleep, or week's sleep. Or a few mouthfuls of vampire blood.

“Jack, you're alive.” Triss picked Damien up and carried him over to the wall to set him beside Fiona. “Fuck, we've been trying to just get the fuck up for the past ten minutes.”

He looked between the Uratha and the Begotten. None of them seemed to care that Triss had just given Damien some of her blood. They must not have known then. That was good, saved them from having a horribly awkward situation.

“Yeap, alive. You're all alive too.” He walked up to her, and hugged her. “Fucking hell. Damn thing chased me and then we were in a sewer drainage shaft, and then it was beating the Uratha and—”

“And this little twerp skydived right onto its head and killed the Azlu.” Clara smirked and shook her head as she hooked an arm around him. Thankfully, avoiding the broken shoulder. The bones were aligning themselves, but it'd take sleep to set them healed.

“Really? You, mister Ventrue?” Triss hugged him again, arms fighting for space on his body with Clara.

“Girls, please, I have so many broken ribs and a fucked shoulder.”

“Ha, sorry.” Triss backed off and got back to the wall of rubble. The spider had torn through it, so a pretty damn large hole was open. Still a lot of rubble around and in their way, but it was cleared enough they could walk through it if they wanted.

But not yet. Clara let go of Jack's shoulder, and he walked over to crouch down by the two Begotten.

“Fiona, I think you'll have your work cut out for you in the monster world. This thing was fucking terrifying.”

Athalia snorted and shook her head. “That wasn’t a monster, that was some fucking animal. A weird animal, not entirely flesh.”

Clara nodded but said nothing, only combed her braids back as she paced. Guess she didn’t like sharing details about what these things were.

“I’m awright,” Fiona said, reaching out to touch Jack’s arm. “Need a week or two in bed though, heal some of this shit.”

“Tell me about it.” Jack nodded, pat her on the arm in return, and looked over at Damien again. He’d drunk Triss’s blood, enough of it to heal a huge wound like that.

Julias had warned him about it, about the addiction, and the Vinculum. The love, the adoration, the devotion that came with it. But it took more than one dose, right? Took three, according to his sire. Three doses, but ... was a belly full of it a single dose? Triss must have given him a good amount to heal a wound like that; though, Jack knew it was only healed on the surface. Damien would need days, maybe weeks to heal from a wound like that, even if the man had half a century under his belt.

He glanced Triss’s way, and she winced when she looked back over her shoulder and caught it. Ok, they could deal with that later. For now, look for Natasha.

“We uh ... we should probably keep an eye open and ear to the ground for any more of those Azlu,” he said.

Clara shook her head. “One makes sense, two adult Azlu sharing a tunnel has never been heard of. If there’s a third, well, we’re all fucked. But, yeah, keep our eyes open.” The werewolf walked over to Athalia and held out her hand. The monster handed the flashlight over with a grunt.

Armed with a flashlight, the two vampires and werewolf continued past over the rubble. And found another wall of rubble.

“Shit, Fiona, I uh ... think we could use your help. Place is collapsing in here.” Not that sticking a bunch of webbing to the underside of a collapsing ceiling was going to make it safe, but it was better than nothing.

“Aye, I’m coming.” The redhead came up over the mound of rubble into the new area, and sighed with the groans of injury. But even injured, she braced herself with feet apart, pointed both her hands toward the rubble, and unleashed the spider monster inside.

Clara jumped back and stared at Fiona, eyes wide as the horror faded into existence, sharing the same space with the little redhead. She’d seen it before, but Jack guessed you never got used to it; he wasn’t. Like sewing a giant sweater, the huge blade spider limbs poked at the ceiling like needles, each layering white thread along the crumbling concrete. While she did that, the rest of them got to work, rolling down rubble, and letting Fiona stabilize wherever they created space.

The werewolf was strong, even in human form. Not as strong as Triss though, who continued to throw giant rocks that weighed as much as Jack. Maybe not with as much energy though, and Jack caught her grimacing more than a few times to lift something she could toss before. Drained, from saving Damien’s life no doubt. She was probably starving.

Sure enough, as they opened up a hole at the top of the rubble, they found hands in there to greet them.

“Art! Matt!” Clara slapped a rock, and reached in to grab one of the hands sticking through. “God damn you fucking assholes, the fuck is the matter with you? You knew better than to come down here without the rest of us.”

The hand pulled back and a face stuck against the hole, Matt's face. Comical.

“Sorry! Tash wanted to prove this Fiona girl's innocence, and some other stuff. So we came down to help her.”

Tash. Certainly getting friendly with her. Well that was cool, a nice change of pace from Uratha and Kindred getting in each other's way.

Jack smirked and gestured down to Fiona. “Mission succeeded. And two Azlu dead, though one of them went full swarm mode and escaped.”

“... two?” Matt's eyes opened wide, and he pulled his head back from the hole to look behind him. “Kid says there were two.”

“Yeah.” Clara grabbed some of the rocks and started sliding them down while Fiona kept at the ceiling. “Pretty fucking weird right? Whole fucking thing is fucked. David will probably have something to say though.” Every so often they heard rumbling, and heard some rocks crack or shift above their heads as they moved more of the rubble down.

“C-Careful!” A squeaky little voice came through, and soon Natasha's head popped up to look through the hole. “We ... we couldn't dig out, cause the ceiling started t-t-to collapse.”

“Shit.” Triss touched the ceiling of the tunnel where it connected with the wall of rubble. “Yeah looks like it's being held up by the shit we're tearing down.”

“Awright, guess I've got work that needs doing.” Fiona, panting and almost falling over, pointed her hands up at the ceiling and started laying more webs. And more, and more.

Art brought his head to the hole, and blinked as he watched the spider goddess work. “Well no wonder everyone thought you were Azlu. Look like there’s a spider monster thing inside you. Should see a doctor about that.”

“Sounds awfully coincidental doesn’t it?” Clara said.

“Or the spiders are getting smart.” Art sighed and stepped away from the hole so only darkness remained, at least until Natasha came back up with her flashlight.

“Who came?” she said.

“Triss, Damien and me. And Fiona.” Jack nodded and gestured to Fiona as she worked. “Ran into the werewolves while we were down here, digging for you guys. But there was another collapse, and one of the Azlu was trapped in there. Everything went sideways. And—” Clara flicked out her foot to get him in the shin with the toe of her boot. Right, foot in mouth. Don’t mention Stephanie. “We managed to kill them.”

“We?” Natasha raised a brow at him. “Thought w-we were supposed ... t-to stay out of it?”

Triss laughed and shook her head. “Didn’t have much choice. It jumped us and tried to kill us on sight. Damien nearly died.” The Nosferatu tossed Jack a quick glance. Enough for him to know to keep his mouth shut about that too. He’d talk to her later about it, but for now no one needed to know what she’d done.

Natasha nodded, and sighed. “Y-You shouldn’t have ... shouldn’t have come down here.”

“We had too many reasons not to. Finding you was a big one,” Jack said. “Almost called Jessy, but I figured she might make things worse.”

Natasha smiled at him through the hole. “You came d-down here for me?”

“Friends do shit like this, apparently.” Jack reached for what seemed like a safe rock to move, and slid it down the rubble.

“Jessy is going to k ... k-kill me.” She chuckled, a tiny sound in her cage. “About now, she hasn’t gotten my m-message, and is about to go on a war path ... looking for me.”

“Then we better get ye out of there.” Fiona put up another web, and gave the ceiling a few taps with one of those massive spider legs. Enough to make Jack shiver, seeing them, seeing what the spider legs could do when controlled by something that wanted to kill you with them.

With some time and patience, a rock here, a web there, they created a hole big enough for the little vampire girl. Creating a hole big enough for Arturo took another thirty minutes, and a hole for Matthew took another thirty minutes. It was not a pleasant hour and a half of worrying about a tunnel collapsing on their heads, and by the time they were done, everyone was tired; Fiona was destroyed. She reached out to put her hand on the wall, and started to limp her way back to the first wall of rubble. Poor girl couldn’t even climb it, and Triss smiled at the redhead before jumping over to help her.

“Hungry,” Fiona said. “And tired.”

“Well I got nowhere to be. Let’s get you back to Athalia, and the three of us can head back to Azamel’s. See what she can do.”

“Is Azamel ... nice?”

“Not even a little,” Triss said. Fiona snorted on a chuckle, and hugged her arm around Triss’s shoulders as the taller woman leaned down to hook her arm under Fiona's. "Hey Jack, can you check on Damien? Maybe get him some place safe?"

Jack nodded, a lingering second of eye contact carrying some weight. Check and see if the man was suffering the Vinculum as well, right. Better that she wasn't around for that.

Jack, Clara, Natasha, and her two friends followed after them through the hole. Sure enough Triss had Athalia's arm wrapped over her shoulder too, and she helped both limping women along out of the tunnels. Natasha tried to walk closer to the Uratha, to move with them like friends would, but Jack grabbed her shoulder and shook his head.

"Wha—"

He brought a finger to his lips. Clara kept walking, and the two wolves kept walking with her without breaking stride, just like a marching family. Good, gave them some distance.

Once the wolves had disappeared beyond the turn of the tunnel, Jack motioned toward Damien sitting against the wall. Natasha still had her flashlight; Athalia took Jack's with her. He really disliked that woman. Sighing, he leaned down over Damien and checked the man up and down, pulled aside where the flap of his shirt exposed his stomach, and moved his limbs around a little to make sure everything was connected and solid. Ready for transport.

Just as he started to pick the man up, the sound of rock cracking against metal rang through the tunnel. Curses followed, some yelling, some shouting, and a few more thrown objects.

"... Stephanie died to the creature," he said.

"... oh." The tiny Mekhet rubbed her arms as she hugged herself, and looked down the tunnel, the tunnel they'd have to walk through in order to leave. "Should ... should we wait?"

“I get the impression they’d be more annoyed if we stuck around.” Nodding to no one, he scooped Damien up into his arms and slid the man over his good shoulder. Damien wasn’t a large man, and even a Ventrue, a young one like Jack, could still muster some vampire strength to carry him.

And carry him he did, silent as a monk as he walked past the werewolves. They were sitting around the corpse, squatting or kneeling, and Avery was giving a speech. Well, maybe speech was too strong a word, but she was saying something about Stephanie, something powerful, enough to have the rest of the pack nodding.

And she gestured to Jack as he walked past, and without stopping to call his attention, made comment about how he was the one who killed the second Azlu, or at least killed its body. That earned some glances from everyone, weird glances, raised eyebrows, shock, confusion, and after a few seconds, what Jack could only imagine was an animal’s form of respect. Horrible way to get it, the wolves looking over the body of their comrade, their family member, but they gave it nonetheless.

It wasn’t long before him and Natasha were past the wolves, and into the lit tunnels where Nosferatu hung out, where Damien liked to hide, where he was at least slightly sure they wouldn’t be jumped by anymore spider monsters. They found an old platform, a place where he and Natasha could sit down, and lay Damien down beside them.

“I’d rather he wakes up before I leave him back at one of his hideouts,” he said. “Or I’ll have to take him back to my place.”

Natasha nodded and smirked down at the unconscious man. Well, unconscious but not really; torpor wasn’t about brain activity, it was a whole body healing and sleeping experience. He’d wake up once he’d healed enough.

“He ... he came with you.”

“He did.” Jack glanced between the two Mekhet a few times, and made it obvious he was doing so.

“ ... Damien and I ... it is a little weird.”

“Yeah, you two have this weird thing going on and I can’t quite place it.”

“I ... I told D-D-Daniel to spare him.”

“And I told Antoinette to spare him. Aren’t we a couple of saps?” he said, smiling. It got a smile out of her too.

“I t-told him we’d talk after, but ... we ... we never really did. I avoided it, and he d-d-did too. He ... probably feels guilty, about helping Lucas kidnap me.”

Oh, that.

“Yeah I’d feel guilty about that too. But, I can imagine doing whatever Viktor told me to, if he’d taken it upon himself to order me around. Ever heard of the Milgram experiment?”

“Mmhmm.”

“I was out of my element and told that this man was my boss, my boss’s boss. That he was basically my new general and if I didn’t do exactly what he said, I’d end up in the shitter, or ash. If he told me to do something horrible, in a situation like that experiment, I can guarantee I’d do it.” Jack motioned down to the sleeping Kindred beside him. “I can only imagine how fucked up that is when taken in a religious context.”

Natasha nodded and sighed some more, pulling her knees up to her chest and looking out to the train tracks below where the platform ended. “I guess being around him makes me a bit nervous. I’ll have to get p-p-p-past that.”

“So, you’ve been down here for over a day now? Must be hungry. You go on without me. I’ll get him back to his hidey-hole and make sure he wakes up fine.” Thankfully she wasn’t asking about how Damien healed from his injuries; he’d left the description vague for a reason. He couldn’t see himself lying to Natasha, but avoiding some details was at least doable.

“Ok ... thanks.” She got up, dusted herself off, and smiled down at him again. “N-Not hungry, the wolves let me feed.”

“Really? What was that like?”

“Very ... energizing.”

---

---

~~Damien~~

He awoke to a pleasant sound, a familiar sound, the near silence of concrete, but the distance and gentle hum of vibrations moving through the earth and metal. The drip drop of water leaking from a pipe rang like a church bell. His favorite hideout.

So he was alive then. He looked down at his stomach and touched the wound. Tender, very tender, and pain shot through him as he struggled to sit up. No, don’t do that, lie down and rest. He recognized the pain signs well enough to do that.

“Awake,” a voice said, someone sitting beside him.

“ ... Jack. Glad to see you live as well.”

“Ha, barely. But both Azlu are dead and so are our friends. One of the Uratha died though, Stephanie.”

“Stephanie ... Right, I remember her. Aggressive woman. Quick to accuse Fiona.”

Jack put up his hands. “Let’s not speak ill of the dead.”

Damien nodded, and set his head back to the concrete. Everything was alright then. Mission successful.

“ ... wait, how am I healed so? That creature, it ... you saw it, it’d take me weeks to heal from that, if I even survived.”

“About that.” Jack, sitting on his butt on the concrete with one leg on its side, the other with knee up to his chest, rocked back and forth a little as he rubbed his buzzed hair. “I didn’t see how it happened; I got separated from the group. But when I finally got back to you guys ... Triss had fed you her blood.”

“ ... no.”

“Yeah.” The boy winced and nodded a few more times, sealing the truth in with each grimace. “She probably thought it was too risky asking a Begotten to do it. Who knows how we’d react to drinking monster blood? And we know vampire blood does better than human blood.”

Damien raised his hands up to look at them, before letting one fall to rest on his forehead, the other collapsing to the floor.

He could already feel it, already feel little nudges in his mind. How was Triss doing? Was she ok? He should go talk to her. Remember the tank top you saw her wearing? Could see the piercings of her nipples and everything. You should go see her, see if she needs help with anything.

He’d be punching the floor right now if he thought his insides wouldn’t rip apart, or his spine disintegrate. He didn’t like Triss. She was brazen and brutish, and unlike Jessy, had the nerve to consider herself as deeper, more emotionally self aware, lending to all the stereotypes of brooding and depressed; that all conveniently went poof the moment someone’s dick got between her legs.

No, no, stop. Stop, this isn't you, swinging from one emotion to the next about her.

"... how much blood did she give me?"

"Enough to heal a giant hole that'd been blown through your guts and out your back, spine and organs included."

A lot, then.

"Not ... completely ... healed."

Jack snorted on a laugh. "Maybe with another two hundred years under your belt. Viktor healed from some pretty ridiculous shit." The kid shivered and shook his head. "But, yeah ... I didn't know how to tell you, but I figured I should. Fiona and Athalia saw it, but they probably don't know why we're not supposed to do that, or even that we're not supposed to."

Well, at least there was that. No pity glances from Fiona.

"And Natasha?"

"She doesn't know how we healed you. And to hear it from her, werewolf blood is quite potent, so maybe she thought we gave you some of that." He shrugged, got up, and started to pace. Not much room for pacing in the little hideaway, the pipes and old, dead computers built into metal casings provided little in the way of living space. "But it might come up. If she asks me, I'll say Triss took care of it and leave it at that."

"Half truths are worse than lies." He sighed, sighed, and sighed some more, before holding out his hands in front of himself again and flexing them, analyzing the shape of his fingers clutching the air. "But, thank you."

“You may want to talk to her anyway. Not about this of course, and I’m sure Triss will keep it a secret. But Natasha and you ... well.” A shrug and nod later, Jack reached for the door and readied to open it. “You Mekhet really suck at approaching your problems head on.”

“ ... we do at that.”

Jack laughed. Damien didn’t, lest his insides rupture, but he managed a small, and a tiny wave for the man.

“Thanks,” Damien said, “for getting me home.”

“Dude, this isn’t a home. Julias tells me Maria is going to help you out? She could hook you up with a real home easy enough.”

A real home? The thought had never occurred to him. So used to sleeping in underground holes and hiding in shadows, it’d become second nature after fifty years of it.

“ ... I shall ask her.”

~~Beatrice~~

Fuck she was tired. What a night, what a fucking horrible, bad, weird night. Her laptop was still at Jack’s being charged, no doubt fully charged by now, but the sun would be coming up soon and she just wanted to get somewhere to sleep.

For a second she considered going back to the Circle, telling everyone what happened, filling in Jacob on the details. Man loved his details, the scheming asshole. Devil’s in the details he’d say, blah blah.

But, as she ran the memories of Damien’s skewering through her mind, a chill danced on her spine and skin. No, she didn’t want to go back to the circle to sleep in her new home. Awesome as it was, she wanted something warmer. She wanted to let the day knock her out while in Julias's arms. Maybe ask Julias to brainwash her an easy meal, someone she could drink, and then get under the blankets with her man, get comfy in the nook of his shoulder, and fall asleep.

After sex, of course. God damn she was tired, but god damn tonight had been such wild ride, part of her felt energized. She'd jumped a giant spider monster, fucking tore into it, gotten dirty with its blood — still on her — and had hurt it. She'd hurt some horrible monstrosity thing that came straight out of a nightmare. Well, not technically, according to her new monster friend, but still, the thing was nightmare-ish and terrifying. She pitied the poor sap who it'd possessed; if you could call it possession.

And all that post-life-threatening-situation-but-you-kicked-its-ass energy made her want to go back to Julias and snuggle into his arms. Let the energy dissipate, fade away before the sun came up, Julias's chest pressed to her back, arms wrapped around her ... maybe lying on top of her, giving her that deep grind, balls deep inside her, and she'd be soaking—

Fucking god she had a problem. Couldn't go five minutes without thinking about sex.

Course all of that tasty sex goodness would have to wait. She still had Fiona hooked with one arm, Athalia with the other, and she was carrying them to Azamel's place. Azamel, grandma monster, the weird person in all this. Fiona, Triss understood. The werewolves, she understood, especially now. And she understood the Kindred and their games. But Azamel, the fuck was her game?

"I think, after this, I'm needing to find a boyfriend," Fiona said.

Ha, wasn't just Triss then, thinking about boyfriends.

"Cute girl like you doesn't have one?"

“No, it’s ... it’s hard.”

“What’s hard?”

“Being around folk, humans. It’s...” The redhead sighed, and her body grew heavy hanging off of Beatrice’s shoulders. Course heavy was subjective and the girl was as light as a feather to a Nosferatu, but still, felt like the girl was getting weighed down by something. Which was very odd for Fiona, normally so damn uplifting and fun, Triss figured she was full of helium.

“Kindred don’t usually date kine, humans,” Beatrice said. “Recipe for disaster. Sometimes we change them into ghouls, so they live forever and can be a persistent source of food. And sometimes we date them.” Though, far as she knew, if there were any Kindred ghoul relationships in Dolareido, they were strictly sexual. Romantically, it’d be a pretty weird thing, considering what drinking Kindred blood did to a kine’s mind.

Considering what it did to Kindred mind’s too, Triss. Fuck, she was going to have to talk to Damien, apologize or something. Saved his second life, sure, but that didn’t change she’d done something really, really fucked up to him.

“I cannae do that, that’s nae a thing Begotten can do. And with humans, it’s ... I ... I’m so hungry. If there was someone I could punish, someone Vrall could punish right now, I’d ... I’d...” She shook her head and let it hang all the more.

Judging from the sounds of it, Fiona had done some pretty bad things when Vrall got hungry.

“You need to learn to feed correctly,” Athalia said with a snort. “You’ll get us all killed attracting unwanted attention.”

Triss twitched a little at that, unwanted attention. Jacob mentioned the concept of hunters to her before, humans who knew about vampires, or werewolves, or she supposed monsters. Hell monsters were an even older concept, more well known idea than vampires or werewolves. Been around since nightmares had been around, Triss imagined. And so too were humans who thought they could fight those nightmares.

Hard to imagine a human standing up to the spider monster hiding inside Fiona, but humans had this nasty habit of being really, really smart when properly motivated.

Fiona shook her head as she turned to look at the woman next to her. “Vrall ... she ... doesn’t ken that. She’s from a time when folk feared her, but also worshiped her.”

“Then this will be rough, because you’re going to have to learn how to not kill every target. You’ll have to learn how to take a sip, not guzzle. A nibble, not devour the whole thing. You need to learn to accept a little hunger as a normal, every day thing you’ll have to deal with from now on.”

“How do I do that? I ... Vrall, she needs to punish folk, bad folk, folk who deserve it.”

“Well for starters, instead of killing them, try letting them live.”

Fiona groaned but nodded. “I’ll ... I’ll have to eat almost every day, if I can only hurt folk, nae kill them.”

“Welcome to the club. You gorge yourself, and you’ll invite trouble ... but, stop eating or starve yourself, and you’ll invite trouble. I don’t know what sort of insane history Vrall has, but you’re in the modern world now, and you have to find a balance. Too much, and someone will show up to kill you, your horror, in her sleep. Too little, and your horror is going to spread nightmares to the edge of the city.”

“ ... what do ye feed on?” Fiona said. “Ye’re Eshmaki like me.”

Athalia sighed and shook her head. “Let’s talk when we’re back with Azamel.”

“Yeah yeah, keep your secrets.” Triss shrugged, which lead to comical results with both girls hanging off of her. “Whatever, we got out of that shithole alive, so ain’t nothing you can say to kill my mood.”

Fiona laughed too, but it died off as she let her weight drag again. “Noo don’t tempt fate like that!”

---

---

~~Natasha~~

She considered waiting for Matt and Art. They spent over twenty-four hours together, trapped in that pit, thinking they were dead, goners. Not long enough to get all weepy and think their lives were over. But long enough for her to talk about personal stuff, tell them about Vivi, and how she regretted siring her; too young and immature to have a childe. They laughed at her, said she was an idiot, and other indirect compliments like that.

She enjoyed their time together. A lot. She hadn’t laughed like that since she’d gotten to know Jessy. They were a couple of fun, silly but intelligent guys. Who were good at cards.

The memory of playing cards in the dark, with their flashlight their only source of light, and their doom on their doorstep, was too funny, and she laughed again as she sneaked out of the abandoned section of the subway and back onto the streets. And of course the moment she did, her phone beeped with a lot of messages. Jack, and Jessy trying to get in contact with her.

First things first. She messaged Jessy back, said she was fine, that she’d fill her in tomorrow night. Then a message for Jack that he’d get once he was out of the tunnels: thanks for everything. The kid was proving to be everything Julias said he would be, and more. She'd have to visit Julias later, and thank him.

Julias and Jessy, her old companions, her fellow right hands. Now she was hanging with werewolves and monsters instead. Well, not entirely true. She was having orgies with Jessy, so that was ... well, even more weird. She laughed to herself as she stepped into the crowd of South Side, and began a long walk home. What was it she couldn't quite settle her mind on, something in her brain running hamster wheels and making her turn recent events over and over again, in random order at that.

Nearly dying might have something to do with it. Meeting new friends and making huge changes in her life probably did more.

She looked down at her phone, and settled beside a lamppost as people walked past. Vivienne's number. She used to stare at it and sigh to herself, about how that relationship had been weakened by the embrace, and broken by Vivi joining Lucas for a while. Broken beyond repair when Natasha left the Invictus?

She sent her a text. Something short, nice, simple: hope you're doing ok.

She put the phone away. Not going to stare at it waiting for the response, nope. She wasn't that person now. She'd grown up. A little. Maybe. Smiling, she shook off her shoulders and headed back to her apartment. She'd tell the Prince about what happened tomorrow night, and Jessy, and maybe tell them about her two new friends Art and Matt.

Arturo Ibarra and Matthew Wilson. Not a word to them as she walked past them in the tunnels, and saw everyone sitting around Stephanie's body. Barely a body anymore. Split in half from the skull down, and the spider creature's weird scythe arms weren't sharp enough to do that cleanly. The werewolves had been mourning a pile of flesh. Sickening. Depressing.

Did she know them well enough to comfort them? No idea, no idea at all. For all she knew, the werewolves would get over their friend's death in a single day, or less. Or maybe they'd respect her death with song, and be glad for it to be in battle, on the hunt, like something an ancient Spartan might do.

She nodded to herself, and headed home. Sun would be up soon, and she was too old to be caught unawares by impending sunrise. But, as she walked the path home, she brought out her phone again — not checking for a message from Vivi, nope nope — and updated her to-do list: get Matt and Art some phones.

She wondered how Antoinette would react to the news. Not that she didn't probably already know; she generally knew everything going on in her city. But, she wouldn't be too upset, right?

Chapter 37

~~Antoinette~~

“Did you truly think I would not find out? Or that I would not care?” Antoinette said, staring at the five idiots in her office. The floor below the Primogen meeting, this room was similar in its cold, simple colors and shape, the giant window behind her for a wall, and one of her chairs that rivaled thrones. Before her, a desk, simple and void of anything except a laptop. The lights, white and directed to create shadows from those who stand beneath them, to shrink any who stood before her and make them appear minuscule compared to the desk, let alone her and her throne.

“I—”

“Beatrice Damar, I did not invite you here to talk. I invited you here to listen. And you will listen or I will rip your jaw from your idiot skull. Understood?”

Beatrice winced, and stood a little straighter. She was used to such grueling lectures from Garry, when she worked for the Carthians, Antoinette was sure. The difference was, Antoinette would do it.

The five idiots included Damien, Fiona, and Beatrice. And unfortunately, Natasha and Jack as well. Fiona could not wipe the grin off her face, but it seemed to be the girl’s natural state; at odds with her existence as a literal nightmare.

“If I ask a question that is not obviously rhetorical, you may answer it. Until then, you five will be silent.” She leaned back in her chair, folded one leg over the other, and turned so her side was to the squirming group. Her nearest hand rested on the desk, and she tapped her index finger against it. “Dolareido is in a time of flux.

Since the purge, the covenants have begun to demilitarize, in a sense. The petty squabbles of the Invictus and Carthians notwithstanding, Kindred violence has been decreasing steadily. Not only the violence, but the spying, the deceit, the Danse Macabre, have all lessened.” And it was true. Her fruitful schemes to eliminate Viktor and Tony were, hopefully, things of the past.

But every time she took a moment to breathe, let her guard down, madness threw itself at her door. Lucas returned, but his return was short lived. His death, followed shortly by Jack’s confession of love, had painted the perfect picture. Her enemies dead, her romantic interest budding into love, and all the reasons in the world to simply relax and enjoy the things she had long forgotten how to enjoy.

But, as if her happiness summoned chaos, like blood in the water, wolves and monsters alike arrived to reek havoc on her city. And the five idiots in front of her were only making things worse.

“And yet, for all my work to create a utopia for our kind, and even visitors of other races, there are those who refuse to ... let the ripples settle.” She gestured out to those in front of her, these fools with no respect for her goals.

The idiot children were not convinced. If anything, they seemed confused about her anger. She slammed her fist down against the table, and all five of them jumped in place.

“The Uratha are juggernauts of animal instinct, with all the subtlety of a wrecking ball. They wished for us to stay clear of the tunnels under Devil’s Corner, to let them hunt their prey, for a reason. You five! Your carelessness, your interference. You could have reignited a conflict long buried.”

Jack and Natasha both stepped forward, at the same time.

“We wanted to—”

“We were trying to help Fio—”

“Fiona deserved a—”

“And then Natasha went missing and—”

“Some Uratha were with me and—”

This, from her lover, and her assistant and apprentice. No, this would not do.

Antoinette got up from her chair, and walked over to the now petrified group of troublemakers. Natasha and Jack were a foot ahead of them, and with a few feet separating them, they gave Antoinette a delightful angle for her to express her rage.

Her hands snapped out at the wide-eyed, frozen two, and grabbed their jowls. Her fingers hooking under their jaws, her thumb between their teeth and pushing down on their tongues, she brought both tiny Kindred to their knees. The look of panic in their eyes was signal to continue lecturing.

“Perhaps you think yourselves familiar enough with the Prince to speak out of turn?” She glared at each one closely, leaning in, and squeezed down on the mouths of their skulls. They squirmed, wriggled, in pain and very much uncomfortable with the position. Good. “Rashness and courage, stupidity and bravery, there is a fine line and you two stepped over it. If things had gone even slightly differently, we could have more dead Kindred like so long ago. But Avery’s new found prudence, reflected in her choosing Jack as the intermediary, is the first time I have ever witnessed these wolves display even an ounce of wisdom. And yet!” She squeezed harder, and both Kindred whimpered as she shook their heads like dolls. “And yet the very man she chose, violated her single request. And my fellow dragon, my subordinate, a representative of my covenant and myself, was half the reason for such madness!”

She raised her eyes to glare at the other three. Fiona had finally stopped smirking, and both Damien and Triss had taken small steps back.

She had demanded the five fools present themselves to her, after Avery had visited her to describe what had happened. Mature of her to come herself, to explain herself how the Kindred had sought Fiona's innocence, sought Natasha's safety. She had explained Jack's bravery as well, how the boy had saved their lives.

Bravery, or lunacy. Antoinette grit her teeth as she glared at her five guests. Best to squash this insolence now, before she let the Kindred under her rule turn into wild vigilantes, or other forms of courageousness risen to stupidity. The Primogen were not invited, and she would deal with their protests later. She was Prince, she had the right to demand audience with anyone she chose.

"Damien," she said, raising her eyes from the two at her mercy, "I understand you have made a contract with Maria Turio. How will she respond to this?"

The man considered, eyes falling, before he looked up to meet hers. No doubt meeting her gaze filled him with many unpleasant memories. And him her, of a sword cutting off her limbs.

"Madam Turio would ... tell me I was impulsive and foolish, for going into the tunnels. If I was her subordinate, she'd ... probably punish me for risking a war with the Uratha."

If only the boy knew how badly he would have been punished. Perhaps he could ask Natasha later, if Antoinette did not kill the girl herself.

"A poor start, to your new role with the Lancea et Sanctum."

He winced again and looked down. Perhaps that would bring him in line.

She threw her glare at Beatrice. Jacob would not punish her; he was the sort to let life lessons do the teaching, even if it meant killing the taught. A short-sighted approach. Antoinette had no qualms with punishing the Nosferatu herself, and Beatrice knew it.

Slowly, Antoinette turned her gaze to Fiona as well, and glared down at the small Scot. Not as small as the little Mekhet in her grip, but small nonetheless, and she squirmed and lowered her gaze as Antoinette glowered at her.

“And you, Begotten, your kind are on thin ice as is. You have killed many in your time here, and lo and behold, some monstrosity took advantage of your carelessness. What will you do if hunters appear at your door, with fire and acid and weapons of this age more than capable of dealing with whatever defense you and your lair may provide?”

“I ... um, Azamel is teaching me to feed better. It will nae be a problem anymore!”

“See that it is not. Far too much attention has been brought to my city, and the Masquerade is in danger. Do any of you infantile delinquents realize the danger of discovery? What would happen if our kind’s existence were brought to light? Across the globe, the kine outnumber us a hundred thousand to one. You think my purge upon that villain Lucas was an act of brutality and violence, Damien? You have no idea what will happen if the Masquerade is broken.” She squeezed harder, enough to make the two Kindred in her grasp whimper. Whimper turned to gasp as she lifted Natasha and Jack, by their mouths. Only the strength of their Kindred bodies kept their jaws from ripping clear of their skulls until they grabbed her wrists to keep that from happening. “So we will do all we can to preserve the Masquerade. You could have ignited aggression from the Uratha, and if pushed into their death rages, those wolves would not hesitate to take this battle to the streets and risk everything I have worked for. Instead of stirring a hornet’s nest and begging for chaos, you juvenile miscreants will only do as your covenant leaders say from now on. Do I make myself clear?”

The four Kindred nodded, even the two with their jaws firmly in her grip and hands holding onto her wrists for dear life.

“And you Fiona, you will learn to hide your ravenous appetite under the tutelage of Azamel and Athalia, or I will paint the walls with your blood as a warning to other monsters to control your hunger. Understood?”

“Understood!”

“Now get out of my sight.” She threw the boy and girl away from her, and they fell back onto their asses as she glared her red stare upon them.

Fiona scampered out, Triss and Damien following behind her with attempts to walk calmly ruined by the hop in their step. Jack and Natasha picked themselves up and ran after them, stumbling on the way. As everyone disappeared through the doors, Jack paused at the entrance and looked over his shoulder to her.

She offered him rage, frustration, disappointment, and scorching fire with her gaze. He winced, head drooping, eyes falling, and closed the door behind him.

For a brief moment, a single flash of instantaneous regret, she wanted to chase after him, apologize, and hold his head to her bosom. It faded, and instead, she paced left and right in front of her desk before at last walking over to the window and netting her fingers together behind her back. She watched down from her tower, watched the odd group of mismatched friends leave, and took a useless breath as she organized her thoughts.

Why was she so livid? She could feel the heat through her dried Kindred veins, coursing vitae through her limbs until the beast inside her roared its power, its rage and need for violence. She suppressed with practiced restraint, but that did not change that the beast within, usually steel and ice before the frustrations of her position, was boiling in a frenzy. It was her acting juvenile, or at least without wisdom, yelling at these children like a parent who does not understand how to temper their emotions, or use experience to guide outcomes.

But every time she imagined Jack dying to monsters in her tunnels, the fire returned all the more. Old memories, just faded and blurry things, danced in her mind, of others she cared for dying at the hands of others, bloody and ruined. Each memory, old and beyond her ability to draw into exact detail, taunted her, mocked her, and laughed at her misery.

She could not let it happen again.

---

She sat in her fitting room, deep in her tower, and fumed. The smoke shot from her ears, lit by the fire in her eyes and the glare they held as she stared at the mirror.

“Mistress, please, you’re so stressed you’re going to ruin your hair.”

“Julee you are well aware Kindred suffer no such issue.”

Her and her two precious ghouls, her sitting in front of a mirror in one of her comfiest, most luxurious leather chairs, while the girls stood behind her and combed her hair.

“Still! You’re so angry it’s going to ruin my hair,” Ashley said, leaning down over her shoulder to smile at her before resuming her work. Work was perhaps a strong word, as the two girls were combing her hair merely to relax her; and relax her it did. The gentle tug on the scalp, the waves of it as the comb moved through her hair, how the girls gripped it to keep it steady as they removed any knots.

“That idiot boy nearly ended his own life on a suicidal attempt to prove Fiona’s innocence. And Natasha, her as well!” Antoinette seethed, and tapped both hands’ fingers upon her chair’s arms.

This was not her usual anger. In the past, she would glare upon those who trespassed against her, and declare her punishment with all the passion of the reaper himself: none. The city was hers, and with cold, unfeeling hands, she would bend it to her will until peace was had. Peace of the gun, but peace.

The past year had shredded her composure, the past few months especially. She knew it, and her ghouls knew it. On more than one occasion, they had commented on her new attitude, how she had more fire, less ice. It was true, quite true, and as she let her mind wander over the changes in her life, she knew why. Her relationship with Jack in conjunction with the chaos being dumped at her city’s gates, the two forces combined had frazzled her. For all her wisdom and self control, she was not managing her circumstances well.

“I know that look,” Ashley said, coming about to lean her hip against the counter. Deep in her tower, the black marble motif was commonplace, and the counter reflected it. The mirror was built into the wall itself, massive and circled with dragons of silver. “That’s the ‘I’m going to need to get serious about this’ look.”

“You do not understand, my precious. A host of children risked the aggression of brutish creatures, without so much as a mention to their leaders. If their idiot pursuits had gone horribly, it could very well have lead to war with the Uratha.” And the wolves had all the tact of an avalanche. They relied on their lunar madness, a mysterious condition that fell upon any kine that witnessed a werewolf in their transformed state.

Hardly an effective means of defense in the modern age. Supposedly, the werewolves also valued the secrecy of their existence, but she had seen no such control when Simon had visited her city.

Was she the only one with the foresight to consider the future? To consider what the world would be like in a hundred years, when the Earth's kine found the stars, when space stations became normal, when the secrets of the night would be threatened by the growth of technology. Would the beast inside them all find a way to evolve, or would Kindred be at the mercy of science?

The Uratha and Begotten, she could understand ignoring the future, to a degree. They were not immortal. But her fellow Kindred should know better, and she would drill that wisdom into their idiot skulls if it was the last thing she would do.

"But..." Julee continued to comb Antoinette's hair, but her voice wavered the way she did when she wanted to say something, something Antoinette would undoubtedly not like. "But that ... that sort of stuff, you're normally very methodical and calculating about. This is different."

"Yeah what Julee said." Ashley pulled out a drawer, got some nail polish remover, and took Antoinette's hand before she began treating her fingers. "And we know Jack has something to do with it. You said he nearly died?"

"Avery said ... that the boy defeated the monster." The monster the werewolves themselves could not defeat. If there was one thing those animals were good at, it was killing, and for them to fail where Jack succeeded was a scary thought. The risk that boy must have put himself under.

"Sounds to me like you're just worried about Jack. Totally understandable."

Antoinette sighed, leaned her head forward to rest her chin upon a palm, elbow to the arm of her chair, while Ashley pampered her other hand. A Kindred needed no manicure, no lotion, but nail polish was susceptible to the wears of time as anything else.

“You believe I am being biased.”

“You’re too smart for that,” Ashley said, smirking at her as she started applying the new base coat along her fingernails. “I think anything you said you’d have said even before you met Jack. Just now, you yell it instead of just saying it.”

“Then I am being childish.” Which, all things considered, was a good thing for a Kindred to feel. So long buried in responsibility and ruling of ages, elders often deteriorated into monoliths of unfeeling cruelty, like Viktor. But it was not good for her position as Prince. “And ... in my juvenile frustration, may have offended my darling.”

“Offended?” Julee said.

“I ... may have took him by the jaw, and forced him and Natasha to their knees. And then ... threw them.”

Her two ghouls looked at each other, and sighed.

“That may have hurt his pride a little,” her little Ashley said, nodding as she focused on her nails. “And he is a man. Even Jack must have an ego to hurt.”

“Maybe?” Julee came around to stand more beside the Prince, still combing her hair with her eyes set on her task. “I think Jack will get over that quickly. He’s not nearly as vain as most men.”

Antoinette smirked at her two precious pets. To hear them discuss it, they must have had a wealth of experience with the opposite gender, when in truth Jack was their only true relation with men, beyond some platonic relationships at their university.

“But,” Julee continued, “I think you should definitely talk to him. Let him know you only got so angry cause you love him.”

Ashley nodded as she worked, soon applying blood red to Antoinette’s nails. “And from what you told us, what he did sounded very ... awesome, manly even. Risking his life like that? I don’t know, maybe it was stupid, but I know I’d be swooning if my boyfriend was doing stuff like that.”

Antoinette eyed her pet closely. The ballerina refused to make eye contact with her, instead deciding to focus on her fingers. But she was smiling as she did it.

And with a slow sigh, Antoinette looked to the mirror and watched Julee comb her long white hair. To her dismay, a sneer was on the vampire’s face, a sneer she had been carrying since she had heard what Jack and the others had done. Images of the small man, torn apart and melting into nothing more than a withered husk haunted her, terrified her, struck her paralyzed.

But, perhaps there was something to Ashley’s silly swooning. Jack, her little Ventrue, taking down a beast of such magnitude with his hands? For all his skills and natural talents, he was very young; such a feat was nothing short of exemplary for one his age. And while she wished he would stay safe, she was proud of him.

How stereotypical of her, to wish her man be filled with drive, passion, to accomplish things and acquire power to his name, but also stay safe and in her arms at all times.

She would make it up to him.

~~Damien~~

Well, that went better than he thought it would. Natasha had been surprised by Antoinette’s anger, which surprised Damien considering how blatant the risk of their action had been. Pissing off the Uratha could easily mean dead Kindred, or Masquerade violations, or a host of other problems. Like a collapsed tunnel.

He shrugged to no one and waited outside, after the meeting. He wasn't sure where to go, what to do, or any of the typical garbage of a man with a new life. Felt almost like how he imagined a convict would feel once released. With no immediate, pressing concerns, what now?

Jack and Triss had already left, Triss avoiding eye contact with him, and him avoiding it with her. At least she wasn't rubbing his new problem in his face. If she did, he'd be liable to pin her down and drink her blood for another taste.

God he wanted another taste. He hadn't even been conscious for the first taste, and he wanted another one.

He shook his head and dusted nothing off his shoulders. Just the cravings Damien, it's just the cravings. They'll pass. Do not succumb to such base desires.

Fiona and Natasha came out moments later, and the redhead waved to him as she spotted him leaning against a lamppost. He returned it with a much smaller wave, a far more subtle smile, and stood a little straighter as the two of them walked over to him.

“Natasha wants to talk to ye!” Fiona said, nudging Natasha forward with her shoulder.

Damien raised a brow and looked down at the two women. Small Fiona, and super tiny Natasha. Fiona had no trouble with eye contact; if anything, she craved it. Whenever Damien met her gaze, she looked up at him with her beaming, golden eyes, as if all the horrible things that had just happened to him didn't. This girl was a nightmare incarnate? Still too hard to believe, even after seeing it all with his own eyes, and tasting jungle water.

“Vola,” he said.

“ ... D-Damien. Um, what’s your last name?”

“Burksen.”

“Burksen. Ok.” Natasha nodded, and stepped in a little closer, eyes down, every bit of her body language dripping of awkwardness. “Fiona, c-can I talk to Damien alone?”

“Awright. I will see ye two later then?” She waved and headed off, jeans and brown leather jacket a complete mismatch for her surroundings, this deep in South Side where suits and cocktail dresses were the norm. Damien had found some nicer clothes to wear for the meeting; he didn’t need to piss the Prince off anymore than he already was.

Natasha waved after her, a small one like Damien liked to do. “She ... she’s a lot of fun, isn’t she? I can’t ... c-c-can’t believe she’s what she says she is.”

“Yeah, I couldn’t either. But I walked in that lair myself, saw the two moons and the jungle she calls home. She showed me other parts too, a city of blood that looked identical to Dolareido.” He shivered as he started walking. Seemed like the thing to do, start walking, keep moving as they had the painful conversation he wanted to avoid.

New beginnings, Damien. New beginnings.

“I heard that Maria is ... going t-t-to help you ... with your Lancea et Sanctum b-business.”

“Yeah.” He pulled out Maria Turio’s phone that she gave him. No messages from her at least. Was he supposed to call her, text her, would it even be her answering them, or some of her ghouls or subordinate Kindred?

“I hope she ... d-d-doesn’t betray you too.”

Fuck. He winced as the low blow sliced through his still very sore insides, and he looked down at the little woman walking beside him. Her eyes were hard set and locked onto the large sidewalk, even as the two of them avoided bumping into the kine in their way with practiced ease.

“ ... I am ... sorry, Natasha, about everything, you know.” He glanced up toward the sky. Dolareido was a city of lights, a city that never slept; at least in the business and entertainment district. The stars couldn’t be seen, just buildings, tall buildings and their many windows, with bright lampposts, hundreds of cars driving by at slow speeds, and various night shows or theaters with their front entrances putting on lights. When he looked back down, he found the girl looking at him, and smiling.

“You d-do have nice eyes.”

Nice eyes, right. She’d said that, back when he’d woken from his sleep inside the sheriff’s dungeon.

“So you believe me?”

“ ... I d-do. Just ... wanted to hear it proper. But now you’re working for Maria, and—”

“Maria only betrayed you because she loved Lucas.”

“ ... loved?”

Did she not know? He looked at her as they walked, and raised a brow at the blatant confusion on her face.

“Yes, loved.”

“I ... I’d heard, and my research suggested, but ... I have a hard t-t-time imagining Maria ... loving anything.”

“You worked with her for decades.”

“But she always kept her distance. And ... I d-don’t think she ever really ... accepted me.”

Damien sighed. Guess it wasn’t just him feeling out of place. If Natasha had worked for that woman for so many years, never feeling like Maria accepted her, that must have done damage to her mind. Trying to meet the expectations of your superiors, only to fall flat because of things beyond your control, was a situation he could understand. Similar, if only slightly.

“Well, I guess I’m in the same boat now. I have no idea if she’ll accept me. But then I’m not Invictus, she doesn’t need to.”

“Still, you’ll b-be working with her.”

“ ... yeah.” As a constant reminder of the shit he did for Lucas. Lovely. He sighed and turned a corner, while Natasha went in another direction. “ ... hey, wait a minute.”

“Y-Yeah?” she said, peeking over her shoulder at him. A glint of hope in her eyes too. She wanted to talk to him, and he was making it hard. Or was she?

Two idiot Mekhets who couldn’t talk to other people to save their lives. Stereotypical.

“Come on, I want to show you something.”

---

“Wow!” She pressed her eye to the telescope, and peeked out over the tower edge to stare into the heart of the city. The tower was conveniently located of course, to be able to see into many buildings from its angle and height, many windows, and watch many roads.

“This is one of the sites I use to ... ah, Beatrice would be angry with me, talking about spying on people.” Stop thinking about shark-mouth. Stop it. “I set many telescopes up so I could spy on Dolareido. It’s more difficult to spy on the Carthians though; no skyscrapers in their area.”

“There’s something t-to be said for low tech.” She hummed a few affirmations as she turned the telescope about, eye never leaving it. “The Carthians are d-difficult to spy on, I know. No database to hack, no cameras or other surveillance t-tools to hack either. And, I guess, even a telescope is only useful if you c-can find a good spot for it.”

“Exactly.” Spying on the Invictus was easy for the technically minded. He wasn’t that, but he still knew how to eavesdrop with a telescope.

“You can see J-Jessy’s window!”

“Yeah. Your friend has ... very...”—how to word this, how to word this—“exhibitionist taste.”

Natasha groaned and let one of her arms hang limp beside her, no doubt mentally picturing what he was talking about. “I can see her right now, d-dancing around to some horrible eighties trash rock, and ... d-doing it only in a thong.”

Yeap, that sounded about right for Jessy; no need for her to mentally picture what he was saying then. Right hand of the Invictus, a Kindred who’d entered her ancilla years, and had the weight of billions of dollars and the lives of her subordinates in her hands, using her free time to dance naked in her living room for everyone to see.

“Her ghouls in there too?” he said.

“No, Vincent and them aren’t there.”

“Oh, you know there names? Partaking in some of Jessy’s other extracurricular activities?”

“N-N-No! No I’m ... not.”

Well hell, he’d been kidding, but looking at Natasha from his seat on the tiny roof, he could tell she was trembling in that super anxious sort of way. The sort of trembling he imagined she’d do, her personality type would do, when trying to lie about something they were ashamed of.

“I didn’t realize you had that sort of side to you, Natasha.” Imagining her joining Jessy in her regular orgy fun was a strange image. But, he had to admit, much as he didn’t really think of Natasha in that way, she was a very cute, tiny woman. He may not have thought of her that way, but others must have.

“It’s ... it’s Jessy fault! She f-f-forced me, and ... and you!” Natasha finally pulled her eye away from the telescope to frown at him, sitting down opposite of him atop their small space on the tower. “Fiona says you’re a virgin!”

“Well if we’re going to get all juvenile about this, yes.” Much as he seemed to have offended Natasha, the conversation was proving too funny for him to not smile. Though, mental note, punish Fiona for being such a gossip.

“I ... I’d heard that Lucas ... had a strict policy involving ... Kindred and ghouls.”

“Oh. That.” He sighed, sitting forward and resting his elbows on his knees, hands dangling between. “Yeah, he taught in his ... dogma, that sex with kine, ghouls or otherwise, is prohibited.” He ran some fingers through the hair on the half of his head, and shook it once the pain of the memory eased. “If I can get the Lancea et Sanctum up and running again, a lot of those old lessons, idiotic doctrine, will be left behind.”

“That’s good.” She smiled and sat forward as well, getting more comfortable. “Cause, I mean, J-Jessy was right. I should have more fun. And so should you.”

He rolled his eyes, and thought back to his trip to the tunnels, and Fiona making him grab her breast. It’d been silly, but he had to admit, he liked the feel.

“I took you up here so we could talk more privately, not try and hook me up.”

“We are talking! You apologized for ... for what you and Lucas did, right? And ... and you’re different than him, a different person now too.”

He hoped so, cause the old Damien was dominated by a fucking Ventrue not even a year old. Embarrassing, and depressing, to have such a young neonate get into his mind and turn him into a puppet. Then again, for one so young to be able to dominate a mind at all was an impressive feat.

“What do you suggest?”

“I suggest you g-go to a club.”

He raised a brow at the tiny woman, and took a moment to look her up and down to make sure it was actually her. Yeap, boring black business suit with pants, definitely her.

“Are you serious?”

“I am! You know some Kindred feed in ... pretty sexual ways. And there are a lot of places with that v-v ... vise in buckets,” she said, and she blinked at herself after using the word ‘bucket’. Both of them chuckled.

“You know in the Second Estate, we try to encourage kine to not sin, right?”

“Yeah b-but, how bad a sin is sleeping around, really?” She shrugged, got back up, and looked back through the telescope.

As far as he was concerned, not a bad one at all. He smirked at the little creature and watched her watch the world. She’d changed. No longer the shy thing he spied on from the shadows, she was becoming far more confident in herself. He had never actually known her, not truly, but spy on someone for a few decades and you become intimately familiar with their body language. And hers read confidence, even after he discovered she’d been joining Jessy’s sexual activities.

“Oh god she’s ... at it again.”

Speak of the devil. Damien laughed as Natasha motioned for him to check it out, and he peeked through the telescope lens into the window of Jessy’s apartment.

Yeap. Girl was indeed partaking in her typical shower of sin. Kindred could sin all they wanted for all God cared, but seeing ghouls engage in such blatant sexual acts? It’d take some getting used to, for him to agree with it.

Maybe the problem was outdated views though. Instead of him thinking of everything as a sin, maybe the problem was the evolution of concepts and ideas, or rather, his refusal to see it that way. The same with cursing, insults, how these words changed and evolved with time, what was once offensive stopped being offensive, and things that were once benign became offensive.

Look at him, sounding like one of those new age preachers. Not exactly in line with the typical Lancea et Sanctum views, as far as he knew. But maybe Antoinette and her vision for the future carried more wisdom than he realized. Adaptation.

Course, baby steps first. Seeing Jessy standing around four men on their knees, with their fingers fighting for space to get inside both of her holes, was perhaps a bit much to jump into. He rolled his eyes and stepped away from the telescope, only for Natasha to jump back to it and look through.

“See something you like?”

“Hey! I ... I’m not you! I want t-to ... try new things sometimes. And ... wow they’re ... really opening her up.”

He laughed and watched her, how her hand gripped the telescope tight, and how her eye was pressed to it just as tight, as if she might miss something. Jessy had definitely awoken something in the girl.

“That might be a bit much for me, Natasha. If we’re going to toss my old beliefs out, let’s try and not throw the baby out with the bath water. Maybe start small?”

“ ... ”

“ ... Natasha!”

“What? What! I was ... just looking. D-Did ... you say something?”

---

---

~~Julias~~

He sat on one of the couches in the mansion’s front lobby where it connected to the main door, and waited. Triss had texted him, saying she’d be coming over. Good, he had some words to share.

A lot of stuff happening underneath their feet, stuff he wasn’t involved in, stuff that should have been observed, not touched. The Uratha had a hunt going on, in abandoned tunnels blocked off from kine, so the Invictus had no reason to intervene; the council agreed on that. And yet he finds out Jack had gone down there. Jack. The god damn last person to be violating what the Uratha demanded. And in the process, nearly got himself and Triss killed.

He was going to kill that kid. After he killed Triss.

He laughed and smacked himself in the forehead. Well, better he kill them than the damn werewolves; or apparently, weird spider animals that the werewolves hunted. Jack had filled him in on the details before rushing off for the Prince's very impromptu, very odd meeting. But, according to the text he'd just received, him and his gang had all survived her fury.

A monster, and four Kindred, each of a different covenant. Hell, five covenants if he considered Triss's previous membership with the Carthians. What a strange band of oddballs to be going on missions into the tunnels, against their superior's wishes. On one hand, Kindred were encouraged to be pro-active, to actively look for ways to secure their covenants safety and power. Course, if it came at the cost of the Masquerade, they were to be punished.

It wasn't his job to punish Triss, but he could still yell at her a little. Might make him feel better.

Eventually she stepped into his mansion, opening and closing the giant door like she lived here.

"Hey there lover boy." She grinned at him and started to walk toward him, hands together in the small of her back, and grin only growing as she got closer.

He liked that. Wait, don't stop being angry at her. She needs to be yelled at.

"Don't lover boy me. You nearly got yourself killed."

"Ah man! Fuck, how much did Jack tell you?"

“Everything.”

“ ... everything?”

“Yeah, everything. About this Azlu monster, about one of the Uratha getting killed, about Natasha being down there to prove Fiona’s innocence, and then you bunch going down there to do the same thing. About Jack nearly getting killed taking one of the monsters down.” He forced down his pride coming through and trying to make him smile. Not the time.

“Oh. Oh, then, yeah ... uh, sorry?”

“Sorry? You—”

“Hey! We didn’t go down there just to prove Fiona’s innocence. We went down there cause Natasha disappeared. And before you get on her case, she had the permission of two Uratha to go down there.”

“Did you have the permission of your boss? You think Jacob would have been fine with you risking your neck like that?”

“Of fucking course not, but he wouldn’t have said no either. Not how shit works in the Circle.”

Right, of course. Jacob would let her get herself killed as a way of teaching her a lesson. Ugh.

“ ... I could yell at you about Dolareido and the Masquerade.”

“Yeah but you won’t. Jacob will give me an earful for that, and the Prince already did.” She came up to him and pushed him, claws to his chest, hard enough to knock him back down until he was sitting on his couch.

“Hey, this—”

“Look, Superman, I get it. The idea of me dying terrifies you. Well, the idea of you dying terrifies me too. But I ain’t gonna let it stop me, and I hope you don’t let it stop you.” She climbed onto him and straddled his lap, knees to the bed. She was wearing the black jeans with rips in it she liked, black combat boots, and a white tank top that was cut high to expose her stomach, abs, tattoos, and piercings. And considering how tight it was, it showed the nipple piercings she was wearing as well. Studs.

“ ... I kind of wish you did.”

“No you don’t. You wouldn’t respect me or love me if I was a passive bitch like that.” She put her hands on his shoulders and leaned in to plant kisses along his jaw and neck. And as she did, she snuggled in, sliding her knees further along the cushions until her body was pressed to his. Claws slid down his arms, under them, and around his sides to hook behind his back and pull him close. “Instead of yelling at me, why don’t you tell me things like ... you’re glad I’m alive.”

“I am glad you’re alive. You know that.”

“Tell me you love me.”

“I love you.”

She crooned into his ear, and gave his earlobe a few kisses before she set her forehead down to rest against his neck and shoulder. “Tell me you’re happy that I’m a strong, confident woman that don’t need no man.”

“Wait, what?” he said, chuckling. She pulled away and frowned at him, but he hugged her back tight to his body, and set one hand along her back, the other into her hair to comb it with his fingers. “You’re a strong, confident woman who don’t need no man. And I’m thankful every day she lets me in her life.”

“Damn straight.”

He was sure this meeting was supposed to go differently. Wasn't he supposed to be angry at her for something? Couldn't stay angry, not as reasons melted away and his frustrations along with them. And holding her in his arms made him forget all the little reasons.

He could find the reasons later. For now, he held her against his body, kissed her head and hair, and hugged her tight. He wasn't stupid, he knew she'd broken him in a matter of seconds; and apparently, he was perfectly alright with that.

His arms encompassed her, held her to him tighter for a moment with a true, proper hug, that she returned with a quiet sigh. He relaxed, and let his hands drift down to hold her hips lightly as the two sat there in silence, Triss keeping her forehead in the nook of his neck while one of her hands found his tie, and began playing with it.

“Ok,” she said, “that's enough lovey mushy crap. Pants off. I'm thinking ... pool sex. You have a pool, right? Like a proper swimming pool?”

“No, I don't have a swimming pool. Why would Viktor need a pool?”

“You're rich! Go buy a pool!”

“Just so you can have pool sex?”

“Yes.”

---

---

~~Jack~~

Finally alone.

Jack stood at the window and looked outside, a glass of blood in his hand and a million thoughts in his head. He'd taken a drink of someone earlier that night, so he didn't need to be drinking blood, but it seemed like the right thing to do when in pondering mode. Stand in front of the window, look down at the streets below, the street lights, the large, luxurious apartment buildings across from his, the people in their windows, and let his mind drift.

The werewolves hunted some pretty nasty things. Life was nicer when he thought the nastiest thing he had to worry about was other vampires, when Kindred like Tony seemed like the scariest thing. Compared to that monstrosity, he missed Tony. Well, maybe not. Tony and the others were manipulators, schemers, murderers. At least the monster was an animal with motivations far less insidious. Eat, kill, procreate, things like that. Just how it did that was nauseating. He could still remember the feeling of driving a metal bar down through its body. Ugh.

So, werewolves were a thing now, and he'd had the unfortunate fortune of getting a personal taste of what their hunts were like. Enough blood and screams to give anyone PTSD.

Then there were monsters, and not the Azlu. Fiona and Athalia and Azamel, and who knows who else. People with nightmares in them, actual nightmares, horrors, things that existed instead of just dreams people had at night. And these nightmares had lairs, in the dream world.

He tried to ignore the fact there was a dream world. Easier to just focus on the physical, on things that bled. And so far his only experience with them was a spider monster that looked more like some sort of spider goddess, like something you'd see drawn on a mural from an ancient civilization. Which, if Vrall was indeed what Fiona said she was, was probably a thing.

What else didn't he know about? With Kindred, he'd just assumed Kindred were the only thing he'd have to worry about. No one else mentioned things to suggest otherwise; maybe that was done on purpose though, to keep him out of things he should probably be staying out of, like werewolf hunts. Were there ghosts? Spirits? Demons? What else went bump in the night?

"Course, none of that is bothering you as much as Antoinette."

He sighed, and let his forehead hit the glass. Didn't care about smudges, just let his weight press into it as he ran the memories through his head.

She was furious. And not in the ice cold way he'd expected, but a fiery way that'd practically burned him when she'd grabbed his jaw.

Did he cross the line this time? He knew he'd crossed the line, in the sense that as Prince she was going to be angry with him; the Invictus council were too. But did he cross a line as far as their relationship was concerned?

No. Maybe. No. Right? Fuck he hoped not. But she'd been so angry with him, angry enough to pick him up and throw him, and Natasha. He had a hard time thinking they'd just be able to walk that of, to—

The door buzzer rang. Oh fuck what now?

"Hello?"

"... Jack, may I come in?"

"Oh! Oh, yea, please." He pressed the button.

Antoinette was visiting him. Kind of like last time then, after the Primogen meeting. But last time it'd been some days between the meeting and her visit, this time she was visiting him immediately thereafter. Good? Bad? He started to shake a little as he waited for her to come to the door. Don't be bad please don't be bad.

She knocked, and he opened the door for her—for three woman to come in.

“Ashley, Julee?”

“Jack! Oh you have a nice place. All sleek and modern and stuff.” Ashley, once she'd slipped off her sneakers, jumped onto his couch and bounced a few times.

Julee on the other hand gave him a tiny finger wave, and stayed beside Antoinette as the woman walked over to him. Over to him, and past him to grab the curtain by the window and pull it closed.

“Um...”

“Jack, I felt it important to remind you, and myself, that my affairs as Prince should not affect our personal life.” The Daeva brought the curtain all the way to the end of the window before casually letting it go, and simultaneously walked into his kitchen. She fetched a glass, same as his own, and poured herself some blood as she got comfortable.

“Yeah, I know. Though uh, little rough on the jaw there.” He rubbed his mouth a bit and smiled at the woman. Thank god his teeth had healed before the meeting. “And ... I get it, I know I was doing stupid shit, risking my neck and—”

“You risked your neck to fight for your friend, and perhaps save Natasha.” She came over to him, swaying her hips a little more than usual — which looked amazing in a business suit skirt — and set her hands on his shoulders to guide him to his couch. “I am selfish to think you should never risk your life in such fashion. I want you all to myself, my little Ventrue, and as this city becomes more and more dangerous, I grow protective.”

“Well, I mean ... yeah, I get that, I—”

Her index finger pressed to his lips, and she pushed down on his shoulders until he was sitting.

“When I am over protective, please, do not think ill of me. And while as Prince, your antics infuriate me, as your love ... I admit, it pleases me that you have such drive.” She sat down next to him, turned to face him on the couch, and started to undo his shirt. He’d already had the jacket off, being home and all, and Antoinette seemed to want more off.

“Uh, kind of putting me between a rock and a hard place then. Make my girl happy, or make my Prince happy.” He managed a shrug, even as she slid the shirt off of him. “Not sure which one I should be striving for.”

“I think you should be striving to make your woman jubilant. And if the Prince grows sour with your shortsighted actions, then you should do all you can to make it up to her.” She leaned in, put a kiss on his neck, his shoulder as she slid the shirt off, and along his chin. “So, both.”

Both, right, keep both happy. He’ll just exist in two places from now on, no problem. Course, it wasn’t like everything he was going to do was going to piss off the Prince, but circumstances did seem to come up that put him in that situation.

Wait, he was shirtless, and the two ghouls were in his apartment. They’d never done this before.

“Did you not once have a table here,” Antoinette said as she teased her fingers along his stomach.

“Yeah uh ... got ... broke.”

She raised a brow, but shrugged and motioned for the girls. Ashley and Julee came on over and sat across from him, both dressed in some simple t-shirts and jeans. Stark contrast to Antoinette and her expensive business suit.

“It occurred to me, my love, that while us having sex in your abode is rare, more rare is inviting my pets over. So rare that, I believe, it has never been done.”

“Nnnope, never done,” he said.

The girls giggled and nodded. Ashley was a giggly sort, but today was extra giggles that had Jack raising a brow.

“I like the place!” Ashley said.

Julee ran her fingers along the couch a few times, enjoying the feel of the expensive fabric no doubt. Not that his stuff was as fancy as Antoinette’s, but he had money now, and he furnished his place the same way Julias would.

Circumstances struck his brain like lightning. Three girls, in his apartment. There were three girls in his apartment, and they were looking at shirtless him. So many fantasies jumped into his mind, a hundred of them, girls in underwear hitting each other with pillows, getting all sweaty and tired, lying down on the same bed, before spontaneously deciding to give each other oil massage for Jack to watch.

“Blush for me my love.” Antoinette set her lips to his ear, and plucked on his earlobe with her kiss. Already wet and warm; she was blushing.

He blushed as well, and immediately felt his member grow harder. Something about three girls in his apartment was sending all sorts of signals through his body, regressing him to when he first hit puberty, when he first discovered the portal to the porn world that was the internet. Such silly fantasies back then, but god damn, they stuck with you.

And they were happening. God damn Antoinette really spoiled the fuck out of him.

“I do hope to keep finding ways to excite you my love, as the years go by. And even if we clash in my tower, I love that I can come to you now and let those worries go.”

“I ... I suppose it'd be really cliche if I said things like ‘I thought of you as I was fighting’ or something.”

“Oui. I hope you were focused on staying alive, not thinking of me.”

Well, he had been thinking of her. Glimpses, glimmers, little flashes of her in his mind as he jumped off the sewer ledge and onto the spider. Would he get back to her? See her again? How utterly pissed was she going to be when she found out he was dead? Would she cry?

“ ... you did sneak in there a bit.”

She laughed, and guided his chin toward her to put her lips upon his. Their kissing earned some sighs of longing from the two ghouls watching, and Antoinette smiled into the kiss as she turned her head just enough to peek at them.

“I believe I had promised you some delightful experiences with my breasts, non? Before that brute interrupted us.” She snapped her fingers and pointed at the door. Like a jack in the box, Ashley sprung up from the couch, jumped over to the door, and locked the bolt before coming to sit back down.

“Y-Yeah, but, I mean, the girls are here and—”

“And we are here to please you. After how I treated you tonight, the girls helped me realize much of my anger was due to my worry for you. In apology, tonight, we will be pleasuring you.”

“ ... really? Cause, I mean, sounds awfully one sided, and I like it when you get to enjoy yourselves too.”

“The girls will be more than satisfied with a Kiss when we are done. And I will be more than satisfied with seeing the pleasure on your face.” Her hand along his stomach drifted lower, and undid the button and zipper of his pants. She didn't even have to glance down to see what she was doing, pure skill guiding her.

He looked at the girls across from him. They were both smiling, Ashley in that bubblegum way, Julee in a subdued way that somehow seemed sexier, complete with a subtle lip bite that stirred all sorts of memories in him. They were there to please him, and judging from the looks Antoinette was giving him, she planned to do many things to him, with the ghouls there to participate.

Utterly. Spoiled.

“Stand for me Jack, and strip.”

He hopped up, and slipped off his pants. In the past he'd have hesitated, especially with three sets of eyes on him instead of one. But now he threw his pants away and hopped back onto the couch with a bounce, smiling. No hiding he was excited, and Antoinette chuckled at him as she slid her arm around his shoulders again.

She kissed him, stood up before her, and stuck her arms out to the side slightly. Queue for the girls to stand up as well and join her. They reached for her skirt, undid the hidden zipper in its hip, and slid it from her body. As they exposed her legs, her black thigh highs and the garter belt that held them up, they grinned at him from around her sides. The garter belt was less a belt, and more a skirt itself, though not long enough to cover more than a few inches of her hips, with black lace — always black lace — designs in the see-through fabric. Her bra was of the same style, the black lace with curling black lines in the fabric, accenting the shape of her bust.

She kept on her shoes, black, with very high heels, almost stiletto.

He sat there and gawked up at her. No matter how many times, no matter how many fucking times she stood there before him, he had to pause and take it in. So much taller than him, a curvy body with a flat stomach and tight waist; the ultimate hourglass figure. The waves of white hair down to the small of her back, her red eyes and alabaster skin, the lipstick and nail polish she liked to wear; blood red today.

The girls on the other hand, threw away their clothes with all the grace of a university student. Which was what they were, far as Jack knew, with maybe a few extra years on their belt. Naked, the two ballerinas came over to his couch, but they didn't sit down. Grinning, Ashley winking, the two of them got down on their knees, and leaned their elbows onto the couch, each kneeling outside his legs.

Apparently making space for Antoinette, who also got down onto her knees in front of him. Antoinette. On her knees. Between his legs. His cock twitched and flexed, raising and pointing upward as he watched the love of his life get comfortable between his legs, her hands finding his thighs and slipping behind him. She tugged on him, bringing his hips forward a little, and leaned down to plant a soft kiss along his member.

He melted. Three girls smiling up at him, looking up at him from around his legs. The two ballerinas, nude, beautiful, leaned in to watch as Antoinette planted another kiss along his cock, and another, lips rising closer and closer to the tip. And she grinned up at him as she slid her lips around the head of his member, moistened it with her warm mouth, and pulled back the skin with delicate fingers to expose the ripe glans within.

She let his cock slip from her mouth as she lifted her head, and leaned back a little. With some room available to them, the two ballerinas leaned in to get between his knees and Antoinette, forcing him to spread his legs wide. Not so wide as to be uncomfortable, and Jack shivered as he looked down at the three women fitting between his knees.

Shivering turned to groaning as both Ashley and Julee leaned in closer again, and put their lips to his shaft. Their kisses started at the bottom, drifting up slowly, each inch peppered with more kisses, until the two of them set their lips upon his glans, and began to kiss it with lingering licks. Like last time, Ashley seemed half intent on suckling on his cock, and half intent on kissing Julee. And it took Julee a few moments to reciprocate, but eventually she did, and smiled a tiny smile as she opened her mouth enough to catch both the head of his shaft, and some of Ashley's lips. With him sitting and leaning back slightly, his member was pointing straight up, and the girls took advantage of the position, sharing him.

"Have you fed tonight, my love?" Antoinette said, her hands reaching out to stroke the backs of her ghouls. While they were naked, she was still in her bra, panties, garter belt, thigh highs, and high heels. Gave her a bit of a dominant look, over her two pets. Perfect.

"I uh, yeah I did, couple hours ago."

"Good. My pets and I would like to play with you tonight, and see how many times we can make you cum."

"Um, yes please."

The ballerinas laughed and looked over at their mistress between them. Antoinette leaned in closer, and set her lips onto his shaft where the girls had been before. And as she suckled, the blond and brunette leaned in again, and pressed their lips to him as well.

Three girls, three sets of lips, kissing and suckling on him, fighting for space on his cock's swollen head. If Avery or Triss or whoever decided to break through his door, he'd tell them to fuck right off, and he'd not move an inch. So amazing, looking down at the three beautiful women, and watching them play with him. Not just looked amazing, felt amazing. The sensation of wet warmth on his length as Julee brought her lips down his shaft, of suckling on his girth, of kisses working along the underside of him as both Antoinette and Ashley bathed the head of his shaft in bliss. Each kiss sent powerful sparks of pleasure down his length, making his cock flex and pull toward his abs, only to be stopped by the three women's lips. The bliss worked down to his testicles and between his thighs, starting to build the tingling waves of his fluids.

Ashley made a moaning sound, no doubt just to pleasure him; it worked. And as she did, she guided her kisses toward Antoinette, so her lips nudged against her mistress's, even as they wrapped around his glans.

“Ashley you imp, you are going to make my love jealous.”

“Sorry!” Giggling, Ashley resumed her work, and she bat her eyelashes at Jack several times as she slipped half his length into her mouth. She held him there, licking along the underside of him while Julee continued to kiss along the base of his shaft, above his testicles.

Antoinette, rolling her eyes, gently nudged her pet aside, and took Jack's cock into her mouth. And devoured him. Looking up at him as she slipped inch after inch of him into her mouth, she eased her tongue back and forth along the underside of his cock, and winked up at him as her lips found the base of his length. Julee and Ashley both stared on, a little wide-eyed at how the Prince held every bit of his length in her mouth. And throat. God, he could feel his cock pressing to the back of her mouth, and she adjusted the angle of her head to let it slide down into her throat.

And she kept him there. No need to breathe, but that didn't mean a vampire didn't have a gag reflex, especially when blushing life. Antoinette had no such issue, and she made a little moan around his girth as she pulled back an inch with tight lips, before sinking down balls deep once again. Holding him so deep, she tilted her head from side to side, causing his glans to rub against her throat, all while she eased her tongue back and forth along the soft underside of his member.

“Pretty sure I'd vomit if I did that,” Ashley said.

Jack chuckled, but Julee scrunched her nose and stuck out her tongue. “Ick.”

Rolling her eyes again, Antoinette began the long, slow journey of raising her head. For each inch she let slip from her mouth, she bathed him in delicious licks all while she suckled, until her lips came to a stop at his glans, and she took extra time to cover his cock in her kisses before lifting her head completely. The rolling pleasure of his precum rising to the tip, only to be kissed away by the vixen, had Jack quivering.

“Ashley dear, you must learn to flow with the mood, and not speak of such things so uncouth.”

“Sorry!” she said, blushing, but Jack doubted she was genuinely apologetic. Not her style.

And Antoinette knew it. She pinched her ghoul's cheek as she sighed a mother's disappointed sigh, before she scooted in a little closer to Jack. She knelt up a little higher, reached for his cock with one hand, and guided it toward her to press it snug to her upper abdomen. With her other hand, she slid her fingernails under the bridge of her bra, and lifted it away from her just enough so she could ease his shaft into the crevice.

Once she set the bridge of the bra against the base of his cock, she placed her hands back upon his legs, and grinned up at him. His cock sat between her breasts, held snug by her bra to her sternum. Where the bra fabric held him was only a couple inches tall, leaving most of his length exposed and begging to be touched. And, as Antoinette got comfortable, Jack stared at the beautiful, perfect sight of his shaft sitting between her two huge, alabaster breasts and the black bra that contained them. At a certain point, his jaw had dropped, and Antoinette reached up to close it before licking her lips.

“Avery will not interrupt our date this time, I am sure. And if she does...” Antoinette shrugged, and with both hands, pressed her breasts together to trap his shaft completely in the softness of her cleavage. “Then she can watch.”

Jack groaned, and melted back into his couch. Her bra was made to accent plunging cleavage, so when she pushed her breasts together, it was pure, warm, soft skin enveloping his cock. In moments, more than just his cock, but the growing wetness of his precum lined her sternum. The clear drops rose to the surface of his glans, and coated the valley of her breasts as she kneaded them together against his length.

“Uh ... uh ... more than her might show up. Been a lot of people doing that lately, you know? Triss, Natasha, Fiona, and Damien too.” Hard to talk with her treating him to the most glorious sight he’d ever seen, her beautiful, enormous breasts, wrapped in her black lace bra, squishing his cock between them, and hiding every inch of his length.

“One would be enough. After that, I feel I would be forced to protest, and remove them before we resumed.” She nuzzled her body against his testicles, pressing her abdomen to them in a soft, rolling motion as she reached out take his hips again, elbows to the couch.

Seeing an opportunity, Ashley leaned in around Antoinette's arm in front of her, and set her cheek to her mistress's collar. Grinning at Jack, just like the imp Antoinette accused her of being, she rested her chin and cheek to Antoinette's closer breast as she craned her neck down to set her lips on his shaft.

And Antoinette did nothing to stop her. Instead, the woman reached up from underneath Ashley to slip a hand up her neck and into her hair. She combed the blond waves, and smiled up at Jack as her ghoul suckled on his cock, while it rested between her breasts.

Don't cum don't cum, not yet.

The Prince did the same for Julee, motioning for the girl to come closer. And when she did, Antoinette slipped her hand into her hair from underneath as well, and Julee set her cheek and chin to Antoinette's breast as she leaned in to place some kisses along Jack's cock, fighting for space against Ashley.

But, as Antoinette began to gently press her body against him again, her soft skin against his testicles and thighs as she leaned in, all while the two girls planted kisses and suckled on the head of his cock, it was too much. The warm, pleasure-inducing waves flooded the base of his shaft, and a hard flex of his muscles — along with a few quiet moans — sent the gush of cum up through his length, and a moment later, into the awaiting mouths of the two girls.

Julee pulled back, blinking, staring at the rising mound of white that leaked out of him. Ashley, on the other hand, continued to bathe his cock with her lips, and giggled as his cum coated her lips. All Jack could do was struggle to hold still as she milked the pleasure out of him, dragging the orgasm out, making each flex of his pelvic floor almost painfully blissful as another squirt of his white fluid landed on her mouth, and onto the valley of Antoinette's breasts. Julee leaned in again after a few moments, and joined Ashley, planting kisses along the tip of his length and letting the cum splash against her lips. Most of his cum fell along the Prince's cleavage, and down along his shaft to coat between her breasts and the bridge of her bra.

"That's enough my pets," Antoinette said, devil smile never leaving as she watched him. And once the two girls pulled away, Ashley making sure to plant some kisses along her breast as she did, the Prince cupped the sides of her bosom, and again pressed her breasts together. Warm, wet, her soft skin enveloped his cock and massaged his own cum into his member, into the sensitive tip that sent powerful waves of pleasure down through his length in between his legs until he was quivering.

"Did you enjoy that my love?"

"God yes." He leaned back completely and collapsed onto the couch, arms falling limp at his sides. And his eyes were still locked onto the sight of his cock disappearing into Antoinette's cleavage; her massive breasts were more than enough to completely hide his length when she pressed them together like that. Another squeeze of his inner muscles forced a final drop of his cum to enter the growing pool of white she was creating, breasts together snug and letting zero of his fluids escape. Until at least she released her bosom, let the bra spread her cum-covered breasts, and let the pool of white drip down the valley between them.

"You are ready for more, non? Or do you feel the need for another drink, to revitalize." Antoinette smiled down at him as she stood up, his length slipping free from her cum-soaked bra. She stood there, thigh highs, garters, underwear, and still wearing her high heels. A perfect combination of sheer sexual allure, and staring at it was more than enough to keep him hard.

A belly still full of blood helped too; blood was the best aphrodisiac for a Kindred in the mood.

And of course, Ashley and Julee stood beside her, naked, Julee smiling and Ashley grinning, their hands behind their backs and jutting out their small, perfect breasts at him.

“Bring him,” the Prince said, and she gestured to him with a finger before she walked off down the hall toward his bedroom.

The girls, giggling like a couple of silly drunks, reached out for his hands and plucked him off the couch. They walked him after Antoinette, holding his hands, squeezing his fingers, glancing down at his hard shaft and how it dripped of his cum. Kindred fluids only lasted five, maybe ten minutes, but it was more than enough time for Jack to get an eyeful of Antoinette as she sat on the edge of his bed, and ran a single finger down one of her breasts. Spreading the cum like that, a trail of white over the black of her bra, he almost melted as the girls guided him toward her.

His bedroom, with the big bed, black sheets — seemed to be the norm for Kindred — and white walls. Well not completely white anymore. He’d started hanging up some pictures, even cycled some as he experimented, and in his room there were paintings of Gothic scenery. Paintings of black forests, cool and spooky castles, a murder of crows circling imposing towers. He thought they were awesome.

“I enjoy the motif, my love. Dark though. Perhaps you have a deep and troubled soul?”

“Nah, sorry, just think crows and shit are neat.”

The girls laughed and rubbed his arms as they guided him to the bed. His joke wasn’t that funny, but the girls seemed to enjoy it anyway, and the arm rubbing was very over the top. But that was the theme of the night apparently, to let him indulge in some very ridiculous, over-the-top sexual fantasies. And after a night of brutality and pain, he was very much ok with this.

Antoinette reached behind her back, and undid the clasp of her bra. Leaning forward, she let it slip from her arms as she sat in the center of his bed, and tossed the bra aside. Still in her shoes, but she kept them from stabbing into his blankets, and with sitting toward one hip, legs out to the side, she was most definitely showing them off on purpose.

Topless Antoinette sitting on his bed, with his cum still coating the center of her breasts. Hard to focus on the shoes.

He climbed onto the bed along with the girls. Tough to fit four people on a king-sized bed, but the girls didn't mind. They pressed up against each other, and him, the two ballerinas crawling like cats along the bed to find better positions.

“Ashley my dear, come sit behind me, and put on a show for my love, s'il vous plaît.” The Prince smiled at her pet, and then at Jack, red eyes drinking him in as much as he was her. But Jack's eyes broke first, watching Ashley and her tight butt wiggling as she crawled on her hands and knees along the bed to get behind Antoinette.

And once she was behind her, she reached underneath Antoinette's arms to cup the woman's huge breasts, and began to massage them. Her fingers teased along his love's perfect, large nipples, and brought them to hard points as her fingertips circled them. And she made no attempt to avoid his cum; if anything, she was spreading it on purpose, fingers reaching between Antoinette's cleavage to find where he'd soaked her. Soon she'd coated the underside of the Prince's heavy, teardrop breasts with his white fluids, and continued to massage in circular patterns with her fingers to grab Jack's eyes and make them follow, hypnotized.

Julee reached over for their bag. At some point they'd brought a bag in with them, a purse, and she ruffled through it until she withdrew a bottle of lubricant.

“Come, sit upon my waist.” Antoinette held out her hands for him, and as she did, she leaned back against Ashley's body. Ashley was sitting against the wall where Jack's bed was snug to, and she spread her legs so Antoinette could sit back against her between them, her hair spreading over Ashley's naked body, and her head coming to rest against her pet's sternum. Antoinette stuck out her legs as well, flat against the bed, like a road for Jack's eyes to follow up to her body.

God yes. He crawled over to her, and did as she demanded, sitting on her waist, weight on his knees against the blankets beside her ribs. He nestled in a little, so her breasts rested along his thighs; they were big enough to pull to the sides of her chest, and with his legs currently snug against the sides of her chest, her breasts pressed and rested against his legs.

His cum was starting to fade into the smallest traces of ash, so small they were basically nonexistent. Meant her skin was no longer wet. But Julee slid up next to him, and leaned over his leg to begin pouring the lubricant onto her mistress's breasts. Jack could smell something too, a flavor, something subtle but there. Mint chocolate, maybe? Nothing he'd want, now that he was Kindred, but maybe the girls liked the taste of it.

With Antoinette leaning against Ashley's body, she was almost sitting up straight but not quite, so all Jack had to do was sit up straight as well, and with him sitting forward on her waist, his cock rested along her sternum. It was an angle they'd done before, with Antoinette sitting against the headboard of her bed, with pillows against the small of her back to angle her right. But instead of pillows and a headboard, this time it was Ashley, and she grinned up at Jack from over Antoinette's head.

And once Julee had liberally coated the woman's breasts in lubricant, and his cock, Ashley reached under the Prince's shoulders and arms, and started to massage her breasts again. She pushed them together, kneaded them with a gentle grip, and spread the lubricant around. And Jack got to feel every bit of it, his length sitting between her breasts and bathed in them as Ashley pushed them together, buried his cock in the softness, and giggled as she did so.

"Does it feel good?" the blond ballerina said.

"Fuck yes." The weight and softness of Antoinette's breasts, pressed tight to his cock, covering it and rubbing against the swollen head of his shaft, was divine. Every bit of friction the lubricated skin provided, all caused by Ashley's hands, was sending warm pleasure down his length again, a tingling sensation that made him shiver.

And through it all, Antoinette watched him, smiling, red eyes looking him up and down as he did his best to hold still. Her hands took his ass, and squeezed on the muscle before drifting up to hold his hips and waist.

"Julee my dear, please, massage my love. He must be sore and exhausted from his valiant efforts last night."

Valiant efforts, heh. Jack managed a tiny smirk between his small groans. She was toying with him and his ego, in a fun way, a teasing way that she liked to do. But, even if it was teasing, Julee came up behind Jack on her knees between Antoinette's legs, and pressed her breasts to his back. Her nipples were hard, very hard, and she set her hands to his shoulders to begin squeezing and massaging, all while pressing her body against his. Not exactly an effective massage — Kindred didn't get tight muscles anyway — but a very erotic, powerful sensation, her body and warmth against his, her breasts squished to his back and her hands squeezing his shoulders.

Not just shoulders. Her grip drifted under them and around his waist to find his abs, and she traced them with her fingertips as she leaned in to rest her chin on his shoulder. She was kneeling straight up, and since he was sitting, she was taller than him in the position, so she got to peek over his shoulder as her hands caressed his body.

He could feel her heat, her blushing. He could smell her arousal. He could feel Julee's desire as her hands drifted further and further down, until she eventually wrapped her fingers around his cock. She plucked it up from the valley of encompassing softness Ashley's hands had created for him, and held it more upright, stroking it with her grip, squeezing its girth, working the lubricant around as she brought one hand up to his glans and softly caressed the sensitive, ripe, swollen skin.

"Hey!" Ashley said.

"S-Sorry ... I'll ... just..." Panting in his ear, Julee set one hand to his abs again, fingers squeezing them instead, while her other pushed down at the base of his cock lightly to guide it down against Antoinette's sternum. And, looking down, watching, she started to push herself against Jack's body. Just a little, just enough to get him to move with her, to ease his hips forward a couple inches in a gentle rhythm, before she eased back and let him pull back as well.

She was fucking Antoinette's breasts with his body, his cock. And he was more than happy to let her. Ashley was too, as she made some aww and ohh sounds before she resumed massaging the Prince's breasts, though at this point, she was actively squishing them together around his cock more than anything.

Antoinette seemed to think the whole thing was cute, as she chuckled a few times and reached up to pat Ashley on the cheek, and Julee on the arm, before she settled her hands back on Jack's hips.

“Can ... you tell me when you’re going to cum?” Julee said, straight into his ear, her voice wet and heavy. “I want to ... to ... try something.”

“Um, sure, yeah.” He managed to turn his head to catch a glance of the brunette. Blushing didn’t begin to describe how red she’d become. Must have taken a lot of courage to bring up her own sexual desires in the midst of all this. But, despite her blatant embarrassment, her hand on his abs reached down further to find his testicles, and she began to gently massage the sensitive orbs within. She didn’t stop pushing against his body either, making him fuck the Prince’s enormous breasts all while the ghoul rubbed her body against him.

Too good. So many hands on him, so much stimulus, wet and warm and soft and perfect. He could already feel the pleasure growing, the telltale blissful sparks building underneath his testicles.

“I’m ... going to cum soon.” The building heat between his legs demanded release, and his cock flexed upward, against Julee’s fingers, against the bed of softness Ashley was creating for him.

Julee moaned, deliberate, intoxicating, and started to stroke his shaft again. She stopped pushing against his body though, instead focusing on massaging his cock, squeezing it, sliding her fingers along the veins. She kept the swollen head buried inside Antoinette’s bosom though, still enveloped in the softness rubbing up and down his sensitive skin from Ashley’s playing.

When the cum started to flow, Julee almost squealed. She pulled up on his length a little, enough to slip his cock from the tight bed of softness, and instead she started to rub it along Antoinette’s nipples. First the left, she guided his cock as she massaged it with slow, deep strokes, forcing a small groan out of Jack as the next wave of cum trickled out of him and onto his love’s areola. And then another, as Julee again pressed his cock downward, rubbing his glans around in a circle motion over Antoinette's nipple until the next gush of his cum coated it in white. The friction of his glans along his love's breasts was euphoric, and Jack shivered as Julee's grip milked more of his cum out of him onto the awaiting bed of wet softness beneath him.

She did the same for the other breast as well, guiding Jack's length over to it to again begin coating her breast in his cum. Her ballerina hands both squeezed on his length, stroking, caressing with a tight grip, and milking yet another heavy drop of his white fluid onto Antoinette. And then another. A strand of cum connected her two breasts, the thickness of it leaving lines along her skin as Julee guided him around, all the while stroking his length until Jack felt the pleasure on his glans grow almost painful. But, as last the last bit of his cum was released, everyone stared at the great mess of white Julee had painted onto Antoinette's breasts using him.

Ashley moaned, loudly, and dragged both of her hands through the cum. "God damn, Jack. Cumming buckets."

"Perhaps sex with three women on regular occurrence has affected your sexual endurance, my love?" Antoinette said, again stroking his ego on purpose.

And he was totally cool with that, managing a smile between the post-orgasm moans. "Maybe. Three beautiful women in my bed? Can't ... can't really explain to you how hot that is. In a childish kind of way, but still..."

The two ballerinas giggled again, though Julee's voice had become a husky thing, a deep thing, and she crawled around him to sit on her knees beside Antoinette's chest and his leg.

Everyone raised an eyebrow as Julee, eyes locked onto her mistress's bosom, leaned down and started to plant kisses on Antoinette's nipple. Jack blinked, and watched as the brunette's lips were soon white with his cum, and then gone as she licked her lips, only to spread the fluid onto the underside of her mistress's breast.

And Antoinette let out her own quiet moans, no doubt entirely controlled and mastered to be as enticing as they were, to encourage her ghoul's behavior. Encourage it did, and Julee continued to plant kisses, eventually settling on suckling on the Prince's nipple, tongue slipping out from between her lips to lap up his cum around her engorged areola, only to pull it into her mouth and continue suckling. With everyone watching her, Julee slid a hand down between her legs, and started to masturbate, fingers finding her clitoris and rubbing it side to side with two of her fingers.

Too much, way too much. What softness Jack's member was starting to experience vanished, cock returning to hard and rigid as he watched Julee devour Antoinette's cum-soaked breast. He leaned forward a little, enough to reach out and put a hand onto Antoinette's shoulder, so he could begin easing his body back and forth again.

"Again?" Ashley said, giggling. Her hand nearest Julee kept the breast up and free for her friend to continue her display, while her other hand massaged Antoinette's other breast in its entirety, top to bottom, fingers sliding the contours around and around. It spread his cum over her mistress's skin, massaging it into the lubricant, into her puffy nipple and swollen areola, into its teardrop shape that jiggled and molded to Ashley's hand.

And Antoinette didn't stop any of it. She seemed quite pleased if anything, and as she set one hand back onto Jack's hip, the other lifted to hook behind Julee, and she rested it on the girl's head, cradling it as her ghoul suckled on her.

Perhaps being too bold, perhaps a little too silly, Jack used his free hand to place it on Julee's back, and his other guided his cock along Antoinette's breast nearest her ghoul until the glans of his length slid up along her soft skin toward her areola. And there, Jack nudged it against Julee's lips.

The masturbating ghoul didn't skip a beat. She managed a peek up at him, whole body blushing as she slid her mouth over a touch, enough to let his glans press along both Antoinette's engorged nipple, and Julee's lips. Her moans came through louder, and her fingers between her legs worked faster as she tried to balance masturbating, kissing and suckling on him, and the nipple he was rubbing his cock against.

And, of her own accord, she tilted her head more to face Jack, and took his cock into her mouth. She peeked up at him again through her almost closed eyes, blushing brighter and brighter until he thought she might explode. And as she caught his gaze, the little brunette started to work her mouth back and forth a few inches of his length, lips dragging tight to his skin, and tongue massaging the engorged tip of his length. More of her moans escaped her mouth, sending tingling waves of pleasure down his cock, all while her fingers between her legs grew faster and faster.

Maybe it was a little too much for Julee, having everyone stare at her while she did such lewd things. But after a minute of giving him a blowjob, with everyone staring, she removed her lips from him; a strand of saliva and cum connected her mouth to his cock still. She quivered as she looked down at it, and pulled away, falling over onto her side and then rolling onto her back. She was in the nook of Antoinette's side, now on her back with her head resting on her mistress's arm. And with both hands between her legs, Julee started to finger herself.

His bed was going to be soaked by the time she was done.

"My pet is trying to rob me of the spotlight," Antoinette said, smirking down at her ghoul.

“I ... no ... just...” Julee’s hands didn’t stop. If anything, her legs were spreading wider and wider, until Jack could see her juices trickling down the crack of her ass.

A sharp jolt of pain along his cock shocked him, grabbed his attention and yanked it back to Ashley. She’d flicked him, his glans, and smirked at him as she resumed her grip on Antoinette’s breasts with both hands.

“Don’t stop! I wanna see a pearl necklace.”

Julee may have had a sexual depth far greater than she let on, but Ashley wore hers on her sleeve, and she beamed with excitement as Jack again began to ease his cock into the awaiting bed Ashley was making for him. Feeling Antoinette’s breasts hug his length tight was heavenly, tight enough he couldn’t imagine it was terribly comfortable for the Prince, having her breasts pressed together that hard. But Antoinette didn’t seem to mind, and Ashley made a couple of her own tiny, experimental moans as she rubbed the Prince’s enormous breasts up and down against his length.

Jack rocked his hips back and forth, and found a pleasant pace, a gentle fucking rhythm that Ashley met in kind.

And throughout all this ridiculousness, Antoinette smiled up at him, red eyes looking him up and down, with occasional small glances to her ghouls. But it was him, definitely him, that she had her eyes locked on, her gaze devouring his body, his abdomen which flexed with each thrust, his arms that reached out for her to hold onto the woman’s shoulders. And, as he leaned down, craning his neck so his lips could find hers, she kept hers open a sliver to watch him as they kissed.

She only had one arm free anymore, with Julee lying on the other one while she masturbated. And like Antoinette, Julee was staring at him, watching him and where his cock was slipping into the crevice created by her mistress’s breast, watching his expression and his body. He knew his expression must have been a constant o-face with the ludicrous amount of pleasure being dumped on him, visual and physical. The feel of his lover's breasts, coated in cum and lubricant, tight around his cock from Ashley's grip, had more liquids building up between his legs already.

He kept his grip on Antoinette's shoulders, still leaned in slightly, and continued to fuck her breasts. Every stroke of her soft skin on his girth felt amazing, and Ashley went out of her way to make sure every stroke was tight. Whenever he stopped, taking a moment to let his building fluids settle, Ashley let Antoinette's breasts part, and instead of squeezing them against him, she caressed the woman's nipples with soft fingers. Her fingers slid lower, trailing and working his cum into the underside of her breasts where they pressed to his legs.

Too good to stop for long. He started thrusting again, faster, with enough speed to make Antoinette's breasts bounce upward; just lightly, not enough to hurt. But he stared at them, how his cock disappeared between them, and how their volume rippled with the gentle impact of his pelvis against her. Ashley kept her hands along their sides, keeping everything perfectly tight, as he worked his way up to a third orgasm.

And when it came, his hands held onto Antoinette's shoulders as he looked down at the sight, unable to look away as he pressed forward, deep, far enough so the head of his cock poked through the bed of softness a sliver. Enough so that, as the first wave of pleasure flowed outward, the gush of cum squirted out onto Antoinette's neck.

"Oh my." The Prince chuckled, and offered him a devilish grin as her free arm reached up to her neck to touch where his cum pooled between her collar. Another squirt of his cum met it, causing the strands of white to drip to the sides of her neck. But, as he pulled his hips back to bury his glans inside the wet, warm softness of her breasts again, the next wave coated the cleavage Ashley's grip was creating, and Jack shivered as the tingling pleasure worked down his length and up into his core, demanding he thrust again. And again, as he sank himself balls deep into the bed of perfect softness, a gush of his fluids poured out onto his love's sternum and collar until it was trickling around her neck to the blankets.

When the flow eased, he slid his hips back so her breasts buried his ripe, tingling glans. Even as he stopped pouring cum onto her breasts, he kept his cock within the softness, milking the pleasure from his engorged cock with subtle thrusts.

Finally, he slipped his length free. White coated his shaft, and more than coated Antoinette's neck and sternum; she was covered. He shifted back a ways and adjusted his knees so he was kneeling between her legs instead of around them, and he panted a few times as he tried to calm his sexual desires. Hard to do, with Julee bringing herself to what must have been a third orgasm, body shivering and her squeaks coming out as she fingered herself. No longer just playing with her clitoris, she was scooping fingers into herself, and earning more juices to soak his bed. He'd been so absorbed in Antoinette, he hadn't noticed.

Antoinette, now having some room, sat up and smiled at him. She slid her arm out from under the masturbating ghoul, and pressed it to Jack's chest. Fingers crept up his chest, fingertips dancing, before eventually hooking his neck and pulling him toward her to kiss her again.

"Be a dear and slide back a bit for me, my love? I must satisfy my pets."

"Um, sure. You uh, don't want me to help?"

"No. You, please, watch and enjoy."

Well, ok. He really did want to help, cause it was damn hot and satisfying to bring the ghouls to orgasm; least he could do after cumming three fucking times. He winced as he let his butt collapse on the sheets, as the ache of a thoroughly drained and exhausted prostate hit him. It passed quickly, and he got comfortable as he watched Antoinette put on a show.

First it was Julee. Antoinette pulled the ghoul into her lap and kissed her neck, her breasts, and turned her to face Jack as she bit into the girl's neck. Jack stared on, absorbed, hypnotized by the sight of Julee masturbating as Antoinette drank the girl into a post-Kiss coma. The act was more than enough to turn Julee into a squirting mess, fluids splashing over her fingers as she collapsed. Done and done quickly, which made sense considering Julee had already had cum a couple times, and needed little coaxing to cum yet again as Antoinette drank her unconscious. The wet spot underneath the little brunette's ass was huge.

With Ashley though, she had a little more fun.

“Ashley my pet, come lie down, like this.” She gestured to the blankets, Ashley's head away from Jack. The ghoul complied, giggling as she did, and on her back too. Not a care in the world, Ashley spread her legs and put her tiny, bare pussy on display. Soaked, and begging to be touched.

Which Antoinette did, with a tiny growl and a following chuckle. She slid off her underwear, climbed onto the girl, straddled her face while facing Jack, and leaned down over Ashley's legs, weight on one hand while the other reached into Ashley's insides.

She motioned with her head for Jack to come a bit closer. And as she began to finger Ashley's little pussy, she grinned at Jack and gave him a kiss.

Jack sat back down, and watched. With Antoinette sitting on Ashley's face and facing him, Jack could see the girl's tongue lapping at his love's clitoris. Antoinette barely seemed to notice, but Jack knew that was just how she sometimes handled pleasure, moans that were almost silent, and shivers almost invisible. She was no doubt more focused on both fingering Ashley's insides, and putting on a show for Jack. Cause god damn, she blew Jack a kiss, and purposefully pulled her fingers up against Ashley's insides hard enough to both have the ghoul mewling into her mistress's pussy, but also cause Antoinette's wet breasts to sway and jiggle with her arm's force. With her leaning forward like that, her breasts were free to hang with their natural weight, immense teardrops, and ripple with each movement. Several strands of his cum had trickled down from her neck, and were now dripping down her breasts to her nipples; Jack couldn't stop staring at them.

Poor Ashley didn't last long, getting fingered so rough, and her cum was soon coating Antoinette's fingers. Chuckling, the Prince sat up and with both hands, pried open the lips and insides of Ashley for Jack to see her tiny, smooth little snatch clench and leak. But as Ashley started to squirm, Antoinette started to finger her again, rougher than before, rough enough Jack was worried she'd bruise the poor ghoul's insides. Hard to concentrate on that though, as he stared at Antoinette's cum-soaked breasts jiggling with her harsh fingering.

Only when Ashley's legs raised and collapsed back on the sheets did Antoinette at last stop, and she set both hands to the blankets as she started to grind her cunt down against Ashley's lips. That grind, swaying the hips in a circular motion, smiling at Jack with every motion. It wasn't long before she sat up straighter, weight on her knees, and as she continued her hip rolling dance, she started to massage her breasts. She cupped their weight, let their size spill over her fingers, and slid her fingertips up their center contours to trail through his cum before it began to fade. And of course, she never stopped looking at him as she did.

Finally, the Prince came over Ashley's lips, and as she did, she motioned for Jack to come closer again. As he did, she rested her weight on one hand against the blankets, while the other held his shoulder. Kissing distance acquired. She bathed his lips with hers, plucked at them, nuzzled into them, and let her eyes finally drift closed as her body shivered. Cumming, while kissing him. Part of him wanted to grab Ashley and drink her dry, just so he'd have to blood kick needed for more sex.

But the Prince seemed satisfied. She released him, and slid off of Ashley, only to pick the girl up and sit her between the Prince's legs, facing Jack. Girl's face had beads of wetness on her lips and cheeks, and a big grin, the kind she had when she'd come her brains out.

"I believe we could all use a shower," Antoinette said. "Does your washroom have enough space for three?"

"Um ... maybe?"

---

His checklist on ridiculous sexual fantasies he wanted to fulfill before he died was getting shorter and shorter. Even this one, bathing with multiple girls while being washed by them.

Well, maybe 'them' was a strong word, as Ashley was the one doing all the work. The three of them were standing in his shower, which was a shower bath. His apartment had a pretty huge bathtub though, much much bigger than the one he had at his old apartment before joining the Invictus. So with the curtain pulled across and the water going, there was enough room for Ashley to get down on her knees and begin washing their legs, soap and loofah her tools.

"My love, I do hope that you will be careful in the future, with such reckless behavior. As Prince, I despise such actions. As your love, I find them ... endearing, but terrifying. If you died, I would be destroyed." Antoinette was standing behind him, holding him, pressing her breasts to his back as she traced his abs with her fingers with one hand, and stroked his buzzed hair with the other.

“I know, and I really hope nothing like that happens again. Just kinda ... got stuck with a hard decision. I got a call from Julias about the new kills, and I figured you’d blame Fiona; I would have, if I were you. But I knew it wasn’t her, so before you called a blood hunt, I thought—”

“Jack, I am no fool. I would need proof before escalating to such drastic measures.” She set her chin on his head — so much taller than him — and hugged him with both hands to his stomach. “You do seem to often find yourself in the center of dangerous events, my love. Why is that?”

Cause he was an idiot and kept sticking his foot in his mouth, or in this case, foot into dangerous places.

“Not sure. I—hey!” He looked down with a startle, and frowned at Ashley as she began scrubbing his genitals. She was not gentle about it, and she giggled up at him complete with a chipmunk grin. “Guess I just can’t help but get myself into things when I ... think I can help.”

“I did not think you so altruistic.” One of her hands reached down to offer Ashley a flick to the nose, before she resumed hugging his abdomen. “A little selfishness and sense of self preservation is a healthy trait, my love. Please do not get yourself killed thinking you can help everyone.”

“Not everyone! Just oddly fun redheads.”

“ ... you do seem attached to her.”

Jack raised a brow and looked up over his shoulder. She sounded sad.

He rolled his eyes, turned around, and hugged the Prince. A little squirming from her, some shock, but he held on and kept her wrapped in his arms, his cheek against her sternum. Always her comforting him, but she had a jealous side, a paranoid side, and other things any person had. But, sometimes, it was easy to forget she was a person, and not just a monolithic entity of control.

“She reminds me of my sister.”

“Oh.” She laughed, and hugged him in return, arms dangling over his shoulders and fingertips tracing his spine. “Forgive me my silly concerns, my little Ventrue.”

“It’s ok. Makes me love you all the more.” Cause every damn time he thought their relationship was in trouble, Antoinette quickly reminded him how it wasn’t, at all. Nearly breaking his jaw in that meeting? No big. Hell, it’d probably happen again. “I—hey! What the fuck.” He looked down behind over his shoulder, down at the girl trying to shove the loofah up his ass.

“Oh come on, you have a really great butt Jack. And smooth too!” A sharp, momentary pain, along with some splashing water marked where she slapped it.

“Not ... completely smooth. I just trimmed the hair.”

“Which every girl appreciates.” Giggling, Ashley stood up and pressed her chest to his back, her nipples rubbing against his shoulder blades; they were getting hard.

At least until Antoinette reached out and pinched the girl by the nose.

“You, my little ghoul, are much too adventurous for your own good. My love and I were having a moment. That you interrupted.” Antoinette guided her by her nose around Jack, and Jack stepped out of the way while the Prince forced her pet back down to pick up the loofah and soap. The whole time Ashley whined and complained about her poor nose, hands holding onto Antoinette's wrist.

“Aw, I was just trying to wash his back.”

“With your breasts?”

“ ... maybe?”

Her joke earned her a few forced head shakes, Antoinette yanking her around by her nose, each earning a wince from Jack. Well, at least it wasn't her jaw.

Chapter 38

~~Natasha~~

“Holy shit,” Jessy said, eyes wide, leaning forward with hands gripping together. The two of them were sitting at Natasha’s counter in her apartment, her new apartment, sharing a corner and a bottle of blood. Antoinette had lent her some of her thralls to serve as moving crew, and they’d done quick work, so all her stuff was set up and ready for breaking in.

Natasha didn’t bother pouring a glass. She drank from the bottle directly, something she’d never do normally, and slid it a few inches across the counter to her friend.

“Yeah ... t-t-terrifying.”

“I mean, I knew about nasty shit like werewolves, but a giant spider monster? First it’s the Begotten, now it’s spider monster things taking over human bodies and ... fuck. Fuck fuck. Fuck fuck fuck.” Jessy got up from her stool and shook out her legs as she rubbed herself down. “Feel like I got them on me!”

Giggling, Natasha waited for her friend to recuperate from her well-deserved fear of spiders, crawling up legs and getting into her clothes.

“It was s-s-scary ... no d-doubt about that.” But, oddly fun. Well, maybe not fun. No, not fun, fun was not the word. And poor Art, poor Matt. Stephanie died on that hunt, and while Natasha didn’t—hadn’t like her, she got the impression her two new friends did. Or at least, thought of Stephanie as family; like a pack of wolves.

“Cool hearing the kid come through like that though. Glad he’s Invictus.” Jessy sat down beside her again and took a drink of the blood with all the grace of a drunkard downing beer. “Wanna come back yet?”

“... no.” She sighed and shook her head. Not after what Maria did, not after what happened. Not after seeing all these things, and needing some sort of answer. “Come on, d-don’t ask me that.”

“I know I know, just kidding. So, over a whole night trapped with two of those sexy dogs. How’d that go?”

“It was nice! We p-played cards and talked and stuff. And Art told me about p-pack life a bit, and Matt and him joked about ... why are you looking at me like that?”

“You liiiiiike them.” Jessy grinned, and slid the bottle back toward her.

“I—well, um, I d-do like them, they’re—”

“No no, not this ‘they’re my friends’ crap. I mean you like like them. I mean want to wake them up with a good morning blowjob like them.”

“Jessy! Not everything has to d-d-d ... d-devolve into sex!” This woman, ugh. Natasha entertained her friend’s sexual obsessions to a point, but she had a limit.

“I’m not saying it’s only about sex.” The Gangrel leaned in, frowned at her, and gave her a shove on the shoulder. “I talked to Matthew and Arturo earlier tonight I’ll have you know, and I got that impression. They like you, and not in your typical I-really-want-to-fuck-her way ... well, I got some of that too, but I meant moreso the other kind.”

“You ... you did?”

“Mmhmm. You should go visit them.”

“Visit? Did they—”

“Yeah, gave me the place they’re staying at. Still no phones though.” Jessy reached out for her and scooped her closer, arm hooking her shoulders in a hug. “Much as I think those wolves aren’t much better than dogs, god damn they are cute.”

“You j-just like anyone with ... b-b-big shoulders and whose tall.”

“I know what I like. And I know I wouldn’t like hanging out with those two much. Too much like me.”

Natasha raised a brow at her friend. That was an oddly self-aware statement for her. Weird. Maybe Jessy was getting wiser in her old age. Natasha sure wasn’t.

“ ... w-what should I do?”

“Do? Girl it’s not complicated, go hang out with them! Go say hello. Here, I got their address; it’s on the edge of South Side near North Side, Carthian district.” She grabbed a pen and a notepad — sticky notes were Natasha’s vice — and wrote down some numbers. “And get those dumbasses a phone. It’s the fucking teens of the century, and they don’t have smartphones?”

Go hang with them. She made it sound so easy, like you could just drop by someone’s place without first arranging a meeting, setting up a schedule, or at least texting them to see if they were free. Randomly dropping by? This wasn’t the 1800s!

But ... maybe she could? They didn’t have phones, so it wasn’t like they were exactly modern age.

“I see those eyes shifting around, thinking up strategies.” Jessy bonked her on the head, and Natasha whined as was custom, clutching her skull. “Stop thinking, and just go. Have fun. Be yourself.”

“Be myself ... b-be myself.”

“Well, maybe a little more like your current self? You know, fun Natasha, horny and slutty Natasha! Natasha who I’ve seen enjoy some pretty sexy stuff. Natasha who I’ve seen ride dick, with two more in her hands.”

“Jessy!”

“But also Natasha who went down into the tunnels with her two new friends. A little spontaneous, you know? Come on, go have fun!”

---

Nervous nervous nervous. So damn nervous. Why so nervous? All she was doing was visiting a couple of friends and saying thank you. That’s all. Nothing else to it.

So what if she’d drank both of them? Felt their warmth in her body? Their really ... really ... warm, thick blood. Felt their heat on her fingertips, on her fangs, smelled their musk. Animals, wolves ... men.

She shook her head, planted her palms against her eye sockets, and shook her head more until her hair was going everywhere. Grow up you big baby, and knock.

She knocked, and waited, and trembled. It was a different fear than being chased by monsters, but a fear all the same, the sort of fear that made her stutter worse, that made her mind race a million miles a second planning exit strategies.

But they deserved a thank you, and she did want to see them again. They were nice. At least Matt was nice. Art was ... not nice, in a fun way. Pushy, but also sneaky. Jessy was pushy too, but with zero sneak factor. With Art she could tell he was smart enough to trick her, but Matt counterbalanced his deviousness, made them enjoyable to be around. Being stuck in that tunnel for a whole night and then some had actually been sort of fun, when she forgot about the danger they were in.

The apartment door opened, and Matt's face lit up like a Christmas tree.

“Madam Vola!”

“Y-You ... you know to call me Natasha.”

“Right right. Sorry, come on in.” He threw open the door and motioned for her to enter. “Art and I were just watching some TV.”

It was a nice little apartment, something cheap and cozy. The whole pack had rented apartments in the same building, a favor from Garry to Avery, and cause the pack didn't want to ever be too far from each other. She understood that, sort of.

Arturo looked over the couch back, and grinned at her.

“Little vampire come for more blood?”

“N-No! No, that's ... I came ... c-came...” Arg, he was going to make this difficult, and smile at her the whole time. “Came t-t-t-t-to ... to say thank you.”

“Thank you?”

“Yes. For ... for helping me, and sssaving me, and ... and letting me ... drink when I had t-to.”

“Come on little vampire, you—”

“Stop t-teasing me!” She threw down her hands and stomped her foot. “I am ... I am older than you. I have d-done things you could never understand. I have ... I am not a child. Ssso you ... stop b-being an asshole.”

So much for thank yous. But Matt smiled, nodded, and motioned to Art. Neither of them had even winced with her sudden outburst. If anything, they seemed happy.

“We’re just teasing you cause we like you Natasha. Both of us. Come on in, get comfortable,” Matt said, before he sat down on the couch next to Art to resume watching the show. “After that fucking Azlu incident? Figured you’d know when we’re just playing.”

Art smiled at her, a new smile, the same sort of genuine smile Matt always used, and motioned with his head for her to do as his friend suggested.

Well, temper tantrum succeeded. She closed the door behind her, took off her shoes, and walked into the living room. Only the one couch, pointed at a nice TV showing a comedy drama. A witty one with dry humor, one she liked.

Should she sit down? The couch fit three people, but Art was a big guy, and Matt was an enormous guy; little room left in the middle of the couch. But Matt shifted over as best he could, and motioned for her again. So, she shrugged, took a deep breath, and sat down between the two werewolves.

Coming over to watch TV wasn’t exactly the plan, but she liked the show, and she kind of enjoyed the simplicity of the interaction. And better yet, Art and Matt were both watching it, without looking at her. Comfortable to watch the show with her, like Jessy would be. Like friends.

Matt and Art were both wearing jeans, though Matt had on a tight white t-shirt and blue jeans, and Art seemed to prefer a gray shirt and faded jeans. Both were a far cry from the suit she was wearing, so she took off her black jacket and set it on the end table. Now in black suit pants and a white shirt, she got comfortable, and laughed at the TV.

Ten minutes later, show over and a new one beginning, she looked to both of them, and tapped a finger on one of her hidden fangs.

“D-Do you only eat cooked meat?”

“You mean us two or the pack?” Art said. “Some of us need it raw, some of us need it fresh.” Art turned in his spot a bit to face her. “Some of us prefer to hunt in Hisil.”

Hisil? Right, the Shadow realm, where spirits like Safe existed. She shivered as she remembered it, and compared the beautiful, amazing memory against the creature the Uratha called Azlu.

“Eat spirits?”

They nodded as they watched the TV. They didn’t seem to mind that she was talking over the show either, and frequently broke eye contact with it to look at her. They were more interested in her than the show then.

Oh god they might eat Safe. She raised a hand to bring it up, but stopped herself. It was a big city, and she had no right to ask them what to hunt or not hunt in their world. Besides, Safe would stay safe, hopefully.

“ ... did ... d-did you ... umm ... Stephanie, I mean...”

Art and Matt both sighed, but Matt turned to look to her as he offered her something between a wince and smile.

“She died on a hunt, against the vilest, most dangerous prey. We’re sad she died, but—”

“But it was a good way to die.” Art peeked at Natasha for a moment, a crack of sadness there before he looked back to the TV. “Mason’s taking it pretty hard though.”

“Yeah.” Matt looked back as well, but she could tell he wasn’t really looking at the images anymore. “Those two hated each other.”

“They d-did?” she said. “Then ... w-why would he—”

“Hated each other like kids hate each other.” Art motioned to the TV, and the sitcom that had started playing. “Like a script from a show. I was sure they’d get together eventually.”

“Oh.” She hadn’t ever talked to Mason; hadn’t ever talked to any of them except for her two friends Art and Matt, really. Maybe she shouldn’t have brought her up. Yeah, that was dumb. “So, I should, uh ... I should g-get going.”

“Already?” Matt said.

“You should stay.” Art reached out and put a hand on her arm. “Nice having you around.”

“ ... what? W-Why? I just ... watched TV with you.” Touching her, he was touching her. And she wasn’t brushing his hand away.

“Trust us.” Art put his hand back in his lap, and smiled more of that frustrating smile. “Nice having you around, like talking to you. And the rest of the pack right now, after that double Azlu fuck up? Volatile as explosives.”

“That’s a common myth. M-M-Most explosives aren’t ... v-volatile...”

“Well, it’s nice having you over anyway. Maybe we could try one of those Kisses again? Maybe a little normal kissing to go with it?” Art said, a sly smile sneaking onto his face.

Whoa whoa, what? She frowned at the bastard, whose smile had turned into an evil grin. A most evil grin, worthy of stabbing. “Is ... is that why you think I’m over here?” Guess he wasn’t feeling too bad about Stephanie. Or maybe this was just how Art coped? Making bad jokes. A lot of people used humor like that.

“We’d be lying if we said we didn’t think you were attracted to us,” Matt said.

Us. Us? She looked over at Matt, and found the big guy smiling at her, excitement in his eyes. Art she could understand making bad jokes to hide mourning, but Matt? It wasn’t his style.

“I d-didn’t come over for ... for more blood ... or anything like that! I came over t-t-t ... t-to say thank you!” She stood up, faced the two wolves, stomped her foot once, and folded her arms across her chest while she gave both men the harshest glare she could muster. It only seemed to make them smile more though, which made her frown more, which lead to a downward spiral she did not like.

“We were hoping you would.” Art reached out for her, and his fingers found where her shirt was tucked into her pants. She slapped his fingers away, and Arturo’s grin only grew. “But, we were really hoping you’d come over to just hang with us, not just say thank you, or that you’re sorry about Stephanie.”

“I w-was hanging!”

“And I hope you’ll stick around, hang out more. A lot more. With less clothes.”

The bastard! The slimy, conniving, manipulative, rude son of a bitch. He ... he ... wanted her naked. And he was so brazen about it. Rude and direct and ... and looking at her like she was a piece of meat. Or at least, she wanted to think of him like that, like he was some lecherous bastard she could justify stabbing. But the man had saved her life, let her drink his blood before, protected her from the Azlu, all the things that should make her want to swoon like a damsel in distress being rescued.

She most definitely did not feel like she was being rescued. Felt like she was a lamb before the wolves.

“D-Don’t think ... just because you ... helped me that I ... that I would...”

“What? No no, it’s not like that,” Matt said, hands up in surrender. “We like you. You’re smart, you’re clever, and you’re so damn cute.”

“You t-too? Do I ... d-d-do I look like a ... like a...” Like a whore, or slut, or some other stupid word that really meant nothing to any Kindred. “I’m not cute!”

“Could have fooled us.” Art got up, and started walking toward her. “We think you’re damn cute, and sexy. We’ve been wanting to do things to you for a while.”

She backed up, eyes going wide and staring up at the tall beast, and the hunger in his dark eyes. They ... they had?

“You ... you’re ... ummm.” Her back pressed to the wall beside the TV, and her hands did as well. Trapped, completely trapped. She looked past Art to Matt, but the big dumb puppy only smiled back at her, the same hunger in his gaze. He gave her a tiny wave too, like this was all fun times.

“I like that you squirm.” Art leaned down as he approached her, and he licked his lips in a very I’m-going-to-eat-you sort of way.

“I ... I um...”

“I like that you still act shy around us, despite the shit we’ve been through. I like that you’re smart, and clever when you start to feel comfortable. And I think you’re really sexy.” He got in closer, close enough she could feel his body heat as he leaned down to grin at her, penetrating gaze only an inch from her eyes. “And I’m really hoping you squirm the same way when I’m inside you.”

Find a knife, a sword, a pen, anything. Stab him!

“You two ... can’t b-b-be serious. There’s ... t-two of you!”

“So?” Matt said, shrugging. “Art and I have been friends forever, and we share everything. And sometimes we find a girl who enjoys two men. Though Art can come on a bit strong. Dumbass.”

Art just shrugged when he looked behind him at his friend before bringing his mischievous eyes back to her.

For a second, she wanted to accuse them of being playboys, sleeping around with any woman they found. She knew it wasn’t true though, she was just looking for excuses to get out of the situation. Just like with Jessy and her ghouls.

But these weren’t ghouls. And Jessy wasn’t here either. Completely different situation.

Completely.

“You uh ... you t-two ... do this often?”

“No,” Art said, “gotta like the girl first. And she has to like us. Avery and the pack have been roaming for a while, but I’m hoping we can stay here. Dolareido’s a great place. And we can get to know the little vamp with some bite to her. We really like her.”

Hehe, bite. No, don’t laugh at his puns!

“You like me?”

“Haven’t I been saying that all night?” Art reached down, and took her hand. She didn’t pull it away, and instead bit her lip a little as she felt the heat of his body warm her corpse fingers. After pulling her back to the couch, he sat down and grinned his evil grin. Bastard was so damn tall, he was eye level with her despite him sitting, her standing. Let alone Matt, who was a good five or six inches taller than Art, and probably eighty pounds of pure muscle heavier.

And they both wanted her. Both were looking at her like prey to be ravaged, but the more they kept talking, the less she minded.

“This ... this isn't ... and ... I ... I um...”

Matt reached out, and took her other hand. Hers disappeared into his palm, like a little girl's. She was older than either of them, but ... but they were so much bigger than her. Trapped, trapped trapped, standing in front of the couch with the two wolves sitting down on it before her, her hands in theirs.

“If you say you want to go, we'll let you go. This isn't like that time we captured you.” Art's eyes were only on her face half the time now, half the time running up and down her body. “You're not our prisoner. You have to say stop though. That's your safe word.”

“B-B-But ... you're...”

Her hands were trapped, one for each of them, while they each had a hand free. And they used them, Art setting his free hand on her outer thigh, while Matt put his hand on her hip.

“And we can stop anytime you want us to,” Matt said, winking at her. His drifting hand slid to the front of her pants, and found the button of her fly. “But, I'm really hoping you don't want us to. Cause damn, I really want to eat you.”

All she had to do was say stop. Good, easy! Easily done. All she had to do was tell them to stop, and the two handsome, gorgeous creatures trying to seduce her would stop. Yeap. Just say stop.

She looked down at Matt's hand on her fly. With one hand he managed to slip the button out of the hole, while Arturo had his fingers in the waistband. She made another tug on her hands, harder, but still she couldn't get away. Harder again, still nothing. The werewolves refused to let go of her fingers, and they kept smiling at her as they started to slide off her pants. Matt's grin had all the sinister intent of a puppy, but Art's grin was as villainous as ever.

"I ... you ... p-please don't? You're..."

"Just say stop and we'll stop," Matt said.

Saying it wasn't easy apparently; it was hard! And the harder she tried, the more she struggled to get the word out.

The villain of the duo chuckled, licked his lips a little — so damn sexy it hurt — and slid her pants down to her knees. "Or," he said, "you can ... think it's called blush?"

"W-Who ... told you ... about that?" Pants, around knees! They could see her underwear!

"Friend of yours."

"... Jessy!" Oh, that bitch. "She said ... you t-t-talked with her."

"We did. Earlier tonight." Art continued to pull her pants down, and she tried to pull away all the more. Like trying to move buildings. They weren't that heavy, not for a vampire, but she couldn't move them at all. Her strength was gone. "She said you might need a little push."

They planned this. They planned it and Jessy helped them. Her so called friend was going to get a mouthful when she found her.

Reality yanked her back when she found pants around her ankles, and the two werewolves working together to lift a foot out of one pant leg, and then the other. Now all she had on was socks and her shirt, and her boring pair of white underwear. But her underwear didn't seem to bother either wolf, who stared at her and her legs, and roamed over the smooth skin with their huge hands.

They really wanted her. Two werewolves, massive beasts, dripping of life and heat and hunger, they wanted her. This was nothing like with Jessy's ghouls, who wanted her like ... like an aroused man wanted what he was attracted to. Which, she admitted to only herself, she'd loved. But Art and Matt were ... they weren't humans, or vampires, they were wolves, and as their fingers roamed her small legs, leaving her wriggling, squirming, and trapped, their eyes devoured her like ... like prey.

“You ... wait ... p-please, I...”

“Not hearing the safe word,” Art said. His hand around her wrist pulled her toward him, until her legs were touching his and Matt's. Matt's free hand danced up to her shirt, and started undoing the buttons from the bottom, while Art's other hand reached behind her. His fingers cupped her ass, squeezed it through her underwear, caressed along the small of her back and tail bone, before sliding under the waistband.

Stop. All she had to do was say stop.

She pulled away again, futilely. The wolves weren't letting her go, and they weren't stopping. Their hands roamed her body, touched and massaged her thighs and ass, tickled along her ever exposing skin as Matt undid more of her buttons, and played with the edges of her clothes. Art's fingers slid her underwear down a little, and she almost squeaked. But he stopped once they were only a couple inches down, and he grinned his smug bastard grin at her before his fingers reached higher, and slid her shirt off her shoulders with Matt's help. Whenever they needed to, they switched hands off on hers without ever letting her go. All her pulling and tugging and wriggling did nothing to stop them as the two beasts undressed her.

She stood there, wearing nothing but her white underwear and simple little t-shirt bra, pouting her best 'please stop' pout. It only spurned them on.

"God damn you are beautiful," Matt said, eyes stuck to her flat, toned stomach, her tiny breasts still hidden, her pale Kindred skin.

"It isn't 1920 Matt. She's sexy, and hot, those are the words you're looking for."

"I can't say she's beautiful?"

"Not if you're trying to keep the mood."

Matt just rolled his eyes, and pulled her in a little closer. She couldn't get much closer than legs touching theirs, so she leaned forward a little, held upright by the grip they kept on her hands.

"Blush for me, please?"

Oh ... oh god damn it. His eyes, big green puppy eyes. There was hunger there, ravenous, sexual hunger, but on top of it all he wore blatant sincerity that was too damn adorable. And handsome. She wanted to run her fingers through his long, dark blond, almost brown hair, touch the scruff of his face, kiss his lips.

And Art, Art she wanted to punch. After. For now, she stared at him, at the voracious need written on his face, his dark brown eyes, smooth face and hard jaw, his messy shoulder-length black hair, his ... his everything.

If she said stop, they'd stop. She could leave, and go home. Maybe call Jessy, berate her, and then maybe have some fun with her ghouls. Or she could blush for the two beasts holding her hands, undressing her, touching her, and they'd ravage her. From the look in their eyes, she couldn't help but imagine them pinning her down, prying her open, forcing things into her, devouring her.

She bit her lip a little with one of her fangs. Didn't mean to, it just happened as she deliberated like a kid in a candy store, but it made both the wolves groan with blatant arousal, and then growl. A real, deep, quiet growl in the throat and chest that she felt through where they trapped her hands.

She blushed.

"... that is sexy," Matt said, eyes looking her up and down.

Even when blushing, she still had pale skin, but it wasn't her skin tone the two beasts were staring at. It was her breasts, and her nipples stabbing out against her soft bra. It was her flat stomach, and how the blush brought some life to her subtle abs and hips. It was her underwear, and how, only moments into the blush, a droplet of moisture was starting to form. Oh god.

She blushed a normal, human blush then, and her body went red. Head to toe, she felt the burn of red, and her cheeks wanted to explode.

"I think she likes it." Art leaned in toward her, still sitting so he had to crane his neck a bit to point his lips up at her, but they found her collar, her neck, her chin, and he put gentle, warm kisses along her naked skin, each accompanied with an electric tingle.

"I ... I um ... this ... this isn't f-f-fair."

"It really isn't," Art said, kiss slipping down to her collar, and then her sternum. "Been wanting to get inside you since the first time we met. Fucking killing me."

Before she could respond, Matt's free hand took the waistband of her underwear, and slid them down to her knees. She meeped and renewed her struggles to cover herself, but they didn't let her. There was a tiny strand of wetness connecting her sex to her underwear until it finally reached her knees. Once the white fabric was around her ankles, they again lifted her feet and forced her to step out of her clothes, like she'd become their doll.

"God damn," Matt said, eyes glued to her thighs, jaw dropped slightly. "That is the sweetest little thing I have ever seen."

"I am not a p-p-p-piece of meat!" More struggles, more futility. The two of them were staring at her sex, at her smooth mons, her puffy little vulva and hidden lips. Wet, and her clitoris was swollen enough to stick out slightly. Staring, and staring, until she was bursting with embarrassment and blushing to death. But they wouldn't let go of her hands, wouldn't let her cover herself, wouldn't let her escape.

"And yet, I really want to eat you." Art's free hand hooked the front of her bra, and pulled it up over her head. Part of her wanted to be obstinate, and not lift her arms. But it was too late to be so petty now, and once the two wolves let go of her hands, she lifted her arms so Art could lift the thing clear off of her.

Naked. Absolutely naked. She was so small compared to them, and naked, and naked, and naked some more. She covered her breasts and privates with her arms, finally having them free, but she remembered what it was like with the ghouls, and how silly it'd been. So, with a deep, useless breath, she lowered her arms, and tried to stand there with some pride. Or defiance, not sure which.

Matt leaned in, and growled. She squeaked and blinked at the gentle giant, but the man's eyes were half closed and not looking at her, they were looking at her breasts. Art did the same, pulling her in closer as he leaned in from his seat. Matt was leaning down lower, and she could feel his hot breath on her nipple. Art was higher, his grinning lips only inches from hers, his eyes on hers. He took her hand again, and set it on his shoulder.

“Eat m-me?” she said, and she squeezed his shoulder a little. Didn’t mean to, didn’t try to, it just happened. He was so warm, and hard, and broad.

He came closer, closer until his lips were touching hers. Not kissing, not yet, but god damn she wanted to. His eyes, his damn, beautiful dark eyes, the heat of him so close to her, and much as she told herself not to, she breathed in his scent.

“I—” She squeaked again, loudly, and looked down at Matt. The giant had put his lips around her nipple, and was kissing it with the most tender, warm, wet lips. More sparks along her skin, tingly, electric. Her whole body started to shiver, and she squirmed as she tried to take a step back. Matt had one hand holding her thigh, the other holding her butt, and he refused to let her back away as he lowered his kiss to the underside of her small breast, and planted warm little kisses.

For a second she was going to say something, maybe ‘stop’, but when she opened her mouth, Art’s lips found hers. Time froze. Life and warmth on her face, on her lips, so close to her he ... he was kissing her. You couldn’t get much closer than kissing. He was kissing her, and nudging his nose into her a bit like a playful dog; his kiss was most definitely not dog-like though. His kiss was tender, and he plucked at her bottom lip after a few moments of her standing there like a statue.

“You’re smooth,” he said.

She gasped and looked down. Art’s fingers had found her mons, and were caressing where her pubic hair should have been. The soft mound of skin molded to his exploring fingers, his digits tracing invisible symbols.

“I ... I ... shaved it a long t-time ago, and ... chose to not regrow it.”

“You can do that?”

“Mhmm. It—nn!” The bastard’s fingers slid further down, and found her budding clitoris. She squealed, mewled, whimpered, and every sound she didn’t want to come out of her came out when she looked down, and found the large man’s hands caressing her folds. He didn’t stroke her clit directly, only nudged against it, teased it as he massaged her labia, wet his fingers with her juices.

Art’s head drifted lower, and Matt’s head drifted higher. Natasha wriggled some more, but at this point she was having trouble focusing, on trying to remember who she was or what her original plan had been. All she could think about was a set of fingers massaging the tiny lips between her thighs, sending warm sparks through her body. Her nipples were so hard they hurt, and her breath came out in tiny pants, pants Matt smiled into as his lips plucked at hers. She blinked at him, sucked into the hungry gaze, and let out a tiny whining sound as Art’s mouth found her other nipple.

Kissing. She was kissing him. Both of them!

“This ... isn’t fair,” she said. “You t-two ... you’re...”

“Still dressed,” Matt said. “Yeah, this is pretty mean.”

And just like that, both of them got up, and stripped. Natasha stared, jaw dropping, eyes wide, arms dangling, as the two men threw away their shirts and jeans, their underwear and socks, completely comfortable with each other.

Jessy would have loved them. All the werewolves had such strong bodies, fit, powerful, and naked she could see all the muscles, the indentations and striations and abs. Abs, hard, chiseled, defined abs. Art wasn’t as big or wide as Matt, but that was because Matt was a wall of meat that couldn't fit through a doorway. Art was a tall man too, big and lean and ... and very hard, with his large member sticking out from his pelvis. She looked to Matt, and found the man's member growing to hard erection as well. She'd done this to them? She hadn't even touched them!

This couldn't have been happening. She must have been dreaming, and somehow stumbled into Jessy's dream.

Matt took her hand, and guided her toward the apartment's hallway.

"I ... I um ... you're..."

"You'll have to forgive us for being a little pushy with you," Matt said as he pulled her into the bedroom. Just a simple apartment, nothing fancy, white walls and a king-sized bed with some blue sheets. Perfectly innocent. "Jessy was right about you."

"J-Jessy!" That was right! This was all Jessy's fault! She tried to jump away, but Matt's hand was still holding hers, and he smiled as he sat down on the bed. The harder she pulled, the more he pulled her toward him, with all the urgency of a turtle. "You ... you planned this! And Jessy, she ... she ... b-b-betr—"

Art appeared in the doorway, and he leaned against the frame as he folded his arms across his naked chest. "No one betrayed you, Natasha. We came to Jessy cause Matt and I really like you, but we know your situation is complicated, and ... well, two guys one girl. Figured it was better to ask the girl's friend first about how viable this was, you know?"

"You—eep!" She'd never get a word out at this rate. Matt picked her up, laid her on the bed on her back, and he lay beside her on his side. But he was big, and heavy, and huge and big and mountainous, and the bed sank a little so he had to adjust to get comfortable beside her. She tried to get up and scamper away, but his hand found her shoulder, and he planted her right back down against the sheets.

“She said you liked us too, and that you’d be willing to have us in your bed, if we gave you a little nudge,” Matt said, his lips to her shoulder, and planting delightful, warm kisses.

Natasha squirmed all the more, tried to get up a few more times to no success, and frowned at the wolf beside her holding her down. But Art drew near, and her eyes lifted to stare at the man as he too climbed onto the bed, large shaft hanging between his legs as he crawled over and lay beside her, opposite of Matt.

Warmth, muscle and skin, their bodies lightly pressed against hers, touched hers, their hard members nudged against her legs with the position, and their breath was on her neck. The two of them were so giant compared to her, she disappeared between them, like two walls of flesh that closed in on her, trapped her, buried her, refused to let her go.

“You ... y-you said you’d stop if I said stop.”

“Yeap. Moment you say it straight, we’ll stop.” Art leaned in closer, and put his lips on her ear. “I’m really hoping you don’t.”

“This is mean!”

“Yeap,” Matt said, his lips doing the same as Art’s. But his hands weren’t. While one of his arms was pressed to the bed underneath him, since he was on his side facing her, the other that had been holding her down eased up, and drifted down her chest. It tickled along her nipple, caressed along the underside of her small breast, before drifting down her belly and pelvis to find her clitoris.

And unlike Art’s infuriating, teasing massage from earlier, Matt’s fingers embraced her clitoris between two fingertips, and began to massage her.

She melted. She tried to find the anger, the frustration again, looked for some inkling of rage against Jessy for having betrayed her like this, for offering her up to these two wolves. But, as she looked between the two handsome men, lying on their sides beside her, she couldn't find it anymore. Sharp sparks of bliss danced along her clitoris and pulsed through her pelvis, earning squeezing muscles that had more of her juices trickling down her pussy.

Her hands came up to her chest, and she kept them tucked under her collar, elbows to her stomach. They didn't stay there long. Art's hand was free, and he used it to take hers, and set it on his cock. Tall as he was, tiny as she was, his length was resting against her thigh above the knee. She couldn't see, unable to raise her head with both wolves nibbling at her ears, kissing her neck, her lips. But she could feel it, the thickness of it, the subtle veins and grooves. The size. Matt did the same, stopping his caressing to take her other hand and set it on his cock as well. And once she gave it the tiniest squeeze, the man resumed massaging her clit, until it was singing and her body was squirming.

Two men, two shafts in her hands. She could hurt them, do something horrible to them, make them pay for humiliating her like this. But as Art raised his head a bit more, and put a few of his warm kisses on the corner of her lips, she turned to look at him. He was smiling at her, waiting, expectant, hopeful, and ... and ... happy.

Maybe she could stab them later. For now, she closed her eyes, leaned in, and kissed him.

Art grinned into her kiss, but he didn't pull away. Good, cause it took everything she had to find that courage. They'd been kissing her, touching her, stripping her, groping and fondling — gently thankfully — her body, but she hadn't done anything to them yet. So she kissed Art, and started to lightly stroke his member. Her efforts earned a quiet, deep rumbling sound from the titan, and she trembled as the vibration of his voice filled her.

A soft caress of Matt's fingers along her dripping pussy's lips jolted her back to awareness. She opened her eyes, and Art pulled away with a wink before his free hand reached up to tease her hard nipple the way Matt was with her clitoris. Matt nudged his nose to her chin, and she turned her head to look at him. Those deep green eyes, god damn it. She melted all the more as Matt leaned in, and she brought her lips forward to meet his. A couple of massaging squeezes and strokes of his cock for him too.

Art's fingers drifted down, walking down her ribs, her stomach, her hip, and between her thighs. She thought he was going to replace Matt's hand, but his fingers cupped her thigh, and he pulled her legs apart a little. His fingers reached further up her thigh, knuckles no doubt nudging against Matt's hand; didn't seem to bother them. Without pause, Art's fingers started to press between her tiny folds, until they found her entrance.

"You are drenched," he said.

"Cause ... cause Matt keeps ... t-touching me." She frowned at Art, but it only lasted a moment before her mouth opened, and a whimper came out of her.

Whimper turned to loud mewl as Art pushed two of his fingers into her clenching pussy, and pressed them up against her walls toward her belly. Matt didn't seem to get the message though, and he continued to caress her clit as Art pushed against her g-spot in slow, deep pulses. And each made her clench down on him, body desperate to control the overloading stimulus of two hands playing with her.

"W-Wait ... it's—"

"So. Damn. Tight." Art's voice came out as a guttural growl, and Natasha's eyes went wide as the wolf angled his head to set his teeth against her neck. No bite came though, except for the occasional playful nibble. As he kissed her neck, his fingers started to speed up, pushing up against her insides a little harder, a little faster, catching up with the rhythm Matt had already been working on.

Too much too much. Attempts to continue stroking their members failed, and she put her hands on their hips instead, holding onto something as the orgasm hit her. She looked up at the ceiling, and closed her eyes as the bliss worked through her pelvis. Her legs spread more, and her hips pushed toward their hands to meet them.

“S-Stop,” she managed to say between her squeaks. Too much, almost painful stimulation on her clit, and her insides were squeezing hard enough to leave her a wriggling mess. Matt and Art stopped, immediately at that, and she managed to crack her eyes open to see their smiling faces as she came on their fingers. She could feel her juices dripping down her body, on Art’s fingers, a lot of it, and she blushed until her face felt like it was on fire. She covered her face with her hands, but continued to squeak and mewl as the sparks worked through her legs and made her toes curl.

But, at least they stopped when she asked, and once the waves started to pass, she lowered her hands again. The two wolves had their heads propped up on their palms, elbows to the sheets, and they slid their wet hands from her pussy to rest them on her belly. Smiling, grinning, eating her with their eyes.

“Did you want us to stop completely?” Matt said. “Or just for a second?”

“... s-second.” She bit her lip, and looked down at their huge hands on her small body. Two hands on her at the same time, making her cum, making her blush and mewl and soak the bed.

Art reached behind him. She couldn’t see what he was doing, but she could hear the drawer of the nightstand open, and see his evil grin. He brought his arm back over her belly, and set something cool on her flat tummy.

She blinked and looked at the small bottle ... of lubricant.

“Jessy insisted,” Art said as he leaned in, and put his lips on her earlobe again. “She really gave you up, said you enjoyed all sorts of experiments in your private time.”

“J-Jessy! I’ll kill her!” She tried to sit up again, but Art and Matt both had her pinned back down by the shoulders in an instant.

“Hey.” Matt’s lips offered her neck a kiss, and then her shoulder as he leaned back a bit. “Don’t have to do anything like that if you don’t want to. But, we know what we’re doing, and we think you’d enjoy it.”

Every inch of her was blushing red, and she raised her hands to cover her face again. No no no no no no no no this wasn’t happening. She’d told Jessy that in confidence, and she left out the details! That jerk didn’t know what Natasha experimented with ... with ... She was guessing! Guessing, right?

Jessy did know her well though, and it wasn’t like Natasha was the best at hiding her feelings about things. Jessy pestered her about anal and double penetration stuff before, and Natasha dodged the suggestion. Dodging was as good as admitting for Jessy, apparently.

“You ... you ... you know what you’re d-d-doing? This isn’t porn! You can’t just ... r-ram things in, and ... stuff.” Oh god what was she doing.

“Gentle as you want,” Art said. He put the bottle back on her stomach — it’d fallen in her fury — and popped it open. The evil grin of his wasn’t going away, and it only grew as he turned the bottle upside down, and started to trickle the thick liquid over her sex.

She gasped with the sensation of the cool liquid over her pussy, which was boiling hot and dripping already. The wolves didn’t care about the blankets, evidently, and they coated her with the lube before closing and setting the bottle on the blankets.

Art was the first to put his hand between her thighs. He leaned over her as he did, smiling down at her. Big bad wolf and she was feeling more and more like Red Riding Hood every passing second. So cliché, but so very true; she was completely hidden on the bed, surrounded by muscle and heat and grinning beasts.

She shuddered, and frowned at Art as the man started to caress the rose of her ass. The electric tingles started up in seconds.

“You ... you’re a ... you’re mean.”

“Sorry,” he said. “Can’t help it. I really like you, and I hope to be doing things to you on a frequent basis.”

“F-Frequent? I—nn!” She covered her mouth with her hands, and glared at Art with as much malice and rage as she could muster as the man started to work a finger passed her sphincter. Her hands went higher, covering her eyes instead of her mouth.

More fingers found her, but she refused to look. Better to stay hidden, pretend this wasn’t happening, that she wasn’t trapped between two men and one of them was gently opening her ass. The other man’s fingertips tickled along her drenched and coated lips before he sank his digits into her pussy, and pressed upward toward her belly. She squeezed on both sets of fingers, hard, and trembled. Not fair not fair not fair.

“Certainly hoping this isn’t a one night thing,” Matt said. He pushed his fingers in deeper, and deeper, and pressed up toward her belly until she was gasping, until she felt the deepest spot inside her pushed up against her and making her whimper. That spot, deep deep, he pressed it up toward her stomach with a curled finger, and her ass raised to push her hips against him.

Couldn't help it, couldn't stop herself. Deep, so fucking deep. But pushing her hips up tightened her ass, and Art's probing finger was forced to stop as Matt stroked her insides.

But, Matt stopped. She still didn't expose her eyes, refused to look, refused to meet what was undoubtedly some very evil grins. He gave her a moment to let her butt come back down, and Art used it to sink his finger deeper into her. And deeper, finger finding the insides of her ass. Matt seemed content to only lightly press against her depths now, while Arturo started to slide his finger back out. Only to start pushing two in.

“W-Wait! Wait, please!”

“Not the safe word,” Art said. His lips found her ear again, under it, and trailed kisses along her neck as he started to work two of his fingers passed her sphincter. He went very, very, very slowly thank god, massaging the lubricant into the sensitive skin, and spreading the two fingers apart between nudges, stretching her.

He didn't stop until he'd sunk his fingers in to the final knuckle, and started to press up toward Matt's fingers. Two sets of fingers, inside her, filling her, and now pressing up against her. Matt resumed fingering the deepest spot of her pussy while Art pressed against it from deep in her ass; almost felt like they were in her stomach.

They pressed harder, working their fingers together in a rhythm motion, each press of their digits reducing her to a mewling mess. So deep, so full, and they knew how to get her body to respond whether she wanted it to or not, using that deep pressure that made her muscles clench and hot sparks run up and down her legs. And they worked with each other, each taking turns feeling her depths, massaging places she only ever touched with her toys normally. They were gentle, but persistent, curled fingers bathing her insides in pressure.

She lowered her hands from her eyes, and eventually set them back on her chest, palms over her nipples. Trying to hide the shame of her arousal, pathetic as it was at this point. She was whimpering, squeaking, and pushing her hips toward the two men's hands. Her juices were joining the lubricant, and her legs were spreading on their own, until they couldn't get any further apart with the two massive men's bodies blocking them.

They both set their lips on her neck, and started kissing her again, nibbling gently on her jawline, or kissing her when she turned her head ever so slightly. And as they did, they moved their hands a little faster, a little harder, fingers opening her up and stretching her deeper. They found a new rhythm, the two of them pressing up against her depths near her womb, toward her stomach at the same time, making her ass lift off the blankets a tiny inch with each thrust.

For a moment, Natasha remembered the sight of Jessy through Damien's telescope, and how it looked seeing the woman being opened up by the fingers of four men. Did she look like that right now?

Too much too much. She closed her eyes and pressed her arms tight to her chest as she came. The two men continued to kiss her, the heat of their bodies flooding her until she started to sweat slightly; the blush would let her do everything she did while alive, even the embarrassing things. And, as powerful waves of pleasure worked outward from her pelvis and into her clenching muscles, she squealed. They weren't stopping. They kissed her, suckling softly on her neck, while their fingers continued to fill her, opened her, stretched her ass and pussy with their deep, pressing fingertips.

Her squeals turned into broken things, barely more than squeaks as she felt more of her juices soak down the fingers of the two men, and down her thighs and butt. The bed was wet, and only getting wetter as the werewolves fingered her through her orgasm.

“Stop! Stop!”

Instantly, the two creatures stopped.

She reached out with her hands, and set them onto the hips of the two huge animals lying against her sides. Had to hold onto something, to brace herself as she continued to convulse and spasm, continued to clench on the fingers inside her and leak more of her cum onto them. They stayed inside her as the pleasure pulsed, but at least they'd stopped fingering her.

After a minute of horribly embarrassing noises and juices, she opened her eyes. The two wolves were smiling down at her, hunger in their eyes. Hunger, actual hunger, the sort that made her meep, and stare.

“Th-Thank you ... for ... stopping,” she said between pants. “I ... couldn't ... umm...” She'd started seeing stars, but she couldn't say something that awkward. No way.

“We weren't lying. Any time you want to stop.” Matt set his lips on hers, and nudged them in a slow, circular sway. He was a good kisser.

“Though I'm hoping we can continue,” Art said, his lips finding her ear, even as Matt's lips danced on hers.

“... ok.” Trying to think straight was pointless. She understood that. She was swimming in arousal and orgasm aftershocks and surrounded by heat and blood and muscle and she was dripping with sweat and so much cum and she still had two men's fingers inside both her holes and ... and she wanted more.

Art smiled down at her, slipped his fingers free of her squeezing muscles, and grabbed the lubricant once more. He spared no expense with the liquid, and thoroughly coated his large cock with the clear liquid. Natasha sat up a touch on her elbows, and trembled at the sight of him working his length, spreading the lube along the veined girth and over the ripe glans; he'd been leaking his own droplets of precum before, and she could smell the arousal coming off of him.

He took her hip with his wet hand, and turned her onto her side. She squeaked again, and stared at Matt as Art turned her to face the blond man, her butt against Art's hip. They had to adjust positions to accommodate the height difference; she was tiny, they were very much not. So her head was only at chest level with Art, and Matt, and she had to look up to see the giant's warm, smiling face, as his bastard friend slipped his thick girth between her thighs. She quivered when she looked down, and found the bulbous tip poking out from underneath her pussy.

“You ... you're uh ... y-you...”

Art pulled his hips back a little, grasped the base of his cock, and nudged the swollen glans along the crack of her ass. She shivered all the more as he took his time, nudging it along her wet skin before easing it between her cheeks, and resting its soft tip against the rose of her sphincter.

“Just relax,” he said.

Relax. Relax! Easier said than done. She was about to take a large phallus in the butt. On the first date! It wasn't even a date!

She lay there on her side, and stared at the wall of muscle before her that was Matthew. The giant's free hand reached out for her, guided her chin to make her look up at him and his sweet smile, before it drifted down her naked body and down between her legs again. Fingers found her dripping entrance, and began to again gently massage her labia, riding a pleasant line between stimulus and relaxing.

Art pushed against her ass a little, and Natasha pouted up at Matt as he did. Couldn't help it. She squirmed slightly as the man behind her began to ease the head of his cock passed her muscles, still stretched open by his fingers from earlier. But she still had to take a breath, relax, and let her muscles loosen as the wolf began to slide his shaft into her. Matt didn't stop massaging her as his friend began to penetrate her, he only smiled, and adjusted his fingers to include her aching, swollen clit in his gentle caresses.

"You ... you're both ... s-s-s-so ... mean, and ... and..." She reached out with both hands to press against Matt's chest. Solid iron. She turned her head to look at the man behind her. Art had his elbow down against the blankets, hand raised to hold his cheek as he smiled down at her, while his other hand held her hip and kept pulling her toward him. She thought she was surrounded by men before, but as Art gently sank another inch of his cock into her ass, she gulped on her fear.

It felt amazing.

Once Art had the glans of his shaft inside her, he paused and eased back a little, giving her the room she needed to relax her muscles again. He went deeper, pulling her body across the blankets closer to him. The angle pushed his cock's head up toward her belly, toward her pussy, and she shuddered as she felt the pressure sensation work its way deeper. Again, another inch, and Art let her relax before he pulled her in more.

"Mean?" Matt said. "You look like you're enjoying yourself to me."

"I ... I am." She blushed again and looked away from Art's evil grin. At least Matt looked less insidious. "But, this ... we've ... jumped like ... t-t-ten dates worth of build up."

"Sorry," Art said with the most insincere pout she'd ever seen.

But before she could reprimand him, he sank deeper into her, deep enough she thought she could feel him in her belly. She pouted up at Matt again, silently begging for some help, but it only seemed to spur the man on, and his fingers continued to caress her soaked clitoris until the pleasure was building again. Art worked with the motion, and eased her onto him another inch between her muscle clenches. So full, she was so full, so utterly full.

Art leaned down over her, and growled, deep in his chest, when the cheeks of her ass molded to his body. Balls deep. She whimpered openly, until Art took one of her hands, and brought it down between her legs. Matt moved his, and Art placed her digits where his cock was spreading her open, where his girth had stretched open her small hole, where his testicles were pressed against her ass and inner thighs. All soaked.

“You feel amazing,” he said.

“I ... I...” She tried to hold still, but every breath the blush of life brought on made her shiver. Art was stretching her deeper, wide, and his cock pressed toward her belly relentlessly. He wasn’t even moving and she could feel his hard shaft rubbing against her walls, each passing moment causing her insides to adjust to take in his girth. And, despite herself, she reached down and touched where his cock opened her, teased her fingers down the hot, wet skin and veins.

Matt slid himself in closer, until his chest was almost touching Natasha’s nose. As if the heat wasn’t already overwhelming, now each breath was a powerful concoction of musk and sex as the werewolf put the wall of muscle of his chest inches from her. And from so close, his cock rubbed its wet tip along her flat stomach.

“You ... you’re...”

Matt growled. God, so close, she could feel the rumble in his chest. It made her clench on Art’s shaft, made her wriggle and panic, made her whimper, and leak cream down her thighs.

Art's fingers, still wet with lubricant and her own cum, found her pussy, and started to massage her clitoris the way Matt had just been moments ago. The sparks were building again, making her squeak despite Art's refusal to thrust. But, Matt and Art must have known what they were doing. Without words they were in sync, and where Art continued to caress her labia, massage and bathe her aching, swollen clit in tender strokes, Matt moved his hips down, and at the same time took her leg. With her on her side and one leg pinned to the blankets, Matt's wet fingers found her thigh, and he pulled her knee over his massive leg while his cock slid down her belly, massive glans leaving a trail of precum down her stomach, her bare mons, and down to her clit where Art moved his hand out of the way.

"Wait ... wait, it's ... t-t-too much. I can't b-breathe, I..."

"Vampires don't breathe," Matt said, and he pushed the head of his cock against her entrance.

She put her hands to his chest, her elbows tight against her ribs as she braced for him. But he didn't thrust like she expected. No, the beast only prodded, nudged his fat cock against her clenching opening, and eased in the thickness of his glans between her squeezing spurts. She mewled, loudly, and leaned her head forward to rest her forehead against Matt's sternum as the wolf gently started to push himself into her body.

And Art! The bastard Arturo started massaging her again, two fingers pressed to her clit and caressing her, even as his friend began the long journey of sinking inch after inch of his girth into her. She had no room left inside her, everything was tight and stuffed, and she could feel Matt stretching her apart, opening her far more than his fingers did. Bumps and grooves, the slight give of flesh against her squeezing, soaked muscles, his thickness fighting for room inside her. She squeezed, hard, but the man continued to fill her up.

“W ... wait... , “ she said. They weren’t listening. And she didn’t want them to stop.

Matt slid in closer, until his legs were cozy with hers. She had one leg still straight out from her body, and both of Art’s against it. And now, both of Matt’s against it, while her other leg was hooked over his leg, and held there by his hand. They clearly had no trouble dealing with the intricacies of this, of threesomes, of dealing with six legs fighting for space, of getting ... very ... very close. Matt kept getting deeper, until she was sure maybe he’d get self conscious about being so near Art’s body. But, he kept pulling her toward him with her leg, and shifting his hips closer to her, until she was looking up at him, touching his chest that was an inch from her lips and chin, and silently begging for ... something.

Matt looked down at her, and smiled, big and warm. And so hot. So dreamy, and hot, and handsome, and god damn it. She reached out with her arm further from the blankets, and hooked it around his waist, his massive body, his muscles, and hugged him close as the wolf started to stretch her deep. She’d run out of room, but the beast kept pushing in, and she squeaked as his cock started to press up against the deepest parts of her.

“Gentle! P-Please, gentle ... gently ... it’s ... nnnn!” Attempts to communicate with the deadly creatures came to a quick end as Art started to stroke her clit harder, even as Matt continued to push into her, pressing against her depths, pushing her flesh deeper, stretching her apart. But he was being gentle, despite Art stroking her clit harder as his friend spread her open.

Art only stopped once Matt had sank himself balls deep into her tiny body, and she was on the edge of orgasm. Squealing, she pressed her forehead to Matt’s sternum again, hugged him tight with both arm and leg, and hyperventilated, panting into the beast's body. So close, so close she could taste the pleasure on her tongue. Just a few more strokes, a few thrusts, anything and she'd cum. But they'd both stopped, and both stayed inside her, buried to the hilt.

"You ok?" Matt said.

"Am ... am I ok?"

"Yeah." Art reached behind him with his free hand. She couldn't see what he was doing, but after rustling around for a moment, he put his hand back on her body, now dry. Must have wiped it off on a towel, or maybe the blankets. That hand, big, strong, evil, crept up her naked body, and hugged her to his chest, his elbow to her hip while his palm cupped one of her breasts. "Never had a woman as small as you."

"As small? I ... I-I'm just ... one of your conquests! I..." She managed a frown, but it melted away as Art's hand drifted higher, higher, and his fingers found her collar. Soon, powerful fingers wrapped her throat in a soft, huge grip, and she turned her head to look up at Art.

She expected an evil grin, but the man was giving her the same warm smile as Matt.

"Not true," he said. "Like we said, not a one night thing. I like you."

Matt nodded. "I like you too."

She looked down, blushing, somehow still able to blush despite the absurd lechery of her current predicament.

Blushing turned into more melting as Art squeezed her neck. Just a little, just enough for her to feel the strength of his fingers, a little firmness, a huge grip, just enough pressure for her head to press back against his chest. Enough pressure so she felt completely exposed. Vulnerable. Defenseless.

Her hug on Matt loosened, and she put her hands back on his chest as her body went limp. Utterly defenseless. Trapped, captured. Trying to do anything, with two werewolves pinning her, fucking her, penetrating her, would have been futile. Right?

Her hand started to circle Matt's chest, just the little bit in front of her, the bit of hair she found, and she smiled despite herself. It was useless to try and escape, she might as well just ... moan.

Moaning earned two growling rumbles from the beasts. Deep, bass-filled noises that she felt vibrate through her body. With their chests, their whole bodies squishing her in a sandwich of flesh and muscle, she felt more than just their animal noises. She felt their breathing. She felt their heartbeats, powerful, getting faster. She felt their blood pumping through their titan frames.

She felt them both start to move. "Oh ... god."

Matt kept his hand around her leg so it remained hooked against his body, and he started to push into her. With the whole of his length already inside her, his motion rubbed his body against her, his cock against her depths, against ... against Art, against how his girth was filling her up too. No room at all! Every gentle rock of Matt's tender motion was making her whimper, especially as he started to ease his cock out of her, and her muscles clenched down as hard as they could. The friction of his girth along her drenched, taut insides, and how Art made everything so, damn, tight, was filling her body with tingling waves until she started to see spots again.

And Art started to move too. Matt gently fucked her with long, deep strokes, but Art stayed inside her, deep, deep enough she could feel him pressing toward her belly, toward his friend. Art's motions were shallow, fucking her in slow thrusts only an inch deep, but staying as deep as he could, deep enough her ass was pressed tight to his pelvis. All she had to do was lay there between them, with Art's fingers around her throat, with Matt's hand around her leg, and try to survive.

Easier said than done. As Matt sank every inch of himself into her, until again, she felt him stretching her deep, her breath caught in her chest. If he had thrust hard it would have really hurt, but he kept it slow, gentle, the thick head of his cock rubbing against her deepest parts and pressing against where Art's cock was pressing against too. Too much, way too much.

She came. Hard. Her arm hugged Matt tight, her other underneath her gripping Art's wrist, and her leg hooked Matt's thigh, as the pleasure started to rock her. The two beasts sank themselves into her again, to the hilt, and slowed down for her. But they didn't stop. They continued to fuck her, gentle, tender thrusts, as she came all over them. Each spark of pleasure rippled out from between her legs and down into her toes, making them curl, making her body squeeze and tremble, making her eyes close and her voice come out in whimpering squeaks again.

Her cum came flooding. She whimpered into Matt's chest and hid her face against it as she quivered between spasms, each forcing her muscles to clench and for more of her fluids to leak out of her. She tried to stop, but the two wolves kept thrusting into her in a gentle, consistent rhythm, in sync with each other and each of them insuring they were both fully inside with each motion. Like cogs working together, working more of her cum out of her, until she could feel the warmth of it trickling down her thighs, over her legs, and soaking the sheets. She was leaking, all over Matt's cock.

The two beasts slowed to a stop, and she spent the next thirty seconds doing nothing but squirming on their cocks as the pleasure waves continued to work up and down through her body. She managed to look up at Art, and his fingers loosened into more of a caressing grip, fingertips and thumb stroking the soft skin of her neck, as her ass squeezed on his girth. Matt did the same, grip on her leg softening but keeping her snug to his body, even as his fingers started to massage and knead the muscles of her thigh.

“You soaked me,” Matt said.

“I ... I-I-I ... um...” Good god she had soaked him. She didn’t normally do this, get this wet, only if she was very, very, very aroused, and feeling experimental. Not even with Jessy’s ghouls had she ever made a mess like this though. No use in denying it.

“You really like this sort of thing,” Art said. Before she could respond, or protest, he started to slide his cock out of her, only to push it back in once he’d removed half of himself. Her body fought to create room, to accommodate so much filling her up, until she was reduced to whimpers again as the head of his cock pressed against that spot, that deep spot where the head of Matt’s cock was stretching her inward.

Her insides felt like they were going to burst. They were both big guys! And she was a small woman! It was ... it was a lot of flesh trying to fit inside her. Warm, living, hard flesh, stretching her and ... filling ... her.

“You ... please, d-don’t ... tease me.”

“Us, teasing you?” Art chuckled

“You do tease her,” Matt said. His hand around her leg slid along her thigh, up her ass and waist, up her arm to grab her hand and bring it to his lips. Her fingers traced the scuff of his cheeks before Matt put her fingertips between his teeth, and ever so gently nibbled on her.

“I—nn!” She tried to say something, but Matt pulled out of her, and thrust back into her with a little more force. Not hard, not like a normal sex rhythm might find, but with how big he was, and how little space was left inside her, a gentle thrust was more than enough to make her squeak, and make her arm and leg hug him tight.

They both started to fuck her. They'd been content before to keep their strokes gentle and deep, but now they were pulling out a large amount of their length, and again sinking into her. She could feel every inch of them sliding in and out, friction against the sensitive parts of her, aching, swollen, coated in more and more of her cum as she panted against Matt's chest.

Slowly, the two started to go faster. Over minutes, Matt started to thrust into her hard enough she felt her ass hit against Art. Thank god Arturo kept his pace reasonable, gentle. Rough anal sex was a no no for her, and Art knew it. Maybe he wasn't so evil. But Matt felt no such limitations, and he started to thrust into her harder, faster, each thrust earning a squeak. His thrusts were no longer as deep, giving her tender depths a break, but that didn't stop each stroke from rubbing along her squished flesh, from dragging along her g-spot until her body started to writhe.

She hugged the giant, and came again.

"You are a sexual little thing aren't you?" Art said.

She couldn't dignify him with an answer, only squeak with each of Matt's thrusts. They were hard enough to make her body bounce a little between the two of them, hard enough she could hear the slap of wet flesh, soaked in her cum. Hard enough to make her body spasm with each wave of bliss and heat.

But, at last, the giant came to a stop. He pressed his cock against her depths, and gently eased himself in further, stretching her deeper and deeper as he sank himself into her pussy until he was balls deep. And then, as he buried himself to the hilt and stayed there, more warmth began to leak out of her.

“Oh ... M ... Matt,” she said. Matt was rumbling, rumbling like a beast, and with his chest and throat not even an inch away from her face, every note filled her. So much life, heat, and the lulling glow of orgasm. She could feel it from him, even as she coated his cock in her cum. His own cum was filling her, coating her with each gentle nudge of the beast, and soon it too was dripping down her thighs. A lot of it. A lot lot of it. She would have peeked down to see if she had the room, but she could feel thick, flowing waves of cum pooling along her pussy’s lips and down her thighs to join the mess on the blankets.

Part of her thought maybe she should try and make his orgasm better, maybe try some of those things Jessy talked about, squeezing and milking and stuff. A much bigger part of her couldn’t get past her own pleasure as the bliss tore through her, as she gushed on his cock and hugged him tighter.

Art wasn’t stopping. While she came, while Matt came, the wolf behind her continued to thrust. He still never went hard, never hurt her, but that didn’t change that he was gently sinking his cock balls deep into her ass in a tender rhythm, while the two of them came. Every time the softness of the head of his cock reached that deep spot inside her, she moaned, a mewling loud sound, straight into Matt’s chest.

Only when Matt had stopped cumming, and she had finally stopped cumming, did Art give her a single, slightly-hard-but-not-too-hard thrust, and started to make his own rumbling groans. His hand around her throat tightened, and he pulled her back toward his chest. She was already against it of course, being pinned between the two beasts, but Art held her throat tighter, much tighter, and Matt slid his chest back a few inches to give her room.

She squeaked, just a helpless little mouse, as the two beasts filled her. Matt was done, but still hard enough to resume his gentle thrusts. Just to make her whimper no doubt. She couldn’t stop whimpering! Couldn't stop mewling, and whimpering, and squealing and squeaking and getting juices everywhere, and now that Matt had pulled back enough for to see his chest and face, she blushed horribly. He was staring at her as Art came inside her, and dragging out the whole process with his gentle thrusts that had her melting.

Art's grip around her throat made her feel so ... powerless, defenseless. Vulnerable and unable to stop what they were doing to her. Not able to stop Matt from smiling at her as he gently fucked her taut pussy. Not able to stop Art from pinning her to his chest, from tenderly fucking her ass and pouring his cum into her. Not able to stop from mewling, rubbing Matt's chest of stone with her hands, and quivering as she squirted a little more on his girth. She forgot what the safeword was.

Slowly, Matt slipped his softening length out of her, and set the large thing on her thigh. Soaked, dripping with fluids, of several sources. The giant chuckled, a warm and inviting sound, and leaned down while shifting his body down as well, so his lips could find hers. Kissing. Tender, warm, delightful kissing, complete with his own quiet groans as his lips played with hers, tugging at them. And with Art still holding her throat, still milking the last few drops of his cum and pleasure into her ass, being kissed by Matt was ... so ... strange, and ... naughty.

At last, the evil man taking her from behind stopped. And when he pulled his cock out of her, she mewled into Matt's kiss. Warmth poured from her, flowing down her ass cheeks and joining the huge mess of fluids. He let go of her neck, and she looked down at her pelvis now that Matt was giving her room.

“ ... you ... you t-two ... are ... animals.” Her jaw dropped as she stared at the mess, at the thick streaks of white that lined her inner thigh of the lower leg, and at the literal pool of white beneath it. She looked over her shoulder and down toward her ass, only to find the same massive mess, the same coating of white along her cheeks.

Art shifted down the same as Matt had done, and leaned over to take her lips into his. More kissing, more gentle, tender kissing. Kissing, as his hand roamed her naked body. Kissing, as Matt's hand did the same, caressing her leg, her hip and waist, her breasts.

"I think," Art said into her mouth, and winking at her when she opened her eyes, "we could use a shower."

---

"Oh g-god oh my g-g-god."

She paced left and right on the living room carpet, towel wrapped around her. The shower had given her time to reflect, to think, to get the cum out of her. Very hot in the moment, not so hot in the aftermath. She frowned at them, then the carpet of the room, then them, then the room again.

"You ok, Tasha?" Matt said.

The two men returned from their showers, quick ones, but long enough to get the mess of sex off their bodies. Wearing nothing but a pair of jeans each, they sat down on the couch, and watched her pace.

She took a couple of peeks at them. Something about fit men wearing jeans and nothing but jeans was very appealing. And all the Uratha were fit as hell, built for fighting and hunting and tearing and clawing and ripping things open. Matthew and Arturo were no exception, and she had to force herself to stop staring at their bodies, their abs, their shoulders, their chests.

Like a young girl looking through a dirty magazine. The fuck was wrong with her? Blame Jessy!

“I’m ... I d-don’t know! This is v-v-very not normal. This is ... two guys!” She pointed at them with one hand, index finger for Art, middle finger for Matt.

Art shrugged. “So?”

“So! S-So, it’s ... weird. We, we’re ... this—”

Matt put up a hand. “You didn’t enjoy yourself? Felt like you did.”

She wasn’t blushing like anymore, thank god. She’d be a beet otherwise. “What about after sex! What about w-when we ... want to watch a movie, or g-g-go out, or ... or cuddle, and be romantic, and stuff.”

They both shrugged. “I like you,” they both said, in unison, again.

Art smirked at Matt, elbowed him in the side, and reached out to take Natasha’s hand into his. “Stop worrying about that. Matt and I are best friends, and we’re used to sharing everything.”

Yeah, she got that. Threesome sex was always fraught with complications; she knew that from her diligent research. Men were rarely comfortable with it, and that lead to problems. Then there were problems with positioning, where to put your legs and stuff. Then there were problems with the actual penetration, and how to go together at the same time, and things touching each other.

Matt and Art apparently had no issues with any of that. They were very comfortable with double penetration, and very good at it.

She yanked her hand free and used it to hold her towel tight to her body. “That’s not romantic! You d-d-don’t g-get it. I’ve always wanted ... a romance! A m-man t-t-to hold me, and ... and be ... kind and tender with me! You know? Hold my hand, and c-c-c-comb my hair, d-do my nails, and ... kiss me.” And doing all that stuff with two guys was weird. Weird!

They didn't seem to agree. Matt took her right arm, Art took her left arm, and they pulled her toward them. The towel fell, and she struggled to try and pick it back up, but they didn't let go of her hands again. Just like last time.

Naked, with her wet hair wrapped in another towel over her head. She looked ridiculous, but the two wolves didn't seem to notice or care. They looked her up and down like a meal, and pulled her in close until she was between their knees.

"We're not human, Natasha. Neither are you," Art said, grinning. "Think we give a damn about normal?" The evil, beautiful bastard put a kiss on her nose, then her lips, before kissing her fingers in his hand.

"Art can comb your hair, and I can do your nails." Matt, grinning the same evil grin as Art, also put a kiss on her lips.

"But ... b-b-b-b-but what if ... another girl ... you know."

"No other girls." Art let go of her hand. Matt too, only for Art to grab her by the waist and pick her up.

"H-Hey!"

Like a child, Art laid her across his lap so her head rested on his arm, her butt fell between the two wolves, and her legs fell across Matt's. She tried to get up, but of course her rebellious efforts were quickly squelched, Art using his other arm to pin her back down, and Matt pinning her legs down on his with ease.

"It's an exclusive relationship," Matt said. "Sorry if it's odd for you. But we really like you, and we're not letting you go." His hands took one of her heels, and he raised her foot before putting a kiss along her ankle.

Exclusive relationship. No one else, just her, and her two werewolves. She stared up at Art, and then at Matt, as the two huge beasts chuckled and smiled. It was going to be a very, very weird relationship.

God, they were going to spoil her rotten.

---

~~Antoinette~~

Her. Alone. Floor twenty-seven of her Elysium tower. Around her, her circular desk, and upon it a dozen screens, each portraying information. There were news reports about the tunnels, what little information she let escape into the news. There were Invictus reports that she had acquired through her many fingers, and Carthian reports as well, though those were often word of mouth from her spies. She had blueprints of her city up, and many highlighted points where the Uratha and the Begotten had been sighted, where deaths occurred, and the degree of which each was a threat to her city's veil.

Many of the monitors showed live feeds; her kine servants wore glasses with cameras in the frames, and others wore breast-pocket cameras, subtle, hidden. With her in her seat, she turned to face one monitor for a while, and digested the information it provided. Eyes on the Carthians, upon a group of them sitting around a corner near a territory the Invictus were building. Another monitor showed live feed of the Invictus, and their attempts to set up monitoring of their own on the Carthians.

None showed the contents of the abandoned tunnel section. None showed the areas where Fiona had been finding her prey, where the Azlu took advantage.

She frowned, then sighed until the frown faded. Leaning back in her chair, she brought up her hands to her lips, fingers netted together, elbows to the arms of the chair. Had she been foolish to trust the Uratha at their word? Perhaps, but not because the Uratha were lying; they had not. Rather, it was foolish to trust others that events will progress as they predict. Thus, it would have been prudent to begin monitoring the tunnels beneath Devil's Corner after Avery's message to Jack. But she had not; it would have been terribly difficult to monitor the tunnel depths without the Uratha knowing.

But maybe she should have. Doubts crashed against her, water upon the rocks of her mind. And they broke with time, as they always did. No, she had made the correct choice, when her two choices were poor. She had to entertain the Uratha their hunt, and be oblivious to it without the means to survey their work in those tunnels.

And that infuriated her. For so long she managed the silly games of her fellow Primogen, their spies, their espionage, their cold war. Dealing with their webs of deceit, and defeating them at their own game, was her world for so long. Such blatant violence from the werewolves, claw and muscle and savagery, so direct and aggressive that it made her methods inadequate. She would have to do better, adapt, break the wolves if necessary. If she could not, she would have to banish them. If they would not leave, she would have to kill them.

She reached across the desk and picked up her sword. Not since after Simon's departure had she created the blade, a short thing of maybe sixteen inches, with the simplest of handles: black, with a spiraled grip. The sword blade was silver, mixed with other metals to keep its hardness intact. More than strong enough to cut through muscle, sinew, and bone.

She put the blade down, and turned to look at Daniel

"I do wish I could meet Simon another time. I would plunge this blade through his idiot skull and be done with it."

“... understandable,” the man said, pressing his glasses to the bridge of his nose with an index finger. “But, Avery seems more reasonable.”

“Yes, she does. A pleasant, if unwanted surprise. I do wonder what happened to Simon; I should ask her. But I fear upsetting her...” Saying the word fear earned a scowl from her, and she slammed both her hands onto the flat side of the blade before her. “I should not fear her.”

“Fearing a werewolf is understandable.”

“I do not fear her strength.” For all Avery’s power, Antoinette felt confident she could best her. Indeed, she was more than capable of taking on that Goliath of raw, animal strength. It would not be the first time she had fought a werewolf; memories long faded, blurry, and filled with blood and pain. And this time, she was properly armed.

“But you fear the damage she can do to your city.”

“... yes.”

Daniel nodded, and started to pace in spot, slowly, eyes staring ahead like a statue, gloved finger to his lip. “Based on what you told me, this isn’t the same situation.”

She sighed, sat back in her chair, and pulled her hair over her shoulder to begin combing it with her fingers. “But Avery is still Avery. Eventually, Jacob will get involved.”

“I looked where you told me. Far as I can tell, Jacob was involved, but only after the arrival.”

“After ... There were two of those monsters, and Natasha assures me that that was, allegedly, a very unusual development. Perhaps Jacob is the cause?”

“Maybe.” Daniel stopped by the window and looked out over the city. The glass was a particular sort in its one-way distortion; they could look out, but others looking in saw only blurs. “He’s been doing something with his blood magic, as you suspected. But I could not figure out what.”

“ ... you could not?”

He shook his head. “I know whatever it was, was aimed at Avery.”

“Did he speak to Azamel?”

Daniel nodded again, and reached out to pluck her sword off her desk. No doubt Daniel had fetched his own silver sword, for the inevitable need. It was undoubtedly hidden within his drab trench coat even now, perhaps strapped next to his usual sword, far larger than hers, unwieldy and, in her opinion, almost absurd. But the man was comfortable with them, and had proven his skill a thousand times over during their partnership.

And as if he was unsatisfied with the size of hers, he swung it around a few times, each swing a perfectly balanced and natural movement. She raised a brow and watched him, and smiled after a time as Daniel nodded to himself, slashing the air a few times more for each nod.

“I’m not sure what he said to her either. Or Garry.”

“Garry.” She sighed and squeezed on her hair, before she resumed combing it. “I fear your outing was for naught then.”

He shrugged and set the short sword back upon the table. “Except we know Jacob has been talking to those two.”

“His talks with Garry are inconsequential. His typical games, pitting the Carthians and Invictus against each other.”

“Maybe. He talked to both, and then returned to perform his crúac ritual.”

“The same night?” That was unusual. She turned toward one of her monitors, and using the touch screen, expanded the view the camera had of the canyon at the edge of her city. Night vision, to deal with the darkness Jacob harnessed there. All quiet on the western front. Of course, Jacob’s gift for obfuscate rivaled Daniel’s; if he wanted to be hidden, she would have to catch him with her own eyes to find him, not a camera.

Daniel came around the opening in the surrounding, circular desk to stand beside her and look at the camera feed. It was pointless, but nevertheless. “I know,” he said, “that he’s pushing Garry to fight Turio, McDonald, and Mire about the Mirrden area. More so, as of late. But what he spoke to Garry about that night he visited Azamel, I do not know. And of the ritual, I heard only mention of Avery.”

“... no mention of Minerva?”

“No. But why else would he mention Avery’s name, other than in pursuit of revenge against her?”

“Why would he mention her name at all? Jacob is intelligent, and forever aware of his actions. He does not react, but acts. If he said her name, it could have very well been due to suspicion of eavesdropping. You did miss a Primogen meeting after all.”

He nodded, and turned to look at a different monitor. Antoinette followed his eyes to the live feed of one of her servants, and the thrall’s feed was pointed at Natasha’s new apartment building.

“She ... wasn’t there, when I visited.”

“Ah, then I imagine she is enjoying the company of her two new friends in Avery’s Meninna pack.” The girl seemed prepared to step out of her comfort zone with those two, and based on the details

Natasha shared with her, the two wolves both had an interest in her. More than the tiny Mekhet realized, Antoinette was sure.

“Is that wise?”

“No. Nor was it wise for her to join them on a misguided excursion into the awaiting webs of monsters. But she felt confident in her two new friends, and that she could trust them. Perhaps it is us who are biased and blind?” As painful as admitting it was, she had to concede that Natasha, perhaps foolish in her choice, was not a foolish person. If she felt she could trust the two Uratha, maybe there was a bridge to be built from that friendship. Antoinette had assumed Jack would be the tool for such political machinations, but maybe Natasha would be instead.

“Perhaps...” The man reached over his shoulder and withdrew his sword from behind his back, where it was hidden within the coat. Impractical place to hide a sword, but the man had half a millennium of practice. “I’m not convinced. Avery did not just kill Minerva, she tore her apart.”

The Prince steeled her gaze and looked her sheriff from sword to glasses. A silver sword, like her own, custom made and infused with other metals, but still mostly silver; the intent was to cleave werewolf flesh, not wood.

“... we will remain vigilant. If Avery oversteps her bounds, then ... instead of escalating to exile, it may be in our best interest to simply kill her and her pack.”

“Including Natasha’s new friends?”

Antoinette sighed, and motioned for Daniel to put the sword away. “A last resort. But, they are a pack. What one does, they all do.”

“... indeed.”

Indeed. They did not want to say it, and the two of them stared at the monitor displaying four different camera feeds of the apartment building the Uratha had been granted by Garry. And beside that monitor, two more, again with live feed from a host of hidden cameras and several of her thralls. And Antoinette was not the only source of eyes upon her inflow of visual information; a host of thralls within her tower devoured it with a fine-tooth comb, for any and all pertinent information.

It would soon be time for her to expand her purview from information, espionage, and politics, to also include brutality and violence. Not since the purge had she embraced such measures. But with monsters and wolves stirring chaos, the necessity was becoming apparent.

She sighed, and let her mind drift to Jack. If the boy could soothe the hearts of others as he did hers, perhaps violence with the Uratha could be avoided. But it did appear that the wolves were staying, and eventually, no matter how hard she or her love tried, sooner or later someone would respond against the other with violence. And, above all, she suspected Jacob.

---

~~Beatrice~~

“Wow,” Jennifer said. “You’re like a super hero.”

Beatrice raised a brow at her friend, and shoved her in the shoulder. It was the two of them, sitting in her alcove and watching some trash show on her laptop. Not exactly what she should be doing, considering all the fucking insanity going on in the city right now, but she felt she deserved a break.

Still hadn’t told anyone about Damien though. Better for everyone that way.

“Don’t be fucking stupid. It was trying to kill me, and I was trapped. Did the only thing I could do.”

“If you weren’t trapped, would you have run and let your friends die?”

“No, but—”

“Hero!” Jennifer sat back up straight and got in close, legs nudging, before she started watching the show again. The girl always seemed ready to jump Beatrice, try and kiss her or something, but she never did. Must have respected Julias’s wishes, at least a little.

“I—” She stopped herself as she heard some clap clop of shoes to the stone, and a few words from Aaron. Jacob was back then.

Sighing, she got up and walked out of the alcove. Time to talk to the man, maybe get a second earful. Maybe some garbage about risking the Masquerade. Which wasn’t garbage, but the Prince was overestimating the threat of pissing off the wolves; they wanted secrecy as much as the Kindred did. The Begotten, on the other hand, Beatrice couldn’t put her finger on. Not Azamel, at least.

“Jacob,” she said, as old eyeless came walking past the blood bowl. New blood was in it, still wet, despite that Jacob had been missing for a couple days now. The fuck was he up to? “Suppose you know already.”

“Yeap.” He smirked at her as he walked past, and gave her a half reassuring, half condescending pat on the shoulder. “Surprised you’re still alive.”

Wow, she liked her new boss. Should have known he’d let her make her own mistakes, and not yell at her for them like some sort of dad.

“It was quite the shit show, but everyone lived ... except that one werewolf, Stephanie.”

Jacob stopped once he was a few feet past her, and took a moment to glance over his shoulder. The grin on his face froze her to the core.

“I know.”

Part 4

Chapter 39

~~One Week Later~~

~~Jack~~

“Second fire this week,” he said.

Amanda knelt down, and ran her fingers through the ashes. “Poor Barry.”

The two of them stood on the street corner, and stared at the destroyed apartment building. The edge of South Side, closer to North Side. Not far from the Uratha and the building Garry gave them, and touching Carthian territory too.

“First fire didn’t get a Kindred though.”

The Mekhet shrugged and dusted her gloves free of ash. “Yeah, but Monica used to live there. She only moved deeper into South Side two days before that fire.”

He sighed, but nodded, and squatted down beside her. Police tape around the place kept everyone at bay; everyone being no one. This close to North Side, people minded their own business and kept to a decent sleep schedule. A rough, but not super rough neighborhood. A nice neighborhood, kept that way by Garry and his covenant. Which, Jack thought, was pretty stupid. It wasn’t a Kindred’s job to cultivate the attitude of people. He smirked at no one and shook his head as he looked over the remains of the destroyed building. The Lancea et Sanctum would disagree with him, and Damien probably would too.

“What did she say about the fire?” He also picked up some of the ashes, and felt them in his gloves. He’d made a point to start wearing gloves; seemed like the thing to do. Cool, badass gloves, black, leather and stuff, the sort of gloves a professional wears. A professional assassin maybe, and he grinned to himself as he rubbed his fingers together.

“Nothing,” Amanda said.

“Nothing? We know she’s been involved in that Mirrden business.” Cause starting fights with the Carthians over meaningless territory was a great way to spend their time. Maria and Michael said it wasn’t just about territory, but blood, humans, their sheep, their sole food source, and their future. Jack figured they just wanted to show the Carthians that the Invictus were stronger. They were right, but they didn’t need to make enemies over it.

“Yeah but she says there wasn’t any fighting over the area she’s covering. Told me things had been clear as day for her.”

Sighing, he got up along with Amanda, and the two of them stepped out onto the wreckage of the building. No one had died — except for Barry — but some humans had been burned, many inhaled smoke, and overall the area was now considered dangerous. Old buildings spread fire if they fell in a bad way, and while that hadn’t happened here, it didn’t mean it couldn’t happen. And this far from South Side’s main district, the buildings were old and flammable.

Kindred did not like fire. But more than that, they didn’t like it when the sheep were spooked. It was hard feeding on kine who were constantly glancing over their shoulder, so if an entire district of people were feeling nervous about burning buildings, it meant younger Kindred might trip and stumble on a hunt they’d otherwise be fine with. It only took one, just one vampire to royally fuck up and ruin everything for everyone. So, as per the Prince’s orders, it was their job to keep that from happening. Dolareido was a great place for Kindred, and it was their responsibility to maintain that utopia, and the Masquerade within.

But that wasn't the main reason Jack and Amanda were investigating the fire. This was a second fire, one that killed a Kindred named Barry. A young guy, only a little older than Jack, and a Gangrel. Young Gangrels were often troublemakers, but they didn't set fire to buildings, especially not when they were in them.

And the biggest telltale that something was up was that Barry was the only one that died. Sure, fire was a bigger concern to a vampire than a human, since vampires went up like kindling. But Kindred were more than capable of dealing with it with a little foresight. Kindred like Jack slept in buildings that were secure and borderline impossible to burn down or whatnot. Kindred like Barry often slept in hidden holes, secret, safe, secure, and kept a separate den for their living arrangements. That was this building for Barry, his den; the fire didn't catch him sleeping.

"Barry was also working the Mirrden job," he said.

"Yeah. I have no reports of any incidents with the Carthians about it though, not since that whole business in the tunnels and the Uratha." Amanda followed him along the piles of broken wood and fallen walls. A lot of collapsed rooms, and the five-story building's top two floors had collapsed down onto the center fire. Meant that trying to recover anything was impossible, with Barry's den right in the dead center of the extinguished inferno.

"I can't believe this is an accident." He pulled out his phone and took a few pictures of the pile of rubble, ash, stained walls, melted kitchenware, and some ruined couches, all half buried.

"Yeah but, this is a bit extreme for the Carthians. It's not like they just burn down buildings. And besides, Barry could have gotten out anyway."

“Agreed.” He stepped down from the rubble and started to circle the building. There was a good twenty feet between it and the next building; normal for this far out from South Side’s central area. It gave him the room to walk the building’s contours, and stop to take some more pictures. Amanda did as well, and came to stand beside him.

The two of them had become work buddies. They got along, and had started handling contracts together, or inspections, or similar tasks. The sort of relationship that stayed at work, but had all the makings of a friendship despite that limitation. Jack liked it, kept things fun. Not that his work was supposed to be fun, necessarily, but if you can’t enjoy your work, bleh.

“What about the wolves or monsters?” Amanda said.

He shrugged, and climbed up onto the next floor. With so much of the building collapsed, gutted, exposed, little him climbing onto higher floors was easy.

“Can’t see any reason for it. I know Garry and Avery are on good terms with each other, and Garry isn’t happy about the Mirrden situation, but I doubt he’d ask for this kind of help from her. Not hearing anything from the network either.” He looked down at his partner from his perch, and squatted down near one of the melted ovens. Damn fucking hot to partly melt an oven.

“And the Begotten?”

That was a better question, and he hummed with his thinking. “We still don’t know what Azamel wants, why she came back. So, I won’t cross her off the list. But no reason to suspect her either.”

“ ... we still sure this isn’t a coincidence?”

“How often do buildings burn down in Dolareido?” Not very often. He sighed and rubbed his head—fuck now he had ashes in his buzzed hair. Amanda giggled at him, and he kicked down a bent frying pan at her. “How much surveillance we got on this area?”

She dodged the frying pan with barely a glance, giggling the whole time. “Not much, nothing over here really to monitor. At least not until the Uratha moved in down the street. We got eyes on them, and reports say the Uratha haven’t been down in this area. At least not from that direction.”

“... I wonder if the Prince has more information.” He paced around the wreckage for a while, snapping some pictures, before jumping down the sloped mess and rejoining his partner. “Cause we got nothing.”

“How are you and the Prince anyway?”

“Eh? What do ya mean?” He raised a brow and eyed the woman closely. But she only returned the raised brow, like he was the crazy one thinking she was crazy for asking about his relationship.

“Jack, stop being so antisocial! You never talk about yourself, about normal things, you only ever talk about music and books and stuff.”

“Those are normal things!”

She rolled her eyes, and started walking, making their way around the building. She had better eyes than him, Mekhet and all, so maybe she’d see something he couldn’t.

“You don’t wanna talk about your relationship?” she said.

“I ... I mean I guess we can do that. What about you though, no relationship?”

“I um ... been getting kind of close to this kine I met.” She shook her shoulders a little, like a creepy crawly was going down her back, and she giggled again as she took a few pictures of different corners of the ruined building. “And after that conversation you and I had, I started getting a little more aggressive with him.”

“Oh?” He never did quite understand talking about this sort of stuff, having a back and forth about the nuances of normal, everyday life. Much happier to talk about things he understood, like music and books.

“Mmhmm. I took him out to a movie.”

“You took him out? Not vice versa? I’m impressed.”

More giggles. “It was some shitty old movie, no one else there. So, after nudging against him and getting him to kiss me, I Kissed him.” More giggling, more squirming, and she almost jumped as she vibrated.

“A kine?”

“Yeah ... do you think that’s weird?”

He shrugged as he put his phone away, and slipped his gloves into his jacket pockets. They’d gone out wearing dark woolen coats; looked great with gloves, and gave them both a professional look. They could also have disguised themselves as cops or whatnot, brought fake badges, but Amanda opted for the nice coats. Jack had to admit, he liked the coat, a woolen trench coat that screamed ‘I’m an assassin and a lawyer’ all at the same time.

“No, but it is dangerous. I mean, sleeping with and drinking kine, even familiar ones, I get. But the moment it crosses the barrier into a relationship, you’ve got a classic dilemma. How much of your personal life do they get to see? How much truth are you willing to tell him?”

“I know! I know I ... I don’t know, you got me all excited to start being more aggressive and stuff.”

“Hey, I’m glad I did. Just be careful, you know? Make him a thrall if you want him around. Maybe a ghoul if you really like him. Just ... be careful.”

She nodded, and got in a little closer until they were almost touching shoulders. “I asked you first though. How are you and the Prince?”

“We’re fine.”

“Nooo! Not fine! That’s horrible.”

“I ... what?” He stopped, and raised both brows this time as the girl started shaking her fists in the air like she was freezing.

“Fine is bad!”

“ ... no it’s not. What the fuck? Fine is good!”

“No, it’s bad! Don’t you know girl talk?”

He facepalmed. “I didn’t mean girl talk fine, I meant actually fine. As in, we get along, we talk, about things I like, and things she likes. We have sex. We sleep in each other’s arms.”

“Oh, that is good.”

Yes, it was, and the memories made him smile. He nodded as they walked, and brought out his phone to call up an Invictus driver. “You going to the ball next week?”

“Mmhmm! But ... I shouldn’t bring Brad, should I?”

“Definitely not. I mean unless he’s the meal. Can he feed a couple hundred Kindred?”

She giggled again and made a small wave to the approaching car. “Nope. Oh, that reminds me of a scary story Michael brought up once, about the old Invictus balls Viktor hosted. Did you know he used to have a person tied down to a table, in the middle of a ballroom full of Invictus Kindred, and bled them dry. Cut their wrists and drained them into bottles for everyone.”

They both shuddered.

“I wonder what other sort of dark shit Viktor’s done in his past,” he said.

“I wonder what any of the elders have done. And so do they, I guess. You know their memories get hazy and their dreams get vivid and insane.”

“Yeah.” Weight forced his head down, and he sighed as the two of them stepped into the car. They stopped talking about elders once they opened the car door; didn’t want the driver to hear and report what they said. But his mind was already on the topic again, of Antoinette and her crazy long life, and that she’d eventually have to take a long sleep to suppress her ever-growing hunger. It’d be years, decades before she had to do that, according to her and Julias, but the thought still ate at him.

Him, without her, for years while she slept. And would she rise the same person? Apparently it was a thing some of the Ordo Dracul were good at, preventing the long torpor from affecting the mind.

He shook his head out, dislodging the negative thoughts as best he could. Stop thinking it about it, stop worrying about things you can’t change.

The driver took them back to South Side and back to the Xnomina headquarters. Amanda got out and waved at him, and he returned it with a nod and smile, before the driver started him back toward his place. He was getting hungry, and tonight was as good a night as any to get some blood in him. Drop off the clothes, wear something a little less business, a little more street. Street for an Invictus meant a casual suit of course, without losing the edge of professionalism and the I'm-better-than-you shoes that cost as much as the suit.

Jack used to think it was a dumb game, dressing for the role, but it was starting to grow on him. It really was just a game, and putting on nice clothes was a fun way to play it, now that he had the money to fuel it.

He stepped out of the car, motioned for the driver to leave, and turned to face his apartment building. A few other Invictus Kindred lived here nowadays, and since the building was made by Kindred for Kindred, it meant burning down wasn't really a concern. Still, he wouldn't sleep well today, thinking of Barry. Someone must have killed him, or incapacitated him — a stake to the heart would paralyze a vampire — and left him for the fire. But who would do that? Why—

Clara waved at him from the front door of the building, smile on her face and arms folded across her chest, before one of them raised to comb her box-braid hair back over one shoulder. She really was a beautiful woman, a fit, lean body in jeans and a white tank top showing off her hard stomach, her tan skin matching her dark hair and dark eyes. Average height for a woman, which meant he was looking up at her by an inch or two. He was used to it though.

“Clara?”

“Yo Jack.” She grinned at him and motioned him over with her head. “Thought I'd drop by. Avery wanted to give you a heads up on some stuff.”

“You guys have phones now, ya know.” He shrugged but nodded, and stepped into the apartment building's lobby as he motioned for her to follow.

“Business talk should be done face to face, don’t you think?”

She had a point. Invictus did their important stuff face to face, half cause reading a person’s expression was just as important as delivering the information, half cause phones were not a secure means of information exchange in general. So he nodded again as he stepped into the elevator, and pressed in his number as Clara stood beside him.

She kept glancing his way, little glances, and she held her fingers in front of her together as she shifted her weight back and forth along her toes and heels. Sneakers. Such a stark contrast to him and what he was wearing, but then, that was Beatrice and Julias too. Maybe girls just liked men in suits? But he was taken, and Clara knew that.

And yet, the glances didn’t stop, subtle as they were. And when he caught one, she smiled, and held his eye contact for a little while before she resumed looking at the elevator door. He could smell life on her, almost hear the blood in her veins, and see it pulse on her neck. Kindred senses kicked into overdrive as he realized he was in an elevator with both a dangerous, deadly animal, and a woman who was attracted to him.

That was so very alluring, and he coughed as the Antoinette in his mind tore him apart. The Prince was the dangerous, deadly animal he was supposed to be attracted to, not this Clara. But at the same time, he was only human—er, Kindred. Not like he was going to do anything about it, but he couldn’t help but notice Clara’s movements, her body language, her interest in him.

He was an adult. A happily in-love adult. Totally an adult, who could be trusted to have a girl in his apartment who was attracted to him. Totally.

“So what did Avery have to say?”

“Just a heads-up that we’re looking into the burned buildings. Figured you guys are, but we’re curious too. We don’t want to go up in flames anymore than you do.”

Oh. Well, that was good to know.

“I was just going to get changed into something more casual before going out to eat,” he said. “I—”

“Oh, really? I’ve never actually joined a vamp on a hunt. Can I come?”

“I ... what?”

Clara chuckled as she kicked off her sneakers, and walked after him down the hallway of his place. Thankfully she stopped outside his room, and leaned against the wall as he mostly closed the door before he started getting changed.

“I want to come. In Tijuana we never got along with the vamps. Hell, it was war half the time. It’s a pretty nice change of pace here, not worrying about Kindred assassins and shit. Just being able to talk to you is unusual. Aaaaand I know people really like a vamp’s Kiss, when you’re not doing it mid violence and shit.”

“I ... yeah.” Yeah they do. A lot. He’d gotten better at meeting women in clubs and bars, and leading the conversation toward a romantic event. Course romantic event translated into him draining them dry until they went comatose; no sex or anything like that, he couldn’t do that to Antoinette. It wasn’t always easy keeping it sex free, considering how strong the effect was on some kine. There’d been one kine woman who’d started masturbating the moment he’d gotten his fangs into her.

The Kiss was good, but not so good as to turn anyone into a bubbling mess of arousal incapable of thought. No, it was Dolareido that was doing that, that had the kine so ready and willing to get Kissed without knowing what it was. The Prince's city, breeding vice and comfort at the same time, and keeping the kine relaxed, horny, and ready for hungry vampires at all hours of the night.

“Ok, but fair warning,” he said. “Dolareido is ... well it's a pretty sexual place. The Prince and her companions built this city for hundreds of years to be a utopia for Kindred, and she runs the whole city, so—”

“Yeah yeah, Avery gave me the speech. You think I can't handle a little sexual awkwardness? Come on, I want to see the nightlife I've heard so much about.” More laughter, and she shrugged like she didn't believe it. “Hear her tell it, people are fucking in the club booths.”

Wouldn't she get a surprise then.

---

“Holy shit.” Clara stared ahead at the pulsing lights of Bloodlust, and stood a little closer to Jack as the two of them moved forward.

“Never been anywhere like this?” he said. Or, almost yelled. The music was the same, bass-heavy, repetitive garbage that was closer to a heartbeat than music, and it was loud. But it did a good job of covering the noises people made.

“In Tijuana we had clubs and shit, but uh ... people ... mostly kept their clothes on.”

The two of them stepped past the bar near the front door, and toward the dance floor. As they moved on, Clara slowed down and stared at the booths, at the people in them. While people on the dance floor were dancing as expected, with revealing cocktail dresses and casual suits with shirts almost completely undone, it was the people in the booths that were the main attraction.

Jack recognized one of them, a Kindred. For a moment he wanted to panic, explain why he was at a club with a girl that wasn't Antoinette, but he poked himself in the temple a couple times and shook out the thoughts again. Stop feeling guilty, you haven't done anything wrong. If anything maybe Clara would get laid tonight with someone from the club; girl was so attractive that many people were glancing her way, and Jack was sure she'd have a few men, and maybe a woman or two, proposition her tonight.

Clara's clothes comment was more directed at the Kindred Jack recognized though. Clarence, a black man, Gangrel in the Invictus, with a shaved head and a few years on Jack. He was leaning back in his booth with his arms out limp at his sides, while a woman sat on his lap, her dressed hiked up so she could straddle and fuck him, and pulled down to expose her breasts. Hard to see much in the pulsing red of the light show Bloodlust provided, but there was enough light to see enough.

While Jack could simply not blush life, and keep any sort of physical stimulus or arousal at bay, Clara had no such tool at her disposal. He couldn't help but notice her nipples were getting hard, and pressing through her bra and tank top. But that was normal, she was alive and breathing and surrounded by sex, and probably feeling awkward as all hell. She did say she wanted to see the nightlife. Got what she wanted, but probably didn't want what she got.

After coughing a few times, she motioned with her head for them to continue. He smirked at the stubborn ox, and walked to the sides of the dance area, along the walls where the stairways were tucked away. Up and up, they stepped onto the second floor, where the music was a little quieter, and the booths a little more secluded. Where the kine felt even more comfortable getting sexual.

One of the booths held another Kindred, a woman of the Invictus, Ventrue, beige skin and short blond hair. She was still clothed, but two men on either side of her had their hands in her shirt, fondling, fingering, and squeezing things as they both kissed her. For a moment, Jack thought she might see him too, but she started to Kiss one of the men, and any possibility of her looking beyond her current predicament was gone. Even noticing the presence of a werewolf would have been impossible in that state.

It wasn't just the two Kindred having sex either. One of the booths further in the back, one with no table so it overlooked the rest of the booths from a small stage, had two women and one man in it. One of the women was riding the man, and she'd taken off her dress entirely to do it. The other was leaning in, kissing the man one second, and kissing the woman's breasts the next.

"Wow," Clara said. First time he'd ever seen the woman looked so shocked. Normally, she dripped of confidence, but being surrounded by so much sex and flesh, in pulsing lights and pulsing music, seemed to break her composure. It earned a grin from Jack, but he washed it away quick before she noticed. Not like he'd been much better first time he came here. Hell, he'd been worse.

He nodded toward one of the empty booths in the dark, and the two of them walked over to sit within.

"This is how vampires hunt?" she said, sitting close enough to be touching shoulders. At first he thought it might have been flirtation, but as she looked around, he realized she was a touch scared. "This isn't hunting! This is fucking! This is voyeurism, exhibitionism!"

He shrugged and scratched his head before rubbing the buzzed hair a few times. "Kind of, yeah? Part of the deal here in Dolareido. There are a lot of ways to hunt, but seduction is a prime one in this city, or at least this part of it. Antoinette's efforts to keep it a vampire utopia at work."

"So ... what do we do now?"

“In Bloodlust? We wait. You’re here, so I’m sure we won’t have to wait long.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?” She turned her head to look at him, brow raised and the eye scrutinizing him.

“Just means that, when there’s a couple in a booth, any lone women are probably intrigued. Especially if the other woman is as attractive as you. Makes—”

She turned her head more, and smiled at him with a mischievous glint in her eyes. Uh oh.

“You think I’m attractive?”

“What? Yeah, I ... er, well, yeah.” You dumbass. Foot, mouth. Antoinette is going to kill you. “You are, but I—”

“Yeah yeah I know, got a girl already.” She rolled her eyes, and reached out to set a hand on the table before them. Once she began tapping her fingers, she started to nod her head to the beat. “So, we just sit and wait.”

“Well, maybe if someone sits by themselves, we look their way and see if they look ours. Then, if eye contact phase goes well, we move onto engagement phase.”

“Phase?”

“Ah, yeah sorry. Just how I think about things.”

“Quite the nerd aren’t you?”

“Hey! ... yes, but don’t bring that up here. Video games, I’ve learned, are not a sexy topic of discussion,” he said, smiling and shrugging.

Clara burst into laughter, and elbowed him in the arm. “You might get along with David then.”

David? Oh David, he remembered him. Man could never look anyone in the eye, far as Jack could tell, but not because he seemed shy; man seemed like he was watching invisible butterflies or something.

“I—oh, there’s Natasha.”

“Natasha’s here?”

“Not Vola. This is Natasha Leblanc.” He gestured with a nod to the woman who was coming up the stairs. Leblanc was a beautiful woman, slightly tan skin, long blond hair, average height, and with a very pleasant hourglass figure. She wore a red cowl cocktail dress, tiny straps and plunging cleavage that showed off her massive breasts. Jack knew they were fake; didn’t have nearly the gravity, the collapsing weight, or the teardrop shape of Antoinette’s.

“You know her?” Clara said, one of her brows raising again as she watched the curvy woman approach.

“Yeah. Antoinette’s been teaching me how to hunt without using disciplines. I—hey Natasha.”

“Hello Jack. New girlfriend?” Natasha stopped in front of their booth and leaned forward to trace one of her fingers along it. Leaning forward meant showing off her cleavage, and now that her hair came down over her collar, show off the dyed color as well.

There was a time when Jack would have found her fake assets annoying, and his opinion of her would have dropped considerably. But, that was then. Nowadays people using fake anything as a part of their everyday life seemed like a small thing to get upset over. The ‘play the game however you want’ motto included kine and the nuances of the living’s life.

Looking at him, growing up a little here and there. Just a little.

“No, Antoinette’s still my girl. This is Clara, a friend.” He managed a tiny grin, slid out of the booth, and motioned for Natasha to sit down. She did, and he slid back in, to trap her between him and Clara. Much easier to convince her to do something if she felt trapped, make her feel helpless, like prey. Course that was all tactics for a first time seduction, while Leblanc had felt his Kiss once before already.

And he could tell she seemed excited, smiling, almost shivering as she made sure to slide up beside him when he sat back down. The dress had a mermaid sort of skirt, so no leg exposure, but it was also backless, and Jack could see how low the dress cut, almost exposing her ass. No underwear. Girl really was looking for some action tonight.

“Clara right? Looking for a good time?” Natasha said. “I know some men around here, and at least one woman, who would love to get their hands on a strong woman like you.” Easy to tell Clara was strong, considering the tank top. And Jack was sure Natasha was looking for signs of interest, of arousal, of intrigue and attraction from Clara. Hard nipples were a clear sign. “Or maybe some rock?” Or she was just selling drugs.

“I uh ... I’m good, thanks.” Clara smirked, but Jack caught a hint of embarrassment there. Funny, coming from a wolf, from someone who normally radiated self certainty and even a little animal aggression. From someone who’d licked him on the cheek.

“You sure? If you’re not Jack’s girl, you can—”

“I’m good, really.” She held up her hands and shook her head. “So you know Jack?”

“Yeah. Little man and his woman here really took me under, you know? Not sure how they do it, their secret, but they—have they ever done it to you? The thing they do with their lips.”

“No, they haven’t. But I’ve heard good things. Wanted to see it in action.”

“Oh! Perfect. I really wanted to try that again.” Leblanc leaned in toward Jack, and then down to bring her lips close to his cheek. “Still won’t tell me how you do it?”

“Nope.” He shook his head, and smirked. “You know the rules. Gotta turn around though.”

“Done.” Natasha Leblanc turned to face Clara, and Jack could practically see the kine grinning through the back of her head. The woman knew what she wanted, and she had no hesitation in pursuing it. She wanted a Kiss, and she wasn’t interested in dancing around the subject for too long.

Lucky for Jack then. Dancing around the subject, flirting with it, playing coy, hinting without tipping his hand, he was utterly atrocious at all these things. Someone like Natasha made it easy for him.

She reached up, and pulled her hair to one side to expose her neck. “So, Clara, I’ve never seen you at this joint. Doesn’t really seem like your kind of club. I place you as more of a sports bar girl.”

“... I do enjoy sports,” Clara said. But Jack could see, over Natasha’s shoulder, that the werewolf wasn’t really paying attention to the conversation. She was staring at Natasha, and Jack, and her eyes had widened a little like she was about to see a mystery or secret. Which she kind of was, as Jack thought about it. The woman had never been friends with vampires, from what he’d learned about her past, her time in Tijuana and the violent history it held for Kindred and Uratha. This was a first for her.

It was kind of a first for Jack too. He'd done a couple of these sorts of hunts with Antoinette now, and was getting a little more comfortable with the sexual nature of it. Antoinette and him trusted each other, and the Prince wouldn't even sleep with her ghouls without his presence anymore. But that didn't change that, in a setting like a club already filled with sex, it plucked on his guilt, no matter how much Antoinette assured him seduction for a Kiss was perfectly acceptable. Doing it in front of Clara changed the pluck to a hard tug.

Just a hunt, Jack, just a hunt. You need food, and you're not sleeping with this woman, or Clara. The sexual nature of it all was a tool, as Julias and Antoinette have both taught you. Use it.

He turned to face Leblanc's back, and reached out to set a hand on her waist. She shivered a little, but settled and shifted back to push her body against his, bare skin of her spine and shoulders pressed to his suit. He breathed through his nose, and took in the smell of life, perfume, blood. So close, his ears adjusted to tone out the music, and focused on the sound of her breathing, her heartbeat. His fingers on her side squeezed a little, to encourage her to relax against him, until he could feel her body start to quiver again in excitement and anticipation.

And Clara was as well. She'd come in a little closer, until she was only a foot from Leblanc's chest, and her eyes looked the woman up and down a few times before they stayed on Jack's gaze. There was hunger in her eyes, a weird mixture of arousal, but also animal, or beastly hunger that Jack understood. Much as Kindred and Uratha were not the same, they both had a beast within, different but animal and hungry all the same.

Did werewolves eat humans? He had no idea. But, as he sank his fangs into Leblanc's neck, he did see an almost starving look on Clara's face. And he heard the tiniest moan from her, quickly overshadowed by Leblanc's.

“God ... yes.” The victim raised one hand to reach behind her, and stroked Jack’s buzzed hair. He smirked into the Kiss, and let the sweet, delicious, thick red pour over his tongue. It coated his taste buds, his mouth as he took the time to enjoy the taste, to pull the blood from Natasha’s body in a slow suckle. No need to rush, no hurry, enjoy the Kiss.

He peeked at Clara again, and smiled into his Kiss as he watched the werewolf stare. She was enthralled. She leaned in closer, and closer again, until she was only inches from Natasha, until it was too close and he started to feel a little uncomfortable. But she just wanted to see, and he wanted a drink.

Natasha on the other hand, must have thought something else.

“Oh ... you ... sure you don’t want to join in?” Leblanc said, and she raised her hands to Clara’s breasts. The werewolf sat up straighter, almost in a jolt, but didn’t move her hands. She looked down at where the kine was groping her, her tank top, and rubbing her breasts and nipples through the fabric.

“I ... um...” Much as Clara looked uncomfortable, she wasn’t stopping Leblanc either. “You just ... grab people’s tits on a regular basis?”

“When ... riding ... high? Yes, I do. Because ... I...” Natasha’s voice started to fade, but her hands continued to touch Clara. One of them drifted upward onto Clara’s neck, over her shoulder, and she gently held on as exhaustion started to take her. But even as the succumbing kine started to drift away in Jack’s Kiss, her other hand reached under Clara’s tank top, hooked the bra, and eased it up to expose one of the werewolf’s breasts.

Jack was sure the woman would stop Leblanc; no reason to just let herself be groped after all. But, she didn’t. Clara’s breathing got a little faster, and her eyes looked the prey before them up and down like a slab of perfectly cooked meat. Or raw, he supposed, if that’s what a werewolf ate. And, because he was a total idiot, he couldn't help but watch, half absorbed in his Kiss, half stuck on looking ahead at how Leblanc's hand cupped the underside of Clara's handful breast, and circled her hard nipple with a thumb.

Such beautiful, tan-colored skin on Clara. The dark nipples, almost brown, were—holy fuck you stupid dick, this is how drunk people end up cheating on their partners. Abort!

He drank faster, and in seconds Natasha Leblanc slipped into the typical post kiss coma. A nudge and shift later, he had the girl sitting up straight again, head leaning back to rest against the curved seat of the booth.

“God, I am so sorry!” He said, forcing his eyes away as Clara, like himself, snapped back to awareness and pulled down her tank top.

“It's ok. Really. I mean, I knew what I was getting into, from the stories I'd heard about Dolareido since I got here. Just ... um ... little surprised.” She shrugged and smiled as she adjusted her bra and top, but she had a bit of blush to her; hard to see in the red light, but he could. “Didn't know they'd be uh ... throwing themselves at you vamps.”

“It's not like this everywhere, not this bad anyway. The Invictus district here in Dolareido is ... it's a pretty loose place.” Save the conversation, avoid the awkward, try and forget that you were staring at her breast. “If this was a bar in the Carthian district, I'd have to do a whole song and dance. Get the girl — or guy — drunk, manipulate their friends into leaving, get the person to like me. Then I'd have to actually pursue the Kiss a different day, when the person is comfortable with me, attracted.” He sighed and shook his head. All way too much song-and-dancing for him for a hunt. “Garry's people must hate having to deal with it.”

“I don't know. Lot of what you describe is fun for a lot of people. Flirting is fun.” She smirked at him, and winked. “It's almost too easy, that they just ... I mean look at her.” Clara reached out, and grabbed one of the woman’s breasts. “Isn’t she worried about how she’s going to get home? Or getting molested in her sleep?”

Whoa. Jack watched Clara sink her fingers into the woman’s huge breasts, until Leblanc let out a groan. Still asleep though, no matter how much she stirred, no matter how aroused she got.

“Um, you’re the one molesting her in her sleep. And Bloodlust is a pretty safe place, all things considered. She’ll wake up, probably around sunrise, and drag herself home.”

He raised a brow as Clara continued to knead the woman’s breast, and raised it all the higher when she raised the hand to find the dress strap, slide it off Natasha’s shoulder to expose one of those ridiculously massive breasts, and again began to caress it. Leblanc’s nipples were still hard, and only getting harder and more engorged.

“I can smell the arousal on her. Moment you bit into her, it was all I could smell. This whole place reeks of sex, but it was just ... pouring off of her. I can smell how wet she is.”

Jack gulped. Until the blood in his belly dissipated, he was basically undergoing an unwanted blush of life; considering his circumstances, that meant an erection. Like being in high school again, getting boners all the time at passing thoughts of anything even remotely sex related.

“The Kiss is pleasurable, and relaxing,” he said, eyes on the table. Don’t look don’t look. “With the proper scenario and stimulation, it’s very sexual. If a hunt had to get violent, if I had to force someone, it wouldn’t be very sexual. Just a quick knock out, and—um, maybe you should stop groping the sleeping woman?”

“This is revenge. She groped me first. And god damn, these balloon tits. I could tie cement blocks to her and throw her in the ocean and she’d float.”

Jack coughed on laughter, and smiled as he turned back to Clara. She was putting the woman's clothes back on, thank god, and she smirked at Jack as she leaned forward to put her elbows on the booth. Still no hiding that she was aroused too, that everyone was, but Clara didn't seem to mind; at least not enough to maybe fold her arms over her chest to hide her nipples. Maybe she thought he couldn't see them in the darkness and pulsing lights? Doubtful, with how many Kindred she'd fought in her life.

"So ... we're cool to just leave her here?" Clara said.

"Yeah. If it were somewhere less safe, I'd have convinced her to come back to my place, drunk her in some alley, and then left her somewhere safe."

"Aw! That's so nice of you, after draining her blood and knocking her out like that." Laughing, Clara did some shifting and moving to switch places with Natasha. He kind of expected her to call the night done, after that little nuclear explosion of awkward; he'd seen her breasts and everything. Didn't seem to bother her though.

"You'd prefer I ... stopped drinking blood?"

"Well, when your only source of food is human life, you can say a lot of people would take issue with that." She got in closer again, and brushed her hair over her shoulder and ear. "The Uratha don't mind what you do here in Dolareido now, but I hear that some of your elders used to do some pretty dark shit."

"... yeah, that's true. Viktor did some pretty nasty things with kine, turning innocent people into buffets for his balls." Did Julias ever partake? Antoinette? Kindred were not kine, vampires were not humans, and they had the freedom to kill innocent people. But he never did, not on purpose, and as far as he knew, none of his friends did either.

But when you were a century old, or five, how much did the life of a random bloodbag matter? He shuddered at the thought.

“Things are pretty good here.” She nodded and gestured out to the people in the booths, the kissing, the fondling, the drinking. “Hisil is ... strange here, in Dolareido. There’s dark places, shadows that reach long, with the most nasty fucking things hiding inside. The history in this city has definitely bred some horrible crap. And the blood tower has things circling it I’ve never seen, spirits that look like they’re made of blood. Some aggressive, some not. And then there’s this weird ... I don’t know, peace I guess? Tranquility almost, despite the fact it’s a modern city. I’ve seen some serenity spirits drifting around in strange places, some others like love, safety, joy.” The werewolf laughed and leaned back as she looked up, digging through memories. “But god damn the amount of sex spirits? Dolareido could very well be the loosest place on Earth.”

He blinked, blinked, and blinked again. “I, uh, what?”

“Yeah I suppose you don’t know much about the Shadow world. You vamps can barely wrap your mind around your own fucking shit, far as Avery says.” She leaned in closer and smirked at him. “If you had any idea what was out there in the world, the whole world, not just the little corner of it that’s material, you’d shit yourself. I—oh, I suppose that’s a bad example for a vamp. But you get where I’m coming from.”

“More shit like that Azlu creature?”

“Yeah, and that’s just from our neck of the woods. The others don’t like to talk about it much, but there’s more out there than the Hisil. But I suppose you know that Begotten girl, you know there’s a dream realm where she’s from too.”

He coughed and looked around. Leblanc was going to sleep for a few hours at least, and the music kept any conversation from going far to listening ears. Plus Clara had her lips only inches from his ear, whispering secrets that would make anyone tremble. He still remembered what it was like stabbing that spider, driving metal down through its body, how it had possessed a human, eaten others.

“I ... really kind of preferred it when science explained everything. Whatever happened to science?”

“Science can’t explain you or me or that Azlu or the other realms, or any of the things that go bump in the night.” She shrugged and motioned to the unconscious woman next to her. “How the fuck does your bite make humans melt, and give you sustenance? Could put it under a microscope, but any organic material a scientist could scrape off of you turns to dust. Convenient, isn’t it?”

“Very convenient.” He sighed and glanced past Clara toward the unconscious woman. It hurt, it really fucking hurt his insides to have to abandon science. Maybe not abandon it, but accept that there were things science couldn’t explain, maybe never explain. He’d spent so much of his life learning how to think logically, how to act instead of react, how to measure and weigh and analyze things objectively.

And every god damn night, his Requiem showed him that he, nor anyone, would ever understand anything. And that the things he didn’t understand were very much a danger, killing and slaughtering and devouring. Fuck whoever said: what you don’t know can’t hurt you.

“So,” he said, looking back to Clara and her slightly cocky grin, “Uratha go to this place called the Hisil?”

“Mmhmm. Probably a place you don’t want to go. You know how vamps are: love your cars, your money, your material things.”

“I ... yeah, that’s true. Though honestly, a lot of this stuff sounds like it’d be up Jacob’s alley.”

The werewolf sighed, but nodded. “That’s how shit with Minerva got started. But, if we’re staying — and it looks like we are — we need to play nice. Avery says we’re in the clear to talk about the Hisil, at least a little. And if I know Art and Matt, they’ll probably want to show it to Natasha.” She laughed and reached over to poke the sleeping woman. “Not this one, the tiny one, the cuter one.”

“Natasha, Art, and Matt?”

“Yeah, those three locking legs like they are, I’m sure the boys would love to show her interesting things. You ... you uh ... don’t know do you?”

“No, I don’t.” Well damn. He raised his hand and started rubbing his buzzed head, brow furrowed a little as he thought about it. It wasn’t like Natasha was sleeping with the enemy, but getting in bed with Uratha—”Wait. Both?”

“Ch’yeah. Those two are best friends, been sharing everything for some ... almost thirty years now? And they like to share girls, if they can find one into that that they like, who likes them. Guess your friend fits the bill.” She shrugged and motioned to all the sex and alcohol and dancing and drugs around them. “Considering the city, and considering she’s a vamp with quite a few years on her, I’m sure threesomes are pretty normal for her.”

He wasn’t so sure about that. Natasha was a whole new level of shy and closed off compared to most people. But, if it was true, good for her. Great for her even. But now he had the image of tiny Natasha between two werewolves, in bed, legs hooked up around each other.

Ugh, now he wouldn’t be able to look at her without getting the image in his head.

“The vamps in Tijuana were a mixed bag,” she continued. “Some of them liked sex, some of them loved it and had harems, basically.

But the older ones didn't. They just hid in their mansions or underground labyrinths, plotting, scheming, killing. Way I hear it here, your uptight elders are all dead now."

He nodded, and squirmed a little. Yeah, three of them dead, all his fault.

"Yeah I'm pretty lucky," he said. "I got into this mess, this crazy world, not even a year ago. My family lives closer to North Side, typical middle class you know? Had no idea this insane world of vampires and werewolves, and apparently sex and sex and more sex was going on right under my nose."

More laughter, from the two of them this time, and she leaned back in her booth before hooking one of her arms around Natasha. For some reason the werewolf liked her unconscious booth fellow.

"Guess the pack is going to have to get used to it, letting down our guard a bit. Seeing vamps fucking, without thralls and buddies and shit to watch their back? Feels weird. Hell even in Garry's area, much as the humans in the area act homely and nice, you can hear the moans through the walls, sometimes from different buildings. Everyone just lets loose in this town."

"It wasn't so bad where I grew up ... but maybe I just tuned it out after a while? I did love headphones."

Clara chuckled, and got up. With a few hand waves she ushered him out of the booth, and the two of them headed back down the stairs. Once they were outside, they both took in deep breaths.

"God damn fresh air," he said.

"The fuck you need air for?"

"Don't need it, but it smells nice. Feels good clearing out the nostrils of all that sex, and drugs, and sweat and drinks and who knows what else.”

The two of them, on the street, laughing. Seemed fine, seemed ok, but a little voice in his head kept nagging at him. She likes you, despite knowing you have a girlfriend. This is unknown territory for you, be careful.

“But, officially, Avery says I should tell you that we do plan on staying, though I’m sure that’s common knowledge for you vamps right now, monitoring us and shit.”

“True, yeah.”

“So new info, she does want you to come our way in three days. You busy then?”

Three days? “Invictus don’t have any pressing concerns...” Other than the fire he’s supposed to be investigating. He kind of wanted to ask her, but maybe it’d be better to go through Avery? Clara would be more willing to share info, but Avery was the politically safer option. Less likely to make a misstep and accidentally piss someone off.

He’d wait for Avery, ask her.

“I’ll be there.”

“Good. Cya around kid.” The werewolf leaned in a little, and winked at him, before walking off.

And he watched her walk off. She was fit, with a touch of thickness to her arms with muscle, subtle broadness to her back, a tiny waist of abs, and a toned ass that the jeans hugged tight. And unless he was mistaken — and he wasn’t — she was swaying her ass as she walked, with more emphasis than usual.

Maybe twenty feet later, she was enveloped in the crowd, in the dresses and suits, the nice shirts and expensive shoes of the kind walking by. The flow of life and blood around him wasn't nearly as overwhelming with some blood fueling him, keeping his bloodlust low and his energy high. It let him focus on watching the humans walk by, and for his nose to adjust just enough for him to pick up on Clara's perfume.

She wasn't wearing perfume the first time they met.

Nope nope, not happening. She liked him, sure. He'd heard women found unavailable men more attractive, sure. But that was just a silly stereotype. And even if it was true, he had a woman, and a woman he loved. A woman who'd rip him into literal pieces if he betrayed her love.

Try as he might, he couldn't just suddenly forget Clara's beauty, or her beautiful breasts. Or that she'd licked him, down in the tunnels.

God damn it. He needed help. He trusted himself, but shit never went the way he planned. Hell, just putting his foot in his mouth could easily get him in trouble with the Prince, and it wasn't trouble he wanted.

He took out his phone, and called a ride back home. Mental note: call Julius later. Maybe he could help your dumb ass.

---

---

~~Beatrice~~

She set the binoculars down to her neck to hang from the string, and sighed. Jack and that Amanda girl, investigating the fire she was investigating. Kind of hurt not letting him know she was looking into it too, but as much as the kid was her friend, he was still Invictus.

Probably trying to find out how their fellow Kindred died. The fire was made to look like it got him, but she doubted it; possible, just very unlikely. Younger Kindred died in such ways, getting killed because they underestimated sunrise, or not respecting how damaging fire could be. But this Barry fellow wasn't a fledgling, he didn't make mistakes like that far as she knew.

Her job tonight was complete. Now she knew the Invictus were investigating, but only sending a couple young neonates to do so. Gave her an impression of the severity factor, or lack there of, and that was something to report back to Jacob. But first, a little more recon.

She headed in the direction of Garry's, or more specifically, Garry's new werewolf buds. She knew he knew Avery, from what Jacob told her, but she didn't realize they were this close, for Garry to give her free reign of one of the apartment buildings. Not a big one, maybe only twenty rooms, but more than enough for the Uratha's pack, especially with one dead.

She winced as she remembered the look on Jacob's face. The way he smiled, the way he almost glowed with joy. He hated Avery, god damn he hated Avery, and that could have been enough of a reason to justify his happiness with the death of her packmate. But the way he said 'I know' made her think there was more to it. Made her suspect her boss of being responsible. How the fuck he could have been responsible, she had no idea, but it was the impression she got from his response.

Look at her, suspecting her boss. He'd have been proud of her, if she could tell him.

With her cloak of night hiding her, she climbed up onto a nearby building, pulled out her binoculars again, and watched the apartment she knew the werewolves were living in. One building dedicated to a group would have been dangerous in most cities, but Dolareido was in a peaceful state, assuming Barry's death wasn't the work of some other Kindred. So having a bunch of vamps together in a single building was normal enough, and it wasn't like werewolves had the same weaknesses. If someone set their building on fire during the day, they'd just jump out the window or something. And pissing off tanks of death, tanks that could walk around during the day, was not a good idea.

So she sat there, and watched. Watched and listened. And listening turned into a more lucrative experience than watching the building, as the distant call of high-pitched moans tickled her ears. She chuckled and shook her head as she tried to find the source of the sounds. Maybe make her night of recon a little more interesting as least.

A few building hops later, she crouched low to the roof of one of the taller buildings, and looked down into the alley. She did miss this neighborhood. This place, this time of night, people were sleeping soundly. And the place was a pretty nice place, low income but with great people, nice people, so anyone who did bother going out this late wouldn't be feeling too threatened by nightlife. And that included young kine or Kindred looking to fuck in places they shouldn't be fucking. Exhibitionism was a kink she understood all too well, and with a pair of binoculars in her hand, so was voyeurism.

But she didn't expect werewolves to be fucking in an alleyway at this time of night. And fucking a Kindred at that.

Oh good god it was Natasha. Tiny, little, cute Natasha, with her pale skin and long black hair ... on her knees, with two Uratha standing around her. Arturo and Matthew, her friends. Both had their jean flies open, their cocks out — wow, fucking endowed, holy shit — and looking down at the tiny woman sucking on them, stroking them, playing with them.

Well, mind blown. Beatrice figured Natasha had a sexual side to her the Nosferatu didn't know, considering the girl was much older than her, old enough to discover kinks and desires people never knew they had, while she also wasn't old enough to become jaded to them. But she'd never expected sweet, innocent looking Natasha to be doing something this dirty, this submissive, in public.

Fucking. Hot.

Natasha was a Mekhet, and that meant she could spot shit others couldn't. And the two Uratha were god damn Uratha, and older ones at that. For all intents and purposes, they'd be able to catch Beatrice if they were looking for her, see through her cloak of night. But they weren't looking for her, they were enjoying some alleyway fun, so, Beatrice decided to stick around. What's the worse that could happen anyway, they spot her and the situation got awkward? Meh.

But god damn, seeing Natasha gazing up at the two wolves, that blatant look of meek and helpless on her face, mixed with so much arousal Beatrice could practically feel the heat coming off the girl's body from all the way up on the roof. Didn't figure Natasha to be that sort. Thought maybe the quiet little girl had a more of a dominant side, maybe liked to give orders in bed, tell her man — or woman — what to do, be a little dominatrix. A stereotypical view, that a girl's personality flipped once under the sheets.

Lesson learned. Natasha looked embarrassed, submissive, obedient, and horny-as-fuck all at the same time as she stroked their cocks. She took turns with her mouth, kissing the fat glans of one of the men, before the other, then back to the first again. And without either men even touching her except to maybe stroke her hair a bit, she was making more of those little mewls and moans, the sort of moans a girl made when she was really enjoying herself. A bit at juxtaposition with how both men were just watching, but that made it all the hotter. She doubted Natasha was the sort to fake anything in bed; meant she really was enjoying herself.

Beatrice, you're not here to spy on your friend's friend having sex. You're here to spy on the Carthians and Uratha and see if they're checking out the dead Kindred and burned building as well.

... five more minutes. This was just too good to pass up. Natasha was really, really enjoying herself, enjoying herself in that way that was intoxicating to watch. Sweet little girl, milking two enormous men of muscle and testosterone and blood, moaning and mewling onto their cocks as she tried to satisfy both of them at the same time. The way she was looking up at them with that half begging, half overwhelmed expression, was making Triss's knees shiver.

Ok, stop you pervert. Get going. Five more minutes? No! Exercise some self control.

With a silent sigh, Beatrice shook out her shoulders and forced herself to crawl away. A few building hops later, she found a different roof she could hang out on, hide in her cloak, and relax. Course relaxing was hard when her mind kept picturing what she just saw. People in Dolareido loved to find bad places for good sex, and alleyways often fit that description. Not that she had ever partaken in alleyway sex as a Kindred, being Nosferatu and all. And now that she was with Julias, she really enjoyed having sex in various places in a mansion instead. Because he treated her like a princess. A bad princess that deserved to be punished.

She giggled, and slapped herself in the forehead for daring to make such a sound. She did not giggle, she growled or chuckled. Princesses giggled; which upon considering, made her hate the sound a little less. There had been the occasional giggle sometimes, when she and Julias had experimented with some of the funnier options being rich provided: frilly dresses, expensive sheets, that sort of thing. The last thing they'd tried, was her with her hands tied behind her back — like that could ever stop a Nosferatu — and wearing a Victorian ball gown. Like a naughty princess that needed a thorough spanking and fucking.

As she thought about Natasha, she considered the whole blowjob thing. It wasn't something her and Julias ever really did, cause she wasn't exactly comfortable with the idea, not with all the extra teeth on her face anyway. But the two of them had been together for a while, and the man showed no signs of being turned off by her teeth, or her green snake eyes, or her claws. Or, when she felt like showing it off, her really long tongue.

Maybe she should try it? Was a fun time when she was human, making a man squirm like that, and Julias had certainly earned it, considering how many times the man had put his lips on her.

She slapped herself in the forehead again. Focus! Stop thinking about sex all the time! Ugh, being with the Circle was really doing a number on her sex drive, considering Jennifer and Othello fucked openly, and almost every night.

But, some movement drew her attention. People moving around, two of them, leaving the werewolves' apartment building. Avery and ... David, she believed his name was. A big, strong looking guy, bit young too, and he had this weird habit of drifting his eyes to look at random things. Every so often, Avery gave him a small pat on the shoulder, like calming down a fidgety dog.

God damn good thing she had some good binoculars, or she was sure Avery would be able to see her. No neonate's cloak of night was going to hide her from one of these fuckers from close, especially an older one. So she stayed a good ways away, and became a statue as the wolves moved around. Moved around. Moved around some more. And continued to walk around, until Beatrice realized they were just out for a fucking stroll and chatting.

Not like they'd suddenly go and do something super sneaky and important the first night she'd come to monitor them. Wasn't a fucking Bond movie. She wished it was, but it wasn't. And once Avery and David had dropped by a butcher to get some meat, she realized she was wasting her time watching them. Ah well, at least she got to learn who was investigating Barry's death.

Sighing, she headed back to the cave.

---

Thank god no moaning sounds tonight. Aaron was sitting around reading a book, and Othello was also reading a book. She was afraid to ask the Daeva what book. Jennifer was out, probably on a hunt, or maybe digging up some info. Jacob had asked them to dig up info on Azamel and the Begotten in general; she could have been out looking into that too. No idea where to begin looking into info about literal nightmares. Maybe ask Fiona? Nah the girl seemed ignorant of the details Jacob would be interested in, like what the Begotten were up to, or how they went about their business in the modern world.

But it'd be nice to take the girl out for a party or something. Not that Beatrice got to party with any kine, but maybe bring her to the next Kindred ball, or gathering or something. Could be fun. Girl would get under Invictus skin so badly, but probably really get along with everyone else. That alone would make it worthwhile.

With a sigh, Beatrice walked up to the blood bowl. Empty. Sometimes Jacob did things, alone, in the dark once he kicked the rest of the Circle of the Crone out of the cave. He did things with his blood magic, his crúac rituals, things that occasionally made some very inhuman sounds, more beast than anything. Rituals that allowed Kindred, according to him, to bypass the limitations of their vampire bodies and perform truly wondrous things.

What a load of shit. He just liked to be vague about his explanations. But that night when he'd bestowed her with the cloak of night strength of an elder Kindred was burned into her memory. Felt good to be that strong. And unnatural.

“Jacob in?” she said to Aaron. Othello was in his room reading something on his e-reader, but Aaron had a proper book, and he looked deep in it with his chair leaning back, and his feet against the stone around the giant mural of bones.

“No.” Without missing a beat, Aaron turned to another page.

Maybe it was time she found out what sort of stuff the Gangrel liked reading?

“Whatcha reading?”

“ ... you want to know?”

“Yeah man. We’re buddies, pals ... sort of?” As expected, the man raised a brow at her like she’d grown two heads, so she shrugged and grabbed a wooden chair to sit beside him on. “We should take a little time to get to know each other better.”

“Like you know Othello?”

“Hey, I ... well I mean, if you ever had someone over, sure I could give some direction? But like with Othello, I ain’t gonna join. Got a boyfriend.” And she loved her boyfriend damn it. “But I was serious. What’re you reading?”

“Journey Through the Rain, by Edward Fairchild.”

“Hit me, what’s it about?”

“A man in a coma confronts his inner demons. The road to recovering from the coma is through the hellscape of his thoughts given form.”

“Uh...”

Aaron sighed, closed the book, and set it on his lap. “You expected something more along the lines of a thriller, or perhaps fantasy, or science fiction?”

“Well, yeah.”

“ ... you don't think our second lives have enough action as is? Yours especially?”

“Never thought about it like that, I suppose.” She spun the chair around so she was sitting with its back to her chest, and she put her arms across its back, her chin resting on her arms. “But I wouldn't want to read a boring book either.”

“Not boring, but it might take a little self awareness to appreciate the messages in the metaphors.” He popped open the book, and flipped back a few pages. “The forest cleared to an open field, where the grass bent in the waves of wind, blades of red like fire against the cold backdrop of the clouds of my family, friends, and colleagues. Damn them all. Where they float above the pain, here I stand, with thorns in my skin and embers upon my heels.”

“Doesn't sound like he's handling his demons very well.”

“No. No it does not. I look forward to learning if our lead here manages to overcome his demons, or if he's destroyed by them.” Aaron put his gaze back upon the page he was reading when she interrupted him, and vanished. Still there, still sitting and reading, but the man was gone. If she stared really hard, she could see the world he was imagining through his eyes. Yeap, gone.

She got up. No point in talking to him, not when he had a book in his hand. Now that she thought about it, she didn't really know what to expect from Aaron's books, but now she picked up on that philosophy vibe he was laying down. Dude might get along with Julias if she introduced them; not that they didn't know each other in passing, all Kindred did, but hanging out was a different thing than knowing names.

Jacob. The beast in Beatrice's gut stood upright as she, and her fellow Kindred all acknowledged the presence, the aura of the returning leader. He came into the grand cavern and headed directly for his private room, same as every night the past week.

“Jacob,” she said, and she fell into step beside him. “Couple of Invictus neonates are looking into that Barry dude's death, like you figured. Didn't see any activity from the Carthians or werewolves though.”

“Keep trying. No one thinks Barry's death was an accident. Someone killed him. Or he's been taken hostage.” Old eyeless shrugged, and sat down on his furs, once inside his alcove. Beatrice followed him, and stood in the doorway; if it could be called a doorway. The tunnel that lead to his alcove was kind of a door in itself.

She looked around his room. The scary masks, voodoo bags and dolls, the strange bones, the figures carved from black wood, it all reeked of Jacob and his obsession with scary shit. The occult, ghosts, and she supposed nightmares too, all of it was the sort of stuff she imagined Jacob tinkered with in his spare time. Maybe he had other blood bowls where he bled other kine, and himself, a place where he could use the blood to do his dirtier, deadlier shit. She wasn't stupid after all. An elder like Jacob would keep secrets, and then secrets, and then buffer secrets he'd leak to the Circle, and then secrets he'd share with them willingly.

“... do you have any secret places?” she said. Might as well be upfront about it. “I bet you have a secret stash of shit somewhere. And probably three more besides.”

“Are you suggesting I don't trust you, or your fellow members of the Circle?” He smirked at her as he leaned back, grabbed some weird, large black book, and popped it open. Nothing on the cover for her to read, and she leaned forward a little to take a peek at the contents of the old, tattered pages.

“That’s exactly what I’m suggesting.”

“Ha! Good call.” Joker smirked up at her, eyes wrapped in his bandage as per usual, and showed her the pages. Some symbols she did not recognize, some language that looked weird, old, something like Egyptian hieroglyphs but not. “Not that it’d matter when none of you could read half the things I deal in.”

“Well fuck you too.” She frowned at her boss as she leaned against the cave wall, folding her arms across her chest. “So, do you?”

“Secret places? Of course. So does the Prince, and the Invictus council, and Garry. When you get to be our age, you learn the value of not putting all your eggs in the same basket.” He got comfortable again and flipped another page.

“Yeah but ... what the fuck is an egg for you?”

“Wouldn’t you like to know.” Again, eyeless shrugged, and flipped another page of his book.

Considering what the book looked like, Beatrice could only guess it was necromancy, or some other absurdity that shouldn’t actually exist, but probably did. And she knew Jacob had some robes — stored in one of those secret places probably — that looked like they belonged on a necromancer, or some other creepy occult shit. He also had some stuff that looked like it belonged on Genghis Khan, and she had to ask about that cause she kind of liked it and hadn’t seen him wear it in a while.

“I suppose I can share one egg with you,” he said, lowering the book again and smiling up at her. “How’s Damien these days?”

Oh shit.

“You—”

“Yes, I know what you did.”

“... how?” She looked around, over her shoulder, and stepped deeper into his room before pulling the hanging fur across the doorway. She lowered her voice, got to a knee, and stared at the man with a hard frown to go with. “How do you know?”

“I wouldn’t be a very good witch if I told you my secrets, now would I?”

This man. God damn this man. She really loved and hated him.

“You ... you won’t tell anyone, will you?”

“You fed him your blood once. He isn’t bound by the vinculum, and I doubt he’s become addicted to vitae. You have some awkward encounters ahead I’m sure, but his feelings for you will pass. A few weeks, maybe a few months at worse, and he’ll be back to normal.” He too brought his voice to a whisper, but his grin only grew. “But I’m sure if you dropped by his place, a few kind words could have him doing you a favor or two. Maybe join you and Julias for a threesome.”

“Ew, no thanks.” Not that Damien was unattractive. Hell, he was pretty damn sexy sometimes, but his churchy attitude grated on her worse than anything. “Feeding Kindred blood is ... I mean I got some earfuls from Garry when I suggested it once, as a way to get an advantage. Thought he was going to slug me just for using the word.”

“There are many ways to gain an advantage,” Jacob said, eyes back on the symbols in his book, “and many of them are dark, twisted, manipulative, and underhanded. But to force the vinculum on someone is a special sort of rape that most Kindred find disgusting.”

“That is what you do when you create a thrall or ghoul though, isn’t it?” She sighed and leaned back as she let her mind wander. “Lot of them seem pretty happy. That girl Madison that Othello’s been spoiling has—”

“Othello’s sexual obsessions aside, he’s been teaching Madison to be well versed in the art of eavesdropping. And,” he said with a smirk, “she agreed to the vinculum, the nature of being a ghoul. The love of a kine for their master. Some Kindred have obtained it by force, and it has created some strange love hate relationships between ghoul and master.”

“Sound like you have experience in that department.”

“I’m five hundred years old, Beatrice. The fuck do you think?”

The two of them chuckled. Christ he was old, but he didn’t act like the other old vamps, not even a little.

She knew about the fading of memories Kindred his age had, and the strange dreams they went through when they took their long torpors. What was Jacob like when he was young compared to now? How accurate was his age of five hundred years anyway? By his own admittance, Kindred his age couldn’t remember that time, and for someone like him and Antoinette, half a millennium was a guess. Could be younger, or older, by a fair amount of years at that.

But it was enough to know the man was old, had earned his years, and she was better off listening to him rather than ignoring him. Give Damien his space until he was normal, and don’t even think about adopting a ghoul until you found someone who liked you enough to willingly accept the effects of drinking Kindred blood.

Next question.

“I’ve been thinking about that night,” she said, “in the tunnels. Two spider monsters. A second one no one had expected.” Again she kept her voice down, but she stopped looking her boss in the eye—bandage, and tried to read his expression. He seemed absorbed in the book, like Aaron would have. Not a flinch or nothing. He could beat Julias at poker. “Was that your doing?”

“Beatrice, please, how could I, a simple vampire, somehow manage to either create or lure a second one of those ancient beasts into our tunnels?” Again, without a flinch or even a shift of the eyebrow, he turned the page. “I was delighted, and surprised, to learn that one of Avery’s pack died.”

“I get you wanting Avery to suffer, but killing her pack seems like including innocent bystanders.”

“There are societies that punish the family for the transgressions of its members.” Again, another page, and this one had a detailed drawing of a skull, along with some feathers and some worms. No idea why, but there was, indeed, a drawn pile of worms on the picture. “One for all, all for one, and all that shit.”

“But—”

“And I didn’t kill her. You know that.” He smirked at her before he turned the page. Another picture, this one with a human heart with some sort of old knife sticking out of it. A very old knife, with a handle carved out of a tree branch maybe. And around the heart were some human teeth. What the fuck.

“Ok, seriously, what’s the book about? We can’t read it, but this is fucking creepy shit ... kind of metal though, and interesting. But also very creepy.”

That managed to get a raised brow from the man. “You’re interested in the occult?”

“I wouldn’t have been when I was kine, but after the shit I’ve seen? I’ve seen a girl unleash some sort of weird spider nightmare thing from the aether, I’ve seen half-spider half-human hybrid monster things nesting in the city underground, I’ve seen werewolves rip and shred and tear things apart in the most brutal way, like it was ... Yeah, I want to try and expand my horizons a little.”

“And you think I’m the man to do that?”

“ ... yes! Yes you’re the man to do that! You’re my boss, you’re old as dirt, and you know shit. So your subordinate, your fellow witch of the Circle is coming to you, requesting that you teach her.” God damn this man. Getting him to do what she wanted was like working with a child, an intelligent child that knew how to be obstinate. So maybe a really old stubborn fuck was the more apt comparison.

“You understand the depths of depravity and cruelty these rituals can descend into?” he said, gesturing to the heart on the page. “Many of the rituals the Circle of the Crone practice were first discovered by civilizations long dead. This here, a woman discovered by dissecting her husband. She sacrificed something truly precious to her, removed that which their tribe considered precious, and then burned them as she prayed to the spirits of the dark to grant her immortality.”

“ ... holy shit. Did it work?”

“Yeap. She was the first vampire.”

“Are you fucking serious!?” she said. But as she stared at the page, and then at Jacob, she could almost see him roll his non-existent eyes.

“No. The origins of Kindred remain a mystery. But the woman’s efforts did earn her a rather nasty case of dead.”

“Dead?”

“Yeap. Her tribe found her curled up in a ball by the altar. The ground around her had turned to black soot. No idea what killed her; but it was an ancient tribe, so it’s not like they knew how to do an autopsy and diagnosis.”

“Whoa.” She stared at the picture of the heart and teeth. Sacrificing someone you cared about, like a husband, to pursue the black arts? She tried to imagine cutting something out of Julias, but just imagining the hurt look on his face when he realized she betrayed him made her heart ache. “Did they write this book?”

“No, this was written by a Kindred centuries before I was embraced. And they talked to a tribe, who had talked to another tribe, who had told them the ancient legend of the wicked wife who sacrificed her husband.” He ran his fingers along the picture of the heart, and smirked, the sort of smirk someone gave when they were deep in intriguing thought about the subject. Kind of sick, but kind of interesting too.

“That’s a lot of hearsay.”

“Which is why various members of the order have tested it, using the power of Kindred blood to fuel the ritual.” His smirk turned into a chuckle, and he shook his head as he slowly turned the page. “Fools. To sacrifice the things that make existence bearable, in pursuit of power? Self destructive lunacy.”

“... d ... did it work?” Kindred sacrificing the things they cherish to pursue dark shit like witchcraft seemed pretty counter-intuitive and self destructive to her. Vamps sacrificed enough as it was.

“No.” Jacob laughed, loudly at that, and showed where the next page depicted someone lying on the ground, surrounded by what Beatrice could only describe as a circle of death. Someone with a decent hand had drawn a forest and field, and the area around the lying person was withered of all life. “The Kindred were never heard from again. Whatever did this to the human who first tried it, we can only surmise killed the Kindred as well.”

“Jesus.”

“I’m sure Jesus was laughing at their idiocy.” He turned to another page, where an altar was shown, one made of wood and lined with skulls and other bones. Looked a lot like the one they had in the main cave. Above it, a person was hung by rope around their hands, and several knives were sticking out of their stomach and waist. Blood — or what looked like blood anyway considering the pictures were done in black ink — dripped from the person’s feet into the bowl.

“ ... this is some dark shit.”

“As you know, the Circle of the Crone embraces, explores these rituals, Beatrice. But as Kindred, we have a better way to approach these arts.” And again, to another picture, this time of someone cutting their wrist. But the blood coming out of the wrist didn’t pour; instead, it came out in a slow, single, controlled, thick droplet. Kindred blood.

“So if I know what to say and do, I can use my blood to fuel these rituals? Instead of ... cutting people up or getting my hands on ancient voodoo dolls and shit?”

“Your butchery of the terms aside, yes, many of the black arts that you yourself have no doubt surmised, you are capable of performing with the sacrifice of Kindred blood. Your own typically, but if there’s an enemy you’d like to bleed dry, powerful rituals would be at your disposal.” More chuckles, quieter though, before he slowly closed the book and looked at her. “Why the sudden interest?”

“Why? Like I said, monsters and—”

“That’s all? It couldn’t have anything to do with wanting to hurt someone specific? Or help someone specific?”

“I ... I um...” If he was asking the question, that meant it was worth considering. Why did she really want to know about this stuff? There was certainly appeal to the power it provided, but also fear, and overall terror. The pictures looked like they belonged on some serious death metal album covers, not in an instruction manual.

But, she wanted that power. She wanted to be able to help if the situation arose, even help Julias, or fuck it, even help Garry if it ever came to it. And after that run in with the spider monster, she felt it important to open her eyes to more than the typical Kindred politics that disgusted her. It was part of the reason she joined the Circle after all. Still didn’t feel like the whole reason though, still felt like she was missing something.

“ ... I don’t know.”

“Good answer.” He pat her on the shoulder, and reached out to grab a tiny burlap bag beside him, something that fit nicely into the palm of the hand and had some crow feathers sticking out of it. “If you knew the answer, I’d be hesitant to teach you anything. But you seem like you have an open mind.”

“Is that a requirement?”

“Yeah, it is.”

He put the bag in her hand, and she froze as the weight of death filled her. Ice. Rock. Something heavy and frozen stuck to her guts and pinned her to the ground. She couldn’t move, couldn’t blink, couldn’t even shiver as the waves of panic ripped at her, demanded she drop the bag despite her inability to do so.

“Feels pretty horrible, doesn’t it?” he said, and he plucked the bag from her like picking up a simple pebble. The moment it left her palm, she fell back onto her hands, and stared at the horrible device. “Othello, Aaron, and Jennifer long learned to stay out of my room.”

“You ... got that just to deter people from coming into your room?” She wiped off her hands, and looked around at all the other little objects sitting around she never touched. Would putting on one of those masks burn her face off? Would picking up one of those knives cut her hand off? What the fuck.

“That’s not what it was made for. But that is a nice bonus isn’t it?” He laughed as he held it in his hand, then between finger and thumb before he brought it to his bandage-covered eyes, and then held it out to her. “This time, take it in. You’re holding dread incarnate.”

Dread incarnate. Lovely. And Jacob was handling it like it was nothing at all.

She thought she knew dread, thought she knew fear and whatnot. Thought she knew a lot of things that didn’t know, apparently. Nosferatu had three natural talents in the blood: strength, hiding, and the ability to bestow nightmares. Nightmares of dread.

She didn’t know dread at all.

Gulping on nothing, she reached out, and took the horrible thing into her palm. And again, just like before, ice froze her guts, and stones tied to her feet dragged her down to the bottom of a black, ocean abyss. Sinking. Sinking. The further she went down, the more she was doomed, covered in oblivion, until it felt like fingers gripped her face and took her deeper into nothingness.

Just in your mind, Beatrice. Just in your damn mind. Whatever this bag was, it was forcing you to feel something. Just a feeling. A feeling.

She dropped the bag.

“Impressive,” her boss said, and he picked the bag back up. “Managed a lot longer than Aaron.”

“Aaron tried this?”

“Mmhm. But the Gangrel prefers his books to witchcraft. Can’t blame him.” A smile had sneaked its way onto the old man’s face, and he chuckled a few more times, quiet and genuine sounds, as he put the bag away. “If you really want to explore the dark arts, come to Three Kings Cemetery tomorrow night. I’ll show you a few things.”

“Um ... oh ... ok.” Her catacombs were in the South Side Cemetery, where everything was normal and dead. Three Kings Cemetery was avoided by most, due to some silly ideas that it might be haunted.

If Jacob was taking her there, he was probably the bastard haunting them.

~~Antoinette~~

“What do you plan to wear to the ball, my love?”

“Mmm?” The little man looked up at her from her nipple, and withdrew his lips with blatant reluctance written into his eyes.

“It is a ball for all, but held by your covenant. Your choice of attire is dreadfully important.”

The two of them were in one of her tower’s luxury rooms, where she sometimes changed and tested her clothing against different backgrounds. Drapes of varying colors and designs, a vibrant carpet floor — carpet was a delight when used sparingly — and many mirrors with coiling dragons that circled them, of colors to match whatever drapes they were near. A few stools and chairs sat about, and the room was lit by hanging lights in what may as well have been miniature chandeliers. The room truly was with no purpose, other than to admire oneself in the mirror.

In the center was a large stool of soft design, perhaps four feet wide, and circular in shape. She had taken her love here so she could try clothing for him, but as per usual, his intoxicated gaze, and her need to satisfy him conflicted with her goal.

So now she sat upon his lap, her knees to the bed-like stool beneath them, and his cock buried within her. They had begun their love making with his lips and fingers upon her, and two orgasms later, she felt it her turn to repay him. She stroked his hair, and straddling him so, she cradled his head to her breasts. Such a wonder, such a delicious treat, to see her love squirm as she rode him in gentle waves, her dripping insides coating his member and milking at his length.

And to force him to converse during the act was sweet torture she did love to administer.

“I just figured, you know, my usual suit I take to these events?”

Ah, her little love was forever at a loss for the impact of clothing. There were kernels of growth and awareness, but she doubted he would ever truly grasp the art of fashion, and the power it controlled. She would eternally have to dress him, like a doll. The image made her laugh, and she hugged him tight to her body before she once again started to gently rock her hips back and forth.

“It will be the first gathering the Invictus have officially opened to the entire city in many years, my love. Carthians will be there. Perhaps even Jacob and his witches will be there. And I can assure you I will be there.” She gazed down at him, drank his open, honest, enthralled gaze, and slowly guided his lips back one of her swollen, aching nipples.

And the boy took it into his kiss with a quiet groan. The warmth of his tongue and lips, the wet suckling that coated her nipple, and soon her areola as suckled the entirety of it into his mouth, had her swooning. His persistent suckling, guided by her words, had long ago found the perfect balance of pressure and softness, so each kiss and lick filled her chest with sparks of bliss. And to enjoy such bliss within the afterglow of two previous climaxes made it all the more pleasant.

But, she was satisfied. It was her love's turn to climax, and she squeezed on his length hard enough to make him groan yet again.

"I believe," she said, "that not only will your sire have advice that you should adhere to, it is his ball after all, I also believe you should wear something perhaps a little less formal than usual."

"Less formal?" He raised his lips from her breast, and then a brow in confusion. "But all the covenants will be there."

"The covenants, and perhaps even the wolves. Perhaps even the monsters." She did not agree with either, and did not expect them to attend as well. But stranger things had happened, and she knew Athalia and Daniel had danced together in a ball, once or twice in the past.

"The Uratha might come to the ball?" That got his attention, and he looked down, and then around a few times as he dug through his thoughts. He looked almost guilty. What could be bothering her little Ventrue?

She almost giggled. The poor boy did not know that she knew.

"Perhaps. Though I believe you should dress to invite the other covenants to peace and prosperity." She set her lips upon Jack's head, kissed his fuzzy, prickly hair, and smiled into the sensation as she eased her hips back and forth. No doubt the boy was on the edge of orgasm, but she kept him there, and would keep him there for some time.

“So, uh ... business ... casual?” His hands were on her back, her ass, squeezing and tugging at her, trying to get her to go faster. But she would not. Far more delightful to deny him his pleasure until she was satisfied with the conversation.

“A step in the correct direction, but not the conclusion I believe Julias will reach. He will want something with both the inviting quality of casual, but also the power of true formal wear. And he is intelligent enough to know that simply choosing something between the two will not quite fit the intent. No, he will ask you wear something both extravagant, but not formal. Something that speaks of warmth and joy.” The words were too perfect to not capitalize. She squeezed on his length yet again, hard enough to force her love to tremble, and she used her knees to raise her body higher before squeezing harder still, before sinking herself down upon his cock until her lips devoured every inch of him. Her insides were warm, and joyful; it need not be said.

Jack stopped suckling on her, and raised his hands to hold her shoulder blades before his fingers caressed her spine; for his efforts, she shivered as the tingling pleasure danced up and down her back. He set his cheek to her sternum, and let his head come to rest there as he approached the edge of orgasm yet again, and yet again did not cross it as she ceased her movements.

“I’ll ... I’ll ask him.”

“Good.” She put her hands to his shoulders, and pushed the boy down to lie upon the seat fully. It had no back to block him, it was simply a very wide stool. Once he lay there, she grinned her devil’s grin, and started her dance for him. She brought her hands up to her hair, and ran her fingers through the long waves of white, back over her shoulders so her elbows raised high. She jutted her chest outward to accent the size of her breasts, the curve of her stomach and waist, and gently rolled her body back and forth to ease her dripping pussy along him. Always she kept him buried to the hilt inside her, and even as she started to rotate her hips in a figure eight, she kept him there to enjoy her efforts.

The boy had no idea how much it thrilled her to see him so pleased. His eyes struggled to stay open, but she could see that he forced them to stay as such, to stare at her as he put his hands on her legs, and to gaze up at the dance she did for him. Those beautiful eyes. To meet them felt like she was drinking his soul.

“I believe,” she said, “that I will wear something a touch revealing. I expect many women will feel the ball’s semi-formal dress code will be an excuse to show off their curves.” Men and women were customarily embraced when at their physical peak after all, and only once groomed into fitness. “Perhaps a backless dress, with sleeves, but also plunging cleavage, that reaches from here”—she placed one hand upon her collar—“to here.” She slid the same hand down to her sternum, then her stomach, past her navel, and down to a mere two inches above where her lips were spread around the boy’s cock, where her pubic hair would have been if she had any.

“That’s uh ... that’s a lot ... of cleavage.” Poor boy, so close to climax, and struggling to speak as she tortured him on the edge.

“The dress also has a long skirt, thin, and split upon both legs. The split is unique, in that it runs up to here.” She ran her fingers up her outer thighs, up her hip, and above it to the side of her waist.

“That’s ... a lot of leg.”

“It is indeed. I will have to be delicate with my movements, if I do not wish to expose myself. And for such a dress, undergarments would be a fashion faux pas.”

“ ... r-really?”

“Indeed.” She smiled at her love, and set her hands upon her hips. The boy was imagining her in the dress, and staring at her as he did with overwhelming need in his eyes. A perfect time for her to dance upon his cock, and with relentlessness, drive him over the edge.

To see her love cum, to see his eyes struggle all the more to watch her, to see his muscles flex, his abs and stomach crunch, to see his mouth part and hear his quiet moans escape him, was delectable. She drew out his orgasm, her dance shifting her hips left and right, dipping them side to side with each squeeze of her insides, until she knew the boy was both filling her with his fluid, and struggling to handle the pleasure she was bathing him in. With a touch of force, squeezing harder until she felt her juices join the growing mess of his cum, she brought him to groans, pushing his pleasure until it bordered on almost painful. She knew exactly how much pressure, exactly what motions to use to ride him at that sweet spot of total bliss.

Only when a combination of their juices started to trickle onto the boy’s body, did she ease her clenching insides. She set her hands upon his quivering chest, and traced her fingers along his flexing muscles, his abs, his jaw and lips, and leaned down to place kisses upon his nose, forehead, and soon his lips as well.

“Were it my gathering,” she said, “I would dress you. But for this, my efforts are in vain. I am sure your sire has picked something for you already.”

“You think so?” he said between kisses. His hands reached up to take her, sliding up her waist before hooking behind her to caress her naked spine once more.

She sighed into his touch, purred, and pressed her breasts to his shoulders and collar as she planted more kisses along his forehead. “But, you will sit with me. Understood?” Not a request. A commandment.

“No argument here.”

She grinned down at her love, and kissed him once again. “Good. You can, perhaps, introduce me to this Clara woman I see vying for your attention.” Ah, the look of shock on his face. She laughed, and stroked his lips with a finger. “Silly boy. I may not be omniscient, but I know much. And I trust you, my love, my little Ventrue. Do not fret.” She felt the boy relax beneath her, and again she laughed. “Were you truly worried?”

“I mean ... a bit, yeah? You are a very scary woman.”

She leaned in once more, put her lips to his, and gave him a lasting, proper kiss. “I am.”

Chapter 40

~~Julias~~

“Tonight, you’re going to communicate with a rat.”

“Delightful.”

Julias smirked down at his childe, and gave him a pat on the head, the sort he knew would infuriate his friend. “Don’t like rats?”

“I think rats raised by humans are awesome creatures. Rats who grew up in a sewer? Not so much.”

The two of them stepped out of the car, and Julias waved the driver off before turning to walk toward North Side. Dolareido was a city, a very large city, and that meant crows, cockroaches, and rats. Maybe the kid would prefer trying this with a crow? Later. For now he knew where he could find rats in large quantities.

“I was hoping we could talk about relationship troubles,” Jack said.

Relationship troubles. Kid did love to be blunt. “Oh? Having issues with the Prince?”

The two of them walked further and further from any ears, any pedestrians, any traffic, and further out again toward the edge of the city. The driver had taken them out a ways, but Julias preferred to walk the remainder. And the kid had said he wanted to talk to him about something; so now worked.

“Not exactly? In fact, she seems to already know about Clara ... liking me. No idea how she knows, but I guess that’s why she’s the Prince.” He shrugged, hands in his jacket pockets, eyes on the sidewalk. No one around anymore, just the two of them surrounded by empty factories and emptier streets. “Just, uh ... she’s, um ... Ok, yeah I ... saw her breasts.”

Julias rolled his eyes and combed his hair back with his fingers a single time. God damn this kid. “Alright, walk me through what happened. Spare no details.”

And thus followed an asinine tale of an idiot boy who didn’t know how to say no to a pretty girl. Jack could say no to most people about most things, with a straight face held in the cradle of cold logic. A valuable trait, that went out the window the moment a beautiful woman fluttered her eyelashes at him.

“She could have covered up!” He threw up his hands, utter dismay chiseled onto his face. “She didn’t have to let that woman lift up her shirt!”

“Sounds like she saw an opportunity to let you see something she figured you’d like.” He sighed and flicked the kid in the temple, hard enough to make him yelp and jump to the side. “Maybe you should lay off seduction hunts for a while, and do some regular hunts? Less sexual, less likely to get you into trouble with a girl trying to get into your pants.”

“Arg, I’ve never had this problem before! I didn’t really ... I don’t know, expect her to get that ... that...”

“She likes you. And she’s not some simpleton teenager, she’s a woman, and judging from what I know of the other Uratha, she’s older than she looks.” Clara was a beautiful woman to be sure, looking perhaps in her late twenties or early thirties, with the body of an athlete and a beautiful face. She took care of herself, and managing a full head of box-braid hair down to her hips couldn’t have been easy. “You seem to attract older women.”

“I guess so.” Upon reaching a corner, Jack walked into the lamppost. Into it, hard enough to make a clear, resonating thunk as he planted his forehead into the metal. The kid leaned against the pole, arms dangling like weights pulling at his wrists, and his forehead stuck to the lamppost. “Antoinette said she trusted me, but ... I don’t know, I’ve never been in this position before. Can I trust myself? I don’t think I’d ever betray Antoinette, but I’ve never had a girl approach me like this, not since her.” A low, whining sound came out of the kid, and he banged his head a couple more times against the pole.

“Jack. Come here.”

With time, Jack eventually stood back up, and waddled his way over to Julias.

Until Julias smacked him upside the back of the head.

“Ow! What the fuck man!”

“Kid, you’re an idiot. A lovable idiot, but an idiot. The fact you’re deliberating this so much, when nothing has even happened yet, means you’re giving this far more thought than any cheating man would. So give yourself a little credit, you’re a faithful man and I bet Clara could literally tie you up, pin you down, and rub her naked self all over you and you wouldn’t even kiss her.”

“I mean ... I guess yeah. I can’t get the image of her out of my head though.”

“Yeah, you have a sex drive, same as everyone else. Figured you’d be used to that by now.”

“But—”

“And you’re feeling super anxious and paranoid, which is making you run the thoughts through your head over, and over, and over, like you always do. That's why you can't stop thinking about her. You and Natasha both, always running a million thoughts through your heads all the time, organizing and analyzing." This kid, god this kid. Such a great friend to have, someone he could trust, someone who would dig through things with the utmost tenacity until he'd filtered a million bits of information, and gotten to the bottom of things. Until he'd become an expert — or at least learned — in whatever he needed to know, he would obsess about something until it consumed him. Think about things until he paced his brain into a ditch, and then a grave.

"So I should do ... what?"

"Nothing. That's what I'm saying. Maybe next time don't take the girl who likes you to a sex club, but other than that, nothing." Chuckling, he put his hand on his friend's shoulder, and started walking them down the street again. "Really, you think too much."

"I know, I know. It's just she's my first girlfriend, and I really love her. God I love her, and she spoils the fuck out of me, and—"

He shook the little man by the shoulder, just enough to get him to cut his worrying to a quick halt. "Worry less about Antoinette. Worry more about the Prince. Do anything like that suicidal trip into the tunnels again, and if I don't kill you, she will. And, if by some strange fluke, she doesn't, then Michael or Maria will."

That got some raised brows. Good, kid needed to stop worrying about girls so much, and worry a bit more about his own hide.

"Rats," Julias continued, "are intelligent creatures as you know. Observant, but not the best eyesight. Great sense of smell, great hearing. And because there are so many of them, a Kindred would be hard pressed to suspect a rat. Be careful when using them to spy on particularly crafty Mehket, or any elders, and you'll be surprised at how much information you can get from a rat."

“I’m confused though. How’s a rat going to convey the information?”

“You’re going to talk to it.”

“ ... say what now?”

With a laugh, Julias brought him to the end of the street, where a couple of decayed large buildings sat abandoned and decrepit. Dolareido was an old city — for the US — and had gone through many phases, many revolutions of technology, many changes as the old died and the new arrived. Areas that couldn’t adapt fell apart, and such was the way with certain corners of North Side. Old factories that used to make things like string, or newspapers, or clothes, or anything that the manufacturer couldn’t update for the modern era lead to such buildings being vacated. Someone would buy them eventually, tear them down or replace them, refit them, but for years, sometimes decades, many of the buildings sat useless.

Rats loved it.

Julias slid open an old door, and brought out a couple of LED flashlights. No power and with old, dirty windows, the outside light wasn’t getting in; the rats counted on it. So Julias set the flashlights on the table pointed up to act like lanterns, and stood in the center of the empty room. A lobby of sorts, maybe for a small hospital, with a large desk and some doorways that led into dark hallways. Around them were a few small, worn couches, some stools, and some magazines on a table from the eighties.

“I can hear them,” Jack said.

“Yeah. Thousands of them. More rats in Dolareido than there are people. Ten million, twenty million maybe.”

“Damn ... reminds me of when Viktor summoned all those rats.”

“An advanced discipline. Summoning the swarm is something I’m sure you’ll be able to do someday, and with proper preparation, to far greater effect than Viktor’s on-the-fly decision to use it. We needed a way to get past Jessica’s rifle.” Not a fun night, dealing with that Daeva devil. But the memory of Beatrice ripping her in half, so her literal ashes scattered to the wind, was a happy memory indeed.

“I could summon a swarm?”

“Given the years to practice and grow your strength and skill? Yes, definitely. And more besides. There is far more to being Kindred than simply being strong or fast, or not needing to breathe, or being able to mesmerize kine with your eyes.” And, to demonstrate, he squatted down, and waited.

Rats were cautious and crafty creatures by nature, but given time, darkness, and quiet, they came out of their holes. First one, and then another, and then another. They scurried along the walls, into holes that must have taken years to make, up scratched door frames, down counters, and eventually onto the center of the floor.

And once one of them looked his way, Julias met its beady little gaze with his own.

“Come here,” he said, voice quiet, calm, and direct. Each letter enunciated, each marking the instrument of command to penetrate the rat’s alien mind. The bad eyesight, the great hearing and sense of smell, the tiny body, the feet and tail. It was one thing to own a pet rat, but to establish a dialog with such a creature took a different level of understanding. And to a Ventrue, animalism was simply giving commands to animals instead of people.

The rat walked up to them, and stood up on its hind legs.

“God damn,” Jack said, chuckling a little as he squatted down beside Julias. “Really doesn’t feel like a Ventrue thing to do, talk to animals.”

“While both Gangrel and Ventrue have a natural talent for animalism, and animalism may seem, perhaps, a discipline you’d expect from only a Gangrel, to give commandments is as natural to Ventrue as drinking blood. Whether it be to kine, animals, or once you are strong enough, other Kindred, Ventrue are rulers.” The whole Damien situation aside.

“Daaamn.” Jack’s smile reached across his cheeks, ego growing before Julias’s eyes. He reached out as well, and touched the rat. Before the animal could bite the finger, Julias made a few, tiny chirp sounds and high-pitched clucks of the tongue, and the rat nodded, giving Jack freedom to touch it. “Did you just ... speak rat?”

“I did. Sort of. When you learn to speak in feral whispers, you can use words, but you’ll also find it’ll come natural to make animal sounds to better fit the way the creature’s mind works.” He held out his hand for the rat, and made a few more quiet clicks with his tongue. The rat nodded, and climbed into his palm. “It’s a thing we have in common with the werewolves, the beast inside us. Much as you don’t want that beast coming out and making a mess of your life, it does provide some significant advantages. It is an animal, it speaks animal, and can communicate with other animals.”

“I’ll say. So, I can talk with rats?”

“Talk, give it orders, ask it questions. Here.” He held the rat up in front of the boy, and gestured to it. “Tell it to turn around.”

“I’m ... not sure how I’m supposed to do this.”

“You have to stop thinking in terms of contracts, suits, shoes, clubs, taxis, and money for a moment. Let the beast in your gut come to the surface; it’ll show you how to think in terms of smell, blood, hunting, hunger, territory, and all the animal things you normally suppress. And once you've let a little of that beast out of its cage, focus on the rat."

"Right, beast ... right."

A sore spot, and Julias knew it. Kid didn't like listening to that part of him, didn't like that he had a beast in there, something that had driven him to murder an innocent woman, Mrs. Pavala. Part of being Kindred was understanding that you were no longer human, but also never letting go of your humanity, lest the beast take you over and turn you into a mindless animal. Forever a tug of war, using but controlling the animal inside.

Kid was going to have to learn how to use both sides, sooner or later.

With a deep, unneeded breath, Jack set his eyes on the rat. Like watching a child learning to ride a bike, there was a balance to be found that took practice, that took trial and error, that had Jack frowning as he attempted to communicate with a rat. A weird direction to take the brain, which was exactly where Jack's problem was; his brain kept getting in the way. But Julias had given him decent instruction, and he trusted the kid to figure it out.

"... turn ... around," the boy said. The rat tilted its head to the side and stared at him. "God damn it." Again, the boy stared at the rat, and leaned in to make better eye contact. Julias almost interrupted with more advice, but he could see Jack was in 'Jack' mode, his 'don't disturb me while I figure this out, even if it takes days' mode. "... turn around."

The rat turned around. Jack grinned a grin Julias knew all too well, the Ventrue grin of 'I'm a god damn Ventrue and I did this' accomplishment.

Julias smiled at his childe. "Well done. Now, ask it a question."

“Like what?”

“Whatever you want.”

“Whatever I want, right right. Um, how was your d—”

“Something a rat would understand, Jack. It’s a rodent that spends its days scavenging for food and fucking other cute little rats.”

Jack rubbed his buzzed head, took another sigh, and tried again. “... how many Kindred are in this room?” The rat stood there, unmoving for several moments, before it held up two fingers. And a squeak to go with it. “... did I just understand it squeak? Can I speak squeak language now?”

“After a fashion. The noises help bridge the gap for your mind to understand how the rat communicates. And now, if you tried to talk to the rat using rat-like noises, you’d find it quite natural.”

“Natural. Ok.” And the kid made a few little squeaks of his own, which enticed the rat to do a slow full body turn again. “Wow I’m the Rat Whisperer.”

“Viktor had a natural affinity for commanding others, as do you and I, be it Kindred or kine or animal. Viktor and I are also comfortable with physical combat, which, despite my best guess, you seem to be as well.”

“Ha, I doubt it.” The kid clicked his tongue a few times, and the rat crawled out onto his awaiting palm. Rat-equipped, Jack stated to walk around the abandoned building, and scanned the walls up and down with his eyes. “I got very, very lucky with that spider creature.”

“Still, given some training, I think you could learn to use more than a gun.” Julias shrugged and stood back up. Squatting for extended periods was a bitch, even for a Kindred. “And it may come up, if things go sour, that all Kindred in the Invictus will receive some proper training with a knife.”

“A knife? Why?” Jack approached a corner where a rat hole was, and clicked his tongue a few times. A few more rats emerged, and they stood in a row while Jack put down the first rat to join them. The rats did not flee, but stood there longer yet, and nodded a few times as Jack offered them a few squeaks. Kid caught on fast, very fast. Scary fast even.

“You would be hard pressed to use any discipline on a werewolf, and unless you learn how to use a knife in proper combat, a silver knife will be useless.”

“Silver ... knife.” And reality came crashing down on Julias’s childe in the most obvious way, with collapsing shoulders and a low groan. “Thought we were on good terms with the Uratha.”

“We are. That’s why we’re slowly setting up our Kindred with silver knives, instead of arming everyone overnight with both those, and silver bullets.”

“Putting me in a weird position as the middle man for the Uratha and Kindred. You know Avery’s looking into Barry’s death too?”

Barry. Julias frowned as he started to pace, and raised a hand to stroke his chin. “Barry was nobody. That was part of why we liked him. I could trust Barry to pursue a goal, a contract, and not only would he do it, but I didn’t have to worry him drawing attention to himself. At least until this Mirrden business. And you know Avery and Garry are friends right?”

“Think she killed Barry to slow down our takeover, for Garry?”

“Seems extreme.” But the Uratha lacked the subtlety of the Kindred. What was extreme to a vampire was a regular night for a werewolf. “Whatever’s going on, it has to do with the Mirrden business. Monica could have been caught in a fire as well if she hadn’t moved.”

“Yeah, but I found nothing that could help me track down who set either fire. No footage, or what little footage Amanda got was useless.” Jack stopped, looked at him, and then at the rats standing before him. “ ... I should have asked the animals.”

Now the kid was catching on. “Being a Kindred is a cold war, most of the time. Information. And the information you can learn from an animal is better than no information at all. Rats, and crows in particular, have surprisingly good memories.”

“But—”

“And you can use that information to prevent fights as much as win them, Jack. I’m happy with the way Dolareido is now, far more than my peers, and I struggle every day to keep them from ruining it. Garry, Michael, and Maria are almost desperate to fight each other, but a little nudge here, a hint there, and I help them settle their issues without Kindred getting caught in the middle.” He motioned to the rats. “Now, try again, more elaborate orders, more elaborate questions.”

The two of them spent the next two hours working on the kid’s feral whisper, and each passing moment made Julias all the prouder. Kid was good. Kid was damn good. Some Kindred bloodlines seemed to water down with the generations, but Viktor had been a natural, Julias even more a natural, and Jack was proving to continue the trend. Kid was going to become a powerful man, given the time to grow. It wasn’t long before Jack had several rats fetching him things, disappearing into rooms, only to return and describe the room contents, and he had some other rats besides standing in formation.

“Excellent,” Julias said. “Keep at it, and soon you’ll be raising similar animals from the dead to be your devoted familiar for a few nights.”

“Raise the dead? Are you fucking serious?”

“That is basically what I did to you when I sired you, Jack.”

“Touche.”

“Once you can do that, then we’ll see about summoning animals to you, and perhaps possessing one.”

Jack’s eyes opened wide as he looked at the rats, then back to him, then the rats. Kid just didn’t get it, didn’t understand how profound and insane a Kindred’s abilities could become, how amazing his abilities could become. Still thought small. Julias would weed that trait out of him, and then there’d be no stopping the kid’s growth.

Chuckling, he put his hand on the boy’s shoulder, and guided him back onto the street.

“So, only Ventrue and Gangrel can do do this?” Jack said, voice a tiny whisper now that they were out in the open.

“Other Kindred such as the Daeva can learn animalism with practice, and a Ventrue can learn to move with Daeva speed, but to dominate a mind like a Ventrue can would require teaching from a Ventrue. And vice versa. For a Ventrue to learn how to enrapture people with the awe and majesty discipline of the Daeva, you would need to learn from a Daeva. Each bloodclan comes with their own, unique discipline as you know.”

“Maybe I could ask Antoinette to teach me?”

Julias laughed, no longer whispering; no need for it when nothing they were talking about was secret. “There are Daeva in the Invictus who could teach you instead, but I think you’ll have your hands full learning from me for many decades yet. And besides, you’d need to taste a Daeva’s blood to unlock their unique discipline. Antoinette wouldn’t let you do that.”

“Oh ... yeah, you’re right. That makes me wonder, about Vivienne and Natasha—not the blood tasting, I mean, just the fact they ... don’t really talk anymore, not like you and I do.”

Julias winced, but nodded, and gave his little childe a half-hug, half-shake of the far shoulder. “I respect Natasha a lot, but I had my doubts she’d be able to be someone’s sire.” And it was such a shame, cause the girl was brilliant. Lot of similarities between her and Jack, not just their small size. “It’s ... it’s not the same, when you sire a friend.”

“Is our relationship much different, now that we’re childe and sire?”

“No, and that’s because I knew what I was doing.” He stopped by a lamppost, and turned to face the boy. This was too important to talk about casually, he needed to look the kid in the eyes. “The day may become when you want to sire someone, and you may get permission to do just that. If you sired someone very close to you, like your mother or sister, the relationship is going to be damaged. You’re not the same person anymore, the beast changes you, and your relationship with others. When you and I became friends, I saw potential in you, and made sure our friendship always had this sire and childe dynamic, right from the start.”

“That’s true, isn’t it?” Jack looked up at him, and smiled one of those smiles that was frustratingly good at disarming people, even Julias. The exact opposite of Viktor. “I ... sometimes I think about my family, and what it'd be like to bring them into the fold. Just a fantasy, I know, but—”

“But it never leaves you. Letting my wife think I was dead, letting her move on without me? Hardest thing I've ever done.”

“Your wife ... you never talk about her much.” It was Jack's turn to reach out this time, and give Julias a small pat on the arm. “You don't need to start now. Shit must be fucking painful.”

“Yeah.” And that was one of the reasons he loved this damn kid. Never got a ‘cry on my shoulder’ request from him. “Yes it is. But that was a long time ago. Times are different now, and better in every way. I have a woman I love, you have a woman you love, Dolareido's in a state of peace, and even the Begotten and Uratha aren't stirring up much trouble.”

“Yeah, yeah we do have women!” Jack said, eyes lighting up. Figures the kid would focus on that of course. One of these days, Julias was going to have to teach him how to resist a woman's charms, before it got him killed.

The two of them started walking again, though Jack was closer to a skip than a walk. Very unbecoming the suit.

“Think we should go on a double date?” Julias said. Bad idea, hilariously bad idea, but the thought was entertaining nonetheless.

“How would that even work? Can you imagine Beatrice and Antoinette sitting across from each other at a table?”

Yes, he could. Strange, maybe even awkward, but the Prince had a way of cutting through those sorts of issues; in her favor, at least.

“You know, I know you've seen Beatrice's breasts,” he said. She'd sent the picture of her topless to the kid with Julias sitting right next to her after all. And that time in his apartment too. Girl was shameless. “And Antoinette’s, and her ghouls’, and now Clara’s. Who else should go on this list?”

“Hey! Hey! D-Don’t say shit like that!” Jack checked left, checked right, and shoved Julias as best he could; not at all, and Jack pushed himself away a few feet for his efforts. “Christ. I mean, Antoinette’s been super forgiving about that sort of stuff, but even she must have her limits.”

“Don’t kiss or fuck any other girls and I think you’ll be fine. Same goes for me you know? This Jennifer woman has been pretty upfront with her desire to get into Beatrice’s bed, and by extension my bed. No idea if that’s a good idea or not.” Well, the conversation had taken a strange route. But the kid wasn’t a kid, he was an adult, and Julias had no one else he could talk to about these sorts of problems. There was Beatrice, but she wasn’t exactly a neutral body in the discussion; girl was practically a sex addict. Which he could understand, considering she had twenty years of unwanted celibacy to make up for. Understand and enjoy.

“I remember talking to Jennifer at the ball. Sexy, very sexy, and seemed pretty intelligent. I could see why she’d like you, but Beatrice?”

“Hey!” He gave his childe a small shove, but Jack being Jack, a small shove sent him a fair ways. “I like Beatrice.”

The little Ventrue smirked at him, and the two of them started walking once more. “So do I.”

God damn it was nice, to just walk down the street with his childe, and talk about girls.

~~Natasha~~

Natasha expected that, sitting around and talking about boys, would eventually get old. But for some reason she found herself smiling, and giggling more than a few times, as she talked with Jessy. The two of them were in Natasha's apartment, sitting at the counter and drinking a bottle of blood again. Far more giggling and laughing going on this time though.

"In the alley, really?"

Natasha nodded. With no blush of life, she was free to be as embarrassed as she wanted to be without having to blush red. And she was very, very embarrassed.

"Y-Yeah, they uh ... had to have me, and I had t-t-to calm them down ... B-But even after doing that, they ... had me anyway." And unlike Jessy's ghouls, they didn't use pharmaceutical aid. They were simply ridiculously healthy, fit, strong beasts. And apparently, extremely horny beasts.

"Wish I was there."

"Hey! D-Don't ... don't touch my boys. They're mine." Mine mine mine. First time she'd ever had a relationship this sexual, this searing hot. It was also the first time she found herself wanting to hang out with her lover, purely for the fun of it, to laugh at the TV or to joke about politics.

First time she'd ever had a romantic relationship that felt fun. And it was so weird that it was with two boys. Men. Wolves at that.

"Quite attached to your lovers. Am I sensing love in the air?"

"W-What? N-N-N-No ... I ... we only just ... it's only been a week together, and ... I only knew them a little while b-before then, and—"

"Yeah, it's good that you're going slow and not declaring your love the moment you felt a connection."

“Hey! I’m just as old as you, J-Jessy, I ... I’m not a child, some juvenile little girl.”

Her friend smirked at her, winked, and took another sip of their drink. “Yeah, but love can turn anyone into a silly little girl.”

“We’re n-not in love!” More frowns for her friend, before she took back her bottle and refilled her glass.

“Glad my advice for them didn’t backfire at least. I had a feeling you liked them, but I could have been wrong.”

“I still owe you f-for that. I ... they ... d-did things to me you know.” Pinned down on a bed, trapped between two massive walls of muscle, with the two of them buried to the hilt inside her.

“Bet you came your brains out too.” The chuckle Jessy made could have come from a hyena.

“That ... that isn’t important! You t-told them personal things! Things I ... things I never told you!”

“Yeah well, it didn’t take a genius to see where your eyes were going those few times we had fun with the boys. Speaking of, damn they are going to be sad.”

“Sad? B-But they still have you. With your thighs and butt and—”

Natasha squeaked when her friend flicked her in the nose.

“You’d think after all this, you’d have grown some confidence! My boys really, really wanted to have you, all of them, at the same time.”

Oh good god. She lowered her forehead to the counter, half out of shame, half cause she was picturing it now. Eight hands on her, four penises fighting to find somewhere to penetrate, her buried in flesh and heat and sex. Too much, way too much. Two men was more than enough.

But the image made her smile anyway.

“They ... really were attracted to me, weren’t they?”

“Fuck yes they were. Tight little thing like you? And the way you spoiled them with the blowjobs, ugh, making me look bad.”

“I’m sorry! I ... I just...” Just seemed to really like it when men were groaning and squirming in pleasure because of her hands, her lips and tongue. It was a very unexpected development from the sexual hazing Jessy had put her through, but very real, and her two boyfriends seemed to love it too. And were more than willing to repay her for it.

Hehe, two boyfriends.

“Any bisexuality in there?” Jessy said.

“W-What?” Natasha sat up straight and raised a brow, then considered. Jessy’s ghouls were more than willing to do anything Jessy asked, and that occasionally included touching each other. “No, I d-d-don’t think so. They’re best friends, and, um, d-despite how close everything gets, they never t-touch or even look at each other.” Always her, always all their attention on her, spoiling her rotten.

“Well, I’m sad that you won’t be joining me anymore, but pretty happy for you. Enjoy it.” Taking another sip of the blood — from the bottle — Jessy reached over and slid the laptop closer. Pictures of the burned building were open, as well as pictures of the Mirrden area. Natasha and Jessy were no longer in the same covenant, but dead Kindred was a problem worth talking about.

“Invictus h-have any leads yet?”

“Nope. Dragons?”

“No. The Prince has D-Daniel keeping an eye open, I’m sure, but ... but there’s no reason to really suspect the Uratha yet.”

“How about those monsters? We know there’s this Azamel chick hanging out in the tunnels, just squatting and being ominous and shit. Think she has anything to do with it?”

“ ... maybe.” But unlikely. Someone killed Barry, but the Carthians weren’t so stupid as to invite war on themselves to kill simple Barry. Barry was Barry, and Natasha doubted Garry even knew the man’s name.

“Ok, enough talk about work,” Jessy said.

“W-What? We said three words about wo—”

“So you going to take the boys out? Or just eat in all the time? I wonder if they’d enjoy going to one of the clubs.”

Natasha frowned her meanest frown, but like usual, it did nothing to deter Jessy and her one-track mind. “I ... I might take them to a club.” Dolareido was at no lack of options, not in the Invictus part of South Side anyway. “But it’s really not me, you know? And I d-don’t think it’s them either.”

“Well you wouldn’t be taking them there to dance. You’d be taking them there to fuck.”

“W-We can do that at home!”

“Yeah but it’s not the same.”

“I p-p-p-prefer it when the city c-can’t all see me naked. Unlike you! Everyone looks at your wind-dow every Saturday evening!”

Insults were useless against Jessy, not when it came to her shamelessness and her sexual desires. The Gangrel shrugged and sipped more blood, as if Natasha had just commented on the weather.

“If they like what they see, all the hotter for me.”

Natasha frowned again, but quickly gave up. Jessy was Jessy, and there was no changing her.

“And you wear that thong, so uncomfortable! Whole city probably just—”

“How do you know I wear a thong when I’m having fun by the window?” Jessy’s smile grew into a terrible, evil grin, and she leaned further across the counter the more it grew. “Been watching me?”

“I uh ... sort of? Just once! B-By accident.”

“Uh huh.”

---

“How goes your new relationship, with the two Uratha, my apprentice? Any new developments?”

Natasha whined and shrank into her seat; even Antoinette wanted to talk about her new boyfriends. Her and the Prince, alone in the laboratory where the Prince conducted her experiments, seeking to communicate with the other side, the Hisil. Perhaps Natasha would ask her boyfriends for help with that someday, if Avery didn’t kill them for it.

“You know about Arturo and M-Matthew?”

“We discussed them not long ago, did we not? You confided in me, told me you Kissed one, told me they flirted with you, that they were interested in you, and you them.” A wicked smile appeared, and she shrugged. “And of course, information travels quickly in Dolareido.”

“ ... oh god.” She sank into her chair some more, and then let her forehead drop to the table. Everyone knew she was in a relationship with two men, two werewolves at that.

“Natasha Vola, are you embarrassed?”

“ ... yes.”

“Whatever for?” The Prince paced about, a tablet in her hand showing her some different camera feeds of the symbol in the center of the room. Each feed was fed through some sort of filter, so the feeds were different color. But the lights were on in the laboratory, letting Natasha take notes of the strange object in front of her: a tiny carving of a crow.

“For ... y-you know, d-d-doing ... b-being in a ... uh, relationship ... like that.” No use in denying it. If Antoinette knew—if everyone knew, then they knew what kind of relationship it was.

But the Prince just laughed, a comely and warm sound, before sitting down across the table from her.

“Natasha, my dear, you are a silly little creature. Being friends with that animal friend of yours, Jessy, I had assumed such trite shames were abandoned already. Or, soon to be.”

“ ... you did?”

More laughter, but not in a taunting way. The sound of the Prince laughing was almost soothing.

“You are precious. Part of me believed that your shy demeanor was merely the mask you wore in public.” She smiled down at her, leaned in, and set the tablet aside. “Half a century of unlife to your name, and you are still concerned about sex, and the views Kindred share of it?”

“A l-little, yeah!”

Antoinette rolled her eyes, leaned back, and combed her hair over one of her shoulders onto her chest, where she continued to comb it with her fingers. “Jessy engages in such crude, sexual pursuits, because she knows that no Kindred — at least any older than a fledgling — care. And I encourage it. In so many cities, Kindred lose their taste for the physical as they age, and I have labored to prevent that from happening within my city, for myself, and for the others.”

“Y-Yeah, and I love that, b-b-b-b—”

“Natasha.” The Prince craned her head a little to look at the door; probably checking for Daniel. But it was just the two of them, thank god. “Do you have any inkling of the sort of sexual depravity a Kindred may sink to, seeking pleasure?”

“I ... I um...”

“When I was your age, little Vola, or perhaps a little older, I once had twenty men enslaved to the power of my discipline majesty. And while four of them were dedicated to pleasuring me, filling my body completely with finger, tongue, and shaft, the other sixteen bathed my breasts and body in their white seed. The stood about me, masturbating, and when one was ready to climax, they soaked my breasts, for another man to massage into my skin. And during all this, I sipped blood from a wine glass, and let the pleasure, and the overwhelming smell of sex and blood and life, let the moment lull me into contentment and orgasm.”

Holy. Fuck. Natasha stared at the woman, eyes wide, and taking more than few up-and-down glances of her. Twenty men, just covering her in cum, and massaging and fingering and fucking and rubbing and stuff? Good god.

“ ... all ... all over you? R-Really?” She almost said gross. And it was gross! In the after math when the arousal was gone and you had to clean up. But, in the heat of the moment, getting a man’s cum on your skin was ... carnal, and thrilling.

Antoinette nodded, and shrugged when they made eye contact. “It was an interesting time, exploring one’s body, one’s self, exploring desires and breaching barriers. Coming into the power of the age of ancilla, as you have, I took the time to discover what appealed or did not appeal to me. I wholly encourage your relationship with these two, Natasha, if for no other reason than to explore what will make you happy.”

“I sense a ... b-but coming.”

“But be careful, Vola. They are Uratha. You are not. We have different goals, different reasons to exist. And sometimes those goals do not mesh.”

“ ... you don’t think ... it’ll c-come to a conflict, d-do you?” Cause she really didn’t want that. Really really didn’t want that.

“Just be aware, my little apprentice. You are smart, clever, quick, and I will be relying on you more and more as the years go by. If it ever does come to blows with the wolves ... Fetch my purse for me, would you dear?”

Purse fetching? A little odd, but she nodded and got up. The purse the Prince was carrying was a black thing, fairly large, large enough to be gaudy and unusual; not something the Prince would wear in public considering her perfect fashion sense. And it felt a little heavy.

Once it was on the table, Antoinette opened it up, and withdrew a small sword.

“For you, my apprentice.”

“Uh, o-ok?” Not to seem ungrateful, but she already had a sword, and Antoinette knew it. “Wha—”

“Draw the blade.”

Natasha blinked, but did as requested. The sheathe was a simple thing, some sort of sturdy material, perhaps black leather, and maybe fifteen inches long. The handle was similar, though as Natasha looked at the grip, she noticed a subtle pattern carved into the hard handle: a dragon, almost invisible unless you were looking for it.

But it was the metal of the blade that locked Natasha’s vision. There was a glint to it, a shimmer, a shine she didn’t expect to find on metal.

“ ... s-silver.”

“Indeed. And I expect you to keep that blade with you, Natasha Vola. That is not a request. If you forget to keep it with you, I will do far more to you than shake you by the jaw. Understood?”

“Und-d-derstood.” She gulped, and ran her eyes up and down the shortsword. She didn’t normally walk around with her usual sword unless she felt the mission was dangerous, and now she was being ordered to keep a blade on her at all times.

What would Matthew and Arturo say? They’d understand, surely.

“And be under no illusions, Vola. The other covenants will be doing the same.”

“Feel like we ... m-m-might trigger something.”

“With luck, my love and his new role will prevent that. That does bring me to a new task for you, Natasha,” Antoinette said. New task, and she was holding a new silver sword. Uh oh. But, the Prince shook her head, reading her mind. “Nothing to do with the Uratha. In fact, with your new relationship, I feel I should leave tasks involving the Uratha to Daniel. No, what I ask of you, is to keep an eye and ear open for a similar weakness in the Begotten.”

“Oh! S-Silver for the werewolves, but the monsters, I uh ... yeah, what is there weakness?” They were literal nightmares, but that didn’t explain any weakness, didn’t provide any real hints on how to deal with them if things went bad. “You’ve d-d-dealt with them before, and ... in centuries, you haven’t found a weakness?”

“No. They hold their secrets close.”

“I got the impression, from F-Fiona ... that they actually ... like bonding with other beings, like us, like the werewolves.”

The Prince sighed, got up, and began to pace about the room, her hands together behind her back, and her head down as she dug through her thoughts. “They do, from the few I have met. But they enjoy their own motives, Azamel in particular. Feeding their hunger is not just a need of the Begotten, it is their reason for existence. The ramifications of their ravenous appetites changes from monster to monster, and if at all possible, I require the means to defeat them should their hungers prove too great a thorn in my side.”

“I’d hate t-t-to have to kill Fiona.” Fiona was fun. Really fun. And nice. She needed to see her again, and thank her a few more times for everything she did with Jack and them.

“As would I, my little apprentice. But I have lived too long to make silly mistakes such as trusting others. We will look for a weakness, but only to use if absolutely necessary. And do not tell the beasts we are looking for this information. I do not wish them to think this will be a city operating under a policy of deterrence.”

“So ... if we ... d-d-discover a weakness, don’t tell them. They’ll think we c-can’t defeat them, but they’ll also be ... less l-likely to be difficult to deal with.” It was a smart plan, assuming she could get such information without them knowing. And that was easier said than done, considering how alien these creatures were. Werewolves were weird and had unusual motivations, but the monsters may as well have been literal aliens from another planet, for all she could understand them.

“Indeed.” Antoinette walked over to the symbol on the floor where she performed her experiments, and stared at it. Apparently her mind was wandering, probably devouring some of the experiments they’d been doing in trying to summon different things. A few minor successes, summoning a few things that had as much intelligence as an insect. Nothing as profound as Safe.

“ ... d ... d-did you really ... have that many men ... cum all over you?” The image was too vivid to just drop it.

The Prince burst into a loud laugh, and winked at Natasha before she returned to her analyzing of the summoning circle. “I did indeed.”

“But that was so long ago! How ... d-do you remember something from back then?” Careful. Elders did not like admitting to their bad memories.

“It is true the memory is nothing more than a haze, but I quickly realized the value of journals when I was younger. I detailed such sexual exploration, and took note of many things.” She stepped over the circle, and analyzed it from the other side, fingers on her chin. “Perhaps you would prefer a more recent memory?”

“Recent? L ... like...” Oh, Jack. She was talking about Jack. “I ... um, that’s personal, right? You can—”

“Natasha, I know that you and that mongrel Jessy are close friends, and she has the tact of a grenade. If you would like to talk sex, then please, ask me. It is a passion of mine.”

Sex was a passion of the Prince's? Well, she was Daeva, but with her age, Natasha continued to have the impression that her boss didn't care for sex like younger Kindred. She knew that wasn't true, but she'd dealt with Maria for so long, it was hard to shake the idea.

"I, I uh ... um..." Awkward, so awkward. But then it was Natasha making it awkward. Jessy never felt awkward, and Antoinette was literally ten times older than Jessy. Making her feel ashamed, embarrassed, awkward, was impossible.

"Personally," the Prince said, "I prefer to have multiple women in the bed, with the one man. It is such fun to tease the man, to hang him on the edge of bliss, before the insurmountable size of three women's sex drive combined crush him." She came back over to the table, sat down, and took a few more hidden notes on her tablet. "With you, I imagine it must be quite different. Two wolves, aggressive animals, large, and tiny you?" With a twinkle in her eye, the Prince leaned in, set her elbows on the table, and netted her fingers together for her chin to rest on. "Delicious."

First Jessy, now Antoinette. But at least with Antoinette, she didn't feel like she was talking to a teenager in an adult's body. Antoinette was a real, mature woman, who could say a word like penis without laughing, and could describe sexual acts in extreme detail without ever breaking eye contact, apparently.

"They ... they uh ... sort ... p-pinned me d-d-down ... on the bed. And um, they both took me ... same time ... one in front of me ... one behind me." How would her boss react to that level of sexual admittance?

"Pinned?"

"Oh! Um, no no, I had a safe word, and it w-was ... weirdly romantic? Cause they were kissing me, and t-touching me, and then ... fucking me, at the same time, and they were gentle! Gentle, and nice ... b-but also ... aggressive and ... hungry."

“That sounds utterly rapturous.” Antoinette sighed, a long, calming sort, and let her eyes drift upward in some memory Natasha could not fathom. “I have forever been the mightier of my bedfellows. I do not know what it is to be in danger from the strength of whoever shares my touch. I envy you. It must have been intoxicating, little you, to be surrounded by such muscle, raw strength, blood and life capable of tearing you limb from limb, yet only concerned with two things: pleasuring you, and relieving themselves within your awaiting depths.”

Yeap. That was it. That was what was making Natasha’s head spin every time she remembered that night. The feeling of being trapped and helpless and even in danger, and yet knowing the two who could easily kill her, wanted only to fuck her into a helpless mess, was overwhelming and intoxicating.

“It was ... it w-was really good.”

“It must have been! In my own experimentations, I have found that I could never quite truly enjoy anal penetration, to my dismay.” The Prince shrugged, lowered her hands, and leaned back in her chair again so she could start combing her hair once more. “Of course, to each their own. And I must admit, the thought of you trapped between those two beasts is a very pleasing thought, Miss Vola. You are a beautiful little creature, and the juxtaposition of their size against yours, is a magnificently erotic image.”

“Th-Thank you.” Natasha smiled, even beamed with pride, and nodded a few times. The way the Prince described things made them feel so empowering, so delightful, so amazing. Not like Jessy who practically made her feel guilty; course her friend was only teasing her, but still. “You have such a b-beautiful way with words.”

“Thank you,” she said in return, smiling a warm smile Natasha found quite rare on her master’s face. “As I said, sexuality is a passion of mine, and I am morose for not having a fellow Kindred to speak of such things with anymore. Would you care to indulge me?”

“Indulge, P-Prince?”

“Share with me details of your exploits, and I will share with you mine. Your relationship with the two Uratha is unique, and one I could not hope to experience on my own. Through your words, I may gain a taste of that experience. And I do hope you will enjoy my own tales.”

Girl talk! Except, not the sort of girl talk with Jessy where it was all chuckles and teasing and dirty gossip. Antoinette actually seemed to approach the topic with the heart of an artist, looking to find the joy and eroticism in the words. And that, Natasha could definitely agree to.

“Ok.”

“Wonderful.” Antoinette made another sigh, another smile, and let her gaze drift upward as she combed her hair over her chest. “But only a week ago, perhaps a day more, I was lying back in the arms of one of my ghouls, my precious Ashley. Jack sat upon my waist, leaning forward, shaft buried in my breasts. Ashley took me into her hands, and used my breasts to massage Jack’s length, until his white fluid coated me.” Another sigh! The third sigh sealed it; it was her dreamy sigh. This was the noise the Prince made when she was swooning. “The look of sheer, total, overwhelming sexual bliss on Jack’s face was enough to make my knees weak. And of course, to my ever delight, the feel of fingers massaging his warmth into my skin was lovely.”

Well, that was an image Natasha was never going to get out of her head. And yet, with how elegantly the Prince described it, she was more than happy to keep the image. Jack was a very attractive little man, and the scene Antoinette described was pretty amazing, if not exactly Natasha's cup of tea. Perhaps that's what these exchanges were all about?

"Jack m-must have really enjoyed that."

"Oh, the boy is obsessed with my breasts." Antoinette chuckled, and shrugged as she looked down at her fingers, and where they mingled with her hair. "And I adore him for it. He has brought me to near climax through my breasts alone, ever doting on them, massaging, caressing, kissing, suckling. Sometimes, I will simply lie there, and let him feast upon my breasts. It will take him twenty, perhaps thirty minutes before he at last feels the need to move on, and by then, a touch of his breath on my neck is enough to bring me to orgasm."

And not at a single point in any of this vivid describing did Antoinette even blink. Not for jadedness though; if anything she looked head over heels in love, and swooned a fourth time.

"But, please," Antoinette said, "this is supposed to be an exchange. Regale me with a tale, Miss Vola, of what your two beasts have done to you?"

Natasha gulped, peeked left and right like someone might be spying on them, and leaned forward. "The ... d-day after our first ... time, they..." She almost squealed, and buried her face in her palms as she shook her head. "Had their tongues ... between my legs. B-B-Both of them did."

"Your new lovers sound quite comfortable with each other and your body."

"T-Too comfortable! It was ... I mean, it was ... really good, just..."

"Natasha, you are Kindred, and have been for five decades. You have no reason to be embarrassed by your body, or reason to worry for the hygiene issues of the living. Your lovers seem delighted to indulge you such salacious acts; embrace it. You will be happier for it.”

Embracing it wasn't so easy when she had a couple lifetimes of antisocial behavior to fight, and one of those lifetimes included bodily functions that would deter someone from sticking their tongue in such places! But, like Jessy said, she hadn't had a period or bowel movement in half a century, so feeling self conscious about things like that was stupid.

“I did ... did um ... really enjoy it. And then they ... lifted me up, and both had me again. But this time ... it was standing up. My toes c-couldn't reach the floor.” And by the time they were done, their cum had dripped down her legs to her knees, and her own had reached her ankles. But she couldn't say that! Too much, way too much. For now.

“Truly delicious.” Another sigh, another smile. “Enjoy it while you can, little Mekhet. Such joys make our second lives worth living.”

“ ... uh, and—”

“And do not fret. Our tales are secret between you and I.”

Mind reader.

“Thank you ... f-for being ... I d-d-don't know, more mature about this than Jessy. I love Jessy, b-but she ... I could never talk about this in so much detail! She ... can't take anything seriously.”

“I understand, Miss Vola, quite well at that.” She leaned in to match Natasha's posture, like the two should have been whispering when they weren't. “You are not Jessy Herrington. Jokes and teasing are not how one such as yourself would prefer to discuss such delicate matters.”

“E-Exactly!” Getting exposed to this new side of the Prince was doing wonders for Natasha’s comfort. Always she thought of the Prince as some sort of deity, and always it came back to Antoinette being very much a woman. A confident woman, intelligent and self aware and all the things Natasha wanted to be.

A friend, maybe? The Prince seemed to like the idea, at least.

“If I may make a suggestion, my apprentice? One for the bedroom. And please, request that I cease if this conversation proves too personal for your liking.”

“N-No! Please, go ahead.” Sex tips from a half-millennia-old Daeva were bound to be good.

“I suspect that you keep rather girlish, cute things in your possession, yes? Stuffed animals, bright clothes with butterflies, similar things, and I suspect that you spend much of your time attempting to convince yourself that these are childish things? Instead of placing your animals upon your bed, you threw them away, and the few you keep you hide in your closet. Instead of embracing colorful thigh high socks, you force yourself to wear only regular white socks, and would never be caught shopping for such juvenile clothes. At war with your intelligence, you convince yourself to pursue cold efficiency in everything, despite a secret want to play with brighter colors, to experiment with different hair styles, to ... wear pink.”

She blinked at the Prince. Blinked, and blinked a few more times. Did she know about her stuffed animals she hid in her closet? Her pink journal she kept hidden in a secret drawer?

“I—”

The Prince put up a hand, and offered Natasha a gentle smile. “You are a clever, brilliant woman, Natasha. But like Daniel, I see that you deny yourself much of what you consider juvenile, when in fact, it is these things that give you both such unique and compelling personalities.” The Prince raised a hand to her lip, eyes looking down as she vanished in thought for a moment. “ ... come with me.”

---

Deeper into the Prince’s tower the two walked. Natasha had never walked these stairs, spreading out with flourishing designs that opened into entirely new depths, with black or white marble dragons on stands, and similarly shaped etchings in the black marble that the Prince loved so much. This tower was huge. Was it twenty floors deep, or maybe even thirty?

Antoinette stepped into a hallway, and Natasha scampered after her, though her eyes continued to drink in the sights. One of the rooms had a pool! A full sized pool, with a hot tub beside it. Another room was filled with mirrors and all sorts of colored drapes. One of the rooms was filled with metal, locked crates, that Natasha could only assume was either filled with gold bars, or dangerous occult objects.

Another room’s purpose was blatant, and Natasha stared at it as Antoinette brought her into its walls. Clothes. There were clothes everywhere, hanging from hundreds, thousands of hangers. Wardrobes too, many open with all sorts of clothes inside. But they couldn’t have belonged to the Prince, they were far too small for her, and much of the clothes came in colors like aqua, pink, lime, violet, and a dozen shades and variations for each.

“ ... Ashley and Julee’s clothes?”

“Oui. They are taller than you, but the clothes will serve well enough to demonstrate.” She reached into one of the wardrobes, and plucked from it a set of socks. Pink socks that went up to the thigh, and had little white flowers on them. “These to you, are silly, cute things, non?”

“I uh ... I d-do ... yeah.” Wearing something that ridiculous would make her die of embarrassment. But the color was appealing, the design was appealing, and she knew it was scratching that guilty pleasure part of her.

“And you, once tasked with the horrible burden of being Maria Turio’s servant, along with being the sheriff’s childe, must have thought such things were not to be worn by one in your position? Believed that you needed to prove yourself, due to your small size, that you were mature and reliable?”

“ ... y ... yeah.” It was true, much as she hated to admit it.

“Then you are a fool.”

Natasha lowered her head, and sighed. Ouch.

The Prince came up to her, and poked her once in the forehead. “While you performed business for the Invictus, and while performing business for me, a certain presentation is expected. But when time is yours, when you are free to be yourself? Please, embrace your guilty pleasures, Natasha Vola. I suspect it will not only make you a happier individual, but your new lovers as well.”

“Art and Matt? Why—”

“I suspect they are attracted to the qualities in you that escape your pitiful attempts to hide them.” Ouch. Again. Her new friend was proving to be real mean. But the Prince sighed again, and pat her on the shoulder. “This is a good thing, Natasha. It means you can indulge yourself in their presence. And, I suspect, if these two massive, deadly predators ever found their little Red Riding Hood wearing naught but red thigh high socks, and silk boy shorts of the same color, they would utterly ravage you.”

Ravage her. She squirmed, but raised her head as a smile forced its way onto her lips. “R ... Ravage?”

“Oh yes. Perhaps if also wearing a petit red tank top, the two men would be slaves to their own desires. They would pin you down, force themselves upon your tiny, wriggling body, and devour you many times, until you were a mess of exhaustion, sweat, and pleasure. And only then would they both take you between them, penetrate you, fill you, and fuck your weakened body until they were satisfied.”

Good god this woman! No idea, Natasha had no idea Antoinette had this sort of side to her. Dominatrix? Sure. Queenly and confident? Obviously. Motherly and tender with her lover Jack? She could even see that. But she never, ever expected Antoinette to be a connoisseur of sexuality. And to be so eloquent and ... arousing, in how she described it.

“How ... d-d-d-d—”

“Natasha, my sweet dear, you are terribly easy to read, as you no doubt know. And for ones as old as I, we recognize behavior in others, behavior we have seen over centuries, and sometimes expressed ourselves.” She sat down beside her, and set the silly pink thigh high socks on her lap. “Learn from my mistakes, and embrace that which you hide behind closet doors.”

“You ... weren’t always s-s-so ... confident?”

“My dear! Of course not.” She got back up, leaving the socks behind, and started rooting through more of her ghouls’ clothes. “I came from a time where women were to be subservient, not dominant. I have always been taller than most men. And, from a time before I can recall, I have had white hair. Much of my life, according to the few journal entries I still retain from that time, I was quite self conscious about those aspects of myself. To be meek, small, to be cared for by a man, that was what I wanted.”

Imagining tall, curvy Antoinette being self conscious about anything was a tough thing to imagine, especially with how tonight's conversation had gone, with the Prince shamelessly describing sex and sexual acts and approaching her about them. Woman barely ever blinked, let alone stutter and fidget with embarrassment and awkwardness like Natasha did.

“It was decades,” she continued, “before I learned to embrace what I kept private. In today's age, it is preached that women should strive to be assertive; and yet, that has perhaps damaged what many enjoy in the bedroom: being submissive. Jack is submissive with me, and I expect you will enjoy being submissive with your two lovers. Submissive, and perhaps, a little ... girlish.” She returned from the wardrobe with some colorful tops, some various colors in underwear — bubblegum colors everywhere — and some more types of socks, different colors, different patterns, different heights.

“Your ghouls m-must have a lot of fun.”

“Oui. If only we Kindred could enjoy life as they do. But, we may try. Jack has awoken in me many pleasures I let lie dormant. Corsets, I must admit, are a guilty pleasure of mine. To create such unrealistic portrayals of a woman's waist? I should feel more guilty for the act, and yet I cannot help but indulge my vanity.”

Natasha giggled, and looked the Prince up and down a few times. Yeah, she definitely seemed like a corset woman. And, as Natasha looked at all the colorful, fun clothes the Prince was showing her, the little Mekhet couldn't help but picture herself in them. Cause they were fun, and silly, and all the things she never considered herself to be. That Jessy kept saying she could be. That Art and Matt seemed to think she was.

She scooped up the clothes. Not that they'd fit her, but it gave her some idea as to the brands she should buy. If a Daeva knew anything, they knew fashion.

“Feel like ... I'm b-betraying my bookworm self.”

“Nonsense. Embrace that as well.” Antoinette dismissed her puerile concerns with a small hand wave, and stood up again to go digging through more clothes. “And I do suggest some nighties to compliment your clothing rotation. Colorful ones. Unless I am mistaken — and that is rare — those two wolves would lose themselves in total, animal lust, if they caught you wearing a babydoll nightie, see-through, and nothing else.”

“Nothing else? N-No bottoms?”

“Non. It spoils the collective illusion of innocence such attire can bring. But of course, that is a small distinction, and if you would prefer to wear them, wear something that matches. In either case, the results will be explosive.”

And again, Natasha giggled at Antoinette’s perfect word choice: explosive. She felt like she should be at a salon, getting her nails done, her hair done, and gossiping about boys with the hair stylist. Course, Antoinette approached sexual details with a little more openness than a hair stylist might. But, at the same time, with total sincerity and maturity. It was refreshing, a total one-eighty from Jessy’s approach.

“Thank you.”

“For what, dear?”

“For ... I d-don’t know, talking about this sorta stuff with me, even though I’m ... p-pretty shy about this kind of stuff.”

“Ah, my dear, it is I that must thank you. Your sire does not share my passion for sexuality, and not since ... Tony’s youth, when he went by a different name, have I engaged in such delightful conversation. To gossip, and talk of men and sex? A guilty pleasure if there ever as one.” She removed another piece of clothing from the wardrobe, a nightie, a tiny thing that was very see-through, and very lime. And now that Natasha was staring at it and Antoinette in this whole new, mind-shattering light, she realized the Prince was handling the clothes of not just her ghouls, but two women she'd spent many years having sex with on a regular basis.

Little bit of bias then, maybe, from Antoinette about the clothes Natasha should wear. Well, maybe bias, but still true. Maybe not so true that she'd start wearing pink all the time, or sundresses, but maybe, on occasion, for fun? It could be fun. It would be fun!

---

---

~~Beatrice~~

She shuddered, and rubbed her arms. Not like she felt terribly cold, being Kindred and all, but it seemed like the thing to do while in a tank top, in the Three Kings Cemetery.

The Dolareido Cathedral, Lucas's masterpiece, wasn't too far away. Beatrice wouldn't be surprised if Maria was in there right now, playing some music like she knew the old Nosferatu could. Maybe Damien was in there too? Maybe. But, not why she was here.

Jacob was wearing his robes, long black things that reached down to his ankles, and worn with what must have been decades of use. Maybe even centuries, if it was treated to last. Whatever it was made of, it wasn't the sort of thing you'd wear in public, cause it screamed witchcraft and occult and other crazy shit; not good for blending into a crowd. The elder kept them both hidden in his cloak of night discipline, and considering his power, his age, it was more than strong enough for them to basically disappear from existence.

“We gonna dig up a corpse?” she said.

“Did you want to?”

“What? No. The fuck? I was joking.”

“Just as well, there’s no one in this cemetery worth digging up.” The old man shrugged and wandered through and between the tombstones, occasionally chuckling when his gaze landed on a tombstone he recognized. “The three kings were greatly overrated.”

Three Kings Cemetery, named as such for being the burial site of three kings. Not real kings, but three people who’d been quite famous early on in Dolareido’s life. Mob bosses maybe? Nah, earlier than that. Three criminals from when the city was damn young, and who’d managed to make themselves some tiny empires. But all things come to an end and their corpses were found here, in what had become the biggest and creepiest cemetery in Dolareido.

Withered trees. Dozens of mausoleums of varying sizes. Tombstones with statues on them, people on horses, of women in robes holding someone’s body, or baby angel things—cherubs. Bits of leaves blew by, along with some twigs that fell from the trees. The moonlight was casting powerful shadows, as the cemetery was far enough from brighter sections of the city to allow some of the sky to be visible. And without the tall buildings around it, the wind picked up enough speed to get the trees moving, their branches dancing, and the shadows coming to life.

Rows upon rows upon rows of graves. Sometimes it was easy to forget Dolareido was a pretty damn old city, even for Beatrice, who hung out in a fucking catacomb. And with so much age and history to the city, elders with some seriously old tastes got to indulge in their macabre delights. Which was cool and all, Beatrice did love that shit.

“I have to wonder,” she said as they walked past some of the larger tombstones, “what sort of shit you elders did when this city was growing up.”

“Oh, such a tale! That boy Tony — Jacques at the time — was always stirring up trouble in the quaint little village, while we created our thralls, dug our tunnels, took over the whole town. They had a city council of nothing but our thralls. Such glorious days, when we only had to herd a few thousand, instead of millions. When there were no cameras or internet, and we were free to turn the town into our playground come nightfall.” He chuckled a few times, and came to a stop in front of one of the smaller tombstones. A carving of a cross was on it, and a stone rose. “I had three Kindred at the time in my circle, and we loved to catch bandits and sacrifice them; Antoinette preferred we spared those who deserved life even then. The blood poured, and we howled at the moon as we danced naked and summoned spirits you would not believe exist.”

“Jesus. What happened to them? Your circle.”

“Dead.” Jacob paused by another grave, this one with a tombstone that carried no statue, but held some words: Death Comes For Us All. Fucking delightful. “Hunters.”

“I’ve heard that word a few times now, but no one ever goes into detail. Hunters? We’ve had no hunters in Dolareido since I’ve been Kindred, far as I know.”

“And you are likely correct.”

“What happened to them?”

“Oh, they’re still out there.” He shrugged as he came to another tombstone, where another quote was found: Fuck You Carl. He laughed and continued on, glancing around at everything they passed like someone revisiting their old high school. “But like the Kindred, they had to adapt. Instead of marching into town wearing necklaces of silver, bones, charms, with pistols and swords and torches, now they hide in back alleys and with walls of meat and technology between us and them. Gangs, or organizations that seem innocent, but are very much not.”

“You mean ... in Dolareido?”

“Perhaps. I know much, as does Antoinette, and even the worthless triumvirate of the Invictus know plenty about the ongoings in the city. It would seem the city is free of that pest. But we cannot safely say that hunters do not hide in our midst.”

She shivered and looked around. “They uh ... must be doing a good job of hiding, if we haven’t heard of them in decades.”

“Far more likely they aren’t hunting in Dolareido. There are a lot of other cities with a Kindred presence who aren’t nearly as kind as we are. Lucas and Viktor and their cruelty are the norm for the elders, after all. Antoinette and I and our compassion are the exception.” He laughed again, knowing full well Beatrice didn’t think of either of them as compassionate. Maybe not insane with bloodlust and violent tendencies, but certainly not compassionate.

She shivered a few more times, and stopped to stare at a tall statue. An angel, with robes hanging over her whole body so the face was hidden in shadow. She was pouring a jar of water, the fluid carved of stone, onto the tombstone beneath her. Beautiful. And totally at odds with the overall creepy vibe the cemetery gave off.

“So, why are we here?”

“You wanted to explore crúac rituals, didn’t you?”

“Yeah but, I figured we’d want to do that somewhere private? This is a cemetery, a public one at that, and Maria’s not even a mile away.” Assuming she was in her Cathedral. Hers, since Lucas was gone.

The man chuckled, and motioned with his head for her to follow. He stepped into one of the mausoleums, and she stopped outside it to look up at the arch of the small, stone building. Pillars lined the sides of the entrance, and a cross decorated the arch’s face. Old, worn stone, and a gate made of two wooden doors, lined with metal. A single step lead up to the small gate, and beside it, statues of the virgin Mary stood with arms outstretched. They too were worn with time, features washed away, and the stained stone looked almost like it was bleeding discoloration.

She stepped into the mausoleum, and shuddered. Mountains of nameless bones she could handle, but a mausoleum like this gave everything a name. It was just a big room, really, with most of the space taken up by shelves of marble, dark and dead. Coffins, each with a name, and each beside a drawer of some sort. Personal belongings probably. And some of the drawers were cracked, with bits of the rock on the floor so the cracks exposed the contents. One of them held what looked like a shaving kit from two hundred years ago. Another held a very creepy doll.

At this point Jacob withdrew an LED lantern. Not a real lantern, cause no Kindred liked using fire if they could avoid it, and not a typical flashlight, because that wouldn't appeal to an elder's nostalgia. No, the man had a lantern with an LED source of light, but also fashioned to look oldschool. She smirked at him, and he returned it with his own, before he pressed on a very specific part of a specific crack of one of the shelves.

The floor slid aside. Beatrice squeaked and jumped back as the sound of sliding stone filled the mausoleum. Straight out of a fucking eighties action flick, the stone moved aside to reveal a stairway, the only source of light being a glimmer of moonlight through the cracks in the roof, and Jacob's lantern as he approached the descending tunnel.

“Come on. Pussy.” He smirked at her again, even chuckled a little, and disappeared into the blackness.

Gonna kill him, gonna fucking kill him. She hopped over to the opening side of the stairway, and descended after him. A very tiny tunnel, so tiny she had to crouch to keep moving with the stairs; nothing she wasn't used to dealing with, considering the entrance to their usual home. And once she had her head under the stones, Jacob pulled down on some sort of metal crank handle on the wall. The floor above her shifted, and slid back into place, giving her a little more headroom. Standing up, she glanced around at the darkness, at the long shadows cast by the one source of light, and how the stone under the earth was so very worn, and wet.

She could smell the dead. And more than just the very old dead, but also the recently dead. The fuck was Jacob up to?

“Guess this is one of your secret places then?”

“Yeap. Only Daniel and Antoinette know about this, and they respect my privacy.”

What a weird relationship between them, that Jacob could be building secret rooms, and they’d just let him.

“They don’t spy on you?”

“Sometimes they try, but it’s rare. Daniel has to go through quite the song and dance to try and spy on me, and what little he learns, most often, I let him learn it.” He raised the lantern up the spreading walls, and showed where strange symbols or runes were drawn in what must have been blood. Not like blood lasted forever, so, he must have been renewing them. “And with a few specific rituals, I can defend my ritual areas from his prying auspex.”

“Really? Damn.” Cause she knew how deadly that shit was in the hands of a master. Might as well have been trying to stop a ghost from spying on you. “And what sort of nasty shit do you practice down here?” That apparently he trusted her with knowing. Made her kind of proud and happy, but she wasn’t about to let him know that.

The tunnel was very oldschool, and she half expected it to collapse on her at any moment. But there were wooden beams within, holding up the thousands of pounds of dirt and rock, and they themselves seemed pretty sturdy. Still, hard to ignore the fact she was underground, something that she was normally used to dealing with, but these wet, dripping rocks, and the complete and total lack of stonework or architecture, made it seem like she was walking through an abandoned mining tunnel.

At least until she came upon one of the support beams along the ceiling with an old wooden plank hanging from it. Something was burned into the wood: Continue Forth, and Death Awaits Thee. And hanging from the sign were several skulls dangling from chains, with hooks driven through their temples.

“Your doing I assume?”

“Actually that was Jean’s doing.”

“Jean?”

“One of my circle, when the city was still young. Three Kings Cemetery has existed for quite some time — for an American city anyway — and this tunnel was one of the first places I taught my pupils the dark rituals.” He brushed the skulls aside and continued on. Beatrice ducked.

“What happened to him?”

“Hunter killed him. Got him with a stake in the heart, then cut off his head when he was paralyzed.”

“Fuck, man. When was this?”

“The 1820s, I believe. Hard to remember the details. Except for, you know, the head removal part.”

Right, right, that memory. God she was following someone with a volatile memory, and that added a whole new level of fear to her adventures. For all she knew, he was going to forget something important and get them both killed. It was like trusting herself to someone who was randomly senile.

Eventually the tiny tunnel opened into a large cavern, a very familiar one at that. She'd never seen it before, but the bone decorations were similar to the ones in their home cave, hundreds of them from every part of the human body arranged to create a tapestry of patterns and designs. In this cave, the pattern looked almost like the waves of an ocean, the sort of ocean where you could hear the howling of wind.

And she could hear howling. Quiet, distant, but there was some sort of howling sound in the darkness of the cave. No candles lit, so the only light source was Jacob's one lantern, and despite how it was a solid light unlike a candle flame, the shadows she found around her flickered.

In the center of the obsidian that surrounded them, sat a bowl. Unlike the blood bowl in their usual cave, this one sat closer to the ground, and was held above the ground by skeletons. Someone managed to get skeletons lying on their stomachs, some on their back, with arms up to press against the massive bowl's undersides. The bowl itself looked like it was carved of stone, and someone had chiseled some intricate lines along its edges, lines that looked like dripping liquid.

Above the enormous bowl, was a corpse. Some woman was hanging, naked, with arms up high and a chain around her wrists. In her stomach were several knives, still in there in places where it'd take a long time to die. The woman's face was aimed down, her jaw open, eyes wide; the pain and fear were still visible in her expression.

"I thought ... you used vitae to perform these rituals, vampire blood," she said.

Jacob set the lantern aside, and stood by the edge of the bowl on the other side. “Yes, but if you’re going to be bleeding yourself to fuel your rituals, it’s nice to have a snack.”

“That’s not a snack!” She pointed up at the naked corpse. Woman looked to be in her twenties, but her skin was sunken into her body with how drained she was. “That’s—”

“Please, your misplaced ethical dilemmas are unneeded. She came from another city and started peddling heroine to some youngsters. Dolareido embraces drug use, but not like that.” He chuckled a few more times, each chuckle a little louder than the last, before he reached out to push the feet of the hanging body. “This is a nice neighborhood, after all.” The corpse eased back and forth, just hard enough for Beatrice to hear the creak of the chain around her wrists against the wooden beam from above. The quiet howling was still there, but Beatrice couldn’t place its origin, as if the stone walls were echoing the dead woman’s cries.

The shadow of her swinging feet flickered on the walls.

“So you tortured her to death?”

“A few knives to the gut hardly counts as torture.”

“Most people would disagree.”

“We aren’t most people.” The man stepped around the bowl again to come beside her, and he leaned in closer until his bandage-covered eyes were only inches from her. So close, even in this darkness, the lantern provided enough light she could see the gray lines in his hair. “You want to explore the power to be found in witchcraft, in blood rituals, then grow up. There are witches out there who will bleed another Kindred dry, to fuel rituals so insane you could not fathom.” He came a step closer, and she had to take a step back from him to make room. “There are Kindred out there who have drunk other Kindred down to the fucking soul, absorbed their entire essence, absorbed what made them who they are, just so their own blood would have the power to perform the most heinous of rituals.”

Diablerie. He was fucking talking about diablerie.

“ ... we wouldn't do that.”

“Oh yes we would. Perhaps not you, and, perhaps, not I, but diablerie exists, and it is a tempting proposition. The sweet taste of a soul.” He touched his lips, licked them, before he smirked and shrugged. “Not that I would know.”

Fuck. Now she had a new thing to suspect her boss of. Elders often did some pretty nasty shit over the course of their long lives, but diablerie was a whole different level of asshole, and she had a hard time imagining even Jacob doing that. But him just saying he'd never done it was no way a guarantee he hadn't. Fucker loved to lie, to see if she could figure him out. And right now she could not.

“So what now?” she said, stepping back and moving around the bowl to stand opposite of him again. The bowl was easier to look at than the hanging body.

Jacob frowned at her, and motioned for her to return. Sighing, she walked back over to stand beside him, until he sat down by the huge bowl, and she did as well. She did not like where this was going.

“You need to understand something, Beatrice Damor. If you want to learn crúac rituals, if you want a peek at what it's like to call upon things beyond your understanding, you're going to have to suffer.”

“Suffer?”

He gestured to the empty bowl. In the dark and hard to see, there were some objects lying in its base, and now that she was sitting by the bowl, she took a moment to squint and peer at them. More knives.

“Why do you think I brought you here, to this underground cavern in an old cemetery? Here, we may pursue these dark arts, and the screams will remain within these walls.”

“ ... screams?”

The robed man leaned into the bowl, and withdrew one of the blades. Blade was a strong word for it, more like rock that'd been chipped into something sharp, and then tied to a wooden grip of sorts with string.

“The Circle of the Crone is many things. Some of us worship the gods of the earth. Some of us chant and dance naked in the moonlight to celebrate the blood of the cosmos. Some of us speak to spirits, or the dead, and offer our blood in communication or worship. But there's one thing you need to know, one similarity between all witches: the beast in your guts is going to come out.”

“I don't—”

“You may not know why you're interested in this stuff, but I do. It's because the beast inside you is a little closer to the surface than most Kindred. In this pussy town, everyone here is whipped. Fucking. Whipped. By that Prince, and the Invictus council, and even Garry.”

“ ... you mean we're all pussy whipped because we like peace? Christ Jacob, I'm not the violence lover you think I am.”

“Didn't say violence. That night I showed up in your precious catacombs to talk, you didn't shy away or anything. Like a fucking badger, you snarled and barked.” He put an arm around her shoulder, and gave her one of those buddy hugs humans give when they're drunk. "If I asked you to rip someone in half with your bare hands, an enemy, you wouldn't have an issue."

She flinched, and looked down. Rebecca. Beatrice never thought back to the woman's death, not really, not for anything more than to smile at how satisfying it'd been.

"So I'm a little more in touch with my beast than the pussy-whipped Kindred of Dolareido. So what?" she said.

"So, that makes you a prime candidate for deeper levels of the Circle. It's why I invited you. It's why I knew you'd eventually wonder about these blood rituals. You remember the thrill of the night I put my blood on you, and bestowed upon you my power."

"You think I'm interested in dancing naked in moonlight?"

More laughter, and he reached out to grab a second blade from the bowl. Holding it between fingers along with the first in the same hand, he kept his other hand around her far shoulder. She felt trapped.

"I'm sure Jennifer and Othello would love that, and there are rituals often done in such a manner." Still with the two knives between his fingers, their blades pointed backward and toward his wrist, he pressed their handles together like cigars turning between his knuckles. "There's a bit of animal in you, Beatrice, that I like, that you like. Hell, that even Julias likes. That spice to you that makes you dangerous and interesting."

"You sound like you're trying to convince me to join a cult."

"That's exactly what I'm doing." He put the daggers in her hands, and smirked. "See a lot of myself in you."

Fucking god. "This some Nosferatu bonding shit?"

“Nope. Not at all. I could describe the things you’ve done, the things that make you who you are, and make the comparisons. But I think we’ve chatted enough. Spill my blood into the bowl, and I’ll show you.”

Hard to read. Why was he so god damn hard to read? A bandage instead of eyes was definitely part of it, but the man’s voice, his tone, he kept flirting with playful, and then serious, and then psychotic, and then compassionate. Couldn’t place him, couldn’t figure out his motives, couldn’t ever get a handle on it. But he wanted to show her, and that was a far cry from his typical manipulative ways. The dark secrets of the Circle of the Crone, blood magic, the thing Kindred whispered about in shadowy alleys, the thing that made witches so damn fucking scary. He was going to show her a crúac ritual.

With a gulp, she dragged one of the knives across his wrist. Jacob smiled at her the whole time, no flinch or anything, and reached out a bit further to make sure the large droplet of thick Kindred blood fell closer the center of the empty bowl, near the corpse’s feet. It landed with a quiet splash, but the echo of its impact resonated in Beatrice’s ears.

The howling in the walls grew louder.

“W ... What is that sound?”

“Not afraid of ghosts, are you?”

“ ... after the shit I’ve seen? Yeah, I’m afraid of ghosts.”

“Good.” He held out his other hand. And again, wincing the whole time, she cut his other wrist. The tiny splash of his heavy blood pulled her guts to her feet, laden with stone. The room grew darker, the lantern now fighting to pierce some invisible black that fought against the light.

And the howling in the walls grew louder still.

Whatever light the lantern was giving, she couldn't see it anymore. The floor, the bowl, the walls and bones, it was all solid black. She could see Jacob, and she could see the corpse hanging before her, but all else faded away in a black cloud she could neither feel nor smell. Not like there'd be a breeze in a cave underground, but she expected to be able to feel something on her skin; not anymore. Whatever texture the air once held was gone, until the feel of Jacob beside her was almost jarring against the backdrop of numbness.

“What’s going on?”

“Shhh.” Chuckling in his quiet, sinister little way, Jacob motioned with his head toward the bowl.

The blood was moving. It trickled down the shallow edge, and pulled its own mass behind it so no trail was left. More like watching a slug of liquid move. It dragged itself down to the center of the bowl, and once beneath the corpse with maybe four feet vertical distance between them, it began to spread. The pool of blood clawed outward, gripped at the bowl and crept up its sides in all directions, until it became veins for the bowl, black veins.

The black veins didn't stay in the bowl. Beatrice looked around into the oblivion swallowing her, and shrank into Jacob's side as her eyes opened wide. It may have been pure black around them, but something was moving. Tendrils, blacker than black in the endless shadow, crept along the walls, along the ceiling, over and around the lantern, until they reached up and touched Beatrice.

She felt these. Cold. So cold. Like ice but without the sting, only the weight and lifelessness of cold death pulling at her and her skin. The fuck did an undead creature like her have to fear from death? A lot apparently, as the shadows around her clawed at her skin, sank their fingers into her, through the skin without damaging it, but filling her legs with more of the same cold weight. She looked to Jacob's legs, and found the veiny tendrils doing the same thing. Didn't bother her boss.

The bowl began to fill. Blood, black and thick, began to pour up from the bowl, managed to spout a few inches into the air before spreading out over the insides of the bowl. More, and more, until the large bowl was filled, and droplets of the heavy liquid fell over the sides onto the stone and dirt beneath it, until the black liquid dripped down the skulls of the skeletons holding up the bowl, and down their jaws like tears. She started to back up, but Jacob stopped her, hand to her leg to keep her from getting up until she calmed down.

Calming down wasn't happening. She looked around again, at the drops of black that started to drip out of the bones on the walls, and from the cracks in the stone. There were screams, still distant and hidden from her, but with the total silence falling on them with every moment, the quiet noise was free to grow louder, and louder, until her skull shook with the sounds of death wails. She looked around again, past the blood bowl and to the other side of the room, where a wave of the blackness that shouldn't be there came forward. Onyx mist, that crept along anything and everything until Beatrice, Jacob, and the corpse disappeared into black.

She could still see him though, could still the corpse, hell she could see the lantern now, when she couldn't before. But nothing seemed to be visible with light anymore. She could see it, but not because it was lit. As if someone had removed the need for eyes, she could see everything around her in the black, despite the total lack of light. Despite that it felt like she was drowning, when Kindred no longer needed to breathe. Despite how it felt like something was pinning her to the ground, something that wasn't Jacob, something cold and dense and smothering.

Something that grabbed the corpse, and yanked it off the chain.

Beatrice gasped hard and fell back, but Jacob's arm kept her from falling onto her ass. And, he kept her from not seeing what just happened in front of her, the black hand that gripped the body, big enough to cover the whole corpse in six fingers, before ripping the dead woman free of the chain. The corpse's wrists tore, and the sound of wrenching flesh forced Beatrice to look up, to see how the dead body's hands fell away from the chains to splash against the black blood in the bowl, while the body disappeared into the curtain beyond.

The howling in the walls settled, and instead, a deep rumbling came from the black before them. It shook the walls, shook them both, shook her teeth until she felt them rattling in her head. It couldn't have been real, couldn't have actually been doing that, more of the fake stimulus like that weird voodoo bag Jacob had back in his room. But the corpse, the dead woman, all that remained of her was her ruined hands floating in the thick Kindred blood.

"Malachi," the darkness said.

"Hello old friend," Jacob said back. "This is Beatrice."

"... Beatrice." The darkness moved. Something large, invisible but silhouetted against the obsidian that buried them. Its voice was a rumble, bass overpowering the room and the two Kindred in it, while harsh rasps scratched to the surface of its voice. "Hello."

She blinked a few dozen times, and looked into the shifting back. "Um ... hello?"

"Beatrice, this is The Black Blood of Dolareido." Jacob nodded a few times, but remained seated. Just a few friends sitting around the dinner table chatting. "Will the body do, old friend?"

"It will."

From the blackness, some scraping sounds ripped through Beatrice's head until she closed her eyes. It passed, only for another to happen, and then another. And then movement to go with it, familiar movement, the movement of a humanoid walking.

The corpse came forward. Each step she took, her feet scraped against the stones beneath them, ripped up the dirt as if weighed down by several tons of rock. But the corpse stood there, favoring one side, with one shoulder drooping too low, and her eyes wide to stare at the two Kindred. Her eyes were black, solid black, and more of the black liquid dripped down her cheeks, like she was crying black tears. The liquid dripped down her naked body, down to her gut where the knives remained and wounds leaked more of the same liquid, down to her wrists where the black blood continued to drip. The corpse had no hands, and the shredded, ruined wrists, with bones jutting from them, were dripping with the same liquid.

She—it sat down with them, legs apart and folding at the knee. The weird liquid dripped from its nostrils and mouth, and down between its legs as it leaned forward.

“Why have you summoned me, Malachi?”

Malachi. Another name Jacob had? Elders occasionally changed names as the centuries went by, but Jacob was an old name as is, no need to change it.

“Two reasons. First, to tell you that one of the Uratha died in their confrontation with the Azlu.”

The corpse laughed, and a splatter of the black liquid fell from its lips onto the bowl before it. “Delightful. My fellow spirits noticed the death. Still, we are unhappy about the presence of the Uratha.”

“No one is happy with their presence,” Jacob said.

Beatrice frowned. She didn't mind their presence, now that they weren't trying to kill Fiona.

“And?” the incarnation of everything Beatrice feared as a little girl said.

“And, I'm going to teach Beatrice here some of the basics in crúac rituals. Thought you'd like to help.”

Oh fuck.

Interlude 2

~~The Year: 1986~~

~~Mason Harding~~

Being alone is horrible.

Lot of the people he knew — knew being a strong word — thought being alone was bad, and rough. But to them it was just a word. Being alone, well and truly alone, alone to the point you feel it in your bones, that it's a part of you, that's hell.

Something about sitting on a city bus really lets the mind wander, and Mason used it to write in his journal. Back angled to the window a bit so he could write without people looking over his shoulder, he jotted down notes about loneliness, about his past, in an effort to contextualize, conceptualize, and understand why his past affected him so. Over-analyzing? That was him, thinking was his favorite hobby. Thinking himself right into the grave.

Mother, dead. Father, in a ward. Siblings, one sister in prison for trafficking, and one brother dead. Friends? All the ones he'd made in high school had moved, and the ones that stuck around were in prison. Some for trafficking, some for fighting, breaking and entering. One for murder. All because they were stupid. They weren't good friends.

Did he try and make new friends? Sort of. There weren't many friends to make, working nights at a convenience store. Just him, alone, and the crazy sort of fucks you found drifting city streets at three in the morning. Not the drunk people getting taxi rides home; they were nice enough. It was the people dropping by the corner store, perfectly sober usually, with a dead look in their eyes that Mason knew were dead inside. Drugs and/or a shitty life had a habit of doing that to people.

Didn't matter to him. Just a twenty-year-old dude trying to survive, making minimum wage and living in a shitty bachelor apartment that could fit into a closet. People showed up, went to the back corner, exchanged things in small bags, with chains dangling from their pants and wallets, and many with tattoos that read 'bitch' or 'nigga' and such. Posturing. Made him roll his eyes, but he kept his mouth shut. Stupid as it was, he didn't need a knife in the gut or bullet in the chest to prove it.

He sighed at the memory, and looked out the window until the bus pulled up to his apartment building. A shit shit, shit shit shit end of town. No cops, no cameras, nothing but bars on the windows and leaking roofs. No friends here, no family, no one to turn to, nothing.

He kind of liked it, but mostly hated it.

The front door of his apartment creaked like a dying siren. He put his journal down, walked past his busted couch, and stood in front of his dirty mirror. He was an attractive man, he knew that, with blond hair buzzed short, blue eyes, and a tight jaw. Average height, but he took care of himself; nothing else to do with his free time. So he spent his days exercising using a metal bar hanging from his ceiling that probably wasn't code, and anything he could do with his bodyweight. No money for equipment. But even if he did have money, he doubted he'd go to a gym.

All alone. Didn't know any other way. Wouldn't know where to begin to not be alone.

He sat down and grabbed a book. Long walk to the library, but at least the library was free. And he was enjoying this book. Journey Through the Rain. The passages about the man's hatred for his family alone made the book worth reading.

He tried to focus on the book, he really did, but memories kept moving through his mind. They were recent memories, new memories, or at least, memories being filed away in a different light compared to usual.

Prey.

He shook his head out and ran his fingers over the buzzed texture of his hair. Everything smelled different these days, everything tasted different, everything felt different. He couldn't look at someone anymore without wondering how fast they could run, if they could hit as hard as he could, if they could stop him if he wanted to rip their throat out.

As the people had come and gone from his store, each had warranted a far longer glance than was normal. Each had pulsed on a radar in his mind, until he managed to assess how much of a threat they were, and how easily he could kill them.

Was this what got all his friends and family into such trouble? Didn't sound like them, and they told him nothing of any feelings like this. But considering the sorry state his parents were in, dead and psychotic, it wouldn't surprise him if there was something wrong with him, genetically. Christ he hated them; fittingly, like the man in the book.

It didn't really matter. He had bills to pay.

---

The next night at the convenience store wasn't any better.

A man came in, covered in tattoos, shaved head, a white dude that screamed biker gang. Mason watched him come in, watched him get some cigarettes, watched him get some milk, watched him help an old lady reach some crackers on a high shelf, and watched him buy his stuff. Nice man. Dangerous man. Same could be said for three black men and one black woman, wearing hoodies with low, torn jeans, and each laughing and joking. He put each as large blips on his radar, but they were polite and patient.

Then several new people came in, college students by the looks of it. A delightful mix of ethnicities and arrogance, wearing fraternity shirts and varsity jackets, or whatever. And these fuckers sent his heart racing. These idiots, his age, were dangerous like a kid with explosives was dangerous.

“Hey man,” the woman said. She walked into the candy aisle, grabbed a couple packs of candy, and slipped them into the jacket. While she made a small attempt to avoid the camera filming the store’s interior, it didn’t take much to avoid the one camera. And she didn’t give a shit that he could see her.

There were a few customers around, some older people easing their way through the aisles to find bread and such. The college brats pushed past them, and not gently either. Mason grit his teeth, but said nothing. If someone wanted help, all they needed to do was ask, and no one asked. Not his place to impose.

Cowardly? Maybe. Not really. People needed to be able to look after themselves, or at least have the stomach to ask for help if they needed it.

Mason sighed and waited. Some of the jocks came up to the counter and paid for what they were getting, mostly cigarettes. But the beer was a problem, and Mason shook his head.

“Need some ID.” He could tell they were going to argue, and his could feel his muscles tense, the balls of his feet press down against the hard floor, and his heart rate increase again.

“What, we don’t look nineteen?” the woman said, standing in front of him, pockets filled with stolen goods. Whatever.

“Legal age to buy alcohol is twenty-one now.” He shrugged, and motioned to the small sign by the cash. The age to get alcohol was increasing across a lot of the US; it’d finally caught up on beer.

“Yeah, fuck that. That was what, last year? Come on,” one of the men said, complete with a little posturing of his chest. Might as well have been puffing up like a blowfish to Mason.

“Sorry. Need some ID.”

The stupid college brats glanced at each other. No doubt they were trying to figure out if it was worth it, to push him on this, which meant they weren’t twenty-one. Shoplifting some candy or other silly crap wasn’t a big deal, but taking alcohol while being underage was a bigger problem.

They glanced between each other a few times more. They weren’t sober. Three of them had been drinking, he could smell it on them, their breath. At least two of them were on some sort of drug, and it certainly wasn’t green. If it was weed, the worst Mason would have to be afraid of would be their extreme munchies. No, this was different, and he raised his lips in a small sneer as one of them, eyes twitching and blinking in quick succession, stared at him.

“Just let us buy the beer, man.”

He really should have just let them buy the beer. This part of town, it wasn’t exactly uncommon to let nineteen-year-olds buy beer. Hell, it was almost expected. But, these kids were his age, a year younger actually, young adults, and today, he just wasn’t feeling like being charitable to fucking kids.

He felt like sinking his teeth into something.

“No. ID.”

“Look man, you know who I am, you know who my dad is?”

Dad. Kid might have sounded slightly more intimidating if he'd said father. Slightly.

“That’s right!” The woman got in closer, and slammed her palms on the table. “Matt Turner is his dad! You know who that fuck is? Man owns half this city.”

Oh god, this was turning into a college drama. Who wrote this script?

They didn’t like his silence.

“Fuck you. We’re outta here.” College brat with the drinks in hand tried to walk away, but Mason moved his hand to rest it on the beer, and pinned it down to the counter.

“I’m afraid you’ll have to leave the beer. Want a drink? Go cry to your daddy.”

He really, really wanted to sink his teeth into something. Or at least, piss off some twerps who deserved to be reminded they really were twerps. Fuckwads.

The bunch of them looked at him like he’d grown an extra head. They glanced at each other, at the woman, who glanced at them, and around at the others, and it went around like that for twenty seconds as, slowly but surely, their shock washed away. The girl gave the biggest guy a nod, and the guy came in closer to the counter.

A college brat may have been a fucking moron, incapable of using the mystical power of thinking past five minutes into the future, but a college brat could still throw a punch. Much as Mason liked to think he was strong and fast — and he was — he wasn’t in a position to dodge that punch as he was trying to hold onto the beer. Plus he really hadn’t expected it, despite the situation. Now he was the dumbass.

Dumbass with a split lip and the world spinning around him as he spun around and collided with the floor.

“Yeah Joe, get him! A few more!” The woman, evidently, did not think a single punch was enough punishment.

A man jumped over the counter, and Mason managed to get his bearings long enough to see the sneaker coming his way. He tried to turn around to block it, but the man was already on him, and it crashed halfway across his forearm and his chest. And then again, into his shoulder, and then again, into his chest. And then, into the stomach.

All concept of breathing left his body, as if the dick’s shoe was possessed by a spirit of asphyxiation. Diaphragm ceased functioning as a shoe toe replaced it, forced the air out of him, and left him choking on his lungs. Pain put everything in his body on pause, and forced his eyes to stare along the floor as the man kicked his arm and chest another time, and another, and another.

A minute went by. An eternity. Someone else jumped behind the counter to kick him a couple times more in the back, adding to what was turning into an array of bruises and dents in his body, each a bomb of agony that forced his muscles to convulse. If they’d been wearing proper shoes instead of sneakers, they’d have broken his bones.

“Come on, let’s go!” the woman said. “Mr. Turner got us covered, right?”

“Oh yeah, definitely. I’ll make up some bullshit and this all disappears. Dad’s got the cops under his thumb. They won’t piss him off for a fucking clerk.”

They laughed, chuckled, laughed some more, and left.

It'd been a long time since he was beaten like this. Pain like this didn't go away quickly, kept the muscles from moving, kept the mind in shock until at least it stopped flooding the brain with panic signals. Having been beaten like this before didn't help him get over it any faster, but at least he didn't piss himself this time.

Other people had been in the store. They were gone now. The camera filming the floor didn't get audio, and it was blurry at best. And Matt Turner was a name he knew, typical corrupt politician and business man.

Really, who wrote this fucking script?

He forced himself onto his hands and knees, and then onto his feet, with hands braced against the counter and the coffee machine behind him. Last time this happened, it took a month for the bruises to heal, and a few months after that for the bones to stop aching. His cheek was damaged and split as well, so there was no hiding all the bruises.

He leaned his weight against the counter, and looked out across the isles. Empty. He looked outside through the glass doors, and winced as he saw some pedestrians, people passing by. Some of them must have seen what just happened. They winced, like he did, and walked on. Of course they did.

He looked down at the counter, and wiped his hand across his face. Blood from the cheek bone, blood from his lip, now all over his wrist and palm, now all over his shirt. Blood inside his pants, and trickling down his ankles, getting into his shoes. Blood in his mouth, coating his teeth and tongue, the taste of life.

Funny how much life tasted like metal.

He looked down at his hands. They were shaking. He looked across the counter where it now showed a couple bloody hand prints. Blood hand prints, what a poetic way of showing the futility and fruitlessness of his job, his life, his predicament.

A really shit script.

His whole life was a really, really shit script. And every single god damn mother fucking cell in his body was screaming at him to go do something about those people, those punks, those pieces of trash. Those threats.

He walked out the door. The smell. He knew their smell.

---

The brats were driving out to Makeout Hill, far outside the city. Mason had never been there, but he knew of it, a place where teenagers and young adults went to make out, kiss, maybe secretly fuck under the light of the moon.

It never occurred to Mason to stop himself, never crossed his mind to put an end to this insanity, and just go back to the store he was supposed to be watching. He hadn't called in the theft, or his assault. He locked up the store but hadn't closed it down. Cash still in the cash register. Just didn't fucking care anymore. He was on the hunt.

Running a few miles was hard, or it should have been. Felt good tonight. Felt right. He put a few miles under his feet in record time, and by the end of it, didn't have his usual exhaustion. Breathing deep, but fine. Felt good to be outside and putting asphalt behind him, until eventually he was outside the city and out into the woods.

The cliff overlooked a lake, and at the top of the cliff where it crested outward over the lake, there was grass, soft, and inviting. A few of the punk idiots were lying on the grass on blankets, kissing, fondling, and a few more were in parked cars, living out their greatest cliché fantasies. These idiots had seen Grease too many times.

Idiots. Prey. The words started to blend in his mind, or at least, the word prey was slowly replacing it for the tag he used to describe these people in front of him. He watched on from the shadows where the hill and the forest met, and licked his bloody lips and teeth. Someone was going to die tonight.

He squeezed the bark next to him, until his fingernails tore bits of it away from the trunk. Get a hold of yourself, calm down, breathe, let it go; none of those words of wisdom came to him, even though he knew they should, that normally they would. Not tonight. As he watched the idiot sacks of meat, he sank low to the bushes and let the adrenaline fill him until his fingertips and toes started to tingle.

“Bobby, there are people around!” a woman said, the woman who’d more or less instigated his beating.

“Come on babe, no one cares.” Her friend, the macho jerk sort, was lying on his side facing the woman, the two of them on a blanket, beer beside them. Far as Mason could see, Bobby had a hand on her side, and was slipping his hand up underneath her shirt.

“Bobby, you’re so bad.” All pretense of trying to dissuade the man’s sexual aggression tossed out the window immediately, she leaned in and resumed kissing her friend, while several men and women hooted or hollered from their cars, cheering on the increasingly erotic scene.

Maybe this would be like one of those scenes in those ridiculous slasher horror films, where every person running from the killer was suddenly struck with a terminal case of insanely-fucking-ineptitis. Perhaps they’d try to run, and trip over every possible twig or slippery bit of grass. He licked his lips as he remembered the film Friday the 13th. Maybe it’d go like that?

What would go like that? The killing spree. What killing spree? The one he was about to unleash. Why? Why would you do that?

Because every muscle, every fiber, every instinct he had was telling him to get rid of these fucks, that they deserved to die for attacking him, that his territory would be better off with them gone.

The world would be better off with them gone.

He started walking forward, out into the open. Some of them noticed him, some of them didn't; he was still far away and buried in the darkness of night. It didn't matter, they weren't getting away.

He knew what to do, somehow, just knew to let it out. Something in him snapped, and a part of him thought that it should have been a more explosive, more violent, more loud experience, this string snapping in his mind. But it didn't. No, it was more like a thin silk rope that someone cut with a pair of scissors, and the rope fell away, no longer blocking this thing that had been building inside him for weeks. Longer than weeks, months, even years, a shit life on top of a shit day on a shitty fucking job with shitty fucking people and these shit fucking kids.

His clothes were starting to fade away. A weird brown fur was replacing it. He seemed taller. He seemed faster. He seemed stronger. The distance between him and the parked cars was shrinking far faster than it should have. He wasn't walking on the ground anymore, he was tearing into it with the claws of his feet. Each step sent him ten feet, easy, despite the monstrous weight he felt sink into each bounding leap.

There was screaming. People running. One of the metal boxes two of them sat in started making noise, mechanical whirs that sounded more like roars. But Mason jumped through the air, landed upon the metal box's front half, and with one swipe, ripped out its guts. Black liquid squirted outward, and the noisy lifeless thing went quiet.

“What the fuck is that!?”

“No, no! Oh god oh god oh god, run! Run!”

Words. The meat was saying words. Meat wasn't supposed to speak, meat was supposed to die.

He marched over the length of the metal box, and swung his two gargantuan arms forward, with them both hanging at his side. They caught the meat at an upward angle against their chest and jaws, and his claws ripped through their skin-covering fabrics, chests, breasts, throat, and up through their screaming mouths. Blood was everywhere, and he roared satisfaction. Two less pests defiling his territory.

The other two in another metal box got out, and ran. He jumped after them. First the woman, he sank his claws in through more of the colorful, alien material that covered her skin, and deep into her body. His claws were long, and his hands titanic. She screamed, gargled blood as he punctured her lungs, and died seconds later as her insides were shredded. He tossed her meat aside, and leapt thirty feet to land upon the female's mate. Mason's new weight was enough to crush many of this trespasser's bones, and as the male cried out in agony, Mason reached down, and ripped his head off; no more difficult than plucking a dandelion.

The two who had been on the grass on a blanket were much further. They'd left their pack to die. Typical of pests. He roared his fury to the moon, to Luna, and bounded after the two.

It took seven breaths to reach them. He could hear their pants, their cries, the strange, hard things on their feet striking the grass. He could hear their heartbeats, loud as they were, almost as fast a hummingbird's.

First the male. He pounced this one, landed upon his back and legs with all of his weight, with his four sets of claws, and broke the man in many places. Bones snapping, cartilage tearing, his prey went down and screamed. Pitiful sounds. Mason stepped on the prey's head, and crushed his skull and brain like stepping on a cockroach. Pop.

The girl he would deal with last, the one who had instigated the attack on him. She cried out, begged for mercy, but they were just words, words he barely understood anymore. Something about 'help' and 'please don't' or some such. Just words. Nothing, meaningless compared to weight, muscle, meat, blood, tooth and claw. The hunt, and the kill.

He ran her down, and bit down onto her skull. It shattered. Hair, brain matter, blood, it filled his mouth. He spit it out, tore off the strange fabric from some of her limbs, and sank his teeth into—

---

He woke up with a snap, a crack of lightning, a slap of white against his eyes, and dampness on his body.

Grass. He was outside. The sun was up. What the fuck.

He sat up, and regretted it. Pain danced up on his back and arms, a burning sensation he hadn't felt in a long time, since the last time he'd been to a gym. He'd had a good workout yesterday then. The fuck did he do—

Blood. He could smell blood. How did he know what blood smelled like? He fucking knew, knew it down to his bones, knew it like it was a part of himself to know, knew it like he knew the smell of eggs and rice he'd been eating for the past ten years straight. Blood and the other things, the sinew, the bone, organs, those smells were in the air and in his mouth.

He looked down, and froze. Blood, everywhere, on him, soaking him. Blood and bits of flesh. Oh shit, oh shit oh shit. He grit his teeth down as the memories started to rise from their graves, each pulling him down into a hazy mess of blood-soaked carnage and mayhem. Something was stuck in his teeth, and when he reached into his mouth to pull it out, he begged it wasn't something he didn't want to see.

It was a piece of clothing.

He tossed it away, turned, and vomited into the grass. Oh god, oh fucking god. More of the memories came back, blurry things, mixed together like a bunch of shit thrown into a blender. There'd been people, right? People, and ... he'd eaten them, or at least bitten into them, tore them apart, ripped them open and shredded them.

His vomit didn't show any of the horrible things he was remembering, but as the memories came back, he was sure he could taste them. And hear the screams of the humans as he bit through them. Humans? Right, because, he wasn't human, not then at least, not when he was killing these people.

He looked at his hands. There had been claws. Fur. He could remember having a snout. He could remember being tall.

And he could feel it now, inside him, something that was hiding underneath the skin before, but now it was out there, in his eyes, on his fingers, between his lips and on his tongue. He could feel the wolf there, almost hear it barking and howling. A wolf, a fucking wolf, no denying it, no escaping it, he just knew it.

He got up, and looked around some more. The mess wasn't as bad as the memories told him it should be. Where were the bodies? He must have moved on from the site where he'd killed them.

He almost vomited again. Killed. He'd killed them. Shit, they were just kids. Kids who'd beaten him to shit and—his wounds were healed. No pain, other than sore muscles, and no bruises either. The beating they'd given him was gone, and in return, they were dead.

He stumbled around, and pressed his hand against a nearby tree. Right, he was maybe a mile out from Makeout Hill, and had run that mile as his ... other ... form ... in minutes. He hadn't had clothes then, just fur, but now he had clothes again. How the hell did that work?

Shit. Shit shit shit shit what was he supposed to do now? Go back? People saw what happened to him, saw him walk out of the store, after those fucking kids beat him to shit, and now they'd be reported as missing. By tomorrow, they'd be on the news, dead, killed by some wild animal. Police would come to him, interview him, find evidence, lock him up.

Mason shook his head. No, don't go back to the city, you don't need to. No friends, no family, no nothing. Just, stay out here, in the woods, and do what wolves do.

What the fuck did wolves do? They hunted. But he wasn't a wolf. Yes, he was, he fucking was. With a little digging, he found a piece of that wolf in himself.

The fuck was he doing? The fuck was he going to do? Why the fuck was any of this happening? Did he really want to do this? Did he really know how this was going to go, how it'd work, anything? Just up, and go? Leave?

The animal half of him, brand new but a part of him, brand new but as familiar to him as breathing, knew what to do. How? No fucking clue, no fucking clue at all. And either he could stand here, with the blood of a bunch of college kids he'd murdered on his hands and clothes, or he could leave this shit life.

Changing was easy enough. A bit painful, and he growled and groaned as the feel of muscles pullings and bones grinding filled him. His clothes vanished into his body, fading away like shadow, and he fell to his hands, almost signifying the lost of his human self. Hands became paws. Mouth became snout. Naked skin became fur.

Painful, but easy. Too easy. Should it have been harder? Did others of his kind do it like this? And there had to be others. He was a werewolf, a fucking werewolf, and he'd never been bitten by an animal his whole life. Whatever changed him could have changed others, must have.

Holy shit. Did he just accept abandoning his old, shitty life, accept that he'd killed a bunch of shitty college kids, accept that he was a werewolf, that other werewolves must exist, and did he decide to go on a mission to find some?

He looked at himself. A wolf. A normal, natural, normal wolf. Not the titan he was last night, but a normal wolf who could sneak and hide and leave, eat deer, and leave everything behind.

So he did. Being alone is horrible, and he had no intentions of staying a lone wolf. Maybe he could find a pack, other werewolves, if they existed.

God, how come this came so easily to him?

---

~~The Year: 1991~~

Being alone is horrible.

He knew that, knew all along. What he didn't know was how different it'd be to actually have a family, and friends, to have people who watch your back, people who care about you and will put their life on the line for yours. Irritating to be around people so much, sure, but now he could sleep at night and not have to look over his shoulder. Sleep, actual real sleep.

Sleep under the stars.

Their pack was small, for now. Avery was certain they'd find more, and that their totem would grow along with the pack. Not like Mason was in any position to complain. Woman had saved him from wandering the woods as a literal lone wolf. Now he had a purpose, something he could sink his teeth into and pursue, something that clicked and made sense.

He was a werewolf, and he had a duty to hunt. Except, not hunt mindlessly, but hunt with a purpose, like keeping a population in check. His new job was to guard the barrier between the physical and spirit realms, and manage the spirits and humans in both, the way a wolf knew best. Hunting.

He looked to his right. Avery, leader of the pack, a tiny woman who was a bit older than him. Blue eyes with a hint of silver, light tan skin, and a black ponytail that went down all the way to her hip. Lot of scars. The fuck kind of wounds she'd suffered to get those kinds of scars, especially as an Uratha, he had no idea, but she had them, a lot of them.

The pack sat by the fire, and waited. To his left were Erica and Stephanie. Erica was an adult, like him, but Stephanie had just turned eighteen, with a chip on her shoulder the size of a mountain. The change had come upon her a year ago, damn young, and it'd ruined her life. So now, she was a bitch. He could understand that, a little, but it didn't justify how much she liked to take out that aggression on him and the rest of the pack. She'd been a part of their group for a month, and the only person she treated with decency was Erica, and Avery by necessity.

Carter sat on the other side of the fire, closer to Avery. He was older than her, but the man followed her lead. Such was the way of Irraka, hunting from the sidelines, quiet, unseen, necessary. Brianna sat on the other side of her, a strong woman, tall, the Rahu and muscle of their small pack. Erica and those two had been with Avery when they found Mason, and before him, each of them had been a recruit to Avery's new pack. Avery rarely spoke of her old pack, other than to say it was gone, destroyed, dead, and she was building it anew.

They were journeying south. Their pack was of the Meninna, Hunters in Darkness, and they did not like to travel. They wanted a home, a place where they could guard the territory, manage it, keep it balanced. Avery knew there were problems, major problems in the Hisil in Tijuana, and problems on this side of the Gauntlet as well, vampires wreaking havoc there. Seemed as good of an idea as any. And maybe they could find more for their pack there.

Heh, how long had it been since he'd just sat down, and entertained thoughts about his circumstance? He used to do it all the time, when he worked at a convenience store, lamenting his shit life. Times had changed, he'd changed. He learned he was an Elodoth Uratha, a werewolf of the Half Moon. Thinkers, according to Avery. He did like to think.

The night came upon them, darker, and darker, until the starlight above was a bright painting against the trees that surrounded the pack. They'd found a small stream to rest by, with a tiny waterfall that danced against an equally tiny pool peppered with pebbles. It was the perfect place and environment to speak with their young totem.

Avery stood up first. "It won't be long before we're in Tijuana. I have an old friend there, and I'm pretty sure he's in deep shit with the Kindred there." Words she'd said before, but it was normal for a leader to recap; in this case, for Stephanie's sake as well. "Erica, Mason, Stephanie, none of you have ever been in a city, not as Uratha, and not when it's a hotbed of shit. You'll have to get used to vampires trying to shoot you in the back."

"Why the fuck would they do that?" Steph said.

"Cause they know they'd lose if they tried shooting us in the front."

“No, I mean, why are they shooting us at all? We making enemies? This doesn’t have to be like those other cities you’ve been to. Doesn’t have to be like Dolareido.”

Mason facepalmed. This girl. Why couldn’t she just shut up and listen? Always arguing.

“Don’t start, Steph,” Avery said. Everyone else waited, and listened, because this song and dance had happened plenty times the past month, and now it was going to happen again.

“Why don’t we go someplace where the people there aren’t trying to shoot us in the back? Or hell, maybe some place without vamps? I spent a good chunk of my life in Tijuana, and I don’t want to go back there.”

Mason leaned back against a tree, and grit his teeth, silent. He had no words to interrupt this argument, none that wouldn’t explode in his face and get him skewered.

“We need to find a place where we can do some good, Steph.”

“We can do good out here, in the woods, just ... watching, taking care of the spirits that get uppity here.”

“These wilds are peaceful, Steph, for tens of miles in any direction. Balanced. The wild usually is. More often than not, it’s where humans congregate that everything gets out of balance.” Avery stood there, and tapped her foot on the ground, arms folded across her chest. Patient, more patient than Mason would be, and more patient than he had been.

“Yeah, I know that, you’ve told me. A dozen times.”

“Then why—”

“Because I don’t think we should have to put our lives on the line for a dead ancestor! Father Wolf is gone, if he ever existed, and children inheriting the sins of the parent is some pretty old world, illogical bullshit.”

Well, shit. Mason winced, and waited for the explosion, for Avery to tear into the young pup and set her straight. But the small woman didn’t. Avery sighed, shook her head, and sat down on the ground by the stream once more. The gentle splashing of water against water and rock was probably the only thing keeping her temper in control.

“Stephanie, I’m sorry that Luna has never spoken to you. You are Rahu, and it’s understandable for that to be the way of things. But I’ve been on this Earth far longer than you, and I’ve had the visions. Many Cahalith do. We’ve been tasked with Father Wolf’s duty. If you want to leave and—”

“It is, perhaps, best if she follows her heart.”

Everyone went silent, and stared on as a swirling mist of color rose above the stream. It wasn’t normal for Uratha to rest out in the open, but it was where the nearest stream was, and their totem found an easier foothold to manifest near water. Such was the way of Flowing Sanctuary.

They all turned, and watched the spirit grow, manifest, become visible as waves of blue and navy, azure and cerulean, flowing with the sparkling crystal of living water. Angel wings rose from the gentle waves, and the color of blue faded from them until only the white of pure, heavenly feathers remained. Flowing Sanctuary itself started to form and manifest its body, and everyone stared on as womanly curves joined the floating waves. Shoulders, but no arms, falling fog where arms should have been. And the spirit’s legs never solidified into more than mist, the upper half forming into something almost human looking, carved of crystal-like blue, with hair like water flowing down its back.

“Even the damn spirit agrees with me.” Stephanie stomped around in place, pacing side to side as she threw up her hands. Here came the raised voice, right on schedule. “I don’t care what Luna’s tasked us with, I didn’t ask for any of this.”

They all looked at each other, and then Avery, and then Flow. The spirit hovered away from the stream, and toward Stephanie. Its wings, its mist, they did not touch the physical, but there was no hiding the light its body gave off, how a gentle azure buried them all as it radiated from its form.

“You Uratha, always seeking purpose,” it said. A lovely voice, almost a singing voice, feminine like its figure. Only the bright white of starlight in the spirit’s eyes looked hard.

“Don’t talk to me about purpose, spirit. You’re a fucking spirit, you don’t even know what it means to exist without purpose.” Stephanie struck out, but her hand passed through Flow without resistance. Might as well have been trying to hit actual mist.

“I know that without purpose, Uratha and humans alike, crumble into nothing.” Flow floated around Steph, getting between her and the rest of the forest. “Your pack leader found purpose when she found me, after the death of her former pack and totem spirit. It has given her not only purpose, but joy, something to pour her energy into, her essence.”

Mason winced with the spirit’s words. Yeah, no purpose was fucking horrible.

“I don’t need that purpose! I’d be cool being a Ghost Wolf and—”

“Would you?” The spirit flew into the air, gentle, a wisp of mist on the breeze, except six feet tall and a wing span of ethereal cloud to follow. “A lost pup, wandering alone, afraid of the spirits with tooth and claw that do not appreciate an Uratha in their midst.”

“I’m not—”

“Be silent,” the spirit said, and shattered the air around them with thunder. Avery didn’t flinch, but the rest of them did. “Avery presented to you a purpose, and you chose it. What’s changed in that scant amount of time, little pup? I said it is best to follow your heart, and not long ago, your heart took you from your home, your city, and threw you into this wild journey with Avery.”

Yeah, what had changed? Flow was frustratingly smart, and Mason appreciated that; also appreciated how good it was at getting to the root of a problem.

“I didn’t ... I didn’t think it’d be like ... Arg, fuck this. Fuck this and fuck all of you.” She threw her arms up, and stormed off.

Avery got up, hand up to her neck and stroking little necklace it held. Just a string, a black string, and one the woman liked to touch whenever she seemed upset, stressed, or when Flow was summoned. He didn’t ask, because, yeah, no reason to.

“That woman,” Mason said, “is insane.”

Avery shook her head. “She’s not insane, she’s just young and confused. Go talk to her.”

“I guess she—wait, what?”

The small woman came up to him, sat beside him, and gave him a punch in the shoulder. Soft enough to leave him unmoved, hard enough to hurt a little.

“Go talk to her.”

“I uh, um ... why?”

“Because you two don’t get along, and this is a perfect opportunity to use some of that frustration for an eye-opening exchange.”

This woman was strange. His leader was very strange. Wise, but strange. Ugh, he threw up his hands, stood up, and walked after Stephanie. Wasting my time, wasting my time, wasting my time.

It didn’t take long to catch up to Steph. The damn woman had stopped only maybe a few hundred feet from the pack, and had sat down by a tree. He was approaching her from behind, bit of an angle so he could see her shoulder, but he could see the frown through the back of her damn head. God damn this idiot girl.

He found a tree maybe five feet from her, and sat down against the grass as well, back to the bark, arms hanging off of his knees.

“You’re a real bitch, you know that?” First words out of his mouth. Yeah, this was going to go real well.

“Fuck you Mason.”

“Serious. Avery gave you shelter and a group of people you can rely on, and you—”

“Sorry if I don’t feel like I should have to die for that.”

Oh, fear of death. Yeah, that should have been more obvious. Christ, why hadn’t that been more obvious? He was Elodith, he broke things down into logical equations, weighing the facts and the realities, while forever being disconnected from the emotional weight of them; so Avery told him, anyway. He didn’t entirely agree, didn’t like being put into a box like that, didn’t like how she bypassed the nuances with her generalizations. She called it good storytelling.

“You won’t die.”

“Won’t I? Avery’s old pack died.”

“Avery’s old pack was lead by some guy named Simon, and the man was asking for trouble. You know that, she told you that. Not all packs go out like that.”

“Bullshit. Avery’s taking us into a shit storm. I don’t want that, I want to find a calmer territory.”

“... you really don’t. You’ll die of boredom, and you said you didn’t want to die.” It seemed like such an obvious problem, with an obvious fix. Afraid of dying? Get over it. What else was there to it? Apparently a lot, because he couldn’t crack this egg, couldn’t figure this girl out. Christ she got under his skin.

“I wanted to let loose, go out there, be a fucking werewolf, fuck and fight and kick around some punks who have the nerve to waltz into our territory. She wants us to go fight someone else’s fight, and try to clean up streets, like ... like ... fucking cops.”

“We are cops.”

“Excuse me?”

“We are cops. We’re supposed to be keeping the—”

“Fuck that, I didn’t ask for this. I—”

“You wanted to join the pack. Avery offered, and you—”

“I didn’t want to be alone!”

He pulled his head back, and blinked. “... yeah, I know that feeling.”

“The fuck do you know about being alone? My family went and ... I ... Fuck it, I’m not going to give you some ridiculous rant describing my life.”

“Same.”

She threw her hands up, and snarled. “Like you know anything about being alone.”

“ ... I know a lot about being alone.”

“Bull shit.”

Ok, that was it. He got up, stomped over to her, picked her up by the shoulders, and slammed her back against the tree behind her.

“You’re a werewolf now, you idiot little child. Get used to it. You can either roll with us, be a part of this family, not be alone anymore, and try to make this world just a little less fucking shitty, or you can be alone, deal with this alone, hunt alone, live alone, die alone.”

“I—”

“So take your high school drama and shove it! What is this, a cry for help? Be loud, be obnoxious, piss everyone off around you, push them away, cause all you really want is for someone to reach out and save you from yourself?” This was the worst. God, he hated arguing with a teenager; they were too stupid to know why they were upset, or to articulate it to him.

Funny, now it was easy to understand why parents got so frustrated.

He opened his mouth, ready to keep arguing, ready to maybe drill into this girl’s head that she was creating her own problems, that she just needed to accept reality and stop treating everything like a problem. She had a family now, and they'd protect her, be there for her. They'd understand her new life as a werewolf, they'd be able to offer advice, support, purpose. The need to hunt was in the blood, almost overwhelming sometimes, like a wild wolf raised to be domesticated, who could never quite shake the instinct to hunt.

But a fist to the mouth suggested he shut up, and he fell back onto his ass. Stephanie glared down at him, took a step forward, and started to change. Oh shit.

Height, muscle, those were the first to come. The woman put on two feet in height, her muscles grew thicker, and fur started to grow out of her dark skin. It was a visceral change for her, not smooth like Avery, and she screamed in what must have been pain as her clothes vanished with her human skin, and a titan of muscle and rage came out.

Mason looked back in the direction of the pack. Predictably, everyone came out of the woods to join him in the dark, even their totem spirit. But, as Erica came closer, Avery put her hand out and stopped her. And then, she nodded to Mason.

Finally. Time to let out some of that frustration. He got up, and let out the beast, let out the rage inside him, let it out until he could feel it on his skin, in his muscles, in his fucking bones. Like Stephanie, he started to grow in height, higher, and higher, and muscle mass filled him, building upon itself, defying physics and increasing his weight until his claws — not shoes — were digging into the forest floor. Clothes disappeared, fur replaced them, and his mouth grew longer, and longer, until he was looking down a snout.

If Avery was cool with it, then fuck it, he was going to smack some sense into this idiot girl; not so much smack, as tear and rip, though.

Gauru, the classic werewolf form, a goliath of power, strength, size, and blood-lust. You didn't change into this form for jokes, you didn't change into this form for a fucking brawl, you changed into Gauru when you were ready to kill. He wasn't going to kill Stephanie, but he was going to make her wish he had by the time they were done.

They lunged at each other. No disillusions here, no dancing around the issue, they didn't like each other and now was as good a time as any to let loose some anger.

His claws found her chest, but before he could slice down, she slammed her forearm against the inside of his arm, knocking it aside as she slammed the rest of her weight into his chest, shoulder first. They bowled over, and rolled along the grass and dirt until they hit a tree. She came out on top, hands on his shoulders, knees outside his waist; a full mount.

But they weren't doing MMA, they were werewolves, beasts, and he slashed out with his claws at her arm. Blood gushed over him as it poured out from her, and she howled as the damaged arm lost its grip on him. His other hand struck out for her neck, but she rolled to the side and away from him and the tree. He leapt after her, throwing himself into the air toward her with the full weight of his body, claws first. Eight hundred pounds of pissed off.

She turned to face him, but still on her back, and caught his weight with her feet. Barking, roaring, she drove her legs back toward him, and sent him flying. The tree caught him with all the grace of a brick wall, and cracked, toppling over and cutting through nearby branches of other trees before crashing into the ground. If anyone was around to hear, it wouldn't be a good thing, but this was too important to stop, impossible to stop.

"You'd leave me to die." Her words were guttural, barely words, mixed with harsh, intermittent snarls. And they hurt.

"I would never!" He forced himself back to standing, but only in time for Stephanie to tackle him. Not a shoulder tackle, but a full body tackle with arms wide and her head lowered. He went flying again, and the ground broke away beneath him as she landed on him, their weight and momentum splitting the earth and leaving a trail as they slid. But she kept her grip on him, and grabbed his wrists as she full mounted him again. Apparently, he really sucked at fighting other werewolves; he'd never done it before.

“You'd leave me to die! You hate me! You're not family, I'm not safe with you! I—”

“We said we'd protect you!” He almost brought his legs up, to maybe get one of them digging into her side; he was damn flexible when he needed to be, even in this form. But, he didn't. He stared up at the woman, the wolf, the enormous creature glaring at him and pinning him.

“You'd never protect me! Why the fuck would you ever protect me?” Her voice died away, but her grip didn't. She glared at him with enough hate in her eyes to cut a hole through steel, and panted fury down onto him until he could feel the heat of her breath.

Speaking English in this form was a bitch, but even if she was in gauru form, catching the inflection in her tone, the drop in pitch, was easy. She didn't think they'd protect her, because she figured they hated her. Because, as far as he could tell from the train wreck life they picked Stephanie up from, everyone hated her.

It'd be so easy to tear into her, verbally, knock her down a peg, expose to her her stupidity. Of course they were going to protect her, they were a family, and family protected each other no matter how much they hated each other. At least, that's what families were supposed to do, did in the Disney movies, and ... and Stephanie didn't know what that felt like, at all.

She was him, from five years ago. Well, way to be a giant fucking asshole, Mason.

“ ... I’ll protect you.”

“You—”

“I’ll protect you. Me, I’ll do it.” His transformation faded away, no more rage or blood-lust to fuel it. Now, he was just an average-sized guy, in the clawed grip of an enormous beast. “I’ll keep you alive, personally.”

She returned to her human form as well, until all that was left was a woman, tall, a sharp chin, sepia skin, and sad eyes.

“You will?”

It should have annoyed him, bothered him, that Stephanie could be such a child. He didn’t do this shit, didn’t throw temper tantrums, didn’t need anyone to draw him through a leading conversation to come to realizations about himself. Maybe Avery was right, and Elodoths were just good at thinking shit through, and Rahu like Steph had to say it out loud. Or, maybe, people were more complicated than that, and trying to wrap Stephanie up in a box was doing her a disservice. But, for some really stupid reason, he felt like maybe, he should help her. It was probably some sort of redirected desire to help himself, and escape his similar past. As good a reason as any.

“Yeah. I will, with my life. Ok?” He almost said something really, really cheesy, like ‘you’re not alone anymore’ or ‘I’ll be your friend’, but knowing Steph, she’d either take offense, or burst into laughter. Besides, ‘I’ll keep you alive, personally’ implied some degree of friendship, didn’t it?

He turned his head a bit, and caught Avery’s smirk. She probably thought it did.

---

~~Now~~

Being alone ... is horrible.

“You’re one of the Uratha, aren’t you?”

Mason frowned at the woman, and lowered his eyes back to his drink. He wasn’t so disconnected from his human half to have trouble with alcohol, like some of his kind were. Getting drunk took a lot though, more than he was willing to guzzle just for a buzz.

“Hello?” they said. Apparently his silence wasn’t clue enough to go away.

“ ... yeah. I am.” He shrugged, took another sip, and kept his eyes down. Maybe they’d leave if he just showed no interest.

“Mason, right?” The woman sat down next to him, and leaned forward over the table enough to catch his eye.

They were in a night lounge, some place close to Invictus territory, but still in Carthian territory according to Avery. The vamps suggested it as a quiet place where they could scout the populace.

The Cahaliths like Avery and Clara pointed the pack in the direction of trouble, based on their visions. David turned the vague direction into a more solid lead by talking with the spirits; a typical approach for the Ithaeur. And Elodoths like Mason analyzed the information to turn it into something actionable, if action was required. It was an important part of the job description, for Uratha to keep tabs on the ins and outs of the humans, see if they could pick up on any oddness before it evolved into a problem. What that oddness was, and what the problem would be, were to be figured out by people like him, people with their ears open and a mind for analyzing.

Garry had pointed him toward the night lounge Danny’s Dusk, and Mason liked to get his ear to the ground and see what he could learn. Never hurt to get digging before trouble started.

Course digging wasn't going to happen, for two reasons. The first was the vampire beside him trying to get his attention. The other was that the only thing going on in the lounge was people genuinely having a good time. Getting drunk, getting laid — some in the club itself in their booths — and getting high. Mason wasn't a fan of all the drug abuse Dolareido had, but violent crime was low in the city, and it didn't seem like kids were getting dragged into the drug world, so—

“You're really good at spacing out. Mid conversation too.”

“ ... sorry. Just want some peace and quiet.” A good friend died and I can't stop blaming myself, so go the fuck away. He almost said it, too.

“In a lounge?” the vampire said, and she gestured to the booths around them, the dance floor further out, and to the corners where speakers were playing the music. Not as loud or as obnoxious as some other clubs, like that horrible place Bloodlust he'd tried once; not that Bloodlust was a loud club, just loud for a werewolf. And instead of red light pulsing with a flickering white light, the lighting here was just a simple, navy, subtle light, just enough light for people to see by.

“In a manner of speaking.” He shrugged, took another sip, and nodded his head in the direction of one of the booths. Two men were in it, chatting over an envelope. “Drug deal going down.”

“Yeah, that's pretty typical,” she said.

He frowned at the vampire, and gestured in another direction. A young woman was sitting with an older man, maybe in his forties, and the two were chatting while slipping some money across the table.

“Prostitute.”

The vampire shrugged it all off like it was normal. “Prostitution is a pretty ancient occupation. And besides, I’ve seen that girl around. She makes quality money, and picks her clients.”

“ ... this city is just asking for problems from across the Gauntlet.” It was a wonder more spirits of wrath or envy weren’t causing havoc as it was. Spirits of money, drugs, sex, and varying incarnations of their elder, more grown, more fed siblings had set up some powerful holds in the Hisil. How the city maintained its weird balance, its weird peace, he didn’t know.

“No idea what that is, but stick around for a while and you’ll learn to ride Dolareido’s strange groove.” She reached out for his drink, took a sniff, and grimaced as she put it back down.

He raised a brow at the vampire beside him. She had very short red hair, a dash of freckles, and pale skin. Average height, and quite thin, almost thin enough to be unhealthy until he took another glance at her neck, her shoulders, and noticed the muscle definition. A touch of muscle, the sort of you found on a dancer’s body. Very attractive. She was wearing a green dress, tiny straps and plunging, loose cleavage between her small breasts, with a split skirt that cut high enough on her hip to show the side of her black thong. Confident in her sexuality, that was for sure.

He sighed, and let his mind wander back to Stephanie. At least until the vampire flicked him in the arm.

“ ... you’re persistent,” he said.

“Yeah well, I heard your friend died last week, and I thought you could use some company.”

Even the Kindred were talking about it. How fucked was that, for Kindred to be talking about Uratha dying, and then one of them trying to cheer him up. But, it was a much better direction than Tijuana would have taken it.

“I’d rather be left alone.”

“So I gathered, but you reek of all the typical self-destructive tendencies of a loner who really needs a shoulder to lean on.” The redhead shook her head, and flicked him in the shoulder again. “Trust a Daeva to know.”

Daeva, right. Artsy, passionate sort of Kindred. Ugh.

“And you are?”

“Tilly. Work for Garry.”

He sighed but nodded, and turned his gaze back to the crowd of people dancing. The music was slow enough to keep the mood at least somewhat calm, where the people were almost slow dancing, and the people in booths greatly outnumbered the people dancing.

“Garry keeping tabs on us?”

“Well of course, all the elders are. But that’s not why I’m here. I came for a meal, but saw you.” She slid in closer, until her leg was touching his. He was wearing some black suit pants, and a white shirt; just nice enough to fit in, without being so nice or ugly as to draw attention to himself.

“And you thought, a week after my friend died, was a good time to start pestering me?”

“Yeah, basically.” She chuckled, and set her elbows down on the table in front of them. “How long you been Uratha?”

This woman. Was this how Kindred operated in Dolareido? So blatant and direct? It was a welcomed change, just not right now.

“Bit over thirty years now.”

“Really? You don’t look a day over forty.”

“We age slower, once we’ve changed. And you?” Couldn’t have been very old. Every instinct he had told him he could tear this girl in half without her having time to blink. She looked about twenty, but that visual age meant nothing to an immortal creature like a vampire.

“About ten years now since I was embraced.” She nodded a few times, and turned her head to look him up and down a few times more. “I can tell you’re a lot, lot stronger than me, or my sire. No wonder Kindred fear your kind.”

“... being strong means little against the fortunes your kind grow, the hundreds of ways you can manipulate people, the empires you build.” Immortality provided a lot of benefits, if you got old enough to use it.

“And yet, all gone with the snap of a finger.” And on queue, she snapped her fingers. “One fuck up and we’re gone. One sunrise and it’s over.”

He nodded, and pushed down his smirk. The girl was actively trying to grab his attention, to keep his mind off of Stephanie. And it was working. Daeva indeed.

“You are paranoid creatures.”

“Wouldn’t you be? Centuries of potential power, wealth, pleasure, all teasing you, all so easily taken. So, yeah, we spend a lot of time scheming and setting up stockpiles of money, webs of deceit, and droves of servants and slaves once we’re strong enough, cause one bad night can ruin everything.” She slid in closer. Their legs were already touching, making closer very close, and she smiled up at him as she flicked his shoulder again. “I could run you over with a train and you’d be fine.”

“ ... I suppose I would be. Wasn’t enough to save Stephanie.”

“With shit like that happening in the city now, I am pretty glad you guys showed up. Thanks for that. And sorry, about your friend.”

He raised a brow at the beautiful creature, and offered her a small smile. She was very pleasant, and continued to throw him intrigued glances, warm smiles of her own, and did not move from her spot with her leg against his. And despite all the smells in the dark lounge, he could smell her clearly, with her proximity and her blushing life. Perfume, and fake life. Not an offensive smell, just unique.

“You don’t need to blush life, just for my sake. I’m used to the smell of Kindred.”

“Yeah well, I like doing it when I’m here. I like the way it gets this dead heart beating when I watch some couples in their booths, doing things to each other.” She gestured to one of the booths in the far back corner. A woman had one of her dress straps pulled down, and a man was caressing her breast while kissing her neck. Tilly gestured to another booth, where in the dark corner, a man was looking down at the table like he was in heaven. Someone was giving him a blowjob from underneath.

“I’d heard you vamps hunt like this in Dolareido. Clara confirmed. People just throw themselves at you for a Kiss. Sounds reckless to me, putting your Masquerade at risk.”

“We’re more careful than you think, and there’s no trail back to us.”

No real trail, but hunters didn’t use real trails, hunters followed rumors and gut instinct and found their targets through sheer determination. He sighed, shrugged, and looked to another booth where two men were kissing. At least Dolareido embraced sexuality in many forms.

“Surprised you haven’t eaten yet then,” he said, “considering the glances people are throwing you.” And there were many glances, men and women who were very attracted to Tilly; and him, now that he took a moment to look.

“Who says I haven’t?”

“I’d smell it.”

“Ooh, impressive.” She giggled, a wonderful little sound. Practiced no doubt, but that was fine, it was a nice sound anyway.

“Surprised people aren’t coming over to asking you out, or over, either.”

“They think I’m propositioning you.” Tilly traced a finger on the table, and slowly nodded her head to the slow beat. “Trying to sell you my drugs, my Kiss that they don’t understand. It’s pretty funny, sometimes when the kine try and get in on trafficking it, not knowing what it is.”

“That ... is a bit funny, yeah.” He chuckled too at the thought of a human trying to coax secrets out of a vampire. If they tried to bully a vampire, it’d only end badly for the human.

“So,” she said, “I am pretty hungry ... and I wanted ... to ask you ... you know.”

He furrowed his brows, and looked down at the gorgeous creature beside him. Not a touch of shame to her face. In fact, the only reason she hesitated was to try and add a touch of huskiness to her voice, a little seduction. It worked, but he wasn’t about to let some random Kindred drink him.

“You want to Kiss me?”

“Mmhmm. Friend of a friend told me it’s pretty intense, getting the blood from a werewolf.” Her hand found his leg, and her fingers reached out to start stroking his inner thigh. “And honestly? You’re very handsome, but you also look pretty depressed. And that’s just a recipe for attraction from a fucked up girl like myself.”

“Attracted to the depressed?” He looked down at her hand, and then back to her face. The pale skin, the blood red lipstick, her blue eyes, she was a very attractive woman. But he wasn’t really in the mood.

Tilly, apparently, thought she could change his mind.

“Like a moth to flame. I know you’re hurting, and if I see a cute guy brooding about horrible things, I want to help him.” Her hand drifted higher. He half expected her to grab his crotch, but her fingers found his shirt, and she reached in between two buttons to begin teasing a finger along his abs. “Daeva are horrible like that, you know? To me it’s like a really good story, the ones where bad things happen to the characters, and you just keep reading cause the drama is addicting.”

That got another smile out of him, and he nodded. He did know that feeling, and he knew Daeva lived for that feeling. She was honest, for a Kindred.

“You are very ... aggressive,” he said.

“Well you have to be, to get into the pants of scary, dark, handsome types, the ones who like to brood and get a girl all ... you know, wanting to take care of you.” A few more chuckles, and she raised her hand outside his shirt to set it on his chest. “If you were wounded, and I had to nurse you back to health? Ugh, makes me swoon just thinking about it.”

He was wounded. Stephanie's death hit him in a weird way, a deep way, some place in his fucking guts that felt like fire sizzling on his intestines. He hated her, and he loved her. Never even kissed her, and he never knew he wanted to until she died. Which of course made him hate himself, and it led to a delightful downward spiral of depression and negative thoughts. He'd seen what this sort of self hatred could do to people, and how bad it could get when the person closed themselves off to others. Worse for an Elodoth, over analyzing things and never letting them hit the heart.

Stephanie's death hit the heart though, hard enough to crack it. Fuck, he was starting to sound like a Daeva vamp.

"... I ... could use a little nursing, yeah." Hurt to say, but it was true.

"Wonderful! I like to think I'm pretty good at the nursing thing. I was a nurse, before I was embraced."

Oh, well, that might explain a little of her unusual desire to help him, to tend to his wounds and such. Maybe she became a nurse, in hopes of living that wounded soldier fantasy, and never having it? He knew the reality of being a nurse was nothing like that, but if it was how she wanted to pursue that—stop over thinking everything. Just, for once in your god damn idiot life, let the pretty girl make you happy.

"I worked a convenience store, before I changed."

That got a laugh out of her, and she got cozy against his arm, leaning her shoulder into his as she looked back out to the crowd.

"So, I'll take care of you, and then I can have a drink of you?"

He nodded. "Sure."

Not like he was in danger. That Mekhet girl had drained Arturo earlier on, and he'd survived just fine; didn't even get knocked out like a human would. And Avery seemed ok with the idea of the pack getting close to Kindred in Dolareido, what with Arturo and Matthew having permission to hang with Natasha. And, Arturo described the Kiss with some pretty enticing adjectives. Mason would be lying if he said he wasn't intrigued.

"Want me to get one of the girls over here? If you'd prefer someone else," she said.

"... what?"

"I am a Daeva. Want me to enthrall someone, a kine? One of the girls, or boys?"

"No. No, of course not. Thought it was you flirting with me?"

"Oh I was, just wasn't sure if it was me you wanted ... Sorry, guess that's just a Kindred quirk. We often kind of think of sex in looser terms."

"I see. That's ... a little crazier than I think your typical Uratha is looking for." Inviting random strangers for sexual favors, when the vampire on his arm was almost a stranger herself, was pretty crazy. Normal behavior for Kindred apparently.

"That's so romantic! And adorable."

He smiled, and frowned, at the little devil leaning on his arm. Perhaps he was a hopeless romantic, in Kindred terms at least, preferring to not involve random strangers in their flirtations. No need to mention that he hadn't had a relationship beyond the occasional one night stand in his entire life, Uratha or otherwise.

Her hand closer to him set on his leg again, and with the table before the blocking out a lot of what people could see, it seemed Tilly had no hesitation to set her hand higher, further inward, and start to stroke his pants along his crotch. Never in his life had he ever found a woman so sexually aggressive. Damn this city was like a teenager, no cares in the world, just looking for sex and fun times. It was going to take some getting used to, but, as he looked down to see the beautiful woman start to undo his pants, he found his smile refusing to leave. It really was a nice change of pace from ... everything.

A girl, coming up to him, and asking to do sexual favors for him so she could drink him. And not a drop of shame or guilt or judgment anywhere. Liberating.

“God damn.” Tilly giggled as she slid her hand under the waistband of his boxers, and gently cupped his still soft flesh. “Warm. And ... damn, I can feel it filling up with blood.”

“Isn’t that normal for your prey?”

“Ha! Prey? You could kill me easily.” She leaned in a bit closer, head to his shoulder and looking down while her hand eased the length of his cock through the flap of his boxers, so it was laid across her open palm and out in the open. “Would it be really cliché of me to say you have a big dick? Too crass, or silly?”

“A bit ... a bit over the top, maybe.” He squirmed a touch, just a little, as the girl began to massage his length. No qualms or hesitation or anything, she just started to caress him and tease his cock with expert fingers. And, being surrounded by all the sex, not to mention smelling the arousal coming from the girl beside him, it wasn’t long before he’d grown erect.

“Well, it is.” She worked her grip higher, to the base of his glans, before she squeezed a little and pulled her grip to the hilt of his length. He glanced her way, and gulped as he found the vampire licking her lips. Her fangs had grown from their hiding spot, and he could see them through her slightly parted lips. Her nipples pressed hard to her dress, and her smell grew increasingly erotic. She was wet, and getting aroused faster than he was. And unlike her, he hadn't been laid in years.

“The brooding, handsome guy, a loner, wounded, with a really fit body and a big dick, and in desperate need of a woman to save him. Sorry to say, Mr. Mason, that you really are a sexual stereotype and fantasy incarnate,” she said. Her breathing was picking up, getting faster as she stroked him faster as well, until his length was completely hard, and she was breathing in tandem with her strokes. No need for a vampire to breathe, but she was anyway, probably knowing full well how much more attractive it made her when her breasts and hard nipples kept rising and falling. She was right.

A handjob, in a public place. First time for everything. He glanced around at the people dancing, at the people in their booths, at new people coming and other people leaving. Many threw him a glance, but not a one of them so much as furrowed a brow. Many couples smiled, a few women and one man spent more than a few seconds looking at him, and one couple in a far booth started to copy them. Couldn't see through the table, but from how the woman's arm was moving, it was easy to tell she was giving her man a handjob as well.

“Maybe I should ... go out more then,” he said.

“Oh you should. Lot of Kindred in Dolareido who think you wolves are just ... really ... hot.” Her hand squeezed a bit harder, a tight squeeze, and moved faster, stroking the whole of his length before easing to a slower, gentler rhythm again.

He let out a slow, long sigh, and closed his eyes for a moment. Someone else was touching him, getting past his surly attitude, making him forget about horrible shit for a little while; it was really appreciated. Greatly appreciated even, and a quiet, low groan escaped him as he started to feel the liquids building underneath his testicles, tingling warmth that made him sigh another long, content sigh.

“I know that sound,” Tilly said. “Gonna cum soon?”

“I ... might.”

Immediately, her motions slowed, and she giggled when she looked up to catch his expression. “Not yet, we’re just getting to know each other. Come on, tell me a little about yourself.”

He didn’t see this coming; but he should have. The Kindred in this city were all so comfortable with sex, far more comfortable than Kindred typically were — which was pretty damn comfortable — so it only made sense she’d want to have a conversation while jerking him off. He was ok with that.

“What do you want to know?”

“Not sure. Did you come from Tijuana like a lot of your pack did?” She reached over with her other hand, and pulled his arm up and over her shoulder. Now in the nook of his arm and shoulder, she had more freedom to massage his girth with relaxed motions, arm resting on his lap. Her further arm reached across her lap to find his cock as well, and she teased her fingers along the tip of his member, while the other continued to stroke him. Precum started to drip out of him, but she prevented any of it from spilling, instead using the liquid to wet his foreskin so she could peel it back. And when she revealed the engorged, pink skin of his swollen glans, she made her own groaning sound.

“I was with Avery, when she—” A small wave of pleasure cut him off, made his cock flex in her hand. She giggled and slowed her hand to a stop, fingers coming to rest at the base of his length in a gentle grip, while her other hand teased fingernails softly along the topside of some of the veins of his girth. “—when she drifted down to Tijuana. I was hanging outside Los Angeles when she met me.”

“Oooh, Los Angeles. Beautiful city.”

“Scary city.”

“That too.” She resumed her stroking, and nudged her head into the groove of his shoulder and chest a little harder. Like a nuzzling cat. “Got a girl waiting for you anywhere?”

“ ... no.” And it was true.

“Sounds like you wish a girl you knew was waiting for you.”

He smirked at the mind reader, but smirked turned into slightly parted lips, and half-closed eyes as he felt his liquids start to build again, more warmth rising underneath the base of his length and making his thighs spark with the growing pleasure.

“You really are comfortable with this.”

“I told you,” she said, “Kindred are pretty comfortable here, doing this sort of stuff. But with you, I got to admit, there’s a certain danger to it I like. Sire would kill me if she knew I’d approached you like this.” And, as if the situation was not sexual enough for her, Tilly removed her further hand from his length, and slid her skirt aside using its high split. With both her legs fully exposed, and her thong, she slid the hand underneath the waistband to find her sex underneath. He couldn’t see through the fabric, or hear quiet sounds through the music, but he could smell the sexual arousal pouring off of her. Her underwear was soaked.

With the way her hand lifted her waistband, he could see she was completely smooth underneath too. The wolves were used to roughing it, living in the woods for months or years at a time, surviving on nothing but wildlife and wild spirits; body hair was pretty normal. These vamps though, these city dwelling vamps, loved to shave their whole damn bodies smooth.

He kind of liked it.

“You vamps really that afraid of us?”

“Kind of. We got peace here, and we know that’s pretty rare. Wanna keep it like that. And we hear stories about what happened when Avery was here last time, some Kindred dying and shit.” She shuddered, but smiled up at him as she stroked his cock, and herself. Ambidextrous. “So you guys are kinda the bad boys — and girls — in Dolareido. And every girl likes a bad boy.”

Her hand got faster, and faster. As the warm liquids started to build up again underneath his testicles, making his breathing quicken and his heart as well, she slid her other hand out from her thong, and set her fingers onto the glans of his length. Her fingers were dripping of her juices, and she spread them over the engorged head, mixing with his precum, and forcing almost painful levels of sparking pleasure through the sensitive skin and into his pelvis.

With her teasing fingers, she reached out to grab an unused glass from the table. She held it underneath the head of his cock, angled to ensure it caught all of him, as her other hand massaged his girth. Her grip slid up to the base of his glans, and used her grip to nudge wet skin along the bottom edge of the bulbous tip, forcing Mason to rumble as the pleasure coursed through him.

“Milking a werewolf.” She giggled, and rested her cheek against the side of his chest as she stared down at her work. His first gush of cum came out as a squirt, splashing against the inside wall of the glass, before the next wave came out in a slow, trickling stream. “How does that feel?”

“Really ... good.”

“Sweet music to any Daeva’s ears.” She sighed into his chest, and snuggled up closer, close enough she was squished against his side as she continued to milk him of his cum. Each flex of his muscle sent another wave of pleasure down his length, and another wave of fluid up his length to flow into the awaiting glass. All the while, Tilly continued to squeeze and stroke his length, timing her strokes to fall in rhythm with his flexing muscles, and drawing more and more of his cum out of him. “Wow, you wolves all cum this much?”

“We...” His voice fell to silence as he let the aftershocks of a strong orgasm settle. But, even as his cum finally stopped, Tilly didn't. She continued to massage his girth, squeezing at the base of him and drawing out more drops to drip into the glass. Each squeeze and stroke earned another wave of bliss through his insides, until he rumbled again. Rumbling in his chest earned a moan from her in return. “We are ... alive, and strong, and ... sexually ... a bit like humans. Just more ... more.” Stronger, hungrier, hornier, all the things that came with being the bigger, badder predator, with the bigger appetite.

“Really? So you're all just ... ready to fight or fuck, all the time? And you're all like you? Fit, strong, big dicks?”

“I ... wouldn't be able to tell you, about the dicks thing.”

“Ha.” Her hand continued to stroke him, slowly, gently, more of a caress than anything, and as she did, she set the glass with a fair amount of cum back on the table, and set the extra hand on her own leg. A second later, it was back underneath her thong, and she resumed masturbating as she snuggled into him.

“You ... were going to drink me?”

“Mmhm. But I kind of like this too. I'm really close, and you're still hard.” Strange thing to like, to snuggle in a booth in a club, and masturbate while jerking him off. “Want to enjoy this while I can.”

“ ... I thought you wanted to nurse my wounds?”

“I do.”

“That’ll take longer than a single night.”

“ ... that an invitation to do this again?” She swooned, literally, and turned her head to look up at him again while she continued to both masturbate, and massage his cock. He was still hard.

“We’re sticking around in Dolareido, and ... yeah, I think I could use your company.” He wasn’t so stupid to not see it. He needed company. He needed some socializing, with someone more aware of reality than a human, and less of a pain in the ass than a werewolf.

“Oh, be still my fake beating heart.” At last she stopped stroking him, and herself, and slid out of the booth. “We should go to your place to do this. Kiss might not knock you out like a kine, but it’ll still leave you drained. Probably wouldn’t be comfortable doing that, far from your pack, right?”

A girl inviting herself to his place. First time for everything.

---

She stood in the doorway of his bedroom, leaning against the door frame, and grinned at him. The Kindred was completely nude, and he was right, she was completely hairless below the neck. One of her hands was holding the elbow of the other arm, while the other arm’s hand had found her clitoris again, and she continued to stroke it as she looked at him.

“You really are a horny creature, aren’t you?” he said, as he slipped off his pants. After that, all he had left was his boxers, but he didn’t take them off yet.

“I just jerked off a fucking werewolf in a public club, with my fingers on my clit. Yeah, I’m horny. And you got to cum once, I haven’t, so you don’t get to say anything.” Eventually she came over to his bed, and pressed her hands against his shoulders since he was sitting on the edge of the mattress.

This close, he took his time looking her body up and down. Skinny, almost too skinny, but she had a little meat on her. Her nipples stood out far from her small, perky breasts, pink and swollen against her alabaster skin, and her tongue licked her luscious lips as she looked him up and down.

“You wolves are all muscle, not a touch of softness to you.”

“The women have some soft spots.” But not much.

Giggling, she grabbed his boxers by the bottom hem, and yanked them down to his knees. “Come on, lie down. To do this fantasy right, my wounded soldier, troubled warrior, you’re going to give me a nice, gentle, couple of orgasms. Some gentle licking, some soft fingering, suckle on my clit for a while, k? And then after that, you’re going to pin me down, and fuck me senseless. Real rough stuff. Like, I’m the sweet, gentle thing who opened her arms to you, not realizing how strong and violent you can be. So you’re going to fuck me until I’m a broken mess.”

He raised a brow, and looked left and right. “I am?”

“You don’t want to?”

“I ... I mean, sure. I would like to.” That did sound rather enjoyable.

“Good.” She climbed onto the bed, but also toward him. The only way she got to keep moving was by pushing him onto his back, before she crawled over him, giggling a few more times as she lay on her side on the sheets. “Oh poor me! Opening my sweet, gentle arms to a wounded man, only for my kindness to be repaid in the most rough fucking ever. Alas, how will I ever walk again.”

Too hard to not chuckle as he slid his boxers off the rest of the way, and returned her smirk. She really was a gorgeous woman, and the very short red hair with the blue eyes and red lips was a killer combination. Daeva knew their fashion and sex appeal, and knew it well. Lucky him.

Lucky him? When was the last time he'd ever thought that? Must have been before his first change.

She grabbed one of his pillows, and lay on her back in the middle of his bed with her head on the fluffy cushion. She spread her legs as well, and reached down between her thighs to pull apart her smooth lips to show the tiny slit dripping with juices.

“Eat me,” she said, and her giggles turned into a deeper, huskier sound. Almost a shock coming from her small frame.

He rolled his eyes, chuckled, and lay on his stomach between her legs. It was the most amount he'd laughed in a single night in a long, long time.

But, laughter turned to kissing and suckling, as he set his lips onto the soaked vampire's clitoris.

“Fucking ... finally.” She reached out and set her fingers onto his head. “Make sure to get your fingers in there. Devour that pussy, but keep it slow, gentle; I don't want to cum from my clit, too draining. It's your fingers that need to do the work, and press up against my g-spot a bunch.”

He shouldn't have been surprised, but he was. The girl not only knew her body and knew it well, but she didn't stutter or hesitate to explain exactly what she liked, and how she liked it. And he was more than willing to do exactly what she said.

He set his lips around her clit, and lightly suckled on it, bathing it in long, gentle licks. With most of his weight on his left elbow, his right arm got in closer, and eased two fingers into her, palm up. A couple inches in, he pressed his fingertips up toward her abdomen, while at the same time, his other hand pressed down on her lower abdomen from the outside. The two hands working together squashed her g-spot between them, and as he pressed the two hands toward each other, Tilly let out a loud moan.

The woman had been close to cumming already, he knew that, from the constant smell of arousal she was emitting. But still, he hadn't expected how quickly she'd start cumming once he started to properly finger her, and how wet she'd be when she did. A couple tiny squirts of her juices, barely more than a few drops splashed onto his lips, and he pulled his head away from her clit to watch her clenching muscles force another little splash of the juices onto his palm. A few drops again, tiny little squirts, but squirting nonetheless, and he stared on as the woman's spread legs allowed him to watch her quivering muscles clench on his fingers.

“M ... more.”

He grinned up to her from between his legs, and put his lips back onto her clitoris. She'd just come, so he knew better than to get rough with what had undoubtedly become hyper sensitive little nub of swollen flesh. Her g-spot, on the other hand, was a different story, and he began to press up against it, while his other hand pressed down. Slow, deep presses of his finger thoroughly trapped and squashed the spot of flesh, and each pressing motion caused the redhead to groan openly, no effort made to stop her voice from filling the room. The neighbors were going to hear, his pack mates; probably her goal.

He got faster, pumping his hand upward hard enough to make a small, slapping down, while he refused to let up on pressing down against her lower abdomen, below her navel. It was earning the hardest clenches of her hot, soaked insides, and soon, her loudest noises.

She squeezed on his head with her hands, arched her back, jutting out her breasts, and set her delicious thighs on his shoulders as she started to cum again. He kept his lips on her clit, but ceased suckling and licking, giving the small nub a break, while his fingers against her insides did no such thing. Her smooth pussy clamped down, hard, and another tiny trickle of her juices fell onto his palm, as tremors started to work through the girl's legs. He kept it going, kept pressing up against it, fast, hard, making her ass jiggle and her body bounce lightly, and soon, making her squirt again, forcing more little squirts of her cum onto his palm, just a few drops each time, but each time sending the girl into a quivering mess.

Only once her legs fell off his shoulders, did he stop. She let go of his head, and collapsed on the sheets, sweating a little fake sweat, and forcing herself up onto her elbows so she could smile down at him.

“N-Now, you need to unleash your animal need on me. Don't hold back.” She got onto her hands and knees, and backed herself up toward him a little so she had a couple feet between her head and the wall. Her legs were shaking. “I mean, you can start slow if you want ... in fact, maybe you should, until you can fit nicely. And then pound me.”

This woman, good god. He rolled his eyes, but laughed again — he almost didn't recognize the sound, to laugh so much — and got behind her. Much as she was a skinny little woman, she had a fairly large, firm ass. A dancer's ass. And he rumbled desire as he set his fingers against it.

“Do that rumbling thing in your chest more often. You wolves do that a lot? It's really sexy.”

“We do, when we're happy.”

“Oh so it's purring! Thought you were wolves, not house cats?”

He smirked at her as she looked over her shoulder to smirk at him. But her smirk melted away, and her eyes rolled up as he set the head of his cock against her clenching entrance, and started to push forward. Immediately, Tilly started to groan, and she dug her nails into the blankets as she clenched down on the tip of his cock; he didn't have his glans inside her yet, and she was making it difficult.

He took her by the hips, and began to pull her toward him. With more leverage, he forced his cock into her squeezing cunt, and rumbled again as every inch he pushed into her sent warm pleasure down his length. It wasn't just that she was tight — and she was very tight — but also that she kept squeezing him, making it difficult, resisting him. Maybe that was what she wanted though, to be overpowered, taken, forced. So, with another deep rumble in his chest, he pushed past her resisting, squeezing muscles, and sank her down until his felt the head of his cock hit her depths.

“Oh ... god that's thick ... and ... fucking deep.” Her body quivered, and she grinned over her shoulder at him again. She liked it deep. Good.

He growled at her, and yanked her down the rest of the way, sinking another two inches of his length into her. She let out a loud squeak, and collapsed to her elbows.

“Fuck!” she said, and her head fell down to hang between her shoulders as she quivered. “That's ... really ... deep.”

It was really deep. He'd skewered her, stretched her until her hot, soaked insides were taut around his girth, until he could almost feel her fake breaths with the depth of his penetration. Every motion she made, the way she arched her back with her new position, the quivering and shaking, the wriggling of her legs, he could feel it all.

He gently, slowly slid himself back until only the head of his length remained inside her gripping flesh, before he, again slowly, eased himself balls deep into her tight cunt. The vampire moaned openly, loud enough for his pack mates to hear, loud enough he couldn't help but smirk at the small woman shivering on his cock.

The moans were embellished, but it seemed like she was having fun with it, not that she was bored; she certainly wasn't faking her juices. He gave her a few more test strokes, each always in a gentle and slow motion, pulling out till only his glans remained within, and pushing in until he was stretching her depths inward.

The few women he'd been with very much against going that deep. This girl though, her moans turned into these squealing whimpers when he bottomed out inside her, and kept her there. And, as he felt her pussy stretch around him, she ground her ass against him, trying to fit more of him into her, even though he was already balls deep.

She wanted deep. She liked deep.

He pulled his ass back half of his length, gripped her hips tight, and slammed into her.

"Oh! Oh fuck!" She threw her gaze over her shoulder at him, and offered him begging eyes. "Please, sir, be gentle with me. It's ... my first time, and ... I'm ... so scared."

God damn this girl. He laughed and shook his head, smirking at her. At this rate he'd lose his erection from laughter; couldn't have that. He ground her hips toward him, pinning her ass to his body, and he smiled down at the extreme ratio of her tiny waist against her ass spread against him. And, he slammed into her again.

Tilly gripped the blankets, and let her head hang as she moaned. She knew what she liked, exactly what she liked, and she let out a meek little growl toward the bed as she tried to meet his thrusts with her own. But she wanted to do a little roleplaying, wanted to be taken hard. And, he had a little frustration to work out. He reached out, and pressed down against her back, hard enough to make her squeak and collapse to the sheets. And once she was lying on her chest with her ass up in the air, he took her hips again, and pounded into her, fast.

With her down and unable to support herself, he had to admit, there was a sensation of power, of control. She couldn't stop him, even if she wanted to. Even if she legitimately wanted to. And as he forced her tiny pussy onto his length balls deep, she managed to peek up at him, her head turned to rest her cheek on the pillow. Her mouth was open, and struggling to get out more than the occasional squeak or mewl.

He looked down at where her tiny lips were taut around his cock. When he pulled out, he could see the pink of her insides pull out along with him, almost turning inside out despite the copious amount of her juices coating him. And, as he pushed back into her, slowly this time, he let out a deep rumble at how her pussy squeezed on him. More juices were coming out of her, until they were almost dripping.

The slow stroke gave her a moment to speak

“P-Please ... don't ... hurt me.” Much as she got the voice of a terrified little girl just right, the facial expression was all wrong, betraying her attempts at roleplay. She was practically drooling onto the pillowcase, and her eyes were half closed, struggling to not roll upward with bliss.

He started to pound into her again, with a hard, fast rhythm. Each stroke stretched her inward, as he made sure each sank her down the whole of his length until he felt her ass bounce against his lower abdomen, and he felt his balls slap against her. At first, the harsh thrusts earned some squeaks from her, but after a while he could tell she'd run out of air to make noises. And if she were human, he'd have stopped to give her a moment to breathe, or at least stop tenderizing her insides.

But she was Kindred, and that meant he could get a bit rough with her, by werewolf standards. By human standards, very rough. The bed started to rock, joining her panting noises with its creaking, enough noise to let every neighbors know what was happening. Tilly didn't think it was enough noise though, forced in a breath, and started crying out, moans and mewls, the sort of stuff you heard in porn. He might have thought she was faking it, if it weren't for the way she was soaking him, his testicles wet with her cum and, as he continued to pound into her, eventually his thighs.

When she started to shake, he slammed into her, and again stayed there, holding her balls deep so he could enjoy the feel of her orgasm, of her insides squeezing like a vise. She squirted again, a little trickle of the hot juice hitting his testicles, and then another, each in time with how her muscles clenched. He didn't wait for her to finish. Grip tight on her hips once again, he gently eased himself out of her until only the glans of his cock remained within her soaked, trembling insides, and slammed himself back into her.

He knocked the wind out of her. Shaking like a leaf, she started to collapse sideways, but couldn't, not with his hands locked onto her hips. He pounded into her, each impact causing her ass to jiggle as it met his abdomen and pelvis, each impact causing the girl's last few breaths to come out as squeals, before she again ran out of air. Muscles squeezed, trying to make him stop, trying to force him and his cock to hold still, but he pushed through the clenching tightness to sink himself balls deep into her again, and again, and again. The feel of his testicles slapping her clitoris and smooth folds, of her squirting juices trickling out of her, slowing one moment and gushing the next, was all too damn amazing for him to stop.

Tilly didn't just like being sexual, she really enjoyed sex. There was something terribly arousing about that, about being with a girl who wasn't only using her body to be confident and manipulative, but also because she genuinely loved sex so much, she came her brains out. And as she whimpered into the pillow, body again trying to collapse to the side and away from him, he pounded into her harder as his arousal started to boil over, refusing to give her a break.

Only once he felt the tingling bliss of his juices start to flood upward from the base of his length, did he finally slow down his pace. He thrust into her, hard, enough to make the bed creak again, and make Tilly squeak with what little bits of air she managed to find. He stayed balls deep inside her, and ground her hips toward him, as he enjoyed both the trembling of her clenching, soaked insides, and the heat of his thick cum gushing up his length, and into her cunt.

Again, he slammed into her, no longer jack hammering her, but each stroke pulling out to the tip, only to bury himself to the hilt inside her and stay there for a second, to enjoy the feel of his cum pouring into her, and coating his length. The third stroke forced a louder moan from Tilly, and her legs shook as her insides convulsed, random spasms gripping on him, squeezing, milking his cum out of her. Poor girl squirted again, harder this time, a few tiny trickles of her cum splashing against his testicles, coating them, before both hers and his cum started to leak out of her folds.

He stayed there, inside her, and took a deep breath as he focused on the pleasure, and on the beautiful sight of the terribly gorgeous woman cumming on his cock. She was breathing again, and managed to force herself back onto her elbows, despite her trembling, trembles he could feel as her insides clenched on him.

“S ... see you ... in a couple d-days?” she managed to say, offering a grin at him over her shoulder, despite her wavering.

“You want to see me again?”

“G-God yes.”

Like a match to gasoline, she lit the fire inside him again. Arousal, hunger, desire, in the woman’s eyes, in her words, while she was in the middle of orgasm aftershocks? Nothing, there was absolutely nothing hotter in the whole damn world.

He leaned forward, and set his weight down onto her, until she had no choice but to collapse onto her stomach on the bed. He grabbed a pillow too, and forced it under her hips, between her and the bed.

“W-Wait, you can’t—nng!” She squealed, music to his ears, as he started to pound into her again.

It only took moments before she was cumming again. She gripped on the blankets, tried to pull herself away, to get away from him, even as she whimpered into the pillow, and squeezed on his cock. She managed to turn her head, cheek to the pillow, and look up at him with begging eyes. The poor woman needed a break.

He didn’t give her one.

Pinning the small vampire into the blankets, he growled into her ear, rumbled deep in his chest, and earned a quiet whimper from the redhead. She still kept trying to escape him, fingers plucking at the blankets with all the strength of a kitten. And as he slammed his body down onto hers, she squirted onto him for hundredth time, tiny little squirts of hot fluid that soaked his testicles, and mixed with his own cum as it leaked out of her, onto the pillow beneath her pelvis.

It took another five minutes of constant pounding to finally reach a third orgasm, and through it all, he’d grunted and growled down at the small creature underneath him. She hadn’t stopped cumming. Were she human, he’d be worried she’d dehydrate, or be thoroughly bruised, but she was Kindred, and he let himself go as he fucked the beautiful little vixen until she went limp underneath him, no longer trying to escape. Now, she simply lay there, and quivered as her clenching insides trembled on his cock, and milked him of his cum.

“You ok?” he said.

“Y ... Yeah ... I did say ... fuck me until ... I was a broken mess, right? M-Maybe ... um ... a little gentler? ... next time?”

Next time. She said next time. Maybe Dolareido wouldn't be so bad.

Chapter 41

~~Jack~~

“You think I can have a mansion?”

Julias shook his head and smirked down at him. “Think you can afford one?”

“No, but, I have connections. You, for example.”

“I can’t afford a mansion either, Jack, not in a dense city anyway. You think I’m a billionaire? I inherited this one.”

Hard to believe Julias couldn’t afford a mansion, but then owning such a massive house and paying for the help to keep it in good condition must have had a deceptively large cost. Kindred in the Invictus had a way of getting around costs, but it only took them so far. Owning a mansion in a dense city probably was absurdly expensive.

They opened the enormous front door, and stepped into the grand lobby. It’d been a while since Jack had visited Julias in his home, and something was definitely different. So different it made Jack freeze for a second as he computed what he was staring at.

There were people walking around. New people.

“Um ... figured your help would be working during the day?”

“I do still have people who work on the house and yard during the day, but these are also here to work during the night.” His sire motioned to a couple of women who were walking around with smartphones and wearing earpieces, and a man who had a broom, also wearing an earpiece. And when they saw Julias, a bright smile appeared on their faces. The men offered warm salutes, and the women offered warmer smiles, the sort of smiles Jack was used to seeing on Ashley and Julee's face when they were with Antoinette.

“Ghouls?”

“No. Thralls. I have bound these people to be my servants with the discipline of dominate, and a drop of my blood. The combination makes for ardent, loyal servants. And so it is for my servants during the day, as well.”

Jack whistled. A couple more people went by as well, a man and woman, and they both gave Julias a bow when he came by, before they moved on. The woman looked over her shoulder as Jack and Julias moved down the hall, and Jack managed to catch her licking her lips as she watched the taller Kindred.

“That all they do?”

“Ha, no. Beatrice does like to be pampered, in and out of bed.”

Ah, to be pampered by your food. Such was the unusual luxury of being a Kindred. Even a Nosferatu could be pampered if they spent the time to get humans to taste their blood. Frequently drinking a Kindred's blood, and the Kindred focusing their will upon the drinker's body to transform them, was how to make a servant into a ghoul. But a few tastes of the vampire's blood was enough to turn kine into thralls, servants. It was much easier to convince a person to drink your blood if they were brainwashed with dominate or majesty though.

Part of Jack felt guilty about it; a bigger part told him it was normal, and correct. He was Kindred, not human, and in the food chain the Kindred were the bigger predator. Course, that made him wonder if he'd feel the same if a Kindred killed his mother by drinking her to death, or turning her into a thrall. He doubted he'd hold his view unchanged.

“Must be a pleasant change for her,” he said. “She’s told me about her life as a Nosferatu, and how shitty it was. Hanging out in the tunnels till she could use her cloak of night, then hanging out in graveyards and the catacombs cause ... well, apparently Nosferatu just like to do that. More or less alone for a good while till she got in with the Carthians, and even then, never a thrall or ghoul to feed on or keep her company.”

“Indeed.”

“Bet you love spoiling her.” Cause the situation was at least a little similar to him and Antoinette, and Antoinette apparently loved to spoil the absolute shit out of him.

“I do. But we’re not here to talk about women.”

“You sure?” Jack said, snickering. Until Julias gave him a good punch to the shoulder.

“We’re here to pick what you’re going to wear to the ball.”

“Ah, right, that. Antoinette figured you’d want to pick my clothes for me. Said stuff about the unusual nature of the ball, half formal, half casual, but a middle ground wouldn’t do?”

“Leave it to a Daeva to know fashion.” Julias opened one of the many doors in his absurd, expensive, fancy hallway, and brought him into a changing room. Not too dissimilar to the changing room him and Antoinette had just been fucking in a couple nights ago.

“Oh, that reminds me. Antoinette told me about what she was going to be wearing, and daaaaamn. Not sure if I’m going to be able to keep my eyes off of her. How will anyone, with the amount of skin she’s going to expose?”

But his sire just shrugged and pulled open a closet door to expose the deep, dark cave of suits within. “Most people are terrified of her, like you used to be. That's normally enough to dissuade too much staring. That said, I'm sure she'll enjoy a little staring. A lot from you, probably."

"Makes me wonder what the other women are going to wear."

"Like the Prince told you, it's a strange mix of formal and casual, but not a middle ground. You need to wear something that's both very powerful, but without the rigidity of a typical suit. With this sort of dress code, it's actually a bit easier for women; wear something that looks fancy but exposes more skin than usual."

Jack laughed and ran the images through his mind. He loved it when Antoinette exposed skin, wore things that highlighted her curves. God, the memory of her in a corset already—

"Jack, focus."

"Right, right. So, what's the plan?"

"A lot of the men and women will wear clothes that partly reflect the era they were sired. Such is the custom for balls, as you probably picked up on that first Invictus ball you went to."

Jack nodded. He remembered the strange mixture of old and new, expensive suits tailored to look a hundred years old, despite being new. Women wore frilly, fancy dresses, but a lot of them had sported some plunging cleavage, give or take depending on the vampire. Maria's clothes had exposed no skin, but that was understandable.

"What era am I from then?"

"The combination of money and technology. The dawn of cyberpunk."

"... wow that's depressing."

Julias laughed, shrugged, and returned from the suit cave with something in his arms. A suit, the color of silver. And not just silver as in gray, but a bit shiny with hints of black undertones. Silver silver.

“Strange color.”

“It fits your background and era. Come here, let’s get to work.”

And to work they went. Julias called in a man and a woman servant, and the two of them helped Jack try on different sizes of each piece of clothing, and what didn’t fit would get adjusted later until it would.

Black shoes of course, cause some things never changed, but the pants were indeed the sort of silver you’d find on a chain, or at least a fabric version of it. The suit came with a couple chains too, to connect a button to a pocket inside the suit jacket. The shirt underneath was white, and the tie black, but the tie also had some silver embellishment, designs that meant nothing but screamed ‘money’. The black buttons against the silver vest, the silver pin of the Xnomina symbol on the right lapel, the dangling bit of chain underneath the vest that held a small silver skull, it all screamed the modern age, technology, and money. But at the same time, the chains, the silver designs on the black tie, the color contrasts, it all had a certain pomposity, magniloquence, that screamed Ventrue, without being the dry, deadly suits Ventrue typically wore.

He kind of liked it.

“Look like I’m going to a very, very, very expensive party, with billionaires, and millionaire escort girls. And lots of cocaine.”

“That is more or less the feeling we’re going for. At the same time, the Carthians and, if they decide to come, the Circle will probably wear clothes not nearly as fancy. And that’s fine. Different strokes. This ball is about celebrating the peace in the city.”

“So ... jeans?”

Julias laughed. He was sitting on the nearby couch, tablet in his hand and scanning across what Jack guessed was Xnomina contracts. “I doubt they’ll come in jeans, but they’ll definitely wear something they like the look of. They generally don’t like suits, so don’t expect suits. You remember what Jennifer wore at the Prince’s ball.”

Ah, yeah. Damn that girl had looked stunning, gorgeous even, and terribly sexy in that skimpy little dress that barely covered her ... anything. And she’d worn it in front of all those Kindred, with no shits given. Out of shits to give, and she wasn’t much older than he was.

“So there’s going to be a lot of exposed skin?”

“No doubt. A lot of them will wear clothing that reveals their chests and stomachs, I’m sure, especially from the Carthians. The women will show off their cleavage, their legs, and those in the Circle will probably wear clothing that will expose near everything from certain angles.” He shrugged and swiped his fingers across the screen. “Neonates should be a little more conservative when exposing skin, but Jennifer, and a few cocky neonates in the Carthians and Invictus will gladly show off their curves and muscles. Dress shirts undone to the stomach, for example. Some of the women will have their breasts exposed entirely, I’m sure, if the dress calls for it.”

Fashion fashion fashion. It was sucking him in more and more every night, and as he looked at the fancy suit in the mirror — shoulders didn’t fit quite right yet — he smiled at how it looked both absurd, and perfect.

“Mr. Mire.” One of the thralls spoke up, the man, with his fingers to his ear to hold the earpiece in deeper. “Beatrice is at the front door.”

“Excellent.” Mire stood up, and pat Jack on the shoulder. “You can change back now. I want you to do some more digging into Barry’s death. Much as it’s easy to not care about Barry dying, turn a blind eye — and a lot of people are — I know there’s more going on here than it would appear.”

“Got it. Barry’s death.”

“Pay a visit to Madam Vendram as well. She says she has some information to share with whoever is investigating the fire.”

“Ah man.” This was going to suck. Madam Vendram was a Gangrel, and while that wasn’t really an issue, it was just that Vendram embodied a lot of the stereotypes of a Gangrel; almost like it was her personal mission to be a stereotype. “She still nest at the old theater?”

“Correct.” Mire got up, offered him a small wave, and disappeared down the hall. He could have gotten one of his servants to bring Beatrice here, but Julias probably wanted to go to her instead, get her himself. Cause he really liked her, and wouldn’t want her to be brought to him by a servant.

Jack really had to figure out something for Antoinette. Try as he might, he couldn’t find a way to surprise her or delight her with those classic romance approaches. He was sure a flower or similar would be met with laughter; not condescending laughter, but the Prince would find his attempts at romance adorable, not romantic.

He could ask her to dance? Julias was teaching him some basics, but it didn’t fix the size issue. Even if the Prince led, she was a foot taller than him at least, and that was without heels. Dancing would be difficult, and he could barely dance as it was.

She liked words. The Prince liked intelligence, wisdom, and introspective reflection. Maybe something in that department? Poetry? The fuck did he know about poetry though?

He sighed, and headed out the back door of the mansion. No need to disturb Julias and Beatrice, and what was likely going to be a sexual encounter if he knew Beatrice at all.

---

His drive took him to the other side of South Side, and into a section where old buildings still entertained people. Movie theaters that were old but still standing, same for bars, and more than a few convenience stores, liquor stores, and local restaurants. A weird mishmash of old and not so old.

The old theater was straight out of Phantom of the Opera. Course the building was at least a hundred years old, so rather than being inspired by the play, they just had the same inspiration: Paris. Just one of those places in the city where the elders let their age show through and controlled some of the building construction.

He got out of the car, waved the driver off, and stood before the royal theater. A few floors tall, with dozens of windows lining each floor against the white stone of the walls. Large doors of black wood with no windows on the bottom floor made for an imposing but impressive entryway, and Jack let out a long sigh as he pushed open the door. He'd never talked with Madam Vendram, but every time he ever ran into the woman at the Xnomina headquarters, he found the woman being aggressive with other Kindred. She liked to shove, yell, growl. Jessy was the same way, but Vendram had a certain harshness about it that set Jack on edge.

“Sir.” An usherette walked up to him and shook her head, hands together in front of her. “I’m sorry sir but an evening rehearsal is in session.”

Jack nodded, and glanced around at the lobby. Red, white, and gold was the motif, with the white stones serving as the walls, the pillars, gold braziers — light bulbs, not fire — and gold chandeliers, along with red carpet and drapes. Beautiful, if very old. The gold was losing its shine, the carpet and drapes their luster, and the white stone that must have once shone beautifully, was turning gray. The floors above had railings of white stone, with red drapes of triangular shape hanging from them, edges frayed.

The usherette looked him up and down for a second, and he returned her gaze in return. But when her eyes found his, she froze.

“You want to let me in.”

“I ... want to let you in.”

“And you don’t want to tell anyone I’m here.”

“I won’t tell anyone you’re here.”

Jack smirked at the usherette, and walked past. And she ignored him, as if he wasn’t there. God damn it felt good to be Ventrue.

He took the stairway along the sides, and let his hand run along the railing. Dolareido did have some really nice, fancy buildings. The Lamanar Theatre was no Black Hall, but still, it was damn nice despite its age, and he found himself smiling as he admired the chandeliers on his journey up the stairs to the second floor, and then again to the third. There must have—ah, a side door, that would inevitably lead to the rafters over the theater. And would probably stay locked at all times.

He wasn’t sneaking in though, he was here on official business. And in this strange, modern era of smartphones, he’d already texted Madam Vendram that he was coming. Lo and behold, the door was unlocked, and he opened it to step out onto the darkness of the rafters.

Rafters wasn’t really what they were. It looked to be a fourth balcony really, with a guard railing and such, with just enough head space for someone to walk along without their heads hitting the roof. It was above the lights, guarded by a curtain to keep it hidden from the audience, and it eventually led out to connect to the catwalks over the stage; again, all hidden by curtains. Just being up here made Jack want to act like some sort of Daeva, overdramatic, excessively romantic, read poetry with absurd inflections, and him in ridiculous poses.

Maybe it was the big curtains? They did get one into the theater play mood.

He looked down over the edge and took a deep breath. Course the breath did nothing to settle his still heart; it was the beast in his gut warning him about how nasty it'd be to land on seats from this high up, not his organs. Not nasty enough to be life threatening to a Kindred, but it might break an ankle. So, he swallowed his silly fears from a life nearly a year gone now, and smiled down at the seats. Not even as far of a drop compared to the one he did onto the Azlu's back.

Cocky, Jack. You're getting cocky. Always remember how easy it is for a Ventrue to fall to hubris. Always remember that the spider monster only had to step aside a single foot to completely ruin that plan.

He sighed, swallowed down his pride, and continued along the upper balcony. There were some people talking below, chatting and whispering, analyzing the performance. And as Jack grew closer, he started to pick up on the verses of a few of the actors on stage.

Macbeth. Because of course it was.

As the balcony opened up onto the catwalk, he realized the catwalk itself was sort of blocked off and hidden from everyone else. It didn't seem like it connected to the catwalks over the stage, but instead went over top them against the roof where the light couldn't penetrate the curtains or dense metal mesh under his feet. But he could see the people below, down where the light was, and he smirked as he leaned his elbows against the railing and listened to the ever so famous ‘Out Damned Spot’ scene.

Finding Hella Vendram wouldn’t be easy. Looking for her at all was probably a mistake. If anything, she could see him already, and was waiting to see what he’d do, what he’d say to the dark, what sort of gestures he might make.

So he stood there and watched, and listened. The woman would show herself eventually, and in the mean time, he could try and enjoy some Shakespeare. And he hated Shakespeare. Something about how the words were said, the language, the rhythm, it was like listening to a different language. Took time and practice to learn to speak a language, and he’d done it a few times in high school when necessary, but ultimately understanding Shakespeare dialogue slipped away the moment he stopped listening to it regularly.

But then you didn’t need to know it fluently to appreciate how an actor portrayed it, and the woman playing Lady Macbeth was putting her heart and soul into her performance. Heart wrenching, even if Jack found the overall plot and character motivations ridiculous. Fate and self fulfilling prophecies were gimmicks used by hack writers, and just because the play was old didn’t mean—

“Hello.”

Jack jumped. Literally jumped. He landed stumbling back, hand reaching out to flail and grab at a railing before he half fell onto his ass and back.

“Jesus!”

“Shhh.” Isabella Laeuvion. Daeva. From the strange tingling sensation Jack felt in his gut, he could tell she was using her cloak of night to hide them, and prevent his noise from attracting attention. Odd for a Daeva to be using that discipline, normally used by Nosferatu and Mekhet, but it probably came with the territory of hanging out in a royal theater.

Wait. “Isabella? Er, Madam Leauvion? Why are you here? Thought this was Madam Vendram’s home,” he said. Isabella didn’t help him up. Wouldn’t really be fitting for someone of her age, a good seventy years embraced.

As per the stereotypical Daeva, Isabella was gorgeous. She had long blond hair, dirty blond, braided into a dozen ponytails of intricate design, coiling backward over her scalp. Looked like a queen, a legit queen; only thing missing was a crown. She had a hard face, a sharp jaw, and Jack couldn’t help but picture her giving orders from a throne, maybe one made of swords. Blue eyes too, bright blue, piercing, like sharp ice.

She was wearing a see-through cloak of black, something that hung over her shoulders and down to cover her breasts, but the front half came to a stop at the underside of the breast, while the fabric behind her continued down to her feet. Underneath the cloak and its fancy hem covered in spiraling black lines, she was wearing a black corset that covered her large breasts, and connected to a black skirt that went down to the floor along with the cloak. Of course, with the cloak being see-through, he could see the corset gave her an insane amount of cleavage, creating an interesting juxtaposition against the coldness of her face. Inspired by Antoinette, perhaps?

“Master Terry, you look upon them with both interest and scorn on your face.”

“Eh?”

“The actors.” She gestured down to the people below. Their rehearsal continued unaffected, thankfully. Be terribly embarrassing if Jack drew their attention and ruined his meeting with his clumsiness.

“Sorry! Sorry, just ... never really cared for Shakespeare. So, I mean, they seem like good actors, but—”

“But the medium destroys the joy in appreciation. I understand.” She nodded, and started walking past him before moving onto different sections of the hidden catwalk. Each step exposed a touch of her heel, and Jack saw what must have been some sort of soft shoe. It made no noise when stepping on the metal.

“Um, I—”

“You are here to see Madam Vendram. Come with me.”

“Yes ma’am.” He fell in line beside and behind her, and stared ahead. She was a beautiful woman, but he was getting a vibe from her that made it pretty blatant that staring at her curves was dangerous. And he could use some practice not letting his eyes wander away from him; already walking dangerous ground with the whole Clara incident.

She brought them to a part of the wall where the catwalk connected. Back here, there were no ropes or platforms, just metal catwalk; all the ropes and platforms were beneath on the catwalks used by the crew. It meant there was little place to go, and he had to wonder what her plan was, until she reached out for one of the circular wooden notches that decorated the walls. She pressed on an indentation six times, in a specific beat, before lowering her hand.

A small chunk of wood slid aside, just a square panel of the many, two feet wide and tall. All the panels, all the notches looked identical, and with this section of the catwalk walking parallel to the wall, there was no chance anyone would stumble onto the secret. And she’d probably change the pattern required to get it to open once he was gone. He didn’t mind though, that was just Kindred being Kindred.

He crouched down, and followed after her into the darkness. Half expected to be stuck crawling on his knees for a while, but the other side of the wall held a tall passage, and once Isabella grabbed a candle from the wall and lit it, the darkness was gone. He grimaced at the sight of the fire flickering on the wax, and considered bringing out his smartphone to help light the tunnel. But the Daeva would have probably taken offense to such a light source; she bled old fashioned tastes.

They continued their descent down the hidden path, down stairs of old wood that creaked, until they came upon a large room with dangling bulbs lighting the dull wood that surrounded them. Old, worn, just a big circular room that had many doors, just like the one he closed behind him as he followed the ancilla. A bunch of passages that all connected to the building above, no doubt.

He followed her through another door, as innocent looking as the others. As they walked through the endless tunnels, he had to wonder why Isabella wasn't one of the Invictus right hands. She was older than Jessy or Natasha, and so were a couple other Kindred in the Invictus. None of them were given the same responsibility as those two and Julias when he was still a right hand. Maybe she simply wasn't as powerful, or as driven, or as smart as them? Or maybe she just knew how to avoid getting saddled with those responsibilities.

He kept his mouth shut though. She was more than strong enough to tear him in half, and he could feel it; beast in his gut knew better than to poke the bear. So he stayed behind her, and kept his eyes on the darkness ahead of them.

“Forgive my silence,” she said, “but, I am not sure of which we could speak.”

“No apology necessary, Madam Laeuvion.”

“But there is, for someone as important as Master Terry enters my theater. Proper respect must be paid.” Her voice carried a hint of sarcasm, just a touch, a perfect level of passive aggressiveness he couldn’t call her out on. But when she looked over her shoulder at him, he stopped. A touch of fear in her eyes, maybe?

“You mean because of Mister Mire, and the Prince.”

“Of course.”

The opportunity to exploit his position and his contacts, handed to him on a silver platter. A simple sentence, something like: ‘yeah, my boss and my girlfriend run this city’, and the woman would find herself forced to treat him with undeserved respect.

“Don’t be, Madam Laeuvion. If either my sire or my love learned I was abusing my relationship with them, they’d punish me. So, please, treat me as I am.” Ugh, sometimes he wished he was more of a weasel.

What little trace of fear or apprehension she carried vanished, and a sly smile replaced it.

“Wonderful.”

Wonderful. Yeap, he just made things harder on himself; maybe for the immediate at least. But his respect should pay off in the long run. Hopefully.

The tunnel began to open again, and as they moved through the black, one wall fell away to expose a black chasm to the side. The wooden beams were replaced with stone ones, each ornate and decorated with swirling designs. The walls of the building faded away until there was only the cave rock of their path. The pathway became smooth, and worn, like rocks that had been walked on for decades. Centuries. And the path continued downward, in a spiral.

He realized, looking over the edge into the black abyss below in the center of the spiral, that he was staring into a hole.

“H ... How deep is that?”

“We’ve a few hundred feet to go yet. I’m sure you’d survive, Kindred as you are, but many bones would be broken; unless you happened to land neatly upon the pile of bones at the bottom.”

That was the smell. He thought he smelled stone, and water, and he was sure he did, but he also smelled something that bit at his nose. Death.

And sure enough, as they continued down the spiraling stairway, the light of Isabella’s candle exposed the water sitting at the base of the pit. It was shallow, with a couple of holes in the dark leading into what must have been underground currents. In the shallow pool, he could see at least twenty skeletons, with clothes rotted and faded with an eternity of cold water on their bodies.

“What happened to them?” he said, gesturing to the dead in the water.

“No offense to your darling, but the Prince often prefers to avoid mention of the seasons of violence Dolareido has gone through. Madam Vendram’s sire spent many years creating this cave, after she discovered the underground river. When some of the villagers at the time discovered her master’s actions, and realized she was Kindred, Vendram’s sire had no choice.”

Butchering a bunch of kine just to keep their vampire world a secret. He shivered as he considered the possibility. Dealing with the evidence of his frenzy fuck up with Mrs. Pavala had been horrible. Dealing with a whole group of people would have been life destroying.

He looked up. The light from Isabella could not light the abyss above them now, but it was enough to shimmer on the water, and light where the stairway connected to the floor, and where the turn of the cave ahead glimmered with some more candlelight. Part of him figured he should have expected something as insane as a colossal, deep, enormous cave with a stairway and a bunch of bodies at the bottom, all hidden underneath a play theater. He was used to such madness, just like Antoinette's gigantic Elysium tower that had a basement almost as large as the tower itself. But, he was still shocked, and his jaw dropped as he looked up into the black, then at the pool of skeletons, and then to Isabella.

"Is there any way out of here except that tunnel above?"

"Yes, there is." She nodded, turned, and continued down the path around the turning cave wall. Should have figured she wouldn't tell him about any other ways into this secret base. Smart. And Kindred could use the underground river, if they were willing to swim it and knew where the entrance to it was, he was sure. Good to know.

He followed her, only to be stopped by a large gate. Thick, metal bars with almost no space between them, and varying spikes designed to tear flesh stuck out from the bars. The bars cut deep into the rock as far as Jack could tell, and several broad bars of metal crossed the gate horizontally, locked in by some equally massive locks.

"And I suppose this blocks off where you sleep?"

"Indeed."

"And I suppose you have at least a couple secret exits from the den as well?"

"Aren't you a smart little Ventrue." The Daeva smirked at him, and knocked on the bars, like knocking on a door. "While Mister Mire knows much about the ongoings of the Invictus, and indeed much of who is where in the city as a whole, all Kindred develop a need for their own secrets.” Stirring drew Jack’s eyes through the bars, and he glanced between the beautiful vixen and the oncoming body beyond the gate. Isabella made another knock, as if emphasizing her points. “Try it. You’ll live longer.”

“I would have to agree, except I think my young age makes me unworthy of killing.”

The body on the other side of the metal gate snorted, shook her head, and knocked on the bars. “If that was true, then Barry would be alive.” Hard to see her through the bars, with how little space there was, but Jack could see some motion. The hard, heavy clank of metal hitting metal did a better job of telling him she was moving the bars blocking their path. And after a few seconds longer than he figured you’d need to unlock a gate, Hella Vendram pulled the metal barrier aside like opening a giant door, complete with creaking metal against rock.

Hella was an attractive woman, but not in the same way as Isabella. The Daeva had an iciness to her face and frailty to her body common to city girls that he was used to, while Hella looked like an athlete from Brazil. Lightly tanned skin and dark eyes complimented a slightly tall, fit body, and where Isabella wore plenty of make up, Hella seemed far more comfortable wearing only a little. Handsome was a good word for her, especially with how she had a portion of the side of her head buzzed, while the other two thirds of her head sported shoulder-length brown hair that flowed in waves.

She sort of reminded him of Garry, and it wasn’t just the Gangrel thing. Both were very fit, with some sizable curves to both their legs and their shoulders. It was also the way she looked at him, grinned in a subtle way, knew she was both handsome and gorgeous. There were a fair amount of scars on her skin, cutting into her chin, one along her cheek, and another along her eyebrow. Made her look dangerous.

That's what the similarity was, that he saw in her, Garry, Michael, and Jessy too. They knew they were dangerous, volatile, and they were proud of it. Fucking Gangrels, probably thinking that their dangerous side made them sexy as fuck. He wouldn't tell Hella that he did think it was kind of sexy on her, and Jessy. Didn't need any more trouble in that area on his lap. At least Hella wore something a little easier for him to not stare at, some simple jeans and a black shirt, that probably hid a rock hard stomach and some nice arms at that.

All the women in the Invictus generally wore some type of suit at work. He'd never really imagined them wearing anything else, for some reason. Guess it was time to start paying attention, if he was going to be visiting other Kindred in their homes.

Isabella stepped into the cave, and he followed in after her. Once they were past the gate, Hella closed it behind them, again with the loud clanks and clunks that made Jack turn around to look. Yeah, giant bars. No one was getting in here without a blowtorch and a lot of time.

He doubted Hella was the one pushing for using candles instead of proper modern light. And as an array of candles became visible, the fashionable display sealed the deal; Isabella was their decorator. Which made sense, if Isabella had taken the nest for her own instead of Hella. A hundred candles, burning, dripping wax, all hung from sconces along the cave walls, black sconces that had gargoyle-shape bodies. The little gargoyles had their hands raised, mouths open, with evil grins and eviler eyes staring at him as he walked by.

The cave opened up into a grand room with an unhealthy candle obsession. Candlesticks, sconces, candles candles candles on various curves of the cave. And it was a cave, a legit huge cave with dips and valleys and hard arches. Much of it was decorated with silk drapes, mostly white, and there were several fancy, old-fashioned beds placed around, with half a dozen other Kindred sitting on them.

Wait, what? He raised a brow and looked to the other vampires enjoying Isabella Leauvion's den, enjoying the candles, enjoying the quiet stirring of water from somewhere Jack couldn't see, enjoying the pampering of what Jack guessed were a few ghouls. And everyone was wearing clothes fitting Isabella's obvious preference for theater clothing from a hundred years ago. The fancy dresses with frilly corsets, the suits with pocket watches on chains, derby hats, and vests under the suit jackets done up to the sternum to hide their ties. If he didn't know any better, he'd assume he was on the Titanic, and tonight was going to end very badly.

He recognized them all; part of his training was knowing the face of every Kindred. And he could always remember a face. Remembering a name, on the other hand, was borderline impossible, but he remembered enough to know the other Kindred were neonates, ages two to twenty.

"I'm confused," he said. "Thought I was here to talk to Madam Vendram, in private?"

Hella Vendram shrugged, and sat down on the foot of one of the fancy beds. She gestured to the other Kindred, some of them reading, some of them kissing in overly dramatic, romantic fashion, and she gestured to the couple ghouls walking around also wearing the Edwardian clothing. Seemed to be their responsibility to keep the rather prop-like decor cleaned and well lit.

"Barry was one of us," Hella said, "and we all want to know what you know."

He folded his arms across his chest, and glanced between everyone. All Kindred alive were older than him, but age didn't wholly dictate rank in the Invictus, and the only Kindred in the room who outranked him were Hella and Isabella. He didn't like sharing information with his peers when they didn't need to know.

“One of you?” he said.

Isabella nodded, and walked over to the bed to sit down beside Hella. “While we are all Invictus, I do have my own little group of like-minded individuals.” And like Hella, she gestured to the group, but she also gestured to the candles, the cave walls, and more. The Gothic paintings, the candelabra, and what looked like room dividers made of some sort of fancy dark fabric he couldn't guess.

Isabella was over seventy years embraced, and considering how old she looked, she must have been about thirty when embraced. Trying to drown herself in the era of which she was born as a human then. He could understand that, to an extent. The other Kindred though? Seemed like posers, except for Hella who didn't seem interested in the fashion statement. What was her deal then?

Hella climbed up onto the bed, sat behind Isabella, and kissed the woman on the back of the neck. Oh, well then, that explained their connection.

He looked around, found a stool, sat down, and pulled out his smartphone. “Alright then, tell me what you know about Barry.”

---

---

~~Julias~~

Beatrice would probably be pacing around in the main lobby, maybe kicking her feet out a little with each step. Not the most patient person, especially when she was happy and excited; which she usually was, when visiting him. And he was too. He smiled to no one as he moved down the hall and appeared at the top of the stairway.

But Beatrice was not pacing. The Nosferatu was sitting on one of the fancy couches in the lobby, and she had her head hanging, elbows on her knees, hands together. Looked like someone had tied a rock around her neck, back hunched and body still. Not his usual Beatrice, not at all.

He came down the stairs, and sat beside her. For a moment he was going to hug her with one arm, put it around her shoulders and hold her, but he needed to test the waters first.

“What’s wrong?”

“ ... don’t suppose I could say ‘nothing’ or ‘I’m fine’, right?”

“You could. I wouldn’t believe you, but if you don’t want to talk about it, that’s fine too.”

She sighed, nodded, and pushed herself closer to him across the couch. He raised his arm, let her snuggle into his chest, and set his arm around her so it draped over her side. And like lock and key, she reciprocated, and hooked her arm around behind his back and waist.

“Maybe later. For now, I just want to ... not ... yeah, later. Got anyone I could suck on? I could use a meal. Christ I’m drained. Starving.”

She looked drained too. Poor girl must have done something to be so tired, and her skin was sunken in slightly the way vamp skin did when starving, even more pale than usual. On the edge of frenzy? Probably not, but she did look like she needed a meal.

“Let’s go out on a hunt then. We can—”

“No. I ... want to stay in.” Meekness in her voice struck a chord, and she nudged her nose into the side of his chest. “And just ... I ... I dunno, let’s not have any kine guests in our bed tonight.”

“Oh? I thought—”

“Hey, I love the pampering. Love it when you got a few of them brainwashed and just rubbing me all down while we fuck, while we drink em. Love it love it love it,” she said. One too many ‘love its’ in there for him to quite believe it, or at least, for him to think she meant only that. Something else was on her mind. “Tonight I just want to relax in bed, just you and me ... and ... cuddle and stuff.”

Something was definitely up. And much as he knew he shouldn't, he wanted to ask her, pry it out of her. Really, really wanted to, like he would have with his wife. Different time, different man.

“Whatever you want.” He squeezed her close, leaned down to kiss her head, and raised his other hand. With a finger snap and a few seconds to wait, one of his thralls came out of the hall to join them. “Jackson, you need to be anywhere tomorrow?”

“No sir.” A thicker man, a bit of chub on him but not enough to mark him overweight, came and stood beside them. Julias liked to keep his help wearing a tuxedo shirt and a bow tie, but casual forms thereof. A nice balance of presentable but relaxing.

“Good. Come sit and let Beatrice feed.”

The man nodded, and tried to contain his smile. Not good enough though, and Julias smirked at the man as Jackson came over to stand beside Beatrice. The Kiss felt good, and while it left you drained the next day or so, his thralls, nor any kine really minded.

“Thank god.” Beatrice got up, and waited for the man to get in position. She got behind him, set her claws on his stomach and chest from behind, and dug in.

Julias watched, and tilted his head to the side. She wasn't making a show of it, or enjoying or savoring it. She was just draining him. At least Jackson looked like he was enjoying it, pleasurable as the Kiss was, but Beatrice looked distracted. In the past she'd tease Julius, play with the meal a bit, draw it out, get the kine super aroused before they succumbed to exhaustion. Not to make him jealous, but to get him very interested in having his turn next. But she wasn't doing any of that tonight.

A Kiss was a pleasing sensation, when the Kindred focused on it. If they were doing it on a more violent, aggressive hunt, it was no longer a sexual sensation, but a satisfying one of a hunt complete, a filling one of a full stomach. And that was the sort of look Beatrice was giving off. Like she was on a hunt, like she was just getting blood into her before she starved. A lot closer to frenzying than he realized.

As Jackson began to collapse, she set him down on the couch. Julius got up as well to make room, and pull the man's legs up onto the couch where he could sleep off the exhaustion. His other thralls would be around sooner or later to move Jackson somewhere better. Beatrice stepped back, raised her arms, and stretched herself out, as if she'd recovered from a serious beating. Hint number two.

"You've been getting more thralls lately. Any ghouls yet?" she said.

"No. Takes a lot more to keep a ghoul than thralls, and ... a connection. Haven't made a connection like that with any kine."

"Me neither." With some color to her — a fresh meal did get the blush of life going — Beatrice came over to him, slipped her hand about his waist again, and guided him back onto the main stairway of the lobby. "Sorry I'm not telling you what's up. Personal stuff, nothing to do with you, or me and you, or anything like that."

He nodded, and made affirming noises. No need to talk; seemed like she just needed someone to listen. She guided them up the stairway, and toward his master bedroom, where the bed was massive and the walls were decorated with luxurious paintings.

Several enormous rugs, armoires, and mirrors, much of which Beatrice herself had moved in or out from other rooms.

Beatrice kicked off her boots and socks, slid off her pants so only her black thong and white tank top remained, and slipped under the covers.

“Always with the thongs,” he said.

“Yeah. Didn’t used to be like that, but then you and I started dating and I realized I had to be on guard for sex at all times.”

He rolled his eyes, kicked off his own shoes, and walked over to the bed edge nearest her. “You think I care if you wear a thong?”

“I care! I like looking good, ok? I got a great ass, and I like to show it off.” She reached out with her claws to find the bottom of his shirt, and tugged on it, pulling it out of his pants and yanking him closer to the bed and her. “Twenty years, Julias. Twenty fucking years of being a moron and thinking everyone thought I was ugly cause of the teeth and claws and snake eyes. No idea other Kindred didn’t think like that.”

“Yeah, that was quite stupid,” he said. But instead of a laugh, she yanked on his shirt harder, till he had no choice but to fall to his knees beside the bed. There was a smile there, on her lips, between the massive crocodile teeth; girl was trying not to laugh.

“Come on, get in here and cuddle with me. I’ve had a very, very rough night, and now I’ve got a full belly and am in desperate need of kisses.”

“Yes ma’am.” He slid out of his jacket, undid his tie, undid his shirt and slid that off, and then his pants and socks. All of which Beatrice watched with a small smile and wandering eyes.

“C’mere, I wanna be the big spoon.”

“How’s that going to work?” He was a pretty tall guy, a muscular guy at that. Laughing, he crawled onto the bed over her legs, and slipped under the blankets. It really was a nice bed, opulent but comfy, and the perfect hardness to support his body. Beatrice liked it too, and she turned to face him.

When he turned his back to her, she pressed herself against it, hooked her arm around his waist, claws to his chest, and buried her face in the back of his neck.

“ ... yeah this isn’t working,” she said. “You’re too fat.”

He rolled his eyes, turned around, and leaned in. With the two of them on their sides, facing each other, he put his lips to hers, and nudged his nose against hers too. His lips grazed one of the crocodile teeth where her cheek should have been, and he laughed as his lip tugged on it. He put his hand to her shoulder, and caressed her skin, the tattoos, the lean muscle, and gave her crocodile teeth a quick kiss.

She put both her hands against his chest, and gently stroked them along his tuft of chest hair. “Figure out who killed Barry yet?”

“You want to talk about him?”

“Not him specifically, but kind of yes, too. I know you got people investigating, and I’m pretty sure no one knows who did it. Not the wolves or vamps or anyone.”

Both of them in bed, nearly naked, and she wanted to talk about Barry, a dead vampire. Something was going on. Hint number three.

“The fact no one knows who killed him is pretty terrifying, yeah.” Not that he wanted to admit that, but she seemed willing to share information, if she thought no one else knew about Barry either. “You worried about me and the mansion?”

“ ... a bit, yeah.” She snuggled in closer, and leaned forward to put her forehead against his chest where they met the blanket.

“The mansion is guarded my servants of the Invictus during the day, and my own thralls now. I—”

“Still ... and I ... could use some safety right now.”

“ ... not like you to be scared.”

“Yeah, it’s not. Jacob and I ... he um ... yeah, don’t wanna talk about it. Just want to feel protected and safe.” She slid an arm up and over his waist again, this time hooking his lower back as she turned her head side to side so her forehead rubbed against him. “Still love me?”

“What, because you’re being—”

“A weak little girl.”

“Well aren’t you sexist.” He slid his hand around her, and hugged her in the same place she was hugging him. “Yes, of course I love you. Love you enough to tell you not to say stupid shit like that in front of Maria or Antoinette. They’ll tear you apart.”

She laughed, but nodded after a few moments. “Yeah but those bitches are old as dirt. I’ll be as hard and cold by then too.”

“I hope not.” His hand drifted lower, down her back, over the band of her thong, and down the curve where her ass met her hamstring. He cupped the large size of it, and offered her butt a kneading squeeze. “I like it where you’re soft.”

“That’s all muscle ... mostly. I am a girl.”

“Yeap.” He squeezed her ass again, and she squirmed a little against his chest.

“You taking advantage of me? While I’m feeling a bit scared, bit vulnerable?”

For a half a second, he thought she was serious. He could tell she was indeed serious about feeling scared, and vulnerable. Still didn’t know what it was that had her so upset, but he wouldn’t ask until she wanted to say. Something to do with Jacob, which was reason enough to be scared.

But she wasn’t being serious about not wanting him to take advantage. She chuckled when she caught his expression, and returned his ass squeeze with an ass squeeze of her own.

“How’s Jack doing?” she said.

“Very well. Kid is going to overcome me with time. You been watching him?”

“Of course. You know I spy on you Invictus all the time.”

The two chuckled. Halfway dorky, halfway dodging the issue that being in different covenants meant they weren’t allies, and things could go sideways at a moment’s notice. Such was unlife.

“Shall I blush?” he said.

“Course. Just cause I had a rough night doesn’t mean I don’t want to fuck. Besides, belly full of blood, remember?”

Good, cause the sight of her big, perfect ass in that thong always stirred him. He nodded, blushed life with a gentle sigh, and forced the subtle vitae through his limbs. Blood pumped through his dry veins once more, brought color to his skin, fullness to his body and muscles, and earned a longing sigh from Beatrice as well. She turned her head enough to set her ear to his chest, and listened to his heartbeat.

Julias lifted his head from the pillow enough to look to the bedroom door. Wide open. Triss used to close it, but after a certain point, she started to enjoy having sex with him in his mansion where the thralls could find them. And there'd been a couple occasions where Beatrice had invited a thrall to their bed, to get Kissed and touched, pleased, while the two Kindred drank their full.

But not tonight. She slipped out of bed, ran over to the door, and closed it with an almost loud thunk. And as she walked over to rejoin him, she slipped her claws under her tank top, and threw it away.

---

---

~~Beatrice~~

She could always trust Julias to give her her space, let her deal with her own shit, her own devils, and at the same time be supportive, loving, and understanding. Part of her wanted him to not be so damn understanding, to push her, make her talk, but she knew she was just being juvenile, like an idiot high school kid looking for some drama to take her mind off the real problem. Jacob and his dark friend, the corpse it had possessed, the things it told her about.

Closing the bedroom door helped a little. Made her a bit sad, cause she did love to show off her sex skills for the occasional passerby in Julias's employ, but right now she wanted some walls behind her, wanted some distance and some protection against the sick, twisted shit of Jacob's world. Against the stuff he'd done to her.

She couldn't tell Julias about the knives Jacob had stabbed into her stomach, twisting them into her intestines. Couldn't tell him about the clawing and tearing the corpse had done to her back, once it had put its hands back onto its mangled wrists. Couldn't tell him about having to close her eyes, as demanded, while Jacob cut at her, stripped her of skin so it faded to ashes, only to cut off more.

It'd taken all her efforts to heal the surface wounds enough so she could come here, and get Julias to give her a meal. She felt healed, mostly, thanks to the blood; still a few tender bits inside her but she could manage until a night's sleep or two fixed her up. It was the imagery she couldn't get rid of, the sight of the dead woman jamming her severed hands back onto the stumps of her wrist, the black blood everywhere, the sight of her own stomach full of knives.

Torture was a requirement, Jac—Malachi had explained, him and the spirit in the corpse. She needed to feel pain, needed to have the beast inside her come to the surface, to 'adjust' her self, whatever the fuck that meant. And it had come to the surface during the torture, snarling, roaring, screaming. How could it not, with an hour of those two fucking maniacs cutting into her?

Maybe this dark witch thing really wasn't for her.

Nope. Nope nope. Stop thinking about it, stop thinking about it. Look, you're in your lover's mansion. You have a full belly of fresh blood. Julias keeps the place safe, with thralls and servants and shit guarding it; dude probably had snipers posted in nearby trees and bushes and shit. Rest easy, Beatrice. Take your mind off of a grueling night of pain and agony and horrifying shit, and just relax in your lover's arms. And she relaxed best after sex.

"You ok?" Julias said. "We could just sleep, if you—"

"Hell no. Don't worry about my shit. I want sex, and then we can cuddle and you can tell me you love me and I'll always be safe in your arms."

"You'll—"

“After!” she said, grinning. She climbed onto his bed, and yanked the blankets down to expose his body. Some body hair on him, but not a carpet’s worth. Big, muscled guy, but he didn’t have the ripped six pack of abs she saw on some other guys like those werewolves. That was fine, his stomach was still flat and hard, with some definition to it. And, as she pulled his boxers down to expose his cock, she smiled down at him, and it. Some pubic hair, but he kept it quite short, trimmed.

And of course he had a really huge dick, cause that was apparently something that came with the job description of being big and dangerous in their world. Those two werewolves with Natasha had huge dicks too. Was Jack walking around with a dick hanging to his knees? She laughed at the thought. He might have, with all the crazy shit he was doing. Kid’s bravery must have been coming from somewhere, and giant balls and dick was as good a reason as any.

She climbed onto Julias’s chest, and set her knees onto the blankets around him. On queue, Julias put his hands on her body, her hips and waist. A little guidance from her raised his hands to her breasts, and she sighed into his touch as the man began to caress them, her nipples, until she felt her areola swell, and her nipple studs shift to adjust to the engorged flesh. And while the man treated her breasts to a loving, gentle bath of caresses, she set her claws on the outside of his biceps, and teased his skin with them.

But, after a few moments, one of his hands slid up her chest, her neck and jaw, and his fingers started to pluck at her lips. More than just her lips, they slid over, and started to creep in between her extra teeth where her left cheek should have been. The man really did not mind her monster teeth at all.

Exactly what this night of pain and brutality needed to offset it. Tenderness.

“So I know,” she said, “that I’ve never really given you a proper blowjob.”

“To my chagrin.”

“Ha! You want one?”

“What man doesn’t want a blowjob?”

“Men with girlfriends who have extra teeth.” She opened her mouth wide, showed off her assortment of extra teeth where the jaw met the skull, and she also let her tongue hang out a bit. It was just a normal looking tongue, but whatever the Nosferatu curse had done to her, had also increased its length quite a bit. Probably because it was extra freaky.

“You try being Kindred for a century, Triss. Things like that? It’s just spice on the meal.”

Spice on the meal. Fucking weird way of putting it, but it had her laughing and smiling as she slid backward along Superman’s body. He spread his legs, and she got comfortable between them, lying on her stomach and putting her elbows on the blankets between his thighs.

Big dick, right in front of her face. Grinning the whole time, she let one of her hands fall forward to scoop it up, and the other hand pressed against his thigh as she brought the phallus to her face. How long had it been since she’d done this? Over twenty fucking years.

“Ok, I’m out of practice. Let a girl experiment a bit here, k?”

Julias nodded, and grabbed a couple nearby pillows to help prop up his head and torso. And, returning her grin with his own, he hooked his hands behind his head, content to watch.

She nudged her nose toward his cock, and closed her eyes for a moment as she felt the hot, hard girth of it brush against her lips. She only used enough claws to keep it upright in front of her, not get a real grip on it. Instead, she lowered her head down to where her grip normally would have been, and with the room available, she started to plant slow, warm, wet kisses where the soft underside of his shaft met his balls. The big guy made a tiny groan, a little thing, but with where her head was, she could almost feel the sound.

Fucking hell she'd forgotten how exciting this could be.

She raised her lips higher, higher, each planting more kisses along the veined girth, until she reached the head of his cock. The swollen, pink head that had drilled her depths so many times, stretched her inward, sometimes a little painfully, but always a fucking euphoric ride. She kissed it, kissed along the base edge of its bulbous shape, kissed where it joined the underside of his length, and kissed the top of it. Each kiss grew deeper, longer, wetter, as she let her saliva coat her lips while she spread them back and forth over the swollen head.

And when Julias made a proper groan, one of those deeper, manly groans she didn't hear often from him, she shivered. Her body lit up like kindling, warmth shooting through her limbs, her crotch, until she felt wetness join the heat. Part of her felt embarrassed for how quickly that happened; just a touch, just a noise from Julias and her body was fucking ready. But the embarrassment passed quickly, especially as she kissed away a droplet of precum leaking out of the man's cock.

"Getting there already?" she said.

"Yes, I am. You can't see what I see. Your beautiful eyes staring at me and what you're kissing, your lips dragging along me ... and that ass sticking out, in that thong."

She set her head against one of his thighs, and laughed. Yeah, that was true, a glance back showed her large ass did kind out stick out from the bed with her on her stomach, with the thong highlighting the shape.

“Like some eye contact?” she said.

“God yes.”

Lucky him.

She raised her head, and opened her mouth wide, very wide, so wide she saw the startled look on the man’s face. Probably looked like a horror movie monster, all her extra teeth fully exposed, and about to bite off his dick. She winked at him, brought his cock in closer, and used her top lip to guide his shaft into her mouth where her teeth were normal, as she slowly leaned forward to take him into her awaiting maw. Deeper, and deeper, each inch of him she took made the man sigh bliss, breathe pleasure, and gaze at her as she gazed at him. She knew she had snake eyes, and she knew that, when she put her teeth on display, it made her look like a reptile. And the fact the man was only getting harder against her lip made the juxtaposition delicious.

She let her long tongue hang out, and pressed it along the underside of him as she slipped more of his length into her mouth. She didn’t know if other Kindred lost their gag reflex, even while blushing life, but she had; probably something to do with the crazy tongue and mouth. First time she’d gotten to really use it though, and she smiled around her lover’s cock as it slipped into her throat, and her mouth closed around his girth completely. Her tongue caressed against where his testicles met his cock, and as her mouth came lower and lower, her tongue went lower as well.

When her mouth found the base of him, and got snug and tight suckling at the bottom of his cock, her tongue slid out, and offered teasing, playful licks. And with how long it was, she could do more than just a few, weak little licks. She gave her lover the proper treatment, massaging his testicles with her tongue, stroking, rubbing, all while she kept the seal of her lips around his length tight.

“ ... tongue ... wow,” he said.

God. Fucking. Damn. It was always a treat to see the man squirm when she took control, but to feel his groans and moans — controlled and quiet as they were — from so close, was holy shit intoxicating. She almost giggled. Couldn't, depthroating her man and all, so she smiled at him, gazed into his lovely dark eyes as she treated his cock to a bath.

“eel 'oo?”

“What?”

Too comical. She laughed, and to do that properly she had to lift her head.

“Feel good?”

“God yes. You know how long it's been since I've been treated to this kind of pampering?”

Rolling her eyes, she grabbed the base of his cock, and slapped it against his stomach, hard enough to get him to flinch. “You probably got one ... maybe two days before our first date?”

“ ... well, yes, but I assure you I was thinking of you the whole time.”

God damn him. She laughed again, and guided his cock back toward her face. “You barely knew my name then.”

“Nonsense. I knew you and I were destined to be together since I was Kindred. I—ow!” A good pinch to the thigh rubbed that smug, romantic look off his face.

Course she was just playing. Her white knight was too good with his words; better to just stop him from talking before he said something to make her want to get all lovey dovey, and ruin a perfectly good blowjob. So, with a few chuckles and some silence from her man, she got back to work, and tapped the glans of his cock against the side of her crocodile teeth a few times.

“Don’t make me mad now. I’ll bite this off.” Just a joke though. Julias could regenerate from it she was sure, but holy fuck that’d be a horrible prank. Worse than knives in her gut.

Stop thinking about Jacob’s twisted world. Your new twisted world. Enjoy your boyfriend’s hospitality, great money, half a dozen servants, and most of all, enjoy his great body and big dick. No, wait, enjoy his love. Cause love was more important than her boyfriend being handsome and having muscles and some serious endowment. Or both, why not both.

Back into her mouth. She couldn’t help but smile, and it took a little effort to keep from laughing at the thoughts running through her head. Julias didn’t mind. If anything, the man looked all the happier for her happiness, which was a really nice symbiotic feedback loop to be in. Made her feel giddier every moment, made her forget the dark shit hiding in old caves dug out underneath cemeteries.

All that shit kind of just faded away when she was looking at her man, his warm but simultaneously arrogant smile, his broad chest and shoulders spread since he had his fingers netted behind his head. And the look of pleasure on his face from having his cock deep inside her crocodile mouth, nestled snug between lips and tongue, made her wet. Something in his eyes, the way she could see the bliss there, see how they half closed as he got closer to orgasm, a twinkle maybe, something that made it so damn satisfying to slip her tongue back into her mouth to stroke him, and ease her head back up to the tip of his cock with a tight lock of her lips the whole way.

More precum dripped onto her tongue, and she gazed up at Julias as she used her lips to spread the liquid around and around his glans. Throughout all the fun, she barely ever used her hands, mostly just resting them on his thighs while her lips and tongue did all the work. Kept Julias on edge, kept him from getting too close, so she could tease him, kiss him, and milk another drop of precum out of him as she locked her lips tight around his glans again. She eased her head back and forth an inch, making sure to slide her moist lips across the base edge of the bulbous tip, over and over, until she could see the pleasure drip from her lover's face.

But before he could start unloading, she removed him again, and grinned the most evil grin she could manage while one hand guided his cock to the right side of her face to gently tap it against some of her monster teeth.

“Beatrice, you're killing me.”

“Yeah, probably.” She set her lips on the tip again, but pushed out her tongue up and over to dangle a few inches of it atop his length. Then she brought it around and around in circles, caressing half his length with the wet warmth of it. It must have looked a bit strange, with how long her tongue was, and how each time she opened her mouth a bit to give her tongue room, it meant Julias could see her jaw open, see through the cracks between her crocodile teeth into the depths of her mouth.

Didn't seem to bother him. If anything, the big guy was struggling to keep his hands behind his head, and not get them into her hair. And she did love them in her hair, but right now she was enjoying doing everything solo. To bask in the man's lovesick, horny gaze, as she pampered his cock, was really scratching the part of her that liked to be watched. And getting her really, really wet.

Winking at Julias, she slid the man's shaft back into her mouth, and took the thick girth deep into her throat. Again, she locked her lips tight — tight as they could with no cheeks — and let her tongue slip out underneath his length to start caressing the whole of his balls again. With no need to breathe, she kept him there, and watched him, met his gaze with her serpent eyes, and gently nudged her head back and forth to massage his cock with her throat.

Too much for him. His eyes nearly closed, and for a moment they rolled up as the man made a good moan, the sort of moan she wanted to hear. His hard stomach crunched a few times, showing some ab definition through, and she smirked at it, at him, the slab of muscle before her, at how his arms flexed underneath where they met his back, at how his hips pushed up a bit, at how his legs spread.

As his cock started to flex and press up against her mouth and throat, she settled in. In slow motions, she shifted her head back and forth an inch, milking the cum out of him while keeping him balls deep in her mouth. With how deep she had him, he was shooting his load down her throat, and she could feel the underside of his cock pump the liquid into her. And the more she massaged it with her tongue, the more it continued.

Her hands drifted up and out onto his stomach, and she rested them along his lower abdomen, teasing and caressing his muscles with her claws as she kept him balls deep in her mouth. All the while he came inside her, she gazed up at him, drank in his flexing body and blissful expression, and continued to bathe his testicles with her tongue. Only when his cock stopped flexing upward against her throat, and when his body stopped crunching his stomach, did she finally start to raise her head. She let her tongue hang out of her mouth the whole trip, licking at the underside of his shaft, and once she'd pushed herself up, the long appendage dangled six inches from her mouth, with a couple heavy drops of white falling from its tip.

"That was ... damn," he said.

She climbed up and over his pelvis, and straddled his stomach again before setting her claws against his chest. Man still had his hands hooked behind his head, just letting her do things to him, with a big grin on his face the whole time. She liked that.

"Hey Julias," she said, claws sliding back and forth across his broad chest.

He quirked a brow, and set his hands on her hips. "Yeah?"

"I gave you a blowjob. You now owe me your life."

"Is that how that works?"

"Mhmm."

"Then I owe my life to a lot of girls you know, I—ow!"

She sank her claws into him, just a bit, just enough for the pinch to nearly draw blood. And as the man flinched, she chuckled at him, and guided his hands back to his head so he could slip them behind his skull again. It was a good look on him, a kingly looking, with his hands netted behind his head, elbows out, and watching.

"That does bring up a good point though." She slipped out both of her feet from beside her, and instead put them around Julias's head, against his wrists where they were beside his temples. "I ... don't think we should let Jen, or any Kindred into our bed with us."

"Oh?"

“Yeah. Just ... don’t really want to share. I mean with kine, a little bit of play is ok, cause they’re just food. And playing with your food is natural.” Maybe her beast was a cat? Maybe all Kindred beasts were actually cats? House cats, fat house cats gorged on blood.

“What brought this on?”

“ ... I don’t want to say.” Don’t want to say what? She was feeling clingy, cause Jacob scared the shit out of her? Didn’t want anyone else in the bedroom, cause she didn’t want to feel exposed to another Kindred when so vulnerable? Didn’t want to damage the closeness and intimacy — and protection — of Julias’s arms?

God, her own thoughts were sounding less and less like the badass chick she thought she was, the chick who jumped a spider monster without a second thought.

“You’ll get no argument from me Triss. I was worried about it as it was.”

“Course you were.” Cause you’re smarter than me and know better than to think with only your dick, unlike me. “So, just ... us. Doing comfy, cuddly things, with no one else.”

“Does that mean more spooning?”

“Yes. Yes it does.” Man did love to spoon. “But I expect to be fully compensated for it. And for the blowjob.” She reached back to her waist, slid her claws under the waistband, and slowly, teasingly, slid the tiny straps of fabric down her large, toned ass, her hard, curvy legs, and down to her ankles around Julias’s neck.

“Shopping spree?” he said, smile growing as she pressed her thong against his neck with her feet.

“Shopping spree. I got some clothes I want to try that you don’t have yet. Custom tailored stuff too. Maybe a really fancy wedding dress, like one of those twenty-thousand-dollar wedding dresses.” She slipped the thong past her toes so it fell off of her and onto Julias’s face, and laughed when the man used his lips and teeth to grab it, and move it aside with a turn of his head.

“I’ll call my guy.”

“Good. Also, grab the lube,” she said, and she spread her thighs as she said it. The stud in her clit hood ached as she reached down between her legs to touch it. Soaked. She was dripping, her lips drenched, and she knew it was enough to be plainly visible, enough to grab Julias’s eyes, and make him stare. Hard to grab the lube from the drawer in the nightstand without looking, but he managed it, a twinkle in his eye the whole time too. He knew what was coming.

She plucked it from his hand, and slid herself back. After setting her ass between his thighs, she reached down, and as she dribbled a copious amount of the fluid onto his cock, her other hand rubbed it onto his skin. Man was still hard, and she had every intention of enjoying it.

Once the lubricant was dripping off of his testicles with how soaked his length was, she set the bottle aside, and climbed back up onto the man’s waist, her weight on her knees again. She grinned down at him, let her long tongue hang out of her alien mouth, and gazed upon his excited expression with her snake eyes as she reached between her legs, grabbed his cock, and pointed it upward. It took a little maneuvering, her weight on her knees and one hand on his chest, while the other guided his shaft, and she had to lean forward to get the angle. But soon, she had the tip of his fat cock pressed to her ass.

Getting him inside was a struggle. Always was. Muscles fought, and had to be coaxed to relax. Muscles were tight, and took time to stretch. Muscles were dry, and took a second to get soaked by the lubricant. She made a show of it, swayed her ass from side to side a little, and chuckled down at her love as his eyes rolled up in bliss. She had a tight ass; could probably squeeze his dick right off if she wanted, and she gave some tiny flexes of her sphincter around the head of his cock as it slid into her body.

It felt good, to feel herself spread open around him, to feel her skin rub and massage against the girth of his cock. But what felt incredible, what left her weak and panting and shaking at the knees, required a deeper angle. She took more of him into her ass, more, and once she'd taken half of the big bastard into her, she angled her hips forward a little, and sank down. Had to find the right angle to force his dick toward her belly, toward her pussy, but once she found it, she let out a long, mewling sigh, set her claws against her lover's chest, and eased him into her ass until he was balls deep.

Pressure. Fucking delicious pressure. She could feel his cock pressing against her insides, pushing toward her cunt from behind another wall of flesh, of her insides. A lot of practice and a very patient lover meant she could take the time to get everything just right, angle herself perfectly to push her body down onto his cock. With her hips angled forward and her body sitting a little forward on him, keeping his cock pressing toward the front of her, she groaned as she felt the man press against her deep spot.

She found a bouncing rhythm, and got to work. Cause Julias had already cum once, and she was dying for some stimulation. Christ, watching the man watch her, his pleased face and the way he had his back spread on the sheets, hands behind his head, made her feel like she was fucking a lord, too arrogant to help her. Like she was a sex slave to be called on whenever the lord felt the need to relieve himself. Bit of that Ventrue arrogance showing through in him, instead of his usual Superman act. Fuck it was hot. And being the girl in that lord's bed, doing all the work while he watched, was doing a serious number on her. Boiling heat built up in her pelvis, and she shivered as the pleasure waves started to build.

She stopped, leaned back, put her hands against his knees, and spread her thighs a little. Pussy on complete display, smooth, dripping, clenching on nothing, begging to be touched.

But the bastard didn't. He kept his hands where they were, and watched her get into a better position.

“You're dripping,” he said.

“Hey, fuck you man, can't help it. I haven't done the blowjob thing in forever.” And for punishment, she squeezed her ass on his dick. Hard. He winced, until she let him go, and her smirk returned. “I was thinking, your tailor could make me something really ... I don't know, slutty? Something like Jen was wearing to the Black Hall ball. Feel like showing a lot of skin.”

“Oh?”

“Yeah, and ... wear me on your arm too, please? Show me off, at the Invictus ball.” She let go of his leg with one hand, and reached down for her pussy. Careful with her claws, she set her fingertips along her swollen, dripping lips, and spread herself open. Sure enough, a couple more drops of her cream trickled out of her, down her skin, and joined where her ass was spread open on the man's cock. She fucking loved the enraptured expression on his face. Loved showing off, even if just showing off how fucking wet her dumb white knight boyfriend made her.

His brow raised with her request, despite his gaze being locked onto her pink flesh between her legs. “How revealing? Jennifer's dress was pretty revealing, but we've had balls before where some Daeva show up with their breasts exposed.”

“Sounds like ... fashion runway clothes.”

With another groan rippling through her, she put her hand back on Julias's knee again, and started to bounce herself. The extreme angle, her hips forward a little and her body leaning back, made his cock press straight toward her abs, straight into her deep spot as she started to bounce on him. She sank her ass down, took him deep, deep until it felt like his length was reaching her stomach. She found a faster rhythm, using only an inch stroke, but picking up the pace until the bed started to creak and her ass was jiggling with the impact against the man's pelvis.

She came. Way, way too early to cum already, five minutes into penetration, but there it was. Her head fell back between her shoulders, and her moans grew louder, loud enough she knew the servants in the mansion would be able to hear her. The rippling waves in her pelvis spread out, powerful, consistent, and worked through her until her toes were curling, and her hands squeezed on her lover's legs.

She managed to raise her head and look down, mid orgasm. As her muscles squeezed and her bouncing was stopped, a tiny splash of her juices landed on Julias's hard stomach. And then another, as her cunt squeezed down in spasms and random convulsions, each causing deep waves of bliss to move up and down her body.

"Fucking ... damn..." She continued to watch herself, watch her defined abs flex and crunch with her panting and post-orgasm shivers. Watched herself leak a few more drops of juices down her pussy lips, and Julias did too. Man was drinking her with his eyes.

Too good to stop. She started bouncing again, harder, and deeper. With enough lube to drown someone coating the man's cock, she had more than enough leeway to pound him. She slid her knees out and up, and put her weight on her feet instead, setting them beside Julias's chest on each side of him on the blankets, and keeping her hands on his knees too. More range of motion leaning back like this, more freedom to push her ass up half the man's length, and then take it all back with a hard drop.

The poor man started to groan as well. She squeezed on him in spurts, each stroke of his length pressing his cock toward her pussy again, until she could almost feel him pressing against her abs. More. She bounced faster, desperate to get more of that pressure against her deepest place, to build that roaring fire in her body. Each time she felt his cock kiss that sensitive spot, press against it through the wall of her ass, the bliss started to build, and her liquids continued to as well. Something about that depth made her body sing, and made her pussy leak cream until she could feel her warm liquids mixing with the lubricant.

A final bounce built the fire into a scorching furnace, and she took her man balls deep again as she let the orgasm work through her. The waves of heat, of tingling pleasure danced up and down her body, her skin, to her toes then back to her spine and up into her chest. The center of the explosion, her cunt and belly, squeezed down again, and again, and again, each squeeze joined with a squeeze of her ass around her man's member. And as Julias's groans returned, she forced her eyes open.

She squirted. Hard. A solid stream of her clear juices landed on the man's stomach, enough for some of it to trickle off to the sides of his hard, wide, muscled body. And as her muscles continued to spasm randomly, another gush met his stomach. And another. She tried to bounce again, to maybe milk more of her pleasure, but her muscles refused to do anything other than tremble. All she could do was make loud moans, and watch her bare pussy soak her lover's stomach.

When the climax passed, and she was left a quivering mess in post-orgasm heaven, Julias spoke at last.

"I didn't say you could stop."

"I ... I ... fuck you," she said. "Christ I ... really did fucking soak you."

“Never met a girl who squirted as hard as you.”

Part of her thought she should be embarrassed. A microscopic part of her. A much larger part was basking in the glory of tingly waves of pleasure, and loving how much her man loved how much she made a mess when she came hard.

“Hey,” he continued, “if you stop now, I’m afraid I’m going to have to spoon you.”

She rolled her eyes, and sat up straight. Straight turned into collapsing forward a moment later as the tingly waves ripped away her ability to control her muscles. The waves refused to stop moving up and down through her body, and another hard clench of her pussy forced a few more drops of her juices onto the man beneath her.

“ ... gimme ... a minute?”

“Nope.” Julias reached out for her, lifted her off of his cock, and turned her around. Once he had his arms around her, he laid her across his body on her back, and then rolled onto his side.

Trapped, in the spooning position. Trapped in the man’s big arms and perfectly tender but tight hug. She melted, let her head relax to the pillow, and waited for the inevitable. She was still too tingly and in dreamy-relaxed land to be on the aggressive front anymore, and she knew he knew it too. And a few moments later, her patience was rewarded as Julias guided his cock back to her ass.

The man kept his head propped up on one arm, elbow to the sheets between pillows, while his other set the head of his soaked cock against her opening. Once he’d eased it back in a few inches into her clenching and unclenching muscles, he wiped his hand dry on the sheets in front of her, then set his hand to her breast, elbow on her hip. A half hug, half fondle, as he eased his length into her ass.

The angle was blissful. With him behind her like this, her back to his chest, it pushed his cock straight toward her belly, and she shivered as she felt his glans press along her walls. Deeper, and deeper, until he was balls deep once again, and she could feel him stretching her muscles inward. Now she got to relax, and let the man spoon her.

Julias leaned in, set his lips on her ear, and kissed her earlobe, before his lips drifted down another few inches to start kissing her neck. And as he did so, his hand drifted down from her breast, down her abs, and down to her clitoris.

“Ah! Hey ... sensitive.”

The man chuckled into her neck, and kept his touch on her clitoris soft. His fingers played with the stud in its hood, lightly stroking up against it, before he set index and middle finger on either side of her clit. After a few strokes, they dipped lower, coated themselves in the juices leaking from her smooth lips, and returned to massage her bud in the wetness.

God damn a century of whoring himself out had taught her man some serious sex skills. The right pressure, the right amount of stroking friction for post-orgasm clit play — very little — along with the ebb and flow to get the rhythm. And as he stroked it, he pressed his hips forward with the same motion. A gentle, rocking pace of sex that he liked to use when he wanted to make things take time.

“Come onnnn,” she said. “You’ve cum, I’ve cum ... twice! You gotta ... speed things up.”

“Why would I do that? Got the most beautiful creature in my bed, her huge ass snug to my body, and her juices everywhere.” He raised his lips higher, set them to her ear again, and offered a few more tiny kisses. “You’re dripping down your thighs, soaking me.”

Arg, it was true. She could feel where his balls were pressing against the base of her butt, and she could feel her juices dripping down her thighs. And she knew the bastard was going to do what he always did when they spooned: hug her, kiss her, and fuck her so slowly it took forever to get the fire going again. From a hard climax going cowgirl, to this slow sex that was practically foreplay.

No way she was going to tell him how much she loved the switch up. Man didn't need any more things to tease her and her sex addiction about.

“Besides,” he continued, “I'm a man. You drained me once, so now I have some work to do, to build up to a second orgasm.”

“Bouncing on your dick ... and ... stuff ... didn't ... get you closer?”

“That amazing blowjob really drained me.” He picked up the pace a little, rubbed her swollen clit a little harder, then slowed down again. Infuriating. Agonizingly perfect. “Afraid this might take a little while.”

“... ok.” She reached up with her free arm to pat his cheek, then down to set her hand on his where it played with her clit. It was nice, to just set her claws on his hand, and feel how he felt her. Man had so much god damn control, so much patience. Dude was inside her ass and she was utterly dripping, ready to squirt the moment he'd start pounding her. But he didn't. He stayed slow, and continued to bathe her clitoris in so much pampering she could feel the building tingles from it alone.

She had enough control of her muscles now to go on the offensive, and maybe start fucking him in return. Maybe get them both cumming a lot sooner. But, no, she'd asked him for spooning earlier, and he was going to spoon her. And it might take another fifteen fucking minutes to cum, which was a long time after having cum twice already, but she could use a little time in his arms.

“S-So,” she said, “you ... um ... how ... how’s it going at the top of the Invictus?”

“Pretty well, I must say. Planning for the ball has been interesting.” His fingers started to work her clit faster, a little harder, and his hips started to push into her the same way. Fucker didn’t even let his faster pace affect his speech. “Michael has insisted we try and encourage a sexual motif. Says it will serve to disarm everyone, make them more comfortable, with how rare it is for all the covenants to be in the same room.”

“Very ... rare.” So close, so damn close, waves of pleasure were already working their way down to her toes. Come on, faster for the love of god.

“Indeed. So Michael is going to have many kine there, thralls from many ancilla, and the two Invictus elders. He’s also extended the invitation to Antoinette, Jacob, and Garry. Should be an interesting evening, scantily clad kine everywhere, cream of the crop in physique.”

That actually did sound pretty interesting, and fun. She doubted anyone was actually going to fuck at the ball, but it sounded like it was very much setting up post-party sex for everyone.

“I ... think I’ll ask Jen for ... fashion ideas ... something extra slutty.” Images of her wearing something that spoke of both the Circle, its apparently justified and terrifying reputation for dark things, and her own tattoo and metal-loving ways, filled her head. Maybe a corset that fully exposed the back, and a cloak to go with it, or something?

“I bet Jen will show up with her two ghouls on leashes. She’s the most cocky neonate in the city.” Julias slowed down again, and she let out a long whimper. God damn him. “Think she will?”

“I ... didn’t think so. But I’ll tell her ... about the idea.” Cause no doubt Jen would love that idea. Fucking Ventrue. “Better not ... use a leash ... on me.”

Julias set his lips on her neck again, and bit down, almost hard enough to pierce her skin, but not quite. “You were fucking gorgeous, wearing that dog collar.” He gave her a hard thrust, hard enough to force a squeak out of her, and make a tiny splash of her juices leak. “Maybe not at the ball, but I do heavily encourage more of such wear when we’re alone. With a leash too.”

Of course he did, cause he was a Ventrue and those fuckers loved to control things. She almost felt guilty for how much it turned her on when he did.

“Not sure ... I should encourage ... this side of you,” she said. Totally lying, and she hid her face in the pillow so he couldn’t see her smile, or her eyes as she struggled on the edge of orgasm.

His fingers on her clit reached lower, and scooped into her. With practiced efficiency and rather intimate knowledge of her insides, the man started to press his fingers into her g-spot, hard. And as he did, he thrust into her again, and again, with enough force to make her body shake.

She came, and opened her mouth as she groaned onto the pillow. She turned her head again, putting her temple to the softness, and drooled onto the fabric as the man pumped her ass. All the lube made each thrust slide in easy, so all she had to do was lay there, and let the big guy fuck her with a good, proper, deep thrusting rhythm. He continued to finger her pussy at the same time, putting pressure on her depths, pressing against her spots until she squirted over his hand, and her juices dripped down over her hip and thighs. She almost heard the splash.

Julias slowed down, slower, slower, and eventually stopped as he removed his hand, slid it up to her breast again, before his fingers found her throat. And as he set his fingers there, he squeezed, gently, enough so she felt the size of his grip around her. The whole arm hugged her tight, her body locked in under the elbow, and his forearm crossing up her chest and sternum so he could hold her by the neck. His hand was dripping wet. She could feel her cum trickle down her neck from his knuckles.

With grip tight and weight against her, he started to thrust into her again while pinning her back to his chest.

“W-Wait ... tired...” she said, squeaks and whimpers all she could muster. This wasn’t gentle spooning sex! The bastard tricked her!

His betrayal was very much welcome, and she turned her head enough to peek up at him. Man had that cocky grin of his, that Ventrue dominance look, that ‘I own you’ look. She knew he didn’t feel that way, but in the heat of the moment? Fucking. Hot. She reached up to hold onto the wrist of the clutching hand choking her, and melted into him as he fucked her, sank his cock balls deep into her ass, and hugged her tight to his body.

More waves worked through her as her snatch squeezed. Each clench of her muscles was met with one of his thrusts, his length reaching into her and pressing against her deepspot. Like an ocean, the waves kept coming back and back and back again, driven on by the man’s consistent thrusts. The tingling reached her toes until they curled, then up her thighs, her back, and up to where the man was choking. Each met with more hard clenching of her pussy, and her ass. Poor man must have felt like she was trying to rip off his dick, with how she was squeezing him.

She was squirting, a lot. She knew it, even if she couldn’t see it. The deep pressure of his cock pressing against her depths kept making her clench, and each clench was soaking everything between her thighs. The blankets were drenched. Kindred fluids would fade in five or ten minutes, but in the mean time, she was just a horrible mess, and there was nothing she could do about it as the man kept her trapped, helpless to do anything but lay there and let him fuck her ass.

She managed a small smirk at the silly roleplaying in her head. She wasn't trapped, and Julias was the nicest man she'd ever known. But it was fun, and so very hot. God, she couldn't keep her eyes open, and the sounds coming out of her were barely more than whimpers. She was seeing spots. And the waves of pleasure kept working through her until her toes started to hurt from curling so hard. Each wave exploded outward from her center, from her stomach and pelvis, and made her whole body spasm weakly, until another gush of her fluids poured down her legs.

But, at last, the man came to a slow, gentle pace. Orgasm pace. She sighed relief, and felt her whole body start to go limp as Julias came inside her, deep in her ass. His grip around her throat tightened for a few moments, a few last second thrusts to punctuate his bliss, before he too started to relax. He melted against her, her body half turning over toward the blankets as the man leaned against her, and gently fucked her. Each slow, loving thrust was icing on a massive cake of orgasm overload that made it hard for her to reciprocate anything. She just lay there, trembled, and let the man fuck her as she tried to recover.

His fingers slid down from her neck to her breasts, and he started a tender massage of her nipples. And, chuckling, he reached down to her drenched thighs, soaked his fingers again along her dripping pussy lips, and brought his hand back up to her breasts. Fingers now utterly drenched in her cum again, he started to massage her breasts once more, gently rubbing and caressing her hard, sensitive areola with the liquid. All for one very awesome reason: drawing out the waves of her bliss.

The two of them lay there for a good five minutes, recovering, enjoying the quiet, the privacy of his master bedroom, the contact of his huge chest against her back. And the best part, enjoying the final waves of orgasm, with the man gently fucking her, never removing anymore than an inch of his length so he could stay buried to the hilt.

“You are one sexual predator,” he said. “ ... er, well, you know what I mean.”

She laughed, and reached down and over her hip to set her claws on his ass. “You just like my ass.” His was nice too, hard and defined; but no one had an ass like hers.

“As much as you love your ass? I doubt it,” he said. It was true too. His arm hugged her closer, pressed her to him, and he nudged his hips into her to earn another mewl from her. He was going to get soft any second now, she knew, but in the mean time, the man seemed content to press his length against her depths and make her body quiver. “And I adore how much of a mess you make when you cum.”

“Didn’t ... always squirt this much, you know? I mean, yeah I made a mess when I was kine, but...” But you’re really good at sex and turning her into a gushing fountain. Too cheesy? Too cheesy.

Didn’t need to be said anyway. Julias chuckled, and hugged her close. Finally the bastard was getting soft, and she quivered as he fell out of her, only to pull her hip in tight to him so her ass was snug against his cum-soaked cock. Well, she’d already soaked everything, a little more mess didn’t matter. It’d all fade in a few minutes anyway.

“About the dress for the ball. You want to show all of Dolareido your body?”

“ ... maybe. It’s a pretty good body, right?” Again she reached down, this time to run her claws up and down her abs, and then up to her breasts to pluck at one of her nipples. Sensitive, nipple hard enough to ache with the stud piercing in it. “I got twenty years of stupid to make up for.”

“Perfectly understandable, and you know I think you’re beautiful. But you also seem to be against having anyone else in our bed.”

“That is a bit of a paradox, isn’t it? I don’t know, I ... I like it when people look. But, touching is a different thing altogether.”

“Got it. No Kindred in the bed, just you and me, and the occasional meal when you want it.” Man hugged her, and started to caress her stomach with drifting fingers.

“Think the werewolves will be coming too? Cause, I mean ... could be interesting. They’re all so fit and strong and ... alive. Alive and surrounded by dead blood suckers.”

“I wouldn’t be surprised if Avery accepts the invitation. Which is a problem I need to plan for. Her and Jacob in the same room won’t end well.”

Yeah, that was most definitely a problem.

As she snuggled into Julias’s body, she frowned at herself, faced turned enough to hide it in the pillow. Thirty minutes ago, she was feeling scared, even a bit terrified, as she closed the bedroom door. Jacob, the rituals, how he was going to teach her. She could remember every detail of the knives cutting through her stomach, her musculature, and piercing into her Kindred withered intestines. Agony. She could remember that fucking thing, riding that corpse, cutting into her. She could remember the blood everywhere, black blood, unnatural and fucking dead. Dead blood. No, dead wasn’t the right word, dead didn’t do the black, endless oblivion justice.

The weird part was, not even two hours later, she was banging her lover. From a horrifying introduction to entities of the occult she could not have even begun to imagine, and pain, agony, misery, and literal torture, to sex. Sex because she was horny. Sex, because dealing with Jacob and the insanity of what he hid in the black, had sent a thrill up her spine. Sex because, much as it scared her, much as it was painful, Jacob's dark secrets were exciting, electrifying. And she had to let out that electric tingle in her body somehow. It was only once she had the arousal out of her system, that she understood why.

Fucking after a night of torture and dealing with otherworldly terrors? That sounded like ... like something Jacob would do.

Chapter 42

~~Jack~~

“Barry was on the Mirrden job,” Jack said, “monitoring the construction and expansion. So, my best guess is the Carthians killed him. But that doesn’t seem likely, so my best guess is a shit guess.”

Hella nodded, put another kiss on Isabella’s neck, and came around the bed to sit on its edge again, beside her lover. “Garry doesn’t like the way the Invictus run the city, sure. But killing Kindred? Been a long time since anyone’s done that. Not since the purge, and, well, that incident with Viktor, and then Lucas and his little army.”

Jack nodded, not a flinch or wince to speak of. He’d gotten a lot better at hiding his facial ticks whenever someone brought up those events. Much as the memory of riding Damien’s mind and body, and butchering a bunch of Kindred with his sword was never going away, he was getting better at suppressing it. Time heals all wounds, and more crap like that that turned out to be truer than he could have ever appreciated before he needed it.

“And,” Jack continued, “Barry was the only one to die in the fire. And I knew he didn’t sleep there, so the fire catching him seemed unlikely.”

Everyone in the room nodded. Those who’d been kissing stopped, and either moved to the edge of their beds, or grabbed nearby chairs. The ghouls about continued with their wandering, cleaning, and fixing blankets and clothes that were scattered about. Cozy setup the vamps had here.

Isabella sighed and brushed off one of her shoulders. “Poor Barry.”

“So I’m thinking,” Hella said, “that either someone killed Barry, and then burned down his apartment building to make it look like he died in the fire, or he’s still alive, and someone is just trying to make it look like he’s dead.”

“Sounds a bit extreme for Barry.” Jack shook his head, and put the info into his smartphone. Not that it was much to input. “Unless there’s something more going on than the Mirrden business.”

One of the others raised a hand. A man, a young Daeva, with short black hair and a lean build. Made for the stage, considering his smile. Apparently, he was waiting for Isabella to give him permission to speak. Leauvion’s childe, maybe? Fuck his bad memory.

“Yes my childe?”

Welp, that settled it.

“Barry had spoken to me about some unusual people hanging around the Mirrden district. Just kine, but he had approached them, and later he told me they seemed rather ... organized?”

Hella shrugged and waved a dismissing hand. “Protesters from the Carthian half of South Side, Zack. They don’t like Xnomia tearing down their old, crummy buildings and shit for our expansion efforts anymore than the Carthians themselves do.”

Zack nodded, but frowned as he dug through his memories. “Maybe, Madam Vendram. Just ... Barry seemed a little more insistent about it. And, I do believe he ... decided to follow them.”

The room went silent, and everyone stared at Zack.

“You tell us this now, boy?” Isabella almost got up, but instead, folded one leg over the other, and gave the man the coldest ice stare Jack had ever seen.

“I’m sorry! I didn’t think it was important. Barry told me later he came back, after not being able to track these people down. Whoever they were, they just blended into the night, the other kine, and ... yeah. He lost them.”

Isabella didn’t get up, but Hella did, and she started to pace around. “Well Zack, I’ll break your arm later for only bringing this up now. But at least that’s something to go on. Barry wouldn’t lose track of a kine he set his eyes on.”

“ ... who is Barry’s sire?” Jack said, eyebrow raised and eyes on Hella. But she shook her head, dismissing his suggestion.

“Not me,” she said. He should know that, but it wasn’t on any info he dug through. Who sired who was information the Kindred seemed reluctant to record. “Mia, Carthian, Gangrel too, left the city maybe five years ago. Barry was a Gangrel, and if he wanted to hunt a kine, a specific kine, he wasn’t going to just up and lose them.” She cradled her forehead in one palm, and then walked over to Zack to give him a rather harsh punch in the shoulder. “A Daeva wouldn’t understand.”

Gangrels were a step closer to their beast than anyone, no denying that. Tracking prey was second nature to them. And Zack, realizing his mistake, winced and lowered his head.

“Sorry. But, Barry did say it was probably nothing.”

“Probably nothing is a better lead than actually nothing.” Hella paced some more, chin in her right hand’s fingers, eyes down and analyzing. “Anyone else know what people he’s talking about? Anymore details you’ve left out, Zack?”

“Um, he said it was two men, two women, couple wearing trench coats, couple wearing leather jackets. They were just standing, and watching the construction crew from a distance. He said the strange part was they stuck around to watch for a few hours.”

Jack nodded and put the notes into his smartphone. The clothes weren't unusual, but the watching for a few hours was. “He say when?”

“Bit after midnight, a couple days before he disappeared.”

Yeah, that was weird. Dolareido had a very active nightlife, but that was in the Invictus half of South Side, where the vices congregated. Closer to the Carthian side, people were rarely out that late, and those that were were not walking around in trench coats. Course it could have all been a coincidence or strange circumstance that just led to the suspicious arrangement. But Hella was right, it was a better lead than nothing.

Another one of the young Kindred raised a hand, a woman, short dark hair and a dainty figure. A bit shy too. Mekhet, if Jack ever saw one. “Um, I've seen people like that too.”

“Where?” Jack said.

“Outside the club Bloodlust. Same thing, two trench coats, two leather jackets, two men, two women. I thought ... thought they were just observing the club, you know? It is a pretty crazy place for tourists to see, even from the outside.”

“And they probably were merely tourists, observing.” Isabella nodded, held out a hand for Hella, and squeezed it once the Gangrel returned to her side. “But, keep an eye out for these people, my students. Invictus Kindred often group at Bloodlust, and naturally at the Mirrden district until this expansion effort is complete. Two sightings hardly makes for proof, but it is enough to warrant concern.”

Jack nodded. Hang out in areas often enough and you eventually notice the same people, or people with the exact same dress code as others. And a group of four individuals with trench coats or leather jackets was common. And two men and two women, also common. Two sets of clothes, two genders, two of each, two locations. One too many twos to just chalk up to coincidence though, so it was worth exploring.

“You don’t think it’s hunters?” the Mekhet said.

There was a collective, hushed gasp from the other Kindred except for Vendram, Leauvion, and Jack. It was easy to forget that most young Dolareido Kindred had never really been involved in serious violence, or had their second life truly threatened. Getting into scraps with the Carthians, maybe breaking a few bones, getting a few of their own bones broken, was the extent of their Kindred-on-Kindred combat experience. What sort of violence they engaged in with kine, he did not know, but that wasn’t true violence, considering how one-sided it was. The idea of a kine being able to kill a Kindred was a level of violence his fellow neonates never considered.

So, as he glanced around at the Kindred, particularly the ones only a few years old, he winced. Other than the typical hardships a fledgling went through, learning to feed and hunt, and maybe an accidental frenzy like Jack had gone through, they were all green, soft. He could see the fear on their face at the mention of hunters, like it was some sort of mythic concept they’d never have to deal with, under the safety and protection of Dolareido’s utopian world.

Maybe Jacob was right. The city was soft. Was that a bad thing? It was, if hunters came to their dens and nests, looking to burn them out or stake them in their sleep.

Isabella sighed, but she didn’t say no. “It has been many years since hunters have made themselves known in Dolareido. All Kindred deaths have been accounted for in that time, and none have been to hunters.”

“ ... something has changed in that time,” Hella said. “Something recent has happened. Hell a lot of shit has changed as of late. Viktor’s dead, Tony’s dead. Azamel’s back, and Avery’s back. The status quo is so fucked right now.”

Everyone nodded, and exchanged a few grunts at the mention of Azamel and Avery specifically. Racism. Speciesism? Whatever, it was shitty seeing how quick the Kindred were to judge the Uratha and Begotten for their current, wildly hypothetical problems. He did not like it.

And he knew, in the past, when he was fresh to the fold, he wouldn’t say anything. But now, his mouth was opening, and he didn’t know how to stop it.

“The Uratha showed up because a monster was under our streets, not the other way around. They helped us deal with a problem before it became too large to handle. One of them died in that pursuit. And the Begotten haven’t caused any trouble yet.” Except for maybe Fiona’s rather large appetite. He had to visit her again, see how she was doing, if Azamel was treating her well. “Have any of you spoken with any of them? At all? A single word?”

Each of them glanced between each other and Hella, before all eyes settled on Isabella. The Daeva ancilla was not happy, and she frowned at him with some grit to her teeth.

He gave her license to ignore his relationship with Julias and the Prince. He didn’t give her license to ignore his role as intermediary with the Uratha. No doubt the wheels were spinning in her head, juggling that information, wondering how she could dance the Danse and put him in his place without offending that position.

“You were not even alive when Avery was here the first time, Master Terry. I was but a young neonate when those wolves were here last, and I remember the fear and carnage those creatures spread.”

He'd put himself in a weird spot, getting on this girl's bad side. But at the same time, the Uratha and Begotten didn't deserve this bullshit reputation following them around.

“Apologies Madam Leauvion, but I've had the fortune of being thrust into the center of our disagreements with them. I can assure you that Avery is not the violent person she was when she was younger. Age changes many things.” Ugh, talking like an Invictus. He could feel the silver growing on his tongue. Julias would have been proud. “And the Begotten only wish to find a safe place they can satisfy their appetites. If anything, they will be the first to extend invitation to us for friendship.”

He didn't mention that he wasn't exactly sure about Azamel's motivations. Athalia, Fiona, they just wanted to eat and live their lives, according to them, but he had as much chance of understanding Azamel's intentions as he did a goddess's. And not a nice, loving, tender goddess, but some ancient deity of destruction, ruling with odd laws and an iron claw.

“The Begotten want to be our friends?” Hella said, one eyebrow raised especially high.

Jack nodded. “From what I can gather, and from what Fiona has told me, Begotten are...” How to word this, how to word this. He put his smartphone into the pocket of his suit jacket, and leaned forward. These people were theater lovers, theatrical types, who thrived on overdramatic presentations and flowery prose. People who thought purple prose were good prose. Gross.

Well, he could get a little flowery, a little poetic. Being around Antoinette was rubbing off on him.

“Begotten are monsters,” he said. The crowd blinked at him, obviously confused. “Vampires, werewolves, and other scary shit that’s out there, bumping in the night, are monsters. Cause as much as we’re Kindred, and we’ve gotten used to thinking of ourselves in that way, it doesn’t change that we’re monsters. We’re the thing humanity fears when it’s dark, and their imaginations run wild. They think they see movement in the shadows, and tell themselves there’s nothing there, don’t be stupid, monsters don’t exist.” He nodded to himself, and leaned in a little more, elbows on his knees. Everyone was listening, wide-eyed. “We’ve all embraced that role as normal for us. We’re Kindred. We’re the thing that traps people in dark alleys.”

Everyone nodded, understanding on their faces. It was easy to forget sometimes that vampires were, in fact, monsters.

“Werewolves, they’re a different kind of monster. These animal hybrids that are ... absurdly, ridiculously, massively strong.” He shuddered as the memory of the fight with the Azlu hit him. The screaming and blood and shredded rock. “And I’m sure there are more monsters, like Kindred, other races of beast that defy science and hide in shadows.

“But Begotten are ... more...” Wow, this was a difficult concept to get across, to word in a way that made sense. “Fiona says, she believes vampires are simply a type of Begotten, that for some reason, reproduced or spread in ways normal Begotten can’t. Same with the werewolves. We’ve integrated with the living, with cultures, with societies big and small. But for monsters, classic, true, real monsters, ancient and unknown, joining society is not so easy. They are the stuff of nightmares, literally.”

“Literally?” Three of the younger Kindred said, at the same time.

“Literally. Imagine if nightmares could be something you could literally touch, literally see while awake, literally have rip you to shreds. According to her, dreams, nightmares, they're real things in some weird existence outside of this one. And monsters? They come from there, from the nightmares, from this dark place where all of kine's fears manifest, in some sort of aether. Now, imagine ... movies like The Thing, or IT, or storytellers like Clive Barker and H.P. Lovecraft's works, or ancient cultural beliefs like wendigo or dullahan or jorogumo, or what have you." After a couple conversations with Fiona, he did his research into ancient, mythological monsters. Fucking scary shit, knowing they probably existed in reality. "These creatures, these nightmares given form, they see us and ... it would seem they only wish to find coexistence among their brethren who've managed to integrate with the sheep far better than they have. Than they ever could.

"So while we think they're strange, and alien, and dangerous, they just want to ... fit in with us." A gross oversimplification, he was sure, but it served for the conversation, and the listening Kindred nodded a few times as they glanced between each other.

Isabella didn't look so sure, but after a few seconds of her own contemplation, she shrugged and nodded. "Unfortunately, none of that dismisses the danger these monsters bring. And as for the werewolves? If you believe age has changed Avery, I must insist on proof."

Step in the right direction, at least.

"Then I will make sure to ask her about Barry. They're nesting near, and I know they're already looking into the fire. I'll find out what they know, and you'll see, they only want to help." Because tomorrow, he had a date with a pack of werewolves.

---

---

~~Eric~~

Eric watched the sun set, and sighed.

He was too young to be a taxi driver, way too young. Thirty wasn't young, but at the same time it was. Money versus health. In the modern age you got to live longer, and had less money to do it on, leading to a generation of men and women who were stuck between the glorious days of being a child, oblivious to the future, and the glorious days of being old, riding the economy of the baby boomer generation and their total obliviousness to the economic struggles of people his age.

So, he became a taxi driver. Because what the fuck else was he supposed to do now?

He sat parked at the corner of Fifth Vonta Street and Marian Street, a corner between North and South Side. He sat there, and watched the sun go down as the night shift started. It was nice to see, nice to remind himself something existed beyond the night, beyond the fake light and fake personalities and fake tits of the city life.

He took a moment to check himself in the mirror. He was a good looking man he thought, a black man with a shaved head, average height, and a stern face. The face was a problem; people didn't tip as well to someone with a stern face. He practiced a few smiles in the mirror, slid his fingers along his clean-shaven cheeks and jawline, and tried a few more. Nope, smiles never got out as anything more than a sneer.

Sighing, he put the car into drive, and headed back into South Side. Around this time of night, there was a drastic shift on what people wore, and what sort of personalities pedestrians had. People had less energy in the day, and wore normal business clothes. Come the night, people started to act differently, possessed by demons of greed, glutton, and lust.

As he drove by the ruins of the burned apartment building, he glanced out his window. Some suits were standing around it, taking pictures, couple of youngsters. Weird. But, not his business, and he put his eyes back on the road as the traffic of cabs, limousines, and expensive cars with nowhere to drive started to greet him.

But something was different. Something in the air maybe. Something he could taste but couldn't see.

As a couple hailed his cab and he pulled up to let them in, he eyed them closely. The man's build, the woman's build, the thickness of their arms and shoulders and back, whether they could pose a danger. He glanced at the man's sides, and the woman's as well, for any potential firearms. Did they have knives hidden anywhere? Were they a threat?

Could he kill them?

He shook the thoughts loose. Random, to suddenly want to kill the first fare of the night. "Where too?"

"You know the club Bloodlust?" the woman said, brushing the blond locks from her eyes and smiling at him in the rear view mirror. Flirtatious, but not blatantly or with intent, far as Eric could tell, especially considering the man next to her was pressed against her and leaning in to plant a few kisses on her neck.

He could smell the cigarette smoke on them, a hundred times worse than usual. He could smell the sex on them too, and that was not something he wanted to last in his taxi.

"I do." With a small salute, he got moving.

Driving in a packed city wasn't fun. Stupid to even let his mind go in that direction, to look for fun in his job; just, holy fuck, driving in a huge, dense city was hell. A hell he'd been driving people around in for almost a year now. Not that Dolareido was the worst place, at least outside of Devil's Corner, but the stop-and-go of city streets was torture.

He looked in the mirror again. The couple were kissing each other, rubbing against each other, and as the man caressed the insides of the woman's thigh underneath her dress's skirt, the woman smiled at Eric again.

"Sorry," she said. "Just ... you know."

He smirked — a smirk practiced to handle all manner of social interactions — and nodded, before he eased into the front of the club. "Here you are. That's eight fifty."

Giggling and laughing, the couple started slipping out of the cab, and the man pulled out some cash before passing it to Eric.

"Thanks," Eric said, and gave the man another casual salute as the tipsy, high-as-fuck fellow waved back before walking into the club.

He found himself watching the man and his girl walk away, and again, he kept an eye on spots they might be hiding weapons, their posture to see if there was any aggressive intent, to see—

What the fuck was wrong with him? Man and his woman were just a couple of horny people with some alcohol in them, and cocaine. He could smell that too. And as the odor of other people came in through the opening and closing door of his cab, he took stock of each one. He could smell the bouncer at the door. He could smell one of the people by the street, smoking; their cologne too. He could smell one of the women come bouncing out of the club, giggling and squealing, her dress barely containing her breasts. He could smell cocaine on her too.

What the fuck. He could smell so many things, like each and every one of them was shoving a body part under his nose.

He squeezed the steering wheel until he felt his knuckles fight to circulate blood. The thump thump of the music of the club filled his ears, resonated in his skull, matched his heart rate. He growled at no one as he stirred in his seat and felt his muscles tense, felt his teeth bite down, felt his blood kick into high gear and fill his muscles.

Calm. The fuck. Down.

He moved on, forcing his breathing to settle and his eyes to focus on the street. Lot of people, lot of pedestrians with no respect for the road, lot of people drunk or high stumbling onto the streets. Much as he wanted to run them over, that'd mean the end of his career. But maybe jail would be better than this job and a shitty apartment.

He got maybe forty feet before someone jogged up to him from behind. Him specifically, not any of the other cabs. Some guy in a suit, with a suit that probably cost as much as Eric's apartment. He had a shaved head too, a white guy, with some scars on his cheek and a thickness to his shoulders. And a big, bright smile.

Eric squeezed his steering wheel harder as he felt his arm hair stand up on edge. Dangerous. Man probably had a pistol inside his suit jacket. And from the way he carried himself, the man knew how to fight. Someone Eric would have approached carefully in the ring.

Eric pulled over, but the man didn't get into the taxi. Instead he came up to the window, and knocked on it twice with a knuckle. Going to be one of those nights.

With a sigh, Eric rolled down the window. "Yeah?"

"Eric Tanverson?"

"... do I know you?" He looked the man up and down again. Nothing about the stranger suggested aggression, except for maybe the snake smile he had. A liar, or a lawyer; same thing.

“No. I’m John Ganders, work at Bloodlust. I recognized you from the local MMA matches.”

Eric sighed, again, for the millionth time, and looked back to the windshield. “And?” Fuck this guy. His fighting career was over, and even if it wasn’t, not like he or any fighter would appreciate getting their life interrupted like this.

“And, saw what happened to your knee. Wife nearly passed out in the seat.”

Yeah, having your knee dislocated and its ligaments ripped apart often meant the shin got to move in a direction it was very much not meant to move. It also meant his knee was ruined.

“Yeah. And?”

“Heh, knew you were an asshole Mr. Tanverson.”

“Excuse me?” He glared at the man, checked him up and down again for any movement, or for a gun, before he put an elbow on the window trim, and turned in his seat to face the man. No need to check the mirror for what his face looked like, he knew he was carrying his ‘I’m going to rip your head off’ face. Local news used to love to bring that up.

“Had to see if your ring persona was real, or just bullshit. But luckily an asshole like you is exactly what I want in a new bouncer.” Mr. Gandra — or whatever his name was — leaned toward the taxi, rested his hand on the roof, and grinned at him. “I’m offering you a job.”

“ ... in case you haven’t noticed, I have a job, and you’re getting in —”

“Without cab drivers, the city would die. Far be it from me to judge you your choice of vocation, Mr. Tanverson. But, work for me, bouncing for Bloodlust, and you'll be making triple what you make now. Better benefits too."

Triple. Triple. He could wipe his debts, he could settle his divorce, he could—no. He'd tried public work before. Never worked out, for good reasons.

"You don't want me bouncing for you, Gandra."

"Ganders."

"Whatever. Not going to bite my tongue for stupid customers. So —"

"And that's exactly what I'm looking for, Mr. Tanverson. An attractive man with a sharp tongue and a rough history. Bloodlust attracts certain types, and I need someone good with their words and a good looking jaw to go with it. You'll draw in a certain clientele, and get rid of others with a conversation. Only need to use your fists if absolutely necessary, but those situations do occasionally happen."

Attractive? Was the man gay? Maybe that was the unusual vibe Eric was picking up from him; which made sense, given the amount of times Ganders looked him up and down. He wasn't getting any aggression from him.

Or he was just the friendly sort. Not many of those in your life, Eric. Man said he had a wife anyway.

"Good with my words? You can't be serious."

"So you're telling me you didn't go on that five minute long, uninterrupted, flawless, not a single stutter rant about your Crowley match, a few years ago? A perfect stream of unending insults? It was like a scene out of Full Metal Jacket, fucking beautiful."

Crowley had pissed him off with some pre-match dissing. Man just needed to be put in his place. That had been a fun night though.

“ ... this some kind of trick? You offer jobs to strangers all the time?”

Laughing, the man reached into his suit jacket, and pulled out a card. “My business card. Think it over, give me a call. You’re already working nights, so you might as well make decent money while doing it.”

The grimace in Eric’s lips refused to leave, but he took the card anyway. That was enough for Ganders, and the man offered him a salute before he walked back to his club. Not his club, according to the card, but a club he worked for as a manager.

Eric set the card on the dash, and resumed his route.

---

Back in his apartment. His shit apartment, the cheapest one-bedroom he could find that didn’t put him in Devil’s Corner. He growled at no one and tossed his keys onto the kitchen table before he stepped into the bathroom. More like a closet that just happened to have a small tub and a toilet. But it was enough for him to stand in, and look at himself in the mirror.

Mom always said if he didn’t stop frowning his face would get stuck that way. She was always right.

Eric sighed and looked down at the sink as he set his hands on the outside edges of the counter. He squeezed, and squeezed, and squeezed until his arms started to shake, until his fingers turned brighter at the knuckles, and he heard the tile on the counter top begin to crack.

Calm. The fuck. Down.

Deep breaths, deep breaths. He stared at himself in the mirror, the sweat that was beading on his forehead, and at his brown eyes. There was a spec of amber in there that almost made his eyes look like gold; his wife had loved it.

The night ran through his mind, with each cab fare planting a specific memory. There'd been a couple covered in tattoos, and he knew they had knives in their boots. There'd been a couple of women who smelled of cocaine, and one of them looked comfortable with her purse, like she might have had a gun in there. There'd been more than few guys who looked ready to fight with their bare hands. And there'd been a few dozen men and women so fat they had trouble getting into the cab, let alone pose a threat. Prey. They were just prey. Meat. Lambs for the slaughter.

He stared at the sink and watched it vibrate. His arms were still shaking, and his fingers were starting to sink into the counter, through the tile. He wasn't gripping the counter like something you'd squeeze in the palm either; instead, he was pressing his fingertips down on it like claws.

He let go of the counter, and stared at the indentations of his fingers. He was a strong guy, but not that strong. The fuck was eating at him so much? Handed an opportunity to get out of this hole and he couldn't even think about it, could only think about all the irritants in his life.

The smell of blood was in the air. Was it? There was no blood in his apartment. But, he could smell it, smell the life of it drifting through the air. An odor so thick he could almost swim in it, run his hand through it. Once his fingers let go of the counter, he raised one and stared at it, at how it flexed and squeezed and curled like there should have been claws there. Only way to describe it, only way it made sense. There should have been claws on his hand.

He slammed the bathroom door, and collapsed against it. Ass to the tile of his bathroom, head hanging, he gripped the back of his neck and squeezed on it. The muscles fought back, and pulsed. They felt bigger. His head jerked up with painful neck snap, and he raised his hands again to look at them.

Claws. There were claws.

He stared at the colossal hand, at the nigh black hair that was growing from the back of his knuckles, far longer than his normal hair. Hands big enough to crush. Hands strong enough to tear people apart. Hands fit for pinning down prey as he bit into them and ripped out their throat.

No air. No air! Couldn't breathe, couldn't get air, couldn't get above the blood. He stood up and turned around, but his hands couldn't grip the doorknob right. Drowning! Couldn't get out, couldn't breathe, couldn't—

His head jerked up from hanging between his knees. Breathing again, he could breathe. His ass was still on the bathroom floor, and his hands were normal. Normal, perfectly normal. Beads of sweat had started dripping down his face again, and he wiped them away as he forced himself to stand up. He wanted to vomit. Nausea ripped at him, and dizziness destroyed attempts to stand.

He should see a doctor. He must have caught some sort of disease, right? What the fuck sort of disease made someone hallucinate like that? No, not a disease. He must have just been stressed. Last thing he needed was to get locked up in a psych ward for something that was just his stress and imagination. And that's all it was. Stress, and probably malnutrition. Hell, maybe he'd just fallen asleep for a few seconds and his fucked up mind took the opportunity to hit him with a quick nightmare.

He needed to eat something. Groaning, he reached out for the bathroom countertop again, and forced himself to stand. Best he had in here for food was a multivitamin, but he took it anyway, swallowed it dry, and turned around to face the door.

Blood. There was blood on the door. It was pouring down from the seams, trickling, thick and heavy. It came down over the smooth, boring slab of white-painted, worn wood, and buried it in flowing red.

He was hallucinating or dreaming or something. Snap out of it. Breathe! Fucking breathe.

“No. No it’s a dream. I’m dreaming. I’m fucking dreaming. This...” He reached out for the doorknob, and opened it. White flashed, buried him, blinded him, and he plummeted down through the floor as it gave way underneath him. Blood. He was sinking through blood. Drowning again in blood.

Before his lungs started to burn, the blood dropped him onto new surface, like he’d fallen out of the guts of a cow. Dirt in his fingers, blood dripping down from his smooth head and nose, from his shoulders, and down into the grass before it disappeared. After a minute of silence, of waiting for death or for this sick joke to be over, he stood up, gasping, staring, looking around. Where the fuck was he? Not his apartment. Jungle? Forest? There was grass, there was blood, and there were trees. The wind cut through the branches and howled like a banshee. The quiet hum of the city was gone, and instead he was surrounded in the silence of screaming winds and rustling grass.

No way this wasn’t a fucking dream. He slapped himself, hard, hard enough to cause his head to jerk to the side and for his neck to wrench. Pain hit him with all the bitterness and stinging aftertaste of a real slap. Not dreaming then. Maybe? Christ, he was in a forest, he had to be dreaming.

He looked around again. Blood on the grass, blood on the trees and their bark, blood on his clothes. He raised his hands once more, and tried to wipe the sweat off his face. It wasn't sweat. His palms dripped of the red liquid, and when he tried to wipe it off his jeans, his fingers grazed something soft and squishy.

Flesh, not his, was on his leg. Something wet, warm, with a bit of fur, was stuck to his fucking pants leg. He gulped, body shaking and lungs refusing to breathe again, and he flicked it away. The air was cool against the wet skin. Cooling blood.

He turned around. A body, something with antlers, something with fur and hooves. A leg, a destroyed head, brains and eyeballs and teeth broken apart against the wood of a tree. And he could taste it. He could taste blood, and bone, and shit he didn't know the name for. He put his fingers to his mouth, and pulled out a bit something trapped between lip and teeth. It was meat. It was flesh.

There was only one source of light, and it was casting everything in the most sorrowful shade of blue his mind could comprehend. As if light itself could be sad. As if light itself could mourn. The full moon.

He fell to his knees, and stared up at the night sky. The moon stared at him, demanded his attention, demanded his eyes and for him to look at it and only it, before it bellowed a booming voice upon him. A woman's voice? If a celestial body could have a female voice, something that echoed with power and depth and noise beyond imagining, it would have sounded like that.

“Breathe!”

His eyes snapped open, and a lungful of air hit him hard enough to send him stumbling back.

His bathroom. The cold tile on his feet, with tiny puddles of his sweat. The shitty door, just old, worn wood with white paint. The dirty shower curtain and stained tub. The bathroom counter that he'd just damaged. He was back in his bathroom, which meant all that insanity was just a dream.

It couldn't have been a dream. He hadn't fallen asleep, and hell, he was still standing up, hand on the doorknob. Hell, his face still hurt from the slap. Hallucinating, not hallucinating. Make up your fucking mind, brain. If you're going to fucking kill him, or turn him into a psycho or something, do it now, stop fucking with him.

Open the door, Eric.

He gulped, and stared down at where his hand squeezed the metal, arm quivering, doorknob shaking in its loose screws. Open the door. Open the fucking door.

He opened it, slowly, the creak of the metal hinges ringing out like sirens blaring in his ears.

A meow almost made him jump.

“Kat, god damn it girl. I could have...”

Kat rubbed herself against his legs. An American Shorthair, Kat was a beautiful little lady, with black and gray lines and a white tummy. And the softest, most elegant face. His total fucking opposite.

As she did circles around his legs, rubbing herself to his shins, he took another deep breath. The anger faded away, the shaking stopped, and he found his old smile again as he leaned down to pick her up. It was why he bought a cat after all, to relieve stress. Supposed to add years to your lifespan. And he fucking needed it.

“Girl, I may be going crazy. I think ... I ... I don't know girl. Could be going crazy. Could be ... just ... stress.” Just stress, that's all it was. He was fine two days ago, other than the inevitable peptic ulcer from his regular job that was going to kill him. Just fine. Completely, totally fine.

Kat seemed to think so. But then, Kat was a very dumb cat. Like nothing was wrong, like he didn't just have a bunch of hallucinations, like he still didn't remember the taste of animal blood in his mouth, and the texture of its flesh, like everything was perfectly fine, she purred.

He needed to move on, think about something, anything.

“ ... you think I should take the job? Working as a bouncer is bound to lead to violence ... course, with the people I see in that Bloodlust club, a single punch would take out most of them.” Bunch of city slickers; of which he was too, but at least he wasn't soft. He shrugged, cradled his girl to his chest, and sat on his half-broken couch in front of his tiny TV.

Kat purred into his neck, and gave him a few headbutts, ears rubbing against his jaw and paws pressing against his chest. The cat odor was strong, but not bad. He'd changed the litter before leaving, but he could smell that too. Hell, he could smell old widow Ms. Swanson smoking cigarettes a few rooms down the hall.

And he could hear the televisions of nearby apartments, when he normally couldn't. He could hear the potheads talking down the hall. He could hear the barking of dogs; nothing unusual there. But he could hear the meowing of distant cats too, in rooms far down the hall, and from floors above and below him. And, as Kat continued to purr into his chest, he could hear the rumbling in her body almost overpower his hearing, like a lawn mower.

Good thing he loved the sound and feel of her purrs. He lay down on the couch, set Kat on his chest again, and pet her as he tried to let the thoughts pass. He knew what his own blood tasted like; a decade of fighting in a ring taught him that. The taste of that thing in his dream, that buck, was a different taste entirely. Hair, iron, and other crap he couldn't guess. And he could feel his muscles ache, as if he'd just run miles, as if he'd just spent a night at the gym.

His knee was fucking killing him.

---

He woke up sweating, and gasping.

Kat flew off of him in a panic, and he winced as her claws nicked his skin. The tip of one of her nails got trapped in the fabric, and came off of her claw easily. Clip her nails, you lazy fuck.

Groaning, he set his feet down on the floor and forced himself to breathe. Still sitting on the couch, he leaned forward and rested his elbows on his knees, hands and head dangling. Sweat dripped from his forehead to the carpet, and he could feel it soaking through his shirt; goddamn underwear too. He needed to go pop a multi-mineral or eat some half-salt or something, before he compromised his electrolytes. The fuck was wrong with him? He couldn't stop sweating all the time, but it wasn't gross nasty sweat from the heat or exercise. It was a cold sweat, like someone was choking him to death and he couldn't stop them.

He brought his hands to his face and wiped away the drops. Dreams. Fucking nasty dreams, of animals chasing and biting things. Of roars and tearing flesh apart. Dreams about weird things, weird looking beasts with too many arms or legs, and him ripping them apart. The hallucinations fit much better in his dreams, made more sense to be there than when he was awake, but they weren't as bad as the hallucinations yesterday either.

Just needed a nap. That's all he needed. Now he felt better, with all the crazy shit in his brain firing during his slumber instead of while he was awake.

“You ok Kat?”

Kat meowed her annoyance, and hopped up onto the small table between him and the TV. Perched and frowning at him, she meowed a couple more times, and waited. A queen who demanded her respect, and her food.

“Sorry girl. Just ... really weird dreams.” He got up, did a few stretches, did some leaned squats on his bad knee to warm it up, and went to his tiny kitchen. A glance back over his shoulder showed the sun starting to cut through the curtains. Meant the sun was peeking over the neighboring building. Lunch time. “Shit, really sorry girl. Must have conked out longer than I thought.”

Kat followed after him, and as per usual once she realized he was going for the cupboard by the oven, she started rubbing against his leg. Queen wanted her food. And of course only the best food would do.

“You know you’re the reason I can’t afford good coffee?” Groaning again, he put the pot on between pouring the girl her food bowl, and filling her water fountain. She got the good food, and the fancy drinking gadget that created moving water. He got rice and shitty coffee.

Couldn’t bring himself to do otherwise. He smiled down at the little lady as she started to eat and licked from the tiny fountain, with the grace of a queen too. None. And as she ate, he scooped her litter box, swept up any bits of litter, washed his hands, and sat down with a bowl of rice. After the rice he’d shower, and then watch TV for a little while before getting some more sleep, and then going to work. Another regular, boring day, with a routine so dull it was undeniably a repeat of yesterday, and the day before, and the day before that. Until someone knocked on the door.

He set the large bowl down, and squeezed the edges of the glass. His arms started to shake. His fingers squeezed in just the right spots to not break the glass; any other place and he was sure the bowl would shatter. His muscles started to clench, flexing, bracing for inevitable combat. Calm the fuck down, calm the fuck down. Breathe.

This wasn't normal. And it wasn't PTSD; fuck was wrong with him for even thinking the thought? He'd been a ring fighter, MMA, not a fucking soldier. He had no reason to be shaking from head to toe, imagining scenarios in his head of the person at the door breaking it down, and trying to stab him, shoot him, jump him, ruin his home and take his life. No reason at all. But he was imagining it. And he was imagining the feel of their neck breaking in his grip. Bones snapping, cartilage tearing, the feel of skin and meat ripping apart in his teeth.

The sensation was very overt. He thought if he was going insane, the effects would be more subtle, sneak into his life and slowly take him over. American Psycho. Sociopathy, maybe even Hollywood's version of schizophrenia, leading to aggressive behavior and delusions, until he was killing prostitutes by dropping chainsaws on them. Real prostitutes, or hallucinations?

The door knocked again. And he was still shaking. Breathe, just breathe.

He got up, wiped away a fresh drop of sweat from his forehead, and opened the door. Fuck, it was Mr. Pitt.

"Got my money, Eric?"

"Fuck you. You want the money? Get it from Sheryl."

Mr. Pitt was a short man, white, bald, with bit of a belly, and a nice suit to match his better-than-you mafia attitude. Matched the big guy beside him, another white guy except this man was tall, huge, with muscles coming out of his ears. Face kind of reminded Eric of a refrigerator.

“Your ex-wife doesn’t owe us money Eric. You do.”

“Yeah well, she got all the money. So go bother her.” He tried to slam his door shut, but Mr. Pitt’s muscle stepped in and blocked it with his foot. And, like he owned the place, Mr. Pitt stepped into the apartment.

“You don’t look good, Tanverson.”

“Rough time sleeping. Get the fuck out of my apartment,” he said. His words got him some angry glares from the tall stack of steroids.

Every muscle in Eric’s body, every fucking instinct wanted to grab the guy and break his nose, and then his arm. And he could too, he knew he could. Big guy like that lived in the gym and pushed around weak fucks for a living. Eric doubted the man had ever fought someone who fought back, and he couldn’t stop imagining how it’d feel to crush the man’s neck inward with his palm. But he wanted to do more than that. He wanted to bite the man’s throat out. He wanted to taste blood, taste muscle and skin and bone and cartilage and—

Deep breaths. Deep breaths.

“Looking down on money, Mr. Tanverson. Not good. Mr. Montel wants his money, and I’m afraid—”

“You came over here to shake me down for money in the middle of the day?” He folded his arms across his chest, and glared down at the fat bastard.

Pitt shrugged, and leaned to the side to look past Eric into his shitty, rundown living room. “Rick’s son goes to the school in the neighborhood, and he forgot his lunch. We had to bring it to him.” The two morons chuckled.

“Want your money? Take it up with the law. I’m not paying you shit, how many times I have to say it?”

Pitt sighed and looked down, complete with a dramatic shrug. “You’re the one that agreed to the loan, Mr. Tanverson.”

“My wife—”

“I don’t care how your wife convinced you, you’re the one that agreed to it. And Mr. Montel has been very understanding of your circumstances. The divorce. The injury. He gave you a six month extension. At no interest! You’re a very lucky man, Mr. Tanverson.” Fat bastard walked past him, and when Eric moved to get in his way, moron number two put out a huge hand to block his path, letting Pitt explore his apartment.

“Sheryl got the jewelry, the car, everything.” Not like it was a secret. Still tasted like ashes though. The lawyer bills alone drained what little money he had left. “And—”

“As I said Mr. Tanverson, your loan, your money. Your head.” He walked around the couch, in his shoes no less, and chuckled as he analyzed the shit world Eric lived in. “Get a roommate, Mr. Tanverson. You’ll need the money. I—oh! What a precious creature.” Mr. Fat Bastard got down on a knee, and held out a hand for Kat. It’d have been nice if Kat was a mean feline, maybe take after her owner, but that just wasn’t Kat. Damn cat came up to the intruder, sat down, and stared up at him with her big soft eyes.

“Don’t touch my cat, Pitt.” He came up to the man, even as Rick stayed within an inch of him at all times. “Ever seen John Wick?”

Fat bastard laughed, got up, and walked past him. Stared up at him too, met his eyes as he pat Eric on the shoulder, and then moved for the door.

“One month, Mr. Tanverson. One month, before Mr. Montel loses his patience. And then a lot more than just Rick and myself will be back.”

Eric growled. A literal growl, something deep in his throat. It didn't sound terribly human, and Mr. Pitt raised a brow as he looked over his shoulder at him. But the little man shrugged it off, flicked his fingers in a dismissing wave, and walked out the door.

Going to kill him. Eric was going to kill him, and Rick, and any other fucker that showed up at his door. Kill them all, rip them apart, bite into their fucking throats and tear them open. He—

A meow broke through his maelstrom of violent thoughts. He looked down at Kat, and scooped her up into his arms. Soft, a little fat, face a bit flat; just made her face look soft and adorable. And he leaned in to rub his nose against hers, only for her to reciprocate with a few licks of her rough tongue. Totally oblivious to everything, to the danger, to the knife's edge Eric's life was balancing on. She just wanted to cuddle, eat, sleep, and chase the occasional laser pointer.

He walked over to his shit couch, Kat in his arms cradled like a baby. His free hand stroked her belly, then her ears, then past to reach for the table and pick up the card that man had given him. John Ganders, manager at the Bloodlust club. A very successful club, swimming in profit and with customers swimming in money and drugs and sex. Christ what a slutty city. Even the cops were getting in on it, Eric bet. Who cares. Adults could do whatever they wanted as long as they didn't hurt anyone, and Eric agreed with that philosophy.

He just wasn't sure he wanted to be there when adults were engaging in that philosophy.

“What do you think Kat? If you get sick, I don't have the money for surgery or medicine right now.”

She meowed.

“And if I get sick, well then we’re both fucked.”

She meowed again, longer this time.

“ ... ok, I’ll do it Kat. Not because of that fucker Mr. Pitt either, but because ... fuck we need a better place to live. And I don’t want to lose you.” Only good thing going in his life right now, the cat he bought on a whim cause he knew he needed to lower the stress in his life. And fuck losing the one good thing in his life.

She meowed.

~~Jack~~

This was going to be dangerous. Not super dangerous, he hoped. Mildly dangerous? Best he could hope for, walking into Carthian territory, and then surrounding himself with a bunch of werewolves, snarling and roaring and biting and clawing. Course they wouldn’t be doing that, but he had a pretty vivid memory of what they were like transformed. Titans. Indestructible titans.

Indestructible titans that were, according to a friend of a friend, as horny as they were fit. Word had already gotten around about Natasha and her two lovers, and by the time the information had circled the Kindred net a few times, the story was that the two wolves were fucking her multiple times a night, every night. Exaggeration, surely. Maybe? There was no denying that the wolves were bastions of life, of raw power, heat, blood, energy. Made perfect sense they’d be as horny as a vampire with a belly full of fresh blood...

The driver dropped him off outside the appropriate building, a shitty rundown apartment building. Just how the Carthians liked it. He doubted they actually liked it like that, but economics was a cruel mistress, and capitalism bred inequality as consistently as people breathed. Money was different for a Kindred though, less important, just a byproduct of playing the game and herding the sheep.

The sheep around here looked at him with a few raised brows. A kid in a suit. He wasn't a kid, but he knew he looked like one, even with the fancy suit and shoes and tie. Must have looked like some sort of rich kid getting out of the nice car, with fancy rich parents and such. He laughed, and remembered the time he visited Garry with Julias. Did his sire look like his father in that scenario?

He stepped into the lobby, and started up the stairs. Room 312. Sure enough, once he reached the third floor of the dirty, water damaged, stained building, he found Matthew Wilson standing outside the door. Man was gigantic, utterly gigantic, with one of those happy, consistent smiles. The sort of fellow who was a genuinely joyful man. A rarity in the city, or anywhere really.

“Yo Jack,” he said with a small wave.

“Um, hello Mr. Wilso—”

“Whoa, just Matt little dude.” He held up his hands in surrender, as if Jack had just put a shotgun to his head.

“Oh ... ok.” So much for trying to be polite. Not that these wolves couldn't be polite, but Invictus tactics weren't going to work. He knew that too, but a part of him was hoping the form of politeness he'd been practicing for almost a year now would work on the wolves too.

But then, he smiled. Avery appreciated bluntness. Jack wasn't allowed to be blunt with his superiors, as it was very bad for Invictus business rocking the boat like that. Even with the Carthians, bluntness was dangerous if he touched a nerve. But the wolves were a different animal. Bluntness could work well, which meant he could be himself with them. He just needed to test the water first.

Matthew opened the door, and Jack stepped in. The big guy followed in after him and gestured for him to move toward the couch.

Not a chair, a couch. There was no desk with someone sitting behind it doing a power pose, and there was no arrangement of chairs pointed at a center or main point. He'd walked into a literal living room of an apartment. Avery's apartment, if he had to guess.

"Hey Jack," the old woman said. Well, maybe not old, but older, looked like she was in her fifties. Fit as hell, and tiny like him. Hard to picture a small woman like her leading anything, but she did have these titans as her pack. And when she was transformed, she didn't seem so little, especially with the flaming claws. How the fuck did a werewolf get flaming claws?

"Avery." He walked over to the couch, but didn't sit down. A little too much too fast for a business meeting.

Avery on the other hand had no such issue, already sitting in the window sill, one of her legs up and her side to the window.

"Glad you could make it."

"That was the deal, right? I show up, tell you what's up, you tell me what's up, and I make sure no one kills each other." A little bluntness. Testing the waters.

"Yeap," she said. Water tested, be blunt as fuck with these people. "Hey Clara, get in here."

Jack flinched, and looked down the hall. Clara came out of one of the rooms, and gave him a wink before she came over to grab a wooden chair from the connected kitchen, and sat in it reverse style.

Only made sense for Avery's second in command to be here, don't look into it.

"Hello Clara," he said, official as possible.

It only made her laugh. "Hey kid."

Avery, rolling her eyes, gestured to the dark street through the window. "Weird to see buildings burn down in Dolareido."

Yeah, it was. "Mmhmm."

"In most cities, a lot of the older buildings actually burn slow. Harder material. It's the newer buildings that go up like kindling, made of nothing but cheap shit, filled with nothing but cheap shit," she said. "Back in my day, things were made of real wood, and shit burned slow. But these days, everything's synthetic and just looking to snap into a blaze in seconds. I could light a couch on fire, and bring down a building in five minutes." Random lecture? Oh good god, she'd gone grandma mode.

"Dolareido's a little different," he said. "Far as I know, Viktor and Antoinette and Lucas, they pushed for buildings to be built with fire resistant material, when the option became available. Cause, you know, Kindred. So the older buildings, like the one that burned down, are the ones we're generally a little more concerned with."

"Exactly." She nodded to herself a few times, scratched her chin a few times more, and gestured to the buildings across the street. "Garry's neck of the woods, the buildings are either old, or not built like your fancy shit is. That fire wasn't too far from this part of the city either. And Kindred don't risk spreading fire."

"Telling me there's no way Garry would risk killing Barry with fire? Or covering up his murder with fire?"

“More or less.” Looking back to him, she smirked. She liked it when he caught on to what she was saying, just like a grandma would, complete with the oddly warm smile.

“You assume I suspected Garry,” he said.

“You didn’t? You’d be the first Kindred I ever met that didn’t suspect an opposing covenant of foul play.”

“Touche.” His turn to nod, and scratch his chin. “Is this what you wanted to talk about? Barry’s death?”

“Only to tell you what Clara told you, that we’re looking into it too.”

Nice of her. And suspicious. But that was just a bit of his Kindred paranoia showing through, hopefully. “Keep an eye out for four humans. Two trench coats, two leather jackets. Two men, two women.” He shrugged as everyone in the room raised a brow. “Yeah I know, shitty lead, but they may be connected.”

“I’ll remember that.”

The strangest meeting of his life, so casual he felt like he should be wearing a t-shirt. Avery didn’t seem too concerned with a Kindred in her presence, and if anything, she almost seemed amused about the whole thing. There was a small grin on her lips, the sort of grin someone had when their mind was elsewhere and imagining, or remembering happy things. At least she seemed in a good mood.

“I understand the Invictus ball is open invitation to all covenants, and even the Uratha and Begotten,” he said.

Avery raised a brow and looked over her shoulder straight at him. “... part of me thought that was a joke.”

He raised a brow to mirror hers. “What? No, the Invictus have balls every so often. And, not long ago, Antoinette had her own, where all covenants were invited. The Prince wants to keep the peace that the city is enjoying, and the Invictus are on board with that idea. And, since now there are Begotten and Uratha in the city, they’re a part of that peace.” He rubbed his buzzed head, and glanced around at the crummy apartment. Would they have the money? Well, they were pals with Garry, and Jack knew that the elder had the connections to at least get well dressed when he wanted.

But Clara and Matthew looked interested, and the two of them looked up with wandering eyes. Picturing themselves in ballroom clothes, maybe?

“It’ll be a sort of casual dress code,” he said, “for a ball, I mean. Suits and dresses, but nothing as strict as black tie. Showing some skin is encouraged.” Finally knowing the meaning of black tie and other dress codes was a useful tool in his kit.

“I’ll talk to the pack. Jacob being there may be an issue.” Avery looked back to the window, set a hand on her knee, and leaned back against the frame of the window sill. There was weight on her, somewhere he couldn’t quite place. “What’s Maria been up to?”

Whoa, hard turn on the conversation direction.

“Maria Turio?”

“Of course.”

He scratched his head again, and looked to Clara. She’d gone serious mode too. What brought this on?

“Invictus business, nothing I can discuss. That said, the Mirrden business is pretty public at this point.” And he very much doubted Avery was asking because of the Mirrden business. She was getting at something, but he didn't know what; question was out of left field.

“Yeah I knew it was a long shot, asking you.” She sighed, louder than Jack expected, and cracked her knuckles. “But I like you kid, so, fair warning. Don't trust her.”

“... honestly? That's status quo for Kindred, even here in Dolareido. I'm guessing in the pack, you all learn to trust each other with your lives, right?” he said. The three of them nodded, and he chuckled. Hey, this conversation was kind of fun, now that he was feeling more comfortable. “I can count on one hand the Kindred I trust with my life, with fingers to spare. Just the way things are. Madam Turio is pursuing her own agendas on top of Invictus agendas, I am sure.”

“No idea what those are?” Clara said, leaning forward on her chair a bit.

“Beyond the typical Kindred stuff? No. I'm the last person she'd tell her secrets to. I'm sure she's got plans on top of other plans to not only keep herself alive for a long time, but to achieve any motivations she has on top of that. Right now she's helping Damien start up the Second Estate once more, to sister our First Estate.”

Avery nodded, but frowned as her eyes looked down. Not satisfied, apparently. But after a few seconds of silence, she shrugged. “You're like a bunch of ... politicians, digging away at each other all the time, not realizing you're digging your own pits of hell.”

Pits of hell. The imagery was vivid. Thought for sure she was going to say they were digging their own graves, but pits of hell certainly carried some extra implications he couldn't deny. He winced as he considered each elder the city currently housed, each digging their own pit, each pit growing big enough to swallow the whole city and everyone in it. Certainly fit Jacob well, and the Invictus and Carthians a bit too. Antoinette though?

“I don’t disagree,” he said. “Mostly.”

Matt laughed at that, before walking over to the fridge and digging through assorted things. Things on plates? He pulled out an enormous steak, took off the plastic wrap, and set it on the counter.

“Want some?” Matt said, glancing his way.

Jack laughed. Matt didn’t. Wait, was he serious? Must have been, at least until he realized how absurd what he said was, and the giant started laughing too. Maybe he was trying to lighten Avery’s weird mood? Or he could have just been a big silly dope, and that would have partly explained why Natasha liked him. He was lovable.

“So we’ll see you at the ball then?” he said. “I have to warn you, it’s going to be ... well, maybe not as bad as Bloodlust, but it’s supposed to be about relaxing. Kindred relax by drinking kine, so kine will be there, and ... yeah, people can get pretty ... aroused.”

Avery rolled her eyes, and her two pack mates laughed. But Clara had a twinkle in her eye Jack recognized. She knew what he meant, but the others didn’t. They’d learn.

---

---

~~Eric~~

The phone call went well. Too well. John Ganders was excited to hire him, and bombarded him with all the benefits he’d get if he took the job. It was a very weird situation to be in, to have someone trying to convince you to take the job offer, when the job offer was already a much better deal than your current job. The dental, the medical, discounts on alcohol the club served, entry into the club whenever he wanted, and a salary that was indeed triple his current income.

He wasn’t sure he wanted it. At least as a taxi driver, he could focus on driving. At the club, he’d be standing around and watching people, interacting with them occasionally, making sure no one caused trouble. Cocaine and alcohol did occasionally lead to troublemakers, Ganders said. The man was so damn open about the drug use, but Eric doubted Ganders was distributing; no way it'd be worth the risk. Much as Dolareido was pretty light on punishment for trafficking or prostitution, it couldn't turn a blind eye to everything. Better for Ganders if he didn't touch the stuff, and just let his customers bring their own drugs and hookers.

Escort girls. Not hookers.

He chuckled as he slapped himself in the forehead, leaning back on his couch. He wasn't sure if he'd be able to bite his tongue enough to do this job. Not punching people would be easier than keeping his mouth shut. Maybe people would leave him alone? He couldn't get away with that, since Ganders wanted him to socialize, mingle a little, and make the customers feel welcome, protected. Desired. And despite Eric's protests that he'd suck at it, Ganders assured him his attitude was exactly what the club needed. A dark, brooding jerk attitude.

The man was wrong, and Eric's attitude would only cause problems, but whatever. He needed the money, as Mr. Pitt so eloquently explained, and if he could hold the job for a little while he might be able to make some dents in that problem. Not that he should have to, he felt. But maybe it was just dues, for being such a fucking idiot and trusting that woman.

He held out his arms for Kat, and after a few curious meows, she crawled onto his lap.

"If this doesn't go well Kat, I'm in shit luck. Quit my job for this."

She meowed.

"Not a care in the world. Good. Keep it that way." He picked her up, cradling her like a big, dumb baby, and went to his bedroom.

Hanging, hidden away in the storage closet, were his suits. He almost opened the closet before he realized a big problem.

“K girl, gotta try one of these on. Don’t touch. Cat hair not allowed on the suits.”

She tilted her head to the side, looking up at him, and meowed. Didn’t understand a word of course. But she understood plenty once he set her outside in the hallway, and closed the door. The meows were loud, and constant, each a ringing siren that might as well have said ‘blasphemy!’. But he needed to try these on.

The trip down memory lane was not fun. The parties, the Broadway shows, the quote unquote balls, the interviews with news crews inquiring about his next match. Ashes in his mouth. But the suits still fit. He knew they would; a bad knee and a shit life didn’t mean he stopped taking care of his body. It almost did though. Every night, it almost did. Fuck, if it hadn’t been for Kat, he’d probably be a fat angry drunk by now.

Sheryl had taken everything. Every god damn thing from him, but she didn’t bother with his suits. And, much as it was a tainted memory, he did used to live in decent luxury, with money to waste on quality suits that Dolareido’s expensive nightlife demanded. Maybe she left him with the suits as a way to rub his new, ruined life in his face. What good was an expensive suit if you couldn’t go somewhere expensive to wear it to.

He should have sold the fucking things. Might have gotten enough money to get that fat bastard off his back. And, much as he didn’t want to admit it, he was about to do just that before he’d ran into Ganders. Good thing he didn’t. Now, he could go look like a fool, bouncing for a club notorious for its sex, drugs, money, and everything in between.

He opened the door, and reached down to stop Kat from rubbing against his leg, as she inevitably would have. “Sorry girl, not tonight.

I'll be back in nine or ten hours." Had to hold her out at arm's length to minimize the damage, but when he set her down beside the food bowl, he put a treat into it, like he always did when he left for work. One tiny treat a day. Probably why she was a bit chubby. But, it was better to not have her see him leave, than have her meowing the neighbors into a stupor while he was gone.

---

"Now that! Is what I am talking about." Ganders snapped his fingers, and pointed at Eric as he walked up to the front entrance of the club. Not many people around, with the sun only starting to set. Customers didn't show up in their typical waves for an hour or two yet.

"This'll work?" Eric said.

"Yeap. Gotta admit, seeing you in a taxi, and then talking on the phone, I was wondering if I should have called you back to inquire about a suit. But this is fine. Perfect even."

Eric sighed and followed the man into the club. No one was in yet except the bartender. The music wasn't on either. And thank god the lights weren't doing that flashy thing he hated so much. He was going to have to get used to it though.

"Derek, Colin, Teller. This is Eric Tanverson. He'll be joining you in rotation."

Three other men, all taller than him, bigger than him, and dressed sharp. He was dressed sharp too, but it definitely screamed 'bouncer' when a guy who was easily two-twenty of muscle was standing around in a sexy suit, and these guys fit that description better than he did. They all could have worked for Mr. Pitt.

A light switch flipped in his brain, turning on a searing beam of scrutiny that hit every man before him. One of them had a scar on his chin, and he didn't fold his arms his chest, so he kept them at his sides and at the ready. Dangerous. Another one of them folded his arms across his chest, a small smile on his lips, and the most amount of meat on him. Dangerous only if someone attacked his ego, but otherwise probably the least dangerous of the trio. The other one came up to him and held out a hand. Thinner than his friends, but still quite tall, with a warmer smile on his face and some striations showing through on the neck. A white man, with a head shaved smooth except for a single, thin line of solid red hair down the center, front to back. Fashionable, eclectic without being ridiculous.

Most dangerous of the group, this Colin fellow.

“Mr. Tanverson,” he said, “glad to see you up and moving, after the shitshow that has been your life as of late.”

Eric raised a brow. Hell, everyone raised a brow. But as Colin stood there, hand out, smile unwavering, Eric burst into laughter, and shook the man’s hand.

“Wife left me, haven’t been laid since, debts to pay, and my knee is fucking killing me. Shitshow is a good way to put it.”

Everyone chuckled. A little self deprecation humor was a good way to break the ice, and these people seemed nice. Weirdly nice. Or maybe he was just a jackass who was too used to everyone in his life being a colossal asshole.

But that didn’t mean he stopped analyzing them, seeing if he could rip out their throats.

Stop it. Stop remembering it. Calm the fuck down.

“Teller and Derek are at the door today. Colin and Eric will be watching the floor,” Ganders said. “And Eric, since this is your first night, just remember that Bloodlust is pretty loose about a lot of things. See someone doing lines? Let them, as long as it’s in one of the darker corners. See a couple fucking, or whathaveyou? Let them, as long as, again, it's not on the center floor.”

“ ... anything I should genuinely throw people out for?” he said. Teller and Derek moved on to stand by the door; probably waiting to go outside when the night officially started. Just him and Colin watching the floor then.

His partner for the night shrugged and gave him a tiny nudge of the shoulder with the back of his fingers. “People getting too aggressive with their flirting; not just the guys, but the girls too. It happens sometimes. Anyone asking for money for anything too, give them the boot. We're trying to keep it a classy place after all.” A few more chuckles. Man knew full well classy wasn't exactly the word people thought of when they thought of Bloodlust.

But, all things considered, it really was a nice place, both in presentation and in physicality. His first time being in the club in a while, and now with the lights on, he hadn't realized before how everything looked spotless, clean, and almost shining. They kept the place in very good shape. A surprise considering how much shit went on in the dark. And with the lights on, he imagined the dance floor could actually serve as a stage for a far more presentable affair like lounge singing. Now that he thought about it, the place did look like a fancy lounge, that morphed into a sex club once the lights went red and the electronic music kicked in.

The bartender, a woman, was wearing clothes not dissimilar to the bouncers, a suit with open jacket to expose a comfortable white shirt. Attractive, to say the last, and she winked at him as she wiped down the counter. He knew better than to dip his pen in company ink though, and besides, she was probably just playing her role as the flirtatious bartender who, if you tip her generously or buy just one more drink from her, will sleep with you.

Club might as well have had sex for a subtitle.

“How much freedom I got?” Eric said.

Ganders stroked his chin, and walked toward the center floor. Eric and Colin followed.

“Freedom? I mean if you want to sit down with a particularly horny guest for a quickie, go ahead. Just keep it under fifteen minutes.”

“... I meant with how I handle the people I’m throwing out.”
Good god this man. No wonder the place was the way it was.

“Ah. You can get pretty rough, but if you break any arms or noses, you need justification. Feel free to lay down a bruise or two if someone deserves it.”

That was good, he could do that. Hell, he looked forward to it, to letting out some frustration. Tossing some dumbass punk onto the street with perhaps a little more force than necessary? Just what the doctor ordered.

---

He didn’t like the music. Didn’t hate it, but didn’t like it. He thought he’d hate it, expected it, but something about his new role changed his mind. It was like listening to a heartbeat, strong, steady, and pulsing. Combined with the white light timed with it against the dark, red light that buried the club, it made the whole club feel like it was the heart of the city, a literal heart pumping sex and drugs and blood through its veins.

It definitely got people into the mood. As he stood by the wall, off to the side where one of the staircases rose into the second floor, he watched the nightlife of Dolareido. A strange mixture of millennial attitude and the freedom being rich provided made for rather adventurous, directionless customers. Rich, or at least well off people came in, and drifted around from table to floor, floor to booth, and around and around talking to random people. No one knew what they wanted, they just knew modern life was a hollow existence, with every facet of reality succumbing to the destructive tides of the current world.

Sort of like the opposite of people in the sixties, but leading to the same behavior. Drifting, naive people, fucking and snorting and shooting and fucking some more, all the time.

He laughed, and took a deep breath to help cool himself down. It was a fairly cool night in Dolareido, the heatwave having finally passed a week or two ago. But in the club, where the bodies were grinding on the dance floor, the heat picked up again.

His senses were in overdrive, and it was making it difficult to breathe. He could smell so many things, so many people. Instead of just the odor of human skin in the air, he could smell individual people, individual colognes and perfumes, individual deodorants. Even as the music buried his ears with bass, he could hear people talking, overhear nearby conversations, hear a few mewls of some women. At first he thought he might have had some rescuing to do, but it was just how high pitched sounds were more piercing, and the women making them were very much enjoying themselves. One of them had a man on his knees under her booth, mostly hidden in the dark, eating her out. The other had a female friend beside her, drinking with one hand and fingering her with the other.

But at least most of the booths were of people talking, hanging out, socializing. He'd been worried that the whole club would be sex sex sex from ceiling to floor, but at any given time he found only maybe two booths on the bottom floor were actively engaged in sexual play. Maybe three on the second floor. And the people doing drugs were at least subtle about it. No one was doing literal lines on their table booths, and if they were, they kept it to the darkest corners.

All in all, standing around and watching people like this for eight hours was turning out to be far less stressful than driving people around. No more stop go stop go stop go. No more drunks and their ever-present threat of vomiting in his cab. No more awkward conversations about tips.

God bless cab drivers. He used to fight for a living, and compared to driving a taxi, fighting was easy.

The hours went by in a weird mix of joy and frustration. Happy to be standing around, watching people, making good money, wearing a nice suit, all around better everything. Not so happy that every single person that went by, he couldn't help but picture fighting, breaking apart, pinning down, tearing into. The tearing imagery was particularly problematic. Why tearing? Why the fuck was he imagining if he could rip out their throats with his teeth? Why—

“You're new.”

He turned his gaze to the woman approaching from the door. A woman about his height, or taller given her heels. She had a skimpy little black dress that only covered one shoulder, and the skirt was barely long enough to cover her ass. It was a really nice ass though, and he took a second longer than he should have looking the woman up and down. Short blond hair, a white girl with some bite to her eyes and the physique of a fighter finishing a cut. He liked what he saw.

Until the switch in his head turned on again. Look at her, look at her and see the truth. Breathe in the air around her.

She was dangerous.

“I am,” he said, a touch of withdrawnness to his voice. Apprehension, maybe. Sirens, or howls, were going off in his mind, and as much as he tried to keep his eyes on the girl's, they kept going to her arms and the power he could see in the slim-but-hard muscles. Something else to her though, something else that was screaming at him to be careful. Something that screamed beast.

“You look familiar.”

“Watch any MMA?”

“Oh! Right. Saw you in an injury highlights playback.” She came closer, set her hands on her hips, and looked down at his knee. “Shit was fucking gross.”

“Gross and painful.” He smirked, the sort of smirk people put on when they were trying to seem a bit imposing; he was no exception. This girl didn’t seem to notice though, or care, and she raised her gaze to look at him straight on, meeting him in the eyes with zero awkwardness. Yeah, a little taller than him with her heels on.

“Name?”

“Eric Tanverson.”

“Right right. Rings a bell now.” She snapped her fingers, nodded with the unearthed memory, and came over to stand beside him. “Jessy Herrington.”

The hairs on his arms stood up, and goosebumps started to send chills into his spine. Be fucking careful.

“ ... did you need help with something?”

“Me? Fuck no. Just got here, looking for a snack, saw the cute new bouncer and thought I’d say hi.”

Cute. Something about the way she said it would normally have been irritating, like she’d normally be ripping up the buried memories of his divorce and making him hate her for doing it. But, for some reason he didn’t know, he didn’t feel that from her. Maybe it was the strange, danger vibe he was getting from her, but the compliment came off more genuine.

“Thanks. You’re gorgeous.”

She grinned, and gave him a gentle punch in the shoulder, a buddy punch, something normally reserved for friends. As normal as saying hi for this girl, apparently.

“Fucking right I am.” She put her back to the wall, same as he had. And it wasn’t long before she had a knee up, foot to the wall, with her arms folded under her breasts and her eyes scanning the crowd. “Uncomfortable on your first day?”

“That obvious?”

“A bit. The other guys are a little more relaxed.”

“You want relaxed in a bouncer?”

She laughed, shrugged, and gestured to Colin. The man was standing beside a booth, and talking to the few in it. Laughing, gesturing with his words, telling a joke maybe.

“You don’t have to get drunk and shit, but in Bloodlust, you ... well, relax. No one’s going to cause trouble, and if they do, I’ll break em for you.” And to prove her point, she raised her hands and cracked her knuckles, putting a hand into the other’s palm for each resounding crack.

“Please don’t. That’s what Bloodlust has bouncers for.”

More laughter. This girl did seem to be actually having a good time, but he couldn’t smell any alcohol on her breath. He shouldn’t have been able to notice that in a club, where the smell was everywhere, but he could. The fact she didn’t have alcohol on her breath was the more unusual thing at the moment though.

“Not true. You’re here to stand around and look pretty, and make people feel more comfortable. Actual bouncing? Doubt it. Besides, lot more people here than me fully capable of taking care of any problems ourselves. Been working well for ... what, ten years now? Hell, longer, just had a name change at some point.”

Ten years to be running a club with this much illegal activity was a pretty impressive time running. He managed a small whistle.

“Well, I guess I’ll just stand here and look pretty.”

Jessy didn’t seem to like that answer. She looked him up and down, a few times at that, each taking him in like she wasn’t sure what she was looking at. Well, same for him. Each time her eyes caught his, they locked, and they stared at each other for a few seconds longer than was normal, than was socially acceptable. Attraction, sure, but he could tell she was sizing him up, the same way he was sizing her up.

“You should come hang out near our table,” she said.

“Our? You’re here alone.”

“Ha, observant fuck, aren’t you?” She shrugged, and gestured to the door, where some more people were coming in. “I’m with the two tiny chicks.”

Two tiny chicks. He imagined this Jessy character pictured her two friends as literal chicks, baby chickens, considering how small they were. A redhead stepped in first, quite short, curvy, with pale skin and freckles. The long red hair was frizzy, and he smiled at the sight of it. The girl that came in immediately behind her was even shorter, so short Eric doubted she cleared four ten barefoot. Long dark hair and a skinny frame, combined with her rather conservative business suit, painted her as meek. He doubted that was entirely true, coming to a club like this, but the first impression was loud and clear, especially compared to the redhead beside her, who was wearing a green dress with a long, double split skirt, a stomach window, and plunging cleavage. The only thing holding her large breasts in was a tiny strap of the fabric across the chest.

“See something you like?” Jessy said.

“I do. Your friends are quite attractive.”

“I know right? Well Fiona wears it on her sleeve. Natasha though? Looks great when I can convince her to wear something more revealing. And she’s so damn tiny and tight you can barely fit a finger inside her.”

Eric forced himself to look away from the two women, and back to the one beside him. He expected to find her smiling a big smile, the sort you’d wear when being sarcastic, but she didn’t have that. Her smile was subtle, and serious.

“ ... I have to admit, that is a very appealing thought.”

“Ha! Well damn, I like you Eric. Normally I can get a guy either too embarrassed to talk, or reduced to a horny child too stupid to talk.”

He rolled his eyes, but his own smile refused to leave. This Jessy girl was fun. Would any of his passengers have been this fun, if he’d bothered to talk to them?

“Been around the block a few times, I’m afraid.”

“I don’t see a ring,” she said. She got what he was hinting at pretty quick.

“Divorced.”

“Ah. Shitty divorce?”

“Very.”

“That sucks. Single?”

“Yeap.”

She clapped him on the shoulder, winked, and motioned with her head toward the stairway he was standing near. “Come upstairs, stand around, be our guard dog. We could use a guy to talk to. And I’m single, after a fashion, so play your cards right and I’ll fuck you. Or the redhead might.” Not a blink or break in her smile or anything. She was serious. “The super tiny girl isn’t single though.”

“Might not be the best thing, flirting with customers on my first day.” Which wasn’t true at all, from what Ganders told him. His job was to be attractive and stand around. And occasionally sit down.

“Well I know that’s not true. Been coming here a lot longer than you have. Now come on, hang with us.” Damn, she knew the club better than he did.

“ ... alright.”

“Great.” She gave him another buddy punch in the arm, and walked over to join her friends. A few words to them, and the redhead Fiona started laughing, before she peeked past her friend to look at him. And, she finger waved as she walked past. Seemed damn young to be coming to a club like this. Hell both the tiny women looked to be twenty.

But, as they walked past, he froze. The same feeling went through him, the same chill down his spine that his body responded to with enough adrenaline to kill an elephant. He could feel his heartbeat pick up as he caught the shy glances of the tiny girl in the suit, and feel his stomach brace for a fight as he caught the gold gaze of the redhead. The same thing, the same damn thing he felt when he looked at Jessy. No amount of ass swaying she did — and she had the ass of an athlete — managed to wash away the terror filling his guts.

That's what it was. It had to be that. Nothing else explained it. Terror. A cold, heavy, sinking feeling in his gut that weighed him to the floor. Something that ate away at him, paralyzed him, felt like parasites devouring him from the inside out.

He was afraid of these women. A real fear. The fear that bit at the skin when you were a child, turned off the lights in your basement, and scampered up the stairs before the hidden things in the blackness around you grabbed your ankle.

His mind shifted, and things he didn't understand began to click, perspectives falling into place. Everyone else, the other bouncers, the customers he wouldn't be surprised to find armed, the women who had the pepper spray and knife combo in their purses, they all just faded away. All of them were prey. These women, these three perfectly normal looking women were the predators.

Go talk to them? Hang out? Hell, if the Jessy woman was being serious, and it seemed like she was, more than talk. Maybe he could find out what was going on, why he was freaking out, why his heart was beating a million beats a second, and why every muscle in his body was getting ready for a fight.

He gulped, and followed them up the stairs. Up on the second floor, the music was quieter, barely, and the lighting was darker. Still red, with flashing white with the music, but not so seizure inducing. More booths, with people in them drinking and relaxing and talking. Fucking. Maybe not actively fucking, not really, but there was one man leaning back with his arms up onto the back of the booth, with a woman on each side of him, their hands doing something under the table the angle hid. Handjob, from two women, at the same time, and they kissed on the man's neck and lips as they pleased him.

The sex play he'd expected, but Jessy came up to the stranger and said hi while her two friends found another booth, and that he did not expect. Jessy laughed a few times, asked the man if he was enjoying himself, quiet enough that Eric shouldn't have been able to hear. But he could. She said something about a ghoul, too. Called him a ghoul, maybe? He didn't catch the details, but whatever she said, the man nodded after, called Jessy 'Boss', and then leaned his head back to continue enjoying the touch of the two drunk girls in his booth.

More laughter, all from Jessy, who walked away from the man and rejoined her two friends. She slid into the booth, trapping the smallest girl in the center. Well, maybe trapped was the wrong word, as Natasha seemed far more comfortable having some walls between her and the rest of the club. No doubt they dragged her here, forcing her to get some socializing in. Friends could be real assholes.

Eric walked over to them, and stood beside the booth on Jessy's side. But, he maintained his posture as bouncer, eyes on the floor and looking for anything that needed his attention. There wasn't, but at least he was doing his job.

"Ladies," Jessy said, "this is Eric. New bouncer here at the club."

"H-Hello," Natasha said. Quiet voice, bit of a stutter. Yeap, a bit meek, like he thought. Didn't change the feeling in his gut about about her.

"Good evening!" Fiona said. Bright, bubbly, and with some form of Scottish accent. And as he smiled at the curvy little woman, he felt the cold rock in his stomach grow. There was something to her, something in there, something different than Natasha or Jessy. Something he couldn't put his finger on.

She was beautiful though.

"Good evening ladies."

Fiona giggled, and took a sip of something from her glass. The other two had no drinks.

“Jessy says ye’re Eric?” The redhead took some time looking him up and down, and she squinted at him, as if she’d found ink on his shirt. No such ink was there, but the girl was looking at him anyway.

“I am,” he said, doing his best to sound friendly. Her smile faded, and for a second he thought he failed miserably, but she didn’t frown after like he’d expected. No, it was like the girl was looking at him as if she recognized him, as if she was trying to place him.

And, after a time, it was him who frowned. Which was apparently enough to snap her out of where her brain was taking her, make her sit up a little straighter, and redon her smile.

“Sorry. Thought I recognized ye,” she said. “Want to sit with us?”

“Can’t. Working.”

Jessy rolled her eyes, but shrugged and leaned back in her booth. “You can’t play hard to get to the point where you’re literally impossible, you know. That’s not how the game works.”

Natasha gave her tall friend a small shove. Comical, considering how tiny the girl was. “Jessy! Stop ... y-you know. I mean, Vincent, he’s ... he uh...”

“Getting a handjob from two strangers.” The blond shrugged, gestured with a flick of her fingers to her Vincent buddy, and then elbowed the tiny girl beside her. “He’s a ghoul, not my love. Sometimes I give the boys a week or two off, to do whatever, fucking other girls included.”

“Aye, I can see that. He do anything to get them both on him like that?” Fiona said.

“What? Nah. Vincent’s a sexy fucker; s’ all you need for a fling. Same goes for you ya know.”

The redhead raised her hands like she was praying to an ancient deity. “I’m trying! Just ... other than a few weird run ins in back alleys, and I ken I told Damien they were ... more exciting than I really got involved in, ye ken?”

Jessy laughed. “S’ why we’re here, right? Get you some dick, so your story to Damien won’t be a lie anymore.”

The tiny thing between them sighed and lowered her head until it was flat to the booth table. “I thought we c-came here to eat?”

“Ye two might be able to eat,” Fiona said, “but I need different.”

“How’s that been going?”

Fiona’s voice dropped to a whisper, and she leaned in toward her two friends. Jessy leaned in as well, until the three heads were all within an inch of each other. With the music to bury them, there was no way he’d hear their whispering anymore, a week ago. But now, as he looked down at the three women, these perfectly innocent looking women that had every instinct in his body flexed and demanding he respect their power, he could hear them. Bad idea to eavesdrop on these women, but then, he was never a smart man.

“Azamel’s been helping a lot. I dinnae kill them anymore, and instead of gorging, I take a wee bite every few days. Vrall’s nae used to being ... deprived like this. This constant state of mild hunger is hard on her.”

Ok, what? He raised a brow, and looked between the three women, but they paid him no mind. Whatever it was the Scot was talking about, Natasha and Jessy didn’t seem to notice the words kill and gorging and bite. Hunger? Vrall? He didn’t react, didn’t let them know he was doing anything more than his job, standing around and looking pretty.

“What about this Eric p-person?” Natasha said. And in the corner of his eye, he caught her peeking past Jessy’s leaning in head to glance at him. “He’s a bouncer. M-Maybe he’s ... a big meanie you can punish?”

Fiona shook her head. “Does nae carry his-self like one. Vrall would recognize the signs. He looks like an asshole, but nae an abusive type.”

“How about some sex then?” Jessy said. “He’s got that hard, stern look going for him. Bad boy maybe, just waiting to have his hard heart melted by your soft touch. And his hard cock pampered by your soft tits.”

Oh good fucking god. Every ounce of training he had stonewalling his wife went into action. He wasn’t offended, but damn, this Jessy girl was shameless.

Fiona snorted on a laugh, peeked over Natasha’s head at him, winked, and lowered her head back to their whispering circle. “Sound like ye want him?”

“I mean, sure maybe. But I’m getting a strange feeling from this guy. S’why I brought him up here,” Jessy said. “I mean, other than him being sexy and very fuckable.”

Fiona snorted again. A strange sound, but it made Eric smile. The juxtaposition of their words and the jovial tone was sending strange signals, like what they were talking about was fine and dandy.

“I am too,” Natasha whispered. “I mean, c-curious about him. Could j-j-just be ... an interesting g-guy?”

“Let’s find out.” Jessy raised her head from the whispering triumvirate, and slipped out of the booth. “I’m gonna grab a quick snack. Be back in five minutes. And you!” She got into his face, set both her hands against his chest, and leaned in. “Don’t go anywhere.”

Fiona and Natasha exchanged a few giggles as they watched Jessy walk down the stairway to the first floor. She made sure every step was exaggerated, so her toned ass, hugged by her barely existent skirt, swayed.

“Y-You ... you’re t-t-tough, to resist Jessy,” the tiny one said.

“Yeah well, a rough divorce can do that to a man.” Regretted it the moment he said it.

Both women made longing sighs, like a scene out of a romance comedy. He frowned, and made his own sigh, a disgruntled one. Didn’t work. The two girls looked at him like he was a wounded puppy now, who needed some TLC. God damn it.

He raised a brow as four more people came up the stairs. Two men, two women.

The switch in his mind went off again.

Chapter 43

~~Eric~~

Four more people who looked perfectly innocent, four more people putting his nerves on edge. Two men, two women. One white guy, and the other guy looked Hispanic. One black girl, and the other looked Hispanic as well. Mostly average heights for their gender, but they all looked quite fit. Well dressed, with relaxed suits and revealing shirts for the women that exposed hard stomachs. They had some tattoos, and carried themselves with a weird mixture of confidence, but also wariness, as if they were looking for something.

They caught his glance, and nodded his way. He was a bouncer after all, and some notice was to be expected. But beyond that, they moved to the center of the second floor and leaned onto the railing to look down at the dance floor. They moved with synergy, like four people who knew each other very well would. Like four people who would fight together if it came to it.

And they would fight. He could feel it. He could smell it. Was that wood? And ... something else, something he could barely smell. Something he didn't recognize, but made him think of metal. Metal working, maybe?

“A divorce ye say? That sucks. But, seems like ye got a nice job here! Must be a nice place to work,” Fiona said.

He forced his eyes away from the four strangers and toward the lovely, smiling redhead. Attracted to him, and she was the sort of girl who got happy, excited, bubbly, when she was into someone. It almost hurt how fun she seemed.

Some quiet, feminine groans drew his attention as well. The man who'd been calling Jessy 'Boss' was still leaning back, arms on the booth's back while he let the two girls do all the work. But now one of the girls had climbed onto his lap, sitting with her back to his chest, and had her skirt up to her waist. The girl next to her had stopped touching the man, and was now masturbating, based on what Eric could see from her arm angle, eyes blocked by the booth table thank god.

The noise drew the eyes of the two women beside him, and while Fiona outright giggled, Natasha's giggles were more subdued, as if she was nervous about making the sound.

"My first night, and ... you could say I'm a little surprised." He gestured to the man enjoying himself.

"F-First time in Bloodlust at all?" Natasha said.

"No, but I only came here a few times, years ago. And with a girl on the arm and a lethal amount of alcohol in the blood, you don't really notice the other booths."

"Still! Reputation must have p-prepared you."

He winced and scratched the back of his neck. Words never really did justice to seeing other people have sex.

"People here seem happy though." He shrugged, folded his arms across his chest, and looked back to the four by the railing. They whispered, tapped each other on the hands, made a few signs with their fingers, subtle, and not typical sign language either. Almost like he watching a football game, complete with a few tugs on their ears and brushing of their noses. Sly though, almost invisible, before the four walked away.

He watched them leave, until he was sure they were gone. Howls were still going off in his head, animal sirens, demanding he pay attention to their threat, and match it with his own. Only after a few minutes did the blood stop pumping madly.

He shouldn't have taken this job. Everything was going fine until these girls showed up, and sent his senses into override. Then four more people showed up and did the same thing, only to leave within minutes of arriving. Suspicious. Tell Ganders? Fuck, tell him what? That you're losing you're fucking mind and suspecting his customers of being deadly threats? No, keep your mouth shut and do your job.

He glanced down at the two girls. Natasha looked around her like she wanted to leave, but Fiona was looking at him more and more, taking peeks at him, smiling when she caught his eyes. Bubbly young redhead interested in the older, clearly damaged divorcee? Maybe. And he'd be lying if he said he didn't think the curvy little creature was gorgeous. But, the last thing on his mind was sex. He couldn't get the dreams and images out of his mind, of tearing into things with his teeth and hands. Of the taste of blood and flesh.

It wouldn't be so bad if it he didn't know what the taste was, what the sensations were, if the warmth and metal taste on his tongue weren't clear as day. If the mental images, being inserted into his skull with a pickaxe, weren't so fucking vivid and detailed and filled with smells and sounds and textures, maybe it wouldn't be so bad. And this job, being surrounded by so much flesh and noise, was making it worse.

Quit. Quit on your first day? And what about Pitt and Montel? Sheryl wanted the shit, but he was the fool that agreed to pay for it. He'd made his bed, time to lie on it. The bed was looking more and more like a grave though, until he'd found this job, this job that was making him want to—

“Ye sure you want this job?”

“What?” he said, looking Fiona's way. Mind reader?

“Ye’re nae the bouncer type. The other bouncers here are big and tall and smile. Ye seem more like a fighter, someone who’d be good when the chairs start flying. I mean, I could bring ye home, back to Scotland, and I’d trust ye in a bar fight! But standing there in a suit? Sure ye don’t want to sit down with us?”

Her intention was blatant, but she also wasn’t wrong about him standing there in a suit, frowning and not smiling.

“Debts to pay and a life to rebuild. Bloodlust offered, and I’d be stupid to ignore the knocking at the door.”

The two girls nodded, but Fiona didn’t seem to get the hint that he wasn’t interested in being sociable. Or she did, and considered it a challenge. She got up, scooted around the booth, and sat in it so Natasha was further from him, her closer.

And then she reached out, took his arm, and yanked him down to sit with her. Strong, the little redhead. Plus he was standing while she was sitting, so she had the better balance to yank him sideways and force him to sit or fall. He chose sitting, and frowned at the girl as she grinned at him.

She and her friends had been talking about some strange shit only seconds ago, but now the girl was grinning at him with all the flirtatious need of a horny young woman. And, much as she seemed to be a really nice girl, something about her was scratching him the wrong way. Not the beautiful eyes — golden brown, hint of amber, like his own — or the warm smile or round cheeks that contrasted her obviously flirtatious nature. No, it was something he couldn’t see, something he couldn’t put his eye on or any of his senses on.

“Jessy could take care of those debts,” she said.

“Excuse me?”

“Jessy. She’s got connections with Xnomina.”

Natasha turned to them, and raised a brow at Fiona before shrugging. “It’s true. If y-you sleep with Jessy, I’m-m-m sure she’ll help you out. If she likes it, and you.”

Something there, in the unsaid, that Eric could only guess at; apart from the blatant suggestion at selling his body for sex. Well, plus one for gender equality, sort of.

“Not sure you girls want to get involved in Montel’s business.”

“Montoya M-Montel?” Natasha said.

“... you know the man? Why’s a young girl like you know that man’s name?”

“I used to work f-for Xnomina. You ... you might b-b-be surprised what they have their fingers in. And Jessy can—”

“Can what?” The predator came back up the stairs with a bounce in her step, and wiped her lips clean.

The Scot chuckled and shook her head. “Ate already? Dinnae take long.”

“Some cute little blond girl was just sitting all alone, drunk and high and waiting for someone to do something to her. So I had to indulge.” Jessy stopped in front of the booth, and raised a brow as she looked between the three of them. “The fuck happened in the ten minutes I was gone?”

“Ye told me to be aggressive! I’m being aggressive.” Fiona leaned in closer to him, and hooked her arm with his. Even hooked their fingers together, holding hands. She was soft.

“You call holding hands aggressive?”

“Aye! We just met and all.”

“No no. Fiona, you don’t understand. Men are idiots. Braindead morons.” She slid into the booth too, trapping him between her and the redhead. “You have to look him in the eye and tell him to take you home.”

She wasn’t wrong. He wasn’t willing to have any girls over to his current, horrible apartment, but the girl definitely wasn’t wrong.

“Perhaps another time,” he said. The look of disappointment on Jessy’s face bordered on frustration and anger, but Fiona took it differently. Poor girl’s head lowered, and she pouted the biggest pout an adult could pull off without looking silly. Manipulation tactic if he’d ever seen one. “Maybe another night? And maybe a different place. My shithole living space is not exactly female friendly.”

Natasha snorted on a giggle. “Y-You might be surprised what girls c-c-can be like, for hygiene.”

“That was a stab at me, wasn’t it?” Jessy said.

“It was. And, uh, Eric, you said Montel is b-being ... a problem for you?”

Jessy smirked, and leaned in a little closer to him. She was a predator, and apparently a fed predator; he could almost hear her stomach purr its satisfaction.

“Oh man, you got into bed with Montoya Montel?” Laughter, not nearly as subtle as the giggles of her two friends. Jessy slapped him on the leg too, and winked. “I’ll take care of it.”

“ ... you’ll take care of it?”

“Yeap, I’ll take care of it. Cause I like you Eric, I want to keep you around.”

“Your friends suggested sex would be required as payment.”

“Ha! I’m just hazing you. I mean, not that I’d say no, but you’re the new guy and I just had to tease ya.” Jessy peeked past him to the other two girls, who were conveniently looking away, even the redhead still holding his hand, though every so often she threw him another glance that betrayed the jovial attitude. Something was on her mind, and it hit her every time she looked at him. “Serious though, about Montel. Consider your issues with him over. Cause for some reason, I think you’ll do good things for Bloodlust if we keep you around.”

He glanced between the three women. Jessy was a predator, and Natasha was a shy thing, but Fiona was smiling up at him, a twinkle in her eye and a unusual weight he couldn’t place. What was she thinking? Why did she keep looking at him like she knew him?

Hard to think about that with Jessy telling him she’d get Montel off his back. Lying? Crazy? Wouldn’t be the first time a beautiful woman had lied to him, but she had no horse in this race as far as he could tell.

“ ... ok.”

---

Night was over, time to leave. Sighing, he wandered around for a little while and re-familiarized himself with the different sights of the club. An hour or two until sunrise, and someone turned on the light to give the cleaning crew what they needed to deal with the mess. And there was a mess. People fucking and drinking and doing lines, hell some people had even eaten food. Madness, but there it was. And all that made for a mess. Not as much of a mess as he’d figured, but there was garbage and condoms and some rather suspicious looking residue on tables and booth seats. The cleaning crew seemed thorough though, like they were used to this, and getting paid well enough to do their jobs proper.

More than just a cleaning crew though. The bouncers drifted around and checked the booths for anything that might be important to someone, or for people who hadn't left yet. Awfully nice of them, the bouncers, doing that; hell, bouncer wasn't the right word for what they did, for his job or theirs. Seemed to be the theme of the joint though, to keep the employees and the customers happy. Happy employees stuck around, happy customers came back. At least they did if either could stand the environment, and he wasn't sure he could.

He raised a brow as he stood by one of the booths. A woman was in there, half asleep, dragging herself up from the depths with a groan. A cute little blond girl. Like the one Jessy said she'd ... she'd what? She hadn't said, but it was implied Jessy had satisfied her hunger somehow, and the girl before him looked utterly drained.

"I ... oh ... oh damn. That girl..." The stranger forced herself up, and standing required some support from the table. Help her? He sighed, it was his job now, to make this a nice place to visit, so he held out his hand for her. She took it, and put all her weight on it. "This girl! A little tall, but really fit you know? She sat down with me ... can ... barely remember. I remember her ... kissing my neck..." The woman shivered, hiccuped twice, and started to walk toward the exit. "Mark is going to be sooo jealous."

He quirked a brow as he watched the woman leave. Hungover, sure, but that didn't explain the odd way she was looking at the ground, or struggling to find energy.

"Heard you kept a few women entertained for a good chunk of the night." Ganders came up to him, stepping in from the front door and saluting him casually. "I got a good eye if I do say so myself. Know just who to pick. And you my good man, are going to bring in many women looking to soften that hard exterior of yours."

Oh good god, he was being whored out by his pimp.

“Two of them tried to fuck me.”

“Understandable.”

“I turned them down.”

“Playing hard to get is perfect! They’ll come back and try harder to get you naked. Or at least with your fly down.”

Eric buried his face in his palm. Well, all things considered, the night had gone well, and he shouldn’t really be upset about Ganders’s prediction. Some sex in his life could be just what he needed to get his mind off the strange shit running rampant in his brain.

~~Julias~~

Beatrice spent the day at his place, sleeping next to him. Something was bothering her, that was plain as day, but he could also tell she didn’t really want to talk about it for more than obvious reasons. Something related to the covenants perhaps, or Jacob specifically maybe. Something had her feeling afraid, but also, wild. Charged, like someone who’d been rubbing their socks on carpet.

They spent the early hours of the next night having sex as well. He should have gone to the Xnomina HQ and taken care of his work, looking into the Mirrden business, examining the latest contracts Xnomina made, insuring profit was had. And of course he should have spent time looking into more direct Kindred affairs, chatting with the various members of Xnomina about what they’ve seen, what they know, and making sure they all knew the score about dealing with the Begotten, the Uratha, and the Carthians now that Barry was dead.

But a certain large, firm ass had demanded he spend the first couple hours of the next night with it. And he was a sucker for that ass. The fact Beatrice enjoyed anal sex as much as she did was a guilty pleasure he was very happy to indulge. He'd been with many kine in his life, but it was rare to find one who climaxed from anal sex, let alone with as much intensity as Triss.

Not that his actions would have been any different if they'd been having normal sex. But, he'd be a fool to ignore how much synergy the two of them had in bed. He loved her ass, and she loved her ass. Everyone was a winner.

He sat up in bed, and looked down at her panting, exhausted body. Lubricant still coated his softening member, and looking at her naked skin, the tattoos that decorated her toned, lean body, and the size of her ass nudging against his leg, was almost enough to get him hard again. But two orgasms was more than enough to satisfy his sex drive, unless he had a meal to reawaken his animal need. Still, even with his sex drive satisfied, he couldn't help but stare down at her body.

Seeing her lying there on her side was too perfect. He set one hand on her ass cheek, and pulled it apart from her other cheek to expose where her ass was leaking his cum along her perfect skin. Wholly salacious. The sheets around her were soaked as well, mostly in her own juices.

Utterly naughty. He rolled his eyes at his thoughts, chuckled, and leaned down to kiss the side of her ass cheek.

"You ... want more?" she said.

"No. Well, not now. Maybe tomorrow night?"

"I might not be around. I'll try, but I can't promise anything." She rolled over onto her back, and raised her leg closest to him. On queue, he took her heel, and guided her foot toward his face so he could kiss her ankle, her shin, and her knee. Her handful breasts flattened a little to her chest, and Julias stared at them as he started to massage her calf muscle.

“Ever think of getting any new tattoos?” he said.

“What? I got a lot already.” She put one of her claws on her nipple, where a snake was biting her areola, and she traced its winding, curving form where it lowered down across her abs down to her mons and further, where the tail tip stopped just above the hood of her clitoris. “I really like this one. Scary thing like a snake biting into me, but also kinda highlighting all my curves and tits and shit, you know?”

“I admit, it definitely screams you.”

“Eh? Whatcha mean?”

“Part of what makes you you. Part of what makes you so attractive and interesting are those sorts of things, the snake tattoo being a good example. Gives you an animal edge that ... well, most Kindred in Dolareido don't really have.” He laughed, as the most perfect example came to mind. “Jessy wishes she had as much of a beast inside her as you did, Triss. But, she'll forever be a nineties action hero. Aggressive, sure. Strong and violent, sure. But that animal edge that makes you both scary and alluring? Like a snake? She'll never have that.”

He watched for her reaction, using his poker gaze so she wouldn't realize he was analyzing her expressions. The extra teeth for cheeks, and the snake eyes made reading her a unique experience, but after almost a year of dating, he'd gotten pretty good at it. And her expression read ‘you just told me something in a way that put something I was thinking about into a new, valuable perspective’. Which was good. He hoped.

“Well, with talk like that.” She reached down her stomach to her pierced clit hood, and started to lightly rub the metal so her body shivered a little, leg in his arms included. She spread her other leg too, so her smooth pussy was on display for him. “Sure you don’t want another round?”

“You know I want another round. But I do have a job. You should get one, make some money, pay rent.”

“Hey, witches don’t need money! We’re dark creatures of the night. We survive on blood and live in shadows. Don’t need no education or thought control.” She sat up, leg still up in his arms. Flexible. And, with a wicked grin she liked to use when she was feeling mischievous, she leaned in to give him a kiss. Still, with her leg up on him. Damn flexible. “See ya later then.”

---

With Beatrice in his life, it was easy to forget sometimes that he was a member of the Invictus council. Easy to forget that he was given all the responsibilities of his sire Viktor. Easy to forget that the peace between the Invictus and the Carthians balanced on a knife’s edge every night, and the moment someone made a mistake, the balance was going to slip. Everyone knew it too. Probably why no one in the Invictus wanted to bring up Barry, in case his death was actually a precursor to war.

Julias paced back and forth in the meeting room. The twelve at his command sat at the table, a long slab of dark wood, likely from an endangered species, knowing Viktor. The larger of the rooms, but still high in the Xnomina HQ, with LEDs in the ceiling turned down to a subtle light, to give the room an imposing, secretive feel. To the Kindred in the room, it was just normal, natural, for the room to feel like a secret gathering of agents determining the fate of the city. They didn’t realize how much of that aesthetic was illusionary, fake, created by people like him. Real secret agencies didn’t sit around in dark rooms, discussing the future over folders filled with pictures of people, places. Real secret agencies simply had a group of men or women who came to a conclusion, brightly lit room and all, and then dolled out the orders via the latest in communication equipment to their agents, without any of the artistic elements.

When Viktor was around, he engaged in the artistry of dark rooms and imposing suits as Julias did, but he did not entertain the words of his subordinates. The right hands of the Invictus had no say in what they did. The senior Kindred below them had no say. The younger Kindred below them had no say, and doubly so for fledglings.

But now he was a part of that council, and he wanted to get Jessy, and the other senior Kindred involved in making decisions. Maria and Michael approved. Much as they were a royal pain in his ass, they weren't the dictator Viktor was.

They weren't in the meeting though. Maria was with Damien, discussing matters of how those two would be working together and starting the Second Estate. Sort of. It'd be years before the Prince acknowledged the Lancea et Sanctum as a functioning covenant of Dolareido. Decades perhaps. And Michael was playing his own games, mostly about expanding Xnomina in ways as to show off its power, and his prowess. If he wasn't careful, the company would be caught creating monopolies on certain software venues.

But Invictus lived for the thrill of such economic exploits. To successfully set up a monopoly and get away with it? To have the entire world eating out of the palm of their hand, forced to pay absurd amounts for something they could only get from Xnomina, was a pleasing thought. Capitalism and Kindred were kindred spirits. Predators feeding on prey, the strong get stronger and the weak perish as food.

Too cruel? Perhaps. But it was a tried and true system developed by mother nature herself. The Carthians could disagree with it all they wanted, but their obsession with searching for 'better' ways to govern territory and handle the economy was wishful thinking at best, dangerous delusions at worst.

He looked around at his fellow Kindred. Twelve of them, Jessy included, the entire population of the more older Kindred in the employ of the First Estate in Dolareido. Other cities had their own Invictus, and while they communicated with each other on occasion, cities were generally left to their own devices. So, for the Invictus in Dolareido, he had the twelve in front of him at his command.

“The Mirrden expansion is almost complete,” he said. He had his hands in the small of his back, and head looking down slightly to put on his thoughtful look. “And none of you have reported any new conflicts with the Carthians.”

Jessy nodded. “Seen a few of them hanging around. Last night, I think that Joe fuck tried to start something. Just barking though, nothing came of it.”

“And you Vanna?”

Bruce Vanna, fellow Ventrue, with a good thirty or forty years embraced under his belt. Potential replacement for him and Natasha as his right hand. Maybe. The man had a habit of being a bit too indirect and passive about things. That was fine, and an elegant way of navigating a snake pit, but not the best approach when the council needed something done immediately, no questions asked.

The tall man tapped his fingers on the table a few times. “The werewolves showed up, a couple of them at least, according to James. Asked some questions about the burned buildings, but otherwise didn’t seem to care about Mirrden.”

“Makes sense they’d be wondering about the fires. We—”

“They ... did ask James if he’d seen anything strange. The boy inquired, and they asked him if he’d seen any people acting out of character, or maybe movement in the corner of his eyes or in shadows. Asked if he’d seen things that vanished upon investigating.” Vanna tapped his chin a few times too, before leaning forward to rest his elbows on the office table. “This was last night. I do wonder what they’re looking for.”

Isabella shrugged and gestured to some of the pictures on the table. While there were plenty of the Mirrden construction, there were also plenty of the Uratha. While the beast within Kindred was a master at deceiving cameras, film, and all forms of recording devices, the special ability of Uratha to distort what people saw — and recording devices according to some myths — only occurred when they were transformed or transforming. To take pictures of them while in their human form was easy enough.

“Perhaps another hunt?” she said. “Your childe Master Terry was quite adamant that the Uratha were helping us deal with a problem, instead of having brought it with them.”

“Master Terry can be a bit naive in some ways, but also perceptive and objective in others,” Julias said. “I trust his judgment with the Uratha. And, as much as we have a troubling history with Avery, don’t forget it was her pack leader Simon who led to many of the issues we had with them, not Avery.”

The group nodded, though Isabella didn’t seem too convinced about the werewolves’ leader. Understandable. She was just a young neonate when that chaos had started.

“So,” he continued, “if the werewolves are asking about strangeness, then we should be looking for strangeness. Don’t throw yourselves into any madness though; leave the wolves to hunt their hunts, and stay out of their way until I say otherwise.

Understood?" The group nodded without missing a beat. "Good. Next point of discussion: living arrangements."

"I'm sorry, Mister Mire?" Vanna said.

"Barry's death and his burned down home are not accidents." He pointed to the pictures of the burned building Jack and Amanda had taken. A lot of duplicates on the table for the group to look at too. "Much as it's easy to dismiss his death, we're not going to do that. Something's happened. What happened, we don't know, but we're not going to simply ignore it. Some of us are investigating, as you can see, and as for the rest of us, we need to consider our lives in danger from an unknown threat. A threat that might be active during the day."

"Thralls? Ghouls?" Jessy said.

"Perhaps, but then we'd know it was a Kindred to blame, and we have no suspects. Mister Tones is unlikely to be the cause of this. Mister Burksen is just as unlikely. And the Prince? Or Jacob? The other covenants do not have a decent reason to kill someone like Barry, or burn down his nest."

Isabella tapped her fingers on the pictures a few times before raising one of them to examine it. "A shame they were not caught on camera."

Julias raised a brow. "They?"

"Two men, two women, two trench coats and two leather jackets. Kine who have been seen both near Mirrden, and once outside Bloodlust."

"Right," Jessy said. "I read that in Jack and Amanda's latest report about his investigation. Then again, I could put together a half dozen similar leads if I was willing to accept such vague and meaningless connections. I've got a sighting of a man with barbed wire tattoo around his neck at Mirrden on three separate occasions. Looked into that already. Turns out he's just a kine who lives nearby and hates the noise."

The Gangrel had a point. Still.

"Keep an eye open," he said. "But, back to the matter at hand. Everyone will need to start taking defensive measures with their sleeping dens. Those of you familiar with, or alive during the purge era of Lucas and our constant struggles with the Carthians will already know what to do. Those of you who have not found a sleeping nest that is secure, do so. Ask your fellow Invictus if you need help."

Gloria leaned forward and made a small, opening wave with her fingers. "How secure are we talking about?"

"Secure enough that I won't be sleeping in my normal bed anymore," he said. The mansion had a dungeon, secure, safe, with escape routes within. Perfect for Kindred to sleep during the day. "I should have started sleeping in my secure location already, but, like you, I've been in denial about the dangers approaching the city. The ball will soon be upon us, and the Prince has highly encouraged the peaceful state we've managed to acquire."

Jessy laughed. A real, deep laugh, that had the rest of the room smiling eventually. "She's even giving Lucas's childe a chance to bring back the Second Estate. She really wants peace."

"And I know some of you think that's an opportunity for us," Julius said. "And if you think you have a plan to usurp the Prince, by all means, bring it to me, so I can laugh at your idiocy." That destroyed some of the smiles in the room. Good. "Back to my point. We're in a limbo state. One half pushing for peace, while the other must now be careful of violence. From now on, everyone is to sleep in a safe nest. Instruct your childe or subordinates in this, or at least make sure they are taken care of."

He began to pace around, and put on his serious face, a face he could adopt in any situation, and bring everyone in the room into line. And they did. They knew better than to joke around when he was instructing.

Sometimes, he wondered if they considered him a second Viktor. Did they worry he might cross a line, and start hurting, perhaps killing Kindred who antagonized him? He wouldn't, but it was useful that they thought he might.

“Get thralls. I expect each of you to have at least a couple of kine to watch your assets during the day. But, as always, keep your thralls in the dark about any and all Kindred activity. Those of you with ghouls are expected to do the same, and expected to train them in some basic combat and marksmanship. All Invictus Kindred are being armed with silver knives, but these are not to be used except as a last resort. Remember, we don't have reason to suspect the wolves of anything yet. If the situation does arise that the wolves become our enemy, we will start arming people with silver bullets. And if the situation escalates beyond that, shotguns and fully automatic rifles with silver ammunition are available. We're the Invictus, and we get the good toys.” A smile told the group it was ok to smile as well, and they did, Jessy including a chuckle.

“Moving on. Azamel.” That made him grimace, and everyone else too. “The deed is done. I will be meeting with the monster later tonight, along with Madam Turio and Mister McDonald. Some of you know the details, some of you don't, and it's to be kept that way. If she retaliates, report to your designated posts with your chosen weaponry. Understood?”

The group nodded, glancing between each other with worry on their faces. She could retaliate, and it could be as bad as last time Azamel decided to push her weight around. But not if he could help it.

“Dismissed.”

---

The tunnels. He did not like the tunnels, but it was important for him to know them, and know them well. The same applied to every aspect of the city, but the tunnels were different. They were not only how many Kindred moved around the city without drawing attention to themselves, they were also occasionally shared. Carthians used them, and every so often the Invictus and Carthians ran into each other down in the Earth. So knowing the veins of the city’s underground was paramount.

But he wasn’t down here to deal with that. Part of him wanted to go check out the damage done by the monster as well, if only to see with his own eyes how much carnage these alien creatures had caused. The pictures had been thorough however, as was the clean-up. Reconstruction would have to wait, but at least the bodies, the webbing, all that was gone. The corpse of the Azlu creature was a pile of burnt flesh, unrecognizable in any fashion. The other one, the human half that remained, was disposed of. And no humans had access to these tunnels anyhow, but redundancy was the bedrock of consistency. You don’t gamble or take risks with the Masquerade, you doubled up on every security precaution.

He wasn’t down here to investigate the damage though. He, and the two elders beside him, were here to talk with Azamel.

Maria Turio, Julias Mire, and Michael McDonald. The two men wore suits, while Maria wore a rather ghostly dress of white that looked like it belonged in the 1920s, complete with long, ripped skirt that trailed along the tracks. Her mastery of the cloak of night was more than enough that any kine in the city would find their eyes sliding off of her, and any noises to fade into the background hum of the world. Just a ghost, wandering the darkness of the strange city.

Julias glanced back over his shoulder. There were ten people behind him, nine, thralls of Michael and Maria and his own. Each given three drops of Kindred blood to bind them, and no more, so they would forever crave the affection of their master without ever obtaining the immortality or strength of a ghoul. Cruel, but that was the way of Kindred. Each agent, seven men, three women, was a trained marksman, and each was armed with a fully automatic rifle of illegal make, using ammunition meant to pierce metal. They also wore an earpiece that matched their all-business suits. It was almost comical, as if he was seeing a scene from a movie, with professional agents ready to unleash a hailstorm of bullets or the full weight of the government's ire at any point.

The agents were needed. Bullets worked surprisingly well against most things, even monsters, when you used a few thousand of them at a time.

“Perhaps we should have brought your childe, Mister Mire?” Michael said. “He was the first Invictus to make true contact with her since her return. And he has been a successful intermediary with the Uratha, strangely enough.”

“Maybe. But I'd prefer to let him think we're trying to be friends with everyone, Begotten included.” True contact? What other Invictus had been sneaking down to speak to the old woman?

“The illusion you present him is not entirely incorrect,” Maria said. “We're not visiting her to cause conflict.”

“You don't think us oppressing her will lead to conflict?”

“Oppressing is a strong word.” Michael frowned as he almost stepped in a puddle, before he stepped around it with a careful sway, like each step could land him in shit. Walking through dirty old tunnels was not the business of elders, but sometimes a hands-on approach was required. “I prefer to think of this as an exchange of priorities.”

“You know full well she’s not going to think of it like that.” He sighed and pressed his hand to the sides of his suit jacket. Sword was there, as was the pistol, and the silver knife. Not that silver knives would be useful against a monster, but the mandate for silver on hand at all times was for everyone in the Invictus, him as well.

Maria shook her head, and gave him a small pat on the arm. “Your sire is not here this time, Julias. And, while you were always of great value to the Invictus, when you were young Mister Honors would often leave out important details. As for Azamel, your sire occasionally tried to force her into obeying his commands, even when such commands were to her detriment. She did not take it kindly.”

Their voices weren’t carrying like Julias would have expected. Maria, altering the perception of sound to keep their voices away from their little army. Such talk was not for the ears of kine, thralls or otherwise.

“You telling me Viktor was the one who drove her to violence?”

“After a fashion. Ultimately, she struck first,” she said.

Michael sighed, loudly at that, and shrugged. “Azamel plays her games, and destroys that which opposes her. And, more than anything, the monster craved power. She wanted to rule her own little world, and as she tried to expand that to include Kindred, Viktor and her naturally conflicted.”

“That,” Maria said, “is why the Prince is not happy she has returned. It appears to be a part of her desire, her appetite, to rule others.”

“I am aware.” He nodded as they continued along. They’d discussed this all before, but now, they were trusting him with a few details they hadn’t in the past. Slowly but surely, they were confiding in him. Slowly but surely, he'd worm his way into being an even partner in their council, and he'd force the two of them into peaceful compromises with the other covenants with far greater success.

Big plans take time. And Kindred had all the time in the world.

“What you are not aware of is how many times Viktor and Azamel came to blows.” The Gangrel wasn't happy, but at least his anger wasn't directed at Julias. With unending frowns to join his chin strokes and thoughtful poses, he gestured to the path ahead of them. “And I am sure Lucas and the woman did as well.”

“True,” Maria said. “I will ask his childe if Lucas had anything to say about her, or perhaps left some information, or tool, for dealing with her. And you, Mr. Mire, has Viktor left any advice or tool for dealing with this tyrant? I fear your lack of addition to this conversation would mean no.”

“Correct. Beyond our reports from our last encounter with Azamel so many years ago, I am as blind as anyone else in this endeavor.” And no Ventrue was happy being blind. If he didn't know every possible detail about the scenario, manipulating people into doing what he wanted became exceedingly difficult. Azamel was a mystery, and that had to change.

The mission was simple enough. The three of them were to explain to Azamel that she was a visitor in the city, and the Invictus were the rulers. The old beast would respond with lies, or half truths, or straight defiance, and then it would be up to the council to force her to accept the situation, on the spot. Leaving with any degree of leeway in their role as rulers was unacceptable, not when the Invictus were finally stabilizing after the death of Viktor and Lucas. The Mirrden expansion was basically complete, and the Carthian's position in the city diminished appropriately; which invited retaliation. And before the inevitable shove from them, the Invictus triumvirate wanted a handle on the Azamel situation before that bit them in the ass.

One did not rule over millions of kine through procrastination and wishful thinking. You had to be proactive, hunt for opportunities, and squash problems before they cascaded into explosive consequences. Plans versus reactions. It was what separated the Invictus from the Carthians, the ability to consider the future, and plan ten or twenty steps ahead, whereas Garry and his impulsive covenant could barely plan where they'd sleep before the sun rose.

“Sure I shouldn't call for Herrington?” Michael said. “Girl might be an impulsive idiot, but she can throw a punch.”

Julias shook his head. “I've worked with your childe many times, Mister McDonald, and I can personally confirm that a delicate situation such as this is better off without her.”

The big guy nodded and wiped away the corner of his mouth with his thumb. “We need to repopulate the right hands of the Invictus. It will be some time before we can find or train people to be as useful as the three of you were together, Mister Mire, but it must be done eventually.”

He nodded with the compliment, and took care to not look Maria's way, without giving away that he wasn't looking her way. The whole Natasha situation was still a sore spot.

The ghost woman sighed and brushed off a bit of dust from her shoulder, only for it to disappear into the subtle mist that fell from her body. “While you may feel it best to have this meeting in person, face to face with the monster, Mister Mire, it is proper for the council to delegate such tasks. The right hands would take care of this, and relay our wishes to Azamel.”

Yeah well, they didn't have right hands anymore. They had to make do in the meantime.

“Madam Vendram and Madam Leauvion, as well as Mister Vanna are possibilities,” he said. The others didn't look convinced.

“Vendram I believe is too impulsive,” Maria said, “similar to Madam Herrington, except without the strength to enforce it. Perhaps, once her power grows to the required levels, she could join the right hands. Until then she is a liability. Leauvion ... again, perhaps. The woman is more interested in her plays, her dramas, than pursuing Invictus superiority. And Mister Vanna is not skilled in the ways of combat.”

“Combat skills can be taught.” It's how he learned. Not everyone needed to be a natural at combat to be worthy of being a right hand. Natasha wasn't. It took a lot of effort to not say that, but Natasha was a good example of many great qualities they needed in right hands.

“Maybe,” she said. “But then, perhaps ... Damien could fulfill the role?”

“Damien? He's not Invictus.”

“No, he is not. But as we talk of the Lancea et Sanctum, I have come to find the boy both intelligent, and skilled.” She nodded to herself as she looked down. The sound died away as both Julias and Michael looked at her, both raising a brow as they watched the deformed woman smile. “I see why Lucas sired him.”

“That may be,” Julias said, “but that doesn't change that he's not Invictus.”

“No, but I think extenuating circumstances exist. And as my role grows in helping Damien with the Second Estate, I feel a business relationship growing as well. I will support him, and perhaps, he will support me as my right hand.” Still smiling, she turned her half-rotted face to Julias, and looked into his eyes without a blink or flinch. “Natasha has left us, and I cannot fault her for that. When she has lived for centuries as I have, perhaps she will understand why I made the choices I did. Until that time, I must accept that she is gone, and if I were to attempt explanation, my words would fall on deaf ears.”

“You may find she is more willing to talk with you than you suspect, Madam Turio.” Worth a shot, but he doubted the ghost woman would listen to him. Still, big of her to realize Natasha’s departure was warranted.

“I ... perhaps, Mister Mire. Perhaps.”

The Gangrel raised his hand and wiped away the conversation with a subtle flick of the wrist. “We’ll discuss it later. We’re here.”

Deep underneath Morning Street was where Azamel decided to nest. A large room of concrete, metal, and a stage, a raised platform of concrete where the woman had set up the sort of things one might find in their grandmother’s bedroom and living room. From fifty years ago. He smirked at he looked across it, but the smirk vanished as his eyes landed on the old woman rocking back and forth in her chair.

“Figured the three of you would show up together at some point,” Azamel said. “And you brought friends?”

Julias sighed, and glanced over his shoulder at the ten men and women. Their rifles were at the ready, and their eyes were taking in every and all sights around them. No mistakes were allowed, or they could end up dead; Azamel or Maria would kill them, depending.

“Hello Azamel,” Michael said, arms folded across his chest and scowl chiseled into his face.

“Skip the hellos.” A drag of her cigarette later, she blew the smoke into the air with the practiced ease of someone who’d been smoking for over a hundred years. “Only one of you I haven’t had a private conversation with already is this Julias boy.” Tapping some of the ashes into her ashtray, she winked at him. “Glad to see Viktor’s death agreed with you. What an asshole.”

Of course Maria and Michael had talked with Azamel in private. And he hadn’t. Easy to forget sometimes that the two elders were older than him, smarter than him, knew how to take advantage of opportunities he’d yet to even see. Azamel was an opportunity, a powerful woman and a potentially powerful ally, if they could somehow get her on their side.

“Relax Mire,” the old woman said with a hoarse chuckle. “I can hear the gears turning in your head from here. Maria and Michael have nothing to offer me, no deals to be struck. Neither do you, before you ask.” Another puff of smoke, another chuckle, and then a coughing fit he thought for sure was going to be followed with her coughing up a black lung. “But, if it’s all three of you visiting, then I’m sure this is a more official meeting. What about the suits with guns? Brought me a snack?”

The ghost woman and the big Gangrel looked to him. Either because they valued his ability to speak fluently and convincingly, or because they needed a scapegoat in case the conversation went badly. Probably both.

“We’re here to discuss the inevitable conflict between us,” he said.

“Inevitable?” She tapped her cigarette against her ashtray, before flicking the butt down to join them. Like a queen on her throne, her ugly rocking chair upon a two-foot-tall stage of concrete.

“Yes, inevitable. We know you hunger for power, Azamel, in a way we can not understand. We’ll come to blows the same way you and Viktor and Lucas did, given time.”

“Damn vampires always approaching problems from the side, never straight on. Heaven forbid you speak plainly.” She shrugged and gestured to her sides, where Julias would have expected her supposed subordinates, Athalia and Mark, to be standing. But they were nowhere to be found.

Julias didn’t trust his eyes though, or Maria’s or Michael’s. Without a Mekhet’s auspex, there was always the chance a rather skilled creature was hiding under a Kindred’s cloak of night, or their own derivative. Never seen this Mark fellow before either, but rumors about him drifted through the Kindred web. A creepy man, to say the least. And Athalia, the woman was a ghost until recently, barely ever seen except for her awakening and interactions with Daniel, until Azamel’s return at least.

“Then we’ll be blunt.” Growling, the big Gangrel stepped forward and wiped away non-existent dust from his chest. “We don’t want you here, but, like the Prince, we understand forcing you to leave is more trouble than it’s worth.”

Azamel snorted a chuckle. “Naturally.”

“So,” he continued, “to prevent the issues of before, you must understand that if you step out of line even slightly, the Invictus will deal with the situation swiftly.”

She laughed, and fell into coughing fits once more. “How the mighty have fallen.”

It was the ghost lady’s turn to get angry. “Excuse me? You—”

“Silence.” The ancient woman stomped her foot, hidden underneath an old skirt and worn slippers with socks. It would have been comical, if the room hadn’t shook with the impact, if a thundering explosion of vibration and sound hadn’t ripped through the concrete around them, and if the lot of them hadn’t stumbled, many of them falling over. The three Kindred managed to stay upright, mostly, but the host of guns at their call fell to their backs and sides with the invisible shockwave.

“You come here, and threaten me? When I’ve yet to even hurt a fly?” the old woman said. Standing up, Azamel gripped a walking stick, a simple thing of carved wood, and inched her way across the stage to stare at them from its ledge. “Stronger have tried, worthless leeches. Lucas, Viktor, these you know, and know these were but pests in my way.”

Julias forced himself back to standing, and glared at the old woman. Not an old woman, no. There was something there, behind her, around her, something that buried them all in its presence. At first it was only a blur, something gray and unfocused along the edges of his vision, but as he looked around, he found the entity did not flutter or disappear; not a trick of the light then. It stood there, towering over Azamel, on her, in and around her, and it held out four arms like mountains, each with man-like hands, though each as big as a person themselves. The thing inside her was gargantuan.

Before he could search for other defining features, the gray thing faded away, a mirage, flickering into the light. It’d been the size of the colossal room, literally, and even with it gone, he could still feel its titanic weight bearing down on him. Felt like he was trying to talk to a god, to control and break a god to his will. Oddly thrilling, and he hid the desire to smile behind his poker face.

“Here you three stand, dirt on your shoes and dust in your hair. How the might have fallen. Council? Triumvirate of the Invictus? Don’t make me laugh. Where is your army? Where is the weight of steel and money that the Invictus are known for? Where are the devils that sit in the darkness of candlelight, dictating the lives of millions as they discuss the growth of their empire? You three are weak. At least Viktor understood the power of his position, as did Lucas. But you three? More concerned with yourselves than true power, than true domination, than—”

“Azamel. Enough.” Michael stepped forward, and dismissed her rant with a wave of his hand like wiping a table clear. “The three of us do not seek to crush the world under our heel; at least, not with the same gusto as Mister Honors, or Lucas. But if you mistake our generosity with weakness, then we’ll have to set the record straight.” A wild smirk graced the Gangrel’s face, and he pulled from his pocket his smartphone to show the woman the screen.

“ ... and this is?”

Julias couldn’t keep the smile back anymore, and had to resist the need to jump in and gloat. But Michael was doing his thing, and while he may not have had Julias’s tact, the man could be imposing when he wanted to be.

“A video feed of some of the explosives we’ve set up in the tunnels. A couple of them, anyway.”

“ ... excuse me?” the old tyrant said.

Maria stepped forward, and brought up her phone as well, showing another video feed. “Thralls will be watching these tunnels, all the tunnels that we know you’re attached to. If any attempt is made to remove the explosives, they will be detonated.”

Such a beautiful sight, the three of them working together. In the past, Viktor was more or less the leader, and the council was often the voice of one man. Now, it was the voice of three.

Julias’s smile grew, into a mischievous grin, and he folded his arms across his chest as he looked at the tiny old monster on the stage. “We know you love these tunnels, Azamel. The Invictus have many reports of your activities last time you were here, and how often you fell back to these tunnels, how often you vanished into them. You have quite an attachment to them. Almost unnatural, according to the reports. Naturally, a plan was devised in case of your return.”

The old woman glared at him, eyes wide, jaw clenched behind the hanging skin. “You would damage your city just to spite me? You don’t even know why I prefer these tunnels as my home.”

Too bad for her, the Invictus covered their bases. “And yet, we have recorded over two dozen instances where, upon conflict with Viktor or Lucas, you returned to these tunnels. To this specific area, in fact.” He adjusted his suit jacket, his tie, and smirked Viktor’s smirk.

The old woman sat back down, sighed, and lit another cigarette. “You want war?”

“No,” he said, shaking his head. “No, we don’t want war. And we’re not here to force you to obey us, or bully you into anything. Except for one very specific thing: do not upset the peace. And before you suggest that you wouldn’t dare damage the fragile peace we have here, we are not willing to risk it. Consider the explosives a deterrent, nothing more.”

The monster squeezed the arms of her chair, and glared at him with the weight of a colossus. “Check your history, boy. A policy of deterrence has a habit of falling apart.”

“Enough.” The ghost woman sighed, and stepped back, signaling her desire to leave. “We will not let you scamper away into the dark, and enact your inevitable plans for control. But, we are also willing to leave you be, as the Prince already is. Enjoy it, old monster, and remain quiet. Or we will not tolerate your presence.”

And of course, the ghost lady kindly neglected to mention that the Prince, who undoubtedly knew the Invictus were setting up explosives, had not condoned the action. She’d bring it up at the next Primogen meeting, and be angry with them, but it was better this way. Easier to ask for forgiveness than permission.

“... am I to expect any other traps?” the old monster said.

“Of course.” Michael shrugged, and also started to turn to leave. The maneuver was excellent for giving the ‘over the shoulder glance’ that Invictus were ever so fond of. “But we tell you about the explosives to let you know we’re serious.”

Julias turned to join his companions. “In short, Azamel, the Invictus had plans in case something like this happened. We have other measures installed to deal with you, if it comes to it. And I should hope it does not. But we will not acquiesce the position of power to you. You are welcome to stay in Dolareido as long as you do not defy us.”

“And what is your first commandment then, oh holy triumvirate of leeches?” She was angry. Very angry. Julias could almost see the god entity around her form again, the strange giant with four arms. Just blurs of shadow.

“No commandment,” he said, “except that you mind where you step. If you try and take over any districts like the last time you were here, we will act.”

Her frown grew, and she sank back in her chair as if held down by a great stone. Trapped, and furious about it. “I have done nothing but sit here in the dark, quietly I might add, while pursuing my own, silent goals. This is how I am repaid?”

He shook his head. “And when you achieve that goal, will it be so silent? I doubt it. But, be warned Azamel, this is not a bluff. Push us, and we will respond with far greater force than Lucas or Viktor ever did.”

“ ... you’ll regret trying to corner me.”

“Think of it as self defense,” he said. “We know you’ll go on the attack eventually. In what manner, we don’t, so until then, safety precautions.” He turned to join his leaving companions, and the squadron they brought with them, before offering Azamel a similar glance over his shoulder like Michael's. "We'll be watching."

The old monster scowled, and watched them leave. The looming presence over her buried the large room in its shadow, and a deep rumble he wasn't quite sure was real started to fill the room. Subtle, quiet, tingling on his shoes into his toes, a gentle vibration that had the kine glancing around with guns raised and looking for the source. It was real then.

A monster, a monster he didn't understand and could not understand; she never explained herself or her intentions. Far as he knew, previous attempts to learn about who she was, her past, what she was, were met with silence.

Natasha and Daniel were likely already looking into the Begotten, and Azamel specifically no doubt, to see if there would be a way to deal with her. Garry probably was too. Maybe he should ask Jack to look into it too? If there was anyone who could ask the woman about who she was, and not piss her off, it was him. But then, did he want to risk Jack like that. He didn't want to, but any information they got about the woman was valuable.

Once they were a good ways away, Michael and Maria started to laugh, again disguised by Maria's cloak of night to keep their voices from leaving their vicinity.

"What's so amusing?" he said.

Maria chuckled a few more times until she forced them down, and pat the man on the arm. "Viktor may have become a brute with age, and a long torpor that twisted his mind to madness, but I remember when he was young, Mister Mire. And in that encounter just now, you sounded much like your late sire."

"I was afraid of that." Easy for her to comment on it like it was no big, like it was a good thing he was becoming more and more like that tyrant.

He could vaguely remember a time when he and Beatrice, still new to their relationship, were lamenting their hatred for the Danse Macabre to each other. A hate for Kindred and their scheming, a hate for deception and manipulation, and a hate for the feeling of never feeling like you could trust someone. And here he was, playing games with a monster, and gambling the safety of his city on how well he could do all those things.

Every night he had to play this game, now with newer, higher stakes. And despite it all, he found a certain joy in it. He always did enjoy poker. And he always did enjoy being in control. Controlling a city was like doing both.

What would Beatrice think? Well, based on the vibe he was getting from her lately, she'd probably admit to similar from her own end, and Jacob's games.

He smirked as he thought about the upcoming ball. Jennifer was going to be there, and despite what Triss said, Julias knew Beatrice really wanted a taste of her. Whatever had scared her last night would fade, and, if he guessed right, his lover would be playing in the Danse Macabre in ways only Jacob could understand. Once she realized her fear was transitory, she'd squirm a little and try and sneak in that she did in fact want Jennifer to join them in bed.

He'd only agree if he felt she was comfortable with it; Beatrice, not Jennifer. Jen he doubted had ever felt uncomfortable with anything sexual in her whole, short life. She was probably helping Triss try on some clothes right now, and was groping his girlfriend's breasts and ass at every opportunity.

The image was not an unpleasing one.

~~Beatrice~~

Two days until the ball.

She came back to the Circle's cave, and let her mind drift back to the wake-up sex she'd just had with Julias. Far less foreplay, far more her lying down on her back, pillow under her hips, while Julias fucked her missionary style. And with the ass raised on the pillow, the angle let each deep stroke of the man hit toward her belly, hit that spot along her pussy that just fucking slew her every time.

Spending the evening — morning to a vamp — squirting straight onto her man's stomach as he fucked her ass, was a great way to wake up. Made it easier to forget what Jacob did to her, and the thing Jacob called friend. The weird, alien, ghostly, chthonic, whatever-it-was thing had called him Malachi. She had to ask about that, once she got over the reality that Jacob was able to summon some strange death-like creature to possess a corpse. Christ, it'd possessed a corpse.

She stopped in the opening of the cave, the tight tunnel hidden in the canyon, and banged her head a few times against the rock. Yeah, she was a major sex addict, a nympho, anal lover, and all around hornball. But that didn't explain how she could let her mind go in that direction after what Jacob did to her. After what she'd seen.

She touched her stomach again, exposed by the tank top, and winced. Healed, but the memories were vivid. Stabbed. Jacob had fucking stabbed her. Several times! And that ... that ... thing, it fucking cut into her. Split open skin. Forced drops of her Kindred blood from her and spilled them onto the cavern floor. The man and thing had watched as she frenzied in pain and hunger from being bled, and had waited for her to regain control, before resuming their torture.

She'd agreed to it, agreed to being tied up and tortured, because she was a moron. A curious moron, who, despite looking an actual corpse possessed by some death entity in the eyes, wanted to know. She fucking wanted to know what horrible things hid in the darkness that made fucking vampires look like chumps, like pussies, like house cats compared to tigers.

Was it because she'd spent twenty years thinking Kindred were the things kine feared in the night, thinking that her and her fucked up shark mouth was the scariest shit humans had to worry about, and now she realized they weren't? Vampires were just the tip of the iceberg, fucking blase and cliché compared to the true horrors Jacob was dealing with.

Why the fuck did it fascinate her so much?

She forced herself to keep moving. Afraid to see Jacob again. Afraid to expose her back at all, to anyone right now. Fuck, she was not used to this. Hadn't felt like this, this paranoid about anything and everything since her first few weeks as a Kindred. Thought for sure she'd seen things in the darkness, haunting her, following her. Maybe she'd been right.

She didn't sense the man in the cave tonight; usually, it was quite easy to sense the presence of an elder if they weren't hiding it. No Aaron either, alcove empty and not sitting around anywhere with his inevitable reading.

A bunch of moans and groans told her to look into Othello's room though. She stood in his doorway, and jaw-dropped.

Othello's ghoul Madison lay upon her master's body, her back to his chest, her head hanging back over his shoulder, the two of them lying down. Her legs were spread, and facing the doorway as well so Beatrice could see the man had his cock in her ass. Perfectly normal. What wasn't normal was Jen's two ghouls were also in the room, sitting back against the alcove's walls, drained of blood and of cum, with white fluid dripping down their abs and soft cocks. And Jen herself, lying beside Madison, her hand playing with the ghou's soaked cunt.

“Umm, hello,” Triss said.

“Oh! Beatrice. How are you?” Jen said, glancing her way without pausing her pampering of Madison's insides. They were well past clit play, and into full on hard fingering at this point.

And now that Beatrice had a moment to watch, she could see Madison was barely awake. She was grunting and moaning, but quietly; Othello or Jen must have already drained her some.

“You two fucking each other now?” she said.

Othello turned his head enough to look down past his ghou's body to her. “Sometimes.”

“When we've both eaten, and want to eat some more. Sometimes.” Giggling, Jen winked at Triss, and returned to her poor, defenseless target. Girl wasn't just drained, she was a live wire of orgasms, leaking juices all over Othello's cock while Jennifer fingered her g-spot, fingers in to the second knuckle and pressing upward against her insides.

Beatrice wasn't here for this. She was here to talk to Jacob, not get sucked into another porn watching session, especially not after just having some great morning sex with her lover. But a little peek wouldn't hurt her.

God damn it, what was the matter with her? Why wasn't she curled up in a ball, crying on Julias's shoulder about what Jacob did to her?

Madison's shivers drew Triss's eyes like moth to flame. Her legs were spread wide, and her pussy was squeezing on Jen's fingers hard, hard enough the vampire had to fight the resistance to keep fingering her. More juices, a lot more, started to leak out of the girl onto Jen's palm.

The exhausted woman started to quiver all the more as Jen slowly began to push her fist into the girl's cunt.

"Hey," Triss said, "um ... don't hurt her."

"She likes a bit of pain," Othello said. "I'm sure you can empathize."

"Hey! You ... you don't know me." She said it jokingly, cause she knew damn well she liked rough sex. And trying to deny that in front of these fellow sex addicts would have been pointless.

Jen made her own groan, a predatory one, half growl and guttural. "And besides, Othello likes the tightness. Don't you?" The Ventrue pushed her fist deeper into Madison's poor, stretched pussy, until she was in to the wrist. And while she forced her fist back and forth inside her, Jen's other hand reached down to begin caressing Othello's testicles. They were dripping with Madison's juices, literally.

Jen, Othello, Beatrice, the three of them had sex on the mind all night every night. And Jacob, well, he had the feel of a man who probably once did, before all the nasty shit in his life started happening. Aaron was the only odd man out, and Triss had a sneaking suspicion the man also had a huge sex drive, just kept private. Maybe she should track him during one of his hunts sometime?

Such a weird little family. And while she doubted she'd ever feel comfortable having any of them in her bed, she couldn't deny her sexual tastes were similar. Trapping a woman kine in the bed with her and Julias? Bit of that reluctant 'wait, please don't, I have to—oh!' pleasure on a kine's face when Julias and Beatrice did some nasty things to her, was awesome. She just didn't want to share that fun with them, only share it with Julias.

Jacob was probably the same with Minerva, maybe.

Ugh, stop comparing yourself to Jacob! For fuck's sake, he's ancient and twisted and has been through enough shit to mentally break any person. He's a schemer, a liar, a manipulator, and a killer. You're nothing like him.

Mewls ripped her attention out of her dark thoughts and back onto the orgy before her. Othello was fucking Madison's ass from underneath now, a solid rhythm, while Jen continued to fist the woman. Must have been damn fucking tight inside there, a fist and cock fighting for room. Must have felt great for Othello, and euphoric for Madison. Maybe a little bruise inducing, but great.

She didn't have the heart to tell Jen she didn't want any other Kindred in her bed. But then, watching Jen grinning like the devil as she fisted the borderline unconscious ghoul into what was probably her twelfth orgasm, Triss doubted the woman would have been too upset. Ah well, no reason to tell her now and ruin her fun.

Triss stepped out, stopped, and poked her head back in. Just a minute more. Seemed like the end of the session after all; it'd be a crime to leave now.

Jen lifted her other hand from Othello's testicles and set it atop the girl's pelvis, below the navel. And as she fisted the whimpering woman, she pressed down against the girl's pelvis with the other hand, trapping her g-spot between the two hands and squashing it with pressure. All while Othello continued to fuck the girl's ass from underneath her, with strokes as deep as the position would allow. The pleasure must have been a blur, an absolute maelstrom of electric shocks coursing through the system. Poor girl. Beatrice licked her lips.

At last Othello started to slow down, with a few almost panicked thrusts to finish himself off. His cum started to coat his length from his strokes, but were soon washed away by the copious amount of liquids leaking from the taut pussy above. Madison's arms were out to her sides, dangling to the furs beneath Othello, and her legs were just as limp, despite the little quivers working up and down through her. Christ she was gorgeous, the dark skin, the curvy legs, the huge tits jiggling against her torso as she occasionally twitched or shivered. She—

No, wait, she came here with a reason, a second reason other than talking to Jacob; if she actually wanted to, and if she actually could.

“Jen,” she said, getting comfortable again against the entrance to Othello's hole in the wall. “I have a favor to ask.”

The Ventrue slowly slid her drenched hand out of the ghoul's pussy; Triss couldn't help but stare. The way Madison's pink insides gripped her wrist, then knuckles, then fingers, was too beautiful to not.

“Favor?” She stood up, naked as usual, and strolled out into the cave toward her own room, Madison's cum still coating her hand. Triss followed. “Oh, this about the ball? I haven't seen you try on any outfits yet.”

“Yeah. Julias will buy whatever, I just need—”

“Buy? Girl you're the same size as me. You know we can share clothes, right?”

“... do you ... have anything that'd look good on me at this ball?” Sharing clothes. The thought had never occurred to her, to ask or otherwise. Sharing sex partners, sure, but sharing clothes? How alien. The idiocy of her for not considering it made her smile.

“Sure. How much skin you looking to expose? Rumor has it the ball will be leaning a lot more toward the fun side of being Kindred. Still an Invictus ball, but I look forward to seeing some skin.”

Of course she did.

“I mean, I guess ... a decent amount? Like, some leg, some back, maybe a little ass.” You had to dress to accent your best features, after all. “That reminds me. Julias said there’d be a lot of thralls there, even some ghouls. Place is going to be packed, and some sharing of food is to be expected. If you wanted, you could bring yours? He suggested they could be on leashes, really paint you as a dominatrix type, but that’s a bit over the top.”

“Ooh!” She turned around, jumped a few times, and clapped her hands. Naked, the whole display was a weird balance of sexy and cute. “Perfect! I do have those.” No surprise there. “And for you, I think we need something that gives the elegant but sexy look, to be a delightful contrast to the tattoos and crocodile teeth. The claws and eyes too.”

Beatrice sighed with how easily Jen described her Nosferatu features. Still hurt, hearing them talked about from another person like that; just an old reflex. She knew Jen was attracted to her, so she had no reason to be offended.

“I do like the snake tattoo.” Julias liked it too. Damn man had a habit of saying the exact right thing she needed to hear even when he didn’t know what was up. She was a beautiful beast, like a snake. Hehehe.

“Alright, let’s go!”

---

By go, Jen meant to a storage area the girl had acquired. Younger Kindred had a habit of doing that, of renting out storage rooms under fake names, for years. And then they’d break in at night, and do whatever it is they needed to do with their amassed possessions in private. In this case, this particular storage room Jen had was meant for her clothes.

“You could bring all this shit back to the cave,” Triss said.

“It’d ruin the aesthetic of our home. And besides, home is for sleeping and fucking.”

Definitely one of the larger storage rooms, and filled with wardrobes and clothing racks on wheels. The two of them stood in the center, concrete walls on three sides, and the metal sectional door down so they had their privacy. A couch too, almost like the girl had planned this. She might have.

“This is a lot of clothes. Considering how often I find you naked, I’m surprised you have this much.”

“You know we often go out and do our thing,” Jen said. “You don’t know where I go or what I’m up to when I’m not at home, right? Well, often, I’m out making contacts with big names, and that requires clothes to match.”

“Kine?”

She nodded as she walked over to one of the clothing racks and started sliding apart clothes bags. “Usually. But on occasion, the Invictus or Carthians have their own, smaller gatherings, where we play dance the Danse. Isabella Leuvion does some pretty interesting things in her free time. I—aha!” She pulled out one of the bags and set it on the couch in the center of the room. But, apparently ‘aha’ was not the end of her search, as she dove back into the endless clothes again.

“Maybe I should hang with more Kindred then,” Triss said. “Make contacts too.”

“Well, you’re friends with Julias and Jack. Hard to beat that for connections. Ah, this would look great too.” And another clothes bag was thrown onto the couch. “Oh, can I see the whole snake tattoo? Might have something that goes with it.”

“You just want to see me naked.”

“That too.”

“... I told Julias that I think it’s a bad idea to have more Kindred in our bed.” Might as well tell her now. No, wait, should have told her after she picked the best dress for her. Damn it.

“Yeah, I had a feeling.” She shrugged, grabbed another clothes bag, threw it on the couch, and came over to her. “So that means one of two things will happen. Either we’ll grow to become good friends, or good friends with benefits once I convince you to let me fuck you and Julias.” Another shrug. “Come on, shirt off. You might as well get naked while I try and see what’ll work.”

Beatrice turned her head to the side. Trust her or don’t trust her? Being told no on the threesome business was, evidently, not enough to dissuade the girl’s aspirations. Girl hadn’t done anything to betray her trust yet. Hell, helped her out on more than one occasion too.

Sighing, Triss reached up and took off her tank top.

“Mm! God damn that’s hot.” Jen leaned in, and stared at her breasts. Took some willpower to not cover them up, but Beatrice kept her arms at her sides and frowned at the Ventrue with no concept of personal space. “The nipple studs, and the snake biting the one nipple? Begs for a dress that exposes the breasts. Exposes everything! Maybe a robe that hangs off the shoulders but doesn’t cover up anything in the front?”

“I ... think I’d prefer to keep my tits and cunt covered for this ball, thank you.” She had no issue showing off her body, but there were limits.

“Hmm, if you don’t want to expose the goods, then yeah, let’s definitely get something to show off what we can, in some way to contrast the tattoos.”

“Corset?”

“Ah, yeah I have some of those.” Back to the clothes again, this time the wardrobe. “Buuuut I think the tattooed girl in the black corset is too boring, and a white corset would be too cliché; typical badass chick trying to look maiden-like. What we need is something more elegant and sexy, something that says ‘I’m a beautiful queen that everyone wants to fuck’.”

“ ... and corsets don’t say that?”

“Not unless you wanted the giant Victorian skirt to go with it.”

“Ugh. No thanks.”

“I know right? Hard to pull those off. The Prince could. But I’m thinking she’ll be wearing something more modern and slutty. Like this!” Out came a long piece of black silk, like a toga or something. “Alright, strip! Have to be naked to wear this. I’ll find you some shoes after.”

“This better be worth it.” Groaning, Triss slipped off everything. The boots, the jeans, the thong—which earned a whistle from Jen, and more than a few hungry gazes.

“Love the piercings. That one hurt? On the clit hood?”

“Yes, yes it did.”

“ ... do anything sexy with it? Like, interesting jewelry and stuff?”

“Yes, yes I do.” She smirked at the woman, and scooped the dress out of her hands. Standing in front of the mirror, she slid it on over her head, and let the silver-colored necklace land on her shoulders.

Dress was a strong word for this. It was more like she was wearing two thin, silk blankets that hung from the necklace, looping down from it to connect behind her. The sheets came down to cover her legs, but when she turned her side to the mirror, the hanging loops of fabric fully exposed the side of her body down to the outer thigh. Her ass was completely visible, but only from the side, since the fabric hung from the front, down past her knee, then came back and up along the center of her back to connect to the necklace again.

“This is ... kind of perfect, actually.” She grinned into the mirror and turned around. Such a simple thing, just black silk hanging from a silver necklace, exposing so much of her body from the side without actually revealing anything. The side of her ass looked utterly glorious.

“A sideless gown. Sometimes simple is best. Here.” Jen handed her some fingerless gloves that looked more like silver jewelry than gloves. “Matches the necklace. For shoes you need some low heel shoes, because you’ll need to walk in a way that keeps the feet partly hidden underneath the sheets.”

Right right, made sense. From the front or back, she would look like a flowing, dark goddess. From the side, she’d look like a seductive devil.

“You really got this fashion thing down. You should be Daeva.”

“Ugh, don’t say that! I know fashion, I know sex, but you won’t see me throwing my life into either.” She went digging through another wardrobe, and from the thudding and clapping, Beatrice knew it was filled with shoes. “Speaking of throwing your life into something, Jacob seems to have taken an interest in you. More than usual.”

Triss turned around a few times in the mirror as she slipped on the sparkling gloves. It was like she was wearing a blanket. So fun, how depending on which direction you saw her from, she went from super elegant, to super sexy.

“Isn’t he interested in all of us? S’why we’re in the circle.”

“Yeah but you and him seem to share an interest in the dark shit. Cruac rituals are ... well, I avoid it, Aaron avoids it, and Othello’s taken a few stabs at it, only to be deterred. He’s not interested in the pain.” She brought out some low-heel shoes, black and silver, to match the back dress and its silver jewel parts. “And from what he told me, there is pain?”

“Yeah ... yeah there is.” She sat down and let Jen slip the shoes on for her. “I guess I had assumed you all practiced witchcraft, before I joined.”

“Maybe some day. Jacob says he’s happy to let us just kind of ... coast, I guess. I—oh! Don’t forget.” Jen came up behind her, got her to stand up, and took the two pieces of hanging cloth behind Triss into her hands. Since it was just two sheets hanging from Beatrice’s neck, it meant that Jen was able to pull the two sheets aside where they overlapped, and expose all of Beatrice’s naked back, legs, and behind. “You have to be careful how you sit and how you move. But...” She came in closer, still holding the two sheets apart to keep Triss’s ass and back exposed, and hooked her hands around Triss’s hips while pressing her pelvis against the Nosferatu’s ass. “It does mean you’re functionality naked in all the good ways. Want to fuck Julias or some food right before, or after the ball? No problems.”

Triss rolled her eyes, and watched herself in the mirror. This woman could not take no for an answer. Hell, told her no just a bit ago, and still the woman was trying to get into Triss’s pants. And watching in the mirror, Triss couldn't help but smirk as Jennifer put her chin on her shoulder, and slipped her hands out along her hips, and then her stomach underneath the dress.

“What about no other Kindred in the bed do you not get, Jen? And you know I'm not going to cheat on Julias.” She tried to step away, but Jen stopped her. Girl knew she wasn't as strong as Triss, not even close, but there was a glint of something in the Ventrue's eyes as she met her gaze through the reflection.

“Is it because Othello and I were enjoying a little orgy? Did that bother you?”

“What? No, I—”

“Cause you said it was you who decided to not have other Kindred in the bed. And I know you're attracted to me.” Jen's hands drifted up, and cupped her breasts under the sheet. The mirror hid what the Ventrue was touching, holding her breasts in a half hug, half hungry grip. “So it must be something else.”

What the fuck was it about Beatrice and Ventrue? Like she was crack or something to them. And why the fuck wasn't she turning around and clocking Jen in the face with a punch? Instead, Beatrice just looked in the mirror, and couldn't help but smile a little as she watched a woman who looked almost identical to her hug her from behind, palms on her nipples.

It was because she knew Jen knew she was strong enough to tear the girl in half, that Triss couldn't help but find the girl's advances intriguing. And it wasn't like Jacob would really care either, if Triss decided to get angry and put the woman in her place. Beatrice had full permission to break a few of Jen's bones.

She didn't though. Instead, she stared at her twin in the mirror, and watched the cloth shift as the woman started to caress her breasts. Dog with a bone. The Ventrue sighed into Beatrice's neck, and watched the mirror too, grinning as she no doubt saw where the fabric shifted where her fingers were circling Triss's nipples. She plucked at her nipple studs a few times, before she settled her fingers underneath her breasts to cup them again, lightly stroke their contours, and gently squeeze. The whole time, Triss tried to keep a straight face, but it did feel really, really pleasant. Even without the blush of life going, Kindred could still feel, and it felt nice, having a woman touching her. Different than a man's, more delicate, more precise.

She should have been punching her, or at least stopping Jen. But something in Jen's eyes stopped her instead, a little more than just sexual attraction there, and she sighed as she watched and waited. She wanted to see where this was going now, where Jen thought her groping was going to get her.

“... you really want to know what happened?” Triss said. “What made me come to that conclusion? It's not the most endearing story.”

Jen removed her hands, smiled into the mirror, and turned around to go digging through clothes again. Just like that, from groping to digging for more clothes, as if it was the most casual thing. Like shaking hands. Once she pulled out a bag, she started undressing as well. Girl knew what she was going to wear already, and was going to show it to her apparently.

“Yes, I want to know. I am trying to be your friend too ya know. Just, a friend with benefits.”

That was true. Jen wasn't just trying to bone her, but also trying to befriend her, be someone she could talk to. And Beatrice hadn't really known anyone like that since Garry, and now Julias. Trusting Jen wasn't coming easy, because the girl screamed devious, but maybe Triss should trust her anyway. Learn from the past, stop being so against bonding with other people, and all that crap.

“ ... I ... realized ... I really rely on Julias a lot. A lot lot, for comfort, and happiness and shit, you know?” She rubbed her claws up and down her naked arms where the dress completely exposed them. “Just a year ago I was a miserable, sorry fucker, angry and angsty and everything. And now I’m not, and I owe most of that to him. A little to Garry, and Jacob too, but mostly Julias. And ... as ... Jacob ... fuck, he scared the shit out of me, Jen. Fucking scared me, really scared me. And then I was holding Julias in my arms, and I realized ... how broken I’d be if I lost him.”

“I—”

“I know, you wouldn’t jeopardize my relationship. But ... just ... I want to keep the feeling of being safe in that man’s arms.” She sighed, and plopped down on the couch beside Jen. “Yeah, I know, really pathetic of me.”

“What? No that’s not pathetic! Damn girl, didn’t think you’d be feeling self doubt like this.” Jen stopped unbuttoning her pants and slid across the couch to bump shoulders with her. “The fuck did Jacob scare you with?”

“He ... told me to keep it secret.”

“Then please don’t tell me. I learn Jacob’s secrets and I’m sure he’ll cut out my tongue, literally, every night for a month.”

Yeah, that did sound like something Jacob would do. And now that she’d seen the sick shit he was more than willing to do in pursuit of his black arts, Jen’s half-joke felt too real.

“I won’t tell you, but you were right that it involves pain. And more than pain. Just ... fuck, I felt like such a pansy after. I was screaming, crying, frenzying, and I ran to Julias for a meal so I wouldn’t fucking frenzy again and drink someone in the middle of the street. Just got into his arms and pretended horrible shit didn’t exist for a little while.” And then fucked, came her brains out, and then fucked again just a few hours ago. But she left that part out. Dampened her point.

“ ... oh. I get it. Not just about maybe damaging your relationship, but my presence might damage that safe feeling.”

“Yeah.”

“Well, guess that just means you need more time for us to become better friends.” Jen hopped up like she knew all the answers to everything — typical Ventrue — and slid out of her shoes and pants. “Cause as much as I love to fuck my ghouls, and Othello’s ghouls, and our meals, and even Othello sometimes, that’s just sex. I’m not really friends with them. Othello and I don’t get along. And Aaron? He just reads, and then fucks off to do his own thing.”

“ ... I am the only friend you have in the circle, aren’t I?”

“Yeap.” A second later, Jen was naked. Again. And of course Beatrice had to look, cause the girl was beautiful. Ass didn’t have the same size as Beatrice’s, and while Jen was quite thin, she wasn’t fit like Beatrice’s more athletic, ripped body. But still, like looking into a sexy mirror. “Now, I found this cloak with a necklace, and it’s designed to go overtop a black chest wrap, but without the wrap, it looks like this.”

Triss watched, intrigued, as the naked creature picked up a long piece of slightly see-through black fabric, and held it by a necklace. Not too dissimilar to Triss’s, fabric hanging from a necklace. Except Jen’s was a single piece of cloth that circled her entirely, but hanging from the necklace from the front and back at a single point. The effect was a cloak that covered her lower back and ass, all the way down to the floor, but all the front of her was completely exposed except for where the fabric came across her chest, spreading apart at the sternum and just barely covering her breast. Fully exposed shoulders and upper back though.

“ ... can't lift your arms wearing that.”

“Sure I can.” She shrugged and lifted her arms. The fabric, already somewhat see-through, raised with her arms and fully exposed her breasts, only to cover them up again when she put her hands at her side. It was like a cape that only connected at the sternum, and dangled behind her while spreading apart to reveal her stomach, legs, and since she was bottomless, her smooth pussy.

“Bottoms?”

“Ah!” And out came the thong. A high rise thong, reaching up to her hips, barely anymore than a g-string. But the fabric was simple, elegant, and colored just right to fit the gold brooch the cloak was connected to at the sternum, on the necklace.

“Sure you don't want to just ditch the cloak and go in only the thong?”

“Nah, that's not pretty! Sexy, sure, but you need the other piece to be beautiful.”

Beatrice rolled her eyes, got up, and walked over to stand beside her. The two of them in revealing black dresses, hers quite revealing from the side, while Jen's might as well have been non-existent. And standing beside each other? Yeah, they were fucking smoking hot.

“What about my face?”

“A black veil to cover the face from the nose down, like last time.”

“And you? Sure you don't want anything to cover these?” Triss reached out and pulled the cloak's open front to the sides. Not like it was hard to do; a gentle breeze would have done the same. The cloak aside exposed Jen's handful breasts, and the Ventrue smirked as she stood there.

“Wait! I am missing something.” Jen spun around, which made the loose fabric swish in the air dramatically. Very fashion runway. She found some bracelets, gold and black, each covered in carvings of small skulls with fangs on them. Her shoes were at least a little less on the nose, black, with a touch of gold on the sides.

“Still going to be flashing everyone every time you move or take a sip of anything.” And, despite herself, she reached out, and again spread apart the cloak to hook it along the outside of the girl’s breasts.

“ ... sending me some mixed signals, Triss.”

“You could say I’m warming up to you.” Triss set her hands on the woman’s breasts, and cupped them in her claws. Basically the same size as hers, perhaps a little bigger, and the Nosferatu smiled at the feel of their softness in her grip.

Neither Kindred had the blush of life going, which was definitely a good thing, since the conversation kept going in a very erotic direction. And it was Beatrice’s fault. She kept letting it happen. Hell less than an hour ago she’d watched the woman fist Madison, and there was no use in denying that she’d love to have that done to her too. The sight of that ghoulish pussy clenching Jen’s wrist so tight, she could see the inner lips drag along her knuckles on the way out, only to squirt onto her hand once the girl was fully outside her.

And Jen seemed genuine about wanting to be her friend. A real, genuine, someone she could talk to friend. Who also just happened to want to bang her; and was nice enough to agree she’d only do that with Julias in the bed too. It might make for a very interesting friendship?

“Think of it like this,” Jen said, and she stepped in a little closer. She reached into the sides of Triss’s dress, and down along the skin of her back to find her ass. And, predictably, she cupped her ass cheeks, bounced them a few times on her fingers where Triss’s ass met her hamstrings, and chuckled. “We could really blow Julias’s mind.”

What was it about this girl that made such contact feel so perfectly fine? Course she’d never kiss or fuck her, not without Julias around, but the girl radiated such honesty and openness about sexuality, that it was hard to not indulge a little. Someone who was truly, wholly comfortable with sex in all its forms, and just wanted to fuck people she was attracted to, and people like liked. And apparently, she felt both for Triss. Would it really be so bad to have this girl in bed, with her tongue and fingers on Triss’s pussy while Julias was inside—

Damn it, she was picturing it, and lightly caressing Jen’s breasts as she did. Ok, enough tempting fate, enough touching the girl’s really, really, really nice breasts. Triss smirked at the woman, and gave her a gentle shove to push her a couple feet away.

“Julias has probably had three or four women at a time before.”

“Women like us?”

“Touche.”

“But, I get what you said. Takes a while to build trust. Give it time, and get back to me. I’d never want to damage the love you two have.” Jen did a few more spins, and chuckled at how the cloak did indeed hover away from her a little to expose her back, her ass, and her breasts. “That said, I’m sorry about what Jacob did to you. Sounds awful.”

“Yeah ... it was fucking awful.”

“Don’t tell me anything you’re not comfortable talking about, but, I mean, go ahead, I’m listening.”

She couldn't talk to Julias about it, not really. But Jen? Jen was in the Circle, and was a girl. Maybe a close friend of her own gender wouldn't hurt. And she could talk about the torture, as long as she left out the Black Blood ... thing.

“Well ... there were knives.”

Chapter 44

~~Jack~~

Back at the burned apartment building, alone this time, and using his free time as well. Course, Invictus didn't exactly mandate hours, but you were expected to work a certain amount. Work above that, accomplish things, and you moved up in rank and social standing; which was like gold in the Invictus. And he wanted to figure this out, who burned down this building, who killed Barry.

He stood atop the ceiling of a neighboring building. The sun had just set, and he only had a couple hours before he was supposed to visit Antoinette, to join her. They were going to the ball together. Ugh, butterflies in his stomach refused to settle. Maybe some work would calm his nerves, so he decided to spend more time on the investigation. With dusk only having just passed, there were still plenty of people out on the street, even in this part of town, so he kept to the rooftops. Up here, he could hide well enough, even without Amanda. And this close to North Side, this part of the city was pretty dark anyway.

He got down on a knee — careful of his suit — and looked across the way to the ashes and ruins of the destruction. Still surrounded by police tape, still being investigated by the humans. Perhaps they'd find something? If they did, Jessy would notify him; Invictus had their eyes and ears on everything the police touched, after all. No word though, and likely that the police wouldn't find anything anyway, not with no evidence. A burned down old apartment building wasn't exactly uncommon.

But maybe the animals knew more?

He looked around from his perch. No rats. Well, maybe there was, but it was dark and he was high up while rats preferred the ground. But, there were three animals cities always had in droves. Rats, cockroaches, and crows. Other animals too, but those three would stand the test of time and outlive them all. Cockroaches were just resilient to the point of absurdity, but rats and crows were smart, damn smart. And they made the perfect informants of the animal kingdom.

He looked around and behind him. A couple of crows stood upon the ceiling with him, upon its ledge and emitting the occasional caw. When he turned to face them, they both looked over their shoulder to look back at him, complete with a couple ruffles of their feathers.

He took an unneeded breath, and met the gaze of one of the crows. Feral whisper, Julias had called it. Bringing up the beast in the gut, taking it to the surface, using its animal nature to communicate with other animals. He did not like the beast, did not like the predatory impulses it sent him, did not like how it forced him to think of other people in terms of dangerous or not, food or not, competitor or not. And, when hungry enough, the beast took over and sent the vampire into a frenzy. The aftertaste of its presence was forever on his tongue, and he could just barely make out the blurry memories of the insanity. Almost a year ago, the hazy images in his brain showed him grabbing an innocent women, drinking her dead, and dragging her corpse up a building like some sort of leopard taking its fresh kill into the trees.

Nope, don't go down that road. It was a long time ago, and every vampire had to deal with frenzying. Many of them didn't really care if they killed an innocent in the process; just part of being Kindred, losing your humanity, your connection to the human race. The fact it still ate at him just meant he still had that humanity, and he should keep it that way.

Another breath, and he stepped toward the crow. “Come here.” Spoken in English, but the words carried the animal power from his chest, from the strange beast lurking in his ribs and always on the prowl, looking for escape. The two crows looked at each other, then him, like he was the craziest two-legged thing in the world.

Until he came closer, and said it again, vitae flowing through his dry veins and bringing out the feral whisper within. “Come here.”

He could almost see the dawning of awareness in their black eyes. Beautiful creatures, crows, and the way they held themselves always denoted a degree of analysis, he thought, even before he was Kindred. And now, as he crossed the gap between animal and vampire, he came closer, and closer, and let the voice of his beast come to the surface.

“Come here.”

The two crows hopped over to him. He smiled, held out his arm, and both birds flapped their wings until they’d found comfortable spots on his forearm to perch. Excellent. Not so excellent for his suit, with bird claws digging into the sleeves, but he’d live.

“How much do you two remember about the fire that happened here?”

The two birds made some quiet clicking noises. And, through some madness that would forever surprise him, the beast lurking in his chest listened. It relayed the information, parsed it, turned it into human concepts his brain could understand. But even with that, the birds communicated with their senses, not words. And once the beast in him turned it into senses like his own, he had to make sense of it.

Crows had great memories, he knew that. Latest research suggested they had memories that lasted far longer than a day, that they could remember faces, that they could teach each other how to use tools, and a host of examples of intelligence beyond that of most animals. Not only that, but crows had better eyesight than humans. A smart Ventrue — or any Kindred who used the discipline animalism — would start to use crows more and more as they grew in power, grew in strength, grew in their ability to command multiple crows.

According to Julias, he was such a Ventrue. The ego stroking made him smile, and he smirked down at the two crows as they relayed information back to him.

Daytime, sunlight. Christ how long it'd been since he'd felt those sensations like the crows did every day, warmth and brightness. He forced back the obvious imagery of life, and through it into the details. People, people below the crows as the two birds watched from on high, up in the air where it was safe, where the air was cleaner and the noises were too. Easier to tell where things were, what things could be eaten if conveniently dropped by the humans.

So much more vivid than the rats. The rats couldn't see anything, but had a billion smells and touch sensations to share with him. The birds were far closer to humans, where sound was important, but vision was of utmost importance. And that, his brain could make better sense of, turn into more useful information as he filtered through the hundreds of men and women that walked by in their memories.

Unfortunately, as much as crows had great memories, they weren't looking for what he was looking for. They didn't have the context or need to remember things specifically in the ways humans did, so the onslaught of images, of people, of fabric covering skin, of food, and honking horns from the metal cages on wheels, wasn't broken down into weighted data. Too much of everything, without anything.

The birds clucked a few times at him.

“How about ... four people, two wearing trench coats—fabric stuff that reaches the feet. Two men, two women. They ... perhaps seemed dangerous?”

The crows looked around, at each other, at him, and made clicking noises a few more times. A memory, four people, standing around in evening just before dusk. They were near, and they were looking at the building. Two trench coats, two leather jackets, two men and two women. The crows had stayed away from them, and watched them for a little longer than the other humans walking around. Bingo.

“This was before the fire? Have they shown up since?” he said. The birds clicked a few noises. They didn’t know. “How about ... the fire. What do you remember of the day of the fire?”

More clicks and some ruffling feathers. The birds shifted on his arm, claws scraping against the fabric, and nodded their heads up and down several times as they dug through more memories. People walking around, nothing happening, nothing special, just the building randomly catching on fire after time. When the fire caught, people came running out, but not the four people the crows recognized as dangerous. Those four were nowhere to be seen.

The fact they recognized them as dangerous though, was definitely a step in the right direction toward suspects. The only lead they had about the fire was growing to be a good lead.

“Alright, I have a party to go to. I ... actually, you two, I want you to do me some favors.” The two birds ruffled their feathers a few times, and waited. “Don’t worry, I’ll give you food for a job well done.” That got some raised beaks and head turns from them. Just because he was forcing their cooperation didn’t mean he had to be a jackass about it. “Great. Now, there’s a ball I’m going to, and you two, are going to be my lookouts.”

---

He was actually pretty excited. Nervous, butterflies in the stomach, but excited too. This would be the first ball he'd be going to that was open invitation for all paranormals in the city. Paranormals, was that PC? He laughed at the thought as he got out of the car and stepped onto the stairs of the Elysium tower.

This would be the first ball he'd be going to with Antoinette as his date as well, like, on the arm date, arriving together date. So excited, and terrified. He already had enough unwanted attention from everyone due to the good and bad things that kept landing on him, and this was going to put him in the center of the light in front of nearly everyone. Everyone. But it was her, his lover, the most beautiful and amazing god damn person he'd ever known, and holy shit he was excited to walk into that ball with her.

Such a change from so long ago, a lifetime ago, when he couldn't even make eye contact with other Kindred older than him. He smiled, nodded to the security staff on his way through the tower, and down the stairs into his love's fortress. Different man now. A different man, a diff—

Holy mother of god.

“Ah, you are here a touch early, my love.” The goddess smiled up at him from down a few stairs.

She was wearing the dress, the dress she'd described, the dress he thought for sure would be far too revealing for an actual ball. It was a tight dress, thin white fabric that hugged her curves so tight he could tell it was custom fitted to her shape. Sleeves, backless, with plunging cleavage that went down, down, down, and down until it stopped a single inch above where he knew her sex started.

The goddess chuckled, and did a slow spin, turning her head over her shoulder to watch him as he watched her. The skirt was indeed long, reaching her ankles, and split at the hip up all the way to her ribs. No underwear. A few bits of subtle white string held the sides tight to her waist, and a single string held her cleavage together ... barely ... not really. The cleavage of the dress pulled apart so wide, it cut straight down across the center of each breast; a hint of her pink areola were visible.

“I ... I uh ... not going to be able to keep my eyes off you, if you’re wearing that.”

“Oh my sweet little Ventrue, then I am afraid tonight will be difficult for you. Many Kindred will be exposing their skin, and many more will be bringing thralls and ghouls to either show off their harem, or to share for drink.” She stepped up the stairs, each showing the white shoes that had a shine and sparkle to them Jack did not recognize, but figured meant they were super expensive. Hard to admire the shoes, when his eyes were locked onto how the dress completely exposed the inside contours of her breasts. It hugged them tightly, tight enough the dress showed the shape of her nipples against the thin fabric.

“Definitely. Definitely in trouble. That said, don’t think I’ll be ... taking my eyes off of you.”

“Well that is absurd. There are many beautiful men and women to appear at the ball, and I fully expect you to take a peek at each of them. The women at least.” Chuckling all the more, she came to stand beside him, and leaned forward a little to bring her lips down to his. Leaning like that made her breasts hang down, and a touch more of the edge of her nipples threatened to slip free of the hugging fabric. “You look delightful in this suit. A fashion success if I do say so, and undoubtedly Julias’s choice? You do carry the tone and texture of a fresh Kindred of this era, wearing this.”

“That was his goal, yeah. I ... just ... god damn.” He really couldn’t stop staring. She was still leaning forward, in the way she often did to draw his eyes to her cleavage. But the dress’s fabric was so thin, hugged her so tight, and revealed so much skin, he felt like he was looking at naked Antoinette. And he loved naked Antoinette.

“Ah, I am sorry my love. I did not think this would be so troublesome for you?” She reached down, took his hand, set it on her stomach, and guided his hands down the deep cleavage. Soft, her skin was so soft, and alabaster, and perfect. And when she guided his fingers down to where the cleavage finally stopped, she slid his fingers down past the fabric a single inch while still against her skin. His fingertips found the folds of her pussy, and he groaned as he shivered at the touch of them.

“This dress,” she said, “is made for you, as well as for myself, my love. To excite and entice you. But I feel it has worked too well, and we must deal with that.” She pulled his hand free of her delicate folds, and brought it up to her bosom. First one, and then the other, she guided them along the undersides of her heavy, hanging breasts, and Jack got to see for himself how easy it was to nudge the dress aside to reveal both of them fully. Very, very easy.

And as he shivered with the sensation, she blushed life. Immediately her nipples began to harden, and she grinned down at him as she pressed his back to the wall on the stairway. Soon he was pinned to the black marble, staring up at the goddess leaning over him, and her breasts still dangling underneath her torso into his palms. The size of them spilled over his hands completely, dwarfing and covering them, and the silky softness of their great weight had his knees shaking.

“R-Right now?” he said.

“I must take care of you, little Ventrue, so your wandering eyes do not run away with you. Now, blush.” An order, the steel in her voice coming through, just a little bit of it, just enough to give her sultry French accent some power. Power that had him melting.

He blushed life, and his cock jumped to life against his suit pants.

“Will uh ... Ashley and Julee be coming?” he said. Couldn’t keep his eyes on Antoinette’s eyes, not with her still leaning forward so the weight of her breasts pressed down against his palms. He squeezed them, gently, just enough to feel how they were supple, how they compressed and gave in to the shape of his fingers. Perfect pillows.

“Non. I would prefer to keep them separate from Kindred life. They are my muses, not my spies.” She reached down, and as he continued to fondle her, she undid the button of his pants. A moment later, his cock was sticking out through the flap of his boxers, and she took it into her grip while her other hand stayed to his shoulder.

She was jerking him off, in the stairway, maybe ten feet from where it opened up into the main lobby of her tower. The goddess couldn’t care less if someone spotted them, at all.

She grinned down at him, one of those dangerous grins, and turned him around. With his back to her chest, she leaned down far until her chin was on his neck, her bare breasts pushed to his back and nipples pressing hard enough on the suit for him to feel it. She pushed him forward, toward the wall, so he had no choice but to reach out to brace his hands against it while she pressed her body against him, reached around his waist, and took his cock into both hands.

“Keep your hands upon the wall, my delicious little Ventrue,” she said, “or I will have to punish you.”

He nodded, and turned his head a little to smile at the succubus. With her chin on his shoulder, turning his head made their cheeks rub together, and she chuckled before she squeezed his cock hard enough to make him wince.

“Yes ma’am.”

“Good.” Her hand squeezed on the base of him, worked a single inch of his length in a stroke, while the other teased fingertips along the tip. The heat was already starting to build, and the woman knew how to milk him of the rising warmth like he was kindling in a fire. “Hundreds of Kindred and kine will see you, my love. And at this ball, I am sure some romance is encouraged, yes? You and I will kiss, and touch, and for all of Dolareido’s night populace to see. They will know that you are mine.” Her lips turned, and her fang grazed along his jawline as she nibbled on it. “You are mine.”

Hers. He could almost feel the power dripping from her words, warm, thick, like blood trickling down from her lips onto his body.

“Yours.”

The Prince purred into his ear, and squeezed his cock a little harder, before she reached up with one hand to pull her mane of hair over his shoulder. Soon the long, flowing waves of white were pouring over his chest and down to graze along where her hands again wrapped his length. He never asked about her white hair much, beyond that first meeting; seemed like it might have been rude, since she didn’t look nearly old enough for white hair. He loved her hair though, so damn pretty and wavy and long and soft to the touch. And, as she continued to stroke him, she let her hair tickle along his cock.

One of her hands drifted higher again, and found his throat. She circled the front half of it, more even, and forced his head to tilt to the side to expose his neck, like prey might when forced by a hungry vampire. Again she started to suckle on his neck, played with his earlobe, and kept her hand on his throat as she stroked him faster, until he could feel the growing waves of heat building between his legs, underneath his testicles. A drop of his precum rose to the tip of his length, and Antoinette purred louder as she slid her finger to the end of his cock, and rubbed the wetness into his foreskin. Wet, she peeled the skin away to expose the ripe head of his cock, and spread more of his precum along his glans. Sensitive, so damn sensitive, the ripe, pink skin of his cock's head, and she caressed it with just the perfect amount of wet pressure to make the tingling sparks dance through his whole body.

Once the head of his shaft was thoroughly coated, she gripped the center of his length once more, and started to stroke him with a harder, stronger grip. A tiny groan worked its way out of him, and immediately, the devil slowed her strokes down to almost nothing.

“How many times have you cum for me, my love?” She slid her fingertips along his length, teasing her claws on the veins and skin of it, letting his fluids settle. She knew all the signs of impending orgasm, and knew when to stop so he could catch his breath and let the rising cum ease back again.

“I ... I dunno, um ... must be hundreds.”

“And every time, the feel of your muscles flexing, the sight of your pleasure, the sounds you make, stirs within me a great need.”

“You ... m-maybe we could—”

“No.” Her grip tightened, and she brought her hand to the base of his cock to leave it there, squeezing tightly, making his cock stand outright and ready to burst. “To satisfy me will take time, time we do not have. I will have to content myself with yours.” Again, her long hair tickled along his cock, and she made sure the angle of her grip caused the white waves to trace along his glans. Until she pushed it more forward, and started to stroke him quickly again.

God, she knew what she was doing, to such a perfect degree. The rhythm, pacing, getting into a nice and pleasant tempo, familiar, inviting, loving. She pressed her back to him, squishing her bare breasts to his back until he could feel her hard nipples pressing through his suit, the softness overflowing his shoulders. All the while, she kept one of her hands secure on his throat, pinning him to her, even as she bent forward slightly so he did as well. He couldn't interfere, with her order to keep his hands against the wall. And he couldn't look down with her grip on his neck. Helpless, he closed his eyes, and let the woman work her magic.

Cum started to pour through his length, hot, tingling, each squeeze of his muscles earning more of the sweet, tantalizing pleasure of thick heat flowing through his cock. Another flex, met with Antoinette's grip rising closer to his glans, sent an almost painful wave of pleasure down his length, and a spurt of the liquid to squirt onto the wall in front of him.

"Ever so sweet," she said, and her grip on his shaft rose again. With her palm and fingers circling him just under the glans, she shifted her grip up and down, so the sheathe of his skin, along with her fingers, and his cum, massaged and coated the base edge of the bulbous tip of his cock, the most sensitive place on his body. And he groaned. No use trying to hide how amazing it felt, how perfect it was, how her fingers caught where his cum dripped from his glans, spread the warmth around, and used it to lubricate his cock as she milked him. Again, her hair tickled along the tip of his shaft as she aimed it more upright, and growled down over him as she stroked him again, and again, and again. And once no more cum leaked from him, she milked the waves of pleasure instead, strokes shortening and becoming gentle.

"Say that you love me, my little Ventrue."

"I love you." So manipulative. Demanding such words after working an orgasm out of him. Hell, she was still stroking his cum-coated cock, and making him squirm as the final tingles of post-orgasm bliss started to fade. There was some definite Pavlovian manipulation going on here.

But that was fine, because he did love her.

“And I trust you to never betray our love. I do. So, do not worry if your eyes wander. The women at the ball will be dressed to invite your eyes, and it would be rude to ignore that request.” She let go of his neck at last, and lowered the hand to run a fingertip around and around the tip of his cock, spreading the soon-to-fade cum. “I would be lying if I said I did not enjoy the intrigued, aroused gazes of people, when I wear clothing such as this. Mostly, it is your gazes I crave, my dearest love, but forgive a woman for delighting in her vanity, and enjoying the eyes of strangers.”

“F-Forgiven, definitely forgiven. And can you wear that dress? More often? When we’re alone.”

She kissed his ear, and purred once again. “Of course.”

He sighed his bliss, and looked down, now that she had both hands on his length. He was still hard, and she was still massaging his length. And she wasn’t stopping.

Having sex so often, sometimes with the rather demanding task of satisfying three women, was having an effect on him. A man’s recovery period from orgasm was only a biological function after all, and Kindred could bypass any biological function with practice. Or in this case, with an conscious and unconscious need. His body, his mind, his beast, they wanted more. More.

She started to stroke him faster again, and nudged her cheek against his as she caught on. No words needed, she knew he wanted more. She brought her other hand up again to find his neck again, but this time she kept her fingers around his throat more gentle so he could look down, and watch how her beautiful, cum-coated hand worked him.

“I would be lying,” she said, “if I did not find our regular bouts to have affected me, my love. Forever I have enjoyed touch upon my breasts, but, your persistent kissing, suckling, massaging, and pampering has lead to an increase in my own desire, as it has apparently done in you as well.”

“I ... I um...” Too good, the sound of her husky voice in his ear as she massaged his wet cock. Cum as lubricant, joined by more precum, made everything slide perfectly along the skin, his ripe glans, so the pleasuring heat of impending climax started once again.

“To simply lay there, and let my love suckle and massage my breasts for as long as you enjoy? The thought of it leaves me dripping wet.” She whispered the words directly into his ear, and her stroking hand grew faster. “And to sit upon you, hold your length sheathed inside me, and cradle your head to my breasts, is bliss. Utter bliss. Or, to touch myself, my breasts, to caress them as you set your lips upon my folds, and your fingers within my recesses?” She pressed herself to him harder, until her nipples were stabbing him like diamonds. “I can feel myself dripping down my thighs, at this very moment, at the thought. I—”

He came again.

---

They took a limousine, a proper, fancy, large limousine, with more than enough room for half a dozen people to sit around comfortably. Course it was just him and the Prince, and she snuggled up against the side of him as he sat down.

God, he still couldn't keep his eyes off of her. The dress exposed so much skin, skin he'd been fondling only moments before, skin he'd covered in his cum dozens of times. Maybe if they had time, she'd—no no, she just gave you a handjob, you idiot, two at that. And you're on the way to an important and expensive party, a ball, had by your covenant. Yes, there will be women there, scantily clad. Yes, there will be thralls and ghouls there, for showing off, for drinking, and even sharing. Yes, vampires were going to get horny, and have to contain that arousal until they went home. It was only natural sex was going to be on his mind, especially with Antoinette sitting beside him with her breasts almost completely exposed, and every inch of her stomach all the way down to her mons pubis also exposed.

Memories of so many nights, sitting on her waist and coating that valley of skin in his cum, refused to stay put. No matter how hard he tried, he couldn't stop picturing the beautiful woman next to him, with her dress pulled apart again so he could caress and suckle on her nipples while she stroked his head, cradled him, while she jerked him off again.

“My love, I can see that twinkle in your eye.”

“W-Wha? Oh, sorry, just ... can't help but stare at you wearing that.” He gestured to the plunging cleavage that reached far far below her navel, and how it was just a loose, single string that kept the cleavage from parting to fully expose her nipples.

“After what I did but twenty minutes ago? My, your sex drive is boundless.”

“I'm sorry! Just ... embraced pretty young, you know?”

“That you were. And, to my delight, a young man such as you will forever, eternally lust with such vigor.” She reached out, slipped her arm behind his back, and settled it on his shoulders while her other hand reached down, took one of his hands, and guided it to her lips. Kiss, kiss, more kisses on his knuckles as she grinned at him with that mischievous devil gaze. “If my hands were not enough, when this ball is fini, I will take care of you once again. Though, this time, you will be satisfying my needs first.” Another kiss, this time with a hint of her fangs putting pressure on his skin. “Multiple times.” And she was using her order voice. Not a request then.

“Yes ma'am.”

“Merci beaucoup. I expect to have your tongue upon my breasts and my folds for the remainder of the night.” A tight hug, and she leaned down to plant a kiss upon his head. “But, perhaps tomorrow, we could embark on a social activity less sexual?”

Well, they did have sex. A lot. All the time. He always wanted it and she always wanted him to want it. But he did want to do more, just never knew what she'd want to do.

“Any ideas?”

“Ben oui. I believe there are operas you may enjoy, and you wished to hear more of my cello playing, did you not?” She gave him another kiss on his buzzed hair, and released his hand only to set her hand on his chest and adjust his suit. Shoulder was probably sitting off center or something. “Or perhaps, we could simply sit down together, and watch television?”

“I have to admit I have a hard time imagining you enjoying television.”

“I have seen the rise of radio, the phone, television in its original form, blurry images of black and white, and have seen the growing era of virtual reality. But, you are correct, it is rare for me to enjoy a television show. Trite garbage.”

He laughed. Yeah, it was garbage. “But not all of it's horrible garbage. Some of it is good garbage. I'd say we could both binge watch a show sometime, but that doesn't really work unless you're willing to sit down for three or four hours a night for a few nights straight.”

“Alas, that would not work for either of us. Perhaps a movie?”

Try as he might, he couldn't stop the smile from sneaking onto his lips. Hearing her, her French accent, and her godliness say ‘movie’ was just too cute.

“Ashley and Julee don’t try and force you to watch movies? Romcoms or such?”

“Oh, the two little minxes try, but they fail. For you though, little Ventrue? I am willing to experiment.” Another kiss for his head, and her roaming hand found his neck, where she adjusted the collar of his shirt. “A trade of tastes. You test your palette upon my flavors of choice, and I yours. Though, as the woman in this relationship, I fully expect to have an unfair bias in this exchange, in my favor.” As if to prove her point, she pressed the side of her body into his, her nearest breast pushing to his shoulder as she ran her hand down his body and down to his leg, near his crotch. “Non?”

“S-Sure! Yeah, um, opera right? I’ll try it, gladly.” He grinned up at the goddess. Christ she could be so damn sexy, just being playful, and fun. And scary when she wanted to be too. Even now, he could catch just a hint, just a wisp of her dominant side coming through, where each proposition she made, each request, held a hint of danger if he said no to any of them. Of course, she’d never hurt him for saying no, but it was definitely not a word she was used to hearing. And he had no reason to say it.

“Bien.” And yet another kiss on his head, before the woman turned to look out the window of the limousine. “I do wonder as to the arrangements Julias and his council have made for this ball.”

“You don’t know? I just assumed they’d tell you. I don’t know either.”

“A surprise is a part of the experience.” Shrugging, her arm around his shoulders bent a little, so she could set her fingers on his ear, and lightly tug on and stroke his earlobe while still looking out the window. “But I can speculate. This is a ball to remind us all of, and embrace the peace the city holds. As such, I expect music, jovial and classical, while there will also be seating, with thralls being drained and blood set into wine glasses. Some of the more adventurous will drink directly from the source, while some Kindred will prefer to keep such acts private, to at least some extent. So the wine glass will be a common choice for tonight; perhaps goblets, for the Primogen and myself. There will be no formal dinner, but rather tables along the walls of the main chamber, where people may sit if they wish, or rise and dance to the music if they wish. And, if the past is any indication, more than a few kine will be naked and thoroughly drained, of blood and more, before the night is done.”

“ ... you speculate all this?”

“My love, when you are as old as I, these things become routine.” Her smile faded, and she looked back to him as her eyes grew heavy. “A different topic. I understand most Kindred are finding safer places to rest come sunrise. What have you done?”

Right, that. Julias had told him, but he wasn’t really sure what to do. He’d never made a ‘secure’ sleeping den before. “Nothing yet.”

“Then, please, sleep within my tower until you find a safe place to spend your days.”

“Really?”

“Oui. My little Ventrue, you sleep upon my bed half the days of the week as is.”

“Yeah, but, sleeping every night? Sounds like we’re moving in together.”

She leaned down toward him, planted a kiss upon his lips, and nudged her nose against his. “You will still have your normal living den, for your nightly activities. But come the day, come to my bed chambers, rest your head upon my bosom, and fall asleep in my arms.”

He smiled, and nodded. He could do that, gladly.

---

---

~~Natasha~~

She'd narrowed the choice down to two dresses. One was a beautiful, simple ivory dress that had straps, some moderate cleavage that worked nicely with her tiny — frustratingly tiny — breasts, and a long skirt that hugged the legs pretty tight all the way down to the ankles. It was smooth, silky, and very pretty. The other dress was red, very bold, and it too was a dress with straps, except the skirt only reached a couple inches down her thighs, open back, and the cleavage was plunging and reached below the navel.

She wanted to wear the ivory one. Jessy told her she should wear the red one. But now she was alone, in her new apartment, without Jessy to bully her into trying something she didn't want to try. Jessy was so bold, she'd probably long forgotten that she was an aggressive woman at all. Just watching her and Fiona throw themselves at that Eric fellow was like watching two teenagers trying to out-slut each other. No, that wasn't fair to them. Still though, pretty awkward.

That Eric man was very attractive though. Not as big as the other bouncers, but he reminded her of Garry, a very dangerous man; so of course Jessy threw herself at him. And she was sure the woman would get into his pants eventually, or maybe Fiona would? It turned out Fiona wasn't the sexual predator she'd made herself out to be, or told Damien she was, apparently. Flirtatious sure, but not the sort of girl to sleep around. Or maybe she wanted to be, and that was part of why she came to Dolareido from her home town, cause in Dolareido people slept with each other as much as shaking hands?

Stalling, Natasha, you're stalling. Pick a dress. She frowned, laid them both on the bed beside each other, and compared. Both designed to fit her small body, but one was classy, the other looked like something Jessy might wear. Hell the other looked like one Jessy might fuck in, in Bloodlust.

Some knocks at the door. Sighing, Natasha walked over to the door and peeked through the view hole. She was expecting Jessy to pay a surprise visit, and—wait, that was Art, and Matt! She looked down at herself, and sighed. Just a white t-shirt and her pajama bottoms. Pink pajama bottoms.

Go change! No, don't change. She didn't need to wear better clothes for her boyfriends. Hehe, boyfriends, plural. Remember what Antoinette said, about embracing the things you like, and that the boys probably liked you despite your attempts to hide your true nature, not because of hiding it.

She opened the door. "Hello Arturo, Matthew."

"Hey babe," Art said, evil grin fully adorned as he stepped into her place.

Matt followed in behind him, his smile much more warm and inviting. Not that she disliked Art's more mischievous, devil smile, but she had to admit, it was the combination of Matt and Art's personalities that made them so appealing together. "Hey Tasha. Like the pajamas."

"D-Do you?" She stepped away and smiled a little smile, before she reached down and tried to smooth them out. "They're uh ... p-pretty ... um..."

"Very pretty." Art chased after her, a little faster than she was backing up, and he set his hands on her hips as she continued backing up, until Matt caught him by the back of the collar. Like catching a horny dog by the leash.

"Dude, shoes."

Rolling his eyes, Art let go of her and got down to a knee to undo his shoes, leaving Natasha giggling and smiling.

“I like w-what you’re wearing t-too. Handsome.”

They grinned and nodded, like young boys given treats. The two of them were wearing gray suits. Normal suits you’d wear to a nice party; no ties though. Someone must have told them about the unusual dress code of the ball, the weird formal-but-not-so-formal-also-unique style of it. It looked great on them. She did always like how a suit emphasized shoulders, and both her boyfriends had big shoulders.

“What’re you b-boys doing here? I thought I was g-g-going ... to meet you at the ball?”

“Meet us?” Matt said. “Come on, you know the guy has to show up at the girl’s place and take her on the date.”

“I ... I guess, I j-just haven’t even gotten dressed yet! I’m trying to pick.”

“Well I think we can help with that.” And, again, Art came after her, like a wolf chasing prey. She made a tiny squeak and ran away, only for the man to chase her down until she was cornered in the center of the room. Trapped!

Art reached out for her, like a beast trying to grab her, and she slipped under his hands. But Matt was waiting for her, and she squealed as the man caught her in his massive hands.

In the two minutes since their arrival, she’d regressed to a silly little girl. And it was fun! Fun. She laughed as the giant flipped her over his shoulder, and she set her elbows against his back as she looked at Art, once the big guy turned around.

“Y-yeah, um, I have two dresses picked out, on my bed.”

“Two? Hell I’ve known girls who were still working on ten this far out from a party,” he said.

“Well, I’m n-not most girls. I like to prepare.”

Matt nodded from underneath her, and pat her leg a couple times as he walked toward her room. Once in there, he set her down gently, and stood by the edge of her bed to look down at the two dresses she’d laid out. Art did too, standing opposite of Matt so she was standing between the two of them.

“So,” Art said, “your options are slutty, or classy? Red, or white?”

“Y-Yeah. And, n-n-not white. Pale skin and white ... d-d-don’t match. It’s ivory.”

Matthew scooped up the ivory dress. Art scooped up the red dress. “Try this,” they both said, at the same time.

Oh good god the dresses were a metaphor for her boyfriends.

But Art rolled his eyes and tossed aside the red dress. “I’m kidding. You’d really be comfortable at a party wearing something like this?”

“Well ... n-no, but Jessy—”

“You’re not Jessy,” he said. “And besides, the white dress is beautiful. Isn’t it Lenny?” And of course he slipped in white again, knowing full well it’d frustrate her, calling it the wrong color.

“It is. Very classy.” Matt set the dress on her shoulder, and smiled down at her. Big, warm, happy smile. “I mean, by all means wear the red dress. When you’re with us. In private.”

She giggled again, and nodded as she scooped up the red dress before putting it away in her closet. But, as she did, she felt the looming presence of people behind her. Turning around, she gasped as she found Art, once again, reaching out for her. His hands took her hips, and the man brought her in closer to him, pressing his hips to hers. Except he was so tall, it was more like him pressing his hips against her stomach and chest.

“You ... I know that look! W-W-We ... don’t have time for that!”

“You sure?” This time it was Matt with the devious grin on his face, and he sat beside the dress on the bed as he watched her. “We got what, thirty minutes before we should probably head out? Plenty of time.”

Art nodded like the crazy man was making sense. He very much was not.

“I need time to put on makeup! You know, b-b-ball makeup, and stuff. You know? G-Girl stuff.”

Art sat down on the bed as well, and both boys pouted the most ridiculous pouts she’d ever seen. Matt could pull it off, but on Art, it just looked he was being sneaky and manipulative again, and obviously so.

“O-Ok,” she said. “Um ... after, after the ball, w-we can ... have sex.”

The two boys perked right up, like she’d given them candy. Boys! Just a pair of silly boys. Except, when they were on her, holding her, doing things to her, they stopped behaving like silly boys. Far more mature, far more ... dominant. Maybe just a quickie? No! No stop thinking about it, you have a ball to get ready for. And besides, you prefer it when you get to dedicate some time to the act, not just ten minutes.

“Ok, I have to get dressed n-now.”

“Ok,” they both said, in unison, while they smiled and watched her. Neither got up to move.

“Boys! A lady, n-needs ... t-t-to...”

“You know we’ve seen you naked right?” Matt said.

Art, complete with a nod and a dismissing wave, grinned. “Lot more than that.”

She couldn’t deny that. The three of them had been all over each other for many nights now, to the point it was interfering with her work. But it was hard to stop! God, she had no idea how addicting sex could be, when you found someone you fit with sexually, an ebb and flow where everything just sort of lined up naturally.

She was supposed to be looking for a new place to sleep too, somewhere more secure, while Barry’s death was being investigated. The Prince had offered her one of her many guest rooms in her tower’s underground bunker, so perhaps she should just bite the bullet and sleep at the Prince’s? But then, what about Arturo and Matthew? She didn’t want them to stop visiting her, and they very well might if she was sleeping in Elysium tower.

“Fine, f-fine! Fine.” Glaring daggers into her two boyfriends, she started taking off her t-shirt. Boyfriends, plural. Hehe.

Both guys leaned back, and watched, hunger in their eyes. She could see the growing thirst on their faces, how their muscles tensed slightly as she finally got the shirt up over her head, and pulled it down past her long dark hair. Topless, wearing nothing but pink pajama bottoms.

She looked down at herself. A tiny body, little breasts, a flat stomach and a skinny waist, but not very curvy hips. Antoinette’s words sprung up from her memory though, reminding her of what she’d said, about her, her size, her attitude and personality, and wearing pink in front of the boys. And, it was working. The two of them looked ready to tackle her, grab her, pin her to the bed, pry her open with their fingers, and—

Stop thinking about it! At least she didn't have the blush of life going, so the arousal running through her mind wasn't manifesting, otherwise her nipples would be diamonds by now. And with the two boys staring at her and her breasts, she knew they'd both be devouring them. Her. Everything. She shook her head, hard, so her hair flew about a bit as she forced the thoughts from her mind.

“Showing off for us?” Art said.

“What? N-No, just ... nevermind.” They were tempting fate, watching her change, but she'd told them no sex until later and she was going to stick to that. So, she slipped out of her pajama bottoms, and walked over to her wardrobe. A glance back showed both men had tilted their heads to the side, in unison, to stare at her butt. She frowned at them, but when she looked back to her wardrobe and pulled open a drawer, she smiled where they couldn't see. They liked her butt.

Maybe ... maybe she could do a little teasing? Just a little. She had to be careful, cause she knew if she pushed the two wolves too hard, they'd just jump her, and to hell with the party. Which was tempting too! But, the Prince would be very angry with her if she didn't go. It was her job to learn things, discover things, learn about the Uratha and the Begotten at the party, meet people and develop connections. The Danse Macabre. So no teasing. Control yourself.

She dug through her underwear drawer, and reached for a boring pair of white underwear. But, Antoinette taught her to not wear white underwear with a white — ivory — dress. Either black, with specific intent to let people see it, or something the color of skin, to hide its presence.

Or none at all.

She shivered. No underwear, at a ball? Well it wasn't like she'd be the only one. She'd been to one of these parties before, and the sexual atmosphere was almost palpable, with women wearing clothes straight off the runway that exposed breasts completely, and men more than happy to show off some muscle. Vampires didn't sweat, didn't give off body odor — except for maybe a little stale air from being a walking corpse — so it wasn't like they couldn't take advantage of clothes humans couldn't. Full suit of leather? Jessy wore that on a regular basis, because she had no reason not to. Corsets? Lot of women wore them, absurdly tight too; no need to breathe after all.

Jessy would tell her to wear a black thong, and let people know she had a butt, a nice, tight little butt. Her words. But that wasn't Natasha either. She liked being secretive, and she liked being playful, behind closed doors.

She closed the underwear drawer, nothing in hand, and walked back to the boys. Managing a tiny smile, she slipped the white dress on over her head, and tucked down on the hem to get it snug to her body. Down and down it went until it covered most of her legs, but the dress itself was quite tight, to contrast the conservativeness of the length. Antoinette had suggested it'd go nicely with her 'secretly sexy' vibe she gave off.

Both boys jawdropped, and stared at her. "Wow." Again, in unison.

"It's so ... t-t-tight, I can barely move. And..." She looked down, and frowned. The fabric wasn't very thick, but not see-through. Still, it hugged her breasts tight enough to give the subtle hint of her nipples, despite their softness, as she was not blushing life.

Like some sort of four-armed monster, the two men reached out for her, took her hands, and pulled her closer to them.

"H-Hey! We ... no no, we can't."

“We won’t,” Matt said. But, even saying that, he kept her hand in his, and set one hand on her hip as he pulled her in until she was standing between the two sitting men. “Just, damn.” And, as the giant smiled at her, he leaned in, and set his lips to hers.

“You are the most petite little piece of delicious.” Art, devil smile carrying the corny compliments and all, leaned in as well and started putting kisses on her neck, her collar, and her bare shoulder.

Two big guys, boys, men, touching and kissing and—

No! She slapped their hands away and frowned. Frowning didn’t work so well, earning only more smiles and chuckles from them, but at least they stopped kissing and touching her. Later, she could indulge later.

“Who else from your p-pack is coming?” she said.

Art shrugged and looked at Matt. “Clara is, and Mason I think has a date with some girl from the Carthians.”

“... he does?” She skipped over to her nightstand and grabbed her phone. Note: Mason Harding has a date with a Carthian Kindred.

“Keeping tabs on us?” Matt said.

“Um ... yeah. Y-You know, cause ... yeah, my job. Part of it-t-t ... anyway.”

They laughed again, and watched her from the bed as she stepped into the bathroom across the hall. The doors lined up, so they could see her as she pulled out her kit and got to work.

“Easy to forget sometimes that you vamps are still vamps,” Matt said. “It’s a really nice place here, Dolareido. I mean damn, hadn’t expected to hear Mason be happy for a while, but that girl sure put some smile on his face.”

Natasha peeked out from the bathroom to look at the boys. “D-Do you know her name?”

Matt nodded. “Yeah, think I heard it was ... Tilly?”

“Oh.” Yeah she knew of Tilly. Mischievous woman, that kind of reminded her of Rebecca. Well, good riddance to Rebecca, but Tilly seemed nice enough. “Hope ... he enjoys himself. She’s v-very pretty.”

“Not as pretty as you.” Again, in unison!

“Ok, that w-w-was practiced! You two can’t speak t-together like that all the time ... d-do you?”

Art shrugged and gave Matt a bit of a shove. Matt returned it, and being a bigger guy, forced his friend to fall off the bed with a loud thunk. Art of course got up and shoved Matt back harder.

“We’ve been buds for decades,” Matt said. “Just happens with time.”

That made sense, and there were plenty of things about her and Jessy that were automatic, knowing each other as long as they did. Natasha nodded and resumed her work. She needed a better foundation setup if she was going to put on her ballroom face. Mascara, lipstick that fit her pale skin with a bit more boldness, and she had to do something with her hair. Normally she’d just do a simple ponytail, or leave it loose, but maybe tonight she’d try something fancier.

Art poked his head in, but before he could speak, she turned to look at him, and tilted her head to the side.

“W-What should I do with my hair?” she said. Asking her boyfriend what to do about her hair was a secret guilty pleasure she'd long wanted to indulge in. Maybe he could do her hair too? That'd be perfect.

“Hair like yours? Think we could get away with some lavish shit. C'mere and I'll try some fancy ponytails out.”

Oh my god he could actually do her hair! She almost squealed.

“H-How do you know how to do ponytails?”

“Wouldn't you like to know.” He winked at her, and guided her back into the bedroom.

Before she knew it, she was holding a mirror in her hands, while Art was doing her hair, and Matt watched, offering occasional comment. It was too perfect.

Boyfriends, plural. Hehe.

~~Jack~~

Well. Damn. Everything right down to the music, she guessed correctly.

“Now presenting, Alder Antoinette of the Ordo Dracul, Prince of Dolareido. And her companion, Master Terry of the Invictus.”

Oh god damn it. Jack turned his head just enough to glare at the man calling out titles, master of ceremonies or whatever, and made sure the man realized he was upset. But Antoinette slipped her hand down to hook it with his arm, and started to walk them down the stairs into the grand room of the Invictus ball.

Massive chandeliers, enormous paintings on the walls of figures that must have been gods, red-lined chairs around the tables, each table covered in a red table cloth with gold embroidery. And on the other side of the grand room, two stairways that curved up and in toward a balcony that overlooked the ball room. But this time, instead of Viktor and Garry have a conversation on said balcony, Jack could see the movement of a dozen hands playing instruments. A small symphony, playing the night's music.

Grand, beautiful, and extravagant. The Invictus did love to throw their money around. But who was he to complain, or compare, when the Prince did the same thing at her balls.

The whole room turned to face him. As was custom, the Prince arrived fashionably late, and since he was her date, that included him. The Invictus preferred punctuality, but hopefully they'd understand in this circumstance.

"You use the title Alder? I remember that from before," he said as they walked down the stairs into the grand room.

"It is not meant as offense to the Invictus, but a statement of force. I am here, and as much as your superiors love to feel they own the city, it is only because I let them. Jacob indulges the title as well, for the same reason."

"Jacob thinks he owns the city?"

"The old snake does think that. He does not, but, I would be a fool to bring strife over his harmless delusions."

Jack strongly doubted the man's delusions were actually harmless, and Antoinette must have known that. He looked her way a little longer, long enough to catch a hint of doubt in her eyes. He understood, completely, that Jacob was the x factor in her life, her city, the unpredictable element she couldn't get rid of, who was just too damn strong to remove. If she'd truly wanted to make it happen, she could probably force out the Uratha, and the Begotten, but Jacob? Man was too smart.

And, maybe, once upon a time, the two of them had been friends. They'd come to the city together, after all, so long ago, worked together to make it a reality, and succeeded. That must have meant something to her, to him.

Jack looked out to the crowd. They'd acknowledged his appearance for a moment, but by now his relationship with the Prince was becoming a normal thing; or at least, normal enough to not gawk at. Instead, older Kindred came up to the Prince, and thus began the Danse Macabre, the subtle manipulations, the dialogues meant to tease out information or plant subliminal misdirections.

First were the Invictus. Jack lowered his head as they approached.

“Master Terry,” the triumvirate said.

Ghost lady was wearing a white dress, like usual, but with a corset and a wedding veil, along with long sleeves, white gloves, and such. Covered her disfigurements, without ruining the aesthetic of the ball. Mister big bad McDonald was wearing his usual suit, except he had no tie and the shirt was undone a few buttons to show some skull tattoos on his chest. And of course Julias was there, wearing a similar suit to McDonald, open shirt, with some jewelry Jack hadn't expected. A couple of subtle rings, and a necklace that had a small design he didn't recognize hanging against his sternum.

“Your excellencies,” he said, and bowed his head.

“Good evening my Primogen,” the Prince said. She used the word ‘my’ with a touch more emphasis than he expected, not dissimilar to how he used to have to say ‘my Prince’ to her, when they first met. Guess she was driving home that she was their ruler, and currently dating the man they were all looking down at. Not looking down at him really, but maybe Antoinette was feeling a little defensive for him.

Should he be offended by his girlfriend defending him? Ha, fuck no.

“Prince,” the three said, eyebrows raised a touch as they caught onto the vibe she was laying down. Yeap, his girlfriend was subtly scary when she wanted to be.

“A delightful gathering!” The Prince raised a hand and made a sweeping gesture to the glorious display around them. “And, dare I say, the Kindred here seem relaxed.”

They did at that. Jack took a moment to look around more, and smiled as he started spotting faces. Sitting down was Amanda Pol and her sire Gloria Jennings. Very attractive ladies, wearing some dresses that hugged the body nicely, thin fabric too. In a seat beside them was another woman, not a vampire, and she was holding her wrist out while Gloria indulged. Openly feeding on kine already? The night was young, and if this was any indication, the party was bound to grow into a buffet.

Next to them were Isabella Leuvion and Hella Vendram, along with some of their troupe. While Vendram wore a rather sporty looking suit, it had an impressive amount of skin on display with how the suit jacket was open, she had no shirt or bra underneath, and the only thing keeping the jacket from spreading apart to expose her breasts was a tiny silver chain. Leuvion on the other hand wore a corset, and a lot of leather. Leather gloves, leather boots up to the thigh, and the corset itself created enough cleavage to drown in. All of them were drinking glasses of blood, and chuckling, laughing even.

Garry Tones and his Carthians were mingling; which was a very good thing. The whole Mirrden business had put people on edge, but it wasn't stopping the covenants from interacting. Garry was wearing suit pants, but instead of the open jacket look, he was wearing a shirt, black, that reeked of that dark and handsome vibe the dangerous man liked to put on. Many of his covenant men did the same, suit shirts with power colors and with the first couple buttons undone. Many of them had glasses in their hand, and a couple of the more daring ones even had a thrall or ghoul by their side — also dressed in the half suit ensemble — with wrists out or necks exposed. The female Carthians did as Julias predicted, wearing cocktail party dresses that were both eye catching, and sexy. A lot of backs and stomachs, a lot of cleavage and legs, and more than one woman wore a dress with loose cleavage that let the breasts nearly expose themselves with movement.

None of them held a candle to Antoinette. More and more of the eyes in the room fell on the Prince, staring at her, the amount of skin she was exposing, and they made occasional glances to the little guy beside her. He felt proud, but not because of the huge breasts his girlfriend had. Much as he loved those too, it was how he and the Prince, two people so vastly different, had been in a relationship for so long. He hadn't dared dream that this amazing woman would be in love with him, and he her, and for this relationship to survive. No one else in the city had expected it to either, from the looks he got.

Not exactly the right time to be monologuing the changes of his life in his head. Bad Ventrue habit.

He looked back to the council and the Prince. They were talking about political affairs, and—

“Do not think I am unaware of your interference,” Antoinette said. “You have courage to perform such measures without my permission.”

“Thought it'd be better to ask for forgiveness than permission, my Prince,” Julias said. “We needed to act.”

The Prince made a small, quiet snort, something between a chuckle and a groan. “We will speak of it later, but be content knowing I am not angry over your actions. Upset you did not ask me first, but I would have agreed nonetheless.” She turned, and smiled down at him. “Jack my love, please feel free to mingle with your companions. Perhaps speak with the Uratha? I must do my rounds.”

The rounds, where the Prince went around and spoke to everyone. No new Kindred since Jack’s embrace, but that didn’t mean the Prince didn’t want to look every single vampire in her city in the eye, to make sure she knew them, and they knew her. And of course, she’d carry the air of a monolithic deity with each conversation, to make sure they all knew who was boss.

How she’d be able to do that, with her breasts nearly hanging out, he couldn’t really fathom. Maybe it was just him, who couldn’t help but be distracted by the large amount of skin her dress was exposing? Her, and a lot of the other women too. Mingling wasn’t going to be easy.

McDonald and Turio bowed and left as the Prince stepped away, but Julias stayed behind, and grinned down at him.

“ ... yes sire?”

The man laughed. “She’s a beautiful woman.”

Jack caught the man’s grin, and matched it with his own. “The dress is killing me.”

“Completely understandable. I’m still waiting for Triss to show up, and I imagine Jen will be with her.” The two of them fell into step, and started to wander in a slow walk by the tables. Nods were offered to Invictus Kindred they passed, and Jack made sure to catch Amanda’s eye before offering her a small wave. She returned it, the glow of a fresh meal on her skin.

Isabella got up from her table, and Hella followed, holding her hand. Jack never picked up on the relationship vibe from the two of them at work, but now that he'd seen them together in their private home, the clues were a lot more obvious.

“Master Terry, Mister Mire,” Isabella said. Jack had to try hard to not stare at where the corset was pushing her already large breasts into balloons. Could have sat her wine glass on one of them without issue.

Jack offered his most official, Invictus-approved nod of respect. “Madam Leauvion. Enjoying the ball with Madam Vendram?”

The ice woman nodded, subtle grin and all. “We are. Though, I think perhaps no one is enjoying the ball quite as much as your friend the Begotten. Fiona Young, I believe?”

“Fiona's here?” He stood up on his toes, but even that still kept him below a valuable viewing height.

“She is. A charming young lady, too be sure. Like champagne.” That icy grin melted a bit, and she looked to her lover.

Hella nodded, and made a gesture to a group of people in one of the corners. “Girl is a Begotten? One of those monster things you were talking about? Girl seems as bright and fun as a college chick with too much beer in her.” It was a large group, with hustle and bustle and some rather loud voices of joy. Sounded like something Fiona might cause.

“I think I'll go say hello, if you don't mind,” he said. And he waited until Julias, Isabella, and Hella each gave him a nod. Always about respect, showing it, keeping it, and using it as a currency in the Invictus. Once they exchanged with him the currency of the realm, he moved across the room toward the other side where the commotion was.

He looked around some more as he made the trip. So much to take in, so many sounds, so many people, far more people than he'd expected. It was almost cramped. Almost. The room was enormous, big enough to handle a thousand people, and there was at least five hundred within as was, half Kindred and half a mix of thralls, ghouls, and apparently, Begotten and Uratha. More than enough to make his antisocial nature come through, and make him want to leave, go home, maybe browse the internet, play some video games, binge watch something on Netflix, anything to be away from so many shoulders, so many eyes. Didn't matter how long and how often he found himself dealing with people, he'd never like doing it. It'd always be a mask to wear, being personable and sociable with groups larger than three. And wearing a mask all the time was exhausting.

Before his brain could spiral down into a pit of annoyance, he caught Antoinette's eye. She'd moved on to talk with Garry, no doubt trying to settle his nerves about the Mirrden expansion. But when their gazes met, she smiled at him, and offered a tiny finger wave, subtle, down by her hip. He didn't need to enjoy crowds, didn't need to enjoy socializing, this 'chew the fat' dialogue that grated on him so much. When the party was over, he'd be going home with Antoinette, and they could have a conversation where the topic lasted longer than thirty seconds.

Energy restored, he made his way through the crowd.

"... Natasha?"

"M-Mas ... Jack. Um ... I s-suppose I d-d-don't need to call you Master Terry." The beautiful little creature smiled up at him, big smile, a smile he was almost shocked to see on her face. Not because it wasn't a great smile, but because she was normally so much more subdued. Having two werewolves in her bed must have really agreed with her; and he almost laughed at the thought. It was a good thought, but thinking about it now wasn't a good idea.

She was beautiful. Natasha Vola was wearing an off-white dress of simple fabric that hugged her body tight, but it went down past her knees, and really accented the little figure she had. Her hair was done up in an interesting ponytail too, with a bun concoction at the top before it cascaded down into a normal ponytail behind her. And, despite Natasha probably not realizing she was doing it, she was nudging her head closer to him, hoping he'd notice the difference.

'Notice anything different?' His mom would say, when she came home from the hairdressers. 'Put on weight?' He'd say, and then get a slap upside the head. The memory tugged at him, and his smile softened as he watched the small woman inch her head toward him.

"Your hair looks really nice."

"Thanks!" she said. She'd be blushing if she had the blush of life going, he could see.

"Ye flirting wi' Tasha right in front of 'er wee jimmies!"

Fiona Fiona. The girl was wearing a royal purple dress, something that hugged the hips, exposed the back, with some loose hanging cleavage to hold her large breasts. Very alluring on the short, curvy creature. What was surprising though was the glass of red she had in her hand; it wasn't blood though. Must have been wine. And it wasn't her first glass.

"Hey Jack."

Oh shit.

Clara came up to stand beside the two girls. She was of an average height, maybe a bit taller, but next to the two tiny girls she seemed quite tall. Dwarfed by the two Uratha behind her, Matthew and Arturo, but still. And the beautiful woman was wearing a dress, black, strapless, something that squeezed her body and emphasized the athletic figure while exposing her strong shoulders. Gold-colored, large earrings contrasted her bare neck, and the tight dress split over one leg above the knee, while the skirt went all the way down to her ankles where she wore rather fancy high heel sandals, black as well.

“ ... um, hey, Clara. You look great.”

She winked at him. She knew she looked great, and from the look in her eye, she liked that he noticed. Antoinette not a hundred feet away, she was playing with fire. Hell, he was playing with fire.

“And ‘ere I thought ye vamps would nae have a gid thing to drink!” Fiona took another sip, and then another, before she nudged Clara with her elbow. “Ye sure ye dinnae bring it yerselves?” Alcohol brought out a depth to her accent that had Jack blinking. Hard to understand, but delightful.

“We’re sure.” Clara nodded with her head toward Maria. “Ghost lady apparently knows her drinks ... not that I think Fiona here could tell good from bad wine on her best day.”

“Well aren’t ye a bit racist? This cause I’m Scottish?” Again, Fiona nudged her, but the smile on her face refused to break. “But, true. Gettin’ me blootered though, so, I’m happy.” And up the glass went to empty its contents into her mouth. “Yuu! Tall laddie. Gie me another woulds ye?”

“Right away ma’am,” Matt said, and turned to find the waiter or waitress. Sommelier, maybe?

“Ah like him,” Fiona said. “He’s handy.”

“Did Avery come?” Jack said. “I might need to pull some damage control if Jacob’s around.”

Clara reached up and cradled her jaw. “Please do. Would prefer we not have a repeat of last time. That said, she’s not coming.”

Smart of her. A sad situation, but smart of her.

Arturo came up behind Natasha, put his hands on her shoulders, and held the tiny girl against his body. It was cute, seeing the combination of embarrassment and joy on her face as she realized everyone could see her boyfriend holding her. Crossing a social line she was very much not used to; Jack could understand. Antoinette would do the same thing, and he'd immediately get hit with embarrassment, at first. But after a few social events, and getting a blowjob from her in Bloodlust, the embarrassment started to fade. It would for her too, he was sure.

“Jessy around?” he said to Natasha. “Surprised she’s not with you.”

“She, um, she’s—oh, over there.”

Sure enough, Jessy was over with the Carthians. Being a bit aggressive maybe, but as far as Jack could tell from a distance, the encounter was a lighthearted one. Jessy had her arm around a man’s shoulders, and was stroking his chest through the shirt of his suit. One of her ghouls probably, and it seemed like the girl was offering the ghoul to some of the Carthians. Upon a second glance, he found one of her other ghouls was actually already sitting down, and had a Kindred behind him, taking a quick sip of his neck.

“That,” Clara said with pointing finger, “is weird. Dolareido is weird. You know how private some Kindred treat the act of feeding? In Tijuana, Kindred never drank unless it was somewhere they felt perfectly safe.”

Jack nodded. It made sense, and he was glad the Kindred situation here was a million times better. “We do feel safe enough here to share. Mostly. Or, maybe, we’re just trying to pretend we do. Lots happened that left a bad aftertaste in our mouths, and now that it’s over and done with, maybe everyone just wants a taste of this openness before it turns sour.” Everyone looked at him with furrowed brow. “Shit. If, if it turns sour!”

“J-Jessy, she um, she’s ... being an amb-b-bassador, sort of, with the Carthians. I guess?”

Seriously? “Is she drunk? ... did she drink someone who was very drunk?”

The Kindred nearby chuckled. Fiona and the werewolves raised a brow in confusion. Probably didn’t know Kindred couldn’t get drunk, or they just didn’t find it funny. Ah well, joke lost.

“P-People seem happy,” Natasha said. “So m-m-maybe she sees an opportunity to smooth over some tempers, because of the Mirrden business.”

Hopefully. He looked back over to Antoinette, who was moving through to other Kindred. No doubt she’d come over to the Uratha and the sole Begotten eventually, but business first.

“Actually, has anyone seen the sheriff?” he said. “Daniel’s been hard to spot as of late, like he’s sneaking around all the time or something.”

Natasha nodded, pat Art’s hands so he’d let her go, and stepped in closer to talk quieter. “D-Daniel is ... keeping an eye on things.” She wanted to tell him, he could see it in her eyes, but she knew not to. But, that alone was important information, her not telling him the information. Meant that, there was a good chance Daniel was up to something of a sensitive nature, and considering the man’s skill set, that meant spying. Course she could have just been misdirecting him, like Julias might have with a client, but he didn’t see Natasha doing that to him.

“Now presenting, Alder Jacob, and his subordinates Beatrice, Jennifer, and Othello, of the Circle of the Crone.”

Well, damn, that was almost everyone in the Circle in Dolareido. Jack knew of the man Aaron, but had never spoken to him. Beatrice said he was an antisocial type like him, introverted, but preferred books to games; Jack could relate, though.

Everyone turned to watch the four walk down the stairs into the room. And many people's jaws dropped, Jack's included.

Jacob was first, and he was wearing something similar to that time Antoinette held a ball. It was a suit, except the sort of suit you might find on a general in an army a thousand years ago, from the north. It even had leather straps across the chest, with a fur neck lining of some animal, and leather straps that dangled from the waist. It could have been made bulkier, like armor, but it was thin stuff obviously made for comfort wear, for gatherings like this. The bandage over his eyes almost disappeared in comparison.

Othello was dressed in something similar, but more tribal, brown leather that matched his dark skin, with brighter shades of string that held the old, imposing clothes together. Jack could imagine the man wearing a giant skull for a helmet with that getup. Not comical though, no, far too real and far too on the nose for Jack to simply dismiss it as posing. Othello was a part of the Circle of the Crone, after all. He had a woman with him, a beautiful creature with near ebony skin, a curvy figure, and a flowing, dark red dress.

Much as the two men looked quite intimidating, and even handsome, it was the two female Kindred that had people staring, everyone staring.

Beatrice came down the stairs first, black veil covering her shark mouth. Seeing her with a lot of mascara on was, just like last time, a bit of a shock. But it was the flowing waves of the black dress on her that were so beautiful, contrasting her hard body. And, as she came closer, when she turned, he could see the dress exposed the naked side of her body completely except for where the loops of the hanging fabric curved upward at the ankles. Like liquid night. The silver necklace, and the silver, delicate chains for gloves, were like twinkling stars against the black.

First thing she did was walk toward Julias. And, considering how much people were watching, no doubt Triss knew that she was creating a very movie-like scene by walking up to the big, important Mister Mire, lifting the black veil up where it dangled over her nose, and kissing him.

Jack smiled, and looked back to his friends. “She really does like to show off.”

“Aye, but ah would too if, well, I was Beatrice.” Fiona scooped up Matt’s offered glass, took another sip, and nodded with her head toward the final person to step down the stairs. “Holy hell.”

Beatrice liked to show off, but Jennifer was showing off incarnate. He’d thought what she wore was revealing at the last ball he’d seen at her, at Antoinette’s Black Hall, but now she was wearing nothing but a high hip black thong, and a cloak thing that dangled around her arms in front of her breasts. And, just see-through enough that his eyes locked onto her nipples.

An elbow in the side jolted him to awareness.

“Jack Terry,” Fiona said, “ye nonce! Yer love is right ower there!”

“H-Hey! I am ... a man, and I do not have control of my eyes. This is a gender handicap.”

“It’s true,” Matt said. “Just like boners. Got no control over them.”

Art nodded, as if they were just stating the obvious, and Jack motioned to them with his hands as defense against Fiona’s glare.

“Bunch ah twats. I cannae believe ye, ye ... whoa.” She raised a brow as she looked Jen’s way again, prompting the rest of them to. They’d missed it at first, considering how easy it was to stare at the ninety-five-percent naked woman, but she had a rope in her hand. The rope, something black, maybe nylon, came out behind her and split into two, and held by the neck two men. The men wore nothing but loincloths, fashioned after Ancient Greece style as far as Jack could tell.

And, as if the woman had broken the dam, more thralls and ghouls started to become more apparent. Like being awoken from a slumber, or maybe, like being told it’s ok to walk among the lions. Many got up, and with master to guide them, started to mingle. Others, started to get a little more comfortable with the Kindred they knew, or maybe didn’t know. And all of them were drinking wine, a lot of wine.

“Makes me regret never getting drunk,” he said.

“Ye ne’er been blootered?”

“Not really. Tipsy a few times? Liquid courage and all that, just doesn’t agree with me mentally.”

Natasha nodded, and again nodded her head toward Fiona. “F-Fiona’s being ... a stereotype, on p-p-purpose I think.”

“I’m Scottish, nae Irish.” The girl gave Natasha a punch in the arm, complete with loss of balance that had her falling until Matt caught her.

Clara, laughing and smiling almost as much as the drunk girl, reached out to grab a glass from a passing sommelier.

“Ok, you vamps may not be able to get drunk, but wolves can. Just takes a lot more than it used to. So my good man, keep em coming.” She waved off the sommelier, and downed the glass like it was going to vanish if she didn't. "I'm going to need to get wasted to convince my brain to accept this."

He couldn't blame her. Clara, Arturo, and Matthew may have dripped of strength, confidence, and everything that made them terrifying titans of power, but they looked uncomfortable. Art was holding Natasha halfly because he was probably feeling a little overwhelmed; Jack could see his eyes darting around and taking in everything, analyzing everyone, measuring them up and checking for threats. Understandable. But the man was also glancing around at all the skin, and leather, and chains, and corsets. The men were wearing fancy clothes, but for a ball like this, the women went all out, as Jennifer's display showed.

Jennifer. The girl was basically naked, and Jack had a hell of a time not peeking. Made all the worse as the beautiful woman started to head his way, sway to her hip and ghouls on a leash.

"Jack Terry," she said, once near. "I have to thank you, for dealing with that creature. Beatrice's life would have been in danger if not for you. And your Uratha friends." Grinning, the witch winked at him, and turned to look at the Uratha. "Jennifer, of the Circle of the Crone, as that pompous man at the door announced."

Wasn't just him having trouble looking the woman in the eye, everyone was struggling. She really was fucking gorgeous. Jack had to glance at Antoinette a few times, just to remind himself she was real, real and beautiful and awesome and would totally rip his head off if he kept staring at the half naked women all night. She'd said it was ok to look, not ogle. Not his fault! Totally not his fault, like Matt said.

"It was a pretty crazy night," he said. "I got lucky."

"Indeed. Oh, this is Hal, and this is Frederick." She motioned to her two ghouls, and the also nearly naked men offered small bows. "Care for a taste?"

“Aye ah think ah would!” Fiona stumbled toward the two men, before Clara grabbed the tumbling girl by the shoulder and pulled her back.

“You wouldn’t respect yourself in the morning.”

Pouting, Fiona tried to wrestle herself free, but failed, half cause she still had a drink in one hand, half cause she was drunk as fuck by now. But her cheerful smile returned a second later, and she leaned on Clara as the alcohol took her on a journey.

“Ye’re strong.”

“Comes with the territory.”

Jack smiled at Fiona. Maybe she did like playing up a stereotype a bit, being surrounded by strangers. She was still fun, and they needed fun. “I’m not sure people will be too willing to share,” he said. “I mean, maybe a little, but—”

“Holy shit, this is pretty sweet.” Jessy hopped on over, a bounce and sway to her step that would have convinced Jack she was also drunk, if she was kine. But, now that she was closer, he could see the color of her skin; girl was blushing life, or had freshly fed on a large meal. And, to fit the theme of the night, her dress was a loose, silk dress hanging from tiny straps down to her thigh, ocean blue, and did nothing to disguise how hard her nipples were.

“I understand that your ghouls are already sharing themselves, Jessy Herrington,” Jen said, and she gestured to the other side of the grand room, where more Kindred were gathering, as well as more of the ghouls and thralls. Indeed, people were tasting. Some of the Kindred comfortable with each other were Kissing the same prey, at the same time. More than one of the kine looked both exhausted, and pleased. Very pleased.

He really pitied the Uratha men. He could smell the arousal coming off of them, hell he could smell it coming off of Clara as well. Being surrounded by so much skin, just like Bloodlust, was bound to make anyone alive aroused. Only difference was the lack of people fucking in the corners, and he was sure that'd change once the party was over and people went their separate ways.

Jessy and Jennifer, two very dangerous women, both very confident in themselves, very over the top, and without the foundation to back it up. Antoinette could back it up, Antoinette could walk the walk, talk the talk, et cetera, but these two? Well, they were stronger than him at least, and that was enough reason for him to be careful.

Or were they? Maybe Jessy was stronger than him, but Jennifer? The beast in his gut was telling him a different story. The posture, the glances from her eyes, the way she positioned herself when looking at him, and the way he did her. The unspoken language of the beast extended beyond body language as well, invisible auras only the animal inside could feel or understand. And it was telling him this Kindred a decade older than him was not his superior.

And as he glanced around, he took note of the other Kindred, the ones of similar age to Jennifer, a bit older, a bit younger. To varying degrees, he could feel it in his gut that many of them that should have been stronger than him, weren't. And those he thought were of similar strength to him, weren't. It was by no means a clear science, understanding the hidden language of the beast, but still.

He could feel the Ventrue ego in him swell. Julias was right, he was strong for one as young as he, the youngest of all the Kindred in Dolareido, and the others knew it too. Would other Ventrue his age have been able to communicate with two crows as easily as he, and have them perching outside to monitor the ball? Maybe. Maybe not.

Careful, Jack. Julias has warned you a million times about Ventrue and hubris. So instead of becoming the next Greek tragedy, don't overstate yourself, and don't invite trouble. Also, get out of your head and socialize, for fuck's sake.

“How did it go with the Carthians, Jessy?”

“Eh, they're kind of pissy, as expected. But it's nothing too bad. Not like anyone's been hurt or anything, too much anyway, it's just a bit of territory. So I brought the boys as a bit of an olive branch, ya know?”

The group looked past her to the Carthians. Well, not just Carthians anymore really. Some of the Invictus were there, and so was Othello. And, it looked like it was getting a bit intense. Jessy's ghouls had their shirts completely open, and various Kindred were taking small nibbles of them. Othello's ghoul — if she was a ghoul, hard to tell without getting closer — was sitting down, and Othello was taking a quick sip of her while a couple other Kindred took their own as well, from the wrists and neck. The wounds always healed of course, as each vampire licked the bite marks to close the puncture marks. Some vampires took licking a little far, and got their hands involved, squeezing and groping gently.

“I um ... you ok with that?” Natasha said, and she reached out to poke Jessy in the side. “I s-suppose so.”

“Course I'm ok with it. They're my ghouls, not my lovers.”

Jack shrugged, and motioned with his hand to some of the Daeva out in the crowd. “Daeva might disagree. And, I think it could be kind of sweet, a vampire falling in love with their ghoul. Bit of a Gothic vibe too, right?”

Jessy and Jennifer looked at him like he was nuts, but Natasha nodded, as did Fiona, nearly falling over in the process. The werewolves on the other hand, were too busy looking around at the feast that had begun. The three of them were obviously having trouble not staring at the half-naked woman in front of them, but the sound of moans and the trickling of blood down people's chests and breasts drew their eyes eventually. So wasteful, spilling blood like that, so decadent, so utterly fitting the extravagance of the party.

“Don't suppose you three fancy sharing some of your blood?” Jennifer said, and she stepped in a little closer toward Matt. “I can only imagine how a werewolf tastes.”

“N-No!” Natasha flailed one of her hands a bit, and reached out for Matthew to pull him closer. Painfully adorable, and Jack couldn't help but chuckle at the sight of the tiny woman pulling the big man behind her. Such a little thing, hogging two massive beasts.

“Relax, Natasha Vola, I'd never force. I'm only asking. And besides, there's Clara here. And I hear a wolf named Mason has been enjoying the touch of a Kindred. Perhaps he'll share?”

Clara didn't look convinced. “Mason's been having it kind of rough since Stephanie died. I'd give him his space. Besides, this girl he's been seeing has been good for him, and I wouldn't want to ruin that. But, David's single, if you don't mind putting up with a little crazy.”

The four Kindred raised a brow. “Crazy?” they said.

“Mmhmm. He's Ithaeur. And ... and none of you know what that means. He's a bit more exposed to the spirit side, so he sees or hears some weird shit sometimes. Bit young though.”

Jennifer raised a brow, and stroked her chin thoughtfully. “I—”

“Now presenting, sheriff to the Prince of Dolareido, Daniel Smith, and companion Athalia.”

Wait, what?

Everyone in the party had the same look on their face, and the whole room turned to see the sheriff walking down the stairs, with a woman on his arm. Daniel was dressed in something close to a tuxedo, if perhaps a bit more plain; typical of the man, as Antoinette was no doubt thinking. What wasn't typical was the beautiful woman on his arm, Athalia. Maybe she wasn't always mean? His one encounter with her had been a pretty poor first impression, and maybe it was accurate, but she didn't look mean as she walked down the stairs, and faced the crowd.

Ok, maybe a little mean.

Dark skin contrasted beautifully against the blue dress, and like most of the other women, it was quite form fitting, with plunging cleavage, sleeves, and a long skirt that split on the hip. Her hair was loose, but it had something done to it, something that made it more wavy than he remembered when he saw her in the tunnels. Her face looked soft, at odds with her somewhat tall, thin frame, and practically on the wrong body compared to her steel gaze. Scary eyes. Scary woman.

He knew she was a Begotten, everyone knew, and everyone could feel it as the ancient vampire escorted the lovely woman down to join them. Like Fiona, but not. From Fiona, everyone could feel a strange aura of power, and of a duality from her of something grand and hidden in the dark. From Athalia though, if there was a duality, he couldn't sense it, as if this woman was far closer, far more in tune with the horror inside her. Far more at home.

"I didn't think she'd come," he said.

"Aye, but ah convinced her. An' Beatrice told me the lass has a history wi' the sheriff, so ah went askin'." Fiona shrugged, took another sip, and walked over to Jack to lean against him.

“Wait, you just asked? Who’d you ask?”

“Th’ Prince o’ course.”

“ ... how did you arrange that?”

“Arrange?” She shrugged again, and poked him in the shoulder. “I’m friends wi’ her lover! Ah walked in th’ front door, and asked to see ‘er. Ah can be very convincin’ ... and that jimmy behind th’ coonter isn’t exactly th’ smartest man.”

Yeah, Chunk wasn’t. Not sure why Antoinette kept him around.

The Prince got a parting nod to the latest Kindred she was speaking with — some of the younger Carthians — and moved over to stand with her friend Daniel Smith. Fake last name if Jack had ever heard one. Athalia stood her ground, and looked the extremely tall woman up and down a few times with a raised brow. Probably wasn’t expecting so much skin.

After a few words, the Prince raised a hand, and motioned for Jack to come closer. He nodded, smiled, but didn’t move at first. Took a moment to get his legs going, and walk over. Athalia was not a woman he liked, and judging from the small sneer she showed him as he approached, she didn’t like him either. Seemed she didn’t like vampires in general, which made her arrival very strange.

“My love, I believe you have already met Athalia.” Antoinette reached out for him, and slipped her arm around his shoulders once he was in close. He was short enough to fit snug against her side, and, as he got in close, he could feel the Prince’s hug tightening. Protective.

“Jack Terry,” the monster said. “It’s good to see you survived.”

“Y-Yeah, thanks.” The most disingenuous ‘happy you’re alive’ he’d ever heard. Not that you hear that line very often, but the annoyance on the girl's face was only thinly veiled. His presence bothered her. Antoinette's presence bothered her. How the fuck did Daniel convince her to come? Why did he? Was that actually what happened? Mental note: ask Natasha later.

Daniel's face was blank, and he adjusted his glasses with a finger against the bridge. "Sorry I wasn't there to help." Daniel, talking to him. This was rare.

"We did go down there without permission," he said. "Maybe not the brightest move on our part."

"You saved my new subordinate from an uncertain fate, my love." Again, Antoinette hugged him to her side, tighter than usual. Something about Athalia was putting her on edge, cause it wasn't jealousy he saw on the Prince's face, it was worry. Subtle, just a single line, a tiny crease on her brow. If her attitude toward Athalia was any indication, no wonder she wasn't excited to have Fiona enter her city. Big of Antoinette to help Fiona with this whole situation then; at least, if Athalia had actually wanted to come.

"I do owe you a favor," Daniel said. "You and your friends, for risking that to save Natasha."

Jack's smile forced its way onto his face. "Well, I mean, we wanted to prove Fiona was innocent too."

A quiet grumble caught his ear, and he looked to Athalia. Woman was looking toward the werewolves and vampires grouping in the back, and Jack could tell she was trying hard to cover a scowl.

What was up with this woman? Exact opposite of Fiona. The redhead was bubbling with happiness and couldn't wait to socialize with other 'monsters' like Kindred or Uratha. Athalia was mean. Not even, mean wasn't a good enough word. Hateful, like she genuinely hated them for no reason. And Daniel wasn't exempt. Poor guy looked utterly unphased by the girl's rudeness, but Jack could see Athalia wasn't too happy about having him on her arm.

"... sorry," she said, once she caught Jack's eyes. Shit, he must have been showing his own annoyance.

"W-What? No, um, it's ok. Just ... you don't really look like you want to be here."

Antoinette brought over her other hand, and gave him a small flick on the nose. "Jack, do not insult the guests."

"He's right." Shrugging, Athalia gestured to the room. "Only reason I'm here is because Daniel says it'll do some good, for Begotten relations. Azamel agreed."

Don't ask her why she hates vampires, don't ask her why she hates vampires. Control your tongue before you lose it.

"I am sure it will." Antoinette mimicked her gesture, catching Jacob and Othello in the wake of her hand. "And, please, understand that the Invictus did what they did only in pursuit of maintaining peace."

"Yes. I'm sure." Another scowl from the monster, but not as cruel as the others at least. "Know that Azamel, angry as all hell, will continue to do what she was doing, as she was doing it. Quietly, without intent to interfere."

"Then I am pleased," Antoinette lied. "It is best for everyone that we get along."

If there was anyone in the room who couldn't do politics, he'd thought it'd be Jessy. But this Athalia woman looked like she was ready to start arguing the moment someone said something she disagreed with. Kindred learned to dance around the truth, lie, manipulate, but, this girl was probably honest to a fault. He could appreciate that. And, she had said sorry, about the scowling.

“Jack,” Athalia said. “May I speak to you in private?”

God damn it.

Chapter 45

~~Jack~~

“Um, sure. Is that ok, my Prince?” he said.

“ ... oui, mon amour. But, return to my side when you are done.”

He gave her his best ‘I love you’ smile, and with a small bow, turned and walked off to join Athalia. As he turned, he took a glance at everyone’s gaze, to see what they thought of this strange development. Bunch of raised eyebrows. People were as confused as him.

It took a little bit for the two of them to find a place that was a little quieter, a little further away from everyone else. With so many people around, a private conversation was basically impossible, but Athalia took them up the balcony stairway, and as they passed the symphony, Athalia guided them along the wall into a corner near a balcony railing. Best they were going to get.

“Jack,” she said, “I understand that you’ve been a bit of an ambassador for the Kindred to the Uratha.”

“Um, not exactly. I’m just a middle man, exchanging information between the two. If I was an ambassador for the Kindred, I’d have a little decision making power. Got none of that.”

She nodded, stroked her chin a few times, and turned to lean against the wall. And, much like Beatrice would, she folded her arms across her chest, and sneered as she looked out over the balcony.

“Your bosses tell you what they did?”

“ ... no.” Uh oh.

“Well, fuck em. They put explosives in the tunnels where Azamel lives. Remote detonators too. If she does anything to upset them, they blow the tunnels.”

Welp, shit.

“I ... I’m sure they’re just trying to deter—”

“Don’t even say the word.” Athalia sighed, and threw up her hands like she was ready to scream, but folded them under her bosom once more. “Now you know how serious the situation is, when I say Azamel wants a way to communicate.”

Of course she did. “And that way is me.”

“Seems to be the ‘in’ thing to do. No fights between the vamps and werewolves yet, so that’s a plus in your court. And you’re in deep with the Prince, so that’s a valuable angle right there.”

Don’t ask her why she hates Kindred, don’t ask her.

“ ... why do you hate the Kindred so much?”

God damn it Jack. If there is one way you’re going to die, it’s pissing off a monster with your big mouth.

“Christ you got balls. But, I am being pretty rude here. Not that I’m going to stop, but it warrants explanation. I lost important people to vamps.”

“Lost?”

“Yeah, lost you little fuckwad. Dead, killed, gone. I was just a little girl, and I lost a lot of important people to Viktor. You know, your grandsire?”

Oh shit. Shit shit shit. “I ... I’m s—”

“Stow it. I was just a kid then, long time ago. I was in my late twenties when I became a Begotten, and that was over twenty years ago,” she said. He took a moment to look her up and down. Begotten definitely aged slowly then, cause the woman looked no older than thirty.

He wanted to ask her what Viktor did to those people, specifically, but it could have been anything, including some seriously nasty shit better not asked about. Daniel would know, but he wasn't sure he wanted to pry. But, dead loved ones because of vampires? Yeah, he could understand hating a people, a race, because of that. He wasn't even that close with his family when he was alive, and the thought of his sister or mother being murdered sent a chill down his spine.

“And the Uratha?”

“Fuck the dogs. I've been to other cities, and the dogs there are fucking pricks. Call everything their territory. I try to be nice, and all I get is suspicion. Suspicion turns to a fight, and before you know it, I've got a pack of wolves on my ass. Killing a werewolf is not easy, let alone three.”

He blinked at her, a few times, and then stepped over to the balcony railing to look down at the socializing people. The buffet was getting a little heated, with more than a few of the kine there now naked save for some underwear, and hands rubbing them as a couple Kindred pinned many of them down onto chairs, or held them tight onto tables. The kine seemed more than happy to let the Kindred indulge, the Kiss being an enjoyable experience when the Kindred made it so, but he was surprised to see how loose everyone was getting with it.

Stop avoiding Athalia. She'd killed three werewolves? Her? The hell kind of monster was inside this woman?

“Well ... Viktor's dead, and the Uratha here are—”

“Viktor’s dead, the Invictus aren’t. And far as I can tell, none of you give a shit about your kine.” She raised her fingers to quote the word ‘kine’. “As you can see from the orgy below, they’re just bloodbags to you. So, fuck your vampires. And the wolves? Just angry dogs waiting to bite anything that gets too close. So fuck them too. And ... and I don’t have to justify my anger to you, that’s not why I invited you to chat.”

He’d expected someone a little more closed off, brooding and quiet, not this loud mouth ready to yell at anything that moved. This woman would have pissed off a tree, given time to shout at it enough.

“Then—”

“I invited you up here to tell you Azamel wants to speak with you. Alone.”

“But—”

“Don’t tell your giant girlfriend with the tits hanging out. Don’t tell your bosses or friends either. If you do, this whole ambassador idea is shot, and you vamps can go to hell.”

Volatile. He sighed, but nodded, and rubbed his buzzed hair as he considered the implications. Talk to Azamel, alone, without telling his boss or Antoinette? They’d be pissed. And now that the Invictus were apparently trying to control Azamel, they’d be super pissed if he talked to her without telling them.

But the other options were to tell them, and piss her off, or not go, and piss her off. Azamel seemed reasonable enough last time he spoke with her, and that meeting hadn’t exactly been planned, dropping by randomly like he did. But he trusted Julias, and Julias told him to stay away from her.

“... when does she want to see me?” Fuck it. Nothing risked, nothing gained, right?

“In a week. Show up around two, and be alone. No friends either.”

“Two AM, next Saturday. Got it.”

Athalia nodded, sighed, and moved toward the balcony stairway.

“Leaving?”

“Course I’m leaving. I don’t want to be here.”

“Kind of thought maybe Daniel had convinced you.”

“He offered, and Azamel saw an opportunity to get a feel for the situation here.” She shrugged, but at least she’d stopped and turned to face him. “Idiot is just trying to make it up to me.”

“It? What happened?”

“Wouldn’t you like to know? Fuck, you are a nosy kid. Want to know, go ask him.” And again, she turned to leave. But he stepped forward, and grabbed her wrist. “... what the fuck?”

Yeah, what the fuck Jack? Stop playing with fire, and let the volatile explosive in heels leave.

“Not everyone is like Viktor.”

“Kid, you have to have a death wish. Let go before I—”

“I’m doing you a favor, Athalia, because everyone in a ten-mile radius can see how deep you are in your hatred, to the point you can’t see out of it. You’re at the point of reflex, where it’s a part of how you think, how your subconscious works, to hate. If you pulled your head out of the black water drowning you for a moment, you might see that many of us are just good people trying to get by.”

She twisted, yanked her arm free, and approached him. Oh good god she was going to break his neck. Could a Kindred recover from that? Sure, but he didn't want to feel what that was like.

“You talk like you know me, you little brat.”

“Don't need to be a psychologist to see someone trapped inside their assumptions, Athalia, someone afraid to look outside their prejudices, in case they might be wrong.” Stop talking stop talking stop talking.

“You think cause your big bad girlfriend is here I won't rip your arm off?”

“I think you wouldn't get so defensive if I wasn't hitting so close to home. I know, I'm just a stranger, some kid you don't know, but I've known people just like you. Viktor's gone, and if you took a second to look around, you'd see how much better things are now that he's dead. No one's sad he's dust, and if you swallowed your hate long enough to look down over the balcony, really look, you'd see everyone, Fiona, the wolves, the humans too, are all enjoying themselves. Could be you.” Yeap, he was a total idiot. He had no reason to say this to this woman, no reason to try and yank her out of her pit of self-inflected despair. Let her rot in her own misery, let her stew in the pain she brings on herself. Why the fuck do you want to open her mind, when you barely know her?

“... you have serious balls, kid. And you love to open your mouth when you shouldn't, don't you?”

“Yeah, I do. Bad habit, and I know it's going to get me killed one day. Just ... some things need to be said, you know? And no one else says them. So I say them.” And he's been saying them more, and more, with more confidence each time. Or cockiness. Hubris, Jack, hubris. “Kindred are sneaky creatures by nature, lot of lying, manipulation, misdirection. I'm ... not a fan of that.”

“ ... neither am I.” The sneer on her face didn’t go away, but at least she walked over to the balcony, and took a long hard look at the people laughing, drinking, socializing. More than a few people had joined Fiona, and were chatting with the increasingly drunk woman; poor girl was going to need a chaperon.

Jack came over and stood beside her. This woman was dangerous, and he could feel the alien power coming from her, something dark and haunting and more than capable of tearing him to bits. It didn’t stop him. Maybe he was just getting used to that feeling, being around deadly predators so often.

He smiled down at the sight of four Kindred standing around one of the tables, with a kine lying upon it. A beautiful woman to be sure, with a black dress that barely covered anything. The four vampires were drinking her from different places, and holding her down as they did. It might have warranted interruption, if the kine’s face wasn’t smiling bliss. One of the Kindred slipped her hand underneath the woman’s skirt, and the kine’s moans joined the increasingly boisterous noise of the party. More hands reached out for her body, sliding into the cleavage and pulling it down to expose her breasts. Fingers all over her, massaging, groping, fingering the trapped woman into a very obvious slew of orgasms as the vampires very, very slowly drank her.

You could taste the difference in the blood, he knew, from his time with Ashley and Julee.

He’d never seen one of these balls get this physical, this sexual, despite knowing full well it was a very real possibility. Not a ball, it was never a ball. This was a party, just like Bloodlust, and the Kindred called it a ball in some weird sense of superiority. When the rubber hit the road though, the vampires jumped on the opportunity to get physical. If there’d been rave music and darker lighting, he was sure half the people in the room would have been fucking or dancing naked.

“Christ you vamps are fucking horny.”

“I, um ... I mean they keep telling me Kindred often lose their sex drive as they get older, and the bliss of the Kiss replaces it. So far, that does not seem to be the case for almost anyone I know.” Maybe Jacob, maybe Maria, but as far as he knew, Dolareido kept nearly every Kindred’s sex drive sky high at all times.

“I can see why you’re making the impact you are, kid.”

“Impact?”

“Yeah. Azamel described to me what this place was like, before I was born, and what it’s like now. A lot due to you,” she said. No mention of Jack’s direct influence over the fate of three elders though, thank god. “You do speak your mind. And you’ve got this cute thing going that makes it hard to want to hurt you for your big mouth.”

“ ... thanks.”

“And, it’s the whole sincerity thing, genuine ... giving a shit. Only vamp I’ve ever met who talks like that.” She shrugged again, and gestured to yet another kine. “Fuck, utterly shameless.” A man, one of Jennifer’s ghouls, standing, with four Kindred around him. A woman undid the man’s loincloth, and let it fall away, before she wrapped her fingers around his length, and started to stroke it. All the while, she was pressing her side to the man’s chest, and sinking her teeth into his shoulder, while the other three found spaces to bite along his neck and other shoulder.

“Shameless, but harmless,” he said. “The kine are enjoying themselves. Hell, even the Uratha and Fiona seem to be enjoying the show.” Fiona in particular had come to stand close to the four Kindred feasting on Jennifer’s ghoul, and Jack could see her blushing as she watched the man struggle to stay standing with four sets of fangs slowly draining him of blood. Girl was also very obviously staring at the hand stroking him off to a quick orgasm. It made sense, being Begotten and not Kindred, that it wouldn't be the biting that'd interest her.

None of the Kindred got naked, or started having sex, or touched themselves. That'd be crossing a weird line. No, this was about Kindred indulging in the utter decadence of having a literal buffet at their beck and call. The worst any of them had to worry about these days was a disagreement over the Mirrden district, or maybe Azamel or Avery causing trouble. And the overwhelming majority of Kindred in the ball weren't even alive, let alone embraced, when those two had caused issues for Dolareido.

Everyone was ignoring the danger Barry's death represented.

So, like carefree teenagers, they embraced the deliciousness laid out before them. And Jack couldn't blame them. And he couldn't understand why anyone would. Hell, with the fucked up world they lived in, Kindred, Begotten, Uratha, they all in the shadows so the near eight billion humans didn't discover them and annihilate them. Yeah, some harmless sex wasn't just acceptable, it was encouraged.

Athalia kept watching, and he took a few peeks at her as she did. Girl could hate them for what Viktor did to her, what the Uratha did to her, all she wanted, but he could tell there was more going on there in her mind, whether she realized it or not. That was what spurred his random outburst to a stranger. He could see there was more.

And on top of that he could see she was getting aroused. Poor girl was no vampire, who could simply refuse to blush life to hide their arousal; unless they'd just ate of course. So he forced himself to look away as she squirmed a little, and her nipples started to harden against her dress. Considering how many Kindred were drinking the kine below, hard nipples poking through dresses were everywhere.

“Sorry I got into your face,” he said. “Normally I’d wait until the fourth time meeting you before violating your personal space like that.”

She laughed. A real, fun laugh, and turned to face him. “Yeah, watch where you step. But I appreciate it. Just, hearing that come from one of you was a bit of a shock. Guess there’s a reason Azamel’s asking for you.”

“I’ll do my best to see her, and not tell anyone. Got a real nice thing going here in Dolareido, and it’d really suck if something broke that.”

“I admit, it’s definitely not the place I remember. I—oh god look at that.” She motioned to one of the darker corners in the ball room. The lighting was never very bright, when Kindred had the option, and the ballroom’s lighting was soft enough for some shadows to exist. In one of those shadows, two male Kindred, Carthians, were getting very hands-on with one of the kine. “Surprised that wolf doesn’t just tear them apart.”

“Wolf?” He squinted his eyes to try and see. Wait, the woman being touched by the two Kindred, he recognized her. She was one of Avery’s pack. “You can really tell just by looking? From this far?”

“Fiona told me she explained it to you.”

“She did, it’s just ... hard to imagine that you can literally see the beast in us. For us it’s something hidden in the shadows of the mind. We can’t see it, only feel it.”

“I can see it, these wisp of black with fangs inside you. Sneaky, fast, a shadow with a bloodlust.” She shrugged, and leaned forward on her elbows a little further, eyes on the woman. “Begotten don’t crave blood, usually. We feed on ... well, it’s different for each Begotten. But, I can imagine a werewolf’s blood must be pretty tasty.” The two Kindred were in front of the distant woman, hands on her, pulling down the straps of her chest and letting her breasts slip free of the black dress. One was leaning in, and was definitely kissing her neck. The other was fingering her, hard enough to make her body shake lightly, for her legs to tremble, and for her to hold onto the two men lest she fall.

“They lost one in that whole Azlu incident,” he said. “You were there.”

“I was. Saw the remains. Pretty horrible.”

“I’m guessing she’s trying to find some comfort, after losing a pack mate.” He nodded toward the werewolf.

“Yeah, some people do that, turn to sex when they’re sad.”

“Is that bad?”

“It can be, but ... in this circumstance?” She shrugged, smirked, and started to head back toward the stairway. “Looks fine to me.”

He smiled after her, and followed. Really shouldn’t have tried to get through to her, stupid of him to think he could break through years of her walls of hatred in twenty seconds. He was a stranger to her, and he didn’t have any of the details about what’d happened to her. Really, really stupid of him.

Still kind of hoped he did get through to her, though.

He stepped back down into the ball. Party. Rave? Well, no rave music, but the setting was becoming more heated by the minute. And as he walked past yet a few more kine giving their blood to various Kindred, he took more than a few peeks. Cause, wow, he really hadn’t expected to be seeing so much genitalia at this party, but there they were. A lot of humans, and one werewolf, enjoying the Kiss and having a set of fingers stroking or fingering or whatnot.

“I see the stress and tension of my city has built to a staggering amount.” Antoinette reached out for him, set her hand on his shoulder, and pulled him in until he was snug against her side, her arm wrapped around his shoulders. “There have been balls such as these before your time, my little Ventrue, where this display also occurred. Always, such lascivious delights followed times of stress, when Kindred battled Kindred, and Dolareido suffered.”

“Understandable, for people to relieve stress this way.” He looked over his shoulder at the werewolf in the corner. Another Kindred, a woman, had come to join them, and she was leaning in to suck on the werewolf’s breasts. The Uratha was definitely drunk, and being taken advantage of, and loving every minute of it, based on the noises.

Vampires, standing around in leather, corsets, fancy suits, revealing dresses, while their sources of food squirmed in pleasure as they gave their blood to the fangs awaiting them, all to the soothing yet jovial sounds of string instruments, violins and cellos and double basses. If a crueller, twisted soul was Prince, he could imagine there’d be far less moans going on around him, and far more screams of despair as kine were Kissed to literal death. Much preferred Antoinette’s version.

“One of the few things the Prince and I agree on.” Jacob. Old eyeless came up to them, grinned one of his trademark twisted grins, and gestured to one of the thralls being drained, a male, who also had a vampire’s hand wrapped around his shaft. “I encourage this! Kindred are animals, beasts, and the beast in us all craves satisfaction.”

“When is the last time you engaged in such animal lust?” Antoinette mimicked his hand gesture, and returned his smirk with her smile.

Jacob's grin faded, and a pause followed that forced a wince from Jack. Dancing on a dangerous topic, and the Nosferatu didn't appreciate it. But after a few seconds of deafening silence from the man, he smiled, and shrugged.

"Been a while, I must admit."

"There are plenty of women here who would enjoy a night with you, old friend, kine or Kindred."

"But would I enjoy it with them?"

"Perhaps," she said.

Yeah, dangerous topic. Jack tried to step back a little, but Antoinette's hug around him was secure. He wasn't going anywhere as these two gods traded veiled barbs and references he didn't understand. It had to do with Minerva, that much he knew, but the nature of that relationship was a mystery, beyond its importance to Jacob. Jack was actually pretty surprised Antoinette took the conversation in this direction, knowing it'd poke the witch in a sore spot. Maybe she was trying to goad a reaction out of him? Sometimes the best way to come to terms with something that was eating at you was to have a spontaneous reaction about it, make some painful revelations.

No way that was going to work with Jacob.

"Don't worry about me, Prince. I'm fine. And, considering the amount of sex that goes on in my home, I am surrounded by moans at all hours of the night as is."

That wasn't exactly a counter point, but Jacob seemed satisfied with his response. And it certainly put images in Jack's head. Othello and his ghoul, Jennifer and her ghouls, and Beatrice? Shark mouth had a great body, and he'd seen her breasts, and—yeah, this party was warping his brain. Couldn't think about anything but sex.

“Jennifer certainly has her eye on Beatrice,” Antoinette said.

“Does she?”

“Oh do not play coy, old friend. Look at her now, how she glances Beatrice’s way every few seconds, and looks the woman up and down. Even with such delights around her, she seems utterly focused on your new project’s derriere.”

New project? Whatever that meant, it was enough to stir a tiny frown from Jacob before it vanished behind his sly smile again.

“The love lives of my subordinates are not my concern.”

“With how close you witches are, I thought perhaps it would be.”

“A little drama only adds to the spice of unlife, non?” he said, complete with a fake French accent. Jacob shrugged, and gestured to the sheriff. “Perhaps you should turn your eye to Daniel. Forever on the sidelines, I fear he’s been neglected a woman’s touch far more than I.”

The sheriff had moved to the side of the room closer to the entrance, and was watching. The tux wouldn’t fit a sword, but Jack doubted the man didn’t have at least two hidden knives on him. His eyes were drifting between the members of the ball, and Natasha. Keeping a close eye on her, and the Uratha around her.

And keeping an eye on Athalia too. The Begotten had stopped closer to the middle of the room, and was looking around at the display of blood and skin that surrounded her. But she caught Jack’s eye, and he shrugged. Could be her, right? Could be her, just letting loose and getting Kissed, or having sex, or both.

No way she was going to abandon decades of hatred in a single night, just because he didn’t know how to keep his mouth shut.

Still, she offered him a small wave of her fingers, before walking out the front door.

“Daniel is as stubborn as you, old fool.” Antoinette rolled her eyes, but the smile remained. “I must speak with Mire and Damor. I will see you at the next Primogen meeting, Jacob.”

---

---

~~Julias~~

“Jacob is going to cause trouble,” Triss said.

“No doubt. He’s your boss though, think you can stop him?”

“Nope. I’m surprised he’s as calm as he is, with Uratha around.”

Yeah, Jacob really hated the werewolves, no doubt about that. “And Athalia looks like she hates everyone.”

Triss laughed, and slipped her arm under his, behind him and around his waist. At least she’d taken off her veil, as no one outside could see into the ball. Not really a ball, just a party pretending to be a ball. And as he looked around at the nearby Invictus, he found less Invictus than before as people switched places, more Carthians coming to join them. Many were drinking blood in excess, and some were drinking from ghouls or thralls, kine that were not their own. Some were drinking of ghouls at the same time, and that was making the kine very aroused; Kindred too. That much blood, flowing, pouring, it got to the point some Kindred were purposefully letting blood slip free of their lips, so it dripped down onto the bare skin of their meals.

Most of the Kindred in Dolareido, or any city truly, were young. Ultimately, neonates were the overwhelming majority of Kindred, and neonates had very little sense of self control. Presented with food, with sin and bliss, they were at the mercy of their desires. And, he could see the itch on Beatrice's face. She was young, so such needs were always bubbling at the surface for her as well.

Sometimes he felt like an old man, indulging in a woman far too young for him. He laughed, and shook it off when Triss raised a curious eyebrow. If that's how he felt, how did Antoinette feel about her relationship with Jack?

Speak of the devil. The Prince escorted Jack over until the two of them were standing with them. Jack made occasional glances at the vampires drinking of kine sitting in chairs; one kine was even lying on a table and having four Kindred bite into her. At some point, the woman's shirt had come undone, breasts exposed, and no one made any effort to cover her as she squirmed under the pleasure of a quadruple Kiss.

"Prince," Julias said.

"Prince," Beatrice said.

"You look lovely, Miss Damor. I am both intrigued and surprised at your choice of attire. It is perfect."

Triss squirmed, and hugged Julias's waist a little tighter. Even when she was being nice, sociable, the towering woman made all neonates feel uncomfortable, and intimidated. She radiated power, strength, and a 'fuck with me and I'll kick you out of my city' aura. And, she was showing enough cleavage to have everyone nearby staring with desire. Triss was no exception, but it was hard to stare at someone without being noticed when they were only a few feet in front of you.

"Thank you, Prince. Jennifer helped me."

"Ah, Jennifer. Lovely woman. Perhaps a little quick to indulge in her feminine wiles." To prove her point, Antoinette nodded her head back toward Jennifer, who was obviously enjoying the eyes of the men and women on her. The girl raised her elbows a little higher than necessary when reaching for a glass of blood, so everyone could see how the flimsy fabric hanging around her chest raised as well, exposing her breasts.

“I’d be remiss if the women weren’t so eager to show off said features,” Julius said. And, winced when Triss elbowed him in the side.

But Antoinette laughed, and nodded. “As would many.” She turned her head, enough so she could look down toward Jack, and set her hand to his chin. With at least a hundred people watching, she guided the shocked boy’s face toward hers, and set her lips upon his. The act earned a momentary quiet from the crowd, as they watched in awe at the very tall woman kissing her short boyfriend. The two couldn’t be more different, and no one had expected the relationship to last.

Julius was glad it was still happening. He couldn’t deny Antoinette had really helped the kid through his fledgling months, probably more than he did. Couldn’t help but feel a bit jealous about that, being the kid’s sire, but at the same time he was happy the woman was able to help him in ways he couldn’t. Though, she did love to put him on the spot, to make him squirm. Kissing him in front of everyone, almost every single Kindred in the entire city? Might as well have been shining a spotlight on him.

“How has your time been with the Circle of the Crone, Miss Damor?” she said, pulling away from the long kiss with a smirk. Poor Jack, still shocked, caught between smiling and glancing around at the staring Kindred.

“My time? You mean, with Jacob? It’s been pretty ... well, scary sometimes.”

“Yes, the old man can be terrifying when he wishes to be.” She glanced over her shoulder toward Jacob, who was talking with

Jennifer, and the three werewolves. Natasha was caught in the middle, but no doubt was listening to every word. Spying overtly. “But it is not he I wish to speak to.”

“It isn’t?”

“Non. Come with me Miss Damor. I desire to talk, away from our other halves.” She pat Jack on the head, kissed it, and started to walk toward the balcony. The music was being played from there, but it was a large balcony, and Julias was sure Antoinette would find someplace the two of them could talk.

Why she wanted to talk to his girlfriend though, he didn’t know.

“Um, yes Prince.” Raising a brow at Julias, she shrugged, and followed after the Daeva.

“It’s the talking balcony,” Jack said, once the women were out of earshot.

“Magically imbued to make people talk.” Julias nodded, pat Jack on the shoulder, and started to guide him around the ball, like before.

But he could tell Jack was distracted, and it wasn’t by all the thighs and breasts surrounding them. A buffet of blood and a treat for the eyes, and Jack’s mind was elsewhere. What did Athalia say to him?

And he had to ask. Before he was in the council, he’d have let the boy have his secrets, but he didn’t have that luxury anymore.

“What did the Begotten tell you?”

“I ... shouldn’t tell you.”

Well, that was a lot better than lying to him at least. Kid avoided eye contact, but he didn't have the squirmy look he used to have when he was avoiding saying what was on his mind. Working on his poker face. Good.

“Shouldn't tell me? Because it's personal, or because it's Invictus business and it'd damage the Invictus to tell me?”

“Bit of both?”

Julias frowned. He didn't like not knowing, and if it was from Athalia and had to do with the Invictus, that likely meant Azamel was involved. Not knowing was dangerous. But, he was trusting Jack with bigger and more important tasks all the time, and the kid was doing good work.

“Alright, I trust you.”

“... thanks.” Kid nodded, scratched his head a few times, and sighed as he looked to the front door. “Pity she left. Woman really hates us.”

“I understand Viktor caused her great strife, but I don't know the details.”

“I ... shouldn't talk about it, I guess. It was really personal, and she didn't give me all the details either. And it seems like she's had a hard life in general.”

“Fair enough.”

“I'm kind of surprised about this party, er, ball. I mean, Barry's dead, and there's a genuine possibility he was murdered, with four humans as potential threats out there. But we're all here, drinking, having fun, socializing.” To make his point, the kid gestured to Amanda and Gloria. The two women had a male thrall between them, a new one, and both were suckling on his wrists. Gloria, older, more bold, was doing more than that, with her hand on the man's crotch and rubbing him through his pants.

"How's your history?" Julias said.

"Academically? Awful."

"In times of war, life affirming acts often increase in frequency, not decrease." He sighed with the reality; Kindred were dead after all, but the philosophy still applied. "Keep looking for clues about Barry though."

"I am. More evidence pointing toward those four humans."

"Good. And, we're not ignoring Master Barry Tellern's death. Every Kindred in the city is finding more secure places to sleep from now on, as are you I assume." And if he guessed right, Jack would be sleeping at Antoinette's tower from now on. Kid hadn't asked him for help yet, and it wasn't like he wouldn't if he needed it.

"Antoinette offered, and I think I'll take it."

"Be careful. Cross a line and the Invictus may have to intervene," he said. Jack looked up at him, but he offered a small, dismissing shrug. "I doubt there will be an issue, but the closer you get to Antoinette, the more difficult it becomes for you to grow in the Invictus covenant."

"Because she's a dragon."

"Yes. The Ordo Dracul are not our enemy, but they are not our friends, Jack. And while I'm happy you and the Prince are happily in love, there's a fine line you're approaching."

"A fine line. Any hint as to where that line is?"

“If you move in with her, as a permanent arrangement that your living den is her tower, that will greatly compromise your position in the Invictus.”

Jack sighed, but nodded. He knew it, and the Prince did as well. The realities of the covenants, like bickering children that didn't like sharing their stuff.

---

---

~~Beatrice~~

Oh god, this again. Last time she'd had a one-on-one with the Prince, Antoinette had told her she loved Julias. And she'd been right. Kind of took the fun out of the juvenile charm of not knowing, the mystery of romance, but it was a good thing Antoinette had told her anyway. Kindred could be stubborn.

But, just being near the ancient vampire was making Triss's muscles tense. So much like Jacob, and so different. No getting around the two were masters of deception, manipulation, and every tool Kindred had at their disposal to control others. And ultimately, she was one of those tools, someone they could break and mold, or twist and misdirect, someone they could have dancing in the palms of their hands without her ever knowing. She fully expected this conversation to be such a manipulation.

Or maybe Antoinette just wanted to be nice, and help her out like she did last time? Could happen.

The two of them stepped onto the balcony where Jack and that asshole monster chick had been a moment before. No idea what that was about, and she was tempted to ask the kid. Maybe next time when she visited him.

“Miss Damor,” she said, once they found a cozy little place on the balcony to speak, “I wanted to speak of Jacob.”

“Jacob? What about him?”

“Now that the Uratha have returned, I know Jacob has been pursuing his own agenda. Of course, the old bastard has never stopped, but Avery’s arrival has sparked his interest in some of his older, more sinister goals. And I am concerned for him.”

“ ... honestly, I picture the two of you as rivals more than friends.”

The Prince frowned at her, and Triss froze. Jack could probably get away with being so direct with her, but she couldn’t.

“I have known Jacob and have worked with him for longer than the whole of your life and unlife, Miss Damor. Such a friendship transcends petty labels and pettier generalizations. It would sadden me to see him hurt, and I fear his hatred for Avery will ultimately lead only to pain. For him, and for others.”

Beatrice rubbed her arm, and remembered the Black Blood of Dolareido thing. Jacob’s hidden agendas were beyond her imagining, if the man was conspiring with alien entities like that.

“I don’t know—”

“Of course you do not know. Sweet child, I am not here to ask for information. You have little to share with me ... except, perhaps, that is not entirely true anymore, is it? I know that Jacob has taken interest in you, and has invited you into his shadows, into the dark corners of the Earth where he weaves his webs. Where bodies pile high and he chases that which should not be chased. Should not be named.”

God fucking damn it, how did she know that?

“I still won’t tell you anything.”

“Of course not dear. And if I truly wanted it, I would take it from you, not ask.”

“You—” She stepped back a little when Antoinette turned to face her, and met her eyes. Red eyes. Fuck, it was like looking into the eyes of a real fucking dragon, Ordo Dracul or not. “ ... then what do you want from me?”

“To ask a favor.”

Sighing, Beatrice stepped back in again, and stood beside the towering woman. And, standing beside her, she couldn't help but take a few peeks at her body, and how the open cleavage exposed her nipples a little. Hell, from the side like this, Triss could see them pretty obviously. Each tit was as big as her head. Bigger! Fucking hell, Jack was sleeping on those puppies nearly every day too, and— holy fuck stop thinking about sex for one minute. Can't, can't stop, not with a dozen kine below her groaning and moaning as vampires drank and fingered and jerked them off.

“What favor?”

“I expect Jacob will move against Avery, in some way not obvious. Your leader is a crafty individual, and for all my powers, my sources, my abilities, I know I will not be able to stop him. I could deal with him now, but I have faith the man will change, if someone was to give him an open ear.”

“You ... want me to be his friend.”

“After a fashion. Would you? I know the man can be twisted, and he holds a tiny porcelain doll of a soul, hidden deep in the shadow of black talons, inside his tainted shell. But, I knew him from long ago, and there is a wise, sincere man with a shred of humanity remaining, buried within that broken husk.”

Holy shit. The Prince of Dolareido was laying some pretty heavy personal views on her, and asking her to try and break through to this old friend of hers. Break through to that twisted freak who stuck her in the gut with knives, who summoned fucking demon things from the beyond?

“ ... I can try.”

“Merci. I would hate for my old friend to become my enemy.” She leaned forward enough to put her elbows on the railing. Yeap, tits just hanging there in her dress, nipples almost out. God fucking damn those were some massive pillows. “Your friend Jennifer has quite the infatuation with you.”

“I ... wait, what?”

She nodded in Jennifer’s direction. “The girl embraces sexuality with a familiar zest. But tonight, much of her display has been aimed at grabbing your attention, and yours alone.”

Beatrice raised a brow, and looked in the Ventrue’s direction. The girl was with a stranger, some thrall or ghoul Triss didn’t recognize. Looked like they belonged to the Invictus, considering the kine was surrounded by suits. And the suits were either watching, or leaning in to Kiss the poor, mewling woman, while Jennifer fingered the shit out of her. Triss could almost see the juices from the balcony.

Jennifer wasn’t drinking the stranger though, she was watching, and her eyes were glancing around, occasionally flitting up to find Triss. Eventually their eyes locked for a while, and as they did, Jennifer fingered the girl hard enough to have her body shaking. Whoever she was, the only thing that kept her from falling backward onto a table were the other two Kindred with their fangs in her neck. Why Jen wasn’t partaking, Beatrice couldn’t figure, but the vampire seemed to not only be having fun making the helpless woman cum her brains out, now she was happy to keep looking at Triss from a distance while she did it.

Jen raised her free hand, and slid into the open cleavage of the woman's dress to lift and pull one breast, and then the other free of the clothes so they spilled over the dress's chest. The Ventrue kept her hand upon her victim's breasts, squeezing one of her nipples maybe a little rougher than she should have. The poor human didn't seem to mind. And with Jen's arm raised like that, one of her breast was exposed as well for all to watch, jiggling with the inertia of her arm moving up and down while she fingered the kine into what must have been a fourth orgasm.

Jen grinned at Triss, and looked back to her target, to continue forcing the now exhausted creature to cum yet again.

“ ... yeah, I guess she has been trying to grab my attention.”

Antoinette laughed, and turned to look across the way to other people, other Kindred who were enjoying a more laid back experience, drinking from glasses and sitting at tables.

“An enjoyable little minx, isn't she?” she said. “Such brazen confidence. And yet, she serves Jacob loyally.”

“Yeah, I guess. Damn girl has been trying to get into my bed for a while now.”

“Oh? She wishes to share you with Mire? A pleasant image, I must admit.”

Antoinette didn't find her shark mouth unappealing? Heh, points for her.

“I mean, yeah, it is, but ... not sure I want it.”

“And why is that?”

“ ... you want to talk about my sex life?” Weird thing for the Prince to be asking about.

“Look around you, Nosferatu. This is the utopia for Kindred I fought for, for so long the memories are but a haze. Here we group, share stories, and indulge each other our desires with our kine to satisfy them. I expect most Kindred, and Uratha and Begotten, to go home once the ball is done, to enjoy climaxes of their own. No judgment, no fear, simply Kindred being Kindred, letting the blood flow into their mouths.”

“Your vision for Dolareido was ... to turn it into the sluttiest city in the world?” Well, she’d succeeded, far as Triss could tell.

“No. My goal was to create a city where Kindred could exist without a constant, night-to-night struggle to survive, outwit each other, outwit hunters, or outwit our prey. And, to create a city where we may give in to our beastly urges in safety. Where the prey need not die, and where we need not as well.” She sighed, an almost longing sigh, as her gaze came back to the woman Jennifer was fingering into a coma. “I have not achieved that goal, not quite yet, but I will continue to try ... and, I suppose, this was a rather long-winded explanation as to my interest in your sex life. Yes, it interests me.”

Antoinette really had a thing for this sort of sexual atmosphere in the party then, almost like she had personal attachment to it. Like, she was seeing her dreams manifest before her eyes. Interesting dream to have, but, it was a pretty damn nice dream.

“I’m hesitant to let her in the bed, because I’m afraid it’ll damage the closeness I have with Julias.”

“Ah, that is a fear worth considering. Were you older, I would say it was unfounded, but you are young still, and Jennifer younger yet again.” A nod and smile later, she gestured with her head toward Julias and Jack beneath them. “Consider this. While you may worry for how it will affect your relationship, Julias is only concerned for you. The man is wholly in love with you, Nosferatu. For him, it would be to see your pleasure, that would bring him the greatest pleasure. And, as long as you did not betray that love, the man would be overjoyed to sit by the bed, and watch Jennifer and you enjoy each other's bodies."

"I, um ... I mean I'd really prefer if he was in the bed with me."

"As would I, were I you. I always have my love in bed with me, to join me in feasting upon the sexual delights my precious ghouls bring to the act." And of course, the scary woman didn't even blink.

"... you really love the little twerp don't you?" Ah shit she called him twerp. Sure, calling him that around Julias, or the kid himself, was fine. But in front of Antoinette?

And she offered Beatrice a tiny frown as well. Shit shit. But, it passed, and the woman nodded before she reached up to pull her mane of hair over a shoulder. Combing it with one hand, she continued to scan the room beneath her, probably taking a hundred mental notes about each Kindred, and the Uratha and Begotten too.

"I do, with all my heart. For reasons that I am sure are obvious to any who know him."

Yeah, she could understand that. Kid was a weird combination of honest to a fault, and good-natured, while also being analytical. Probably a welcome change for the Prince, being with someone who just didn't know how to stop being genuine like that. Even if it did land him in hot water.

"You ... you said your ghouls join in?" Well, if the scary elder vampire was willing to talk about it, and was impartial — unlike Jennifer — then she might as well ask her for advice. Girl was as old as Jacob, so she must have had some wisdom. Maybe twisted and biased wisdom, also like Jacob's, but wisdom nonetheless.

"That they do."

“You ... feel comfortable? Sharing Jack? Don't think it kind of ruins the closeness you have?”

Antoinette stood a little straighter, and looked down at her from her great height. “My pets understand that Jack is my love, and that, while they are great friends of mine, the closeness between my little Ventrue and I is not to be challenged. They do not kiss him, or at least, not his lips.” The succubus grinned a small, sly grin with that. “They would never touch him without my presence, and I no longer touch them without his presence as well. But, when the four of us are together, it is an enjoyable experience, as my ghouls are my pets, and I wish for them to experience the physical pleasures he and I share. And, perhaps, give them a peek into the love he and I have.”

What a beautiful way of describing a foursome. Triss returned to looking back out over the crowd, and took a little longer this time watching Jennifer. The kine she'd been fingering was now utterly spent, comatose on a table. At least the Kindred were kind enough to pick her up and set her down in a chair off to the side, out of the way. Still mostly naked though, but it was the thought that counted. Heh.

“The details of your relationship with Jennifer are unknown to me, though it is not upon her I lay my confidence. Julias will hold you in his arms, Beatrice, and love you completely, whether it is you two alone, or with Jennifer undoubtedly trying to ... well.” Again, she gestured out into the crowd. Jennifer had found a new target, another woman. Not so aggressive this time, Jen was giving the woman what appeared to be a rather gentle clit massage underneath her skirt, while the kine got comfortable between a couple more vampires. And, of course, she peeked up at Triss and smiled while she did it.

“Dog with a bone.”

Antoinette chuckled, and turned her head enough to catch Beatrice in the corner of her eye. “Please, keep an eye on Jacob for me? He has taken an interest in you. And, he too is a dog with a bone, in this case with his desire for revenge.”

“I ... don’t think he ... yeah, I’ll keep an eye on him.” The fuck was she going to do, or say to the man? She’d been a witch, a member of the Circle of the Crone, for what, half a year now, and Jacob had only just now started to show her some of his secrets. None of them were personal.

The Black Blood thing, that stuff of nightmares, was happy one of the werewolves had died. It and Jacob were discussing it. Connection? Did the weird death entity thing — god, that was never going to be something she could easily accept — and Jacob somehow plan for the second Azlu to screw over the Uratha? How the fuck could they have done that?

Christ, she didn’t know how any of it worked. Werewolves, transforming into titans, monsters coming out of literal nightmares, spider mutation things taking over human bodies, and now Jacob’s friend? Some literal incarnation of ... of ... fuck it, too much to think about right now. She could think about it later, the next time she let Jacob ‘teach’ her crúac rituals. What would he do next time, drag barbed wire over her naked skin?

“Let us return to our men,” Antoinette said.

Right, yeah, the men. Right. Stop thinking about Jacob’s shit, and enjoy the party. Easier said than fucking done.

---

---

~~Antoinette~

It was not her ball, and yet, the ball was progressing just as she had hoped. Just as she had planned. Months of subtle hints, directing the Invictus toward this sort of gathering, baiting them with bits of candy. Good for relations, she would say. And it was good for relations, to remind the Carthians and Invictus, and others, that paranormals need not be enemies.

Cooperation was the way of the future; if, perhaps, a little guided, controlled, by someone such as herself.

She slipped by Jack, and kissed him on the delightful, buzzed head of his. "I will go mingle with the others. Come, join me."

"Yeah! Ok."

And just like that, she had stolen Jack away from his sire, and back into the hook of her arm as she took him around the room. Showing him off, though she knew the boy did not strike a good first impression. That was then, long ago, when people were surprised that the great Julias had sired a tiny childe, her included. But now, her little Ventrue was known to others for his dangerous stunt in the tunnels with the Azlu creature. And for that, he was admired.

They need not know of his trials against Viktor, Tony, and Lucas. Her alone was enough. And Jacob, as she was sure the old devil would be able to piece together some of his exploits.

For his growing prowess, abilities, and reputation, she could not help but feel pride and joy. To show him off on her arm? Such a vain, amusing indulgence, and she smiled at nearby Kindred as she took him toward a group of the hungry vampires. Many stopped what they were doing, greeted her with the utmost respect, and offered some respect to the little Ventrue as well. And more than a few eyes lingered on her love with hungering gazes. Power was attractive, but also, there was no denying her love was adorable, cute, and as delicious as blood fresh from helpless, exhausted, thoroughly spent prey.

The Daeva who had brought ghouls of their own did not taste of the others. Such was the way of Daeva, to become obsessed with those they fed from regularly, to make such targets a part of their lives. The thought of feasting upon kine other than Ashley or Julee made her frown, and she wiped it away quickly as she watched the other Kindred indulge in the orgy of teeth and moans.

There was no ruling that the Kindred would not join the kine in the mess of sexual delights, but the ball did imply that the Kindred were to remain above such base physical desires. Antoinette did not consider sexual urges to be base or somehow beneath Kindred, and she strongly encouraged Kindred in Dolareido to embrace how their unlife allowed them endless sexual satiation. Perhaps, one day, when any and all traces of tension between the covenants were gone, and perhaps when the Invictus were less obsessed with suits, they would encourage such joys as well. It would please her greatly, to see the Kindred bathe in sexuality during such balls, to penetrate and be penetrated, to enjoy climaxes along with their meals.

She laughed, a quiet and wispy thing, as she let her imagination roam. In the future, perhaps there would be a day when she would sit upon a circular bed, in the center of the grand ballroom, with her two ghouls and her love Jack. And the four of them would perform a grand display of sexuality while hundreds of kine and Kindred watched. The crowd would give into their lust, and would begin to masturbate, or touch each other, as they watched the Prince pamper her lover's shaft between her breasts. Once his seed coated her heavy bosom, she would mount him and sit upon his cock while Ashley and Julee devoured her breasts, massaging and licking, until they were clean and ready to be suckled upon by her love. And through it all, the sounds of moans and mewls would be their music.

A silly fantasy to be sure; but perhaps, not so distant from a possible future. Carthians were enjoying Jessy's ghouls, after all. Strange of the brutish woman to extend such an olive branch, but she had, and it worked. Not only worked, but a rather large amount of the female Kindred, and one male, had included heavy petting while indulging Kisses upon the gifts.

She stopped before one such display. Three Carthian women were sitting about a table, and a male ghoul lay upon it, naked. He was an impressive display of meat to be sure, and the women looked upon their meal with hungry eyes. One woman sat by his neck, where his head dangled over the table's edge, another beside his chest where she indulged in both kissing, and Kissing his broad muscles, while the final woman sat between his legs. And she was not Kissing him. Rather, she had both her hands on his shaft, and was stroking the man's length, while holding his shaft only an inch from her lips.

And, when she put a slow, succulent kiss on the human's glans, the poor kine groaned his pleasure. Two sets of fangs already in him, very, very slowly draining him, meant there was plenty of time for the woman between his legs to have fun with her prey, before inevitable exhaustion and bloodloss would take away his ability to remain erect. Not all the time in the world, but more than enough.

"Prince!" The woman performing fellatio tried to stand up, but Antoinette waved a dismissing hand.

"Please, Caroline, continue, enjoy yourself. I am not here to stop you; in fact, I find this sight quite appealing." She grinned down at the three women, and the meal they were sharing.

Caroline, Darla, and Linnea. Carthians, and dressed for a cocktail party. But the ball was no ordinary ball, and the three fit in quite well. While Darla and Linnea were lean, fit looking creatures, Caroline was a more curvaceous woman similar to Antoinette, without her great height. And, like Antoinette, the dark-skinned beauty wore a dress that highlighted her large breasts.

She could not blame Jack for staring. A man's cock was in Caroline's hands, and with how the woman was sitting, leaning forward slightly so she could kiss the man's shaft, it made her heavy breasts hang forward from her dress and threaten to spill out of the loose cleavage.

How often had the two of them enjoyed such a position, Antoinette and her little Ventrue? Dozens of times.

“Are you sure, Prince?”

“Yes, please. This feast of flesh has been a joy, and I am both delighted and encourage such pleasures. To see the Kindred of my city feeling comfortable, safe, to this degree? To partake of such pleasures in the presence of others, and other covenants? By all means, continue.”

And she did. The girl was ravenous, Antoinette could see it in her eyes and her body language; she wanted blood, and more. The fact the woman was going to pleasure the kine as her two friends drank from him, was oddly sweet.

Poor Jack. She kept the boy close to her, and could not help but find a strange glee in bringing him close to such public, salacious acts. Despite the unending bombardment of sexual delights she buried him with, it was still easy to bring a surprised, gawking stare from him whenever she wished it.

The women noticed he was staring, and they grinned with their eyes at Antoinette. The power of the little Ventrue's gaze was a very real force, and she returned their grin with her smile, knowing full well how intoxicating the boy's eyes were. Intoxicating to the point that, a woman might find herself wanting to show off.

Caroline combed back her short, black hair, turned her head just enough so she could see Jack's blatant staring, and smiled around the kine's shaft as she took his length into her mouth. Soon the man was buried to the hilt within her lips, a small distension on the woman's throat showing where his shaft filled her esophagus. And she kept him there, nudging her head back and forth in slow, sensual motions. The poor kine was left a mess of quiet groaning and trembling as Caroline depthroated him.

Antoinette watched for perhaps a minute more than she should have, but could not help herself. Jack beside her looked so uncomfortable, and the genuine surprise on his face was like sweet blood to her palette. And she had to have more.

She offered Caroline a nod of approval, and with a slow, lingering turn, guided Jack toward another corner of the grand ball.

“Are you trying to break me?” her little Ventrue whispered.

“Of course.”

“Whyyyy?”

“Because, the expressions you make are too adorable to not, my love.”

They both laughed; her lover, a little more nervously however. But that only made her enjoy it all the more, and she kissed his head once again as they explored the sensual displays around them. At least, until Antoinette found one particular person she was not hoping to find.

Damien Burksen.

She offered him steel eyes, and waited for the man to make his move. He met her glare for only a moment before his eyes lowered, and turned to look at the flood; and yet, not with the awkwardness of a shy individual. No, with Damien, it was because he knew she did not like him, that the man took his gaze to his shoes.

How soft had she become? Once, she marched upon Lucas, his churches, and slaughtered Kindred by the dozens with her own hands, with Daniel at her side and Garry as her back up. She was feared, and she was respected. Now? The respect was there, but it had changed as the fear vanished. People were happy with Dolareido, and happy with her. That was good, was it not? That was what she had always wanted, a peace where she ruled with a gentle touch, not an iron grip.

A gentle touch was dangerous. It invited idiocy from those with courage spilling into foolhardiness, and imbecility. It was why Damien had revived Lucas from his torpor when he did.

But the boy had changed, and that, she could not deny. Changed, and was perhaps never the cruel assassin she had thought him to be. He was only a boy, a young man barely older than Jack when he was turned, and fifty-years deep in ignorance at the hand of Lucas's dogma. Both Natasha and Jack vouched for him, and she was not so petty as to hold a baseless grudge.

Still, the memory of his sword severing her limbs was not a pleasant one.

“Mister Burksen,” she said. “You hide well.”

“Not a fan of crowds ... my Prince.”

No, she imagined not. Much like Natasha, or Daniel. A common trait among Mekhet, one they continued to perpetuate with their selection of childe. Lucas was an exception, and yet, his protege was not. Strange, and perhaps prophetic that it was the exception that had to be killed.

“Damien,” Jack said, complete with a tiny nod, a knowing nod.

“Jack,” Damien said, returning the gesture.

She should have waited for Maria, before interviewing the boy; the Nosferatu had decided to represent the young man after all. But a few harmless questions would not upset her. Much.

“I understand that Maria has asked you to begin sermons? In the Dolareido Grand Cathedral no less.”

“... yes, my Prince.” He looked surprised. Good. Maria had not told her, and Damien had certainly not told her. She had learned of their sermons through her own means, and it was a sweet indulgence to remind the man indirectly that she knew what he was up to, without him knowing how she knew. Fifty years he had hid from her eyes, and she would allow that no longer. “Is ... that a problem?”

“Your means of acquiring followers has been passive enough to satisfy me. Keep it as such, and I see no issue.” Not that it guaranteed there would be no issue, but as long as the man acquired his followers through nothing more than a few words of encouragement from Maria, she felt it would be fine. The boy had proven he was not Lucas, and she had to respect that. “Are you enjoying the Invictus ball? I felt, perhaps, its inevitable sexual nature would offend you.”

“The First Estate’s ... openness, to adding this ... icing upon their meal, is definitely shocking.”

“Is it not? I must admit, while it pleases me the Kindred of my city are familiar enough to engage in such sexuality, I did not expect the ball to escalate to this degree.” She started walking. And, when Damien did not accompany, she gave him a look. The look.

He winced, and fell into step beside her. “The Second Estate ... or at least, Lucas’s version of it, would not approve of this.”

“And you?” she said, as she came closer to a delicious scene. A male Kindred had pinned a female kine to the wall, and was drinking of her neck while fondling one of her breasts. The woman’s dress had been pulled down to let them spill out, and she was doing nothing to cover herself as the man groped her. Perhaps, squeezed a little harder than he should have, but the woman responded with only moans, and set her hands on the man's chest and arm as he drank her.

It was a bit cruel, to force Damien to be near such sights, when she knew the man was conditioned to find it unappealing, or repulsive, for Kindred to enjoy sexual pleasures with kine. But she had earned the right to be cruel, after losing her two previous ghouls to Lucas's tyranny and sword.

Damien watched the male Kindred fondling his prey, and then turned to look toward a table, where two Kindred were drinking from the wrist of another kine. Far less sexual, except that the kine being Kissed was looking rather blissful. Still, far tamer.

"It's hard breaking half a century of ... brainwashing. But, I try."

Brainwashing. That, was an accurate word, and she raised a brow as she looked down at the dangerous man beside her. Jack did as well. A powerful word indeed, and she nodded as she accepted it, its weight, its finality.

"I am glad that you understand that, and that you try. I am." She continued walking, away from the sexual displays, with no more urge to torture the brooding Mekhet. Softness, thy name is Antoinette.

She glanced around. Jacob was speaking with Fiona, as the Begotten was no longer with Natasha. Which put the young woman in a strange position, feeling awkward, looking intimidated, and trying to avoid staring at where the man should have eyes. Why was the old monster talking with her? The old man had undoubtedly spoke with Azamel, in pursuit of his agendas, but Fiona was of little value to the fossil. And perhaps Jacob was simply trying to misdirect Antoinette, convince her Fiona was of importance to the old man, when in fact she was not. A wild goose chase, perhaps, to have Fiona monitored.

Or not. Such games took careful maneuvering, and she would play them.

Her wandering eventually took her toward her subordinate, and she smiled down at the beautiful little woman. The dress was lovely. Plain, but it hugged Natasha's body tight enough that every curve of her petite figure was visible, including a subtle hint of her nipples, and to the observant eye, that she was not wearing underwear. Perfect, and fitting the tiny, secretive creature.

And then there were the two beasts, the wolves, Arturo Ibarra and Matthew Wilson. Dressed nicely, but not too nicely, much like the Carthians; it fit them. And the two men hung around Natasha, often with a habit of setting a hand on her shoulder. They towered over her, and while Antoinette was eye level with Arturo, perhaps an inch taller, Matthew was a giant, and one of the few people she had ever had to look up to to meet his gaze.

Tiny Natasha, between these two titans of muscle? The image was a delicious one, and Antoinette raised a finger to graze her lip as she looked down at her subordinate. The girl knew what she was thinking, and she managed a tiny, sheepish grin before she squirmed and fiddled with her fingers.

"P-Prince," she said. "Are you enjoying the ... b-ball? And you, D-Damien? You haven't been ... mingling."

"Yeah, not really here to mingle. Just here cause Turio assured me it would be important for ... relations."

"Relations," Antoinette said, "are created by mingling. Though you need not be a butterfly, such as ... Jessy Herrington, for example."

The group of them followed her guiding glance, and took a peek at the aggressive Gangrel. Indeed, the woman was socializing, though she had moved on from the Carthians, to instead speak with her fellow Invictus, some of the younger ones engaged with prey. Two female and one male Kindred, and a male kine who sat between them. Through the crowd and music, Antoinette could make out the woman's loud voice, giving instruction on how to both Kiss a male kine, and have sex with him, without compromising his ability to maintain an erection. The Kiss was, essentially, blood loss for the kine after all.

“Um, I think maybe ... something a little more subdued might make for an easier first contact,” Damien said.

She laughed. Quite true. Damien, despite his age and strength, had hid from their kind for all those years.

Fiona, returned from Jacob's grasp, poked her head out from behind Matthew, glass in hand, and teetered left and right as she looked at the man. “Damien! Ah lied.”

“Fiona, hello ... what?”

“Ah lied! About the sex. Just wanted tae seem older, right? And ... and...” She stood up straighter, and looked around at the people staring at her. “Hullo.”

This girl, was ridiculous. She had marched into Antoinette's tower, and had asked for Daniel to speak with Athalia. The girl had been — and continued to be — so naive and bubbly that Antoinette could not help but entertain the silly child's request.

And then there was Clara. A beautiful woman to be sure, and her box braids were exquisite. The tan skin, dark brown eyes, and the strength to her bare shoulders were all delightful, beautiful, and compelling. It was easy to see the woman was doing her best to not look at Jack, and Jack was doing the same with her.

But, Clara had no trouble looking Antoinette in the eye. Defiant, in a subtle and silent way, a way Antoinette could not call her out on despite its blatant nature, as if someone had taught her in the ways of the Danse Macabre.

She liked Jack, this beautiful wolf. And despite herself, Antoinette hugged the obviously uncomfortable boy closer to her side. He was hers, and she was not giving him up.

“I am surprised your pack leader has not come, Clara Moreno,” she said. Yes, I know your name, wolf. “I understand with Jacob here, it would have been difficult. But, her presence may have generated some good will.”

“Maybe, Prince.” Clara nodded, before offering a small shrug. “I’m second in command. I’ll relay anything I learn.”

The smell of alcohol was on her breath, and Antoinette could see the woman’s stance was a touch unbalanced. As far as Antoinette knew, an Uratha had to drink quite a bit to experience the effects of alcohol, which meant that Clara had been drinking plenty, along with her two companions Matthew and Arturo.

And that made Antoinette content. And maybe a touch nervous. Content that the wolves, once her enemy, were comfortable enough to risk themselves so, getting drunk. Nervous, as a drunk werewolf could perhaps be a rowdy werewolf.

“What will you tell your leader, if you do not mind the asking?”

“I’ll ... tell her that you’re all a bunch of very horny vamps, but mostly an amiable bunch. You know, for vamps.”

She laughed once again. “Yes, that is an accurate statement, I must admit. And please, feel free to indulge. Dolareido is a city of peace once more, with vices flowing through the streets, ready to be gobbled.” The blood of her city, after all. “I am sure many Kindred here would be glad to share their thralls or ghouls with you for the night. Or themselves, in some circumstances.” A glance for Natasha, who smiled a tiny smile.

“You offering?” Clara said.

Antoinette’s smile faded, and her arm around Jack tightened a touch more, enough so the boy went still. “No.”

She, the wolf, and the people around her went silent, as Clara and Antoinette looked at each other. At first, Antoinette had thought Clara’s fondness of Jack had been nothing more than mere flirtatious interest. But the wolf’s gaze did not break, spurred by courage or alcohol or both. Perhaps it was not simple, passing interest in Jack then.

Fiona stumbled forward, no longer with drink in hand, and leaned against Clara’s side. “Ah vote we bring a few of th’ sexy Kindred ‘ere back tae Bloodlust, an’ we don’t go home until I’ve got a man atween mah legs.”

This Fiona, silly child, was a confused woman, to be sure, a woman who wanted to explore her sexuality but seemed blocked by her own choices. She reeked of a woman secretly insecure about herself, who did things such as lie to Damien about having sex, in order to carry the impression she was a sexual woman. And, the petite, curvy creature was plenty attractive; the only thing stopping her sexual exploration was herself. But why?

Begotten were strange creatures. But, Fiona had disarmed the situation well enough, by accident, or perhaps on purpose. Perhaps, the delicious ginger creature was not as drunk as she let on? ... no, the little woman was indeed quite drunk, and young, and naive, and Antoinette could not help but feel herself brighten for being in her presence. A touch of similarity, Fiona and Jack, genuine and honest and young.

“Can I speak to you alone for a moment, Prince?” Clara said.

Alas, not entirely disarmed then.

Antoinette held her steel gaze, neither a smile or frown, and nodded. “Jack, if you do not mind?”

“Uh, sure, yeah.” The boy slipped out from underneath her arm, and walked over to stand beside Natasha. Damien followed.

With a gentle sigh, Antoinette walked with Clara. The two of them moved for the exit, side by side; and Antoinette did not like that. Others would have followed a step behind, while remaining at her side, but not the werewolf. No, Clara kept beside her shoulder to shoulder, and glanced around at the nearby Kindred as the two of them garnered gazes from others. No doubt this little excursion the two of them were making would be the focus of conversation for many.

Outside. With a more annoyed sigh, Antoinette tapped into the ocean of vitae in her core, and blanketed the two of them in the cloak of night. Not a natural discipline of a Daeva, but even a minor learning was of use to keep their voices from carrying out to be heard by nearby, passing humans. The two of them stood underneath the archway of the enormous building, and faced each other.

“This isn’t about Jack,” Clara said.

“Of course not.”

“ ... he is a great kid though. Bit young for you, don’t you think?”

Antoinette’s frown returned. So this is how it would be? To parley with barbs and poison.

“Are you not older than you appear, wolf?”

“Yeah I suppose. Got a couple decades on me I don’t carry on the face yet. You’re what, four or five centuries older than you look?”

“All the better, so that I may protect that which I love with power, and wisdom. And, pleasure him with experience.” Antoinette’s frown faded, replaced with a tiny smile that made her feel dark, sinister, and reminded her of Tony. “And unlike yours, my beauty will never fade.”

If she were not intoxicated, Antoinette felt the wolf would have kept her composure. But alcohol destroyed many things, including one’s patience, and Clara’s frown scarred her beautiful face.

“... Avery wanted to tell you, she knows you’ve been fucking with the Shadow more than usual.”

Antoinette brought a hand up to her chin to rest a single finger, and adopted a pondering expression. “Have I?”

“Like you’d know. You’ve never been to the Hisil, never seen the blood tower you’ve created there. And the black rivers haven’t left either, still here, still fucking shit up whenever anything touches it.”

Antoinette absorbed the words carefully, though each marked with feigned obliviousness. Each name and noun was more information for her to use, but ultimately Clara was correct about her lack of exposure to the other side of what Uratha called the Gauntlet. She had never seen the tower of blood, and had only heard mention of the black rivers from Simon.

“I am not Minerva, Clara Moreno. I do not, and will not make the same mistakes that she did. And, should fate conspire against me and such folly befall me, you would not be able to stop me.”

Clara snorted, and wiped her lip with her thumb. Uncouth creature. “Me, alone? No, I doubt I could take you in a fight, Miss Big Bad Elder Vamp. Avery could. And the fuck would you do if the whole pack came marching to your door?”

She almost grinned. Since Lucas’s ridiculous kamikaze attempt, she had taken the time to increase the defensive measures of her tower. What would these wolves do once they realized the twenty thralls armed with fully automatic assault rifles in the lobby were firing silver bullets? Or, when Daniel and she exposed their silver swords?

Do not underestimate Avery, Antoinette. The woman had learned from Simon’s mistakes no doubt, and would not simply bash her head against your door in the same way. And perhaps a little compromise would be possible.

“ ... be specific with me if you would, Clara. What exactly is it about my experimentations that is risking Avery’s retaliation?”

“Spiritual activity that’s pretty chaotic around the blood tower is causing weird interactions between spirits. Clashes of ... You ever seen a Magath tear through the Gauntlet, vampire? Ever seen someone spirit ridden try and resolve a need to heal and a need to consume at the same time? Or maybe a—no, course you haven’t, I’m wasting my time.” Aggressive, the wolf was growling, and she stepped in a little closer to glare up at her. “Nothing bad’s happened yet. But then...”

A pause in the werewolf’s aggression peeked Antoinette’s interest.

“Yes?”

“ ... you’re not the only person fucking with shit in the Shadow, Antoinette. Someone else is, and ... Avery wanted me to ask if you know who.”

Well, this was a surprising turn of events. Clara, this obviously aggressive woman who had an eye on Antoinette’s love, was asking for her help. And she did not seem too happy about it either. And it was an important question, dealing with things outside the Danse Macabre. Were the Uratha asking for information about other Kindred, or the covenants, Antoinette would have mislead her. But, with monsters like that Azlu tearing through her tunnels, she had no choice but to accept the reality. For all her exploring, for all her experiments, for all her attempts to understand what lay across the Gauntlet, it was the purview of the Uratha.

And that infuriated her. When glorious creatures such as Safe came through an invisible barrier she could neither see nor touch, to grace her with its presence? Large and small, entities of passion and grace and wisdom and love, with wings and hooves and glass and fur and metal. And other entities, dark and twisted things with many limbs and teeth, or things that defied description, with skin, scales, rusted iron, and bleeding eyes. For years she had dabbled, summoned these things in a controlled environment, and scratched at things that threatened to shatter a Kindred's understanding of reality. And, outside of the tower, she had journeyed to other locations. With methods beyond her understanding, spoke with yet more entities, creatures subtle and hidden on the wisp of shadow, and others as grand and towering as the oldest trees.

All of it, beyond her grasp of understanding, of experiencing. But not these Uratha, these brutes of strength, with 'wisdom' as meaningless as the ancient assumption that without sacrifice to the gods, the Nile would not flood that year, and Egypt would starve. Fools, blind, ignorant fools. And yet...

"I know of no one, Clara, that knows much of the Hisil, except for my subordinates. And Jacob."

"Yeah ... Jacob." Clara sighed, turned to put her back to the wall of the grand building, and sighed. "Don't think it's him. We don't know who it is, but someone else is ... reaching, poking holes, causing problems." She laughed, and kicked at the concrete beneath her a couple times. “You think vampires are bad? Try playing politics with a bunch of spirits. It’d be easier to negotiate with a child.”

It was difficult to make use of her vague words, but Antoinette doubted she would be able to pull anything more specific. That spirits, those both wondrous and terrifying, played at politics was known to her, but to what degree, was a mystery.

“I am sorry, Miss Moreno. I do not know.”

“Yeah ... thanks anyway.” Sighing, the wolf pushed herself away from the archway wall, and started back toward the entrance. “Your boy Jack is pretty damn cute.”

“He is. Utterly delicious, is he not?” And he is mine, animal.

“And if I convinced him to take a younger woman?”

“If you—”

“Yeah, if I convinced him. Would you be that greedy? Hold onto the kid even if he wanted to leave? You wouldn’t be the first Daeva that plucked the flower, killing it, in their desperate need to own it.”

“Jack is m...” Mine. Mine! No one else’s. She would never let him go, could never let him go. Never!

She grit her teeth until her fangs came to bare, and she forced the rising inferno in her dry, withered insides to settle. Clara was not incorrect. Daeva grabbed things precious to them, held them close, held them tight, until the life was wrung out of them.

Dizzying images, blurry memories assaulted her, ripped the rock from her stance, rendered her asunder. She closed her eyes for only a moment, but a moment was enough to bury her in hazy pictures of a time long ago, when that which she held precious burned away, and those she clung to with all her might withered into dust. Tony, once upon a time. Others before him she had buried in her unabashed need to own them, until they were but a shell of their former selves.

Jack. He would have made the comparison to the Phantom of the Opera; a silly story that failed to capture the nuance of obsession, Antoinette felt. But, ultimately, the musical did capture the overwhelming emotion, the need to turn the target of your desire into your possession. To own them, consume them, integrate them into every part of you, until they were wholly yours. The fear of losing that thing so precious was tantamount to damnation, and any Kindred, Daeva or otherwise, would be broken by such loss.

‘You will curse the day you did not do, all that the phantom asked of you.’

She turned away, and put her hands to her arms. “Nothing would hurt me more, but I would let him go.” No longer the child she once was, no longer the neonate or the ancilla. She had learned her lesson, painfully, time and time again.

Clara smirked at her, and dismissed the avalanche of pain her question had wrought with but a simple flick of the wrist. “Relax. Kid loves you, he made that clear.”

“ ... yes ... thank you.”

The wolf’s smirk grew, and she reentered the ball.

Antoinette took a moment longer. A night before and she was perfectly confident in herself, in her love, in her position, in everything about her romance with her loving, precious Jack. And this werewolf damaged it with a single question. Would she give Jack up, could she at all?

She shook out her hair, took a second to comb it with her fingers, and brushed herself off. Some others on the street nearby were talking, but their eyes would slide over her, with the cloak of night hiding her. And she kept it that way as she touched her face — do not ruin your face — and attempted to wipe away the crease upon her forehead. She was the Prince of Dolareido, a monolith of strength, a beautiful, sexual goddess, seductress, and towering presence of intelligence and wisdom. You are Prince, and it is upon these virtues that you hold that position.

And yet, Jack did not treat her as such. Jack treated her like a person, once the shock of her presence passed. He treated everyone like a person, when given the opportunity. And she loved that about her little Ventrue. She needed that in her life, needed to hold him and hear his words settle her scarred heart. Needed to hear the honesty and sincerity in his voice, and see the depth of his genuine soul through the windows of his beautiful eyes.

If only her city knew the ridiculous, juvenile, disgustingly poetic thoughts going through her mind. There would be an uprising within the week. Sighing all the more, she adjusted her dress, checked her hair again, released her cloak of night, and returned to the ball.

---

---

~~Jack~~

“Wonder what they’re talking about,” he said, once Antoinette and Clara were outside. Please don’t be talking about him. He didn’t want to go back to the Elysium tower and have a weird conversation about Clara. Antoinette wouldn’t be that insecure of course. Right?

He looked around. Beatrice and Julias were enjoying each other, holding each other as they drifted; almost looked like they were ready to dance. No one was dancing though. In fact, as far as Jack could see, almost everyone was getting far more into drinking the shared kine than anyone could have predicted. Jennifer and Jessy were no doubt a part of that reason, as the two women seemed almost in competition for who could be the most sexual, without actually having sex on the ballroom floor.

Around him were Natasha, Arturo, Matthew, Fiona, and now Damien. Could have been awkward, but Fiona drifted between them, and reached out to put a hand on Damien's shoulder.

“Sorry ah lied.”

“Um, it's ok.”

“Na it's nae! Ah was just trying tae be ... ah don't know ... Vrall was nae like this! Vrall had orgies in 'er honor!”

Vrall, the spider goddess nightmare entity thing inside the bubbly little redhead. Still hard to imagine, but Jack did his best, and smiled as he watched Fiona struggle with her turmoil. To be upset about lying about not being a virgin? If that was the worst thing she had to feel bad about, she was a strange girl. She'd killed people, a lot of them, to feed her hunger. Didn't feel bad about them? Very strange girl.

“Damien,” Arturo said, still standing behind Natasha with his hands on her shoulders. “I understand you tried to take down the Prince?”

Wow, right to the sore spot.

“ ... Lucas did, and I aided him, yes.”

“Hey, not looking to start anything. Just thought that was worth bringing up, cause damn, that must take balls. Avery has some stories about the Prince and the sheriff getting into a fight with Simon and his pack. Scary stuff.”

Jack must have been going insane, cause he thought he spotted a smile on Damien's face.

“Well ... we had the sheriff trapped. So it was just me and our companions against the Prince.”

“Sheriff trapped?”

“I—” Damien stopped himself as he took a glance to Natasha, and Jack did as well. She managed to, without moving any part of her face, show that she didn’t tell the two werewolves the sheriff was her sire yet. “I had something precious of his, and private. He had no choice but to stand down.”

“Something so precious the sheriff let you fight the Prince?”
Matthew said.

“Can we have it?” Art said. “For ... you know, peaceful purposes.”
A joke, complete with a chuckle.

Every bit of training Julias gave Jack about the poker face went into action. Damien as well. Natasha as well, though she didn’t have the steel to her gaze that Damien had.

“Sorry, he has it back,” the assassin said.

The two wolves nodded, and took a few more sips of their drinks. Good, the more alcohol the better.

Antoinette returned, as did Clara, and the two of them walked back to join the group. Neither of them looked happy.

Jack took a step toward his love and slipped in under her arm. Not usually his place to be the first to engage, but something was bothering her, and for some stupid reason he couldn’t help but feel responsible, if Clara was involved. And she hugged him with that arm, with a little more weight than usual.

“If you will excuse me, Kindred, Uratha, Begotten, I have preparations to make for the future. Jack my love, please come join me before the sunrise.”

“Sure you don’t want me to come with you now?”

The goddess smiled down at him, leaned down to plant a kiss on his lips, and let him go. “Non. As I said, work to be done. Please enjoy the party.” She traced her finger along his lips, turned, and left.

It wasn’t unusual for the Prince to leave the ball before others. Hell it was expected. They all watched her leave, and Jack took a few extra peeks at her before looking back to Clara.

“You—”

“Don’t worry Jack,” she said. “Just ... yeah.” Another shrug, and she gave her pack mates some gentle punches on the shoulders. “I’m out of here. Don’t break your girl tonight, ok?”

“Sure boss,” they both said, and both turned to look at Natasha with evil grins abound.

Natasha shrank against Arturo’s stomach, and gulped.

---

The party continued for a little while longer, before everyone started to leave. Kindred here and there helped their exhausted kine get dressed and such, and many Kindred went home with another Kindred by their side; and some kine between them too. If any of the vampires in Dolareido were not planning on having sex tonight before they’d gone to the ball, that probably changed. Bellies full of blood and plenty more to be had from the many thralls and ghouls being shared had turned the air into a veritable ocean of sexual energy.

But, after Antoinette’s departure, the night lost its zest for Jack. Halfway through the party, he was thinking Antoinette was going to do a host of nasty things to him when they went back to her tower. Now, he wasn't so sure. Something had shaken her, and seeing Antoinette shaken was weird.

He didn't stick around the whole time. Julias told him he could go, and so he went after saying goodbye to Natasha, Amanda, Beatrice, Fiona — all his friends were girls apparently — and just as he was about to say goodbye to Damien, the assassin approached him first.

“Can I talk to you, Jack?”

“Yeah sure.” Hopefully not as heavy a topic as Athalia's.

The two of them decided to walk home. Not far to get back into the main city district, or at least it shouldn't have been, but Damien nodded toward a dark alley, and Jack, like an idiot, followed him. He trusted Damien, but dark alleys weren't exactly doing him any favors. Memories of Rebecca were fresh and painful.

“Making me nervous, Damien,” he said, giving the Mekhet the opportunity to make a joking chuckle. He didn't.

“Those your two crows watching the ball?”

“I ... oh damn it, how did you know?”

“Two crows hanging out by the front entrance of a building for that long, when no other crows were around, were bound to be noticed.”

“Damn it.”

“Though, only a Mekhet would be able to see that the crows had indeed been touched by the animalism discipline.”

He sighed, put his hands in his pockets, and let his head droop.
“How’d you know they were mine?”

“ ... I’ve been watching you.”

“ ... why?”

“I wasn’t watching you at first, I was investigating some unusual people. Four people, two men, two women, visited the Dolareido Cathedral at one point.”

Those four again, at Maria’s Grand Cathedral? “ ... I guess if you’ve been talking to Maria, you know about Barry.”

“I knew about Barry before you did.”

Of course he did, cause the man was forever sneaking and monitoring everything.

“Any information to share?”

“No. Except that those four were at the burned down building the day after you were.”

“Shit, really? They were there not long before the fire too ... Fuck, I knew I should have reported the new evidence before the ball.” He threw up his hands, groaning. “I already reported about the four, but there wasn’t enough evidence to really get the whole Invictus up in arms about it.”

The two of them nodded, and they both sighed. With both of their sightings combined, the pile of evidence was too big to ignore.

“What did they do at the Cathedral?”

The assassin shrugged and looked out to the street. People walked by, but they wouldn’t be able to see the two of them with Damien covering them in the cloak of night. And yet he was still being cautious, about humans. Scary thought.

“They didn’t stay long, just long enough to realize it wasn’t actually abandoned. No dust on the pews.” The assassin sighed, combed the half head of hair, and met Jack’s gaze. “You know what this means.”

“Humans following us around? Barry’s dead and no one knows why? I ... it’s probably ... hunters.”

“Yeap.”

The two of them looked around again. They were in a dark alley, so damn dark they might as well have been hiding in a closet. And yet, he felt exposed. So did Damien, a vampire fifty years his senior, who was strong for his age at that. Strong enough to fight the Prince; when she had a handicap of course, but, still. Jack should have felt safe with Damien there to watch his back.

He didn’t feel safe. The stupid little nagging feeling in his gut just kept growing, and had been for days now. It was in everyone’s gut, and everyone was ignoring it; the near orgy in the ball was proof of that. People were getting so into it because it was easier to pretend everything was fine.

Kine were sheep. Kindred were the wolves in sheep’s clothing. Then what the fuck was a hunter? A sheep with a stake and a flamethrower?

“I’m going to go tell Maria,” Damien said. “You should just ... go to the Prince’s.”

“What? Why? I should report this to—” “Think about it Jack. Youngest Kindred in the whole city, and the Prince’s lover? You don’t think hunters would make you a prime target?”

“If these hunters have been here all this time, then—”

“Then either they’re waiting to make their move, or they just don’t know about you yet. Until we get rid of them — if they’re even hunters at all — you should be beside a Kindred capable of defending you.” Damien winced, looked down, and then back out from the alley to the street to watch the kine walk by. “You remember what ... I did with Natasha, against Daniel.”

“ ... yeah, I do.”

“Imagine the Prince in that position, with you.”

“I’d prefer to not.” Because either way, that was going to end badly. Jack dead and Antoinette devastated, or Antoinette dead and him devastated, or other horrible possibilities involving a lot of dead Kindred. “I get your point though. Ok, code red then.”

“Maybe not red yet. Code ... orange? What’s before code red?”

Jack raised a brow as he looked at the Mekhet. Was he making a joke? Didn’t look like it.

“I get you. We’re not at war, yet. And we don’t have proof, yet.”

“Yet.”

Yeah, yet. He sighed, for the millionth time, and rubbed his buzzed hair. “Telling them about this is going to have the entire city freaking out.” And with the Uratha here, and the Begotten wanting to meet him, it couldn’t have been worse timing. Wait. “ ... you think ... the Begotten or Uratha caused this?”

“You mean, their arrival caused the hunters to show up?” He shrugged, and pat his leg once, likely checking to make sure a knife or sword was still there. “Maybe. People hunting vampires is more common, but, Dolareido is pretty low on that radar I imagine, with how low the death rates are here to Kindred. Monsters and werewolves? I ... don’t know. Fiona did let her hunger get out of control for a while.”

Right, Damien was friends with Fiona. Hard to imagine that, considering how different they were, Damien with unending bitterness and Fiona with her unending sweetness.

“We don’t have a choice,” Jack said.

“We don’t.”

“This really sucks.”

“Yeah.”

“We just had a party celebrating how peaceful Dolareido had become.”

“Yeah.”

This must have been what it was like for Antoinette and Daniel. Getting blood from a stone.

“I’ll head to Antoinette’s then, tell her what’s up, send a message to Julias, and tomorrow night, see how badly shit hits the fan.”

Damien nodded, and pushed off the wall. “I’ll tell Maria ... Keep an eye open, Jack. Any hunter who knows what’s going on in this city is going to have their eyes on you.”

“Right ... I’ll call up an Invictus driver, instead of walking the rest of the way.” Lovely, just lovely.

“Good idea.” Damien disappeared around the corner back onto the street. No goodbyes or anything. Was it a Mekhet thing?

Couldn't have been, Natasha was far more expressive than Damien; when she let her guard down anyway. Maybe Damien and Daniel were always on guard? Must have been exhausting.

Jack sighed, took another deep breath, and headed toward the street.

A sharp pain shot out from his chest. Before he could cry out, something covered his mouth and nose, tight, leather gloves, and strong.

Something was stabbing him in his back. In his heart. And, he couldn't scream, couldn't yell, couldn't do anything as his body started to slip into torpor. A face was looking down at him, someone with gray hair, and a scar along their nose ridge. Someone alive, and not one of the four.

As the darkness and paralysis took him, he had only one thought: you have got to be shitting me.

Chapter 46

~~Natasha~~

They took a taxi home. She sat in the middle, and peeked left and right during the ride. Matthew the giant, and Arturo the devil; and, also quite huge. The tiny Mekhet disappeared between them, and she smiled a little smile as she took a slow breath through her nose in the proximity of their bodies. She could smell the arousal.

Much of the night had been spent looking at half-naked men, women, and then eventually completely naked men and women, the humans being brought up to orgasm for the joy of the Kindred feeding on them. Supposedly, you could taste it in the blood. And she had to admit, when she was sleeping with Jessy's ghouls, there was a change in the flavor when the man had just cum. So subtle you could mistake it for a placebo.

Kindred treated it like humans did caviar, or fine wine, or similar extravagant food. She could understand why.

With so many of the Kindred indulging in such a luxury, it'd created an overwhelming sexual atmosphere. At least any Kindred that wanted to could simply not blush life, and hide their arousal, but her poor boyfriends could not. And she couldn't blame them for peeking at all legs and breasts and penises being stroked and vaginas being fingered. At first there'd been only one or two, almost hidden as they sat in the seats while nearby Kindred leaned over them to touch them. By the end of the ball, many of the kine had enjoyed at least one orgasm, and at least one pair of fangs in their neck. Jennifer's targets — all women — had enjoyed far more, and had been reduced to exhausted, sweating messes, mewling and whimpering. Was she trying to impress Beatrice? It'd seemed so, with how often Jennifer kept glancing at her fellow witch.

She'd impressed a lot more than just Triss. Natasha hadn't been able to stop herself, or her boyfriends, from staring at the sight of one of the women lying down on a table, completely naked, while three Kindred gently drank of her blood. Until the poor kine had slipped into a post-Kiss coma, Jennifer had fingered her until Natasha could see the girl's juices trickling down her thighs.

"That Jen," Art said. Girl must have been on his mind, and she couldn't blame him, not after that display. "Got the impression she was trying to get everyone's attention."

"N-Not everyone's, just ... Beatrice's."

"Yeah?" Matt said. "Thought she was with that Invictus dude."

"She is. So I d-d-don't know what she's up to." Maybe she was just trying to get into their bed? Or something more devious, and break them apart? Doubtful, but she didn't know the witch well enough to make that call.

Once they were out of the taxi, outside Natasha's apartment building, they walked in and took the elevator. Still a couple hours until sunrise, and she'd made a promise. So, she stood in the elevator with her two boyfriends, and tried her best to hide her grin. Two boyfriends, hehe.

Her two boyfriends were drunk! Or at least tipsy. She could smell the alcohol on their breath, and their movement was a little sloppy. And, they kept sneaking glances her way, and looking her up and down like she was a snack; they always did that, but tonight their glances were a little less devious, a little more obvious. If only she could indulge in liquid courage like that.

She was hungry though. Seeing all those kine getting Kissed, drained, and all she'd had was a glass of blood. Not terribly satisfying to a vampire when it wasn't fresh; still good, but not as filling. So, as much as Art and Matt smelled of arousal, and kept looking at her like food, she was doing the same to them. She wanted to bite them, sink her fangs into them, fill her belly with their essence.

And have them inside her while she did.

She opened the door and let them into her apartment, before turning around to lock it as the two wolves stepped around her. Always locked it of course. But, as she locked she, she heard a growl behind her.

She turned around, and squeaked. Both of the werewolves were approaching her, shoulders haunched and knees bent. Prowling!

Matthew reached out for her first, and she tapped into the vitae in her body to spur on some speed. A reflex, a life saving reflex, and she ducked under his enormous arms to try and get behind him.

“W-Wait!” she said, and stopped short as she almost ran into Arturo, who’d jumped back in anticipation of her.

The evil man only grinned, and tried to grab her. But she ducked again, and went through his legs. Being tiny has advantages.

She squealed as she darted around to the other side of the couch, and put it between her and the two wolves. “N-Now, boys! We were ... thought we were ... going t-t-to ... not be so—”

Again, she squeaked as the two of the beasts came at her, walking fast and blocking off both pathways around the couch. Closing in on her, surrounding her, like ... like wolves! And they weren’t listening either. Their eyes were squinting a little, and their lips were raised in small growls that exposed their teeth. They were both grinning.

They dived. Squealing, she tried to jump over the couch, but Arturo saw her plan coming. His hand was waiting for her, and she ran straight into it. Arm hooked her stomach, and pulled her in so she was trapped with her back to his chest, her feet dangling a foot from the floor.

“You,” Matt said, stalking in closer, “should blush life for us.”

“I won’t!”

He growled, deep, rumbling in his titanic chest, and got in closer yet again. Art took her hands and lifted her by them, so now she dangled two feet from the ground instead, eye level with the giant Matthew. Or almost.

The blond-haired beast reached down, and started to slide up her dress. “After what Art and I just went through?”

“Pure torture,” the devil man behind her said.

“I ... I s-said it’d be ... sexual...” Trapped. Trapped trapped, unable to get away from her two boyfriends. Why would she want to? Cause they could get scary! So massive, and strong, and when they were hungry like this, it sent a chill down her spine. She remembered what it was like, in the tunnels when they chased her.

The giant continued to pull up on her dress. Higher, and higher, until she was wriggling and squirming as the man exposed her bare sex. They worked together to strip her, until she was dangling there in nothing but her shoes; but even those were taken from her a moment later.

Art brought her higher, and higher, and set a kiss on her ear. And then, her neck. With her naked, and him holding her up like this, she felt like a bug. A tiny, wriggling little bug.

“Blush for me,” Art said.

“N-No! You t-t-two are ... b-being ... mean...” Her voice died, melting away as Matt also stood in closer, leaning down to kiss the opposite side of her neck.

“Blush,” he said. Rumbled. Matt, being forceful, being insistent? God, she blinked up at him, and did her best ‘please be nice’ eyes. They only made him growl, louder, until she felt the vibrations against her naked body.

She swallowed on nothing, and blushed.

The two animals rumbled their pleasure, and set her back down onto the floor. Art turned her around, and with his hands reaching down for her hips, held her tight to him as he leaned down, and kissed her. Matt moved with the flow, and reached down to squeeze and knead her ass while Art buried her lips in a rather forceful, powerful kiss, physically powerful. And as Art squeezed her tight, held her, buried her in his kiss, Matt set his lips on her neck, massaged her back, her shoulders, and her ass once again.

And then Art started to move down her body. His hands reached lower, and so too did his kisses, finding her neck and threatening to bite it out with a playful nibble, before his lips went lower to her breasts. Her nipples were hard, and she reached out onto Art’s shoulders to hold on as he suckled on the tiny buttons. Warm, wet lips on her nipples. Each kiss along her areola sent tingly little sparks into her chest, until she made a tiny mewl. He didn’t stay there long, and continued going down, and down, and down.

The man, on his knees, reached out for her legs, and squeezed on her thighs as he brought her in closer. She was standing, but Arturo was so tall compared to her, that as he brought her in closer, he lifted her. She whimpered at him, pouted her best pout, but to no avail. The man sat down on his butt and knees, and set her feet on his legs above the knee. With her height raised, standing on his quadriceps, he brought her closer yet again, and set his mouth upon her smooth pussy.

Tongue. Hot, wet tongue found her folds. No hiding it, she was already wet. In just a minute since her blushing, the two beasts had her wet, and mewling, and whimpering, and now she was reaching out to hold onto Arturo's head as the beast began to devour her.

Matthew disappeared, and she turned her head to try and find where the giant was going. But pressure, hot and dripping pushed along her folds and along her clitoris, ripping her attention back. The man between her legs was grinning up at her with his eyes, and she squeaked when he set his teeth against flesh. But he didn't bite, thank god, and resumed licking her. And growling against her smooth lips, rumbling, he licked harder.

"Art! S-Slow down ... p-p-pl ... you..." Too much, too fast! She needed to warm up first; or she should have. But her body knew better, and for all her begging, her nipples were hard enough to almost hurt, and her juices were already on her sex. She was all over Art's lips.

"We've been dating for several weeks now Tash," Matt said, returning, with a bottle of lubricant in his hand. Oh no. "We know what you look like when you want sex."

"I d-don't know y-y-nnng!" She squeaked, and dug her fingers into Art's hair as the man suckled on her clitoris.

Matt came up behind her, and also got down on his knees. "Hold still." An order, from Matthew, big, gentle giant man! He didn't shout it or say it with any harshness, but there was no doubt the man was giving her a command.

She tried to express her discontent, but it just kept coming out as whimpers. Art wouldn't stop licking her, and no matter how hard she tried to pretend it wasn't true, her body was on fire already. Embarrassing, to be so aroused, so quickly, and for the two men to be able to know it just by looking at her. And as Matt set his hands on her ass again, her whimpers turned into an outright moan as Art slipped two fingers inside her aching, squeezing depths.

“Art, p-please ... sl...” He wasn’t listening. He gazed up at her from between her legs, lips still pulling on her clit between bouts of licking, and his fingers starting to press forward toward her belly. And he pressed hard. A bump showed along her lower abdomen where the beast pressed against her g-spot; a flat stomach, subtle abs, and very tiny body frame meant every bit of pressure the animal pushed against her depths toward her stomach was shown along her skinny belly, below the navel.

It drove Art wild, and he started to finger her harder, push against her g-spot further, all while soaking her already dripping folds with his tongue. All she could do was hold on as the pleasure forced her muscles to squeeze.

But when Matt started to press wet fingers between her ass cheeks, she squeaked, and looked over at the giant. He was on his knees too, and while one hand was prying open her butt, the other was pushing thoroughly lubricated fingers against her entrance. Always they both wanted her, always at the same time! And after that first time, their insistence, their need, their aggression, it was always so high, and overpowering.

It scared her, thrilled her. And her body had no such inner conflicts about it, more than happy to give away her arousal with copious amounts of her juices, and endless panting.

Her grip tightened on Art’s shoulders, and she whimpered for mercy as Matthew eased two of his large fingers into her tiny, squeezing body. Two sets of fingers, both wriggling, squirming, pushing and massaging against her insides, all while Art continued to gently suckle and kiss her clitoris, too soft to push her over the edge though. He didn’t want her to cum with her clit, he wanted to her cum deep inside, where the muscles would spasm, squeeze, and fill her core with waves of deep, rolling bliss.

The two werewolves were far, far too good at what they were doing. Natasha knew the two men must have had a very large sexual history, but with both of them filling her and pressing against her spots, those spots, it was hard to care about anything else other than the pleasure tremors in her pelvis. Art took turns pressing her g-spot forward toward her belly, and then reached deeper, pushing his fingers against her depths toward her stomach as well. He knew where that spot was, deep inside, and he pushed on it hard enough to make a small bump along her abs just below her navel. All the while, Matt reached in deep as well, and pressed against her depths, finding the other side of her deepest place and pressing it toward Art.

It all left her a shaking, mewling mess. And a minute later, a cumming mess. She cried out, but her cries were quiet, without breath, nothing more than pants and whimpers as she held onto Art, and came onto his face. She could feel her juices, far more juices than there should have been, drip down onto him, and down her thighs. She could feel her inner muscles clench with all their might, before they convulsed in random spurts of bliss, and more of her liquids trickled out of her. The more they pressed against those deep places in her little body, the more her eyes rolled up, and the more she found herself teetering, body wanting to fall but unable to as the two beasts held her, and fingered her more, and more, and more.

When they stopped, she collapsed. Art and Matt both removed their fingers, and Art helped set her down on the floor, before the two of them stood up. In seconds, they tossed away their shirts, their pants, their underwear, their socks, until she was staring up at two very naked men. Her, on her knees, panting and trembling, while the two titans stood over her, members erect.

For a second, she thought maybe they would ask for blowjobs, and she didn't have the energy for that. She was still shaking, trembling, and attempts to stand failed as the pleasure coursed through her muscles and down to her toes. But, she knew they wanted more, and she tried to get away again as Matt reached out for her. Her attempt at escape was a pale comparison to last time, her legs refusing to work and all, and the giant only laughed as he scooped her up into his arms and cradled her as the two men walked toward her bedroom.

Arturo hopped onto her bed, grinned his evil bastard grin, and lay down on his back, his head on her pillow, and his hands out to motion for them to come to him.

“P-Please ... need ... break.” Her voice was starting to come back. Still mostly pants and wavering squeaks, but at least it was there.

But they weren't listening, as if arousal had clogged their ears. Matt climbed onto the bed, set her down on Arturo's waist, and she trembled as she placed her hands upon his enormous chest. Hard, rock, muscle and blood. And as she sat there, shivering, staring down at his wide valley of strength, the wolf beneath her reached out and set his hands on her hips.

She whimpered as the beast forced her forward, so her clit, aching, swollen, slid along the veined girth. Back and forth, Art forced her smooth pussy to drag along his cock, until it was coated in her juices. She was soaked, and dripping, and she reached up to cover her face as she turned beet red.

Maybe she shouldn't have done that. Hiding her face behind fingers, she peeked through the cracks to find Art's face mad with voracious hunger, and sending more shivers through her spine. He forced her forward until his cock's head was pressing against the entrance of her, and angled her pelvis so the thick glans started to force her open when he pushed her back down toward his legs. And penetrated her. She gasped, reached down quick to grab his wrists, and held on as the man quickly sank his length into her. At least at first; he stopped once he had four of five inches inside her. With a few inches of his length still to go, she felt the man press against her depths, the swollen head of his shaft stretching her in deeper slightly. She meeped, and with a reflex, tried to push herself off of the enormous thing penetrating her, filling her, stretching her pussy taut with its thickness, and length. But Arturo growled, animal, vibrations she felt through her legs around his chest, and continued to push her down.

There was no getting around the size difference. She was a very tiny woman, and Arturo was a huge man. A huge, ravenous, overpowering man. She was thankful that, in the middle of what appeared to be borderline insanity, he still knew to take those last few inches slowly, to let her aroused body accept and adjust to fit him. It hurt, to have her depths filled like this. But in moments, her boiling insides sent powerful jolts of pleasure down her thighs and up into her core as the man sank her deeper, and deeper onto him, the head of his cock consistently but gently pushing and massaging against her depths. Pain faded away, and electric shocks rippled outward as she finally managed to take every inch of his length.

Whimpering, she forced herself to look down. Her little lips were stretched so wide, taut, struggling to fit the beast inside her, and her clitoris stood out from her smooth skin, swollen and aching. Whimpering turned into another squeal as Matt got comfortable behind her on his knees, and pushed her torso forward a little.

“Matt! P-Please ... I’m ... I need a b-b-break...”

He wasn’t listening either. Just like Art, there was a look on his face, of ravenous need, of overwhelming desire that both terrified her, and had her body singing with arousal. They wanted her this badly.

The giant set his glans against her ass, and started to press against her tight muscles. His shaft was lubricated now, she could tell, and with how much lube had already been worked into her butt, it started to slide in easily. At least, until the smallness of the hole, of her, her body, started to fight back against the man's girth.

She tried to sit up, to get back some measure of control, but as Matt began to sink his massive cock into her, he put one of his hands against her back, and pinned her. Wriggling, squirming, she could do nothing but lay there upon Art's chest, and tremble as Matt forced inch after inch of him into her ass. He was slow too, like Art, and knew how to make sure the lubricant and gentle, massaging rhythm worked together to allow her body to accept him. But she had no room! No space inside her, not for all this, for the both of them, filling her until she felt like she'd burst. Her sphincter squeezed down on the titan, the ring of muscle already taut with the girth of the man, but it did nothing to stop him. Pinned and helpless, Matt sank more of his cock into her body, more, and more, until she was sure the man was pushing into her stomach.

Somewhere, between getting pinned and Matt entering her, she'd started moaning. And as she did, she felt both the titans growl once more, deep rumbling sounds that sent vibrations through her. Trapped between walls of muscle and power, and all she could do was lay there, legs spread, and let the beast fill her.

Once her ass pressed tight against the wolf's pelvis, he removed his hand from her back, only to slide it forward over her shoulder, and around her neck. Matt scooped her toward his chest, again trapping her, but now with her back to his stomach, her head against his sternum — he was way too tall — and his arms around her. One of his giant hands trickled down her breasts, her belly, and down to her leg, while the other kept her neck in his hands.

His grip was almost big enough to completely circle her neck.

She looked down, and let out a quiet whimper. She was a skinny woman, with a touch of abdominal definition, and a small frame; which meant the sheer amount of girth filling her was causing a small bump along her lower belly, a subtle distension showing where the two beasts filled her to the point she thought she might split open.

“G ... god... , “ she said.

Matthew growled over her. With her head against his sternum, the power of his rumbling voice forced her eyes to roll upward, and she whimpered as she melted against him. The grip of his fingers did not loosen, almost tight enough to render her unable to breathe. She did not need oxygen, but that did not change that every muscle in her body started to go limp with surrender, and boil with need as the beast held her.

He started to fuck her. Slowly at first, easing out half of his long cock, before pushing it back into her. She managed to look down even with his grip, and mewled openly at the sight of the bump along her body shifting, becoming more pronounced as Matt sank his shaft into her to the hilt, and then eased out half of it once more. You weren't supposed to be able to see it! To see how they were stretching her insides like this. But, she stared wide-eyed at how the two men fighting for space in her quivering insides forced her lower abdomen to distend slightly around their girths.

She could feel it. Arturo seemed content to watch, to stare and gaze at her, her body, her hard nipples and her belly where the vulgar, obscene ... hypnotizing site was, the bump. And it reached her navel.

She started to whine, and whimper, little sounds that were barely audible. Each stroke of Matt's cock into her awaiting insides pressed toward her belly, pressed against the wall of flesh between her two depths, pressed against Art's shaft within her, and pressed against her deepest places. Thankfully the giant kept it slow and gentle as he eased in every inch of him, and every so often, he stayed there, balls deep within her. Two men, buried to the hilt inside her, and she was helpless to do anything while Matt hugged her, squeezed her, choked her, and Arturo watched every bit of it.

The heat started to build again. Her whines grew louder, and her head fell back again to rest against Matt's chest as the man began to fuck her once more. She reached up with one hand to grab his wrist, but it did little to deter the man. He growled down at her, louder, and hugged her tighter to him as his fingers around her throat tightened as well.

For a split moment, she wondered how exactly Matthew was in the correct position for this. Kneeling would have put him too high. Maybe his knees were spread very far outward? That would have hurt the legs after a while, right? Her thoughts were ripped back to the present as a sharp jolt of pleasure erupted from her clitoris.

“Ar-nnn!” Her voice came out muffled, buried by Matt's grip, as Arturo began to massage her clit. Gently, he caressed the swollen nub, until the sparks traveled into her thighs and made her squeeze down on both of their lengths. Not fast enough to make her cum, but the consistent, loving pressure was more than enough to have her whimpering.

It wasn't her clitoris that was going to make her cum, it was the friction of Art's cock against her g-spot, and the length of him forcing her depths inward, constant pressure against her deepest places. It was Matt, and how each deep stroke of his cock reached far enough she could feel her body fight to accommodate his length. How each stroke made his shaft press toward all her taut flesh, and how each stroke joined Art in filling her to the brim.

She started to cum. Arturo wasn't even moving, only tenderly massaging her clitoris, while Matt continued to trap her, hold her, squeeze her, and press her against his chest and abs. But she started to cum, and as Matt sank himself to the hilt inside her until she felt the head of his cock press against her deepest place with Arturo, she squeezed. Her mewls came through, louder, and Matt released some of the tension on her neck to let the sounds escape as she started to tremble upon their cocks.

Warmth. Wet warmth came out of her, and a peek down showed her juices leaking out of her smooth lips and onto the waiting pelvis of Arturo. The man set aside his fingers, held onto her legs as she came on him, and a quick peek at his eyes showed awe and craving. But her eyes rolled upward again, and half closed as she squeezed again, and again, each met with more of her juices soaking the wolf between her legs.

Arturo wasn't moving, but Matthew was. He growled down at her, and tightened his grip on her neck again while his other hand pressed on her chest, to keep her pinned to his colossal torso of rock. He stayed inside her, as deep as he could get, her ass molding to fit against his hips and pelvis, before he withdrew a few inches, and thrust back into her. She shuddered, managed to look up at him with begging eyes, before her squeezing muscles rippled waves of pleasure down to her curling toes. And more of her cum flowed out of her, until she felt it on her thighs, and her knees.

She was drenching him, as Matt continued to fuck her ass. And, each time the man forced his pelvis snug against her, until his glans was pressing forward so hard she could feel the bump along her stomach, she convulsed, and came. More juices, and more, until she felt it drip down Arturo's sides to reach her calves and feet where they were tight to his body. More, until she felt so embarrassed she would have made a beet jealous, and could do nothing about it as Matt held her tight in his grasp.

Finally, he stopped thrusting, and let her go. She collapsed, hard enough for her cheek to land with a quiet thud against Arturo's chest. Her arms were limp, hanging over the man's sides and onto the blankets, and a touch of drool escaped her mouth, dribbling onto his sternum.

"You overdid it, you dumbass," Art said. The sound of his voice through his chest, her ear against his body, was powerful, soothing, and she smiled as she tried to get her energy back. Whole body tingling, and her insides refused to stop with their random spasms, each earning a delightful orgasm aftershock. Energy was nowhere to be found.

"Yeah. Maybe. You ok Tash?" Hands found her, took her shoulders, and pulled her up. She didn't help. Nope, content to just be limp, and tremble as the tingling waves took their time fading away. "See, she's fine." Matt's arms hugged around her this time, one hooking around the front of her chest, while the other reached down to hold her hip. "Right?"

"Need ... b ... b-break..."

"Break?" Art said, and he forced himself up on his elbows. No room left for Natasha, sitting between the two beasts, still inside her, walls of meat and strength burying her. "I'm so close."

"So am I," the beast behind her said.

She whimpered, and forced her heavy arms out to touch Art's chest. "Please, let me rest. I ... still ... t-t-tingly."

Her touch sent Art back to the bed, and he made another growl as he set his hands on her hips; Matt moved his out of the way, and held her stomach inside. And then, the devil forced his hips upward.

She bounced, and squealed. "Oh! N-Not so rough! Please, p-please, slow ... down."

Again, they didn't listen. Art continued to thrust upward, not so hard as to break her, but he wasn't gentle either, and he was deep. So deep, every thrust stretched her inward, and she felt the thickness of his glans against her deep spot.

And Matthew held onto her, hugged her, squeezed her, while keeping himself balls deep inside. Every thrust from Art was met with her tightening muscles, and so little room left inside her with Matt taking up so much of it. With so much pressure inside her, so much flesh, each stroke forced her g-spot to drag along Art's veined girth, until he forced his cock back into her to the base. And, with Matt no longer holding her neck, she was free to let her head hang, and watch the titan beneath her flex his hard abs, his broad back, and every muscle in his core as he pushed up to meet her.

Her poor, tender little pussy seemed more than happy with Art's aggression, and continued to squeeze on the veined girth spreading her lips taut.

Matt finally let go of her, and she collapsed forward again. She had enough strength to catch her weight this time, and she set her hands Art's chest as she continued to bounce on his length. Each thrust earned a squeak from her, sometimes a squeal, and sometimes a moan, until she could feel more of her juices start to leak from her. So much of her cum was soaking her, her legs, Art's pelvis, she blushed brighter every time she looked down at the mess. Never made this sort of mess before, not with Jessy's ghouls or by herself or ever, and every time the two wolves did this to her, it only got worse.

Art got faster, and started thrusting hard enough to hurt a little more. And, try as she might to tell him to stop, to slow down, to ease up, every time she opened her mouth all she could find was mewls, and panting whimpers. Pain melted away again, and her body, already boiling, melted away too.

Somewhere along the line, both men started to gently thrust. Art slowed down to almost nothing, giving her tender insides some deserved mercy, while Matt joined him, and the two beasts each fucked her in a soft, tender rhythm. More warmth was leaking out of her pussy, and not just hers. Arturo was cumming, and lovingly fucking her quivering body as he did, until his white fluid was leaking out of her, and soaking their connection. She hadn't even noticed when he'd started.

She tried to move her hands, or maybe join in and milk the man, but her arms were limp again, hanging over his sides and against the blankets. All she could do was lay there, wriggling, mewling, as both men fucked her.

“She’s all mine now,” Matt said.

“W-What? I—nnn!” She moaned as the giant behind her took her by her armpits, pulled her toward his chest, and lifted her. The dragging girth of Art’s cock sent more shocks through her, but after a few seconds, the large phallus fell clear of her body, and landed flat along the wolf’s abs. Coated in white, and her juices.

Art smirked, hooked his hands behind his head, and watched as Matt set her back down so her pussy rested along the underside base of Art’s length. And once she was comfortable with her lips spread apart over the man’s cock, pinning it to his abs, Matt started to fuck her again.

And Art watched. He grinned at her, gave her a devious little wink, reached out with one hand, and again began to caress her clitoris as she shifted back and forth over him a few inches. Matt held her tight to him, turning her into a tiny, limp doll against the vast wall of steel muscle and sweat behind her. Each thrust from the man was deep enough to force her ass snug against his body, but that wasn’t enough for him. Matt hugged her tighter, bear hug tight enough that her arms were pinned to her sides, and he sank himself into her deep enough that each stroke forced her body forward, until Matt pulled her back.

She was sliding along Art's cock, while the man caressed her, massaged her clit, watched her and her soaking wet pussy slip over the cum-coated thickness of his girth. And each shift of motion was met with Matt, pressing his length toward her belly, hitting that deep spot through the walls of her flesh, her ass, her depths. Sometimes, he pulled out slowly, nearly all of his length so only the bulbous tip of him remained within her, before he thrust forward, the angle forcing his cock to press against her pussy, her g-spot, and the pressure reaching deeper, and deeper, deeper, until she started to tremble once more. Explosive pleasure hit her, robbed her of any body control, and reduced her to a quivering pile of bliss.

She looked down, and turned red from head to toe, for the millionth time. She was squirting.

Without Art's shaft within her, there was nothing to stop her muscles from clenching down with the waves of orgasm, and force the fluid to spurt out rather forcefully against him. Her cum washed over his cock and along his abs, mixing into the white of his semen and making a big, big, big mess of everything.

"Cumming this hard?" Art released her clitoris, and sat up again, still leaning back slightly with his hands behind him against the sheets. "How naughty."

"It's ... n-not..." She wanted to reach out and hit him, but Matt's hug around her body was absolute. And even if it wasn't, she was struggling to keep her eyes on him, to not show how she was still mid-orgasm, and that she wasn't overwhelmed by pleasure; it wasn't working. Her arms were limp, bear hug or not, and her head eventually fell forward, mouth open and her tongue nearly hanging out as she stared at another gush of her cum. Now that Art was sitting up, her pussy rested against where his cock met his testicles, and she drenched the base of him with her warm juices as Matt started to pump faster, and faster.

And then slower, and slower. The giant slowed to a few, hard, deep thrusts that forced her to squeak with each one, and another squirt of her fluids to splash against where her pussy was rubbing against Art. Matt was cumming, and she was cumming with him. She forced her head back, and then let it fall backward to relax against the titan's chest. So close like this, trapped in his arms, she could feel him breathing, feel his muscles tense and flex with each spurt of his seed he poured into her, and feel his rumbling voice.

And she could feel his heartbeat. Blood, gallons of it, pouring through the enormous man's body, and being moved by a giant heart beating hard against the back of her head. Deep, rhythmic, enthralling.

“ ... yeah, let's go again,” Art said.

“W-What!? P-Please, I'm ... so tired ... need ... to...” To rest! She'd never cum this hard, ever, or for so long. She needed a break before she passed out.

The two of them worked together, lifted her enough so Art could set the head of his hard cock to her shivering lips, and ease her down onto his length. She whimpered openly, and as Art lay back once more, she fell forward as Matt released his grip on her body.

But it did not last. Even as white cum trickled out of both of her holes, Matt reached out for her arms, took her by the wrists, and pulled back on them enough to force her to dangle from them, a foot over Art's chest. With Matt holding her by the wrists, Art took her hips, and started to thrust upward into her, while Matt started to thrust as well.

The two of them, thrusting together, working like a machine of cogs. Both entered her, and then Matt withdrew several inches, and then Art a moment later. Matt would thrust into her, and then Art a moment later again. She could do nothing but bounce and whine as the two men fucked her, until the blush of life had her a sweating mess, and another wave of her juices spilled out over Art's cock.

She was in heaven. She couldn't say it though! Way too embarrassing, and with how overwhelming it was to have both men take her like this, she could never ask for it. But, trapped like this, with no way to stop the two wolves from ravaging her? Totally helpless to prevent their advances, aggression, and strength, as they fucked her pussy and ass? Part of her wanted to feel a little bad for indulging in such a stereotypical loss-of-power fantasy. A much larger part of her never wanted them to stop.

She came again. Matt didn't let go of her hands, holding them at his sides, so her torso dangled forward and over Art, shaking with each thrust. Her small breasts shook with the impact of their bodies against hers; not that they were fucking her too hard, but rather, she was so small that each impact made her whole body shake. The only thing keeping her in place was Matt's grip on her wrists, and Art's grip on her hips.

At some point, things started to blur. They weren't stopping. The only break she got was when the two of them both decided to thrust into her at the same time, and stay inside her as she came. Five seconds at most, of being allowed to cum without the two cocks inside her thrusting into her depths, before the two beasts started to fuck her again.

Matt let go of her hands. She collapsed, for what must have been the fourth time, and let her body rest along Art's wide body of iron as she came. Everything was soaked, and her insides felt tenderized, a little bruised, and would not stop convulsing in bliss. Each shock of orgasmic bliss exploded outward from her pelvis, reached up to her head, and down to her toes. Each had her quivering, and her squeals were reduced to pants and quiet whimpers as she struggled to get control of her body. It wasn't working. All she could do was lay there, and writhe.

Matt set his hands on her hips near Art's, and the two of them pressed down on her body. And as she lay there, trembling, they pushed down on her, trying to get as deep as they could as they came. Her pussy was already stretched to bursting, but Art wasn't satisfied, and he pressed down on her as he gently rocked her back and forth an inch, rubbing her clit against his soaked pelvis. Matthew did the same, leaning over her and pushing her ass to him until she was sure he was trying to reach her stomach.

They rocked her that single inch, back and forth in a gentle manner as the two beasts filled her with cum again, as they made quiet, deep, rumbling growls that vibrated through her. She couldn't cum anymore, and she didn't want to. Too much, way too much. She was glad to have a real break, and simply let the two animals pour their cum into her while she tried to recover.

At last she felt Matthew start to soften, and then Arturo. With Matthew the effect was a little more obvious, as she felt her ring muscles begin to tighten into their normal shape once more, while also leaking copious amounts of the white fluid from her. Such a mess, all over her sheets. And unlike hers, theirs wouldn't fade away! She'd need to shower, and do laundry, and shower again, and try and clean herself out a bit, and ... and she couldn't wait to do it again.

---

The three of them, in her shower. She was renting a very nice place, so the shower was big enough to handle even Matthew, plus her and Arturo.

She was standing between the two of them, and stroking each of them, their cocks heavy in her palms and filling her grip. No getting around how big they were compared to her.

“How can you t-two ... still be horny?” They’d both cum, fifteen minutes ago!

“Wet hair,” Matt said, and he ran his hands over her head and down the length of wet hair reaching to her butt. She did her best to not sigh with bliss.

“Definitely wet hair.” Arturo nudged his hips forward, and pressed his hard cock against her stomach. She still had the large phallus in her hand, but the angle and height difference gave him a lot of control.

Matthew took his friend’s queue, and also nudged his hips forward. Both of them were tall enough that, when they got in very close so both of their cocks pointed upward while resting against her, they pressed to her breasts.

She was blushing life, at their request, just so they could see her get aroused right along with them; which also meant her nipples hard again, and despite herself, she rubbed the tips of their shafts along them. Tingly little sparks made her shiver, and smile.

They’d had far too much sex. Way too much ... Way way way too much. She was sore, and tired, but her body didn’t seem to mind, and she could feel her pussy begin to ache with need again as she held their enormous shafts in her tiny hands, as they pressed against her body.

“Sensitive, aren’t you?” Matt said.

“ ... I ... d-d-d—”

Arturo set his hand on her shoulder, opposite of Matt. “Been a while since we’ve had a girl. But, none of them hold a candle to you.” His other hand’s fingers found hers, and slipped between them so both of them had a grip on his cock. “And none of them cum as hard or as much as you.”

Blushing life meant her dead heart pumped faked blood through her veins, made all the signs of human life show through, and that included blushing. Felt like her body would explode from all the embarrassment she'd suffered tonight.

She'd squirted all over Arturo, multiple times. Once from only anal! Soaked him in her juices. Lost control of all her muscles so she was just a writhing mess of pleasure, a live wire flopping and convulsing with the sporadic pulses of orgasm. And they knew it. Any and all pretense of disguising her, evidently, sensitive body were out the window.

Matt bent down, used his free hand to guide her chin up to him, and put a kiss on her lips. "Very sexy, very beautiful, and a total nerd."

"N-Nerd! I ... grrr." She frowned up at the giant. His smile was too sincere and honest for her to remain angry for long though, and she sighed as she felt her own smile force its way onto her cheeks. One minute, they were hard men, rough, growling and rumbling and pinning her down. The next, they were boys, silly and dumb and horny.

She got down on her knees.

Both of the wolves let out quiet groans as she took their cocks into her mouth. One, then the other, a hand on each of them to continue stroking their thick girths, while she took turns suckling on their tips. A kiss here, a kiss there, and within minutes, drops of precum rose to the surface to be licked away by her roaming tongue. She couldn't swallow it, since it wouldn't just fade to trace amounts of ash like a Kindred's fluids would. But, she could still use her mouth, and look up at the two titans towering over her as she bathed their cocks with her tongue.

Soon, Arturo was cumming. She withdrew her lips so only the head of his cock was in her mouth, and she lightly slid her suckling back and forth along the ripe glans as waves of his cum poured over her tongue. It flowed out of her mouth, down her chin, her neck, and down over her body, her breasts and stomach, only to all be washed away by the warm shower water that rained upon them. Then she took care of Matthew, turning her head to do the same for him, until his white cum was dripping down her body as well. And through it all, she stroked them both, tiny fingers squeezing and working their veined shafts, feeling the pliable but hard texture of them, the heat of them fill her palms.

Now, for her reward. Not that she didn't enjoy fellatio! Enjoyed it too much, to the point she could feel her juices mixing with the water as she forced herself back to standing, and reached up for Arturo's neck. He bent down, knowing what was coming, and grinned at her before his eyes disappeared beside her head.

She kissed his neck once, twice, and bit into him.

Warmth flooded her mouth, and she made her own, tiny, quiet little animal growl as felt a jolt of energy hit her exhausted body. Werewolf blood. Thick, powerful, delicious. The blood was so heavy compared to humans, so sweet, almost syrupy but not quite, and yet thick enough that she felt it coat her throat on the way down. Arturo let out a soft moan, and set his hands on her hips to lightly hug her, as the two of them enjoyed the Kiss.

At least at first. Another hand took her outer thigh, and then another found her pussy. She opened her eyes, but didn't stop drinking Arturo. No way she was going to stop, she was starving. But Matthew wasn't stopping either. In moments, he worked two of his fingers into her clenching insides, and his other let go of her leg only for his fingers to find her clitoris.

He started to finger her. Hard. She trembled and held onto Arturo's neck for dear life as Matt wasted no time, didn't build up to it, didn't prepare her for it, but simply took advantage of her already dripping hot state, and started to drive his fingers into her g-spot. The fingers on her clitoris were gentle, loving, caressing and massaging, while the digits inside her drove forward into her g-spot until her hips pushed into Art's legs. Not gentle, or slow!

In seconds, her body was quaking. Still she didn't let go of the wolf man in her arms, and she moaned onto his neck as she drank down the sweet red liquid. But, as she held onto him, her eyes rolled upward, and her legs started to tremble as her juices trickled out of her. How could her body want more already?

The only thing keeping her from collapsing was Arturo's hug on her hips, and the renewed strength his blood gave her. Much as the Kiss had her whole body feeling warm, fuzzy, and blissful, it also jolted her with life, energy, and pouring heat through her limbs. Mixed with Matt and his rough fingering of her insides, she moaned loudly into Art's neck, and let the waves of tingly bliss flow outward from between her legs, up into her head, and down into her toes. Waves like a wave pool, back and forth, each flowing with the pleasure of climax. Each making her drip juices down to her ankles with the shower water.

Finally she let of the beast, and fell backward. Matt stopped, and caught her, letting her rest against his shoulder since he was kneeling, and her head dangled over it backward.

"Stop! Stop, p-please, I ... I'm going ... t-to be so sore tomorrow." She was shaking, mewling, and hugging herself as she vibrated in the orgasm aftershocks. "T-Too much." And it was too much! Much as she'd enjoyed it, at a certain point you had to call it quits. Otherwise they'd exploit their inhuman bodies and simply fuck all night, every night.

Art made a growl again, but when she opened her eyes enough to look at him, she sighed relief. He wasn't aroused, at least not physically, and she could see the titan was struggling to stay standing. The Kiss, and blood loss, had a habit of doing that. He placed his hands against the shower wall, and let himself slowly sink down onto his ass, to catch his breath.

“I’m jealous,” Matt said.

“N-No you’re not.” She turned around and smiled at the juggernaut. “I’ll get you next t-time, ok?” Even with Matt on a knee, he was still tall enough to almost be eye level with her. Just meant she didn’t have to bend over very far to kiss him.

Kissing two boys, two different boys, was such a weird sensation. Part of her felt guilty every time, but the boys didn’t mind it at all; as long as they were both there when the clothes came off, they seemed perfectly happy with the arrangement.

“You really soaked us,” Matt said, and his hands reached out to take her shoulders to brace himself as he stood up. “Don’t remember you squirting like that on our first night.” So brazen, to say it so directly, and the man didn’t flinch or grin or blush or anything.

“I ... it ... it was ... r-really good.”

“Turning into a little hornball,” Art said.

She looked over her shoulder, and gave the exhausted man her best death glare. He only chuckled, and grinned at her.

“I have to admit, it is really, really hot,” Matt said. “Really ... really ... re—”

“No!” She poked the giant in the abs, his big dripping wet abs — focus! — and glared up at him. “It’ll be sunrise in thirty minutes. I n-need to check my messages, and go to the t-tower right after!” Sleeping at Antoinette’s place, trial run sort of thing. Had her nervous, very nervous. “You know K-Kindred die in sunlight, right? I have to hurry.” Wouldn’t even have time to check her messages.

“Fine, fine,” they said in unison, complete with annoyed sighs.

Ugh, boys. Dog with a bone.

---

---

~~Antoinette~~

Jack did not come to her tower.

She checked her phone again, and again, to see if her love had messaged her and she had not noticed. But there was nothing. She messaged him, and waited for his response. But there was nothing. She paced, long nightgown trailing behind her along the marble floor around her bed. Plans to hold the boy in her arms and fall asleep to the rising sun, dashed, as unease crept up her body. Where was Jack? Why was he not answering his phone?

Twenty minutes until sunrise, and Jack should have been in her bed, safe and sound. She glared at her phone, and squeezed it until she could feel the glass and metal within begin to bend. But, she did not break it. She needed it, in case the boy messaged her. And, she would need it, to receive Daniel’s messages, once she sent him on the hunt to find him.

Cold knives stabbed her feet into the black floor beneath her. Perhaps Jack was with Clara? The woman was interested in him, was beautiful, and the two had made some sort of connection during that incident with the ancient monster that had somehow manifested in her city’s tunnels. A mystery she was investigating; yet another hole in her knowledge. If Clara and Jack had—no, stop being infantile, silly woman. The boy loves you, Clara said so herself.

Antoinette grabbed the juvenile fear, strangled it dead, and tossed it aside. Jack was not with Clara, or if he was, it was not romantic. His disappearance was the cause of something else.

She marched out of her vault bedroom, and into a neighboring room where computers stood, ready to be used. The Invictus could be messaged with this, as she had long ago established the need to be able to communicate with the covenants by technology, in emergencies. And this was an emergency.

Was it though? Perhaps the boy was preoccupied, and ... no, Kindred were calculating and careful. They did not simply forget their arrangements or to check their phones. And with Barry's disappearance, now was not the time to be timid with conclusions.

First Daniel, then Natasha, then the thralls under her control. Then Julias. Then, the rest of the triumvirate. She messaged them all.

Jack is missing.

~~Julias~~

The bunker. It was a stretch to call it a bunker though. Viktor spared no expense, and had crafted himself a room of grand design, with an enormous, four poster bed of vermilion, a mirror to reach the ceiling of embroidered wood, wardrobes, and more. It was just as adorned and indulgent as the master bedroom of the mansion, except fifty feet below it, with a dozen gates of varying strength, each posing threats of their own. Traps with spikes and bullets and the like. And within the bunker room, an escape tunnel that lead into a random section of Devil's Corner in South Side, where the escape hatch was a hidden thing in a random wall of a random building in a random street.

Perfect for the ever paranoid elder vampire. Perfect for he and Triss to sleep, after they'd made love.

The two of them were facing each other, each on their side. She had her leg draped over him, the other parallel to his out along the sheets, with one arm snug between both their chests, the other reaching to hug him and hold him close.

He gently eased his hips forward, and sighed contentment into her hair as her pussy clenched down on him the whole journey. She'd already cum twice, and he was nearly to his own.

"Figured you'd want something a lot rougher and kinkier," he said, "after the sights we saw tonight." Antoinette must have said something to her that had changed her mood. Something about her seemed gentler, far gentler than he'd expected after the sexual madness of the ball.

"Yeah, but ... I like this. Can think about things while we fuck." She leaned in, kissed his collar and neck, and smiled a shark smile up at him.

"I was hoping you'd be thinking about the sex you're currently having."

"I am! I am." Chuckling, she squeezed him with her arm and leg, and pushed her hips forward to meet him. He could feel the metal piercing in her clit hood rub against him, along with her nipple studs. "But sometimes, a gentle fuck is the best fuck."

He nodded. True, very true, and he hugged her with his free arm as he continued to ease his hips back and forth. Like this, he could feel his warm cum building and building, but unable to escape, while drop after drop of his precum trickled out of him into her taut, massaging insides. Each drop was blissful, sending tingling waves of pleasure down into his pelvis, and he sighed with more pleasure as he again came near orgasm, and again slowed down to let the fluids settle.

“Did ... you notice how Jennifer was trying to get my attention all night?” she said.

“I thought I noticed that, yeah. Lot of looking at you, while she put on a show for everyone.”

“She has great tits doesn’t she?”

He chuckled again. He knew where this was going. “I admit, they looked nice. But I think I prefer ones with piercings and tattoos.”

More chuckles. Yeap, he found the sweet spot, words hitting her ego with just the right brevity and gentleness to make her smile, and put her weight on her elbow so she could prop her head up, inch a little away from him, and caress her breasts with her free hand. All the while, she kept her leg hooked over his hip, and her dripping lips sliding back and forth an inch around the base of his cock.

“My piercings are pretty awesome.” She caressed one hard nipple, and then the other, before tracing the snake tattoo. “Still ... her tits were ... really soft.”

Oh my.

“Touched her, did you?”

“I ... did. Sorry! Just, she was all over me when we were getting dressed.”

“Did she cross a line?”

“Just a little. But she backed off. She ... I don’t know, really wants to get between my legs.”

Maybe he could prod her a little, tease her. A little humor could go a long way to helping someone say what they wanted to say.

“Not attracted to me at all, is she? Seems she only wants you.”

“What? She is! She plenty is, really. Sure she would do you in a heartbeat. Just really seems to have her eyes on me. Dog with a bone.” She laughed again, and set her free hand on his chest to trace his muscles. “And ... she uh, genuinely does want to be my friend. Friend with benefits.”

“Is that so?” He grinned at her, and reached out for her shoulder. Licking his fangs, he pressed over and onto her, and then lay upon her, trapping her beneath his wider shoulders and body. All the while, still inside her, still gently fucking her so he could feel her depths stretch against the head of his cock. She liked deep, and he liked being deep inside her. And sometimes, it was nice to just bring the sex to a slow crawl, and stay that way for minutes at a time.

She smirked at him, one of those devious smirks, that made her look like an evil, seductive demon with her extra teeth. A moment later she had a pillow under her butt, and her arms around his neck and back.

“Sunrise is in, what, twenty minutes?” she said. “Hurry up.”

“Fine.” He feigned annoyance, groaning frustration, and it earned a chuckle from her. But chuckling turned into squeezing muscles, and she pushed her hips up to meet up as she purposefully clenched on him.

They hugged each other, melted into each other, and fucked a little faster, a little harder, just enough to cause the stirring warmth beneath his cock to build again. And this time, they kept the pace, until sweet release hit him and each clench of his muscles squirted the hot fluid into her soaked, squeezing body. He sighed, maybe even moaned a little, and she returned it with her own as she forced her hips up against him. A few strokes later, she was cumming, and Julias held her tighter as he felt her insides spasm and squeeze in random spurts, milking him until the pleasure was almost painful. Gentle, slow orgasms for the both of them, the sort that let them indulge in holding each other as much as the pleasure itself.

They held each other, hugged each other, and gently rocked their bodies back and forth as they each let the orgasm aftershocks work through their cores, their legs, thighs, and everything in between.

He sat up on his knees, and eased out his cock from her soaked, gripping lips. She had a tiny chain on her clit hood, dangling down half an inch, enough to tickle along her clitoris with every motion. And she mewled bliss as he rubbed his cum-soaked glans against it.

He rolled onto his back, lay beside her, and set his closer arm up behind the pillows so she could snug into the side of his chest. She did, and kissed his chest once, twice, and then nibbled on him a couple more times.

“Cumming at the same time? Ugh, so romantic it hurts.”

“Been a long time,” he said, “since I’ve had a woman I could do that with.”

“Maybe ... we could um ... see if we could get a third person ... in that rhythm?” Her attempts to be sneaky were so adorable, it almost broke his poker face.

“Like a kine on the regular?” he said.

“Um ... no ... come on you know who I’m talking about.”

“The Kindred with the nice, soft breasts?”

“Yeah, her! She who shall remain nameless.”

“Jennifer.”

Her frown was so large he could almost feel its aura. “You suck at this.”

He pulled her closer, so she had to slide up onto his chest a rest her cheek on his sternum, her arm draped over his body completely.

“Beatrice, I love you, and it’s not because of the sex, amazing as it is. You want to bring Jennifer into the bed? Go right ahead.”

“I know! I know ok, you just ... need to convince me.”

“Not like you to be so indecisive.”

She whined into his chest, quietly, and knocked her forehead against his sternum a few times, hard, and not so quietly.

“You remember the first time we went out?” she said. “You said you didn’t sleep with other vamps anymore. But you slept with me. And ... I ... I don’t know. For me sex is more than just fucking. I like this connection we have.”

His closer arm hugged around her shoulder, and his fingers traced along her back, her shoulder blades, before sliding up into her hair to comb it and massage her scalp.

“It’s up to you. Jennifer can get in the middle of this, but she can’t get in the middle of this.” The former being sex, the latter of course being what they were doing right now, hugging, snuggling, talking about things with emotions laid bare, unguarded.

“I think she likes me.”

“I think she likes you too.”

Triss raised her head, set her chin on his sternum, and looked at him with her snake eyes, curious and wary. “Think maybe she’s interested in me romantically? Cause that could get super weird.”

“Honestly? I doubt it. But you’d be better off asking Jacob.”

“Jacob ... asking that snake about romance? Can’t even begin to imagine how that’d go.”

She’d never met Minerva, she didn’t know what sort of man Jacob could be.

“I—” His laptop dinged. The joys of modern technology meant that, even down deep in the Earth, he had a computer connected to the internet via ethernet cable. And the unique ding sound was set up for one very specific person. “Shit.”

“Shit?”

“That’s the Prince.” He sat up as Triss moved aside a little, and reached for the laptop. He couldn’t let Triss see the contents, potential Invictus secrets and such, but she was smart enough to not peek anyway. “ ... Jack’s missing.”

“ ... seriously? Like missing missing?”

“Missing.”

“Sure he hasn’t—”

“He was supposed to go to the Elysium tower, both for Antoinette, and because it’s going to be his sleeping den until the city is secure. If he’s missing ... shit. Shit shit shit shit.” He jumped out of bed, and started to pace, naked and all. “Shit.”

“It’s like twenty minutes until sunrise Julias. We’ll have to—”

He put the laptop down on the desk by the bed, sat down, and got to work. Twenty minutes until sunrise? More than enough time to have every thrall and ghoul in the Invictus looking for him during the day.

---

---

~~Jack~~

Pain sucked.

Waking up from a hole in the chest was a weird sensation. But, there was no denying that's exactly what it was, a hole in his fucking torso, and enough awareness came to his groggy, pain-ridden mind to manage a peek at his chest to see the hole closing. And a moment later, more realizations kicked in. He could see his chest, which meant he wasn't in his suit anymore. Still had his pants and shoes on, but no jacket or shirt, so he was topless. He was sitting. It was dark. And, he couldn't move his hands.

Movement in the shadows, in the blur of silhouettes. He should have been able to see in the dark, at least a little, and he felt he should have been able to in this room as well, but his body was too busy healing the hole jammed through his ribs and the heart. Scalding pain, incinerating, like molten lead being poured into his chest. Felt like it was melting his intestines and boiling his lungs. He didn't need them anymore, vampire as he was, but they still felt pain, and the gargled groans of agony slipped out of him. A few moments later, they silenced as the pain faded to only a harsh ache. He was healed, at least enough to cover the hole and have his heart back to its correct, withered shape.

He looked to his left and right. Darkness, but no longer total darkness as his eyes adjusted. A tiny seam of light poked out at him from underneath some sort of door in front of him, taunting him with the subtle, glowing white. As his groans died off, the silence around him was broken only by the heartbeat and breathing of nearby humans, and as his eyes started to work, he could see their bodies against the walls of his dark enclosure. They had pistols in holsters at their hip, blurry in the black but enough he could see and recognize the shape. And, something in their hands glinted, caught the tiny bit of light from under the door. Large knives maybe, or small swords like many Kindred carried.

They weren't vampires. Vampires blushing life breathed and had heartbeats, body warmth, all the good stuff from their first lives, but it took more than that to suppress the aura a Kindred carried with them. An aura that, once you were close enough to feel it, any paranormal creature seemed to carry. Werewolves all felt like being near a Goliath with a lust for raw meat, and the Begotten felt like cold death crawling under the skin, like black venom swimming in shadows.

The strangers had none of that. He could smell the blood, the breath, the body odor of living things, but none of the extra stuff that came from the monsters that bumped in the night. They were human.

He sat up a little straighter. Metal chair. He tried to move his hands, and the rattling of metal on metal rung through the room. Concrete room then, based on the sound flutter. Room definitely needed some acoustic panels to help with—

“He’s awake.”

“I’ll get Jeremiah then.”

Jack winced as the darkness split, and a light cut across the dingy walls. Yeap, concrete.

A woman disappeared through the light and outside; enough time with the door open for him to see the door was metal, and outside the room he could see metal bars. A prison? There was a prison in Dolareido, and an old abandoned prison as well, in North Side. That’s where he was then.

Shirtless, chained to a chair, in a prison, after getting stabbed in the heart. Yeap, kidnapped. Ugh, why him? Why always him?

God damn it Damien, you jinxed it.

The woman who'd walked out of the room wasn't wearing a trench coat or leather jack, and didn't look like one of the women in the memories the crows had shared with him. Neither did the man still standing in the room. They both looked strong, and were armed with shotguns, and like he thought, large knives and pistols, complete with tattoos, scars, and worn street clothes. If he didn't know better, Jack would think he was looking at Carthians.

Maybe the two crows would come to his rescue, like Lassie or something? Doubtful. Animalism forced them to obey simple commands, and communicate with him. They weren't loyal. But, that could be kind of cool, loyal crows? Maybe he should try training some.

Entertaining fantasies to ignore the reality of the current situation. Wonderful.

A man walked in, and this guy was wearing a trench coat, brown. Still, not one of the four Jack expected either. This man was old, with pale skin sporting a few too many scars across his face and short, gray beard. Short gray hair combed backward showed a scar or two cutting across his forehead as well. And, Jack could see a hint of tattoos starting on his neck before disappearing underneath his black shirt.

Silence. The man looked at him, watched him, took the time to check him up and down and analyze the vampire. Gave Jack time to look him up and down, try and figure him out, figure out his situation. Other than the lighting from beyond the door, which was dimming now that his eyes were adjusting, there was no light to be had. He still had his shoes and pants, but he couldn't feel the weight of his phone in his pocket anymore. He was alone.

Alone, with humans, who knew what he was. For a second, he worried for the Masquerade, and what these kine might do with a Kindred in their possession. But then they'd have to go public, and they hadn't done that yet, hopefully. Find out later. First, find a way out of here.

"Hello Jack," he said. Gravely voice, hoarse, a bit deep, like he'd been smoking his whole life and singing too hard.

Jack met the man's gaze. Whoever this old man was, his faded blue eyes were hard, the sort of hard Jack figured you'd get if you were exposed to horrible things on a regular basis, like those movies set in the Vietnam war showed. Maybe military then, someone who'd worked their way up from private, and seen all the horrible things the barrel of a gun could accomplish?

Or the man just had that sort of look to him, and exploited it.

"Hello."

"Suppose you wonder why a bunch of humans have kidnapped you."

He called himself human. Guess that meant he knew he was a vampire for sure then. Made sense, stake in the heart and all that; or whatever they'd stabbed him with.

"You could say that."

The old man stood straight, and started to pace, combat boots landing lightly on the concrete. He was a little tall, this old man, and he had some thickness to his shoulders men his age usually didn't. Far as the beast in Jack's gut could tell, he was just plain old human through and through, except, that something was off. Like that time he had some tacos when he was younger, and something was off about the taste but he couldn't quite put his finger on it.

Food poisoning sucked. Not as much as a stake through the heart though. Delightful comparison.

“You’re taking this pretty well,” Jeremiah said. “Young guy like you, figured you’d be at least a little nervous.”

He was nervous. He was very nervous. But he was getting a lot better at his poker face. Besides, once he had a moment to get his bearings, he was going to brainwash these idiots and get the hell out of here.

“Not sure what to say to that.”

Jeremiah shrugged, and grabbed another chair beside Jack to sit in it reversed, facing him. “Don’t think we’ll kill you?”

“I ... guess you might. But you did kidnap me, so, I doubt you’ll kill me.”

“Yet.”

“ ... yeah, yet. Until I tell you what you want to know.”

“Exactly.” Jeremiah kept his gaze, and kept the door open too. Wasn’t trying to hide where they were then. “First, how much do you know about me?”

Jack remained silent. He knew nothing about this man, except that he was probably linked to those four humans he was on the lookout for. But he had to keep some control of the situation, and not letting the man know what he knew or didn’t know about him was better than nothing.

“ ... ok, Ventrue, try it.”

“W-What?”

“Try it.” The old man leaned in closer, and after pausing for a moment, slid the chair closer so he was only a foot from Jack, and staring him in the eyes. The man’s poker face was infinitely better than Jack’s; or he was just that sure of himself. “Try dominating me.”

Jack pulled his head back a few inches, but couldn’t get very far with the chair behind him not moving. It wasn’t moving? He looked down, and groaned. The feet of the chair were bolted to the ground. He turned his head again, and now with some light, he managed to look over his shoulder and get a glimpse of the handcuffs on his wrists. The cuffs holding him weren’t regular looking handcuffs, and they had weird, white symbols etched into the black metal. Normal hand cuffs he might be able to break, but these laughed at his attempts to even bend them.

Not good. Very not good. And, when he looked back to Jeremiah, tried to meet the man’s gaze again, he could feel the wall in the man’s eyes. A steel wall. Jack tried, stared into them, reached down into his gut with vitae as best he could, but nothing happened. He dug harder, groaned, growled as he let the beast in his guts fight against the barrier. Nothing happened.

“Nice cuffs, right?” Jeremiah reached out, and took him by the chin. “Daeva or Nos might be able to break them with some raw strength. You though?” The old man squeezed on his chin hard enough to hurt, and shook his head around a little before letting him go. Hard fingers.

A small twitch of the man’s eyebrow gave away that he was thinking about something else as he said it. More than just the cuffs then? What other tricks did these people have? He knew about the bloodclans, which meant he must have been doing this hunter gig for a long time, and was good at it.

“ ... how’d you sneak up on me?”

Jeremiah shook his head. “Secret.”

“I’m your prisoner. And ... and I’m guessing you’re going to kill me once you know what you want to know, I—”

The man smirked, and shook his head again. “We’re not here for you vamps, Jack.”

“ ... you’re not?”

Jeremiah shrugged, like the conversation was casual, breezy. “No, we’re not.”

“How do you know my name anyway?”

“We’ve been watching.” He shrugged again, and reached into his pocket to pull out a smartphone. Not Jack’s though, his own, and he brought it up to show Jack a picture of a burned building. Barry’s.

“Barry, you—”

“Your fellow vamp stumbled onto my work. Couldn’t let him see where I was setting up shop.” Jeremiah nodded a few more times, each subtle, each weighed with some secret or hint Jack couldn’t piece together, each painting a picture of history from his face, of killing vampires on the regular, like it was natural.

And the man had a powerful face, the sort of face you might expect to find behind a cigar’s tiny flame in the dark, with a knife in one gloved hand and a severed beast’s head hanging by the hair in the other.

“I’ve seen your shop though, so you’ll—”

“This old prison? No, this ain’t where I work. But it made for a decent site in an emergency like this.”

“ ... what about Barry?”

“That vamp? Shotgun to the head.” He shrugged, like he’d squashed a bug. “He resisted, and you don’t trust a vamp. You act fast, before they slip away into the dark, like the cockroaches you are.”

Jack pulled his head back, and stared. The man said cockroaches as matter-of-factly as someone describing literal cockroaches. Jack expected to see some hate there too, but if there was, it was the hate people had for ants. This man, this human, would kill Jack not because he hated him, but because he didn’t give a shit about him. This man considered his life as valuable as an insect.

The shivers started, trembling in his feet. Cold, like ice, started to work up his naked spine, and he felt the old urge to breathe in pants come back. He didn’t pant, didn’t show that he was starting to panic, didn’t show the stabbing ache that was starting to creep up through his muscles, the urge to flee tensing them. But the rattling of the cuffs was more than enough for the man to know what was happening to him.

“You burned down the apartment building.”

“I stirred the nest killing a vamp, so I watched who would come check it out. You can learn a lot by watching the fallout.”

This guy came watching? But he wasn’t one of the four. Or were they his lackeys? The man and woman he saw in his cell weren’t the four either though.

“ ... what do you want?”

“You kid, are going to tell me about Azamel and Athalia.”

Oh fuck.

“I ... don—”

“Let’s skip this part of the interrogation, and jump right to the good stuff, ok? I already know you’ve talked with Athalia and Azamel. I already know they’re monsters.” The old man leaned in closer, and stared him down. “Angela, get in here.”

The door creaked, and another person walked in, a woman, a bit tall, a bit thin, dark skin and short black hair, very short, almost buzzed like his. She too was covered in scars, including one across the eye. It cut deep, and Jack inched his head back as he realized the eye with the scar was a glass eye. The softness of her face didn’t match the steel, hard gaze.

She had a blowtorch in her hands.

“Angela here doesn’t really care for vamps.” Jeremiah shrugged, got up, and started pacing, body crossing the line of light that cut across the floor and onto Jack’s helpless body. “Bad history.”

Yeah, he was hearing that a lot lately.

“I don’t know anything about Azamel.” He sighed, shook his head, and struggled a little more. But as he struggled, Angela came in closer, and smirked at him as she took Jeremiah’s seat for herself. And just like Jeremiah, her eyes shut him down, locked him into his mind, put a dead halt on any attempt to break her with a domination discipline. It had to be the cuffs, right? Then why did it feel like it was Jeremiah and Angela blocking him instead, the same way an elder Kindred might if Jack was trying to dominate them.

Who the fuck were these people?

The woman smiled at him, took out a lighter, and flicked on it a few times, each creating a spark, each dancing along the blowtorch she held it near.

“You were seen talking with Athalia.” Jeremiah came up behind him, and set his hands on Jack’s shoulders. “And we know that, at some point, you took a visit to see the old monster yourself, down in the tunnels.”

“How...” How did they know that? How long had they been in Dolareido? What the fuck was going on?

“Nevermind the how.” Jeremiah walked around some more, slowly circling the captured vampire and the crazy woman with the blowtorch. Easy to tell she was crazy, or at the very least eager to do things to him with that blow torch; it was in her eyes. “Tell me everything you know about Azamel and Athalia. Mark too, while you’re at it.”

Mark. Azamel’s other companion that Jack had never seen. No mention of Fiona though. Good.

“You can’t seriously think she told me anything important.”

“Why not? Seems you’re pretty important. Had the Prince’s attention.”

How the fuck did these hunters see into the Invictus ballroom? How did they get so close to him with Damien near?

Or, did Damien betray him? That was a possibility, and one he wasn’t eager to dwell on. If Damien had betrayed him, decided to get revenge for Lucas, handing him over to some hunters after Azamel was an easy way to make that happen. Or worse, he’d told Maria what he did to Lucas, and the two of them had betrayed him.

No proof though. Don’t jump to conclusions like a Gangrel.

“The Prince and I are a couple. But I have no pull with her or Azamel or Avery.”

“Avery?” Angela said. First time she’d opened her mouth, and Jack flinched back when she said it.

They didn't know Avery? Oh shit, shit. Think think think think.

“One of the Invictus, from another city, I ... I can't tell you anymore.” Poker face, do your best god damn poker face before these fucks cut off your fingers for lying.

The old man snarled, but shrugged, and rubbed a thumb across his beard. “Probably someone on Forner's radar. Not my business, and I don't want to step on his toes.” He came closer again, and put his hand on the back of the chair Angela was sitting in. Pupil, maybe? “Describe to me exactly what you saw when you visited Azamel.”

He could tell them, but then Azamel would find out. From what the others told him, if he pissed her off, that meant dead Kindred, that meant a monster they were trying to hold at bay with explosives flipping the fuck out and going on a rampage.

“I ... can't do that.” Christ he wanted to. He knew pain, he knew what unbearable agony felt like when Viktor had split his face and chest apart. He didn't want more of that, he just wanted to get back to Antoinette and curl up in her arms. “You don't know what she's capable of. If she finds out I've betrayed her, she'll—”

“Don't know?” The old man laughed again, hoarse, gritty. And as he laughed, he pulled out his knife, a large knife, and slammed it down against Jack's leg. The resounding ding of the metal blade hitting the metal chair, after having passed through his femur, resonated against the concrete walls.

It took a few seconds for his mind to realize what just happened, and then, bury him in the waves of torrid pain. A second later, for a scream to break through.

“Kid, you don't know shit about Azamel.”

~~Eric~~

The woods.

He shouldn't have been in the woods. He should have been in his apartment, feeding his dumb cat Kat, and getting ready for his job. New job, right. Bouncer, or something akin to.

But he wasn't doing that. He wasn't in his suit. He wasn't smiling at his bank account numbers. He wasn't worried about any of it either. The only thing on his mind, was his territory, and the pursuit of prey.

He looked down. Paws. Fur. He looked around. Rocks, earth, grass, and the moonlit sky. And he sat upon a rock, a large one that overlooked some of where the forest met the mountain, where he could get a feel for his territory before he resumed looking for food.

He was an animal, a beast, and with his pack, they'd bring down mighty prey.

Except, there was no pack. Just him. Just him, sitting on the rock, and caring for himself, alone. Something wrong with that. Something comforting about that too.

He looked at the moon, and let its grand light encompass him, bury him until his breath came to a halt. Tonight, the moon changed shape constantly, quickly, blinking her gaze over him as it revolved through its different phases. Tonight, the moon spoke to him, angelic, overwhelming, burying, and crushing.

Demanding.

“Breathe!”

And all at once, the moon stopped upon the Gibbous phase, and slammed him into the ground with blinding light.

---

He sat up in his bed, fast, almost whiplashing his neck, and sending his cat darting across the room. Sweat soaked his sheets, more of the same, cold sweat. Nightmares. Or not? He didn't mind the dream. If anything, he wanted to go back to it. Then why was he having this cold sweat again?

He looked at his hands in the dark. Since he'd started working night jobs, he'd started using blackout curtains to block out the light. But it wasn't enough, and he'd set up Velcro tape on the curtains to make sure they were snug to the wall, to block out all the light, every shred of it. So dark he normally couldn't see much beyond silhouettes once his eyes adjusted.

Now, he could see far more than silhouettes. He could see the grooves of his knuckles, and he could see where his heartbeat was pounding against his wrist, the radial pulse, like it was trying to jump out of his body.

Breathe, just breathe.

Groaning, he turned and set his feet to the tile floor. Cold, but not cold, like someone was running ice up and down his back, while his feet and hands and head were boiling. His body didn't like it, and neither did he. He groaned some more, and turned on the light.

"Fuck!" He threw his hands up to his eyes to block out the scorching flash. Searing pain dug into his eyes until they were filled with tears. He leaned forward, rested both hands against the wall, and forced his eyes open to stare at the floor as he opened the door. The pain slowly faded, but not before he felt his pulse in his eyes as well. At least it was slowing.

"Kat, you ok?"

She sat by the open door, and meowed.

“Right. Food.”

His body was heavy, and he had to brace himself along the tiny hallway wall as he walked toward the kitchen. God awful little apartment, and he couldn't wait to get a better one, once he started getting paid, once he got Montel and his maggot Pitt their money.

He perked up, and smirked as he reached for some coffee grounds. That Jessy woman had said she'd take care of that for him; and, despite himself, he believed her. This random stranger, who really seemed like nothing more than a horny woman, a bit younger than him, trying to show off her attitude, had something to her he couldn't dismiss. He felt it from her, from the other tiny girl, and even the redhead; something different from her, but something similar too. Not that it meant they were trustworthy, but he couldn't dismiss the feeling that she wasn't bullshitting him. And they'd known who Montoya Montel was too.

It was a nice change of pace. People bullshitting him was as common as breathing, back when he was a professional. Hopefully that trend in his life was over, or at least abated.

He went through his usual routine. Scooped the cat litter, drank some coffee, ate some shit food, took a shower, brushed his teeth, got Kat some fresh food, and then started the new routine. First, a treat in her food while he went to put on his suit. And then, once he was changed, a laser pointer to keep her at a distance and cat hair away from his suit. Another treat in her food bowl — poor girl was going to die young and fat at this rate — and then out the door while she was distracted.

Time for another night of standing around, surrounded by sex and drugs and money and everything in between.

---

The lovely sound of pulsing music and pulsing hearts. Ugh.

He stood in a corner, and tried to keep to himself. Ganders wanted him to socialize, but tonight, socializing wasn't feeling like too good an idea. Which, as Ganders predicted, seemed to invite the attention of a certain clientele. Single women, and the occasional man, sought his attention, tried to engage in conversation with him, and the more he tried to tell them to go away without quite saying that, the more interested they became.

So tonight he tried staying in the dark, and just watch.

The four people came in again, the two men and two women, each with eyes glancing around, reading the environment, the people around them, like any dangerous animal would. And as he stared at them, he adopted an innocent stance, pretended he wasn't watching them; at least, not watching them anymore than the rest of the club. They glanced his way, he offered the same semi-nod he offered everyone, and he turned his head to watch randoms, while keeping them in the corner of his eye. These four were not like the others, and he needed to watch them.

The other bouncers didn't notice. He could see they were watching the more obvious dangers, the big guys who got handsy, the women who leaned toward their purse like they might have something in there that wasn't legal or safe, and all the people who crept around more than was normal. It was a hard job, spotting those subtle nuances, when everyone at Bloodlust was all over each other, and everyone was at least some degree of sneaky, shady, or drunk.

But these four were different. All the others, every one of them, he could safely slot into his mind as not a threat; maybe annoying, but not a threat. The four though, with the jackets, the scars, the way they walked, the way they watched people in the corner of their eye without actually looking at them, like Eric did, these four were most definitely a threat.

And yet, they did nothing. Hell they didn't stick around for very long. They made some hand motions, subtle, mostly near their hips or when their hands were resting on tables, and the others picked up on it without ever moving their head to directly stare at the movements. Always about subtlety with these four, the sort of people who didn't just have things to hide, but were very practiced in hiding them.

He could smell the strange smells again. Metal working, wood, odd smells that didn't belong to Dolareido, that didn't mix in with the smell of life and alcohol. How he knew what smells didn't belong to Dolareido, he had no fucking idea, but the instinct was there, in his mind, screaming for him to notice. These people didn't belong, and they were dangerous. And, he could only relax once they were gone.

He sighed as they left, and forced himself to breathe. Just breathe, in, out, relax.

Five minutes later, Fiona came in, and his muscles tensed all over again. She wasn't wearing the same green dress as last time, and instead opted for a white tank top and black pants. It might have been a bit boring, if not for her vibrant red frizzy hair, and the large breasts filling the top.

This place really was doing a number on his brain. Half the time he was looking for threats, the other half the time he was doing his best to push down his sex drive.

Fiona looked around, and around, and then around some more. When her eyes found him, she grinned, waved, and hopped over through the dancing and bumping bodies, past the drinks and fondling and dance floor.

“Eric!”

“ ... hello.”

And like they were friends, best buds, she grabbed his hand and pulled him into a nearby empty booth.

“Eric! Have ye seen Jack?”

“ ... Jack?”

“Jack! Wee lad, buzzed head, adorable. Oft has a very tall woman on his arm.”

Little guy, buzzed head, tall woman? Didn't ring any bells.

“Oh ... wait.”

“What, what what!?”

“The manager mentioned the woman. White hair?”

“Aye!”

“Mentioned her, said she was to be given her space and treated with respect. That was it. I've never seen them though.” Plenty of types came into Bloodlust. Short, tall, small guys with tall girls, small girls with tall guys, and everything in between. But the manager had been pretty insistent about this super tall girl with white hair. Stay out of her way, or you get canned.

“Oh ... damn it.” She whined, threw up her hands, and grabbed his wrist. “I have to find him! Everyone's looking for him! Damien said there were these four folk, and they might have taken him. And—”

“Four people?”

“Aye! Two men, two women.” She scratched her head a few times as she thought about it. Girl wore her thoughts on her sleeve, like her emotions. “One dark skin, two with tan skin, one with white skin, I think he said. Some scars on them too.”

Yeah, that was them. He winced, and looked out to the crowd, to the jumping people, to the numbing sound of the heartbeat music. Tell her? Not tell her?

He took a moment to look at the panicked girl beside him. Yeah, those four people were dangerous, with edge that screamed hidden knife. As a fighter, he knew to fear the quiet guy who could look you in the eye. The loud ones were all talk, and the ones that couldn't maintain eye contact were pushovers, but it was the quiet ones that stood their ground that got his skin crawling and adrenaline jacked. Those four sent the same chills along his skin and up his spine, got him looking for when one of them would strike out, like a quiet snake waiting for the right moment.

And then there was Fiona. Bubbly, silly, ridiculous, curvy little Fiona. Fiona that looked so delightful and innocent, and fun. Fiona that made him want to avoid the shadows, afraid she was hiding in them, ready to rip out his innards. He couldn't tell why, couldn't see why, couldn't smell or hear or notice anything about her that made him think she was dangerous; and yet, he knew she was. Her friends Jessy and Natasha were dangerous as well, in the way a prowling, hunting animal was, and that was a danger he could understand. Not sure why they were dangerous either, but it was clear to see in their movements, their stances, the way they looked at people, that they were dangerous too. Christ, so many people he wouldn't have noticed before, and now they were sticking out like sore thumbs.

But with Fiona, every instinct he had told him she was more than dangerous. She was terrifying.

She raised a brow at him. He wasn't talking, he was thinking, and staring into the crowd. And he wasn't breathing. Just breathe. He forced his lungs to move, and looked down at her.

"Ye do that dark and brooding thing very well," she said.

"... takes practice." A stupid little joke.

Stupid little joke worked. She erupted into laughter, and pat him on the arm. “Ye dobber!”

He tried to smile, but it didn’t work. Tell her, not tell her, tell her, not tell her. God, what the fuck happened? In just several days he’d gone from driving a taxi, to being surrounded by sex, drugs, bad music, and the sort of people he was sure were doing crazy shit by moonlight. And, as for moonlight, he was going out of his god damn fucking mind, and the moon was haunting him every dream, every nightmare. And for the fucking life of him, he could not stop this overwhelming urge to ... to who fucking knows what. Something with ripping, tearing, biting.

“Ye’re doing it again.”

“Sorry, just ... I have seen those four.”

“Oh? Tell me, tell me!”

“Just ten minutes ago.”

“Perfect! Let’s follow them!”

“ ... I’m working. And my shift just started.” The night was very young.

“Yer boss wulnae mind!”

“ ... and they’re long gone by now, how do you expect me to find them?”

Fiona raised a brow in confusion, but soon raised both as realization dawned on her face. No what idea what she was realizing, but it had her scooting in closer on the booth seat, and leaning in to whisper.

“Ye dinnae ken, do ye?”

“ ... know what?”

“What’s happening to ye.”

He drew his head back, frowned, and glanced around. “Nothing’s happening to me.”

She rolled her eyes and elbowed him in the side. “Come on! Ye can tell me. Avery must have ... must have ... have nae talked to ye, has she? Does she even ken who ye are?”

He stared at her. Avery? What?

“Fiona I don’t—”

“I shouldnae intervene! Nope. Nope nope nope. But ... but I need to find Jack.” She leaned in closer, and reached to pull down on his shoulder until his ear was to her lips. “Help me and I’ll tell ye why ye feel different. Why ye’re ... why ye want to hunt things.”

Hunt. Hunt was the word he was dancing around, refusing to acknowledge, keeping at a distance. He wanted to hunt. He wanted to chase something down, sink his teeth into it, rip it apart, and devour it. He wanted to know his territory, scan for threats, chase them off, and own his land. He wanted to ... do the crazy shit he was seeing in his dreams.

“How do you know that?” Should have kept denying it, but she’d nailed the feeling so accurately, he couldn’t just ignore it. How the fuck this girl knew what was happening to him, he couldn’t imagine, but then he couldn’t figure out why he was so fucking scared of her either.

At this point, he was totally mind-fucked, and this girl seemed to be the only one offering an answer.

“I’ll tell ye ... if ye help me follow those four.”

“But I told you they’re gone.”

She shrugged. “Follow yer nose.”

Oh god, she was serious.

Chapter 47

~~Antoinette~~

The next evening was not a pleasant one. She'd hoped to awaken to news from her thralls of the boy's whereabouts. She'd awoken to despair.

"Why am I not out in those streets, Daniel?"

"Because we're trying to find a needle in a haystack, Annie." The man stood and watched out over the city along with her, the two of them by the large window in her office, at the top of her Elysium tower.

"I am an extra pair of eyes!"

"You know that's not how you find someone in a city."

Her hands were in fists at her side, squeezing, clenching, shaking.

"It is my city."

"It is."

"And I should be able to find anything within its veins."

"You know that's not true. Millions of people, thousands of streets, tens of thousands of buildings, and a billion places to hide anything and anyone." The man shook his head, and gestured to the desk behind them, her main desk. The laptop upon it displayed various messaging windows she had used to communicate with the Invictus, and Natasha as well, about the boy's disappearance.

Part of her was tempted to tell Jacob or Garry, but she could not trust those two. Jacob may have been playing games with her, tormenting her by stealing away her love, while Garry may have been making a move for power. The man had been somewhat quiet, less aggressive than usual, at the ball. There had been times when Garry was quiet in the past, and it was purely because he was in a quiet disposition. Sometimes a cigar was a cigar, after all. But there had been times when his quiet behavior was a precursor to aggression against the Invictus.

And Jack was not Ordo Dracul, he was Invictus, a target for those such as Garry. That alone presented problems, as the Invictus would no doubt suspect her in some sort of trickery as well. Perfectly reasonable suspicion; it would not be the first time she had manipulated them to dance to her tune.

Still, Jack was missing, Julias confirmed it. The Invictus were looking for him, regardless of their potential suspicion of her.

She wanted more. She wanted to demand Garry search for her love. Demand it of Jacob. Demand it of Avery. Demand it even of that abomination Azamel.

“... should I bring this to the attention of the werewolves, and the monsters, my sheriff?”

“I’m sure Avery already knows. And Azamel probably does by now too.”

“And you are sure it was not your friend Athalia that is responsible? The entire Kindred population saw her speak with Jack.” And every ounce of willpower Antoinette had went into stopping herself from marching down to confront Azamel and her subordinates about that conversation. “Perhaps she spoke to my thralls, and is working with them, manipulating them, falsifying their reports?”

“I ... can't imagine she'd do that. Azamel might, but why would she? It's the Invictus she has a problem with, and the Invictus won't bend over backward to save their youngest Kindred. Jack isn't the bargaining chip Azamel needs with them. And, revenge against the grandchilde of the man Athalia hated, a dead man, seems too insane even for Athalia.”

She glared at her companion, stared at him with all the fury her eyes could muster. And the man returned it with a quiet, calm, almost cold gaze, before adjusting his glasses again.

Her fury broke, and she sighed as she stepped in closer to the window, to gaze out through the wall of glass from only an inch away. He was right, after all. While the Invictus would attempt to save their young neonate Jack Terry, ultimately, he was not of grand importance to the covenant. Of grand importance to Julias individually, as to her, but Julias was intelligent enough, wise enough, to not let his love of his childe destroy the Invictus if such an ultimatum were ever presented to him.

She was not so sure she could be that heartless anymore, not after Jack had touched her soul, ripped the roots clear that shackled her depths, deep down in the lingering black.

It had only been an hour since the sun had set. In that time, she received three hundred and twenty-seven reports from her dozens of thralls, all of which were of no value or use, except for one. A mention of four humans, seen together, skulking about. But attempts to pursue them by the two thralls that had spotted them were quickly rendered fruitless, as the four humans vanished.

She knew of these four. She had read the Invictus reports her network of spies had uncovered; nothing significant. But the report had mentioned four individuals seen more often, kine, with scars. They suspected hunters. And now, so did she.

For all her power, for all her intelligence and experience, it was her and Daniel running the city, two Kindred against hundreds. She controlled the ebb and tide of power, the flow of money and influence of Kindred and organizations alike. Macro, the Invictus would call it, macro management. To be the one in the street, giving orders, partaking in the hands-on digging for clues and evidence, that was not her purview. And no matter how logical that assessment was, how correct it was for her to be giving her orders from above where they had the greatest effect, it still hurt. She wanted to be in those streets, looking for her love with her own eyes.

Perhaps she was overreacting? No, it was foolish to think that Barry's death and the sighting of these four suspicious kine had nothing to do with Jack's disappearance. And Kindred were paranoid creatures by nature. They did not simply disappear for no reason, especially not at Jack's age, and especially not in the modern world, where technology had made constant communication as easy as it was. She had called him twice more upon awakening, texted him, but again, there had been no answer.

"Natasha's out there," Daniel said. "She's plugged into the network. Any thralls find traces of Jack, she'll know. And I'm sure Mire's got his own feelers out."

"Yes ... I know." And it was not enough. Not enough. "We should have looked into these suspicious kine earlier."

"We let the Invictus run much of the city so we can focus on our own affairs, Annie. You know that."

"Perhaps that is not enough anymore? We toil, exploring what mysteries lay beyond our grasp, for centuries now!" She grit her teeth, and forced her nerves to calm. A moment later her hair was pulled over her shoulder, and she combed it with both sets of fingers as she watched her city beneath her. “When the greatest joys are to be found within our reach, within our presence.”

“ ... you want to stop?”

“No. When the secrets of existence are so near, to be beyond our grasp is but a question of time. Still, this dilemma has made it painfully clear that without the closer things, our second lives are ... void of value.” Void, in general. “If he is dead, Daniel, I ... I do not know what I will do.”

Her old friend winced, an expression she did not see him carry often. And as he came closer, he gave her a single, gentle touch of the shoulder, and stood by her to watch the city beneath them.

Neither of them said what had become too strong a reality to ignore. Jack’s disappearance was killing her, and threatening her objectivity, threatening her abilities as Prince. She would be quite the fool to abandon her role as Prince, abandon her role in the Ordo Dracul, in order to join Jack in romance, and protect him for all the years to come. And she would be quite the fool to abandon Jack, who wrested her soul from atrophy and sparked life into its withered corpse.

No matter the hardships her second life threw at her, should would find a way to have both. And with time, Jack would grow to become a Ventrue worthy of fearing, a greater power than his grandsire or even his sire, relative to their ages. With time, he would become as like her, a rock against the tide.

But it would be decades until he was strong enough to face the more dangerous threats of their second lives, and until then, she could only offer so much protection.

“ ... sometimes, my old friend,” she said, “I remember the faces of mothers and fathers as their sons went to war, almost seventy years ago. Do you remember?”

“Sometimes.”

“Some nights, I would hear crying, mothers learning of the deaths of their sons. Wives, who lost their husbands.” She stopped combing her hair, and let her hands fall as weights at her side. “Only now do I understand such pain, the desire to protect with all your soul, that which you cannot protect.”

Forever wiser than she, her old friend said nothing, and gazed upon the streets below them. Asphalt, black veins through the body of her greatest accomplishment, Dolareido. Her greatest accomplishment, and now her greatest enemy.

---

---

~~Beatrice~~

Julias left the moment the sun set. He did his best to be lovey-dovey with her, to kiss her and say ‘I love you’ and stuff, but she shooed him away. No time for the romantic stuff when shit hit the fan.

As for herself, she had no idea what to do. Jack was missing, and with all the shit that’d been going on lately, she doubted it was an accident or coincidence, especially not with the girlfriend the kid had. Antoinette was wearing the pants in that relationship, and it’d be a bad idea for Jack to piss her off.

Plus, why would he want to? The two oddballs really loved each other, and with a rack like that, no way the kid wasn’t doing everything in his power to fall asleep on those things every dawn.

She slapped herself in the forehead. Stop. Thinking. About. Sex.

Crouched, upon the edge of a roof between North and South side, not too far off from the canyon where the Circle of the Crone liked to sleep. She needed to pay him a visit. Jacob had mentioned to her that they’d be preparing defensive measures of their cave, in case someone managed to discover it. Unlikely, with how well it was hidden in the unclimbable canyon's base, but shit happened, and you didn't get to live to be Jacob's age without compensating for the shit-happens factor.

She jumped along the rooftops, and soon down into the canyon. Jagged rocks and steep cliff faces meant you weren't getting down here without a pulley system or something similar. Dangerous for even her to scale. Each step a trap capable of breaking a leg, each hand hold ready to break apart or slice open the fingers. But soon she was down in the crag, sharp rocks and prickly bushes everywhere.

She crouched low through the darkness and found the opening of the cave, and crouched lower again to move through the tiny opening. Didn't get far though, before she ran into bars. Giant, thick, spiked, metal bars.

“What the fuck.”

“Beatrice Damor?” A voice in the black, one she didn't recognize.

A man came out, wearing nothing but a robe like Jacob would probably wear, dark brown and leathery. Maybe in his thirties, healthy, strong looking man, and now that he came closer, she managed to recognize the silhouette of his body and blur of his face. This was one of Jacob's thralls.

“They got a thrall to guard the gate?” She laughed and leaned her crouched body against the tiny tunnel wall. “Any Ventrue or Daeva could break your mind and have you open the door.”

A sudden light forced her to block its glow with her hands until her eyes adjusted. Once she could see again, she squinted at the man, and the small candle he was holding. There was something around his neck, a necklace, something made of bone. It reeked of Jacob.

“The Master has protected me from such mental control. I guard the gate, until the city is safe once more.”

Anti-brainwash necklace? That was pretty awesome, actually.

“Cool. Let me in.”

“Yes, Beatrice.”

Oh god he really was a slave, a mindless servant sort of type. He had a small smile that never went away, the sort of person who was happy to serve their master. Well, the blood bond did that. Three tastes and you were bound to your master, devoted to them, for months, years even.

Kindred weren't immune to the blood bond. She had to visit Damien and see how that was going, cause the two hadn't even made eye contact at the ball. Hell they'd made damn sure to not even look each other's direction during the whole fiesta.

The thrall disappeared around the corner, back into the depths of the cave. And just as she was about to call out to get the fuck back here, the bars slid away, disappearing into tiny holes in the little cave wall. When the fuck did Jacob get this set up? Must have always been there, just never activated. And she doubted the bars could be taken out with anything other than a nuke. Made the cave a pretty damn safe place to stay then.

She crept through the tunnel, and winced as she heard the loud screech of rock and metal scraping against each other, bars sliding back into place.

Everyone was home. Hell, everyone was actually together, standing around the blood bowl. More candles were lit than usual, some thralls and ghouls wandering around and lighting them, tending to them, making sure they bathed the room in a pleasant, creepy-as-fuck glow that highlighted the array of bones and skulls along the walls with defined shadows.

Aaron, Othello, and Jennifer. Each wearing robes similar to the thrall at the door, each watching Jacob as old eyeless, not wearing his eye bandage, dragged a finger across his chest to bring forth some Kindred blood. Thick, heavy, the powerful liquid coated into a single drop upon his fingertip, and he dandled his fingers over the blood bowl before him to let it fall into the red.

This blood bowl was a pale comparison to the one she'd seen in the secret underground lair in Three Kings Cemetery, and she was fucking thankful for that. No corpses dangling over this thing, dripping old, cold blood into it. No screams echoing in the walls. And the moving shadows were caused by flickering candlelight, not the stuff of nightmares.

She almost asked what was going on, but that'd have been pretty dumb. The atmosphere screamed silence, and maybe some chanting. No chanting though, much as it would have fit, but everyone kept quiet as they watched Jacob work his magic, his ritual. And, as Beatrice came in closer, she felt the chill work up her spine again, the same chill as that time in the cave.

“Beatrice,” Jacob said, his gaze still on the blood ... she thought. Hard to tell, being empty eye sockets and all.

“Jacob.” Hushed voices, as if volume would shatter the power of what they were doing.

Aaron and Othello stepped aside, and she stepped between them. The five of them, standing around the blood bowl. And just as she was about to make a stupid comment about her lack of proper fashion, Jen came around the group and tossed a robe over her shoulders. The woman smirked at her, adjusted the robe a little, made sure to spend a little more time than necessary adjusting it around her chest, then went back to stand where she'd been.

They did this every so often, watched Jacob do his work, to get glimpses into the true nature of the Circle of the Crone, and the Crone goddess herself, whatever the fuck that was. Occasionally, Jacob described various roles in the organization's structure during these demonstrations. The Whore, the Hero, the Maiden, the Fool, Father and Mother, Hermit, and others. Jacob had, on occasion, referred to himself as the Father of this particular little pod of witches, and also, the Fool.

The rest of them though? He gave no role. Or rank for that matter, other than that they served him. Serving him, for the most part, meant doing whatever the fuck they wanted. But, on occasion, he had requests for them, like the time Beatrice was sent to spy on the burned building and the Kindred investigating it. And then he'd go weeks, months, without so much as a single order or goal.

Fuck he was a weird dude, and Antoinette wanted her to connect with him. Yeah, sure, she'd get right on that.

"Jack is missing," she said.

"Yeap," Jacob said.

"Know who did it?"

"Nope."

She sighed, and looked at everyone else. The three others were content to listen quietly, or stare at the pool of blood with interest. It was moving, almost like it was boiling, but it wasn't. A couple bubbles came up from underneath it, and for a second, Triss thought maybe someone would leap out of the bowl, as if they'd been drowning. It was only a foot deep, but still.

"I want to find him."

Eyeless nodded, and chuckled. "I'm sure you do."

“Can you help me?”

He nodded again, and gestured to the bowl with his chin. “Watch.”

His hands disappeared into his robes, and pulled out objects. Objects was as best a descriptor as she could come up with, as each thing was unique. First, a crow feather, or at least something black. Then, a dead spider, a large one. Both into the blood bowl; or pot, now that he was tossing things into it like ingredients. Then, a rotted finger. Good fucking god

Another nod, and he took out a final item. A knife. A knife she recognized.

She stepped back.

“I had an interesting conversation with Fiona,” eyeless said.

“ ... don’t torment her, Jacob. She’s a really nice girl, and—”

He waved a hand over the bowl, dismissing her and drawing her eyes to the blood at the same time. Damn liquid refused to hold still.

“I didn’t torment her. But, her naivete is apparent. She did not realize how many questions she answered without answering them.” A chuckle, a laugh, like an old man might make when he managed to outsmart a young whippersnapper. “It seems Azamel is not in Dolareido just to chase something. No. Seems she’s in Dolareido to avoid something too.”

“Avoid?”

“Oh yes. The old monster’s caused a stir in many places in the world. Small towns in quiet, ignored places, have been damaged, or destroyed. Some not so small, in different corners of the country, gone.”

“ ... destroyed villages?” What the fuck?

“Indeed. Scary, isn’t it?”

“How do you know what—”

He gestured to the blood bowl. Right, of course, magic. Fucking blood magic.

“I am preparing a ritual, before I go and speak to Azamel herself.”

“ ... herself.” Yeah, if Azamel was destroying literal places, wiping them off the map, maybe it was better if they kept their distance?

“Sure you want to antagonize her?”

“My dear, sweet little Beatrice.” French accent included. “You want to see how dangerous a beast is? You have to poke it first.”

Cause that was a good idea.

“Seriously?” She mimicked his gesturing hand, and met his eyeless gaze as best she could.

He smirked. Always with the smirking. “Afraid of a little chaos?”

“I—”

He chopped off his hand.

The four of them jumped back, and raised their hands to guard themselves at the brief flash of light of the man’s hand disintegrating. It looked almost like fire, a brief touch of flame like a firecracker, but turning into ashes without a sound. The man was so old, antediluvian, severing a body part created instant dust. And as the four of them managed to lower their hands and stare at the falling ashes, they gulped.

The ashes danced upon the surface, before sinking into the blood. Aaron, Othello, Jennifer, they stared at the crimson liquid for a few moments before they looked to watch Jacob. Man was ancient, disgustingly ancient, and before their eyes, he regrew his hand. First it was the blood coming out of his wrist, binding on itself, turning into bone, into muscle, into tendons, ligaments, and skin. But Triss couldn't help but stare at the bowl of blood instead, at how the bubbling was getting worse, at how it churned, writhed, and breathed.

He was going to teach her crúac rituals, blood magic, and he'd said the way to do that was pain, because with pain, you could tap into the beast. Hurt someone enough, really hurt them, and the pain turned the ego off eventually. Instinct took over. For a vampire, that meant frenzy, that meant letting the thing with claws and fangs on the inside out onto the surface, meant giving it control. Jacob wanted her to let her beast closer to the surface, cause it was the beast in a Kindred that had true power. It was the beast in a Kindred, that could call upon the power in the blood, do shit like cross barriers, empower Kindred with insanity beyond understanding, and even communicate with madness like the Black Blood.

She licked her crocodile teeth, and watched, wide-eyed, as a single eye floated up from underneath the blood. An eyeball, an actual, white eyeball, with a dark blue iris. And then, another eyeball floated up as well, same color. It drifted around in the settling blood, the red liquid finally calming as it offered its prize.

Jacob reached down, took an eyeball, and slipped it into one of his eye sockets. The four of them winced, maybe even groaned a little at the unsightly display, and Jacob laughed at them as he covered the grotesqueness with one hand. The hand glowed red, subtle, between his fingers and from his palm where they couldn't see with it flat to his face and eye. But, when he removed the hand and lowered it, the fake eye had an eyelid, and eyelashes to match it.

“Handsome, don’t you think?” he said, Joker smile on full tilt. And when he moved his hand over to cover his other, empty, shredded eye socket, Triss stared at him.

He was kind of handsome, in that older man sort of way, salt and pepper hair giving him a sort of debonair appeal. With his lean frame and deep cheeks, it would have fit well in a soap opera, wearing a nice suit and running a massive corporation or something. Crazy to think so, but maybe there was some appeal to this man, sexually, even romantically, that drew Minerva to him.

“The eye, um ... what’s it for?” Why was she the only one asking questions? Why did the other three just watch wide-eyed, and not wonder how he was doing this insanity? For fuck’s sake he just created an eyeball out of blood, and random occult shit! But no, Jen, Aaron, Othello, they just watched on, intrigued and amazed, but silenced by their own hesitations and fear. Or laziness.

She wanted to know.

“Begotten are not creatures of blood and shadows, like Kindred. They aren’t beasts of muscle and aggression, like Uratha. They are nightmares.” He laughed again, and reached for the other eyeball. “They think they’re beyond our reach. But they’ll learn. I’m going to do a little hunting, for nightmares.”

“ ... I want to come.”

Everyone raised a brow as they looked at her, Jacob included, and he lowered his hand to expose the empty, ruined eye socket, while also looking at her with the good eye.

“You think they’ll know where Jack is?” Aaron said.

She shrugged. “I’m sure the Invictus and the Prince are throwing every resource they have into finding him ... well, Julias and Antoinette are at least. And I’d probably step on their toes. But the Begotten know something, about something. Athalia talking to Jack, and Jack disappearing on the same night? Come on, fucking suspicious. And, I bet Jacob's thinking the same thing."

Her three fellow witches nodded, while Jacob held his chin in his fingers, and considered her. God, he had an eye, a fucking eye, and he was using it to look at her. Gross.

"You can come, if you'll be an asset."

"... and how do I do that?" Here it comes.

Eyeless snickered and gestured to the blood bowl. "You'll need one of these eyes."

Yeap, of course it had to be something really fucking gross and nasty. Something right off the cover of a metal album.

"The fuck am I supposed to do with one of these eyeballs?"

"Wear it."

She blinked, and stepped back. So did the others, wincing and each reaching up to touch a part of their face with caring fingers. Othello of course would be against the idea of damaging his face, even temporarily. Aaron and Jennifer, well, no one liked the idea of losing an eye. Replacing it with an eye from a dark blood ritual wasn't any better.

"I ... I..." Fuck it. "Fine, let's do it." She leaned forward, set her hands on the edge of the blood bowl, and stared the old man in the eye. "Take it."

"What? Me? My dear Beatrice, if you want to explore the depths of darkness crúac can provide, you have to learn to embrace the pain." He gestured again to the bowl, where the single eye rolled around half sunk in the liquid. Considering how much blood was in the bowl, and how dark and thick it was, she imagined the reason Jen and them were at the bowl was to provide their own blood for the ritual.

“I’m embracing the fucking pain, just—”

“Just do it yourself.”

She let her head drop. Just do it yourself, he said. Easier said than done! The amount of reflexes a person had, Kindred included, to not harm the self, was high. Very high. Every instinct she had told her she shouldn’t be ripping off, or out, her own body parts. But it was in that darkness of pain and blood and the beast where the insanity Jacob demonstrated existed.

She remembered a story of Odin, Norse mythology, and how the god gouged out one of his eyes, in pursuit of knowledge. This shit was right up that alley.

“You ... you don’t have to,” Jen said, stepping in closer and putting a hand on her shoulder. “Jacob was going to do this alone. Azamel is dangerous, and we shouldn’t piss her off.”

Aaron and Othello nodded, but said nothing.

She looked between the three of them, and slowly, she felt a frown and harsh glare creep into her expression. The three of them did nothing but fuck all day, every day. Witches? Circle of the Crone? Suddenly, she felt insulted. These three weren’t witches, they were freeloaders.

“ ... why are the three of you in this covenant?” She pushed Jen’s hand away, and glared at her three companions. “Jacob offers us secrets, knowledge, power, and the three of you do nothing but fuck your food and do him the occasional small favor? Don’t any of you care about this shit? Don’t any of you want to fucking know what’s out there? Don’t you want to understand how the fuck he’s able to do the shit he does, understand the things he communicates with? Christ, we're vampires, and all you three give a shit about is satisfying your hungers!"

The three squirmed, looked between each other and her again, and then back to Jacob. Eyeless shrugged, and waited, smirking at all of them the whole time. And when his one-eyed gaze met Triss, he winked the eye at her. So gross.

She wasn't done ranting. "The shit we've seen, the shit we've felt, and you three are concerned only with ... existing! Fucking god, even you Aaron, all you do is read. You can read until the god damn apocalypse, but they're just words, they're not real! And you two," she gestured to the Ventrue and the Daeva, "sex and blood and that's it, that's all you two live for. How the fuck Jacob lets you three just coast like this without actually giving a shit about this stuff, the Crone, the madness that hides beyond our view! How can you not care?"

The rant really came out of nowhere, and she was probably just redirecting her fear into an outburst. But, it was still true. These three did nothing to belong in this covenant, other than agree with its views. They barely helped Jacob in his endeavors, and their interest in the terrifying nature of their primal existence was nil. Well, fuck them.

Before they could respond, she used one hand to pry open her eyelid, and reached into the socket with the claws of her other hand.

She'd be able to regrow an eye, with a good night's sleep and a belly full of blood. Unlike Jacob, she wouldn't be regrowing any limbs in minutes, but still, losing an eye was temporary. And the pain was temporary.

Temporary, but the memory wouldn't be. The slicing of her claws along the soft shell of the eye earned a shudder from her as the scalding agony exploded outward from her face and down into her body. Maybe she should have done this slower? No, fast was good, like tearing off a band-aid. Except, the eye. And as she got her claws around the squishy flesh of it, she screamed. Flesh, cutting and splitting apart in her fingers, Kindred blood fighting against the damage, and she having to tell her body to let it be as she forced the claws in deeper, behind the eyeball, pulling it out of her while the claws fought against her eyelids trying to close.

Her claws were sharp. It made the whole process a blurry agony of blood and distorted images as the eye was cut into by her fingers. She'd never really thought about it, what it'd be like to see through an eye as it was being destroyed, as the lens distorted under pressure, as the eyeball was punctured and the fluid coated her claws and eyelids. She screamed again, her other eye closed, the ruined eye in her grasp but still in her skull, and every reflex in her body telling her to let go.

She didn't. She tugged on it, and fumbling in pain, she swiped her finger along the backside of the eye. She knew enough about anatomy to know the eyeball didn't just float in your skull. It was attached, and she had to detach it.

The eye fell away, rolling off of her hand, and landing against the rock of the cave floor with a quiet plop that followed the silence of her cries. And as she forced her other eye open, she watched it fade away in a tiny ember, before it became ash. Her empty eye socket was closed, no opening that, and she felt her Kindred blood flood it to heal the wound. Regrowing an eyeball wouldn't be happening any time soon, and she could suppress the healing to prevent that, until they were done what needed to be done.

Holding her hand over the empty, agonizing eye socket, she forced herself back over to the blood bowl, and glared at everyone. First Jacob, who was smiling a smile so ... genuine, he almost looked like a father admiring the dedication of their child. Pride.

Ugh. The other three looked shocked as all hell. Good, fuck them twice.

She squeezed the edges of the bowl with the one hand, and, trembling, she forced down her other hand away from the other, empty eye socket so that it also gripped the bowl. A drop of Kindred blood trickled out of the wound, and down her cheek to land and mix into the crocodile teeth of her mouth.

“Do it,” she said.

One-eyed bastard almost looked ready to cry tears of joy, with the over-dramatic presentation of a Shakespearean actor. He reached into the bowl, scooped up the eyeball, and reached out for her face.

Every single god damn mother fucking reflex she had told her to yank her head away. A wounded animal. She gripped the bowl tight, and stared at the man with her one good eye, as another drop of her Kindred blood worked down her cheek bone and down onto her extra teeth.

Jacob’s smile hardened, became a determined, solid gaze as he opened her ruined eye, and slid the eye in. He was fast, smooth, delicate, precise and quick all at the same time. There was no describing the sensation of having a new eyeball inserted into an eye socket full of blood, and thank god Jacob was kind enough to keep the brutal sensation succinct; cause she couldn’t take much more. Didn’t want to start crying after that speech. She’d made a point, and to start crying now, she’d seem like a whiny baby instead of a proper witch willing to do the shit they weren’t.

He pulled his hand back, fingers releasing her eyelids, and waited.

She groaned, forced down her screams, and gasped on useless air as she squeezed the blood bowl. The liquid and the lighting wasn’t right for a reflection, poetic as it would have been, but she stared into the blood anyway as she felt the unnatural eye mold to fit her skull. And, for her Kindred body to attach the optic nerve to the new vessel.

She could see out of the eye.

“That ... is fucking creepy,” Jen said, but she had a weird smile on her face, like maybe she was a little interested in what they were up to. Which made Triss happy, and pissed, cause maybe she wouldn’t have given a rant if she’d known. “You got blood on and under the new eye, and it’s very poetic. And it doesn’t match your other eye.”

She rolled her eyes — oh fucking god ow! — and wiped the Kindred blood away from underneath the new eye. It began to fade away, turning into wisps of ash along the back of her hand.

She had an eye now, a normal looking eye, next to her usual snake eye. Too late to worry about that now, she could get rid of the new eye later.

Oh shit, why hadn’t she thought about that? She had to get this thing out of her later, and go through this again.

“See anything?” Aaron said.

“I ... I can see with the eye, yeah, but ... nothing new.” She squinted at Jen, then the boys, and then around at the ghouls and thralls taking care of the den. Everything looked normal, once the dizzying pain settled. “How’s this work, Jacob?”

“Let’s go find out.”

---

“You continue to impress me,” one-eye said. The two of them were sitting on a rooftop, in the middle of South Side where the casinos and high-price strip clubs were, where the most people were, where the most lights were, where a Nosferatu like Beatrice knew her cloak of night wouldn't be able to keep her hidden if she even so much as tripped.

Jacob's could, without issue.

"Then you have low standards, cause I thought this was the sort of shit you witches do." Their legs were dangling, and she smirked a little as she let the heel kick against the building underneath her. Did this qualify as making a connection with the old man? It hadn't been her intention, but maybe she could get two birds with one stone.

"We do. We did. You know my old circle perished to hunters."

"So you got a new circle, of a bunch of sex-crazed slu—well, except Aaron. You know what's up with him? What's his deal?"

"He shares many of my views, but instead of enacting them, he prefers to explore their philosophies with dialogue. And often, just read." He shrugged, and offered her a small, holy-fuck-maybe-genuine smile, before looking out to the crowd below them.

Neither of them were wearing robes anymore, instead opting for some street clothes. He was wearing some black pants, probably something for a suit, with a white button shirt to go with, loose and undone to the chest. She was in her usual black jeans and white tank top, high cut and tight so people got to admire her abs and nipple piercings. Well, they would have, if her and Jacob had gone to see any other Kindred. Instead, Jacob took them out into the city, hidden, to watch and learn.

"Jen, Othello?"

"The same. They share my views, and they have no issue indulging their animal desires, as you well know. Jen get into your pussy yet?"

“W-What? No, no ... not yet.”

“Then we’re thinking about it?”

Oh good fucking god not him too. First the Prince and now the Joker.

“We are Kindred, aren’t we? Pretty open minded about this sort of stuff. Julias included.”

“So that’s a no. Wimp.”

She frowned at him, but he only laughed and shrugged. This was just how he talked, full of juvenile digs that were never meant to be taken seriously, but at the same time held little bits of wisdom. Useful, if she could swallow all the crap attached to them.

“ ... you think ... Jen might be into me? Romantically, I mean? I get wanting to fuck me. I have the nicest ass this side of the planet,” she said. Old man laughed, and for some reason, she smiled at the sound. “But sometimes I get the feeling she wants to do more than that. Wants more than that.”

“Well that’s just because you’re infatuated with yourself. Christ you carried that chip on your shoulder about the teeth for how many years? Could have gotten over that in a quarter the time if you didn’t have your head so far up your ass. No, she’s not in love with you, and doesn’t have a crush on you, but she does like you as a friend. Ya fucking nitwit.”

“ ... I think I liked you better when you were this mysterious figure I kept at a distance.”

He laughed, loud, boisterous even, and wiped a finger along his cheek bone beneath his new eye. “It serves any elder to seem inscrutable and unapproachable. But spend a little time with us and you realize we're just like you, only smarter, stronger, and a lot more fucked up."

"I get that. I ... I wonder how Jack is with Antoinette then?"

"Oh no doubt that kid has seen a side to her no one else has, a womanly side, a loving side. And probably a lot of her other sides, dominant, motherly, queenly, seductive, everything in between."

"... you've known her a long time."

"Yep. But, she's practically a different woman now, now that Jack's softening her up."

She scratched her cheek bone underneath the new eye, and winced at how the socket was still sore. Maybe when she was half a millennium old she could grow a fucking hand in minutes, but for now a nasty gash took hours to heal, and a missing eye would take the night, and some blood.

"You think Azamel knows anything about Jack's disappearance?"

"No doubt."

"Oh ... kind of got the impression you weren't sure."

"She knows something. I don't know if she knows where the kid is, but she definitely knows something. And with these eyes we're going to pay a visit to her, a real visit."

"What're we doing here then?"

"My friend suggested I take a peek into a crowd, and see if we can catch a glimpse, before taking the plunge."

"Glimpse of?"

"A nightmare."

She shivered and hugged her knees to her chest. Her only true experience with the Begotten was Fiona; her experience with Azamel and Athalia had been short lived at best. With Fiona, there was a genuine ... thing inside her, something that was not only scary, but strong. Young, sweet, fun Fiona, controlling something that strong, that weird inside her, and they were going to go meet with her new mentor? Some super ancient entity that'd been destroying whole towns, a monster thing that could have very well been a god from ancient mythology for all Triss knew.

“ ... Malachi.” For some reason, the topic brought up that memory, of the thing in the darkness talking to Jacob like an old friend, with a different name.

“An old name, not used by any kine or Kindred anymore.”

“That thing, that Black Blood creature or whatever, it called you that.”

“Because I've known it for a long time.”

“ ... how long?”

Jacob turned to look at her, actually look at her, with an eye, an eye she was mirroring. The two of them must have looked damn weird; should have worn some eye patches.

“When this was just a small town, surrounded by dark wood, the harsh elements, and murder within, I met the Black Blood. I was already well versed in crúac, and both Antoinette and I had expressed interest in exploring what lay beyond our realm. She and I came here, and pursued our agendas on our own, but with the occasional helpful boon for the other.” He laughed, always with the laughing, and gestured out to the people below. “We exploited the sheep, and used them to build us our city. But, far before the village became a city under our rule, as I started poking at the barrier and looking across it, I found it.”

“So this thing was around before you guys showed up?”

“Yeap. You know anything about spirits?”

“Jacob, I didn’t know spirits fucked existed until you showed me that ... fucking ... thing. Happy to keep thinking the only supernatural shit I had to deal with was vamps and werewolves. You know, the classics.” But now a whole new can of worms was open, and she couldn’t walk in shadows anymore without thinking something was inside the black, following her.

“They reflect our world, spirits. One affects the other, like whipping a rope attached to something. The inertia affects it, bounces back, creates a loop. That world, on the other side? Crazy. Fucking. Shit. Mountains that can speak, floating wisps of glowing light get eaten by black shadows on wings, colossal giants walking around made of asphalt, and the tower of blood where the Elysium tower is, in a crazy man’s version of Dolareido.”

She blinked, and looked out through the lights of the city, and far away to where the massive tower of glass stood. “Blood tower?”

“Yeap, in that place, Antoinette’s tower drips of it. Straight out of a painting. Black Blood is on the other side of the wall that separates our worlds, a tempestuous spirit of death and pain. It’s not what it seems though, and it ... it...” Holy shit Jacob was speechless. First time for everything. “It’s shared with me a lot of twisted wisdom about the nature of death and pain, because that’s what it is, but also about existence, about the flowing connection of life. Like blood.”

Well, that would explain the ‘black’ part, and the ‘blood’ part she supposed. “That ... sounds like something that ... fuck, that sounds like the sort of shit you read about in old books, mythology and shit.”

“Many Kindred, even my peers in other cities, refuse to acknowledge or explore that world on the other side. Antoinette’s the only elder I’ve ever known also interested. And the werewolves, those fucking dogs, refuse to ... Fuck em, just fuck them.”

“Is ... is that what these eyes are for? We going to see that? The other side?”

“No. Like I said, we’re going to see nightmares. Completely different thing.”

“ ... how?”

He laughed, loudly, and reached out to set his hand on her shoulder to balance himself as he laughed more and more. Well, if she wasn’t making a connection now, she didn’t know how she could.

“You sound like Minerva.”

“I ... I uh...” Ok, wow, maybe that was how to make a connection with the old man.

“Ever curious, so ever curious. There are many realms, Beatrice, layers upon, underneath, around, and within. The realm of spirits, the Shadow, or the Hisil as the dogs and spirits call it, I am familiar with, as is Antoinette, and the Uratha march upon that land and guard the wall between us and it. Fucking dogs. But other realms? Those idiot dogs are blissfully unaware of things like dreams. The power in dreams. Nightmares. And the things that roam within them.”

“And ... Black Blood? It was ... pretty nightmarish.”

“Ah, now there’s a puzzle. Dreams are something the human mind creates, but can also reach, tap into, something out there that exists, a place. But spirits, twisted reflections of reality, do not reflect humans themselves. Or vampires or werewolves, for that matter. What could they know of dreams then? Of real, true, powerful dreams, of life destroying nightmares only possible in a human's mind?" He reached up and touched his cheek below his new eye. "Some of them do happen to know a thing or two, and Black Blood has shared its secrets with me on occasion."

"... in exchange for?"

He winked his new eye, and stood up. "Come on, not seeing anything up here. Let's get down into the tunnels and head in Azamel's direction."

---

Back in the tunnels. She hadn't touched them much since that whole monster-from-a-shitty-sixties-monster-movie incident, cause a shitty monster from a bad sixties movie was pretty fucking terrifying when you had to deal with it face to face. The texture of its hairy spider body and mutated human flesh was still fresh in her mind.

"I really hope she knows where Jack is," she said. "I owe the kid a lot, and he's Julias's childe, and he's an awesome kid."

"He's an adult."

"I know! And fuck you, you call him kid too. He's small, and barely an adult, and ... and now I can't stop picturing him underneath Antoinette, her just squishing him with her tits and pampering him like some sort of milf fucking the kid next door for his eighteenth birthday present."

The two of them chuckled. Yeap, bonding. And she wasn't even trying, it just sort of happened. Talking to Jacob like an actual person actually had him responding like an actual person. Such a weird realization.

“I like the kid too. Clarice is bringing change to Dolareido, and in ways people can’t predict.”

“Yeah, I guess he is.” Clarice. Silence of the Lambs? Why the fuck was this ludicrously old vampire watching movies? She kind of liked that he did, but it was also unsettling, how this old fart was savvy on the latest references.

The two of them walked the dark tunnels, still masked in Jacob’s cloak of night. He never had to stop, or refocus, or deal with any of the strain of keeping up such a discipline constantly like Triss did. Fucking terrifying in a way, how easily he kept them as hidden as shadows in a dark room.

“I once thought Damien would also bring change, and he did for a while. But the man has regressed to a simple clergyman, and Maria’s right hand. Ah well.”

“... did you really convince Lucas to attack the Prince?” Really shouldn’t have asked, but she remembered Antoinette getting angry with him about it.

“I’d never have touched the situation so directly. But I’d be lying if I said I didn’t plant the idea in his head.”

“Jacob! Christ man, a lot of Kindred died, and—”

Jacob put a hand up and waved it aside, dismissing her. “Let it go, Triss, I know what I’m doing. And besides, I didn’t convince him, he did that on his own.”

Yeah but, like one-eye said, he put the idea in Lucas’s head. Still, Triss couldn’t appreciate any of the details, the nuances, or scope of that situation. She hadn’t even been alive when the purge happened. So shut the fuck up and trust your boss, a little at least.

“Sorry.”

“Don’t be sorry. Last thing I want is for my witches to keep their mouths shut. Don’t like what I do? Bring it up, so we can argue, maybe throw a punch or two.” He came closer, and as they walked the dark and tracks of the abandoned subway tunnels, he hooked an arm over her shoulders to half hug her. “Fair warning though, I punch hard.”

“Yeah, I remember you hitting the Prince in the cave. I ... I did want to ask about Minerva.”

“You have balls. I like that.” And he did too, smirk and smile included, and the one-arm hug persisting. But as he dug through the memories, his arm grew heavy, slid off of her, and the two again walked side by side as normal. “Love of my life, all the cliches of life-changing romance wrapped into one.”

“And she wanted to see the other side too? Like you?”

“Like you.”

“I ... I don’t ... I mean I guess I do? I figured everyone in the circle did, see what sort of shit was hiding in the dark. You really let those three just sit around and do nothing all the time.”

“They do tasks for me every now and then. And this ritual? It took far too much Kindred blood for one Kindred to provide.”

“Yeah but, we’re in the fucking Circle of the Crone. I was expecting more shit like you told me you did with your old group in Dolareido, dancing naked to rituals and ... and even more stuff like that Black Blood thing. More things like this.” She inched her head toward him and pulled down on the cheek of the new eyeball.

“Christ this fucking hurt.”

“Ripping out your own eye was utterly delicious. And I was worried perhaps I’d scared you that night, with Black Blood and I, stabbing you until you frenzied.”

“It did scare me! It fucking terrified me, and it really fucking hurt you god damn fucking asshole. I can still remember the pain, and ... and there was more ... I want to know more.”

The elder’s smile evolved once again. He had a million smiles, each with its own persona, history, implications and flavor; this new one was a mix of intrigue and excitement.

“Quite the beast inside you.”

“ ... thanks, I think?”

“I—oh my.” His eye shot out to the darkness of the tunnel ahead of them, and he gestured to one of the shadows near a flickering light, cast by the abandoned stage of old, forgotten, locked away stations.

The shadow was moving.

Jacob let go of her shoulder, and the two of them came closer. Looked like shadow, didn’t make a sound or give off a smell or anything, just shadow, lack of light. But it was moving, shifting back and forth across the dirty metal and concrete of the subway tunnel, like hazy fog fighting against a breeze.

They approached. Nothing happened. They got down on their knees and reached out to touch it. Nothing happened. Triss covered her new eye, and the shadow returned to normal. She covered her old eye, and the shadow sprang back to life again, shifting against the ground and wall.

She touched it. Nothing happened.

“What the fuck am I looking at?”

“Not sure.”

“... not sure?” She threw up her hands and glared at the man. “I thought you knew everything!”

His laughter was howling, almost like a banshee's. “You and I will explore all sorts of depravity and insanity, my apprentice.” Oh fuck he was riding the Star Wars vibe and everything. “But, you decided to join me as I explore this new boundary that I have previously ignored. Dreams? Always I thought them just a fleeting wisp of the subconscious acting out its theater of thoughts, but with Azamel's return, Black Blood and I have refocused our efforts. This,” he said as he pointed to the eye, “is something it taught me, so that we could both understand these nightmares, it and I.”

Wonderful, she was wearing an eyeball given to her by what might as well have been death incarnate.

“So we're both going into this blind.”

“No, that's what the eyes are for.”

“You know what I fucking mean.”

A smirk and chuckle later, he got up and started moving again. The flickering shadow was just that, a flickering shadow, and as far as she could tell, it meant nothing, except that her normal eye couldn't see it.

“Azamel and her companions are burrowing.”

“Burrowing?”

“Burrowing. Those monsters, those nightmares, they tunnel through reality as we know it, breaking through and fucking with things. Nesting. They hide in this other world neither me or Black Blood have ever seen, and like ants they dig their tunnels into our existence. Except this time, Azamel is up to something.” They started walking again, and Jacob hopped onto one of the tracks to walk it tightrope style. Hop, skip, hop. “In the old days, instead of doing this myself, I’d have my circle of witches investigating. But as you can tell, my current circle is pretty lazy.”

“Which is your fault.”

“Ha! True.” He started walking backward, while remaining on the subway track. No need to balance his movements with his arms either. At first it was silly, but now it was impressive. “Perhaps it’s time for a change? Everything’s changing, with Azamel and that bitch Avery returning, Lucas’s death, Viktor and Tony’s death. Quite the upset, and I’ve just been lazing about, doing fuck all.”

“ ... bullshit.”

“Bullshit?”

“Yeah, you fucking can’t trick me that easily you old bastard. You were involved in that Lucas shit in more ways than you’ve let on. You apparently had something to do with that fucking spider monster in the tunnels. And I bet you know Azamel and Avery in more ways than you’ve said. Fuck, you probably had something to do with that whole Viktor and Tony shit!”

He stopped. She stopped. That might have been too far. Yeap, too far. She froze a little, a lot, then petrified as the elder glared at her. He stepped off the track and came up to her, frown on his face, and his one eye cocked, ready to blow her brains out. So much easier to stare at him when he had no eyes, just a bandage, but now he had the one eye looking into her fucking soul, while the other socket was now visible, an empty eye slot where his Nosferatu deformity had blessed him with shredded and removed eyelids. Just an empty eye socket that looked like it belonged on a monster. Or a corpse.

“You really want to know?”

“ ... know what?”

“Secrets. You really want me to let you in, like I did with my circle in the days of yore?” Fucker smirked when he said ‘yore’ too. “You want to explore the cracks in the world, the blood that trickles through its seams, see what darkness you can summon from its crevices? I’m happy to drown you in the sick delights of blood magic, Beatrice. But if you want to know the secrets this city is built on, that’s a different matter entirely.”

“I ... I ... don’t know.” Fuck fuck fuck, what wasp nest was she poking now? “I used to be a Carthian, because I thought I wanted to flip the status quo, you know? Invictus run shit, money money money, and everyone bows to the Prince even though she’s the smallest group in the city. I—”

“Bullshit. Garry put a roof over your head and you thought you owed him.”

“I did owe him!”

The man came up behind her. Too fast for her to turn around, or she was still frozen. Both. His hands took her shoulders, and he held her that way as he came in closer until his chest was to her back, his chin beside her neck. Devil on her shoulder.

“Garry is no different than any Kindred his age. He’s got a goal and he’s willing to sacrifice the younger to achieve it. You owe him nothing.”

This conversation was going in random weird directions and she wasn’t sure she liked it. Flirting with some dangerous shit, and not the dangerous shit like the fucking madness of crúac, but the more evil shit. Secrets, the sort of shit politicians kept in their closets. Real fucking evil.

“Then—”

“I’ll let you in, Beatrice. You want to know the sort of secrets that could collapse the Invictus, destroy the Carthians, bathe the streets in Kindred blood and have everyone tearing each other’s throats out? Want to look old bosses in the eye, or the Invictus triumvirate, or the Prince herself, with knowledge in your skull that could bring the city to its knees, bring the covenants to civil war and ripping themselves to bits?”

“ ... I ... I ... don’t know.”

“Good answer.” Repeating the fucking past like it was a play he’d seen before. And probably had. He pat both her shoulders a few times, before stepping around and resuming their walk down the valley of the shadow of death. “But enough drama, we can talk about it later. For now, we’re going to Azamel’s little hole in the wall.”

“Yeah ... ok.” She gulped on nothing, and walked after her boss.

Fuck, that’d gotten dangerously close to signing her soul away on a dotted line, or joining a cult or something. Not that she hadn’t already done those things. Maybe she should just jump in and see if she could swim? Blood magic that screamed ‘you’ll go to hell for touching this’ was almost blase in comparison to what he was offering her.

How the secrets beckoned so sweetly, sirens on the rocky shore.

~~Julias~~

Dusk, a vampire’s morning. Many Kindred used it as a time to make sure they still had all their limbs, that they lost nothing to the sun or to an enemy while they were asleep. Of course, that never happened. You never woke up and found yourself missing a limb or suffering any burns. You either woke up fine or you didn’t wake up at all.

Jack could have been out there, in the sun, a pile of ashes. Though Kindred his age didn't truly turn to ashes, rather a burnt, withered husk. He shuddered at the thought of his childe, panicking in the streets, sunrise peeking over the buildings, and the boy forced to spend every ounce of vitae he had to fight the daily need to sleep. Exhausted and unable to find a safe place, he'd collapse, and cry out as the—

He slapped himself in the face. Hard. Maria raised a brow, and gestured to the large display on the wall that showed two dozen video feeds from their thralls.

“Mire, please, control yourself. We are doing all we can,” she said, raspy voice calm and collected. Too collected. He did not like that she was so calm about Jack's disappearance, and his poker instincts told him she was hiding something. Wouldn't surprise him if Maria had found out about what Jack did to Lucas, and had arranged for his death. Would Damien have killed him, for the Lucas incident? Maybe. Damien had seemed like he'd changed, but you could never be sure.

It was only the two of them, in the Xnomina headquarters, where Julias could monitor the inflow of information from their thralls. The Invictus network was massive, and it either controlled or monitored every organization with a notable amount of money. What corporations that dabbled in big money, that dabbled in enterprises worth billions, the Invictus controlled a large portion of their stocks; or all of them, if they were local to Dolareido. What branches of organized crime existed in Dolareido, they controlled. Any person with enough money to present a threat, the Invictus knew of, and were either ready to manipulate to their will, or already were. Money was power, and the Invictus were power.

None of that helped a fucking bit when you were down in the cracks of the city streets trying to find a single individual.

“I should have stayed with him.”

“You had no reason to suspect this danger would occur.”

“I didn’t have reason?” He turned to face the small ghost woman, and marched around the table to get nearer. She was sitting in her large business chair, a tablet in her hand, and was both watching the wall display while checking Invictus business, as if everything was perfectly fine. “Barry’s dead!”

“Missing. You know Kindred vanish, Mire, neonates above all. They underestimate the sun, or they misstep and find themselves without the blood needed to wake from their hiding hole. Or they leave, and find a city or town with people they do not know, to get away from the hooks of their old life.”

“Dolareido is—”

“Is not large enough to completely hide all contact with their old lives. Surely you are aware that Jack has, on occasion, gone to visit his mother and sister?”

“I ... I’d suspected, but I didn’t know for sure.” Groaning and running his fingers back through his hair, he sat his butt against the side of the massive table, and folded his arms across his chest. “With Amanda’s help, I presume?”

“Of course. They often partner, and she is young as well. She still feels such pain.”

Maybe the kid was just letting a part of him out that he normally suppressed? Jack thought himself the distant, analytical type, and he wasn’t wrong, but he was still human, or at least had a human soul. Even as a Kindred, he was far too young to have lost his humanity, which made old ties terribly powerful. It was one of the strongest reasons some fledglings fled the cities they were embraced in.

But Jack wouldn't do that. He'd just flip a switch in his brain, ignore the emotions, and make life choices logically, no matter how much it hurt him. It was part of the reason Julias admired him, and sired him. It was a unique skill most people did not have, and it served a Ventrue well.

But perhaps most of all, Jack wouldn't leave the Prince.

“He's still in the city, alive, I'm sure of it.”

Maria frowned at him, and met his gaze as he returned it. “Do not let your connection to your childe cloud your mind, Mire. Your blood connection to Master Terry has not provided you with any clear message, has it? Can you even be certain the boy is alive?”

Blood sympathy, the connection between sire and childe. The nature of it, the degrees to which it acted, how it felt, it was all an enigma. They knew of it, knew it existed, knew it was real, but beyond that, the only Kindred who had even scratched the surface of such mysteries were the Ordo Dracul, and it wasn't like they were sharing their secrets.

Worst of all, trying to interpret blood sympathy was like trying to predict the weather based on the pain in your knees. Not exactly consistent, and he usually ignored it. But not tonight.

“I can feel it in my gut. He's alive.”

The ghost woman sighed, but nodded, and set her eyes back upon her tablet. “You have almost every thrall and ghoul with at least a year's experience searching for him, Mister Mire. This will attract attention. And it may very well be that the boy is simply indisposed.”

“Barry's dead, suspicious activity has been seen, confirmed by Damien and Jack and Isabella's lackey, and we know the boy was speaking with Athalia. His phone's tracker isn't working! And hell, he was supposed to go to the Prince's to sleep that very night. The only way he's indisposed is if he's been captured."

"... captured by the Begotten then, perhaps?"

"We checked all the footage we have of the tunnels, the ins and outs. Athalia went back there, alone." And as much as he suspected Athalia and her boss Azamel of any and all sorts of deceitful shit, he doubted they'd simply kidnap Jack. The repercussions were too obvious. And if Azamel was going to play that game, she wouldn't have started from a position of openness, the way she'd made herself known in the tunnels. Or she'd at least get a bigger bargaining chip.

Maria tapped a finger on her chin. "I understand the werewolf Clara Moreno is quite taken with Jack. Perhaps she played a hand in his disappearance."

"Now we're just grasping at straws."

"Straws are all we have, Mire. Damien has insisted that these four kine are likely to be hunters, and with the timing of Barry's death, and now Jack's disappearance, that they are to blame. But we have only conjecture."

Close, so very close to flipping the desk onto the tiny ghost woman and crushing her. It would have meant his death, or at least a very painful retaliation from the elder Nosferatu, but the urge still worked through his limbs. Jack was alive, he could feel it, and his fellow council member refused to acknowledge the very real threat of hunters.

They should never have had that ball.

"... Maria?" Enough with the last name only bullshit.

"Yes Julias?"

“What do you know of Athalia, and Viktor?”

“ ... you truly wish to know? I imagine you understand that your sire caused her great strife.”

He pulled out a chair and sat down beside the ghost woman, near her, ignoring the white mist that dripped from her cracked and decaying skin. This was important, and now was no time to be squeamish about her Nosferatu disfigurements. He slid the chair in closer, until he was only a couple feet from the small, rotted corpse, and met her gaze.

“I know Viktor became a horrible person over the centuries. I’ve accepted that.” I’ve accepted that it’s in the blood, that it’s a real possibility for me to suffer, and Jack as well. I get it. “So, if you know the details, I would like to know.”

Maria sighed and set her tablet down upon the table. “You think this information will help you find Jack?”

“There may be a connection. I was content to leave Athalia’s past out of this, but I no longer have that luxury. I need to know what happened.”

“So that you can manipulate her when the time comes.” She said it deadpan, no judgment, no insult, or pride or admiration.

“ ... yes.” He wasn’t Viktor.

“Viktor had become ... violent, as his age grew. As you know, the man’s gift for domination and animalism was great, and he used these to fuel his growth. Before his long torpor to squelch his bloodlust, he used such abilities to feast upon Kindred.”

“I understand he—”

“He hid his actions well, Julias. A master of manipulation, he used others, toyed with their memories as he drank Kindred, some until they ... died. He engaged in violence of an unsavory nature, of an indulgent nature, as he often satisfied his need for Kindred blood with barbaric cruelty.”

“Indulgent?”

Another nod before she looked away and back to the screen on the wall.

“He did not engage in diablerie, but I could tell his lust had grown to such a point. Michael and I convinced him to let torpor hold him for years, to suppress his need for such cannibalism. He awoke ... twisted, as you know.”

He did not like where this conversation was going. Before his long sleep, he'd known Viktor to be a ruthless but intelligent and patient man. He'd had no idea the man was involved in such disgusting brutality.

“I live in the man's mansion now. I've seen his dungeons.”

“Yes ... his desire to take the Kiss past the needed point, and into killing prey, did not abate with his torpor. He no longer craved Kindred blood, but the desire to feel prey die to the Kiss only increased. His indulgences continued, kept secret by his many talents and many connections. And he did more to his prey than simply kill them, he tested torture, of which ... are you sure you wish to know the details, Julias? He was your grandsire.”

Yeah, his grandsire was a monster. Kindred were not kine, even if they still had the memories of being kine. Many embraced killing kine as a sport, took joy in it, like hunting rabbits. The Prince discouraged such blatant cruelty, which was normally enough to make any Kindred with a sense of self preservation avoid doing it. But Viktor didn't bend so easily.

“ ... tell me.” He didn’t want to use the info. He was happier not knowing what sick shit the man who made him who and what he was today, did in the dark. But knowledge was power.

Knowledge and money, powerful bedfellows. He was Invictus to the core, just hopefully not like Viktor was.

---

---

~~Eric~~

Chasing strangers through the city streets, for a girl he barely knew. This was strangely like the first time he’d ever really gotten to know Sheryl, except that’d been some punk that’d taken her purse. Eric had jumped to her rescue and ran the man down. Now, the memory made him want to vomit.

“Which way?” she said. Or yelled, really.

He brought a finger up to his lips to shh her, but he had to be subtle about it too, with the four they were following possibly nearby. Fiona didn’t get subtle, and he had to flick her in the shoulder and get her to look at him to pick up on the queue.

“Ever tail someone?” he said.

“No...”

“It’s simple. Stop acting like you’re tailing someone, and head in their general direction.”

“ ... done!” She stood rigid, taller, and walked like a robot. “Like this?”

Oh good god she was going to get them both killed.

He facepalmed, shook his head, and just kept walking. There were enough people around outside the club to hide tiny Fiona’s pathetic attempts at blending in, their shoulders clearing her head. Should be enough to hide her antics for now.

Took a moment for him to realize he was walking, in a direction, without even stopping, like it was natural to stalk someone. He just knew, knew where the four had gone, where the prey had been, how to follow them. Dolareido wasn't only his home, it was a home he knew inside and out, every street and every corner, and evidently every smell. These four didn't belong, something they were carrying or doing marked them with a smell that didn't fit, and he could pick up on traces of it in the air, despite the amount of people around him.

This was really stupid. He should turn around and get back to his new, amazing job. Ok maybe not amazing, but better than his last job and paying infinitely better on top of it. Debts to pay, bills, real world shit to deal with. Everything that was happening to him, the dreams, the hallucinations, being able to smell and hear better than before, wanting to hunt and feed, it had to just be stress.

Don't be a fucking moron. Even thinking the thoughts sounded stupid; they'd have been gut-wrenchingly hilarious to hear out loud. They weren't caused by stress. Something fucked up was happening to him, and this girl knew about it, knew more than that too, knew a lot of things probably. And he needed to know, if only so he could find a way to make it stop and get back to his life. Pay his debts — assuming Jessy's promise fell through — and pay his bills. Get a new place, a car, maybe get a root canal for a tooth that was bothering him, maybe try hitting the dating scene again, and just living life.

The little glass of champagne beside him had wanted to go on a date, that much was obvious from the first night she met him. That Jessy girl didn't seem like she wanted to date, more so just fuck him. And maybe that wasn't so bad? Let go of his baggage for a night, or at least thirty minutes, and enjoy some sex with a beautiful woman.

“Ye’re doing it again,” she said, and poked him hard enough in the side to make him wince. “Ye still on their trail?”

“Yes.” And he was. He was following the subtle scent like he’d done it a hundred times before, a thousand times, like it was normal, natural. Instinct. Hundreds of people walked past them every few seconds, suits and dresses, fresh fabrics, leather, cologne and perfume, drugs and alcohol, all the smells of home. The streetlights, the flashing signs of nearby casinos, clubs, fancy bars, the not-so-subtle advertisements inviting men and women into arenas full of vices, full of sex. His home, and these people didn’t belong.

“Talk,” he said.

“Talk?”

“Yes, talk. Walking in silence with someone isn’t casual, talking is.”

“Oh, right! Talking.” She nodded a few times, and smiled up at him as they worked through the crowd. “Jessy says ye used to be a fighter?”

“Yep.”

“And something happened to yer knee?”

“Yep.”

“How bad?”

“Ruined it. Lost my career.”

“... oh.” She visibly shrunk, and pouted up at him. “I’m sorry.”

“Yeah, it was quite the shit show.” Easier to not mention the wife, and the divorce, and—

“And ye’re divorced! Was it cause of yer destroyed career?”

Wow. He had to wonder if this girl had a single thought in her head, or if she simply was incapable of thinking them without speaking them. Honestly, that was a pleasant change from the snakes he was used to dealing with.

“Partly.” No longer being famous and having all his money evaporate put a strain on the relationship. And having no money exposed a side to that relationship he wished he’d never seen.

“ ... dinnae want to talk about it?”

“Not especially.”

“Sorry.” She stepped in closer, and hooked his arm. Taking Jessy’s advice of being aggressive then. “I could make it up to ye? Want to go on a date?”

“ ... I—”

“Though, Jessy does really expect payment for her speaking to that bawbag, Montoya. So, after she jumps yer bones, then we can go on a date.”

“ ... so we are going on a date?” He raised a brow at her, and she beamed up at him. Damn cute, no denying that.

“We are! Aren’t we?”

“How about we finish following these four and then we can discuss it?”

“If we go out on a date, I’ll tell ye more about what’s happening to ye.”

God damn it. He frowned down at the tiny redhead, and she grinned the most evil grin he figured she could manage; which, wasn't evil at all. Just adorable.

“How ... how do you know what's happening to me.”

“I ken ye can tell I'm nae normal.” She shrugged, and gestured out to the people around them that they pushed past. “These folk are normal. So many folk in Dolareido! Wasn't like this at home.”

“From Scotland?”

“Aye. Now I'm just a wee lass in the city, no money, working as a waitress now and doing her best to stay out of the porn industry.”

He laughed. He stopped for a second, and blinked. Forgotten what that sounded like, laughing. Fiona raised a brow at him, but he started walking again as he wiped away the smirk.

“Young girl leaves her small town home and goes to live in the big city? Does sound like porn is in your future.”

“I ken! Ugh, and this town is the sluttiest town. The things I've seen on my hunts! Holes in the wall, filled with folk fucking every hole each other has.”

“... hunts?”

“I'll tell ye later.” A wink and another elbow to his side, before they resumed their walk.

Naive as she seemed, she wasn't naive. Maybe wore her thoughts and emotions on her sleeve, but certainly not naive. Even if she'd pretended to be, he wouldn't have believed it, not when he could almost smell the invisible black drip from her, almost see it.

“ ... you’d really be comfortable going on a date with me, specifically after feeding me to your friend?”

Whatever he said, it hit the girl’s funny bone, because she erupted into laughter, enough that some people looked at her and stumbled around her as she struggled to not fall. He had to reach out to hold her shoulder to stop her from running into strangers walking by.

“Aye, fed ye to ‘er! Ye’ve no idea lad. But, yes. I mean, not before, but after sure, that’s normal for Dolareido. And I’ll likely get to see at yer goods, so that’ll be an interesting sneak peek at ye.” Giggling madly, she hugged his arm and resumed walking once more.

Dolareido definitely had that effect on people. If you weren’t comfortable with a sexual atmosphere, this part of South Side would make you comfortable with saturation therapy. He’d never been to one of the infamous sex holes, but apparently this girl had? Hard to imagine.

The smell continued, and he followed it, putting some briskness into the speed. They had to catch up, but from the smell, he figured they were nearby. How he knew that, he didn’t know, but that was why he was doing this insanity after all, risking his new job and potentially his life. He needed to know what the fuck was happening to him.

Fifteen minutes of walking, and the smell was getting stronger. More of that metal and wood smell he couldn’t place. And, eventually, how the strangers smelled, their flesh. Consistent, persistent, whiffs of various odors that were always around with those odd smells, the smell of people, individual people. He could smell them.

He didn’t like where the smell was leading them. If the smell had been going closer to Devil’s Corner, or maybe toward the more conservative area of South Side, it’d be understandable. But the trail was taking him toward North Side, away from where people gathered, away from the familiar sights and smells. The city was as familiar to him as his own body, but North Side, not so much.

The people grew less and less, until they were no longer surrounded by shoulders to hide their actions, until there was only a few people, until eventually there were none at all. The smell was all the more obvious without the additional bodies, but Eric felt every muscle tense as he glanced left and right along the near-empty streets of where North Side met South Side. The neighborhoods were rougher, sometimes nicer, sometimes meaner, but the people were always tougher. Unlike Devil's Corner where everyone was broken by economic struggles, people here were just as poor, but they carried themselves, their own, and anyone who was stupid enough to try and rob a house or sell drugs on the street corner was bound to get shot. Shot by a gang protecting their turf from lowlife scum, or by a grandmother with a shotgun on the porch doing the same thing.

But there were at least a few people around, and with Fiona's more casual wear, it was enough that the two of them could walk without too much issue.

"So how did ye get in deep with Montoya?"

This girl, right for the jugular.

"I was young and stupid."

"Aye, I know that feeling." More giggles, and she wiped her smile away. "What did ye do?" He doubted she was trying to be nonchalant, to hide that they were following a trail. But whether she was trying to be casual or not, she did look it, when bombarding him with horrible questions and giggling about him.

"Bought my wife and I a bunch of stuff ... mostly her."

“Och. Och god that’s horrible. So now Montoya wants his money back and ye dinnae even have the lass ye borrowed the money for. Why doesn’t he go after her?”

“ ... cause I’m the one that borrowed the money, not her.”

“Wedding ring?”

“Engagement ring, yes, among other things.”

“ ... ever get the ring back?”

“You can’t legally force someone to give back a gift. We got married, verbal contract fulfilled. It just didn’t last.” His fingers tightened until he felt the knuckles turn white. How many of those final conversations with Sheryl had turned to screaming, yelling, throwing and smashing plates, and tossing each other’s things out the window? A lot of them.

Destroying his knee was the worst thing that had ever happened to him, brought to the surface just how fucking awful that relationship was, once the money started to run dry. Christ it ached. Each step ground on the bone and wrecked cartilage, and eventually he was going to start limping a little. It always healed enough for him to use it again the next day, but it never healed enough for him to do anything particularly stressful to it.

“What a twat! Worthless pile of shite.”

“I ... yeah, I guess.” He smirked at her, and shrugged a little as they walked. “Money brings out the best in people, and then the worst.”

“I wouldnae ken, have none. Jessy though? Her and Natasha, they’re rich.”

“ ... really?”

“Aye. Jessy works for Xnomina. Nathasa used to. The two of them have a lot of money saved up, wee fortunes. Their bosses are super rich.”

Well, damn. Hell if he made this Jessy woman happy, she could just pay off his debts instead of telling Montoya to fuck off. He kind of preferred the latter option, but anything to get the maggots off his back and let him rebuild his life.

“What have yer dreams been like?” she said.

“ ... my dreams ... you really know about this, don’t you? What’s happening to me.”

“Course. I am following ye, and ye’re following yer nose, literally. I’d be dumb to do that for no reason.”

Yeah, well, his sense of smell wasn’t perfect. It was definitely in overdrive, but every twenty feet he had take a few sniffs of the air, deep, and look around for contextual clues. Certainly didn’t have the nose of a hound dog, but no denying that his sense of smell was far better than it should have been.

“I dream about ... hunting things. I dream about biting and tearing into things. Flesh and blood. I dream about the moon.” So poetic. So stupid.

She nodded a few times and kicked at little pebbles on the sidewalk. “I used to dream about the dark. Nightmares. Started when I was young, never went away.”

“Pretty common nightmare.”

“Aye, that’s what I thought. But it kept happening, and happening, and in the dreams the shadows would grab me, tie me up like ... like a spider’s web. I’d get dragged into the black, screaming, kicking, ‘n crying.” She hugged herself, hands rubbing her bare arms, and leaned in a little closer to him.

“You don’t seem the type to get those sorts of nightmares. Traumatizing past?”

“Na.”

“Feel extremely guilty about anything you did before the nightmares started?”

“Na.”

“Scared about the place you lived?”

“Na! Loved my home town.”

“Odd.”

“Yeah, and ... and the nightmares only got worse. Things changed. I closed in, held folk at a distance. Got scared of going to sleep. Eventually scared of my own room.”

He raised a brow at the girl. Heavy stuff, sort of stuff you tell your best friend or your therapist. Why was she telling him?

“Ye’re likely wondering why I’m telling ye this,” she said.

“Yeah, you could say that.”

“I can see ye’re confused about what’s happening to ye, and ... well, it won’ t be the same as me, but it’ll be powerful. I thought maybe I could help a wee bit, before Avery finds ye.”

“That’s the second time you’ve mentioned Avery. Who are they?”

“Later! I’ll tell ye later. Or she’ll show up and tell ye herself.” The redhead shrugged and gestured out with her chin. “Where to?”

He stopped, sniffed at the air, and looked around. Moon cut in and out through the clouds drifting by, stars buried in the light of the city. Not much wind. He could still smell them. Why didn't they take a taxi or something?

He smirked. Old job habit kicking in.

"You said you were experiencing nightmares?" he said. "That have anything to do with ... why you're ... I don't know."

"Different? Ye can feel it can't ye."

"... yeah. I guess I can." Felt like admitting to a terrible secret, or admitting believing in some childish fantasy. Felt like admitting to crazy shit, and letting it in. But then, he'd already admitted that to himself, considering he was going on this ridiculous journey, risking his new job, and getting himself into who the fuck knows what.

It also felt like idiotic, teenage gossip. He smirked again as he imagined a couple idiot fourteen-year-olds, sitting around an ouija board, half laughing, half trembling in fear as the board spelled out a name. Something he was sure this girl beside him probably did when she was younger. She was ten years his junior at least. This silly, bubbly girl was dragging him through the city streets at night, away from the populated areas, and into the edge of North Side where there were no people out this late. If she pulled out some ridiculous, goth voodoo shit, it wouldn't have surprised him.

Or it might have, considering the circumstances, considering he was the one picking the direction, following the scent.

They rounded a corner between two buildings. "I—"

Something hard and fast cracked him against the jaw, and sent him down to the asphalt.

“Eric! Don—” A sickening thud of something against flesh, and Fiona fell down beside him onto her side, one hand clutching her face and the other bracing against the road. Her phone slipped out of her pocket and slid across the shadows.

A boot crushed it, hard, repeatedly, until the phone was nothing but bits of plastic and metal.

“Who are you? Why are you following us?” One of the four they’d been following squatted down beside Eric, frown on her face and a black baton in her hand. A police baton too, one of the more modern ones, expandable, so it could be held and concealed.

Funny, he really should have seen this coming. Every instinct he had told him following them was a bad idea, that they were dangerous. And yet he walked right into a baton to the face. Distracted by the cute girl, probably. History repeating itself.

He tried to get up. Mistake. The woman with the baton didn’t hesitate to use it again, and slammed the metal stick against his arm. He rolled with the pain, and groaned as his shoulder made friends with the asphalt.

“I didn’t say get up, I said who are you.”

“Dinnae hurt him! He—” She went silent as she looked at one of the four. Eric managed to glance in the same direction, and his body went numb as he recognized the glint of a pistol in the moonlight. And then, the moon disappeared behind the clouds.

What to say to these people? It wasn’t supposed to go down like this, it was supposed to be following at a distance. When they eventually spotted the four, he and Fiona would hide, observe from far away, and then she’d tell him why he was going out of his fucking mind. Too easy. Life never went according to plan. Hell, life is what happens to you when you’re busy making other plans, right? Fuck you Lennon.

He stayed down this time and looked over toward Fiona. Girl was still down, and had learned from his mistake. No getting up for either of them.

“I’m—”

“Dinnae tell them a thing!” she said.

Wait, what?

“You can’t—”

“Nothing!”

Eric blinked. The woman squatting over him with a baton in hand blinked. The other three were blinking if he guessed right. The tiny redhead was looking at a pistol aimed directly at her, and instead of cowering, petrifying, pissing herself, she was frowning and telling him to not give up his name.

Well he had his wallet in his pocket, so it wasn’t like they couldn’t find out who he was that way. But instead of grabbing his wallet, the three strangers still standing stared at the girl.

“She knows something,” one of them said.

“What’s she know?”

“Enough to follow us.”

“That doesn’t mean they’re blood suckers.”

“What other reason would they have for following us?”

“ ... this is the guy we’ve seen at the club a couple times. Bouncer, right?” The woman squatted beside him, a black woman with a scar cutting across her neck. Four scars actually, parallel, and nasty. Claw marks? “Hold still.”

“I—Arg!” She grabbed one of his hands and yanked it backward, behind him, twisting it in just the right way so attempts to free himself of the grip would mean dislocating a joint. If he was standing, he’d have a counter, twisting his body with the motion while reaching out to grab her shoulder and force her to fall, foot hooking her ankle. Not doable when on the ground, when your head is spinning and throbbing.

A clink of metal made him raise a brow. He couldn’t see what the girl was doing as she moved quick, but a second later, searing pain hit his finger. Quick, but painful. Burning.

“The fuck are you doing?” he said.

“He’s clean. No ashes.”

She’d burned his hand. Christ. He tried to get up again, but another swift crack of boots to the stomach made sure that wasn’t happening. Nausea hit him, and then a need to breathe as his lungs refused to work. At least trying to breathe was helping keeping him from vomiting up the rice this woman’s boot had worked back up his guts.

Fiona snarled, but Eric could see the flickering flame grow nearer to her. Another one of the strangers was approaching her, lighter in hand, while the other two strangers held their pistols at the ready. Or at least, one of them was a pistol. The other was a shotgun, and it was pointed at Eric. Shit.

The stranger took Fiona’s hand, prying it to the side so Fiona reached out to try and free herself. The stranger didn’t hesitate, and slammed his other hand forward, fist tight, lighter inside his grip to turn the fist into what might as well have been a brick as it collided with the girl’s face. Cartilage crunching, nose broken, Fiona went down, a streak of blood smearing across the asphalt. The man didn’t let go of her hand, and kept it twisted as he exposed the lighter from his fist again.

Eric got up. A burst of energy, adrenaline, a mountain of stupidity. The woman near him swung the baton, and she swung with zero hesitation or mercy. Metal cracked against his shoulder, but she'd aimed for his head; he'd blocked. Instincts kicked in, fifteen years of punching bags and faces, but also something more, something that wanted him to reach out and rip this person in half.

Ripping her in half was not in his power, much as every fiber in his body was telling him it was. He'd have to settle for punching her in the head; he'd had plenty of practice doing that too. She spun out and went down, rolling with the punch along the asphalt and landing on a knee and foot, facing him, snarl on her face. Hit her hard, and she was already getting back up. No ordinary woman. None of them were ordinary.

The one with the pistol pointed the gun at him, and fired. Shit.

Part of him was sure they wouldn't fire, that this was all a misunderstanding, that they were just crazy punk kids who wouldn't actually fire the gun. Normal people weren't so quick to take a life. Normal people avoided killing. As the gun let out a flash of light and crack of thunder, his mind wandered back to something he once read, about how soldiers in the World Wars often fired to miss, because they didn't want to kill. They had to change how they trained soldiers to break that reflex.

This person also missed. Didn't look like he was aiming to miss though, with cold hard reflex in his eyes; he'd fired because his training taught him to. He'd missed because a bunch of white webbing was grabbing half of his body and pinning him to the wall.

What in the fuck?

“Fuck!” The woman Eric had struck stood up straight, and pulled out a pistol from behind her. A necklace she was wearing started to pulse, a subtle white that had her looking down to stare at the strange, alien shape. “She's one of them! Shoot her! Before—”

She went down, body thrown across the alley and against the wall. Blood splattered over the bricks as something long, black, and blade-like cut across her forearm. She'd blocked it, whatever it was; girl had reflexes better than any fighter Eric had fought. Whatever the black blade shape was, it dispersed like a flickering shadow.

The man beside Fiona had turned to face him, but turned back again to face Fiona, only for the tiny redhead to backhand the man across the chest.

Not Fiona. Something else, something around her, on her, in her, something with a lot of long, sharp ... legs? Something that smacked the man to the side, and exploded a white web over half of his torso. More of the weird webbing, and it stuck the man to the wall like some ridiculous seventies Spider-Man comic. Not so ridiculous was how the man's skull cracked against the brick. An easy concussion.

The final woman pointed her shotgun at Fiona. The little redhead was standing now, eyes glaring daggers into the last stranger still standing. Blood was trickling down her nostrils, her face, chin and neck, soaking through the tank top.

She looked fucking terrifying.

Both of her hands came out before the woman could fire, and the monster came out as well. Eight blade-like limbs, nothing but shades of onyx against the night that surrounded them, and four of them struck out against the woman.

But she dodged. How the fuck she dodged, Eric had no idea, but the woman rolled to the side underneath the blades that struck out at her. Before she could roll again, Fiona ran in and slammed out with her human hand, unleashing another web of the white. A mess of aimless stickiness as far as Eric could see, ropes of the material sticking to random things in its path, including the woman and the shotgun in her hands. She half-rolled into a pinned kneeling position on the ground, and tried to raise her shotgun to point it again, but couldn't get it pointed at them with webbing tugging at it.

“Let's go!” Fiona ran over to him, grabbed his hand, and started pulling him into the alleyway. Not out into the street where maybe they could find someone; not likely this far into North Side, but a hell of a better chance than between the old buildings. Apparently he wasn't moving either, and he stumbled forward as the bleeding little girl yanked on his hand harder.

As they vanished into the darkness between the many old buildings, factories and the like, gunfire erupted behind them. They were shooting at them, and Eric winced hard enough to hurt his teeth as a couple bullets slammed against the walls around his head. Holy fuck, they were actually shooting at them.

Wincing turned into gasp as Fiona screamed out and fell down to a knee.

“Fiona!” Shit shit shit shit shit. He reached down to help her up, and as he did, she turned around.

She stuck out both her arms, and swung them through the air, screaming in pain as she did. But as she did, more of that strange, white rope shot out of her hand, and connected wall to wall. A blockade, or spider web, something.

She fell. Shit shit shit shit. Shit! He scooped her up and rounded the corner. He knew North Side well enough to keep moving, and he broke into a run as he clutched the small woman to his body.

He could feel her blood soaking into him, warm, wet. He could feel her heart beating a million times a second, his as well. He could feel his knee grind itself into dust as he ran.

“Phone ... need to call ... Natasha...”

“Your phone?” he said between gasps. “They crushed it. We need to get you to a hospital!”

“N-No ... not ... hospital ... find ... darkness...”

“What the fuck are you talking about?” Good god he should have brought his shitty phone.

She reached out to him with one hand, grabbed his collar, and stared at him. Blood soaked her grip, and her other hand clutched at her side. Shot. He was holding a gunshot victim. She was bleeding to death and he had to—

“Darkness,” she said, eyes hardening and glaring into him. “Now!”

Chapter 48

~~Eric~~

Fuck fuck fuck fuck fuck.

He clutched the small woman against his body, tight enough so he could keep running, but there was no hiding that she was bleeding on him. Her blood was soaking through his suit and onto his skin. Each labored breath he took filled his lungs with the smell of it; and the smell was so damn familiar. Blood, life, from this dying creature in his arms.

He shook his head. What the fuck, get a grip.

“Just ... find me a place ... really ... really dark. Completely ... dark.”

“You have a bullet in your fucking stomach, Fiona!” He winced as another bullet snapped nearby, crashing into his shadow as he rounded another corner. Those psychos were a ways behind him, slowed down by that weird web thing the girl had made, but they were going to catch up.

“Darkness ... all ... I’ll need...”

“Darkness? Like, a shadow.”

“Darker ... complete ... darkness.”

“You need a hospital you fuck—”

“Darkness!” She grabbed his suit jacket, and managed to shake it a couple times as she raised her eyes to glare at him. Christ she was pale.

“Alright, alright! Fucking darkness, alright.” He looked around as he ran. Easier to ignore the grinding pain in his knee this way at least, panicking about the bleeding-to-death girl in his arms and trying to find some place where he could get the sort of darkness she was looking for.

It was night time, and he was on the edge of North Side and South Side. Only a mile from the neighborhoods, and he could run that. It'd destroy his knee, but he could run it. The girl was insistent though, very insistent on the darkness crap, and after seeing her defeat four psychos using some very weird shit, he really should just do what the girl said. If girl was even the right word to describe her.

Was she a monster? Or a regular every day Spider-Man? Far as Eric knew, Spider-Man didn't stab people with giant black blades. And that was a comic-book character. This girl had done insane fucking shit right in front of him, summoned something large, with eight legs that doubled as blades, and she'd attacked with them. Shadows that vanished after she used them.

She'd told him to not say anything, as if this was something she'd anticipated. God damn it, the fuck sort of ridiculous shit did he get caught up in?

Her blood was dripping down into his clothes. The feel of its warmth on one of his legs cracked across his brain like a whip. Find darkness, get to some fucking darkness.

A nearby building, some old, decrepit multi-floor building that was abandoned, waiting to be renovated and fixed. The door wasn't locked; most of the super old shit wasn't, worthless as the property was. He leaned down to open it, one arm hooked behind Fiona's shoulders, the other under her legs. With a little maneuvering, the two of them slipped into the darkness of the old building that was bound to fall on their heads at any moment.

He was panting, gasping, and every word stung his lungs. “You’d think ... with how much money is rolling around South Side ... they’d have enough money to fix ... all these abandoned buildings ... North Side.”

“Old ... town.” She was gasping too, coughing, choking, but no blood came out of her mouth. Not lung shot, but the bullet had definitely ruined her side, her waist, and he was afraid to look down and see. She could start vomiting blood any minute. Just keep moving, keep moving.

No wonder the place was abandoned. The brick walls were filled with half-broken slabs, bits of ceiling had fallen apart and rained wood chunks over the equally destroyed floor, and old lighting fixtures hung empty. So dark, so very dark, dark enough he had to squint to see the silhouettes of the walls, and that was with his better eyes.

“D ... Darker.”

“Darker, right, darker. You know you’re going to bleed to death? And I’m going to go to prison for it. You think a black guy won’t get pinned with first degree murder, getting caught with a dead white girl in his arms?”

She laughed, then let out a quiet, low whine as the pain ravaged her, left her shivering and curling up against him. Don’t make jokes, bad time for jokes.

The building looked like it must have been used as a private office building, probably for lawyers or accountants or something, with a secretary behind the large desk he found in what looked like something between a living room and a lobby. Falling apart benches lined the walls to his left and right. The drapes were rotting, and horrible.

“B-Basement ... hurry ... I have to see her.”

See her? Basement? Cold started to work up his toes and into his legs, until his heart sped up for more reasons than adrenaline. He gulped as he looked down at the bleeding woman, the bleeding monster in his arms, and winced as he noticed her getting paler again. She was already pale, redhead and freckles and all, but his eyes could make out the white showing through as the blood drained out of her.

Second time he'd ever met this girl, and she was going to bleed to death in his arms. Fuck. Fuck fuck fuck.

Breathe, just breathe. Remember the shit in your dreams. Breathe.

He started wandering around, feet tripping over random bits of rubble. No time no time, go faster, find something. There were hallways lined with doors, and he peeked into them as he went past them as fast he could, but a basement wouldn't be connected by a door in the hallway. Think. End of the hallway? No, a lot of these old buildings put a basement door near the bathroom.

Bingo. He pulled the door open, and gulped again.

Blackness.

When he was a kid, he'd visit his uncle and aunt's place. A nice home, pretty big, fancy, old. It had a basement, deep and large, with stonework straight out of the medieval ages, exposed pipes and wall studs that still hadn't been covered in drywall. It was a great place to goof around with sticks or a soccer ball, but the light switch was on the wrong end of the large room, far away from the staircase that lead back upstairs. Come nightfall, turning off the light meant navigating the large basement in pitch black to reach the stairs.

He was always sure, each night that it had happened, that a monster was going to get him. It never happened, but he could still remember how fast it got his heart beating, navigating the blackness to find the old wooden stairs. Stairs just like the ones he was looking at. Blackness, just like the blackness in front of him.

“Ok, yeap, I’m going to die. We’re both going to die, in a black abyss in an old building.”

“Please ... hurry...”

Gritting his teeth until it hurt, he started to walk down the stairs. His eyes were better now, so much better, and they couldn’t see shit. It was just blackness ahead, complete black, and with his hands underneath Fiona’s body, he couldn’t feel what was ahead of him either. Couldn’t reach out to brace the wall beside him, at least, until he turned his body a touch so he could nudge his shoulder and Fiona’s feet against it. A wall meant something, and something was far better than empty black, than endless nothing.

He’d probably make a horrible astronaut. Floating out there in the black, in the endless nothing? He shivered, and stared ahead into what might as well have been the same empty, colossal space before him. Breathe, just breathe.

Each step slow, each step painful as his knee fought against him, each step like walking into an obsidian chasm. He did his best, poking out with his foot and looking for the step below, and each time he managed to find it, covered in dust or bits of broken wood. If he stepped on a large bit of broken anything, good chance he’d trip, and tripping right now was a bad idea. Slowly, he took each step, and stabilized on each step before he took the next.

He almost tripped when he ran out of steps.

“We’re uh ... at the bottom. I can’t see shit.” He glanced back up to the stairway. Just a glimmer of a glow from the doorway above and behind them was the only light source, and it wasn’t reaching down where they were, in the pit of death.

“Put ... me down, and take ... my hand.”

“Girl, you’re bleeding out, and—”

“Just ... do it.”

God this girl. Not long ago the best he thought of her was that she was a fun, bubbly glass of champagne. Now, the girl had grit, serious grit, the sort of grit that made you keep fighting even when your knee was destroyed, the sort of grit that usually backfired and got you killed. Reality wasn’t a fucking movie, you didn’t get to succeed just because you were determined.

But at this point, she was going to die either way. She felt cold, and she wouldn’t stop shivering. Her voice wavered and cracked. She felt lighter.

He set her down, and kept one hand underneath her armpit, the other holding her free hand while she cradled her wound. He thought. He couldn’t see to be sure.

“Just ... follow me ... and ... d-dinnae freak out.”

“I’m beyond freaking out. You’re shot, you’re bleeding out, and instead of running to a hospital, we’re in the basement of an abandoned building. I ... I saw you do things, Fiona.”

“Aye. Ye’ll ... get to see more ... in a moment.”

Wonderful. Fucking wonderful.

He supported the girl as best he could. She managed a step, and then another, and her clothes shifted as she moved her hands in ways he couldn’t see. He could hear the drip of blood against the concrete beneath them, and each made his muscle tense and heart ache. Girl was going to die, and—

Something wet soaked through his shoes, his nice shoes too. He almost laughed at the concern, and raised the shoe to try and look at it. No good, still pitch black, and whatever the liquid was, it couldn't have been blood, unless Fiona had suddenly turned into a pool of blood ahead of him. Nope, girl was still holding onto his hand, his holding hers and the other under her shoulder. But, each step soaked his shoes, and each step sank his shoes into something soft. Soft but kind of hard though, like wet mud over earth.

He tripped. Fuck, fucking fuck. So careful, every step had been so careful, but whatever he was walking in didn't give a shit, and gripped on a shoe hard enough that it forced the step to follow shallow. Toe collided against something solid, and he spiraled with it, flopping forward and landing hard on his hands, both of them. Something wet and soft covered his suit head to toe, and soaked into it until he felt it on the skin.

Shit, Fiona! He turned to face where she'd be falling, and waited for the sound of her crashing into the wet crap beside him. But she didn't.

“ ... this is home...” She smiled at him. Smiled. He could finally see, just enough lighting, just enough of a shade for him to catch her silhouette, and then the most basic features.

She didn't look like Fiona. She didn't sound like Fiona. Accent gone, replaced, changed, and her body rising higher, and higher, before in a gentle sway, it melded into the bending shadows of the leaves and vines around him.

Leaves? Vines? He jumped up, and groaned as bone ground on bone in his knee. He fell over again, but this time managed to catch himself against a tree. Tree. A fucking tree. What?

Breathe, just breathe. And with every breath, his eyes opened wider, adjusted to the glimmer of light that was hitting him and the mud around him through the canopy above, and exposed more of the impossible. A forest. A jungle. The heat was immense, and it wasn't long before beads of sweat started to drip from his body. The smell was intense, of plant life, of animals, of rot and shit and fungus.

Breathing wasn't so easy anymore. He forced it, made each breath happen, but each was flooding him with a billion smells, and he almost started to panic. He'd never had a panic attack before, but he could feel it coming, feel his muscles lock and started to shake, feel his lungs refuse to listen. He forced them to listen. Fucking breathe.

He gripped the tree beside him, felt the moistness of its bark, and whatever was growing on that bark. He felt his shoes push and shift against mud, and grass, and rocks and roots, and mulch. He felt the oppressive heat and humidity push through his suit. He felt eyes on him, everywhere, beady little eyes watching from branches and hanging vines from high above.

“ ... I'm in a fucking jungle.”

“You are.”

Her voice, not the same voice anymore, but someone else's. Or was it even the same girl? Someone in her spot had sort of just, lifted off of the ground, and vanished into the trees and darkness around him. Maybe something had dropped down from above, grabbed her, and yanked her away?

“Where's Fiona?”

“I am Fiona ... I am Vrallar'trakla of the Eight Blade Arach.” A raspy voice, powerful. Frightening.

“Those are two different names.” And one of them was a very weird name with a weird title attached to it.

“That is ... how it is for me, us. Not for most others of my kind, but for some, for me.” The invisible voice moved with rustling leaves, drifted above him, over and around him, like the shadows were whispering to him.

“ ... where are we?”

She laughed, a deep and powerful sound. Nothing like Fiona’s laugh.

“You remind me of Damien.”

“ ... what?”

“A vampire that stumbled into my home. Do not worry about him.” The voice sighed what sounded like relief, and pushed aside some of the canopy.

Only then could Eric see everything clearly, and he wasn’t so sure he wanted to. His eyes locked onto the two moons, one large, soft red, the other smaller but glowing a strong white. Not strong enough to provide much light beneath the canopy of what was apparently a jungle, but strong nonetheless.

But with the canopy pushed aside, he could finally see Fiona, or Vrallawhatchamacallit. And his jaw dropped as he stared at the exposed monster.

A humanoid shape floated many feet above the ground, and eight gargantuan spider-like legs came out of her back, long, slim, blade-like, with four of them stabbed into the earth while four others were touched and balancing against nearby trees and branches. The girl held by the legs looked absolutely nothing like Fiona, at all, not even close. Dark steel-colored skin, and instead of feet, her legs came to end in points, like her spider legs, like stiletto shoes without the shoe part, only the stiletto. Her hands were similar, with only two fingers and a thumb each, and those two fingers were long black blades like the rest of her limbs.

She was wearing a white dress, of what looked like the same spider silk material he'd seen her use a few times already. It dangled off of her, loose, pretty revealing too, and as much as he was looking at some sort of monster creature straight out of a nightmare, she had curves. Nice curves. Inhumanely nice, in fact, as he noticed her waist was too small for all her organs to fit, or a human's organs anyway. But, a tiny waist paled in comparison to her other inhuman features. Especially the crown of horns.

She had a mouth and nose like a human, except for the dark, steel color. But she had no eyes. Black spikes curved outward from where eyes should have been, and joined many other spikes of similar shape that jutted outward from her skull, coiling backward and creating a sort of crown shape. Like some sort of beautiful, ancient creature, with a myriad of spikes flowing backward over her skull, instead of hair.

Beautiful, in a strange please-don't-kill-me sort of way.

She smiled down at him from above. Her new mouth was smaller than her old one, subtle black lips offering him a warm smile.

"You're ... you're um ... I uh ... dreaming, yeah I'm dreaming." He pinched his skin on the back of his hand. Still in the jungle. He slapped himself hard enough to spark a fresh headache. Still in the jungle.

"I have invited you into this little pocket of nightmares, Eric. I ... would have preferred to do this more gently. Or perhaps after Avery had spoken to you of your condition. None of this is as I had hoped." The spider creature lowered herself down to him, but she never quite touched the ground. Always her legs dangled underneath her a few inches over the mud, with her sharp, pointed blade feet grazing against grass.

“Ok, not dreaming. I’m not dreaming, and you’re a spider monster, and I’m in a jungle. Where ... where’s the city? What the fuck is going on?”

“ ... perhaps not so much like Damien. But then a vampire would have an easier time accepting this than you.”

“Vampires!?”

She chuckled. God, she sounded nothing like she did before. The weird rasp to her voice, its power and size despite her normal-sized humanoid body, it was hard to accept that this was Fiona. But it was Fiona.

“W-Wait, you’re not bleeding?”

“No. Vrall has healed my wound, but at a cost. I hunger.”

Yeap, that sounded straight out of a nightmare. He backed up again, but a tree was behind him, and he wasn’t about to dart into the dark jungle blind, with nowhere to go. Christ, he was in a fucking jungle! Where the fuck was the city, the abandoned building, the distant honking of car horns and the smell of asphalt and gasoline. Fuck, it was all gone, all replaced. Now there was nothing but jungle.

Breathe.

“Ok, um, my shit can wait. For now, can you explain to me where the fuck I am, and ... and ... what the fuck you are?”

She sighed, nodded, and reached out a hand for him. If she’d had a blue and red pill in that hand, he’d have taken the blue and just closed his eyes. But he was neck deep in this shit whether he wanted to be or not, so, he took her hand, and waited. Her skin was oddly soft despite its dark steel color, and despite how the two fingers and thumb looked like black blades more than anything.

“At least I know you better than Damien, the first time this happened. That man hunted me into my lair, and I thought for sure he was out to kill me.”

“Damien ... and—” He gasped and clenched his jaw as Fiona, or Vrall, started to pull him up, and up. Her other hand reached out to hook under his shoulder, and she steadied him as she took him higher. Strong, damn strong. Her massive spider legs had no issue carrying the two of them, and within moments she’d lifted them fifteen feet into the air, and set them both onto a large branch. Up in the canopy instead of underneath it, it was easier to stare out through the levels of vines, leaves, and branches to see how the white and red moons bathed the jungle in their light.

A small part of him thought this could be romantic. A much bigger part was flipping the fuck out. Fiona had set him near the trunk of the tree though, and he braced against it with one arm as he looked down into the darkness beneath him, and then out over the rolling land of jungle.

“My phone. I need to contact Natasha, and tell her of these four, that they were indeed hunters and are now chasing me. They may know where the boy Jack is.” She frowned, though without eyebrows, or eyes for that matter, it was hard to tell. Only the subtle scrunch of her small nose gave it away.

God, she sounded nothing like Fiona, not even in dialect, and he couldn’t place the foreign accent either. Brazil maybe?

“Like I said, uh, Fiona, your phone’s destroyed.”

“Damn it.” She sank some of her claws into one of the branches passing overhead, and Eric pulled his head back as it snapped like a twig in her sharp grip. “We made a mistake, a bad mistake, Eric. Now they know about me, and you, and ... I’m sorry, for dragging you into this. I thought we’d get to see what they were up to, and not get spotted.”

“I guess we underestimated them.” He said it with raised eyebrow and eyes darting around, both at the jungle around him, and the monster girl in front of him. Still had a million reflexes telling him this couldn’t be happening, but with the hallucinations he’d already started suffering—“Wait, am I hallucinating this?”

She turned to face him, blade legs hovering a single inch above the branch where her feet should have been. “Of course not.”

“You say that, but here I am, regular Joe, in some sort of nightmare jungle with a half naked spider lady.”

“ ... I imagine in your hallucinations, there is only the one moon ... and ... perhaps she speaks to you?”

“How do you know that?” He reached out for her, grabbed her bare arms, and shook her. The crown of enormous horns that coiled back from her forehead and eye sockets shined in the strange moonlight. All her skin did. She really was soft. “How ... I ... I don’t...”

“ ... perhaps, as you said, we should focus on our present circumstances? I can explain about you, later, but for now, you should understand that you are in my lair. Please, tread lightly. I am ... there is ... you are in a dream, Eric, but you are not dreaming.”

He frowned. This was turning into some ridiculous Disney movie spiel, about how he’d stumbled onto something magical, and his life would forever be changed after this moment. Yeah, changed, because now people were shooting at him, and he was going to go home with fucking malaria.

“A dream?”

“A pocket of dream. A nightmare. A ... very old nightmare, where ... Vrall nested.” She gestured to herself, her body. “I told you about my nightmares. I guess I was just ... trying to bond with someone who was going through their own changes, not so long after I went through mine only a year ago.”

“And—”

“And you are not a Begotten. But changes are upon you, and ... ugh, this is a mistake. This is all a big mistake. I should not have involved you, I should have let you be, and later when you came into your own, maybe then...”

“Yeah, well, too late for that.” He sounded angry. He was angry. Christ, he was always fucking angry, and whatever was happening to him was adding some straight up hunger and aggression to go with it. Breathe. “I really am a fucked up person to help you with ... whatever it is you’re doing, you know. Did you not piece together the train wreck that is my life?”

She tilted her head to the side. Without eyebrows, he guessed it was the best way she had to express surprise, or interest, or something.

“That is a part of the reason I was delighted to see a change was upon you. You seemed so ... normal, compared to my vampire friends.”

“And vampires, vampires are a thing?” Again, his hands went up, and again he braced against the tree in case sneaky gravity decided to break his neck.

“Yes. But we can talk of them later. For now, just understand that you are in my lair, my home, a nightmare. I am a creature of the nightmare, and you are within that nightmare. Please stay close, or the nightmare may attack you.”

Ugh, this was some fucking Amazon jungle nightmare shit right here.

“Ok, I’m just going to turn off the smart part of my brain, and just go stupid kid mode here. I’m in a dream world, a nightmare, got it. You’re a nightmare creature, some magical, terrifying, creature. Got it.” He almost said busty, cause the little silk dress thing she was wearing was barely more than a sash, and it didn’t do a good job of covering up her exaggerated proportions. Made sense, he supposed, if she was a dream creature thing. Combining sexy with terrifying was a staple of nightmares, and slasher movies. “And those dudes chasing us?”

“Hunters. Killers of vampires and other creatures. Perhaps of Begotten as well. I wanted to follow them because it is possible they know where Jack is. A friend who has disappeared. A vampire.”

“O .. k. Friend, vampire, vanished, think he might be alive. So we were going to tail these four and now everything is fucked.”

“Yes. I—” Her body went rigid, her lowered head raised to stare straight, and then snapped around to look down and behind her.

Light beneath them, flickering as it passed leaves and vines, white light, the sort of light you got from LED.

“They’re here.”

“They followed us?”

“ ... they must have followed my trail of blood into the building and its basement.”

“You didn’t, I don’t know, close the crazy fucking magical gateway behind you?” Getting snippy wasn’t going to help, but then, this was why he normally just kept his fucking mouth shut, because he turned into a snippy asshole bastard when he started mouthing off.

“It takes a moment to close, and ... and the gateway is large, it filled all the darkness of the basement. They must have been right behind us. It is closed now, but ... too late.”

Bad to worse, always bad to worse. Why the fuck did things always go from bad to worse?

---

---

~~Jack~~

The pain went from bad, to worse. He was never going to get used to pain.

Part of him thought he might. Memories of what Viktor did to him weren't old enough to be forgotten. Memories of Damien stabbing him through his stomach were definitely not old enough to be forgotten. He still winced when he remembered Julius's lesson about how much fire hurt Kindred, and how the older a Kindred was, the more damaging fire and sunlight could be.

It all sort of amalgamated into a searing poker of experience that stabbed through his brain, along with the sword stabbing through his leg.

His screams continued for ten seconds, until at last the agony became manageable, enough so he could stop screaming at least. He stared at the hand holding the large knife, the knife itself, and where it penetrated through his suit pants, his flesh, and through the bone of his leg. Never, ever, had a pain hit him with such vivid clarity, as a knife jammed through his bone. Viktor cutting his face and chest in half an inch deep had been overwhelming, almost surreal. This was all easily defined, radiating from a specific point, and making the muscles in the leg flex in some sort of futile attempt to expunge the blade. Each flex forced groans from Jack, each blinding him with flashes of white pain, until he started to go limp.

He grit his teeth, started breathing through them, and forced his eyes to look up at the psychopath.

“Stop...”

Jeremiah twisted the knife.

All at once the pain renewed, bones bending, flesh scraping along the side of the blade, bone too, until he felt something snap. Pain worked up and down his body in waves, each hitting his skull and forcing his stomach to squeeze on itself. Trying to make him vomit. Kindred wouldn't vomit, not like this, but he could still feel his body trying to make it happen.

“Azamel's nightmares spread, vamp. She grows hungry. You don't even know what I'm talking about and you still defend her?” He almost snarled, but opted for twisting the knife more instead.

“Stop! Stop, please!” He wanted to vomit twice over, for saying those words. But for all the movies he'd seen and stories he'd read about heroes resisting torture, nothing could prepare him for real pain. Not resisting it, anyway. If some empty words could get it to stop, then he'd fucking say them.

He remembered once a book he'd read, where one of the main characters was a torture survivor. The man had described in vivid detail how his permanently ruined body had been flayed, burned, cut and dug through, but it was the passages about having his teeth broken apart and the nerves prodded that made Jack's body sick with worry.

The man smirked, and yanked the blade out. Jack screamed again, and threw his head back as he felt metal destroy muscle and skin and bone on the way out. But again, he grit his teeth, and forced himself to breathe on useless air; it stopped his screaming, and for the moment that was the only goal he could focus on.

The two guards at the door winced, a few times at that, and glanced between each other before looking to the two nutjobs intent on torturing him. They didn't seem the same as the psychopaths.

And, when he managed eye contact with them, he could feel the mind of a kine, like he should have been able to.

Not the two in front of him though. Jeremiah, and Angela, he couldn't get past their eyes. Something in their gaze, something in them in general was blocking him, holding him at bay. But if he could tap into the other two, then it wasn't the cuffs blocking his Kindred abilities, or not completely anyway. And his leg was healing, so the cuffs weren't working some crazy magic magic to keep his vitae-infused blood from healing him. The cuffs were doing something, but not that.

Ever since he'd seen Lucas summon a bolt of lightning, he tried to keep an open mind about magic. Antoinette had called it Theban Sorcery. Made swallowing the fact they'd put some sort of enchanted cuffs on him easier.

"You're young," Angela said.

"... y-yeah ... you could say that." Groaning, stifling a whimper, he looked down at his leg and the closing wound. His blood realigned the twisted and punctured bone, set its contents, and let him relax as the pain lowered from agonizing, to only extremely painful.

She reached out, grabbed his chin, and forced him to look her in her good eye. Hard hands, callouses and all. "What would Azamel want with you?"

Ugh, moving into territory of sensitive information. He shouldn't tell them he was sort of an intermediary with the Uratha; they didn't seem to know the werewolves were even in the city though. But Azamel wanted him for the same role, and he shouldn't bring that up.

Angela's grip tightened, let go, and then turned into a fist to crack backward against his jaw. She hit hard for a human, and his head jerked to the side fast enough to wrench his muscles. Bone to the skin, hard enough to damage and split the skin at the lip. Kindred wouldn't bleed from that, and the wound started to slowly heal; which just pissed her off, and earned another backhand against his face, twisting his head the other way. A strange sensation, feeling your brain bounce around inside your skull. And then the pain replaced it, headache, then migraine.

It healed quickly, but he did his best to not let Angela know that. Better to act like he was in agony at this point. And he was, fucking hell he was, just not dying of it like a kine would have been. Silver lining, always look for the silver lining.

Scratching metal drew his eyes. Sparks, and then, flame.

“I asked you what Azamel wants with you.”

He pulled his head away, and tried to do the same with his body. But the chair was bolted down, and as he jangled the cuffs behind him, he could tell the cuffs were chained to it. He couldn't even shift his hands from side to side, which meant the cuffs were solid connected to the chair somehow.

He was avoiding the question, and that was probably the last thing he should have been doing. Angela brought the blowtorch closer, and closer, until the flame cut across his face only inches from his lips. Heat, fire, panic. He started fighting against the chair harder and harder, but all it did was jingle the chains louder, and earn a smile from the woman with the glass eye.

Jeremiah pushed down on her hand, and inched the fire away from his face. “You really have a lot of respect for Azamel.”

“... respect?” Jack said. “Just ... fear, really.”

Jeremiah raised a brow, wiped the ashes from his knife, and slipped it back into some pocket inside his trench coat. “Afraid of her are you?”

“Like you guys said, I’m young. Afraid of a lot of things.”

“Not of us it seems.” Angela brought the flame closer again, and Jack twisted his head side to side as he pulled it back. Maybe if he still had a functioning bladder, the piss soaking his pants would have backed up his claim.

“ ... you’re ... the first hunters I’ve ever seen.”

“Dolareido,” she said as she pulled back the flame, “isn’t too high on the local hunters’ list. You vamps keep a low profile, here in slut city.”

“ ... the Prince encourages Kindred to feed without killing.” Maybe he could talk to these people? No need for all this violence, right? Ugh, just fooling himself. They were going to stab him again, or punch him again, or torch a hole through his chest, and he was really just talking to avoid that from happening.

“Lucky you.” Angela shrugged, let the blowtorch go out, set it aside, and leaned over the back of the chair while she flicked the lighter. “In other cities, where the vamps are real fucking maggots, we’re not so nice in getting the info we want.” She brought the lighter closer, lit it, and held it inches from his face. Inches, only because he couldn’t pull his trembling head back any further. “Great thing about vamps though, is you can torture them so much more than most things. Ever seen what happens to a vamp when you cut off their arms, and their legs, with barbed wire?” Chuckling, grinning, she brought the lighter in closer still, until all he could see through one eye was the flame, and the death it represented an undead thing like him.

“Sounds ... horrible.”

“It was.” Jeremiah grabbed a nearby chair and sat down, though not reverse like before, like Angela was. He folded a knee over the other, took out a leather-bound journal, a pen, and started writing in it. He was halfway in the beam of light that came through the open door, and he aimed his book toward the light as he wrote.

“Jeremiah is a little soft when it comes to vamps,” she said.

Oh Christ, if he was soft, the fuck sort of duo was this? Bad cop and sadistic cop?

“You’ll have to forgive Angela, Jack. Bad history. But then I suppose that’s how all of us get into this sick little game, a bad history.” He shrugged, jotted a few more notes, and gestured to the two guards. “Angela and I aren’t hunters though, not like the ones you’re thinking about, none of this Vigil shit. We’re not here for you worthless blood suckers. We’re here for bigger prey.”

“ ... Begotten.”

“Bingo.” Angela closed the lighter, putting out the flame. Once between her fingers, she gripped it in her palm, squeezed on it, and used the fist to punch him. Brain bounced around in his skull, headache throbbing and pulsing through his body. The damage to his face, his lip, his jaw, all superficial sharp stings compared to the migraine.

Hadn’t even asked him a question and she was hitting him. The fuck was he supposed to do?

“Azamel’s domain,” Jeremiah said. “Ever been there?”

“ ... domain? She ... she lives in the tunnels. You already know that.”

The man nodded and closed the book. “Well, she’s hiding down there. But that’s not what I’m talking about. I’m asking about her domain. Have you seen it, or any of its chambers?”

“No ... I’ve talked with her once, and it was in the tunnels.”

“Why?” And again, Angela drilled her fist into him. His chest this time, and he coughed up on the air he was going to use to speak. She liked hitting him. A human her size shouldn’t have been able to hit him this hard.

Before he could say anything, she punched him again. Crack. He groaned a scream, gargled messy sounds, and stared down at his shirtless chest, where her fist was pressing and grinding knuckles into his breaking ribs.

“Angela, he’s a vamp but he still needs lungs to talk.” Jeremiah opened the book again, and started jotting down more notes. “Jack, keep talking and she won’t cut a hole through your stomach with that blowtorch.”

The woman flicked her lighter a few times, and adopted her grin again. Jacob’s grin, when he was feeling playful. Jack winced as he saw it, and did his best to ignore the trembling in his legs and the pain in his chest.

“I don’t ... know anything ... She showed up some months ago, randomly.”

“Not so random.” Jeremiah lifted the journal, and showed him a page. A drawn picture of Lucas’s face. Made sense, since you couldn’t take a good picture of a vampire.

“H ... How did you ... manage to draw that?”

“I didn’t. A hunter did, many years ago. Way I hear it, there was some fighting between the vamps here some fifty years ago, and Lucas disappeared. Only to show up again after that Viktor vamp died. And then he died too.” The old man shrugged, leaned back into his seat and flipped to another page, slow and controlled. “Azamel didn’t get along with those two.”

“How ... do you know all this? I—” A fist crashed into his face, and his skull whiplashed backward, bouncing against tightened muscles behind him. Pain came a second later, and he choked down a sob as the pulsing agony exploded outward from his face. Not a good time to cry, so he wasn't going to cry. He was a Ventrue, and he was going to bite his lip and figure out a way out of this. And crying would let them know how fucking close to broken he was.

“Hunters are a pretty dedicated sort. Useful. Aren't you?” The old man looked to the two at the door, and they returned some sneers. Not happy to be working with this guy then, maybe. Made sense, given that Angela and Jeremiah were sending him all sorts of psycho killer vibes.

Hunters must have been in Dolareido for some time then, or at least, humans who knew about vampires, and kept their eyes open. Reporting information to someone? Kindred told him hunters were just people, or groups sometimes, wandering around and killing paranormals they got their hands on. For understandable reasons really, as vampires like Viktor or Lucas toyed with the lives of kine like cats toyed with mice before killing them.

A lost family member, a lost love, killed by a hungry Kindred that made a mistake in their hunt, got seen, or let the other person go. Said person gets it into their head to get revenge, and gets sucked into the world of paranormal. Might make a good novel to read, if said persons weren't currently beating his face in.

“What did Athalia want to talk to you about,” Jeremiah said.

Jack winced, and looked down. Mistake. Angela cracked her fist against his chest once again, and he whined as he felt knuckle crash against muscle and bone. A second punch caught him when he didn't expect it, couldn't brace for it, and the pain of a wrenching neck joined the breaking agony of knuckles, again, colliding with his face.

His head fell forward, but not because he was looking down. He wasn't looking at anything. Body refused to work anymore as everything went blurry, as the waves of pain had him shaking, spots filling his vision, tremors working down his chest and into his core. Part of him wanted to ask, beg her to stop beating him, but he knew she wouldn't. He knew that, despite their words, they weren't going to let him leave alive.

Two options then: stall until someone came to his rescue, or figure a way out of his current circumstance.

Well, there was a third. Tell them everything he knew about Azamel and Athalia. They might let him live, at least for a little while. Hell if they were nice they might let him go; no fucking chance. The thought almost made him smirk, but a nauseating wave of pain had him choking on air instead. He could tell them all he knew, little as it was. It might make the pain stop for a little while, if nothing more. Or get him a death with less torture involved. No, fuck that, he wasn't going to die here.

Only reason he wasn't telling them everything was because he was afraid of Azamel, afraid of what she might do if she found out a vampire spilled everything. But he had nothing to spill! At least, he thought he didn't. Did he? What detail would be the detail they needed to do whatever, he didn't know.

Angela lit the blowtorch again, and brought the insane flame closer to his face like before.

“Talk.”

“I ... I don't know ... anything...”

“That's not true. You spoke to Athalia, and you spoke to Azamel. You know something.” Jeremiah jotted down a few more notes, and shrugged as he brought the pen up to his lips to nibble on it. “Did you see the heart of her lair, hmm? Did you see the great temple?”

Great temple? He managed to raise his head and look at the man, only to draw his head back as Angela moved the torch in close enough for him to feel the heat waft against his eyes.

“I’ve seen where she’s staying in the tunnels! But that’s it, I swear!” Please take the fire away please take the fire away.

She lowered the torch, but didn’t pull it away. She traced the waves of its heat over his chest, held to the side so it didn’t hit him. But it was fire, insanely hot fire, melt through metal fire, and being anywhere near it was terrifying. Just a tiny little blue flame sticking out of a metal pipe, but hot enough to annihilate him and the metal chair he was sitting in if she wanted to.

“And the others?” she said. “Where are they nesting?”

“Athalia? She ... she’s with Azamel I think. I’ve never even seen Mark!” What details could he give them that wouldn’t have Azamel coming to kill him? Best he could imagine was avoiding telling them that the Invictus were holding her home hostage with explosives, and that the woman had wanted to speak to him privately about becoming a new intermediary. Everything else? Any detail he could use to keep that blowtorch away from him, the better.

“Why did you visit her the first time?” he said.

“We ... we had an infestation, in the sewers.” Careful, leave Avery out of this. She might be your only hope for all you know. “Some sort of mindless monster thing. Looked like a spider. Azamel showed up not long before they did, so I asked her about it. She helped us pin down their location.”

“Monsters in the sewers?” Angela turned off the torch again, and shrugged as she looked at Jeremiah.

He returned the shrug, and took down a few notes. “Arachnid monsters hiding out in old tunnels and sewers are not unheard of.”

Jack doubted they meant Azlu, which meant there were other kinds of monsters that were spider-like. Ugh, why was the world dumping all this scary shit on him now, when before it'd been perfectly happy to let him live in ignorance of all this paranormal insanity.

“Something to tell Joanna about?” Angela said.

“Maybe. I—” A phone rang. Jeremiah sighed, put his journal away, stood up and pulled a smart phone out of his pocket. “Yeah? ... shit. Angela.” The man nodded his head to the side, toward the door. She made an annoyed groan to match his, and walked after him.

“Wait,” one of the guards said. “What do we do with the vamp?”

Angela shrugged and pointed at Jack. “Kid isn't even a year embraced. He's not getting out of those cuffs and he can't brainwash you with them on. Don't be an idiot and you'll be fine.”

And with that, they were gone, leaving Jack alone with the two guards. Finally, a god damn moment of peace, a moment to heal, to get his vitae working and fixing his wounds. Broken ribs, a concussion, lots of split skin, a hole in his leg. And it was only going to get worse. They were going to come back, and they were going to use that blowtorch to cut off his limbs, and then draw the alphabet into his stomach. They were going to fucking kill him.

“Shit, another? Stay on their tail.” Jeremiah's voice, from down the hallway.

He had to get out of here, back to Antoinette, back to Julias and the Invictus, back to a simple vampire's life of manipulating kine for money, for blood, but no one getting too hurt for it. Back to hiding in the shadows and, much as hiding in shadows sucked, back to enjoying the joys of his second life. Back to enjoying being in Antoinette's arms, his face in her breasts, melting into her. He was going to get back to that life, he was going to escape, one way or another.

Jack let his head droop, and let the pain make his body shake, let the quivers work up and down his legs, and let some small sobs break through. He wanted to cry, but right now, he wasn't sobbing to let out the need to cry. He was sobbing, quietly, barely, so the two hunters would think he was broken and weak. He wasn't. He was a Ventrue. A fucking Ventrue. He would not be broken by this.

He was stronger than Kindred his age. He knew it, Julias knew it, and other people were starting to realize it. But these hunters didn't know it. To them he was just another young Kindred they could bully because they knew what vampires were weak to, what they were afraid of. And yet, they were kine, and that meant they were his prey, not the other way around.

The two psychos may have been able to block his mind, his brainwashing abilities, but he doubted they could block bullets.

---

---

~~Eric~~

What drugs had he taken to get him this high? Alice in Wonderland much? Maybe he was still falling down a well, or rabbit hole, and just going down and down into a pit of insanity that made no sense.

“Beast! Show yourself!” The four hunters moved through the black, two of them holding rather powerful LED flashlights, held reverse grip under hands holding pistols. They were trained. The other two walked forward with shotgun in one hand, knife in other, hacking and slashing away at the vines of the jungle.

But Eric and Fiona had gone higher, and higher. She took his hand and guided him up branches, and branches, and more branches, until they were a hundred feet up in the canopy. He could hear howling, like monkeys or apes. And every so often, he could hear a growl, and as far as he knew, big cats didn't go around randomly growling.

This jungle wasn't normal. Fucking felt like he'd been dropped into Jumanji. God he wished he was dreaming.

"Stay here," she said, raspy voice almost inaudible in the jungle's breathing.

"... what?"

"I must deal with these hunters. Please stay here, remain safe." The spider monster pat his shoulder, and hovered away, her spider legs moving through the canopy of trees and green with barely a sound.

It was more than just barely a sound. It was without a sound. Her spider legs brushed against the foliage and leaves, but the foliage and leaves didn't respond. And as he squinted to see her movement, she faded away.

Faded. Just fucking faded. Vanished. It wasn't that she was just a dark-colored creature in a dark place, but something caused her body to blend into the black far more than she should have. The only thing he had to go by was the direction she was originally moving in, toward the hunters beneath them.

One of the hunters had a glowing necklace as well, something that was emitting white light in a slow pulse. The necklace had begun glowing when Fiona had started doing inhuman shit, attacking these 'hunters' with the crazy comic-book insanity.

Monsters. And apparently vampires? Wait, she'd laughed herself into stitches about the him getting fed to Jessy comment. Oh fuck, were Jessy and Natasha monsters too? Or vampires? Oh god oh fucking god what crazy fucking world had he—Gunfire. He almost jumped, but his grip was a constant vise on the tree trunk beside him. He was in dress shoes though, and they had no fucking grip for a mother fucking god damn wet-from-the-humidity tree branch. Fuck. Fuck fuck. He crouched as best he could, one hand still on the trunk, and another testing a vine. Stable. He held it tight, and stared down into the blackness below.

No way the hunters would be able to see him. From below, he'd just look like a part of the canopy, pitch black as it cast overwhelming shadows upon those under him. Their sources of light couldn't penetrate the canopy, and it was enough for him to see them, a little at least.

Whoever these people were, they were organized. They moved as a unit, even as they cut apart a jungle. Other than some mumbling curses, or demands for Fiona to show herself, they kept quiet. Not like people couldn't hear them, with all the chopping they were doing, but they didn't waste words either. Sometimes they turned to face each other, and in the light made some hand gestures; very trained, very professional.

Hunters, she'd called them. She was a monster. They were hunters. Was he on the wrong side in this? Why wasn't he running up to the hunters and asking for their help, for them to save him from the terrifying monster?

Ugh, cause if anything, you're part monster, with all the fucking crazy shit happening to you, and Fiona was a monster willing to help explain it. Lovely, just lovely, he was a bad guy in this shit show. Maybe he should just run up to them anyway, ask for their help, throw Fiona under the bus. He'd never done a damn fucking thing to deserve getting lumped in with monsters.

And he considered doing that for a second. Climb down the tree, hopefully not fall to his death in the process, and ask for their help. Explain it was all a misunderstanding.

Cause sure, that'd work. Just as likely to get a bullet between the eyes. And he couldn't do that to the girl. She'd done nothing to earn any ire from him. Hell if anything, she was the nicest girl he'd ever talked to, and that included Sheryl during their honeymoon phase. Monster? Yeah, apparently she was a monster, at least in the physical sense. A monster with a tiny waist and a huge rack.

That was kind of strange, wasn't it? The monster in the jungle looked like she had a rather sexually exaggerated figure, with a bunch of spikes and sharp limbs on top of it. It was creepy. Beautiful, and creepy, and scary. But, it wasn't as scary as it should have been. Rewind a few weeks and he was sure it'd be terrifying, sure that Fiona's monster side would have rendered him paralyzed in fear. Not anymore. A bit scared, yeah, but not terrified.

He stared from above, and tried to see if he could spot Fiona. Vral. Whatever. Couldn't see her, but he could see some leaves and vines adjust ever so slightly, enough so he could get at least some idea of where she was. But those massive spider legs made it difficult.

She was doing something, ahead of the four. Unseen, silent, she was weaving something, drops of white flicking across the tree trunks and buried in the shadows. She worked fast, still borderline invisible, but the white lines she created were not. He stared on, squinting to see through the darkness, and watched as black blades flicked through the dark, each planting another white line in the shadows. She was weaving a web, a big web, big enough for a human.

A spider in the dark, setting up the trap.

She'd told him about nightmares, her nightmares, from when she was younger. It was obvious she was looking for someone to put her woes on, to share some of her baggage with, and find a shoulder to lean on. Maybe he should have listened more, because it didn't seem like such juvenile baggage anymore, having a bunch of nightmares. Now it felt real. Now it felt like he should pay more attention to his own dreams, if this girl's nightmares about something dragging her into the dark was now what she was actually doing herself.

Gunfire. He almost fell off again, and dropped down low to squeeze the trunk and stabilize himself as best he could. In the hushed whispers of jungle life, and even the loud howls of nearby animals, it paled in comparison to random gunfire. His heart nearly jumped out of his mouth, and he swallowed it back down as he stared into the black. White flashes joined the lights, and again, more bangs.

“Get this shit off of me!” a woman said. Someone was trapped in one of the webs.

“Shit is fucking tough.”

“Here, I got it. Watch my back.”

Quick, seamless, a unit used to working together. They didn't hesitate to cover each other's backs and help each other the moment one of them was trapped. Really did make him wonder if he was actually helping the bad guy in all of this, and these hunters were the good guys. Good guys covered each other's backs like that. Good guys helped each other without hesitation. But, he didn't feel that, didn't sense that, didn't get any of that from these four from the way they looked at him, and Fiona. The sheer hate in their eyes, when they caught him and Fiona off guard? Now that had been terrifying.

“There!”

A shotgun blast. And then, screams, inhuman, loud, ear piercing. A weird rasp that would have fit a banshee. Eric winced and pulled his shoulders up to his ears, and another blast forced them higher. No scream this time.

“Jeremiah better get here soon. No fucking bane for this monster.”

“He didn’t mention anything about this Begotten.”

“Think he set us up?”

“Unlikely. You saw the size of his troop. Others hunters seem to think he’ll do right by them.”

“Or he’s just a good liar.”

“Stow it. And he did say use the knives. Better than nothing.”

“You really want to go melee with this thing?”

“Better than wasting bullets.”

They were whispering. Eric could hear them, over the jungle noise and through the canopy, ears straining but hearing. The four kept moving as they talked, and as they moved, two new blades were drawn. He could see the blades by the glint of moonlight; really fucking shiny knives. Too shiny, unnaturally shiny. Yeah, those weren’t regular knives. No idea what was special about them, but seeing them move through the jungle night, he felt his hairs stand up.

“Get out of my home.” Vrall’s voice, bouncing off of trees and mixing into the vines. Couldn’t locate the raspy voice, but its power echoed through the life and death of the jungle without issue.

The hunters said nothing, but their knives cut through more of the vines, and more as they pushed forward. Fucking fearless.

“Get out!”

Fiona's body slashed through the walls of the jungle, appearing from the side, and half of her massive blades sliced down through the branches, vines, and trunks of nearby trees alike.

The four hunters dived out of the way, rolling in the mud, catching twigs and roots and rocks on their bodies. Groans and curses abound, but their reactions were fast and harmonious, each throwing themselves out of the way with full commitment, and then rolling onto their feet and unloading their ammo. Two kept their pistols up, firing into the black and lighting it with their flashlights, while the ones with knives slashed out at the nearby limbs, their spare hands holding flashlights.

Fiona screeched, a splatter of blood painting nearby trees in red, a brighter shade of it than Eric expected. Again she disappeared into the black, and Eric winced for the hundredth time. They'd hurt her, bad.

"Get out!" Again the monster cried out, but remained hidden this time. Learned her lesson he guessed; the hunters were too damn fast.

"Fuck you, monster. Working with Azamel, or that psycho Athalia? Her daughter's going to do her in, Jeremiah's going to do Azamel in, Mark's next, and then we're going to clean this city up," one of the men said.

"Derrek, shut up."

Derrek shrugged. Probably thinking there was no way Fiona was going to get out of here alive, no harm in spilling info. A fatal flaw, or earned confidence.

So many names he'd never heard. Remember them, could be important.

“I’ve done nothing to harm you!” Fiona said. A blur of her shadow shot across the dark, and the two hunters unloaded more shells into the black. They missed. Fiona was dark, and right now, so dark even Eric couldn’t see her unless she was moving.

One of the hunters leaned in to her friend, shotgun still held up and aiming at anything that moved. “How the fuck is Jeremiah supposed to get here from the prison?”

“He said trust him.”

“I don’t fucking trust him.”

“I—shit!”

The four hunters dived out of the way, each throwing themselves at full force into different directions, whatever got them out of the way of the collapsing tree. A big tree, a tree so tall it reached past the top of the canopy, and its weight tore through the limbs of its brethren. That included Eric’s branch.

Shit.

---

---

~~Jack~~

“Then follow them!” Jeremiah’s voice echoed through the hallway outside Jack’s cell. Metal and concrete had a habit of doing that.

The conversation didn’t stop, but it did go further away, two steps of boots thudding against the hard floor. Thank god, thank fucking god. He choked down a sob, but another one came after, and he let it leak out of him as the pain blinded him. If he got out of this alive, he was going to go to Antoinette’s, not leave her tower for the next month at least, and fall asleep holding her tight every morning. Cause fuck this, fuck this shit, fuck these hunters and these fucking psychos. Fucking having them in the city, skulking around, hunting, killing. Killed Barry for nothing.

Anger. Anger was good. Anger he could use. Pain invited anger, and anger was one way to get the beast to the surface, to get that creature in his guts to bare its fangs and tear into something.

He inched his head upward enough to glimpse at the faces of the two remaining hunters. These two weren't the same as Jeremiah and Angela. They—fuck, what was it about Angela's face that seemed so familiar? Certainly not the glass eye. He'd probably remember meeting someone with a glass eyes. Either way, these two weren't the same as those other two. These two felt like normal kine, and when he managed eye contact with them, they adjusted their eyes and posture like normal kine would. Like nervous kine would.

He tried to pull up his vitae, to empower his body, to regenerate his wounds, and maybe tap into some of that resilience Ventrue and Gangrels were known for.

It wasn't happening. Not easily, at least. It had to be the handcuffs suppressing it, making it difficult to pull and manipulate the flow of vitae, it had to be. Enchanted fucking handcuffs. He pulled at them, squeezed on his muscles hard, and pried against the metal.

“Give it up kid,” one of the hunters said. “Vampires a lot older than you have been trapped by those.”

He kept trying, engaging his shoulders and pulling his arms apart harder, and harder. The metal started to cut into his wrists, splitting the skin enough to make him bleed if he'd still been human. Kindred blood took a more serious wound to warrant coming to the surface, but he was getting there, twisting and grinding his wrists and hands against the metal. Deep in his guts, he pulled at the pool of vitae in his core, in his being, in his beast, and forced it through the murky waters that buried him. These handcuffs were a pale comparison to the sorcery Lucas had used, and if Antoinette could still fight an army after that, then the least he could do was escape some handcuffs.

That's what he would have liked to think. And maybe if he could summon the raw strength of a Daeva or Nosferatu, or a Ventrue a hundred years older than him, he'd do that. But the metal wasn't bending, and he doubted most Kindred, Daeva or Nos or otherwise, would be able to get out of those cuffs at his age.

But he wasn't most Kindred.

"... how many vampires have you killed?" he said.

"What?"

"How many of us have you killed?" He grit his teeth and started to squeeze on his muscles again. The hunters were watching him, but he needed them to lower their guard, to not fear him. To get closer. "I'm ... pretty young, and ... never really ... thought hunters would come here."

One of them scoffed, and adjusted how she held her shotgun, unnecessarily.

"Been hunting for almost a decade, kid. How many do you think?"

He sighed and twisted his head a little. He could feel the vitae in there, buried and suppressed. But he could get it, he could find it, scratch it out of the weird layer of what-the-fuck-ever was keeping it down. These handcuffs weren't perfect, and he was going to get past them.

"... A few?"

"Try dozens." She came in closer, and leaned in to glare at him. A hard face, someone who'd seen a lot of shit, someone who wanted vampire dead cause she was a vampire hunter. What sort of twisted story did she have? Something worthy of a book, surely.

“ ... why?” Let’s find out. Get her closer.

“Why? Cause you fucks are a menace, spreading like flies and hiding in the shadows, killing people, ruining lives, why—”

The other hunter reached out and touched her shoulder. “Stace, he’s just goading you.”

“I’m ... not goading.”

“How many people have you killed?” the hunter Stacey said. She came in closer, and poked his skull with the butt of her gun. “You started this. How many humans have you killed?”

One human, just the one, and it wasn’t his fault. Not his fault. Not his fault.

“ ... one. I ... it was an accident.” Should have lied. Why didn’t he fucking lie?

“Yeah, hear that a lot. But here’s the big secret, fucking vampire.” She leaned in closer still, got right into his face, and glared at him. “You wouldn’t be the first vamp with only one or two kills under their belt, where it was an accident. In fact, it’s pretty god damn common. Strange how that keeps happening, isn’t it? Almost as if vamps are a bunch of rabid monsters that can’t control themselves, and need to be put down.” She poked him again, harder, and got into his face until he could feel her breath and fury against his skin.

He almost said he was sorry. He almost said that he regretted his one and only human kill to this day, that sometimes it haunted him, that sometimes he checked on Mrs. Pavala’s family, just to torment himself, just to remind himself how easy it was for a vampire to become a fucking monster. He almost spilled his guilt, his self loathing and pain over her, and asked for her forgiveness.

And then he grew the fuck up. He wasn't human anymore, and he had to accept that. He'd had. It wasn't murder anymore, it was feeding. A predator feasting on prey. They didn't have to kill their prey, but sometimes it happened, and sometimes that hurt. That was the struggle of a vampire, balancing the beast with their humanity. A kine would never truly appreciate that until they had a beast in their guts, changing their instincts, their reflexes, changing how they felt about everything. He wasn't human anymore, and that was that.

And that's how it was going to be, he realized. There'd be no even ground with these kine, these hunters, no way to get them to accept that Kindred were higher on the food chain. And maybe that's how it had to be, maybe that's how it should be, with hunters killing vampires who got too cocky, and vampires forever hiding in the shadows, protecting the Masquerade. No way for Kindred to ever truly reach a sort of compromise with kine. How do you convince sheep to let the wolf suck their blood on occasion, along with occasional fatalities? You don't.

Strange. Staring this livid woman in the eyes, it was oddly freeing, realizing that he could not ever come to peace with her. A ceasefire, maybe, hell maybe even a tense truce, but peace? Vampires preyed on humans, and no human would ever accept that. Why would they?

A small smile crept onto his face as he met her gaze of fire. No need to ask her to look into his eyes, none at all. And through the heavy weight of the handcuffs, he found his depths, found his beast, and pulled it up through the weight pinning it down. No, not pulling it. Breaking the chains that held it.

“You ... are mine.”

“What? You can’t be fucking serious. Kid you are a twerp, a tiny little vamp, young as fuck, and you’re wearing those ... hand ... cuffs...”

He smirked, and tore through her eyes and into her soul. “You. Are. Mine.”

“Stacey, the fuck?” The other hunter stepped in, and Jack threw his gaze at him as well.

“You. Are. Mine.” This was one easier. This one didn’t have fire to break through, tempered steel. This one was a pawn, a puppet, mind unguarded and soul exposed. And Jack reached out, and grabbed it.

The two hunters stood in front of him, and with wide eyes, jaws dropped, they waited.

“Good. The two of you will guard me with your lives until I am safe. I am your master from now on.”

“Yes master,” they said, in unison.

Jack breathed deep, and sat up straight. This wasn’t the usual way to dominate a mind, this wasn’t the gentle caressing he normally used to coax people’s thoughts, to mesmerize. This was different, this was total domination. Through the weight crushing his insides and trying to keep his Kindred disciplines at bay, the beast in him roared, snarled, free of the chains binding it, and unleashed its will upon the two helpless fools in his cell with him. This was something Viktor would do, break people and turn them into meat puppets; Julias didn’t like it, and neither did Jack.

He was going to get out of this prison though, one way or another.

“Where are the keys for the cuffs?”

“The handcuffs do not open with a key, or anything, master. They cannot be removed.”

God fucking damn it.

“How are the cuffs bound to the chair?”

“A padlock, master.”

“Keys for the padlock then?”

“Angela has them, master.”

Mother fucking piece of god damn worthless fucking shit fuck.

“Either of you have a crowbar, or can you get one?”

“No, master.”

Fuck. Fuck! He twisted and turned and banged his cuffs around against the back of the chair. The chair was bolted down, and the padlock wasn't going to break this way. If Angela had left the blowtorch, maybe that would have worked, but she hadn't.

Ok, maybe crushing their minds into mindless puppets incapable of a coherent thought wasn't the best plan. At the time it was the only way he could push past these damn cuffs, and the only way he'd get these two pawns doing what he needed them to do. But now his plan hit a wall, and quickly at that. So much for feeling so damn superior. Hubris, fuck you.

No, no, no. Fuck that. Fuck that, he wasn't going to just sit here and die to a couple of torturing psychos. He was getting out of here, no matter what it took.

“... You.” He nodded to the man. “Get out your knife, and cut off my hands. And do it fast.”

His whole body paralyzed. He'd said the words. He fucking said them, cause it was the only plan he could come up with. Hands off, handcuffs slide off, and he'd be free. Regrowing hands? Sure, he could do that, right? Probably. Maybe. Hopefully.

God, he was going to need a lot of blood, and several nights sleep, to regrow two hands.

Flip the switch in the brain, make logical decisions, and ignore the emotional state of the mind. Emotions are not logical, emotions are reactive and mindless and without concern for reality. Emotions did stupid shit like make you not do something because you were afraid of pain, even if you logically knew the outcome was worth it. He was good at flipping that switch.

But he wasn't good with pain.

The hunter didn't hesitate. He grabbed one of Jack's hands, and started cutting. Jack thought he knew pain, but every fucking day of this second life, it found ways to introduce him to new levels of it.

Metal, cutting through skin, slicing through muscle, tendon, cartilage. And then, using pure strength, the hunter cut through bone. It took a moment for the pain to kick in, just like getting a really nasty paper cut and the sting only happening a second later when the body realized what just happened. Except a million times worse.

He started to shake, and then, to scream. They'd hear, and they'd be running down to see what was going on. He had maybe twenty seconds he figured to get control, to manage the outcome, to guide the events a way a Ventrue should.

"The other! Quickly!" God, his voice was a wavering, cracking mess. Anymore and he was going to burst into tears, and he wasn't even blushing life. Fuck, please, let this work, he couldn't take any more of this. No more, no more pain for just a few seconds.

And then the hunter started cutting off the other hand, with just as much brutality and brevity as before.

The sound of his hands falling to the floor, withered husks quickly drying to a corpse, were the biting ice on the scorching inferno of pain working up his arms. Any and all DNA evidence was ruined, just a pile of compromised ashes in the shape of a hand. Older vampires would leave nothing but ash behind, but not him, he was way too young.

It wouldn't have been so overwhelming if he'd only needed to get one hand off, but the cuffs wouldn't fit through where the padlock was locked to the chair. He needed both off. And now with both off, he forced himself to stand, and looked at the jagged stumps of his limbs.

Stay. Standing. Stay. Standing.

Bone and flesh, the dried and withered flesh of a vampire. The thick Kindred blood that coated the bones worked quick to keep more of the blood from pouring out, but the wound was too great to stop it completely. And, as he let his arms drop to his sides, he heard the splish splash of his blood hitting the floor of the prison.

Stay. Standing. Ignore the pain. Ignore the agony, the searing fire working up through your limbs. Every part of him wanted to squeeze on something, and every time his muscles made the attempt, his body started to shake with new waves of pain. He had no hands. He had no fucking hands. Another scream escaped him as the pain struck him like a steel pipe against his skull, acid working down his limbs and back up into his brain until it felt like it was going to explode.

Footsteps, rushing down the hall. No time, no time to stand here and agonize over his agony. No. Fucking get ready, get ready. Get ready!

Two hunters came through the doorway. “What the fu—”

“Kill them.”

The two hunters at Jack’s side unloaded their shotguns. They weren’t just kine with shotguns, they were trained marksmen, trained killers. They didn’t miss or hesitate or any of the things he’d have to worry about with dominating normal kine. These tools were perfect.

The two other hunters managed only a second of surprise, eyes wide, panicked, torn, before they both went down. His tools didn’t aim to wound, they aimed to kill, as he instructed. The enemy fell backward, chunks of their faces and skulls splattered against the cell wall. And Jack should have looked away. But it was only a second’s time, just long enough for him to see the look of death in their eyes before they were murdered.

Don’t think about it, keep moving. He couldn’t wait, couldn’t stand here and get trapped, get pinched inside the cell. He had to get out there and get moving.

“You, what’s your name?”

“Henry, master.”

“Henry, you will cover our back. Stacey, cover the front.”

“Yes master.” Again, in unison.

Jack marched forward, two living tools at his side, and stepped over the bodies. Ignore the fact they were the first humans you’d ever killed while in control of yourself, ignore that, ignore that you’d turned these kine into tools and were probably going to get them killed as well. The pain of his wounds was constant, unending, like he’d stuck his hands inside boiling water and he’d just left them there. And he ignored it. Lament the pain later, when it was safe, when he could take the time to get a proper meal. Flip the switch. Logical choices only.

A prison. Cells, bars, and lights. He didn't know how they had power going in an old abandoned prison, but then maybe that's why they picked this place to take him. So they must have known. Jeremiah and his psycho partner may not have been setting up a base here, but it wasn't just some random drop off zone for him. That meant there may very well have been more hunters.

And there were more. He could hear them, boots hitting the floor, many of them ahead. Had Jeremiah lied to him about this not being his base? Either way, there were a lot of people coming to investigate the noise.

He walked forward, passing the empty cells, stumps dripping blood at his side for each step. Shirtless, pants a mess and with a big hole through one leg of them. He wasn't blushing life, so his skin was pale, body thin, musculature more defined like a dehydrated person's would be. Hell, he must have looked like a zombie. He smirked through the pain, and kept walking.

Someone must have seen what was happening, and communicated it out to the others, because instead of another hunting running in blindly to see what the shooting was about, three hunters poked their heads around the doorway at the end of the hallway. And then they opened fire.

Crushing minds and communicating with animals, Jack knew these skills were coming to him quickly. Ventrue were also naturals at resilience, to be able to take a bullet to the chest and get right back up. And Jack knew he sucked at it. He threw himself to the side and into one of the cells, and screamed as he landed on his side, one of his stumps smacking against the concrete floor.

His two slaves opened fire, each ducking into their own cells and poking their heads out only long enough to unleash some bullets or shells.

“Jack you fucking little shit! Let them go!” Angela’s voice echoed down the hall. Sounded pissed. “How the fuck did you get out of those cuffs? Should have locked down any piss-ant vamp!” And when she was pissed, she had a habit of saying too much, giving stuff away. Good to know. “Where are Mitchell and Jacky?”

Damn it. Would have been easier if he didn’t know their names. Attaching names to their shocked expressions before shotguns tore them apart was not a good thing to do.

“Dead.” Maybe, if she was pissed off enough, she might make a really bad mistake.

“You’re fucking dead! Dead! I’m going to split you open, rip out your guts, and send the ashes to your girlfriend, you fucking shit welp! Dead!”

Holy crap. If he couldn’t get out of here, she really would do that shit, and it’d take him days to die as she slowly tortured him to death. Christ she was terrifying. And insane. And stupid.

No Jeremiah though, where was he? The fuck had the phone call been about? Whatever, an opportunity was an opportunity and—a rat! Hiding in the corner, in the darkness of the empty cell,.

Jack almost rolled onto his nonexistent hands, before he stopped. The pain had become a constant drumming, persistent, almost overwhelming but not quite, enough that he could function. And, with a single glance at the rat, he grabbed its mind. “Come here.”

It sprinted over to him and stood at attention.

“Good. Now, get your friends. I’m not getting out of here without an army. I need an army.”

The rat nodded, and scurried out into the hallway before disappearing down its length, away from the gunfire.

Jack forced himself back to his feet. Don't use your hands, don't use your fucking nonexistent hands. If anything, keep your mind half on the pain, to remind yourself you don't have hands anymore. Once standing, he looked out past the bars of the cell enough to see the hunters waiting for him. They'd stopped firing. The only people still launching bullets were Jack's new bodyguards, and only when they saw an opportunity to try and land a shot. But so far, no one had shot anyone. Angela's hunters were reluctant to shoot their friends, and reluctant to stick their own heads out and get shot.

A minute or three was exactly what he needed. Rest for a second, tap into his core, pull at more of his vitae, and wait for his army to amass. And he knew he could do it. Somehow, he fucking knew it. He should have been wiped, should have been on the ground screaming about his hands, crying out in agony and then falling into torpor, no energy to remain conscious. But he wasn't, and he knew, as he grit his teeth until his jaw clicked, that he could do more.

“Let me go and no one else has to die.”

“Like I'm going to let some fucking vamp outta here!” she said, voice bouncing down the hallway.

“You started this!” He poked his head out enough to see down the hall, and glanced around to take some stock of his situation. No catwalk over him or anything, just a single floor hallway with probably eight cells on each side, and he was close to the wrong end of the hall.

“You're just a leech, a stupid fucking blood leech. Your words mean nothing. Lay down and fucking die.”

“... you're not making a good argument for me to spare the lives of your friends.” He looked across the hall to his tools. Man and woman, each poking their heads out just enough to keep an eye on the enemy, each with empty gazes almost like porcelain dolls.

“This isn’t a fucking conversation you fucking insect. Let them go and I’ll kill you quickly, best offer.”

“ ... you suck at negotiating. You wouldn’t last five minutes at an Invictus contract meeting.”

“Shut up! You’re a cancer, a fucking cancer. You’re all ants to be walked on to get to my real goal. Housing fucking monsters, fucking Azamel, and just letting them nest? I’m going to rip out your fucking throat and film it all so your fucking bitch girlfriend can see it. And then I’m going to burn down this city, all of you, and record the fucking screams for a nice fucking lullaby to sleep by!”

Wow. Just wow. Psycho was right on the money. And, as he listened to her insane babbling, a familiar chill worked through his body, fear on his toes and traveling up his spine. This woman was terrifying. Reminded him of Athalia, hate and anger included.

Some squeaks behind him drew his attention. More rats, a dozen, and more coming in through the cracks of black, through the shadows, quick scurrying in front other cells, and more through the holes years of neglect and weather caused. More, and more, and more. They kept coming, droves of them, dozens, and then dozens more, and then hundreds. They stood in lines, rows and rows of beady eyes starring up at him. And more. And more.

He stood there, and watched the cell floor around him grow into a carpet. So many rats. His voice had carried far more weight than he’d realized, and it’d somehow echoed throughout the rats that had spread it. That wasn’t normal. But, normal or not, it’s what was happening. More rats came in through the holes in the walls, and many from other cells did their best to remain hidden to join his growing army.

There must have been food, rations or something in the basement of the prison, some place where they stored provisions, for so many rats to be here. Negligent of the government; nothing new there. He smiled as he watched the army grow, and felt his pride begin to swell as his army swelled along with it. It was almost enough to make him forget the pain he was in.

Would Viktor have been proud? Did he want that old monster to be proud of him? Viktor had been a powerful Kindred, even for his age. Julias was the same, better even, relative to his age. And Jack was following in that path, he knew that, and this was proof. What sort of history did Viktor have, where did his bloodline come from, did bloodline even play a factor in any of this? No one fucking knew, except for maybe the Lancea et Sanctum and their records.

Mental note: ask Damien. For now, survive.

He looked at his amassing army, and again reached down into his gut, into the pool of unlife, of energy, of vitae he had within him to enact his commandments.

“All of you, protect me with your lives.”

The multitude of rats nodded. Unending, alive, an army of claws and teeth and scurrying little bodies.

“Now, come, we—” The tink tink of metal rolling along the floor yanked his attention, and he spun around. Grenade? No, Angela wanted to save the lives of her hunters.

The object rolled onto the floor by his cell. Longer, thinner than a grenade. And a lifetime of video games told him what that was. That was fucking flash-bang.

“Cover it!” He threw up his arms to cover his eyes, and screamed in agony as once again, muscles squeezed down to try and work hands that weren’t there anymore. But he kept his arm there, turned around, and waited for inevitable explosion, the sound, the light. It didn't come. Instead, a loud but pale comparison to the expected noise erupted, nothing more than a muffled cry. And no light followed.

He turned around. In the center of the hallway, a pile of rats were spread about, dead or injured, and dragging their half-torn bodies across the concrete with trails of blood. The shards of the flash-bang sat in the hall, surrounded by dead rats.

He frowned, and again began to grit his teeth. Enough of this fucking absurdity.

He stepped out into the hallway, and pointed his bleeding arms down its length. His two hunter friends jogged ahead of him, each ducking into cells and readying their guns. But it wasn't them that he was relying on to get him out of here, it was his army of rodents.

The rats came to him, and swarmed ahead of him, each only a tiny body, but together they flooded down the hall as a battalion. Perhaps it was his blood, how it still dripped from him, how he'd left a trail of it behind him as he walked that had summoned so many rats? Viktor had done similar to summon his army, and perhaps Jack had accidentally done the same. No, that wasn't how disciplines worked, you didn't accidentally do them. And yet, the rats came to him, rushed past him, and flooded him, just like that night Viktor had summoned thousands of them.

“Hunters, guard me. Rats, ahead.”

The rats didn't hesitate. The unending swarm flooded ahead, and as they poured through the bars guarding the ending of the hall, the screams began. Then, the gunshots.

“Get off me, get off me!” Angela's voice. No girly screams though, just pure rage, frustration, and more shotgun shells met with the squeaky deaths of his army.

His two hunters each took a side at the end of the hall, backs to the wall, each guarding the other's six as they both peeked into the hallway that they were trying to reach. The hallway gate was closed, but not locked. They probably couldn't find the key to lock it, thank god; he couldn't mind control a metal door to open. He groaned as he stuck his stump through the bars, and forced the gate to slide over.

He looked down the hall, both sides, and frowned. The hunters were retreating down one of the halls, shooting at the rats, or tearing them off of their legs. One of the hunters had fallen, and was roaring agony as he ripped the biting, clawing little balls of fur off his body. He was close, close enough for Jack to see his eyes.

“You. Get over here. Now.”

“Fuck you! Fuck ... you...”

Like crushing grapes. He could feel it, feel their mind even from such a distance, even through this chaos, even with only glancing eye contact.

“Come. Here.”

“Don't listen to him Johnny, don't—” Another shotgun blast into the unending flow of rats. The swarm was unending, and the hunters knew if they didn't keep it at bay, it would overrun them. To be devoured alive by rats, even he did not wish that fate on these hunters. But if given the opportunity, he'd take it.

Johnny came closer, and closer, until he stood only inches from Jack. Eyes, empty. Arms limp at his sides, gun loose in his hand.

“Lower, so I may drink.”

The mindless man leaned down, and Jack did not hesitate to crane his neck to meet him. He sank his fangs into his neck, and began to kill the man.

“Johnny no!”

The drama of it all. It was sickening. In another circumstance, he might have laughed at how bad of a ridiculous action movie this whole situation reeked of, hunters on the retreat from a swarm of mind-controlled rats, and screaming out for their doomed comrade. Being in the situation destroyed any humor for it. This was horrible, and every passing moment he felt more horrible. But he needed blood, and Johnny was going to give it to him.

He spared no mercy with the Kiss. Done hard, done fast, done rough, there was no pleasure to be given to the prey here, only a nigh paralyzing exhaustion. For the Kindred performing the act, it was exhilarating. It was a rarity for Jack to ever feed like this, brutally, but each time it was a mark on his memory, each time it left its imprint in him, how satisfying it was to give into the beast's desire to satisfy its hunger. Blood, sweet, delicious, thick blood coating his tongue, his mouth, his throat, filling him with life itself.

He growled. The beast growled. The man fell to his knees, exhausted to the point he couldn't stand anymore, but still Jack didn't let go, bite secure on the hunter's muscle. More, and more. He drank it all, drank it until it stopped coming out easily, drank it until it stopped coming out on its own at all, drank until he had to suck on the puncture wounds to pull out the last of the blood. Only then did he release his bite, and let the man, the corpse fall.

He stared at the empty eyes of Johnny. God he wished Angela hadn't said his name. Like Mrs. Pavala, more names he'd never forget, and that was not a good thing. It would eat at him when this was over, claw at his conscience, gnaw at his heart until he was a mess. A weak, crying mess.

But it wouldn't do that now, he wouldn't let it. For now, he growled a vampire's growl, and let the flood of energy fill him. He wouldn't be regrowing his hands yet, but the stumps healed over now that he had fresh blood within, and the pain greatly subsided.

As sickening as it was to be killing, murdering, a small part of him was enjoying how good he was as it, too good for a vampire his age.

He looked down at the rats that still surrounded him. "Destroy the evidence, destroy the body."

Loyal to the core, the rats pounced upon the corpse of the hunter. They bit through the clothes, swarmed over his flesh, and began to devour him. No time to lick the fresh bite wounds closed, and the body had to be removed regardless. A bloodless corpse would attract attention, especially considering all the other traces of paranormal violence that were being left around.

Jack felt alive again, as much as a vampire could be. The blood pulsed through him, and he growled louder as he felt the sated beast purr its satisfaction, inside his guts. Satisfied, but also, empowered. He could keep going, he could go on. He could break these hunters, and get out of here, back to Antoinette, back into her arms, even if he had to walk over the corpses of a hundred hunters. Even if he had to make a bridge of corpses to cross.

"You," he said to a group of the rats behind him. "Spread out, find more, bring more of your kind here. Bring all that you can find to me."

He stepped out into the next hall, and continued his march. His two guards dashed in after him and darted ahead, each taking up positions along the long hallway. Nothing to duck behind this time though. There were other cells, but they were isolation cells, closed. Behind him was a dead end, and ahead of him was Angela and more of her crew. How many hunters did she have?

He marched forward, rats pouring in from more cracks, more and more, until they poured over each other to try and fit along the hallway floor. The hunters at the end of the hall, poking their head around the corner and looking through the bars, gasped.

“Get out of my way and you get to live.”

“Fuck you! What the fuck is this? You’re just a fucking kid, a fucking fledgling vamp, you don’t get to do this!”

She wasn’t doing a very good job with the morale. The hunters looked panicked, eyes wide. And why wouldn’t they be? He was coming for them, bloody stumps for arms, shirtless, and with an army of rats at his beck and call. He only now realized that blood was on his lips, his chin, and some had run down his neck and onto his bare chest. The blood of their friend, their comrade Johnny.

He must have looked like a god damn monster.

He snarled as he marched forward. A glance left and right showed more beady eyes, more rats poking their noses out of their hiding holes. Instead of running from the madness, the echoes of his command drew them.

“You. Are mine. Defend me with your lives.”

The new rats nodded, and jumped into the fray, chittering, scurrying, and they joined the flood of brown fur. Many stayed close to him, flowing around his steps, avoiding getting crushed by his shoes, and yet pouring over them at the same time. They joined the teeming masses of his army, and poured out into the hallway, like ocean waves.

Is this what it felt like for Viktor? Did the elder find it so strangely easy to break the minds of others, to grab their conscious thoughts and crush them until they were mindless, obedient puppets? Did he find it so easy to summon animals to his side, to defend him and be his scouts, be his army of teeth and claws? Did it feel so empowering, so amazing for him too?

Jack walked forward, and the rats flowed around him, an aura of squeaking death. Another flash-bang was tossed into the hallway, and again the rats swarmed it, far more of them this time, a couple hundred piling into a riling mass of little bodies. Many died to the resulting explosion, but the sound, the flash of the device was suppressed to nothing more than a quiet plop, and Jack continued on without stopping. If the enemy had been smart, they'd have tossed a grenade or molotov, and accepted the loss of their friends Henry and Stacey. Probably still hoping they could save them. Their hopes would be their undoing.

He felt good. He felt great, pain and death and the taste of blood mixing into a crescendo of euphoric violence, silencing his grief over the murders he'd committed. He felt Viktor's bloodline coursing through his veins. He felt like crushing more of these idiot hunters beneath him. How dare they underestimate him because he was young, the youngest in Dolareido. How dare they try and bully him, torture him, break him. How dare they injure him. How dare these lowly bloodbags try and manipulate him.

He could hear shouting from beyond the hall of metal and concrete, the loading of weapons, the hollers of commands being given. 'Spread out'. 'Get behind these tables'. 'If we have to kill Stace and Henry then do it'. They'd learn, they'd all learn.

At first, he was only going to kill if necessary. But now the sweet blood was on his tongue, and he couldn't help but lick his fangs as he continued into the awaiting maw of his enemies.

If there was one way he was going to die, it wasn't here, to this, to them. He was going to kill every last one of them.

Chapter 49

~~Beatrice~~

Nearing Azamel's hole in the ground, back in a place she very much didn't want to be. But this was how the magic happened, throwing yourself into the deep end and seeing if you could swim. She had Jacob with her, so at least he'd help her out if she started drowning. Hopefully. Maybe.

Azamel's place was still maybe a quarter mile ahead, and each step down the abandoned tunnel sent larger and larger chills up Triss's spine. She could feel it, her, the old woman, feel the oppression the monster radiated, like something thick in the air. Felt like trying to swim through some sort of sludge, something that made you not want to be there.

And it wasn't like that the first time she'd come here. It was there, but it wasn't like this, not like this.

It wasn't just a feeling either. The tunnel was flickering, fading in and out, and the moving shadows weren't rare anymore. They were everywhere. And to make it even creepier, they weren't always black. Sometimes, bits of purple or red sneaked into the waves of shadow, and sometimes bits of gold.

It only got worse the closer they got to Azamel's place. Sometimes the tunnel faded out, pitch blackness swallowing them, only for a brief flash of something to appear. White pillars with golden platforms circling their contours every twenty feet or so, with small lighthouse-like shapes on the top, and red drapes with gold embroidery hanging from them. And then they were gone, and the two vampires were again walking in a long, boring, abandoned subway tunnel.

Then again it flashed, back in a dream, back in some sort of madness of long stretches of green grass, trimmed, tall, weird bushes, and a river that flowed. Again, gone, replaced with dirty train tracks, concave walls of concrete brick, and the old, dusty floor around them.

Again, more flashes, except now puddles of blood lined white stone floor. Guillotines beneath a red sky, a dozen of them, each with a fresh body to bleed red into the puddles. The pools of red connected into a small, carved ravine in the white floor, and followed its twisting snake-like shape into the river, where the blood flowed away. Then they were back to the tunnel, and its curve at the end where it opened up into Azamel's home.

A big, empty room of concrete, with a stage a foot or two high off the floor. Here, Azamel had set up Grandma's place, rocking chair and shitty furniture included.

But it wasn't Grandma's place. Holy fucking shit. Beatrice gasped and stepped back as she looked up, gulping down nothing and eyes widening until her new eye started to hurt. A blood moon, literally. A giant red moon far far far too close to the planet, so big it filled half the sky. It bled red, thick, a liquid that fell upon the palace that stood before her, some sort of palace made of white stone, smooth, carved, ornate, with tall pillars surrounding it, and multiples domes on its roof topped with gold spears.

Guillotines were spread around the palace courtyard, and they bled into the twisting, turning man-made stream of red that leaked out into the river beside the palace. More than just guillotines added to the death show, but spears with corpses mounted on them, skin flayed or backs split open from what had to be a hundred strikes from a whip. And then gone again, back to the concrete, the shitty old lights that were somehow still working, and the god awful lamp plugged into an extension cord on granny's stage.

Her, sitting in her chair, rocking back and forth and smoking a cigarette, an old book in hand. Triss tried to hide her trembling.

“What are you doing here, old man?” she said.

Jacob laughed, predictably. “Pot calling kettle.”

“And you have an eye. You looked better with the bandage.”

“Yeah well, I couldn’t see you all too well without the eye.”

“See me?” Azamel coughed, coughed, and coughed a few more times until Triss was sure she’d cough up a lung. But it passed, and she tapped her slippers on the stage floor twice as she took another drag of her cig. “I had always assumed you could see without eyes.”

“I can, but now, I can see you.”

“You ... can see me?” She leaned forward, set an elbow against the chair arm, and her chin in the palm, cigarette between her fingers. Her eyes, old, worn, stared into Jacob with a piercing gaze Triss didn’t expect from an old woman.

And then the world changed around her again. The guillotines, the spears, and other devices of torture were set about, some with people still in them. Screams filled the air, and Beatrice raised her hands to cover her ears to block them out. But they were constant, rising and falling in volume like waves in a sea of torture. The palace was closer now, and the blood that poured from the moon above dripped down its shiny white walls like slime.

But now there was something in front of the palace, and Triss backed away again until she felt her butt hit the concrete behind her. An elephant? No, some sort of person with an elephant head, but from head to toe they had the skin of an elephant. Four arms, human, but each hand held a chain, and from each chain dangled something Triss did not want to see. A corpse from one. A giant net filled with fresh skulls in the other. And finally, a sword in both of the remaining hands, scimitars. They were coated in blood, and dripped of it, unending, as if they themselves were bleeding.

The size was impossible. No way, there was no fucking way something this big was real, no way it could have existed. It towered over them, fifty feet tall sitting down, with legs folded in front of it crossed at the ankle, knees apart.

She recognized that figure. She knew absolutely shit all about religions or Hinduism, but she recognized an iconic figure when she saw one, looming over her like a god ready to squash a buzzing insect.

The image faded away, replaced with the sobering world of concrete and tunnels, electricity and shitty green chair that should have been burned for its crime against eyes everywhere.

“... you can see me.” Azamel blew smoke toward them, but it dispersed long before reaching them. “No, silly girl, I am not who you think I am.” Another deep drag of her cig, and she shrugged as she leaned back in her shitty, creaking recliner. “I’m not even from the East.”

“I ... I ... uh ... I—”

“And I do not appreciate prying eyes!” She slammed one of her slippers down. Not a slipper, not a fucking slipper at all. As the images of the two realities overlapped, the giant elephant thing raised a leg, and slammed it against the white, bloodied stone that it sat upon.

And the world began to quake. The rivers of blood began to boil, rippling with the vibrating world, and the blood moon cried out its agony, a deep bellowing sound like a great whale speared through its side. The corpses began to moan, the heads that sat about their prostrated or pinned bodies crying out to the sky. Blood leaked from their nostrils, ears, their mouths, and their eyes. It flowed into the twisting blood river, and the edges of the small stream splashed up, over, and onto the white that surrounded Triss.

Back to the real world, back to old granny sitting in her chair, glaring at the two vampires who had the audacity to enter her shitty home.

Oh good fucking god they were going to die.

“A big girl, aren’t you?” Jacob said.

Triss grabbed him by the arm and started to shake the damn bastard. “I’m sorry, did you not see the giant monster woman. Did you not see the fucking corpses? Don’t piss off the giant monster woman!” she said, listening in close to whisper.

Jacob snickered, and kept his eye on the granny in the chair. “So you old bat, I have some questions for you.”

She snorted, and flicked the cigarette his way. He dodged. Even a lit cigarette could be nasty painful to a vampire.

“You bring your blood magic to my home so you can pry into my world, sneak a peek at my true self, and now you have questions for me? The nerve.”

“That I do. Turns out you’ve been busy in the time you were gone. I’d heard you’d destroyed villages before your first arrival in the city, but even after you left Dolareido, you destroyed some towns. Why oh why would a nice old lady like you do such a thing.”

Poking the bear with a hot iron poker. Dead. Yeap, they were dead.

“I pursue my inheritance.”

“So I heard, but you’ll have to forgive me. I’ve no idea what that means.”

“ ... and how did you hear that this was my goal?”

Jacob shrugged, laughed, and did a small spin in place. “My secret.”

The old woman snarled, and reached into her god awful sweater vest to pull out a pack of cigarettes. Trembling hands struggled to retrieve another cancer stick, and she growled down at the package as it fought against her. But with time, one succumbed to her assault, and she set it on her lips and lit it like it was the most natural thing to her, like someone putting on their glasses that they’d been wearing for a hundred years.

It was probably Black Blood that told Jacob about this, but then how did that freak show know? And what the fuck was inheritance, if even Jacob and Black Blood didn’t know what it meant?

“Mark. Get rid of these two.”

Triss almost squeaked as a man stepped out from behind a four panel room divider on the stage, some shoddy piece of hazel crap that she could probably buy at a flea market for a dollar. The man looked entirely forgettable, dark skin, a bit overweight, clean shaven with short, curly hair. Some jeans and a worn out gray shirt covered what she guessed was a fair amount of muscle to go with that fair amount of fat.

How had she not sensed him? Jacob didn’t look surprised, but she was, and she snarled as the unknown man started to walk toward them.

“I’m not leaving,” Jacob said. “Jack’s disappeared.”

“ ... has he?” Azamel said.

“As if you didn’t know.”

“Perhaps I didn’t?”

“Well, you know now. And I bet you know what’s happened to him.”

Azamel raised a hand, and blocked Mark’s forward march. “What does a witch care for the Invictus boy?”

Jacob shrugged. “Kid’s great, isn’t he? Has this nasty habit of getting to the truth of things, and opening his mouth about it when he should probably just keep his lips sealed.” Old Joker started to pace, and put his hands against the small of his back as he walked around. Fucking Sherlock Homes being a jackass. “Avery asked for his help in being an intermediary with her and the Kindred here. Makes perfect sense, given this is a vampire’s city, and the werewolves are just guests. Given your recent strifes with the Invictus, Athalia’s talk with Jack at the ball was probably you asking him to be the same thing, wasn’t it?”

Well. Damn, she should have realized that. Or maybe she shouldn’t have, cause Azamel’s frown was only growing, and she lowered her hand once more.

Mark jumped down from the stage, and walked toward Jacob. The flickering realities struck Beatrice once again, and she sneered at the sight of Mark, at the weird, worm-like entities crawling on the man’s skin. Big, slimy, gross worm things, all over him.

Not all over him. Him. They were him. The worms worked into his flesh, and out again, out through his nostrils and where eyeballs should have been, then back into his ears. One worked up the jaw, the exposed bone letting it wriggle up into the man’s skull, and then down into his rib cage. A skeleton, but not. A cloak of something like dark, leathery, wet skin was draped over his shoulders, but the chest was undone, and the skeleton inside was visible as Triss's eye exposed the hidden nightmare's form.

She could smell rotting flesh. Jacob's eye was doing a lot more than letting her see the nightmares these monsters brought with them. It was letting her experience them.

"You don't want none of this, Mark." Jacob raised a hand, index finger pointed down, and twirled it around. "Just turn around and walk away before I put you in the ground."

Mark sneered, raised his hands, and cracked his knuckles. Not a word from him though, the silent lackey type. If he'd been wearing some brass knuckles, it would have fit the motif perfectly. But not the rotting motif, the corpse walking around motif, the disgusting stench and stomach-turning display motif. As he came closer, Triss took another step back, hand raised to cover her nose.

"Hey, don't say I didn't warn you." And out came Jacob's fist. At first Triss thought her boss might give the Begotten a warning punch, something to let him know the man meant business. Surely something to let the idiot know what it meant to fuck with an elder Kindred, especially one as old as Jacob.

But, no, Jacob didn't do things the way you'd expect. He gave Mark a proper punch, the sort of punch he used on Antoinette, the sort of punch that destroyed jaws to the point they ripped off the face. This Mark fellow was going to die.

Mark fell apart. His body shattered around Jacob's fist, but didn't get sent flying backward. Instead, he fell to the ground, and him, his clothes, everything just fell away into a giant pile of really big worms. Like, foot long worms, an inch thick and shiny with their slimy, wriggling bodies. And not in the weird nightmare world either that Beatrice could see, or at least not only there. It was in both worlds, a big mess of gross.

“Couldn’t hold together, heh.” Jacob marched over to the pile of worms, and glared down at its writhing mass. “You’re not the first Begotten to try this trick.”

“Oh?” Azamel said. “I think you underestimate my companion.”

Jacob shrugged, and dusted off his shoulder. “We don’t have to fight. I came here for information, about you, and Jack. Just tell me —”

The old man jumped back, and frowned at the mess of worms. It was rebuilding itself, but coming for Jacob at the same time, spreading out over the floor. One-eye snorted and kicked at the pile, and a dozen of the giant slimy bodies splattered, guts and such landing around the concrete beneath them. But, the guts, the gooey skin, the slime, they started to pool back together, until the worms were whole once again.

“Ooh, impressive,” her boss said.

Yeah, she was going to stay out of this and just watch for a little bit. Cause, gross.

There were more worms though. Triss raised a brow as she looked around, and grit her teeth as the flickering realities fought to break her mind. A trail of worms, of big, fat, juicy worms were mixed into the nightmare world. She didn’t understand it, didn’t get it, but was pretty sure she wasn’t in the nightmare so it wasn’t like she had to worry about all the crazy shit she was getting glimpses of. They weren’t in the nightmare, right? Fiona said you had to go into it, that you couldn’t be in both at the same time. But, also, the beast and horror kind of were? Didn’t make any fucking sense.

But that’s what the eyes were for, to try and figure out how these Begotten things worked. And so far they worked really fucking scary like. She took another step back as more worms started to appear, and more, and more, until she could feel them pressing up against the toes of her boots and she had to jump back again to get away from them.

Jacob felt no such compulsion. He folded his arms across his chest, and watched the sea of worms begin to grow around them. Deeper, more of them, until it was up over the ankles.

Time to nope the fuck out. Triss jumped, a good twenty feet through the air, to land on Azamel's stage. "Yeah, uh ... I'm just gonna watch if that's ok with you."

The old monster shrugged, and kept her eyes on the sea of gross surrounding her home. It was getting darker too, and Triss had to cover her new eye with a hand to make sure it was something actually happening, not more fake nightmare shit. It was real.

Mark's hand shot out of pile of worms, near Jacob's leg, and grabbed his ankle.

"The fu—" The old man went down, yanked and yanked hard. The teeming pile of worms was a foot deep, and it surrounded Jacob for thirty feet on all sides of him. More than enough space for Mark to hide and strike out. When he did, Triss covered her normal eye, and watched a skeleton draped in a cloak of old flesh strike out from the foul mound, bony fingers clutching the Nosferatu's leg and yanking on him to the side.

Like watching a shark thrash around, some helpless seal in its mouth getting torn to bits. Jacob didn't tear, but the comparison was apt. Mark's hand moved left and right through the ocean of worms, his form hidden underneath the surface, and Jacob's body was dragged along at speeds fast enough to break bone. Left, right, each thrash crashing Jacob's limbs against the worms, whiplash causing the sorts of sounds that made Triss wince and groan. Dislocating limbs.

Jacob reached down, wrapped his fingers around the hand, and returned the unwanted yank. Up came Mark, out of the mountain of death, and out into the open. Dislocated limbs or not, Jacob stared at the man, growled at him, raised him up by the collar of his shirt, and shook him.

“You’re annoying me, pest. You think you know nightmares? Think you understand nightmares? You’re just a fucking child, someone given a gift, and you didn’t earn it.” Jacob threw the man down into the worms, and glared at him as Jacob’s limbs, his knees, his elbows, all snapped back into their proper orientations, each with a crunch. “Want a nightmare? Here’s a fucking nightmare.”

Mark was unfazed by all of this. Didn’t say a word, didn’t grumble or groan, and his facial expressions seemed just as bored, as if none of this was a threat. If Jacob took another swing at him, Triss figured he’d just melt apart into more worms.

But then he started to grumble. Squirm, groan, and then the Begotten raised his hands to cover his eyes. His voice started to come out, a normal, a perfectly normal sounding voice, except it was getting louder, more pained, filled with rasped screams, until the screams were ringing off the walls.

The worms vanished, faded away, some melting into goo that dispersed into nothing, and others vanishing like dust in the wind. The poor man fell forward onto his elbows and knees, clutching his face, screaming into his palms as he was trapped between a sob and a death cry.

Jacob stood beside him, grinned down at him, and let out a long, warm sigh, the sort of sigh Triss made after she’d had great sex with Julias. Fucker was happy with himself, for what he just did, for forcing a nightmare on a nightmare. He was a Nosferatu, it was in their blood to make people fear, fear on a level they wouldn’t understand until the deformed vampire burrowed into their brain, ripped open a hole, and dropped in a nightmare that could literally drive kine to commit suicide to escape it.

It was horrible. It was truly, utterly fucking horrible, and Triss hated doing it. She rarely did, and only to people who deserved it. A nasty kine who needed to die, or that Joe fuckwad. But Jacob took things to a new level.

The skeleton, the man, fell forward, and screamed into the floor.

“You really think I came here for a brawl with your buddy here, Azamel?” One-eye shrugged, and started to pace again. Chin in hand, he used his other to wag a finger around, Joker smile growing bigger.

“No ... I suppose not. Release Mark.”

“In a bit. Gotta let the bastard soak in the juices a minute, you know?”

Fucker thought he was on a cooking show. Beatrice winced again, and again, as Mark cried into the floor, screamed bloody murder, and fell onto his side. Poor guy curled up into the fetal position, and screamed. And screamed. And screamed.

“Dude, please,” Triss said. “Pretty sure point’s made.”

Jacob stopped pacing, raised the brow of his new eye as he looked at her, and shrugged. A snap of the fingers later, and the screaming stopped.

Mark sat up with a jolt, and turned over to look at Jacob. He was sweating, his eyes were wide, and his body was trembling. Triss covered her normal eye to get a glimpse of the other side, to see the nightmare inside this disgusting thing, to see what sort of shit Jacob’s nightmare discipline had done to the wretched soul. The skeleton thing was trembling as well, to the point its bones rattled, and worms and insects fell from it and the skin cloak it wore, onto the bloodied white floor of the palace courtyard.

Beatrice had gotten the impression Begotten and Werewolves considered themselves stronger than vampires. And it was true for the most part. Elders were the exception to that rule.

Triss could tell she wouldn't be able to handle Mark in a fight, not easily. She was a young vampire, and that was to be expected, especially when up against major freak shows like these Begotten. But Jacob was a different story, a whole different story. So damn easy to forget when he started acting like a juvenile jackass, that Jacob was fucking ancient, and for a vamp, that meant fucking strong.

She had to raise a clawed hand to her face to hide how a grin was coming through. Proud, maybe, that her boss was that much of a fucking powerhouse? Yeah, she could be a little proud of that.

The man wasn't screaming anymore at least, but his eyes refused to blink, locked onto Jacob. No one said anything, moved, did anything, and soon Triss could hear the panicked man's heart beating up a storm in the silence. Fucker was still terrified, despite Jacob having released him.

Triss hopped down onto the floor, and stood beside her boss. Still moans and groans happening behind them as Mark continued to back away, sliding his ass on the floor until his back was against the concrete bricks.

Jacob winked at her. With the eye. Fucking gross.

"I think I may have overestimated Mark's abilities," Granny said.

"Underestimated mine, more like it." One-eye shrugged and resumed his pacing. A fedora or deerstalker hat with a pipe between his lips would have been a good fit. "I've been here, in this place, since you were just an idiot child, Azamel. Antoinette and I let you stay because you are more trouble than you're worth to expel, not because we can't. Don't forget that."

She snorted, blew some smoke his way, and leaned back to begin gently rocking her chair. "So what do you want to know?"

"I want to know who you're running from."

The old woman snorted again, and slammed her foot. And again, the flickering images of the great beast she was, and the temple of blood she guarded awoke before Triss. Again, the room shook, and the alien monster trumpeted its annoyance. An elephant's trumpet noise, but thunderous, booming and layered with growling roars.

"I run from no one. I am the conqueror, idiot vampire. I am—"

"On the run from someone. Or something. Or maybe a group of people. How many did you piss off to make you want to return here and hide away in my city's underground?" Apparently giant elephant monster and her temple of torture didn't faze Jacob. It wouldn't surprise Triss if the old man had created a similar landscape in his youth.

"... and why should I tell you?"

"Because if you don't, I'll beat you up."

Another puff of smoke, and the old woman growled at the scary bastard threatening her. "Is this how it's going to be between us, Jacob?"

"Looks like. I got a good thing going in Dolareido these days and I don't want you spoiling it."

She tossed aside her cigarette, and lit another. The missing piece of herself, cigarettes. Triss had never suffered a true chemical addiction before, and she could only imagine what that must have been like if you'd been smoking your whole life. Would probably have had an easier time convincing the woman to try metal music.

“It was spoiling when I arrived, old man.”

Both Nosferatu raised a brow, looked at each other, then at her. “How?” they said, in unison.

“Viktor, Rebecca, and Tony’s death did not go unnoticed. Hunters spread word of the change, so I hear. They came, and watched Dolareido tear itself apart with Lucas’s madness. Then he was dead, by the Prince’s hand, and a host of Kindred with him.”

One-eye sighed, but nodded, and walked over to Azamel. Cause, yeah, that was a good idea. He hopped up onto the stage, and started rooting around through the old lady’s things. Dresser, back of the chair, bed — she’d added a bed since the last time Beatrice visited — and some of her other things. Like a nosy kid.

“Dolareido’s a peaceful place these days,” he said. “Like I said, I got a good thing going.”

“You want peace? Don’t lie to me Jacob.”

“ ... What I want is a little more complicated than that.”

“Isn’t it for everyone?”

Triss shook her head and raised a hand. “No. Think I’d be happy with a regular source of blood, fucking, and a safe place to sleep. Call me simple.”

The two old farts glared at her. Yeah, not a good time for jokes.

“Hunters have come,” Azamel said, “and were coming all along. They have been silent, content to take their time in planning the downfall of Kindred in the city. Four of them of particular skill have been here since Lucas's death, and they have begun working with ... an old enemy, that followed me here."

"An old enemy?" Triss said.

"Yes little girl, an old enemy. A killer of my kind. Jeremiah is human, but more, and he has recruited a host of hunters to join him in his crusade against me."

"So if I get rid of you, they'll leave?" Jacob said. Not really a question, given the huge smirk on his face.

"Not until every Begotten, Uratha, and Kindred are dead, I imagine."

"... so now your problem is our problem. Unless of course you're lying, and this Jeremiah fellow will leave once you're dead." One-eye came up beside the old monster, and frowned at her. Smirking, frowning, smiling, sneering, man was all over the place, and each expression was accompanied by a one-eyed gaze that kept ... looking at things. This whole night was filled with grossness.

"Or he stays, and you would be killing a powerful ally in this little battle that is now, as you say, your problem." Granny turned her head, looked up at the Nosferatu glaring down at her, and breathed smoke into his face. "If you can kill me, that is."

And, again, silence fell upon the room and everyone in it until all that could be heard was the breathing of the two living creatures, and their heartbeats. Mark's, loud, panicked, and Azamel's, steady, and soft. The two old monsters stared at each other on the stage, until Triss was sure a spaghetti western song would start playing. Or, maybe, some Japanese drums

Footsteps down the tunnel. Everyone turned, watched, and waited, for the source to make itself known. Athalia came out of the darkness, a grocery bag in each hand, and an eyebrow raised to match their's.

“Um ... what the fuck is going on here?” she said.

“An interrogation.” Jacob smirked, hopped off the platform, and started to walk toward Athalia. “Jack’s missing. The elephant woman here says a mad fucker called Jeremiah is in town. Connection?”

Athalia set down her groceries, but didn't get to do much else as Jacob came in closer. Poor girl had no choice but to back up a few steps, and lean back as she noticed the bastard had an eye.

“Jack’s missing?”

Triss nodded, and jogged up to stand beside Jacob. And maybe stop him if the man got a little violent, or nightmare-y. She was starting to think that maybe the man took it personally, that these nightmare monsters thought they could be scarier than a Nosferatu and his unique ability to bestow hallucinogenic nightmares. Jacob probably considered himself the scariest thing Dolareido had to offer, and these Begotten thought themselves the same thing.

Professional rivalry? Heh.

“Jack is missing,” she said. “And we were hoping you'd know where.”

“I ... I don't know where. Didn't even know he was missing.”

Triss almost said something, but stopped herself as the eye in her skull did its magic. A flickering image, a momentary glimpse of the other side, of the realm these nightmare creatures called home. And more importantly, a glimpse at Athalia, at true Athalia.

Tall, dark, waving bits of shadow as a backdrop, and a massive skull in the foreground of this monster, this entity that filled the tunnel. It had horns. Spiked, jagged and sharp. Arms too, like a skeleton's, but massive and black, dripping a black fog too, like a toxic cloud. The arms were covered in the same spikes, serrated, and they reached out from the blackness that surrounded the monster, blackness that she wore like a cloak.

Triss looked up and up, and stared at it, her, the thing, skin so tight and gaunt she didn't notice it wasn't a skeleton at first. It had no legs; instead, a dangling spinal cord hung from a partly exposed rib cage in the waving shadow. Two enormous, black wings joined the darkness that surrounded it, as if someone had taken an angel and burned it to char.

The only thing that didn't scream darkness was the two, white, glowing dots in the center of its empty, black eye sockets. Like staring into the eyes of death itself.

Fuck, that was happening a lot lately.

Jacob must have noticed it too, cause he whistled and folded his arms across his chest. "You look like a bigger threat than that Mark jackass."

"Mark? What? Wait, the fuck did you do to him?" She looked past him, to where the man was sitting, and her shocked expression faded into a blatant I'm-going-to-kill-you face. Marched right up to Jacob, and jammed her finger against his chest. "The fuck did you do to him, fucking leech?"

Not a good idea, not a good idea at all. Triss winced as Jacob raised a hand and backhanded the girl. If it'd been a normal backhand, like a dramatic scene in a movie, enough to sting, maybe even knock the girl down, that'd have been one thing. But you never knew with Jacob, and apparently the old man felt like being a colossal asshole tonight. Athalia half spun, half flew through the air, blood decorating the tunnel wall as it spewed from her lip, and she collided against the concrete bricks of where the tunnel opened up into Azamel's home.

Man had no issue making enemies; hell, he enjoyed it. Antoinette definitely had the softer hand, despite the reputation of her steel will. Pros and cons to both approaches, Triss supposed.

“Jack is missing, and everyone saw you talking with him at the ball. Any idea where he went?” One-eye walked up to her, a small hop to his step and a grin on his Joker face, before he reached down and picked the girl up.

“Jacob,” Azamel said, “release her.”

“You're not giving orders here, hag. Now, you,” Jacob said as he picked Athalia up by her throat with one hand, and pointed a finger at her with the other, “are annoying. You're loud, you piss people off, you piss Kindred off who haven't done a damn fucking thing to you. Just cause Viktor and his sick fetishes royally fucked you over, you feel the need to shit on everyone? Man's dead, get over it.”

“I—”

“Oh shut the fuck up.” He threw her aside and into the main room. A vampire would have handled the physical violence better, but these monsters seemed perfectly human out in the real world. Sort of. They ate and drank, they breathed, they bled and they broke. Athalia crashed against the concrete with an audible crunch, and rolled a few times to stop on her back beside Mark.

Sighing, Triss leaned in toward her boss. “Dude, seriously, you're going to burn some bridges here.”

“And if I do?”

“I want to find Jack alive, you know?” She really hadn’t expected Jacob to get this physical.

Azamel sighed, took another puff, and waved a slow hand. “Enough. I sense a disturbance in the dream ... in one of Fiona’s chambers.”

Athalia sat up, groaned a few times, and forced herself back to her feet. “Anything to do with these fuckers?” Woman was bleeding hate, and blood, and Jacob wasn’t making it any better.

“No. Humans.”

Everyone frozen. Humans probably meant hunters. Shit shit shit.

“Mark, go home. Athalia, take Beatrice here to Fiona. I suspect the girl has run into some of Jeremiah’s troupe, and they may know a thing or two about Jack’s disappearance.”

“You can’t seriously—”

“Now, Athalia.” Azamel’s voice was rough, grit and age and old as dirt. But solid, and Triss could see how Grandma’s words hit Athalia with more weight than the tone carried. Must have earned her role as leader of these freaks then.

“... fine. Come on leech.” Without bothering to look Triss in the eye, Athalia started walking in the other direction, toward a tunnel on the opposite end of the room. The lights weren’t working over there, so only darkness awaited them. And of course, the damn bitch didn’t even wait for Triss before she rounded the corner.

“Fucking hell, wait! God damn it.” She jogged after the monster, sighing the whole time. Jacob just had to make things worse. Now this Athalia woman hated Triss, and it wouldn’t surprise her if she’d leave Triss to die given the opportunity.

At least Azamel was extending an olive branch. A flimsy one bound to break the moment Triss put her weight on it, but it was better than nothing.

---

---

~~Natasha~~

“Now it’s just us adults,” Jacob said.

“Indeed.”

“So, this Jeremiah man, got a description for me?”

“A bit tall, appears to be in his fifties, short gray hair, with many scars. Tattoos from the neck down.”

“I guess you’ve seen him in person then?”

“He has been a thorn in my side for decades.” The old woman shrugged, and blew another puff of smoke out to fill the room with more of the disgusting smell. “And has nearly killed me on two occasions.”

Jacob laughed, and started to pace in place, some fingers to his chin. Seeing the elder pretend to be a detective was odd, and off putting. The psycho did love to play games, keep people on their toes, Natasha included.

“A human nearly killing you, old monster?”

“... how is it that you are able to see me, Jacob? Where did you get that eye?”

“Think I’ll tell you just because my girl isn’t here anymore?”

“Yes.”

Again the elder laughed, and walked up to the stage to lean in against it with one foot raised to press on its edge.

“It was a gift from the other side.”

“... the other side? What would the world of spirits want with me?” Azamel blew smoke down at the man’s face, and tapped on the cigarette so more ashes fell into the ashtray. She didn’t bother to look either. Must have been smoking her whole life, however long that was.

“It’s all connected, isn’t it? This physical world of ours seems to be at the center of a lot of shit. You fuck with it, and they notice.”

“There is something special about this city though, isn’t there? For spirits to take notice as they do,” she said.

“Oh there is.”

“And that would be?”

“Like I’d tell you, old hag.”

Azamel snorted, and again blew smoke down at him. “You’re infuriating.”

“And you’re unwanted. But, now that the problem is here, I’m going to have to ask for your help in dealing with it, with Jeremiah and whoever the fuck else he’s got working for him.”

“How quickly you change tunes.”

“Oh, I’m sorry, let me rephrase that. Help undo this mess you’ve caused, or I’ll rip out your fucking spine and let Jeremiah have his way with your saggy, shit-filled corpse.”

Azamel laughed. A croaking, raspy sound that made Natasha wince with each gargle of phlegm.

“Come into my home, my real home, and you’ll find circumstances quite different, vampire.”

They both sneered at each other. Natasha crouched in the shadow as low as she could, half hidden around the curving tunnel, every possible ounce of vitae she had pouring into her cloak of night. Getting caught now could easily mean she was dead, but she needed this info, needed to know what the fuck was going on. Antoinette had asked her to find out the weakness of the Begotten, and this wasn’t exactly that, but it was a step in that direction. And, she needed to know, because these two old bastards knew what was going on in the city, knew about shit they didn’t want others knowing. Information that could save Jack. Hell, information that could keep anything else from going to hell.

Or she was completely wrong and was wasting her time. The sad truth about espionage was that it often led nowhere.

“So this Jeremiah. Think he’ll go after Kindred or Uratha himself?”

“Probably. His goal is to kill Begotten, but he has killed others, and often brings hunters with him, or attracts them to his cause. They will no doubt jump at the opportunity.” She chuckled, another hoarse, disgusting sound, and rubbed her leg with one hand while smoking with the other. “Could be fifty of those fanatics in the city by now. And more to come, surely.”

Oh no. Natasha had no real experience dealing with hunters. The few times an incident had ever occurred in her comparatively short life, older Kindred had taken care of it. She knew Dolareido had it far better than most cities with Kindred, but now Azamel’s presence ruined that. No wonder Antoinette and Jacob were so upset. Azamel said the city was already spoiled, but that could have been a lie.

“... I’ll be back, Azamel. You and I are going to have a chat, a proper, lengthy chat someday. In your lair.”

She snorted, and flicked some of the fresh ash of her cigarette at him. “You’ll find I’m not so friendly there, Jacob.”

“Yeah well, private, right? Good place to get away from prying eyes.”

And then the man looked at her. Looked at her, with his new eye. She froze, stared at the man in the distance, and became stone. Don’t move don’t move don’t move. He can’t see you, your cloak of night is strong, and Jacob was no Mekhet, he didn’t have auspex to see you. Or maybe he did? She knew there were ways to learn the bloodclan-specific disciplines of a bloodclan different to your own, but as far as she knew, Kindred rarely engaged in such pursuits. But then, Jacob was ancient; who knew what sort of crazy shit he did when he was younger. He might be able to see her?

Or she greatly underestimated his normal senses, and he could see her without auspex.

But the man looked back to Azamel, shrugged, and turned to start walking down the tunnel, toward Natasha. His hands were in his pockets, and his gaze was downcast, a small smirk on his lips.

“See you later old hag. Don’t bring my city down on my head while I’m sleeping, k?”

“ ... my desire isn’t to destroy Kindred, Malachi.”

He stopped, grit his teeth hard enough Natasha could hear the bone grind. Smirk gone, shoulders shaking, the one-eyed beast squeezed his fists at his sides until they were trembling. But he moved on. With some time to calm down, he wiped his shoulder clean, as if he was dusting his sandals free of the dirt of Azamel’s presence, and continued on down the tunnel. Toward Natasha.

Natasha slipped back around the curve of the tunnel, and faded into the darkness of a doorway. No lights in this small section of the tunnel worked, and the doorway, though locked, had flat walls carved into the tunnel side. She sat down on her ass and feet in the corner of it, her side pressed to the wall, and her cloak of night dialed to the point she was struggling to maintain it. Draining, so very draining to keep it up this strong, but she wanted to know more. Really, really wanted to know more.

What was it about Mekhet that they just couldn't help but be drawn to secrets? Stupid. Stupid stupid stupid. She should have just bolted the moment Jacob turned around. Run like a smart person. She was a young ancilla, and Jacob — or Malachi apparently — was very old even by elder standards. Vampires got stronger as they got older, and everyone knew Jacob, Antoinette, and Daniel were ancient.

So she should have been smart enough to just run away when she noticed Jacob had turned around. But, nope, here she sat in the corner of an alcove in the subway tunnel wall, in the pitch black, doing her best to not let two old monsters realize she was spying on them.

Jacob came closer. Came closer. And then, passed her. Further, and further. She tensed every muscle in her body, stared at him from her pocket of darkness, and waited. He might still turn around, might still notice her, might still chase her down and tear her a new one for eavesdropping. Hell, he could kill her if he wanted to, and no one would know, no one would be around to report it. She'd be another disappearance, like Barry, like Jack.

She crept along after the terrifying, horrible, nasty man, and chewed on her bottom lip as she kept him at the edge of her sight, where the tunnels turned. Face against the concrete brick, she inched forward, each step soft and perfect. Not a sound, not a breath, not anything, just pure silence as she followed after him for another ten minutes. Ten minutes of walking, ten minutes of her draining her vitae until she was starting to feel the hunger of its absence, ten minutes of quiet stalking in darkness.

At least it wasn't like the last time she was stalking in the tunnels, when it turned pitch black and she'd run into all those spider webs. Ugh. She shivered with the memory, and dusted her shoulders free. No webs, but it still felt like they were on her. Spiders were nasty, and gross, and she didn't care if that sounded horribly juvenile and girly, because it was completely true.

She rounded the next bend of the tunnel, and petrified. Gone. Jacob was gone.

She put one hand on her sword, and stared. Where was he? He couldn't have just vanished. Did he use his cloak of night to hide? She could—

Tightness grabbed her neck, and lifted her into the air. She tried to scream, but the grip on her throat was too tight to let air through. She tried to kick, to punch, but her assault bounced off the bastard's body as he held her at arm's length. She reached for her sword, but his other hand found her wrist, squeezed it hard enough it forced her grip to deadlock too loose on the sword grip. Helpless, in a split second.

"You're probably wondering how I noticed you. Mmm?" He pulled her in closer, and grinned a psycho's grin as he eyed her with his weird one eye. "Mmm?"

"G ... g..." Couldn't talk, couldn't say anything, couldn't even argue that he shouldn't be doing this. She kicked at him again, and again, and again, but her shoes bounced off his legs and stomach. She considered kicking him in the balls for a second, but even if that did manage to loosen his grip, it would surely spell her death.

The psycho witch chuckled, and began walking down the tunnel again, away from Azamel. Still holding her by her throat, and her wrist, and grinning his crazy grin between insidious chuckles. Please please please don't kill me.

“Too bad for you, I won't tell you. Hmmm, hear anything interesting while you were spying?”

“G ... g...”

“No? Well I thought perhaps my mention of where I got this eye, the talk of spirits, or perhaps this Jeremiah fellow, that all of it would be interesting to a little sneak like you.”

“G...” She couldn't talk! He refused to let her breathe, to use the air to speak. If anything, his grip was only getting tighter, and she stared wide-eyed as his grip started to do more than just block her windpipe. It started to hurt, a lot, muscle and cartilage crushing under his fingers until she felt things bend that shouldn't bend. Pain came a moment later, and she squeezed the wrist of the offending hand with both of hers, desperate to get him to let her go.

“Yes, I knew you were following me from the onset, little Vola. I have more tricks up my sleeve than a young creature like even knows exist. Don't try and spy on me, or I will rip your arm off.” His other hand let go of hers, took her arm near the shoulder, and began to squeeze. Nosferatu were strong, like Daeva, capable of punching through rock, concrete, even steel if they had enough age and power to back it up. Jacob had it in spades, and she squeezed her eyes shut as the man started to crush her shoulder all the harder.

“P ... P...”

“And unlike your two boyfriends, I don't think you're cute. I think you're weak. Typical Mekhet, sneaky little fuck, with prying eyes and a fast step, useless without a sword and more useless when someone shines a light on you.” He brought her in closer, closer, until his face was only an inch from hers. “Think you'll survive when a true veteran like this Jeremiah fuck starts hunting us, starts burning us out of our little hidey-holes, starts finding our hideouts in the day while we're asleep, starts laying traps with fire and shotguns, and silver for your fuck buddies?"

At last he let her neck go. Or not really, but he did relax his grip enough she could use her lungs again.

"I ... I was j-j-j-j-just ... I um ... w-w-was..." Ok, she could talk now but didn't know what to say. Uh oh.

"You might survive, now that I think about it. Sneaky types do have a habit of doing that, surviving, where others perish. So, Natasha Vola of the Ordo Dracul, you and Annie stumble onto anything interesting lately? Perhaps some spirits of note or renown have visited your tower?"

This bastard knew everything. How did he always know everything?

"M ... m-maybe?"

"Well aren't you a cheeky little shit." Jacob brought her so close their noses were touching. Gross gross gross, staring into his eye and his empty eye socket. No eyelids on the empty one, just destroyed flesh.

"You ... you shouldn't d-do this."

"Do what? Haven't hurt you yet."

"B-But you're going to."

"Am I? Not exactly sure what I'm going to do with you yet. I don't like being spied on."

"You ... must have known I w-w-was spying on you ... b-before you started talking to Azamel though."

He nodded, smiling and nodding as he held her out at full arm's length, and started walking. "Smart little fucker."

"Th ... thank you."

"You're welcome." A chuckle or two later, he did a few hops, some of them landing on train tracks, some on the ground, each random and way too much like a young ballerina being silly. "We don't talk much, you and I," he said, her still dangling from his hand.

"... yeah." Elders generally only talked to elders, or their subordinates. She was neither.

"Your dainty, weak shtick grinds my gears. Really makes me want to slap some sense into you. Fucking half a century of being a vampire, and you still can't take anyone in a straight fight. And probably never try."

Ow.

"I ... it d-d-doesn't ... there's usually a w-way to—"

"Oh good god, get a spine, you worthless little mouse. You can't always solve everything by being smart, or quick, or sneaky. When push comes to shove, it's often the strongest who comes out on top, and you? You can't even form a sentence. You're so weak you—"

She shot him.

Somewhere along the line, her hand had snapped to her pistol instead of holding his wrist. Being insulted like that burned, and after a few of them, she didn't want anymore. Art and Matt told her to be more aggressive, or people were forever going to tread on her, to steal away opportunities from her, or maybe even get her into danger. It'd do her some good, they told her, to run on instinct for a second here or there and see where it took her.

Probably a bad time to do that.

She landed on her feet once Jacob dropped her, and took out her sword with her other hand. Definitely a bad time to do that, as Jacob snarled in pain and stepped back several times. One of his hands came up to his face, to his neck where she'd put the hole, and covered the wound for a moment, only to pull his hand away and look at the Kindred blood that coated his palm.

“You shot me.”

“D-D-Don't ... think just cause I hold my t-tongue, or use my ... b-brain, that ... that I'm weak, Jacob.” There was flirting with death, and then there was pissing on its face and seeing if it decided to retaliate.

“Well, color me surprised. Those wolves rubbing off on you? Well, rubbing and getting off, for sure.” The psycho licked his lips, and leaned his head to the side. In mere seconds, his neck healed, a wound that would take her a day to restore.

“And st-stop making fun of my relationship with them! It ... it's private, and ... and least I have one!”

Jacob's lips settled on a snarl, and he started to walk toward her. She really should have been running, or maybe shooting him a whole bunch and running at the same time. Yeah, running was actually a pretty good idea, she should be able to outrun him.

“You got bite, Vola. I like it!” He stopped walking toward her, shrugged, and licked one of his fangs in obvious, dramatic fashion. “Been a while since a Mekhet has surprised me. Damien did, at least for a little while, before he replaced you as that bitch's slave.” Wiping his thumb on his lips, he motioned for Tasha to stand beside him.

She gulped, and with trembling hands, put away her sword and pistol. If he wanted her dead, she'd be dead, sooner or later. Even if she hid in the Prince's tower, she couldn't hide in there for forever, and eventually the man would find a way to kill her. But if aggression was how to appeal to Jacob, maybe she could work with that.

"I'm ... I-I'm looking for Jack," she said as she stood beside him. Kept him in the corner of her eye, ready to bolt, but he did start walking again just like before, along the tunnel toward wherever he was planning to go. Maybe he was genuine. So damn hard to read him, this Malachi.

"You and everyone else. Triss has gone to lala nightmare land with that bitch Athalia, in hopes she may find some clue as to his disappearance. Want me to ask Azamel if you can go in with her?"

"Um ... n-no, I think uh ... think I'll d-d-do better out here, with my feet firmly on the ground."

He chuckled, and faced her as he raised a hand to the cheek of his new eye. Pulling down on his cheek, his smile grew, and he stared at her with the strange, normal looking, but very weird eye.

"You work for Annie now, so get used to seeing some strange shit."

"I ... there has been ... strange things, y-yeah."

Another laugh. Man just loved to laugh, and each time he did, he put a different angle on it, a twist, each with its own personality. This one sounded intrigued almost, like she imagined Hannibal the Cannibal would sound when having a delightful conversation at tea time.

"How goes your search for Jack?"

“I c-can’t find him. He’s gone, and the P-Prince is furious, and I thought maybe Azamel would know something ... b-b-but then I saw you and Beatrice, and...” And she decided to sneak sneak, because like Jacob said, she was a sneaky person. Apparently, a ballsy sneaky person.

When did that happen? Used to be a time she would timidly obey Maria’s orders, and nothing more. She became a right hand to the Invictus because she was smart, and fast, good at sneaking, and had a talent for auspex most Mekhet did not. Maria gave her an order, and Natasha could get it done, quietly, with no traces and no suspicions.

Then, she’d asked Julias to kill Viktor. A scary request to say the least, and from then on, each month had been pushing her just a little further into making rash, dangerous moves that were liable to get her killed. Shooting Jacob in the neck was the culmination of a lot of changes, and it could have easily ended her second life. Except, it seemed to be exactly what the man wanted, for someone to show some spine and have the guts to challenge him on things. Dangerous, so very dangerous.

“It’d be a shame if the kid’s dead,” Jacob said. “Hopefully Triss and that cunt learn something.”

“ ... do ... d-do you think this Jeremiah person has Jack?”

“Probably. Or he’s killed him already.”

She shivered, rubbed her arms, and looked up at the elder. “Sorry ... for shooting you.”

“No you’re not. Don’t be a bitch now and ruin what goodwill you just earned.”

“S—” No, wait, not sorry. “ ... you deserved it.”

“Heh, damn right.”

Oh god trying to get along with this man was like trying to get along with a volatile explosive. Perfectly content to sit there, quiet, not exploding, as long as she treated it just right, and how it liked to be treated was a gamble to figure out.

“And J-Jeremiah is hunting Azamel?”

“Yeah. Probably a Moby Dick situation if I’m guessing right.”

“ ... so Jeremiah is Ahab? And Azamel is the w-whale?”

“Correct. It’s just a hunch, but a good one, if this human has been hunting Azamel all this time.”

Not good. Ahab got his crew slaughtered on a futile quest to kill something that had hurt him. An insane man willing to get other people killed in order to reach his goals. And he was a captain at that. If Jeremiah was of that disposition, then Natasha could understand Azamel’s retreat to Dolareido. Putting a bunch of vampires between her and Jeremiah was a smart plan.

For someone like Azamel to fear a human had Natasha shivering again, and she rubbed her arms a few times more as she and the scariest vampire in Dolareido walked the abandoned tunnels. She could run from a vampire, could sense him, spot him, or at least rely on the political situation of the covenants to hopefully not get killed by them. With Jeremiah or his hunters, she wouldn’t be able to do any of that.

A few seconds of silence went by. She was waiting for Jacob to talk, to offer information; but, that was dumb. He liked aggression, so be aggressive. Ask questions.

“You have an eye n-now.”

“Yeap.”

“H-How?”

“Blood magic.”

Oh god.

“W-Why di—”

“Begotten are nasty fucks, and they hide all sorts of surprises. Eye let me get a better look at them, at what they are; for the night at least.” He laughed, leaned in toward her, and pulled down on the cheek with the eye to expose the white of its sphere. “Sexy?”

“Um ... it-t might have been ... if you had two.”

“True. Triss took the other one.”

Oh god oh god. Ok yeah, no more asking about the blood magic. If Triss had a new eye, that meant she had to get rid of the old eye somehow. She winced just thinking about it.

“ ... w-want to tell me anything about them, the Begotten?”

“Ha! Want to know how to knock them down a notch, don’t you? I’ll give you one hint, Mekhet, just because you’ve impressed me.” Jacob hopped up onto an abandoned subway platform, and walked over to the ladder, used by repairmen back when the tunnel was used. “Begotten are like vampires, in a way. We’re killed by fire, and sunlight. Werewolves, silver rips them a new one. What are Begotten weak to?”

“I ... d-don’t know.”

“The problem isn’t so much that we don’t know, but rather, Begotten are each unique in a way. That Mark fellow is some sort of corpse, a skeleton, and he's also the insects inside it. His weakness will have something to do with that, I'm sure."

"Unique..." Oh. Well, damn. Finding out the weakness of the whole race wouldn't be possible then, but rather, she'd have to learn about each individual Begotten and figure out their weakness that way.

"Fiona's your friend, ask her if she knows much about Azamel or Athalia. Don't let her know why you're asking of course, but keep an ear open. Azamel herself is a very old monster, and I'm sure her weakness is rooted in the nightmare that she is."

"... w-w-what nightmare is that?" she said. Didn't bother to ask why he was being so helpful, gift horse and all that.

"Oh, a very old nightmare, a twisted thing from a twisted mind, surely. People, many of them, somewhere, hundreds and hundreds of years ago must have dreamed up that monstrosity. What horrible history could have led to such a horrible thing, I don't know. A butcher maybe, a king or queen, who abused a godly image? Who knows. Certainly wouldn't be the first time someone's used the image of a god to fuel their own, blood-soaked agenda." The elder tapped his nose twice, and winked. "Some poor soul dreamed a nightmare, and now this woman looks like a giant with an elephant head and four arms, some sort of twisted, horrible abomination of the original."

"Ganesha? Hinduism?"

Jacob shrugged, and began his climb up the ladder. "Ganesha, before an ancient, Eastern temple, surrounded by tortured kine. Granny has quite the eye for decor." Laughing all the way up, Jacob gave her a tiny, finger-wagging wave, and disappeared. No goodbye or stereotypical parting words elders often had.

That description didn't sound like what Natasha knew of Ganesha, not at all. But, it was a lot more than she knew about Azamel five minutes ago.

Triss was in a nightmare world now, apparently. Natasha wasn't able to watch Triss's departure from her hiding spot, but Triss was indeed gone, and she too was looking for Jack. So, Natasha pulled out her phone, and—shit, no reception in the tunnel. She almost followed Jacob out, then, decided against it. Better to find her own exit.

Back on the surface, she again tried to call Triss. No answer. Either she was still deep in the tunnels, or she was in, as Jacob put it, nightmare lala land.

Ugh, she was never going to find Jack at this rate.

---

---

~~Jack~~

The prisoner main lobby. Two floors, with some stairways rising from the tile floor to balconies, where more gates were half opened into more hallways. The lobby was also blocked off by a gate, that lead to a proper lobby where civilians could come and go. An old fashioned building to say the least, old, run down, with decades of use under its belt.

The room had a large counter in the middle, circular, with several shitty old chairs in its center. In a newer prison, computer terminals would have been set up there to control all the gates electronically. But in this prison, everything was old, and the keys were nowhere to be found; which meant the gate to the civilian lobby was unlocked. Good thing, cause Jack wasn't strong enough to break open gates made of metal bars and locked in with steel.

Did the hunters have more chains and locks? It'd have been smart to lock the place down somehow at least, but after looking around, he found no chains on the gates. Or, maybe one of the five hunters now dead or brainwashed had been responsible for managing padlocks and chains. In either circumstance, it was obvious his escape was unexpected, something they hadn't planned for because the idea of young, little him escaping seemed absurd to them. He had an advantage, and he was going to take it.

He stood at the gate before the prison lobby, and looked around. His two guards stood in front of him, each with shotguns raised and checking out the million places the enemy could shoot at him from. The circular counter in the center was obvious, and Jack couldn't see into it to be sure it was empty. It looked like the balcony around and above him was empty too, though the gates they held were all unlocked, and more hunters could have been waiting for him in there.

He looked down at his army. "You, check the counter. You, check the hallways down here. And you, check the hallways below. Report back if you see any humans."

A host of the tiny bundles of fur nodded, and ran out onto the dingy tile of the prison floor. Twenty for each command, more than enough to survive any potential gunfire. And Jack braced for it, for the explosive sound of guns unloading bullets upon his army as they scouted the area. But none came.

No way the hunters just left him to his devices. No way they'd just let him escape. But the rats eventually returned, and each of them reported no one.

But, they could smell something. Hell, he could smell something. A chemical?

He raised the corner of his mouth in a snarl, and motioned for his two guards to go forward. "Stay near me, ahead of me, and protect me with your lives."

The two tools nodded, and stayed at his side as he walked out into the exposed position of the prisoner lobby. No one behind the counter. No one above him, at the dozen perfect positions for someone to shoot at him. The lights were on, but no one was home.

No way it was this easy.

“Jack.”

He spun around. In the distance, past the lobby, past the gate, past the civilian lobby, and at the open front door of the prison, stood Angela. Five hunters stood with her, weapons at the ready.

“Angela.” He stared at her in the distance, and his two guards sprinted forward. “No, wait. I want to hear this.” Without skipping a beat, the two tools came back to his side, and waited.

“You killed three of my men.”

“You were going to kill me. You honestly think I care?” The concrete walls and the empty hallways did wonders for carrying the voice, and the two of them talked as if only a few feet from each other.

“Your life is worthless, vamp. Fuck, you’re already dead, and you have the fucking nerve to compare yourself to the lives of the living?”

“ ... I am what I am, human.”

“Yeah, a cancer.”

“I don’t blame you for hating me. The mouse hates the cat that kills it.” He snarled again as he stepped forward. The distant humans took a step back despite the range, except for Angela.

“You don’t get to kill me.”

“ ... you are different from your hunter friends, aren't you? You and Jeremiah, not entirely normal.”

“Fuck you, I'm human.”

Jack took another step forward, and again the hunters stepped back, except for Angela. The humans were retreating, she wasn't. What was she? What was so different about her and Jeremiah? Christ she looked familiar.

“I'll say it again, get out of my way, and you get to live.” And he knew that wouldn't happen. Empty words, meaningless, and he wasn't sure he'd let them live even if they let him go. Way too dangerous to keep them alive. And, he really wanted to inflict pain on that woman, grind her face into a bloody mess under his heel, break her limbs, and drink her dead.

He licked his fangs as he came closer still, his two guards in front of him at each shoulder, and his rats flooding over him. Many climbed up his pants, some settling on his knees with claws digging into the fabric, while others poured over his ankles, and several took anchor on his shoes. Others poured around his two guards, and of their own volition, climbed up their bodies to perch on their shoulders, their heads, all their limbs, scurrying and squeaking.

Eventually Jack and his bodyguards stood at the gate between the prisoner lobby and the civilian lobby.

Angela took out a lighter, one of those larger ones with the flip top. She flicked it on, then closed it. Opened it, flicked it on, closed it. Her smile grew as she did, and she took a step closer to meet his gaze as she played with his bane. And then, grin growing so big she'd have given Jacob a run for his money, she lit the lighter, then dropped it.

As it fell to the floor, he realized what that smell was.

It spiraled around the lobby ahead of him, flicking left and right, snapping at the air and whipping through the only exit to the prison available to him. Red, scorching, the searing death, vampire's bane, engulfed the room, up and down the walls in zigzags, and racing across the floor in swirling spirals. Fire, dancing across the trails of gasoline.

He jumped back, threw himself back, every Kindred reflex taking over and shoving him away from the red death as it sped at him. No idea, he had no idea fire could run across gasoline this quickly, and it licked at his shoes as he flew through the air, back and away ten feet. The fire stopped short of him, its wicked flame not passing the gate. Angela must not have had time to coat the prison lobby, thank god.

It didn't stop there. Laughing, maniacally at that, Angela held out a hand to one of her fellow hunters. He set a glass bottle in it, with a white piece of fabric jammed into its mouth, on fire. A molotov cocktail.

She threw it. She had a really, really good arm, and with the front entrance of the building opened, she had a clear shot across the lobby to the gate that separated him. The glass flew straight, like a fucking professional pitcher, and smashed against the bars near Jack.

Fire. Everywhere. It exploded around him, engulfed everything in the red death, blanketed his eyes and screamed its fury at an undead thing in its presence. Dead, so very very dead.

Except, not dead. In a fair bit of pain from many claws digging into his skin, but not dead. He could not say the same for many of his army, his loyal subjects now screaming shrill squeaks and squeals as they burned. The smell of burning rat fur and flesh curled his nose, and he jumped back from the shrieking chorus, arm raised to cover his eyes from the wave of heat. So close, so very close to the fire hitting him, every vampire instinct he had was shrieking right along with the hundreds of dying rats.

But, sad as it was, it was only the rats who were damaged. They worked as a carpet and had covered him and his two hunter tools, some leaping out to block the flammable liquid as it splashed through the air from the bottle's impact against the bars. The only reason he was alive was the sheer amount of rats that had come to him, to block death for him. So very close to dead, and so very close to his two hunter tools being set on fire right along with him.

He snarled as he stared on, through the flames ahead of him, through the flames that flicked across the bars of the unlocked gate before him; except, now the hallway was barred with flame, and flame was a better barrier than steel. Another growl escaped him, its inhuman sound alien to his ears, but another again came, until the hunters in the distance took another step back, their eyes widening. The psychopath, on the other hand, barely noticed.

“You don't get to leave,” Angela said. “You get to burn.”

“It's a concrete building! The fuck do you expect it to do, melt?”

She laughed. Her fellow hunters laughed as well, nervously, and seconds later. Girl reeked of a super villain, with the dramatic poses and pompous speeches to go with it.

“You're mind controlling a bunch of shit right now, stupid vamp. You can't keep this up for forever, and this exit's the only way out of the prison. Sunrise will get here eventually, and we have all the time in the world. You on the other hand, are running out of it.”

“Did you read that speech on the back of a cereal box?”

“Ha ha. Fucking joke all you want, fucking Ventrue, but you're not getting out of here. Trapped, like a rat. Fitting, huh?”

He grit his teeth until his fangs came out again. She was right. This insane, ridiculous nutjob of a woman was correct, and that boiled his blood almost as much as the fire covering all his exits.

He backed up until the counter of the prisoner lobby was against his back, and looked around. Above him were the catwalks that led to other hallways, probably of the exact same style as the one he came from. To the side, similar hallways. Behind him, another big gate that opened up into what looked like an outdoor area of some sort, some place where the prisoners went to do their allotted exercise. It had no ceiling, but there was no way he was going to be able to climb out of there, with its smooth, high walls and barbed wire.

“Panicking yet?” Angela yelled out. She was maybe a hundred feet away, and yelling super loud wasn’t really necessary. Or at least, it wasn’t, until one of the hunters threw another molotov down the lobby again. Glass shattered, gasoline went everywhere, and Jack stepped back again as he watched the flame snatch up the liquid. Bits of fire flew through the air like evil fireflies, and they landed on his escape path with reckless abandon.

And just as the fire was starting to die down, things only started getting worse. There were still a few hunters around Angela, but some others had disappeared, only to return with torches. How the fuck they had torches, he didn’t know. They were hunters, and if there was any paranormal creature hunters were used to dealing with, it was probably vampires, which meant they had the means to burn him alive. Lots of different ways to burn him alive, probably. Considering the amount of people he’d already dealt with, and the amount of people he still had to go through at a minimum, there was probably a lot of tools they had at their disposal.

His one advantage: they hadn’t expected him to get out of his cell. Their tools weren’t on them, and they had to fetch them; at least, fetch the fancier tools. Except, one of them did just that, and Jack’s heart sank as one of them handed Angela a large gun-shaped tool. A blowtorch was bad, but a flamethrower? That was not something any vampire could handle easily, free of shackles or not.

He stepped back again, or tried, but the counter was behind him, and going further back was pointless. Every path he could take was a dead end. It was a fucking prison after all.

“Henry, Stacey, either of you know another way out of this prison?”

“No, master,” they said. He knew they’d say that too, god damn it.

Angela, armed with a flamethrower, stepped ahead of the hunters behind her. They had molotovs, pistols, torches, and god only knew what else. He was sure they’d tie him up and burn him at the stake if they weren’t afraid he’d brainwash them first. Angela was laughing, each step she took marked with more laughter, and every so often she shot the flamethrower. The spewing beam of liquid carried the red death on its wings, and the flame whipped the air into a hazed frenzy of blurry chaos as fire marked the walls, and the floors around Angela’s path, but not in front of her path. Whenever her and her hunters came upon a patch of burning, they hopped around it or over it, except Angela. Angela stepped on it and kept walking. As long as she walked quickly, the fire would not catch to her, and no doubt she did it because she thought it would intimidate him.

She was right. She could get close to fire, have it touch her, tickle her boots or pants, brush against her skin, but for a human it was as simple as not standing in the fire for more than a second to prevent skin or hard fabrics from burning. For a vampire, each second in a flame would have meant serious damage, and the agony to go with it. Fucking hunters knew his weakness, knew how to exploit it, knew how to embrace flame and its fickle nature, knew how to wrap it around themselves and protect themselves with it.

It wasn't him using a surprise advantage to take down a few hunters anymore. Now it was him, trapped inside a rabbit hole, and the hunters were after him. So close to getting out, but he'd underestimated how quickly they'd have reacted to his escape. He'd stirred the hornets' nest.

Whatever happened to those action movie scenes, where the hero, once captured, manages to escape, and then proceeds to slaughter everyone in the facility that held them? Why wasn't it that easy? Why couldn't these hunters just be really dumb, and stand around waiting for him to come to them, so he could kill them one by one, or in pairs? Reality wasn't so kind. These hunters had brains, and once they'd realized what was happening, they'd retreated to a bottleneck and reestablished the offensive using the one weapon he couldn't fight.

The one weapon he couldn't fight directly, at least.

"Stacey, Henry, march forward. Fire at will. We're leaving." The longer he sat back, being defensive, the more they'd box him in. Now or never.

"Yes, master."

Their minds crashed against the shackles he'd placed upon them, pushed against the boot crushing them beneath him, and cried out for mercy. But as each tool glanced at him, he gave them a glance back, and offered a quiet, rumbling growl. Their tiny minds broke once again, silenced beneath his boot, and they began their march of death.

They weren't going to survive. And that was fine.

"Hey, guys! Come on, you still in there? You keep doing this and I'm sorry but you'll have to die to get to the kid." Angela stood in the center of the civilian lobby, fire surrounding her, fire on the main, large desk in the center of the room, fire on the walls, fire trickling from her flamethrower. There was a grin there, mixed with a touch of concern maybe. Maybe she did actually care about these hunters she was going to get killed, but if she did, she cared about killing him more.

It was a half-ass attempt to break through his mind control, and token, futile, and she knew it. Not the hero she was pretending to be, not the hero she probably convinced these hunters she was. The hunters weren't nearly as quick to kill their friends, he could see it in their eyes, in their movements, in their everything. They wanted to save Henry and Stacey, save their friends from the horrible vampire that had taken their minds and already killed three others.

Fuck them.

Jack's tools raised their pistols, and began their assault. He followed after them, and as the two tools stepped over the fire, gunshots started to fill the air.

"Don't make us kill you!" One of the hunters said, a man, tears in his eyes and on his cheeks reflecting the flickering flames that surrounded him. Their original plan had gone so wrong, usurped by the monster they hadn't suspected capable of this madness. Just a simple catch-and-kill job for them probably, just another day breaking a demon, learning what they could from the soulless monster before dusting him.

The drama would have been overwhelmingly sad, if he wasn't the monster on the other end of that plan. Instead, the sight of the man in tears over the inevitable death of his friends was frustrating, and infuriating. How dare they, how dare these fucking ingrates be upset over this outcome. They started this, this was on them. Fucking insects.

Again, his tools hesitated as they aimed their pistols. They paused, each casting a glance at Jack. He returned it, and offered them each a soul crushing word.

“Now.”

Henry and Stacey stepped forward once again, and began firing.

“Henry don’t!”

The hunters jumped out of the way, each diving behind various tables, chairs, and Angela herself jumped back to get into the circular desk in the center of the civilian lobby. She was still too far to attack him with the flamethrower, but the others had pistols, and molotovs. They seemed hesitant to use them. Their loss.

Jack pointed his hands forward. “Go. Kill them.”

The army of claw and fur ran before him, and all was brown and flame. Many rats succumbed to the fire they ran over, and some were no longer enslaved as the fire took them. They shrieked their death cries and ran against the wall, while others ran forward, bodies of writhing flame entering the second lobby, only to die to the flame’s power.

Each rat that died so horribly hurt him, made him wince, made him grit his teeth all the more. The beast in him identified with these little scavengers, scurriers in the dark and hiding from humanity, more than it ever could with the humans trying to burn him alive.

His tools took advantage of the chaos, stepped into the second lobby, and fired. Their bullets tore into the furniture and the desk, ripping shards of wood up into the air, only for it to join the fire that surrounded them. It kept the enemy hidden behind furniture, and an opportunity for rats to pour out into the frenzy. The hunters were quick to use torches to fight off the rats at their feet, but it kept them pinned down, as planned.

Jack followed the rats, slow steps, many soaking his shoes in the blood of his dead servants. No time to pity them anymore, he had hunters to kill. The hallway of fire could not be escaped, it surrounded him, covered the floor ahead of him, and as he approached the flame, more rats threw their bodies onto the red death. Their fur burned for only moments before only their corpses remained, and he again stepped on them, spreading their blood and soaking his steps in death.

“Forgive me!” One of the hunters popped up from behind a nearby overturned table, and fired. Stacey went down, a splatter of blood coating Jack’s body as God apparently thought the situation needed to be more horrible. Jack stared at the shooter, only for the offending hunter to point his pistol at Jack, and begin firing.

Bullets hit him, tore through him, ripped apart his insides and got lodged against his bones. Two ribs cracked as the hollow-point rounds collided with them. Another bullet hit him in the stomach, and he stumbled back several feet as it lodged into his guts. And yet another slammed him in his leg, and he fell to a knee as the muscle gave way.

He glared at the offending hunter, and watched as karma reaped its vengeance. Bullets slammed into their shoulder, their chest, and their neck. The blood sprayed, followed by the bits of tearing flesh, and the screams. Jack’s remaining guard had adjusted his aim, fired upon his comrade, and didn’t stop firing until the offending human fell back, clutching their neck with their only good arm.

Fool would have been fine if they had ducked behind their table more quickly. Shooting their friend Stacey had no doubt given them pause, a pause Jack’s tool did not reciprocate.

“Fuck you! Fuck you!” Another one of the hunters unloaded their ammo, poking out from behind the same desk Angela was hiding within. Bullets whizzed past Jack, slamming into the wall, into the metal bars behind him, chunks of concrete showering over the fire and dead that surrounded him.

Not just one hunter shooting at him now, three of them were. They poked out from behind their chairs and overturned tables, eyes locked on him, wide, glaring. They were shooting at him, but not at their friend Henry, who slid down onto a knee beside Stacey, picked up her pistol while tossing his aside, and began firing that one instead.

More bullets flew past Henry, aimed at Jack, many going wide as the hunters were forced back into their hiding spots by Jack's only remaining guard. No time to set up good shots on him, not as Henry continued to shoot at them, and not as the rats continued to pour over the floor, earning their ire. Half the time, the hunters were tossing molotovs at the floor or waving their torches at it, blocking the path of the rats as best they could, then resumed shooting at Jack.

They were good shots. Jack forced himself back to his feet, only for another bullet to slam into his shoulder and force him back a foot. In the chaos, in the flames and the screams, dodging bullets and holding an army of rats at bay, the hunters continued to shoot at him. Another bullet sank into his other leg, and he screamed as his body tried to stumble with it. Tensing muscles and aching bones kept him upright. Another bullet caught him in the waist, tore through his obliques, and created a hole to his insides. Another again caught him in the neck, took a chunk of the side out, exposing the throat within.

He stayed standing, and pointed with one of his stumps. "Get him first."

The army of rats picked a new objective. Instead of swarming randomly, they changed to his target. No longer rapids of random brown joined by burning fur, the rats pooled together, piling high until they flowed over the table the hunter was hiding behind. His army met fire, met gasoline, met bullets, but there were simply too many of them, and they flooded over the man.

His screams joined the inferno as a thousand rats began to tear into his body. Jack had hoped he might stand up, so Henry could shoot him, and Jack could guide the rats to a new target. But the man fell behind the table, rolling, screaming, but out of sight.

Angela stood up from behind the counter, and unleashed hell upon the dying man. Somehow, she held the flamethrower in one arm, and unleashed the river of fire on her doomed comrade. At the same time, she fired her pistol at him with her other hand. No need to see the carnage to know what was happening. Angela was killing the hunter and his rats at the same time, putting her follower out of his misery while destroying hordes of the little scavengers while they were vulnerable.

Henry was still standing. They didn't want to shoot their comrade. Or at least, the hunters didn't. But once Angela was done with the man covered in rats, she turned to face Henry. The tool had been shooting at another hunter, and Angela took the opportunity, firing the flamethrower around the desk, while at the same time firing the pistol through the flames at Henry. One hit the man in the shoulder, and he went down.

Too much chaos, too much insanity. Jack could barely see through the flames anymore, as the bodies piled high and the thick smell of burning flesh filled the room. It was a horrible smell, sizzling fat and blood and muscle and skin, not too dissimilar to pork, but pork or not, none of it appealed to a vampire's nose. It joined the maelstrom of death surrounding him, crackling fire and licking flames on the walls, and the air around them bending and twisting with the fumes and growing heat.

His mom used to cook chicken wings in the oven, and he liked to stare into the oven through the glass window as they baked. The sounds and sights that surrounded the chicken wings, the glowing heat, the wavering air, the crackling of flesh, it sometimes made him wonder how horrible a torture it'd be to be in that oven. He didn't wonder anymore.

More bullets came for him, but they went wide again as Henry got up on a knee, began firing more to keep enemy heads down, rather than trying to pick his shots and go for kills. But, even in the scorching inferno and roars of hundreds of rats, Jack recognized the sound of an empty magazine.

Henry dropped the gun, took out his knife, and ran for the side of the counter where a woman hunter was standing up and aiming for Jack again. The tool jumped at her, knifed raised, and the woman had no choice but to turn to him, raise her hands, and catch him. An opportunity for Jack then. The hunters would probably all come to the same conclusion: if they could get Henry's knife away from him, they could save him.

Bingo. The three other hunters ran over to Henry, and jumped him. A brawl, arms and legs kicking out, and Henry slashing at his friends as they did their best to catch his wrists. A perfect opportunity for an observant Ventrue to get in close, and break them to his will.

Or at least it would have been. Angela didn't turn, didn't try and save Henry, didn't even so much as throw the man a glance. Angela slid over the counter, and started shooting at Jack.

Surrounded by fire, its whispering curves along the walls and tile floor, he could do nothing but send more of his rats forward. Angela waited for them, a big grin on her face as she unloaded bullet after bullet after bullet through the haze and dancing fire, while at the same time, spreading more of the fire around the floor. He was still too far away, a good forty feet, for her handmade flamethrower to reach him directly, but each bullet she shot landed against his chest, some skimming along his face, and one ripping the side of his cheek bone off.

The pain was excruciating, but its claws could not sink into his mind, not now, not as the beast in his gut roared its anger. Angela would not be able to hear it, feel it, human as she was, but that didn't change that the beast in Jack's hole-ridden corpse was screaming bloody murder at her. Every muscle, every fiber of his undead being wanted to sink his teeth into her, and end her.

He stood there, growling, arms dangling at his sides and Kindred blood dripping from the handleless stumps as the thick liquid trickled down the wounds in his neck, his face, and the copious holes now filling his chest and shredded insides. Angela was laughing, loudly, her cackles breaking through the yelling hunters behind her, the roaring fires around her, and the burning shrieks of hundreds of rats yet again dying horrible deaths to hungry flame.

“Thought you could get out? Thought you had us beat just because you caught us off guard?” She laughed again, louder, enough so her voice boomed through the hall between the two lobbies, where Jack stood. “Or maybe you thought you scared us off, that your hat trick kills overwhelmed us? Kid, you're just an idiot vamp who got lucky.” At first she laughed again, then roared, and so too did the flamethrower as she aimed upward, and blasted the ceiling with the liquid flames. Where her roars ended and the fire's began, Jack could no longer tell.

Jack looked down at himself. Belly full of fresh kine blood also meant some of that was leaking out of him, and he snarled at the sight of his meal's lifeblood trickling down his abs and pants. Holes, everywhere in his flesh. Still not as bad as that night Antoinette had fought Damien, but he was getting closer to that point. And closer again, as Angela sank a couple more bullets into his chest, each forcing him back a step, each forcing his muscles to tense, to fight the need to fall over.

Just keep distracting her for a little bit longer. Look for an opportunity, any opportunity.

He found no opportunities, only bullets. Again and again they crashed into him, until Angela aimed lower, and another bullet slammed into one of his knees. The distinct sensation of a hollow-point round shattering his kneecap was a very unique feeling, followed by a very unique pain, enough to pierce the numbing of his bloodlust. He screamed as he fell back, no longer able to stay standing, and writhed on the ground as the joint ceased to function. Kindred blood flooded the wound quickly, prioritizing it above all others. Heal the knee or you can't move, and if you can't move all the other wounds were meaningless.

Angela got closer, and closer. Laughing all the more, she fired the flamethrower into the air again, decorating the walls with living flame. But once she entered the hallway between the two lobbies, where Jack was currently lying prostrated, she let the flamethrower be, and held it to her side while her pistol was out, pointed at him. She took a step, and fired, slamming her foot down as she did, sinking the bullet into his guts. Another step, another bullet, tearing through his arm. Another step, another bullet, ripping into his other leg's quadriceps, this one joined by chuckles far, far darker than the earlier ones.

She was right over him.

He stared up at her, snarled, growled, bared his fangs, did all the things a vampire about to frenzy would do. Pain was back, and worse than when he had his hands cut off, but the roaring in his gut buried it once again. Pain could be ignored. Pain didn't stop an animal from chewing their leg off if they were in a trap, just like he'd done with his hands, and pain wouldn't stop him from trying to kill this woman with the gun pointed at him.

She got in closer, and closer, and once she was over him, she slammed her shoe down against his gut. Boots, hard boots. She twisted her heel, tore his skin, and forced another scream out of him as the agony stabbed him. Seconds into the scream, more of his snarls came back, but they were weak, pathetic, and worthless. He could try and hit her with his legs, but both of them were barely working. It was taking every ounce of effort he had to force his vitae to heal his legs as fast as possible, and ignore the growing wounds in his torso.

“Thought you had us, fucking leech? Christ you caused a lot of fucking damage.” Her heel ground harder, hard enough he could feel his punctured guts squash against his spine. “Almost got out. You’re a real fucking Viktor, aren’t you? Killing cause you like it, brainwashing people, using rats like ... like this.” She nodded to his left and his right. Dead rats were everywhere, many still on fire, while others had been crushed in the mayhem, their blood and guts coating the floor. “Regular fucking animal, a hungry animal, a monster.”

Oh god if she didn’t kill him soon he was going to do it himself, or at least vomit his guts out at the the sound of her juvenile bullshit. What person could possibly think it was ok to give this child a gun? Let alone a flamethrower.

“Fuck ... you.”

“Ha! Say it again, cause damn that’s music to my ears.” She got in closer again, put the pistol to his jaw snug up underneath it, pointed upward, and she smiled a big Jacob smile. “Lost good people today because of you, leech. Bunch of my hunters down, but there’s plenty more here, and more coming. And you didn’t get Henry.”

Henry, Jack’s last remaining tool. Jack could still hear his yelling, his hollering, as the man fought against the several hunters trying to keep him down.

“You ... deserve to die. I never ... did anything ... to you.”

“You’re a vampire. Isn’t that enough?” Laughing, always with the laughing, she got even closer again, and put her nose to his. Her glass eye was tame compared to the real one, and it glared into him, cut through his soul, as she pulled the trigger.

Click. Empty.

This woman was a fucking nutjob, a sadist, and fucking deadly. But she was young, probably his age, and really, really full of herself. And that meant liable to make mistakes, like not paying attention to her pistol, and how the slide was open, indicating the magazine was empty.

She laughed, rolled her eyes, and tossed it to the side. “Wanted to see your brains splatter. Ah well. I’ll just—”

She stopped. The world stopped. The fire went silent, and the squealing rats faded away, as Jack stared up at the woman. She forced herself to stand, the flamethrower falling from her hands and clanking against the prison tile floor.

A knife, coated in blood, stuck out from her stomach, a few inches to the side. She put her hand to it, felt the blood, stared at how it coated her hand, and then turned around.

Henry was standing there, but only for a few moments before three hunters jumped him. He must have gotten away.

“You ... stabbed ... me...”

Go. Now!

Jack stood up, forced his vitae into his knees, his legs, forced his power through him, forced his limbs to heal faster, forced his body to obey. Forced it, controlled it, dominated it like a Ventrue should. And, as Angela turned around, the sight of her wide eyes was the sickeningly sweet dessert to join the crunching sound of his shoe colliding with the other side of her stomach, hard enough to break ribs. She fell, hard, and the knife skidded along the floor from the impact.

He ran toward the exit, and ignored the fire as it turned his skin to ash.

Chapter 50

~~Beatrice~~

She was starting to become envious.

Athalia was a bitch. A real, horrible, nasty bitch of a person. Only vamp Triss had ever seen talk to Athalia and not get chewed out or glared at was Jack, but it wasn't Jack that Triss was envious of. It was Athalia, and that monster chick vibe she had going for her. Badass monster chick on the inside, perfectly normal, attractive woman on the outside.

"Fiona's told me about you," Triss said. "About your ... form, I guess?"

"... horror."

"Sorry?"

"It's our horror. The horror that lives in the nightmare. It is the nightmare." She shrugged, and continued down through the black tunnel. Unlike the tunnel Beatrice had come from, this one had no working lights at all, and the further they went, the darker it got.

"That does sound badass." And it was making Triss jealous. Nosferatu and horror were kindred spirits, but with Athalia, seemed like she was more than that. "And I've seen Fiona do some oddly impressive shit. It's pretty neat stuff. Makes me kinda wish I was a _"

Athalia stopped, looked at her, and frowned. "You don't really mean that."

"I don't?"

“ ... you’re a vampire. You don’t know what it’s like to ... be changed like this.”

“Fiona says—”

“Yeah well Fiona’s a stupid idealist. We’re not the same. The little thing inside you, hiding in shadows, tiny little wings and tiny little talons, is not the same as us. So fuck off and shut up.”

Oh god the melodrama was going to make Triss puke. This woman wasn’t just angry, she was anger incarnate, just a walking pile of livid and hateful.

“ ... so I’m a little thing?”

“You are. The thing inside you is.” She waved a hand aside like she was dismissing a fly. “Sometimes it looks like a rat, sometimes a bat or snake, and often, an owl. An insignificant creature that loves to hide in the shadows, instead of using them as the weapons they are.”

“And that would make Jacob what?”

Athalia snarled at her, even as she continued to walk without pause. Yeah, Jacob was one of those vamps she hated, with one of those tiny little shadow creatures in him, part of him, was him. A tiny creature, and this woman probably could not understand how it was able to kick her ass like she was a child. Worded like that, Triss would be angry too.

But Athalia didn’t retort, just chewed on her hate and kept walking.

“So, uh, Azamel is uh ... a pretty terrifying looking ... thing.”

“ ... she showed herself to you?”

“No, that’s what this eye is for.” Triss turned and pulled down on the cheek of her new eye. “Jacob had one too.”

“ ... I ... don’t understand.”

“You monsters think you’re so scary. Athalia, I have seen Jacob do shit that makes you monsters look like pussies. This eye is just a little bit of the crazy shit that man can summon.” Ok, maybe she shouldn’t have been rubbing it in the girl’s face that her boss was scarier than Athalia’s boss, but she couldn’t help indulge a little. My dad can beat up your dad. Or mom, in this case? “I can see little bits of the nightmare. And I can see you.”

“ ... and what do you think?”

“Kind of envious, honestly. You look like something from a Motorhead album cover.”

“And I suppose that means a lot of skulls and claws and black wings and shit.”

“Exactly.” Triss snapped her fingers and pointed at her, summoning her inner Fonzie. Athalia was a scary woman, but compared to the shit Jacob had been showing the Nos as of lately, it was manageable. And besides, Athalia was once human, and that was some even ground.

“ ... well, you would have gotten to see anyway.”

“Whatcha mean?”

“You heard Azamel. There’s something going on in one of our chambers. And you’re tagging along while I investigate, apparently.”

“Yeah, but where’s that? Other side of town, or ... or ... in the nightmare.”

It was Athalia's turn to smirk, and she stepped into the final shadow of the curving tunnel. This far out from Azamel's little nest, the shadow was now the unending blackness, and as far as Triss could tell, it went on endlessly. Pure, delightful darkness. Normally Triss would be fine with that, but after the Azlu shit, she didn't want to be in the tunnels like this. The thought of getting more spiderwebs on her made her shiver, and rub her arms to try and dislodge the nonexistent, sticky webs.

Triss set her hand on the wall of the tunnel, and slowed down her pace. Couldn't move quickly in this without risking tripping. "Fucking dark."

"Monsters have different worlds, different realms, different things they like. The Eshmaki, like Fiona and myself, need darkness."

"Darkness, right. So I ... shouldn't pull out my phone then. Cause, you know, it has a light and—"

"Not yet."

Alone in the dark with the scary-but-cool-but-major-bitch woman, Triss continued walking forward, and let the darkness swallow her. Nope, nothing wrong here, just a stroll through old, abandoned tunnels in complete black with a darkness nightmare monster thing. She kept walking, squinting, trying to see something, but it was no use, too damn dark. No choice but to keep walking, and listen to the quiet clack of her boots on concrete.

At least, until her footsteps started to change sounds. Weird, and worthy of her stopping to kneel down and touch the floor. Stone.

And that's when it kicked in. Like a scene from Pulp Fiction, a needle full of adrenaline straight into the heart, every reflex in her body kicked in. Overload. She jumped up with a spin, and looked around. Still darkness, couldn't see shit, and every muscle was tensing hard enough to hurt. She wasn't in the tunnels anymore. And like a cat dumped into a new home with no warning, she wanted to get somewhere protected and safe so she could get her bearings.

“W-Where am I?”

“You may turn on your light now.”

White dots, two of them in the distance. They didn't give off enough light to illuminate whatever it was they were in, but they were there, two white dots she recognized. Gulping all too loudly, Triss pulled out her phone and turned on the light.

Athalia, in all her angel of death glory. An enormous torso, skin taugt and bones exposed, covered in serrated spikes. A skull, with a tiny white dot in the center of each large eye socket. Enormous black angel wings. And best of all, Athalia had no legs, just a dangling spinal chord that followed her as she flew—hovered around. Her wings weren't flapping, just taking up space as the abomination moved along the cave floor and through the darkness.

Cave floor. For a second she thought maybe Athalia had found a cave entrance in the tunnels; certainly possible with the shit Jacob did in his free time. But, no, this couldn't have been a cave like that, cause when Triss looked up, she could see stars.

She shined the light at the cave walls, and gulped again. Her new eye wasn't showing her any flickering, waving, or oddities anymore. Now, she was in the nightmare, and the eye had no more secrets to expose. Just darkness, endless, and deep.

“The fuck...” It was some sort of vertical cave, a pit, a giant hole in the ground. A spiraling edge followed the contours of the enormous hole, and went down, and down, and as she shined the light into the black, she stared down into its depths. The light couldn't reach the bottom. She pointed the light back up against the walls, and tried to see to the other side of the cave, but the light couldn't reach. Back up, she stared at the twinkling stars, their light unable to penetrate the depths of the hole. Hole wasn't a strong enough word, more like someone had taken a drill a thousand feet wide, and decided to try and dig to the depths of the Earth.

Terrifying, and thrilling.

The angel of death continued on. It really didn't fit; or at least, Athalia didn't fit her horror. The shadow, the dripping black mist, the onyx wings, the giant torso and dangling spinal cord, all just silhouettes in the darkness except under the light of Triss's phone, that were right at home in the cave. But Athalia herself was a bitch, a mean, hateful bitch, and the form she carried with her looked like it belonged on some sort of greater entity, like a personification of death or inevitability or something.

Then again, woman hadn't said a thing since she transformed, or exposed her other half, or whatever was a politically correct way of describing her horror half. And from what Fiona said, the nightmares this woman had as a child had something to do with this horror, this thing, this death personification floating before Beatrice. What sort of horrible things would those kind of dreams do to someone, with those wings haunting their thoughts, those white, glowing dots for eyes in the black, and those claws tearing at the ground? The sort of nightmares that made you pull your arm and legs under the covers nice and snug. The sort of nightmares Triss wished she had the power to inflict with her nightmare discipline; purely for defensive purposes of course.

Much as it must have been a horrible experience, to have this creature haunting her dreams, she did look god damn badass.

Triss had to jog a few moments to catch up, and jogging wasn't so easy with the stone beneath her being an unpleasant mix of smooth, wet, slippery, and randomly jagged with tiny drops. But she caught up, and started walking beside the angel of death. Just, a giant, floating torso thing, with its spinal cord hanging out and almost hitting the dark stone Triss was walking on. Christ.

“I uh ... don’t suppose I should try and pull a Jack, and start talking about personal shit, right?”

The creature turned to look at her, enormous skull blending into the obsidian around her except for the two white dots, a foot apart. “I do not suggest it.” Oh damn that voice, a whisper in the dark if there ever was one.

“Can you tell me something about where we are then? Cause, I mean, yeah, this might be the norm for you guys, but vamps spend their every night and day in the city. I mean, I haven’t left Dolareido since I was embraced, cause it’s not like I could handle sunlight.”

The enormous creature turned to look at her, but didn’t stop its slow hovering down the sloping path that circled the giant hole. With the darkness as her backdrop, it was hard to ever truly see any of the monster’s features, just bits and pieces as she swayed, body catching hints of starlight or Triss’s phone light.

“We are here to ensure Fiona is not in danger, and to kill her attackers if she is. I have no reason to share my secrets with you.”

“Not like I’m trying to—”

“Aren’t you? Jacob and his eye allowed him to see me, Mark, Azamel, as you explained.” Her voice caught between a whisper and a harsher rasp, and clawed down Triss’s spine. “The same eye you now have.” She didn’t use her lips to speak; barely had lips at all, skin so tight on the face it was basically a skull. No nose. Her voice just emitted from her, as if using a mouth with a tongue was something this entity was beyond needing.

“Yeah, the eye lets us have a peek at you guys and your nightmare worlds. But—”

“Leeches. Sneaking, cowardly leeches.” The arm came out, and pushed Triss. Not the arm of the tall, slender black woman Athalia, but this dark shadow creature, and its enormous arm, with bone claws that dripped more of the black mist around her. It was more than enough to knock the vamp over, and she cursed as she started to roll down the slope.

“Fuck!” She didn’t go far, but a little ways was enough for her to roll against the wall of the enormous cave where it met the path, and come to a stop in some bones resting against the stone. “You bitch, I could have ... have ... holy shit.” She pointed her phone at the bones, at the walls, and then, gasped.

The tunnel wasn’t just a big hole drilled into the Earth, with a pathway that circled the side all the way down like a screw. It was a graveyard. Bodies, randomly spread out against the wall and ground. Limbs with clothes still on them. Some fresh, or at least only a year or so old. Most were far older, skeletons, of varying sizes, some far too small to be adults.

“There was a time, centuries ago, when bandits and raiders were as common as fleas.” The angel of death hovered past the corpses and skeletons where they amassed in a pile against the wall, before passing it and moving further down the slope. And once Triss caught up with her again, she couldn’t help but notice more, and more, and more bodies they passed. “There was a legend, of a horrible place where these bandits and raiders would toss their kills. And, so the legend went, many of those tossed into the great hole of the dead were still alive when thrown in.” The demon motioned with one of its giant hands of bone toward the wall, where another pile of bones had grouped up in the grooves of dark rock. “And some survived the landing, only to die of their injuries, screaming up into the emptiness above them for help.”

“ ... yea, that’s pretty fucking dark.”

“Indeed.” It, she, nodded, and continued once again. “An exaggeration. In my travels I found this place, I found the bones, the dead, centuries gone and buried. Not so nearly as large as this, but then dreams are prone to exaggeration. The fears of the dying carved this chamber into the primordial dream.”

“ ... I thought you weren’t going to share your secrets with me.”

“There is power in legends.” The dark angel shrugged, a strange motion for shadow to make, and gestured to the pit in the center of the vertical cave. “Begotten feed on fear, as Fiona has no doubt told you. For the others to fear us, fear me, is to my benefit.”

“You think I fear you?”

“Of course you fear me.” Athalia came closer, and Triss stepped back. The fuck was she supposed to do? Athalia might as well have been a literal angel of death for all Triss could see, and the fucker knew it too.

“You really underestimate vamps.”

The monster snorted, a weird, half rasp half groan noise that echoed off the rock walls, before she, it, they continued along. “Perhaps. It is easy to underestimate a cockroach until you try and kill one yourself. You are notoriously difficult to kill, and you spread in much the same way.”

“Yeah well, a great man once said eventually we’ll all be dead, and the only ones left are gonna be five cockroaches and Keith Richards.”

“ ... and you take pride in this?”

“A bit, yeah.” She shrugged, adjusted her tank top, and resumed the walk into the endless pit of black. “So, pit of death, some sort of fear-created ... thing, place ... thing?”

“Yes. You vampires know of only the physical. Azamel tells me both Jacob and Antoinette have long sought to touch the borders of other realms, but you ... you’re so limited. What could you know of spirits, or the other realms, the layers of existence where the universe is ... no, I waste my breath.” The monster waved a dismissing, titan hand, and floated out over the empty hole. Triss had to jog down the slope — fucking scary — to catch up as Athalia landed on the other side, before continuing down. What a bitch. “What do you know of H. P. Lovecraft?”

“Just the basics. Cthulhu, fish men, knowledge so unimaginable that it’s capable of making you go ... insane...”

The monster turned to her, and Triss froze solid as she came in closer, and closer, until the colossal face of nigh bone was almost up to her. The dark skull was easily five times the size of a normal skull.

“If you dreamed a dream, infantile vampire, a dream that let your mind go, that let it reach up and out of this single realm of the physical, it could scrape against the walls protecting it from the outside.” The thing hovered down the cave slope further still, until at long last their walk came to what seemed some kind of bottom. “If you had any idea what sort of entities waited for you, just waiting for you to be stupid enough to leave the safe confines of your little world, you’d never sleep again.” The floor of the pit cave was covered in the dead, in bones and clothes and empty bags. Some bones belonged to horses, and others to dogs. “You think Azamel is terrifying? You have no idea, cockroach, just how terrifying the grander existence of things beyond understanding can be.”

“I never really did get the cosmic horror thing.” She shrugged, and gestured to the graveyard they’d started walking through. “Call me simple but I think spooky things in the black are scarier.”

“You are simple.” The entity returned the shrugged, colossal shoulders move its colossal wings with the motion, before it continued along up and over a pile of bones.

Climbing bones didn’t go as easily as Triss figured. They moved or broke under her feet, and thrice she fell down onto her face, bones meeting her and jabbing up into her. Many shattered where they were once connected, and hands or feet fell apart, raining down the sides of the hill of the dead and sending Triss sliding down along with them. Like trying to climb a hill of nothing but ice and loose snow, ugh.

She gave up, and walked around, one hand to the stone wall, the other pointing her flashlight at the bones beneath her. “This isn’t real, right?”

“It is real.”

“Thought this was a nightmare?”

“It is.”

“I ... oh.” Ok, that put it into better perspective than all of Jacob and Athalia’s ranting combined. Nightmares were real, actually real. The crazy shit the mind could only manage a glimpse of during dreams, was real. Yeah, ok, now she was starting to get a chill.

“This way.” The monster disappeared into another hole in the wall, big enough for her wings and titanic bones to fit through. Triss jogged after her, hopping up over bones and onto any rock or empty space where her feet could land on stone. “Turn your light off.”

“Right.” Fiona had said she was a monster that dealt with darkness, and had said Athalia was the same. Did they need it to function, or did they just prefer it? Everything was such a mystery with these damn things, and Fiona either didn’t know the details, or wasn’t willing to provide them. She didn’t blame the girl, but then maybe she and Jacob wouldn’t have had to come here, with a witch eye each, if they knew as much about the Begotten as they did Kindred, or the Uratha for that matter.

Christ, what the fuck else existed out there she didn’t know about or had never seen. Ghosts? Mummies? Fucking fairies?

She almost tripped as her boot got stuck in mud. If it was mud. She froze again, and took a long sniff of the air. Humidity, heat, water, rot, and mulch. The cave had connected to some kind of jungle or something.

“Is this—” Gunfire cut her off. She ducked low, and blinked into the darkness ahead of them. Or, ahead of her. Athalia was nowhere to be seen in the black, and the damn thing hovered around so it wasn’t like she made footsteps, or breathed. Triss grit her teeth and waited, listening, straining her ears to adapt to the new environment. A jungle, an actual jungle, humidity and heat and weird noises and all.

It couldn’t have been the same place she just came from. Wherever she’d been, whatever nightmare that was, it’d be silent, and cold. But without a door or gate or some magical, mystical watchamacallit to make the transition more notable, she’d entered someplace new, someplace hot, someplace where the environment itself pressed down on her.

She crept along, crouched and silent, claws against the mud, the roots and shit beneath her. A jungle, it had to be a jungle. Fiona’s jungle. Girl had mentioned it but Triss hadn’t really given it much thought, since Begotten were strange and it was easier to think of them like that, easier to dismiss the girl's words as weird metaphor or something. Not a metaphor, not a metaphor at all. And as Triss moved forward, some light started to reach her, enough for her eyes to adjust and see the bark, the mud, the moistness and moss and fungus and mushrooms and fucking insects. Oh god the insects, everywhere, creepy crawly things with a thousand legs and others with none at all.

More gunfire, and screams. She continued along, summoned her vitae, and hid herself in the cloak of night. With this much darkness, trees, and vines dangling around, she'd be able to walk up to someone and punch them before they realized she was near.

Or at least, that would have been nice. But as she came closer to the gunfire, the sound of voices joined in, and then lights, far stronger lights than Triss's phone, cut through the black. And then the toppling of a tree.

She'd never heard a tree fall. How could she have? City girl her whole life, and second life, and the closest she'd ever heard to a tree falling was in movies. But there was no mistaking the creaking of wood, and then the tearing of vines and breaking of branches in a crescendo of weight and an impending crash. The tree was huge, so very huge, so very fucking huge, and it tore a through the canopy until moonlight bled through the wound.

Two moons. Holy shit.

Holy shit! She jumped back and scampered as someone fell in front of her, and landed hard enough to splat against the mud and splash it against her clothes. Some black dude in a suit. The fuck?

---

---

~~Eric~~

That hurt. That really fucking hurt. His head didn't hit anything too hard on the way down, but riding a giant tree down as it tumbled onto its brethren through the black night of a jungle, wasn't fun. Close to the bottom, when gravity decided it didn't like Eric anymore, the man fell and crashed down through brush, vine, and darkness. Mud greeted him, and softened his landing as much as a bellyflop in a swimming pool would. Better than breaking all his bones, but it still really fucking hurt.

He sat up, groaning, rubbing his head. Covered in mud, and Fiona's blood, and god only knew what else, whatever sort of shit, literal or not, you found on a jungle floor.

He froze. A woman was staring at him. The light from the torn-open canopy hit her enough he could see her decently well, or at least he should have been able to. Something was making it hard, something pushing at his eyes, causing them to slide off of her, and he had to squint and focus to force his gaze back onto the stranger. She was only two feet away, in literal punching distance, but it was damn hard to look at her.

She had one normal eye, and one snake eye. Fucking weird. They stared at each other, both unmoving, his heart pounding and his breath panting. But not hers. No breath, no heartbeat.

And just like before, his gears kicked in. Again, adrenaline spiked his system, and he found himself breathing in the scent of this newcomer, trying to analyze the threat they posed, trying to figure out friend or foe, or where they fucking came from.

She was doing the same thing. Expression on her face was—holy shit she had extra teeth, extra teeth where her cheeks should have been. Her raven hair hid it by framing her face, and so did the darkness, but the piercing moonlight and his new eyes managed to catch glimpses of them. Weird crocodile teeth, sharper though, and big enough that it was easy to imagine them tearing off limbs whole.

“ ... I ... uh—”

She held up a hand and put one of her fingers to her lips. She had claws.

“Don’t move, don’t speak, or I’ll rip you in half.”

He almost said something. Very a much a ‘don’t look down’ sort of situation, being told not to say anything so suddenly. But after he stared into her very, very weird eyes for a moment, he nodded. Girl was sending him the same sort of signals Jessy and Natasha did, some sort of sneaky-but-deadly vibe, the sort of vibe he imagined anyone would get when walking around poisonous snakes.

“Work for Jeremiah?”

One of them had said that name, Jeremiah. He shook his head. Girl didn’t know he wasn’t one of these hunters Fiona was dealing with.

“How can I trust you?”

He gulped, and gestured to his clothes. Not like these hunters were in suits, and unlike him, they had weaponry.

“... good enough I guess. But, tell me, name of the person who let you in here?”

“Fiona. Scot girl. Asked me to help her follow four people. Said she wanted to find someone named Jack.” Spilling the beans. Well, in all the chaos, this girl with the crocodile mouth seemed like she was on Fiona’s side, and that was his best option at the moment.

“And—” She raised her hands to protect herself as the sound of gunfire, and the sound of tearing trees started up once more. He did too, and threw himself to the side behind a trunk as gunfire ripped through the leaves.

And then, claws. Bone claws. Giant, massive, black claws tore through the leaves around him, over him, and black feathers covered the sky over their heads. Spikes, serrated, jagged, ripped at the bark and the vines, pulled down the forest with the motion of the titan, and earned the ire of the hunters. Shotgun blasts fired in the direction of the damage, and both he and the new woman found themselves face down in the mud.

Another monster. This one had wings, and some sort of torso of bone. Its beady white eyes, tiny, betrayed what must have been a huge skull. Streaks of reflecting black cut through the jungle, curved, showing only glimpses of its form, of spikes and horns, of ribs. No legs. No fucking legs. As it moved, hovering through its new path of carved and ruined jungle, he could see its spine dangling behind it.

Death. He was looking at death, moving around, and hunting in the darkness.

The hunters appeared in a clearing, their backs to each other, pistols and shotguns and two special knives drawn. The moment something moved, they shot it, and Eric winced as he recognized the sound of Fiona's new, monster scream. But, as he peeked out from behind the tree trunk, he caught a glimpse of the spider woman. Wounded, but alive, and still trucking, pulling herself up into trees and slashing out at the four hunters.

Damn the four shmucks were so outclassed, but they kept on fighting, each firing into the black, and every so often, they earned an alien snarl from the darkness. This time it was one Eric didn't recognize, some sort of raspy thing without the texture of a human voice. The other one, the other thing with black wings, it hissed and rasped and disappeared into the black as quickly as it came. A bullet managed to hit it, clipped one of the bones, and only then did Eric notice it had skin, gaunt to the point it wrapped the bone like saran wrap clinging to leftovers. Bits of the black material tore away, and blended into the mud of the dark jungle.

And then shit got even more crazy. Universe just felt like dumping it on, shutting down his throat with as much insanity as he could possibly handle. Another dude showed up.

“Get down!”

The crocodile mouth girl didn't listen to the new voice. Instead, she sank her claws into one of the trees and started climbing, while Eric was more than happy to throw his body to the muck and cover his head, as he watched the man pull a grenade from his trench coat, and toss it into the forest.

An explosion, his first explosion. He wasn't prepared for the kinetic force of it striking out like a wave, or the sound of it. And he wasn't prepared for the debris, the shredding bark and branches cutting through the air. Somehow, crocodile lady was prepared, and she held on as she climbed higher.

“How did you get in here!?” Fiona called out from the black.

The newest newcomer laughed, and wiped his thumb on his lip, content to keep his secrets. He took out another grenade. And then, another. And the jungle forest screamed in agony as the man destroyed it with reckless abandon. Two more grenades immediately after, into the darkness, into the chaos. Not like the stranger had to worry about casualties, not with his four buddies beside him.

Eric certainly had to fucking worry. He did his best, stayed down and covered his head, but this fucker was tossing his grenades around like confetti, and they got closer, and closer, until everything around Eric was shredded trees falling over. If he didn't move, he was dead. If he got up, he was dead; the hunters weren't asking questions, just shooting first.

He started rolling, staying as low to the ground as he could, but there was only so much he could do to avoid what was turning into a giant fuckfest of carnage and mayhem. Get up, and die. Stay down, and die a bit later once one of those grenades landed beside you, or one of the hunters noticed him. More and more of the forest was being destroyed, so more of the dual moonlight was reaching them.

“Such a young monster,” the trench coat fucker said. Might as well have been wearing sunglasses at night. “Got a name?”

“I—”

“Don’t tell him anything,” the blackness said. That angel of death thing, no doubt. Both Fiona and its voice sounded horrific, but the death thing’s voice was the sort of raspy you expected to hear in a graveyard when you were looking for ghosts. Almost like a whisper that was somehow louder than yelling.

“Athalia, you really should just come out and let me kill you. Think your daughter is going to be as nice as I am?” Man’s voice flirted on playful, and angry. Reminded Eric of a bar before a fight erupted, when people were pounding their chests, but thought they were being sly about it by using shitty jokes and sarcasm.

“You ... brought Angela ... here?”

The sound was more focused, coming from somewhere past the five humans — christ, identifying people with ‘human’ was fucking weird — and showed a touch of shadowy movement. The guy with the grenades took advantage, drew his pistol, and fired. Eric didn’t see the movement, just the result, his gun aimed. Fast.

His bullet hit something, and something hissed its fury as it faded back into the shadows behind the trees.

“Lovely girl. She’s really looking forward to repaying you.”

“I did nothing to her!” Again the voice came from the black, but Eric couldn’t pinpoint it this time, and neither could the man. Jeremiah, according to the hunters and what they said earlier. And he’d also said something about ‘her daughter’. So, that made this death angel creature a woman, and a mom too. Creepy.

“Guess that whole wandering life, getting into fights with the werewolves and the vampires, making enemies of everyone, having it follow you wherever you went, didn’t agree with her.”

More movement, shadows slipping by the trees still standing. Jeremiah shot his pistol just once, straight into the darkness, and earned another loud hiss of pain. How the man could hit anything in the jungle, let alone through the parts of it that were pitch black, Eric had no idea, but he was.

“You ... poisoned her against me.”

“No, you did that. I just found her. Gave her a lift. Gave her a gun.” The man marched forward, pistol in one hand, and he eased a sword out of a hidden sheath into the moonlight. And it shined with the weird shine the two hunters and their special knives did. “Who’s your new friend? Another Eshmaki vermin to hide with you in the shadows?”

“She is none of your concern.”

“I think I’m going to have to make it my concern. Hurt one of my friends here. And besides, can’t let a monster live.”

“Get out of my home.” Fiona’s voice, or Vrall’s, Eric supposed. Making heads or tails of this whole situation was getting insane.

Fiona lashed out, massive legs coming in from above and stabbing down at the ground. It was her home, she had the advantage, and she was a fucking monster. The fact the humans were standing their ground was hard to comprehend, but they were, and they rolled out of the way as massive blade-like legs stabbed down from above. When they all started firing upward, Fiona had already moved on, legs carrying her back up into the canopy in another direction, dark skin fading into the shadows.

As they got up, one of the hunters leaned in, and whispered something to Jeremiah. The man nodded, and began looking up, but not in the direction Fiona's shadow had moved. He was looking for something else, and he squinted hard as he panned his gun over the black canopy above.

He fired. Someone screamed. A woman's voice, a normal, human-sounding woman's voice.

Eric almost stood up as the woman from earlier came crashing down beside him. She screamed fury and pain, and rolled to the side to get behind a tree trunk as a hail of bullets followed her. The ground and mud and roots ripped up, rocks and insects scattering over the jungle floor as lead decorated the wet moonlight beside Eric. The girl's shoulder had a hole in it, and she covered it with her hand as she pinned her back to the tree. No blood, or at least, she didn't gush blood like he expected from a wound like that. There was something red between her fingers, thick and slow, and it didn't smell like human blood.

Nothing about her smelled human.

"Triss, get out of here! Take Eric with you."

"What?" Crocodile face said, and she looked across the cut ground to him. "Are you fucking serious? Let me—"

Both Triss and Eric flinched, covering their heads, as an enormous splatter of white coated the trees around them. Webbing, a lot of it, not arranged into any pretty patterns or elegant strings, but thick, heavy vines of white that splattered around randomly, chaotically, painting the trees and forest and everything between Eric and the humans with spin art.

“Get out Beatrice! We’ll be fine. Mark will be here soon.”

Triss winced at the word Mark. “He uh ... might be? Jacob—” Another grenade landed by their way, slipping through the webs, and splashing in the mud between Eric and Triss.

The two of them stood up, and threw themselves to the darkness. The landing didn’t go so well, and Eric felt rock and branch rip through his suit and into his body. Skin tore, his blood joined the fabric, and his knee was fucking killing him.

“Mark will recover and be here shortly.” Athalia this time, her voice somewhere above them, flickering bits of dripping black mist sliding off the branches overhead.

“R-Right ... well, you’re the boss.” Coughing, groaning, and still holding her punctured shoulder, the crocodile lady started pushing herself up to her feet, back to the bark. Eric couldn’t help but stare. Certainly an attractive woman, with a very lean, fit body, with the muscle and abs to go with it. But as her head hung forward, her long tongue dangled out of her mouth, and Eric shuddered. Perfectly normal human lips from the front, but where her cheeks should have been, crocodile teeth chomped together. Not the time to be staring at her extra teeth, but something about them made him do a triple take. Something about the idea of biting someone with those teeth was oddly appealing.

“How the fuck are we going to get out of here?” he said. Don’t ask why this random monster woman would bother saving him, just assume she would for now. He had to do something, anything. Bullets whizzed by his head, and he again rolled onto his stomach. Crawling, dragging his body, he wormed his way through the jungle floor and toward another tree further from the gunfire and yelling men and women.

“Back the way I came. Christ that fucking gun is strong. The hell is this.” She motioned toward him with her shoulder, and he winced as he managed to peek through the hole and out into the jungle for a second. “I can’t leave until I have some fucking clue about Jack though.”

“You’re looking for Jack too?”

“Yeah, I am, I—” A chunk of the tree beside her head exploded outward, and she ducked as the bullets started ripping the trees around her apart. Then she vanished. Like a fucking ghost fading out of existence, she was gone, and Eric stared on as he gulped down his surprise. Just gone, vanished and—she appeared in front of him, and grabbed his wrist. “Stay close, and—”

And he punched her.

“Shit! God fucking damn it, christ woman. You fucking startled me.”

She picked herself back up off the mud, now coated in the slimy earth, and snarled at him. The hole in her shoulder was starting to close, right before his eyes, the weird blood, thick and heavy, filling the wound and pulling in skin and muscle, or making it new. But, before he could apologize again, or comment on the fucking insanity of her healing something so fast he could actually see the flesh rebind itself, she reached out, grabbed him, and started running.

He tried to move his legs to run with her, but they weren’t touching the ground. Like one of those silly videos with someone picking up a dog and carrying them just over ground, and the dog tries to walk or swim but can’t reach the water or ground. He was that dog. This woman, average height, built like a rock climber, was far stronger than even her impressive muscle mass would allow. Carrying him like a fucking child. And he was kind of glad she was, as more bullets started to slam into trees around them, causing the wet bark and vines to explode and shower them in plant matter, and god knew what else.

She threw him down into the muck, and she threw herself down next to him. Bullets crashed against rock, a couple creating some small sparks as they hit the minerals. There was a crag ahead, some sort of wall, some sort of cave.

“Stay close,” she said. “You’re invisible now, sort of, just stay close and stay quiet. Assuming the way back actually takes us back to the real—er, the material world, you’ll have to run out without me.”

“Cause of this Jack guy.”

She nodded, crawling on her belly right along with him. Her shoulder was working again.

“Kid needs saving, if he’s alive. And this Jeremiah fuck or his buddies might know where he—”

“I ... did hear these fuckers say that Jeremiah was coming from the prison.”

She stopped, turned to look at him with her normal eye, and her crazy green snake eye. The smile was unsettling.

“You just saved the fucking day ... Eric, was it?”

“Yeah.”

“Don’t know why a human is with Fiona and in this shit, but if we make it out of here alive, we’re gonna have a lovely chat.”

Human. She called him human. Every warning signal was going off in his brain, telling him that this girl was dangerous, but it was a shit load better call than going back toward the psychos behind him.

They continued crawling along, bellies to the mud, darkness covering them again as the sounds of gunfire, screaming, monster roars, and howling animals came and went. Laughter too, that guy in the trench coat, but not the sort of laughter you might expect to hear from a guy in a trench coat in a jungle with grenades and swords and guns. This guy's laugh was heavy, hoarse, smoking and yelling his whole life, but only strengthening his voice instead of damaging it. The sort of guy who could scream his fury at the ocean, and it'd notice.

It started to rain. It was a jungle, so of course it started to fucking rain. Not just rain, but flash flood, water pouring down the enormous leaves and twirling vines above. With Triss and Eric back under the canopy, none of the rain hit them directly; instead, it hit them as waterfalls flowing from the branches above. And it was strong enough, heavy enough, to leave the man gasping for breath with each forward swing of his elbows. Drowning in the mud of a jungle was not fun.

They continued the crawl toward the cave, and once they had their hands against the rock, they got to their knees and moved into its welcome embrace. Anything to get away from the hail of gunfire slamming into rocks and trees behind them.

Beatrice grabbed his arm, pulled him up, and the two of them broke into a jog. Or at least, that was the plan, but he fell, groaning and clutching his knee. Soaked, in pain, exhausted, and scared. What a fun night.

“The fuck is the matter with you?”

“Fucking knee. Old injury.”

Crocodile lady mimicked his groaning, and got down on a knee. Too dark to see much in the cave, but he could tell what she was doing by the feel of her arm holding his.

“Hop on.”

“ ... seriously?”

“Seriously. Two seconds before I leave without you.”

“Fucki—fine!” He got behind her, hooked his arms around her neck, and then his legs around her hips.

And then she got up and started running, as if she wasn't carrying a middleweight fighter on her back. Hell, he'd seen people struggle to run this speed with a heavy backpack on. She definitely wasn't human; not that he needed more proof, what with the crocodile face, but it was a sight to behold — or feel in the darkness — that she was carrying him. No wonder she'd been able to throw him so easily.

Hope she didn't run into a wall in the darkness, or he'd have to add broken nose to the list of tonight's delights.

She didn't go far. Maybe a few hundred feet before she stopped, and looked up. He did too, and sucked in his breath hard at the sight of the sky and moon. The moon, but not the moon, something alien but familiar, around alien but familiar stars. And the smell, alien but familiar. His new nose told him it was old rot and bones, a different smell to the jungle. Wet but not soaking wet, barren, rock, and while the jungle was half alive, half dead, there was nothing but dead awaiting him in this new nightmare.

But he couldn't see shit. He hooked his arm around the woman's neck, reached into his pocket for his phone, pulled it out, and— “Oh fucking hell it isn't working.”

“Phone flashlight?”

“Phone flashlight.”

“We’re so wet we might as well have been swimming. I probably can’t use mine either.”

“Then what the fu—” Gunfire snapped past them again, hitting more rock while others slammed into the bones before him. So damn dark he almost couldn’t see it, but with the stars and moon way way up there, and them apparently at the bottom of some giant hole in the ground, he could just make out the silhouette of a mountain of death before him.

Beatrice jumped forward, and onto the bones. And then again, jumped, each jump going a fair bit higher than was possible, each landing into the bones and sending them scattering in random directions from the weight of their combined bodies. Bones cracked and shattered, many exploding and sending their shards down the hill of the dead.

“The fuck is this?” he said

“Another nightmare. Athalia’s.”

“Right, that ... that...”

“Yeah, I know. Fucking spooky. And she has a daughter apparently, working with that Jeremiah fuck.” Through her scaling over the mountain of bones and toward the other side of the enormous vertical cavern, she didn’t break her words at all. Almost as if she didn’t need the breath. “I—” And then gravity decided the two of them needed to join the dead beneath them.

Gunfire, several shots, shattering the silence of the cave. Beatrice went down, slamming into the mountain of dead, and launching Eric to the side as she spun. He only had time to realize she was falling harder than a simple trip would have caused, before the dead decided to ensnare him. Hands, arms, skulls, they all took liberties with pushing against his clothes and rubbing against his mud-soaked face as he rolled down the hill. At least he was rolling toward Beatrice's goal, but every roll was a combination of a horrifying dance with the dead, and scraps and bruises peppering his already very beat up body.

"Fuck!" Crocodile face fell down the hill somewhere beside him, and he had to blink a few times to find her silhouette in the darkness. She was holding her leg. "Fuck fuck fuck. Give me a few minutes," she said, dropping her voice to a whisper.

"A few minutes to what?"

"Heal."

"What happened?"

"Someone's coming up behind us. One of those hunter fucks must have got past Fiona and Athalia. Put a hole through my shin."

"... and you're going to heal that in a few minutes."

"Enough to put weight on it again at least."

"Are you fucking serious? Christ, you and Fiona and that corpse angel thing, the fuck are you—"

"We can discuss it later. We—" They both turned and raised a hand to cover their eyes as white light blinded them. A flashlight. And as he tried to block out the searing in his eyes, the sounds of gunfire joined the white beam.

Not for him though. He would have recognized something like a gunshot wound in his body, even with his eyes covered, he was sure. Seems the hunter was aiming for crocodile face, and was a good shot from the sounds. Each was followed with a shriek of pain, and the thud of a bullet hitting flesh. The creature fell backward, screaming again, and again as a bullet ripped through her and splattered a mess of her flesh out over the dead that surrounded them. The splatter, lit by the hunter's light, vanished as it moved through the air, turning into tiny flickers of ember and ash.

Eric threw himself to the side and out of the way, but once he was on his knees and palms again, he stared at the hunter at the top of the mountain. One of the woman hunters had managed to follow them, and she sneered from atop the hill of bones, gun still pointed at Triss. So much for being invisible.

“H ... how—”

“You were moving the bones while you walked on them. Idiot.” The human managed a quiet chuckle, out of breath and covered in sweat and jungle muck. She loaded in another magazine, smooth as butter, and pointed it at Beatrice.

Eric managed another glance at crocodile face, and winced. She had a bunch of new holes in her body, lit by the flashlight the hunter was holding underneath the pistol. Seven shots fired, seven hits, and each straight into crocodile face's torso. Enough to make the monster cough up some of that weird, thick red liquid that wasn't blood onto her extra teeth.

“ ... fear...” Some of the red liquid trickled from the woman's tank top and stomach, too thick to go far, and some of it slid back into other holes, as if something inside the monster was pulling it back into her guts. “Fear.”

Eric expected to hear the click and boom of another bullet, but none came. The hunter stood there, shaking, glaring, and fresh sweat started to drip from her forehead, lit by the glow of her flashlight. Her breathing quickened, and Eric blinked as he watched her gun and light start to jitter. Her heart was beating faster too, and she raised her flashlight to her face to wipe away the sweat drops threatening to touch her eyes.

Something was up, something was wrong, something was weighing down on the area and burying it in the cold, suffocating grip of terror. He gulped and stared on as crocodile face, sitting on the side of her hip with her hands to the ground in front of her, looked up at the hunter, stared at her, and growled. It came out of her, out of Beatrice, something invisible, something that clawed at his skin and told him to get away from her, something that felt wrong.

“I’m not afraid!” Click. Bang. The shot went wide, missing crocodile face and slamming against the rock wall behind her. There was a ramp, some sort of path that led up the side of the vertical cave, some way to get out and escape. But what really got Eric’s attention was that somehow, the hunter missed. She fired again, and again it missed, as crocodile face stared down the woman above her.

“ ... fear.”

Panting and panicking, shaking and fumbling, the hunter woman started to mumble to herself, words of encouragement like ‘it’s not real, it’s not real’ and ‘she’s just fucking with your brain, it’s not real’ over and over. Didn’t change that the girl was trembling, and the bones around her were rattling right along with hers.

Triss jumped up, and growled. Not a human growl, not a human sound, something far closer to an animal, something that would hide in shadows and bite with the ferocity of a badger or wolverine. Something that told Eric’s gut that she was a creature of shadow, a hunter in the night, something that told him she was like a wolf—no, no. He had it all wrong. Not a badger or wolverine or wolf.

An owl, waiting in the night for prey. An owl that could growl, that could roar, that could sink fangs into you. The imagery struck him still.

The human screamed and ran. Eric gulped and looked after her, but with her went the light, and soon he and the thoroughly punctured monster were left in the dark again.

“The fuck did you do?”

“Lot of vamps have ways to fuck with a person’s mind. I mean come on, you must have seen Dracula.” She sighed, a dreamy sort of sigh, and as his eyes adjusted to see her silhouette, he noticed she was fanning herself. “Gary Oldman back then? Fuck, I’d let that man do a million things to me.” Acting like she barely noticed she was horribly injured, and perhaps she did barely notice.

Wait.

“ ... you’re a vampire.”

“Yeap.”

“ ... Fiona mentioned vampires ... do ... do all vampires have mouths like yours?”

“Ha, fuck no. Nosfer—you know what? How about we get out of here first. My phone is...” She reached into her jeans, soaked in blood, mud, water, and covered in bits of dead everything, and pulled out her smartphone from the rather tight confines. Girl definitely had a thing for her ass, with jeans like that. “Yeap, my phone’s fucked too. Fuck fuck, why does this fucking nightmare shit affect us like it’s real? Oh, right, cause it is real.” She started crawling, but crawling fell to groaning and grunting as her body fell too. “Ok, switch. You carry me.”

“You can’t be serious. I can’t—”

“It’s either that or you leave me here, and I can personally guarantee my boss will do worse to you than I did to that hunter if you do, so come on.”

Yeah, point taken. Grumbling, he forced himself to his knee, and held his hand out to her.

And then began the crunching, the grinding, and the pressing bone against ruined cartilage that could not protect the joint. Knee injuries were the fucking most horrible thing, because of how much they lied to you, how much they tricked you, how easy it was to think your knee was functional, that it could handle something, that it'd be ok if you pushed it a little. It was good at this lie, and Eric fell for it far more often than he liked to admit.

He groaned once, grit his teeth, and forced down the next dozen groans as he started up the cave ledge. It was a wide ledge, no real risk of falling down the hole in the cave's center, but each step on the slope was precarious, and falling down it to roll a rather painful trip was not something he wanted to experience. And each step, his knee tried to make that a reality, each step putting the weight of this bleeding, swiss cheese vampire on his back into his knee. She wasn't extremely heavy, but with a body like that, she had enough muscle mass to put a decent amount of weight on him.

He almost laughed. Bad time to tell a girl she was heavy.

“You are slower than molasses going uphill in January.”

“ ... the fuck kind of expression is that?”

“Had some relatives from Canada. Newfoundland I think.”

He groaned a few more times, and came to a stop. He managed maybe a hundred feet before his leg started to buckle, and he fell to his good knee. But falling to a knee was a painful position to be in for his bad knee, no matter which knee he landed on, and he groaned again, louder, as the fucking thing clicked.

“Sorry,” she said, “didn't know you were eighty.”

“Fuck ... you.” He almost told her to get off and carry him, but he could feel the holes in her flesh with how her body was pressing against him. Vampire indeed, a walking, talking corpse. No wonder she didn’t sound winded earlier, since she probably didn’t need to breathe. But despite that, he was better off than her, and it was the better call that he be the one carrying her. He got moving again, but the best he could get was a slow walk. No way they were outrunning anyone chasing them like this.

But it seemed like no one was chasing them anymore. Thank fucking god.

“Shit, I hope Fiona’s alright,” she said. “We just left her.”

“She told ... us to leave ... seemed ... confident.” Every word was labored, sweat dripping down his forehead and chest, each step a shaky mess.

“You’re handling this insanity pretty well.”

“Just ... guess I ... was getting used to ... crazy shit.”

“Oh?”

“Just ... nevermind ... Fiona can tell you ... later.” If Fiona and this dead thing on his back were friends, well, maybe she’d tell Triss about his dreams later; hopefully after telling him about them.

“K, I can walk now. But christ, that hunter pumped me full of holes. Only walking.”

“Walking ... better ... than this.” He got down again, and the vampire hopped off. She put a hand on his shoulder, and the two started walking. Fuck fuck fuck every step was painful, every step made his leg wobble, and every step made him grumble.

“You’re a whiny fuck, aren’t you?”

“ ... you can't be serious. My knee doesn't work you—”

“I know you can't see it in the dark, but I currently have a bunch of holes in my chest and the lead's in there too. I'd be dead twice over if I was human. Oh, and you saw what that Jeremiah fuck did to my shoulder. So, yeah, I still feel pain. Get over it.”

Damn this girl had bite, crocodile teeth or not.

“ ... so vampires exist.”

“Yeap. You really shouldn't know that, but you seem to be helping Fiona out, and me out now, so I'll cut you some slack.”

“ ... and if I wasn't?”

“Well then you'd be dead, or forcefully turned into a thrall. Masquerade violation, letting you know about us, about any of this shit.”

“Violation?” Even with her off his back, his breathing, his words, all of it was getting weighed down by his exhaustion, his pain, every step up the slope draining him. This night was brutal. Walking with Fiona, then running with her in his arms, then the trees in the jungle, then belly crawling along the jungle floor, then this shit in the cave. He wouldn't be able to stand for days, maybe weeks, once he got to sleep. Hopefully his boss would let him sit at his new job, assuming he still had it.

Fuck, he really hoped he still had that job.

“Yeah. There's a reason you didn't know vamps existed until now.”

“Shit. Am I fucked?” Fuck, did he just stumble into the mafia, except, vampires? Fuck. Fuck fuck.

“Well, maybe. We’ll see. But stick with me and I’ll see about getting this sorted out.”

“ ... and if I don’t stick with you?”

“Then I have to tell the boss, and you’ll be dead within twelve hours. Or worse.”

“ ... guess I won’t need to worry about my new job at the Bloodlust then.” He really should have just told Fiona no, and let the girl do this on her own. Doubtful she’d have found the hunters then. Probably wouldn’t be fighting them now, or had gotten shot earlier, or any of this shit. Bad decisions loved to create cascades of horrible leading to more horrible.

“You work at the Bloodlust?”

“I do. I did. Started just a little while ago, bouncer.”

“Heh, you’ve probably met other vamps then.”

“ ... really?” Wait wait wait. Those two Fiona was with, what were their names? “ ... Jessy, and uh ... Natasha?”

“Ha, yeap.”

“Shit. Fucking shit, Jessy agreed to do me a favor.”

“Getting a favor from an Invictus? Might as well have been getting a favor from the devil. Expect to be repaying that favor,” she said. Great. Fucking great. Life was just a lovely avalanche of shittyness shitting down his shit-filled throat. “How’d you get mixed up in all this anyway?”

He almost told her, about him and Fiona, about her saying she knew about his hallucinations, his dreams, all that shit. Life or death kinda did that to people, apparently, got them feeling truthful when they really should just shut up. He didn't know if this woman would actually help him, or if she was just using him to get out of this nightmare and back to Dolareido, where she could then suck his blood out and leave him a withered corpse. So he decided to keep the truth to himself, and wait.

“Met Fiona at the bar. She came to me tonight, asking if I knew where Jack was. I didn't, never seen the guy, but she mentioned she was also looking for four strange people, which I had just seen. We tailed them.”

“You left your job randomly, to tail some strangers, cause a girl asked you to?”

“ ... she was very convincing.”

“Uh huh, right. Well, whatever, we're friends so she'll tell me about it later.” She shrugged, and then screamed before falling down to a knee again. “Forgot ... about ... the fucking shoulder.”

“How the fuck do you forget about a hole in your shoulder?”

“Fuck you dude, let's see how well you last with a fuckload of holes in your body.”

“Pretty sure I'd just die.”

“Then don't fucking complain!”

“I've earned the right to complain.” With one arm hooking around her waist so she could hook his shoulder, he gestured to the stones and rock beneath them with his other. “I can't see shit. I'm in a nightmare. I'm going to have to see a doctor about my knee, for the tenth time. And now you're telling me Jessy is a fucking vampire, and Invictus, whatever that is. I ... she said she'd take care of Montoya, and then she'd fuck my brains out. Please tell me she wasn't making some sort of metaphor.”

“Jessy? Well, I have no idea who Montoya is, but yeah, fucking the bouncer from the club sounds like something she’d do. Probably while you’re in the club too. Don’t be surprised if she wants a Kiss though.”

“A kiss?”

“Vampire Kiss, you know? Suck your blood.”

“ ... Jesus! What—”

“Don’t worry about it. Feels good, won’t kill you, and knowing that whore, she’ll fuck you and do it at the same time.”

The strangest. Conversation. Of his life. Pit of dead beneath them, bones and random crap like bags and clothes littering his route, a precarious walk up a very long path up the inside of a cave, all inside a nightmare world. But it was the realization that the girl he owed a favor to was a vampire that poked his brain more. Please just mean sex, please just mean sex, he didn’t want to be a vampire or some vampire’s slave.

The path came to a stop, almost at the top of the cave, where it turned into yet another cave, small, but tall enough and wide enough for the two of them.

“You came in through here?” he said, and as she nodded, he guided her through the passage. Yay, more absolute darkness. Fucking annoying.

“Yeah, Athalia was walking me through the dark and then bam, I was here.”

“Sounds like me and Fiona. I—holy shit.” The sweet sweet clack of his shoes against something man made: concrete. Yes, finally, back to city, back to reality, back to hum of cars and other machinery, echoing down as near-silent vibrations through the earth.

The jungle had been overwhelming. He much, much preferred the breathing of the city, even if he was... “Where are we?”

“Beneath Morning Street. The old tunnels.”

“Right ... I—”

“You, are going to get my ass topside. We got a prison to get to ... and maybe ask Azamel for a phone.”

Do what she says you dumbass, or you won't live to regret it.

“Think ... think Fiona and them will be alright?” he said.

“We'll find out tomorrow. Right now we got a dumbass kid to save. Fuck, if he's not there or if he's dead, the Prince will burn half this city to the ground to get revenge.”

~~Jack~~

Fire hurt. Getting shot, stabbed, cut open, beaten, broken, dismembered, all of that was horrible, painful, excruciating, agonizing, and made each undead nerve in his body scream bloody murder. But fire was different. Fire was alive, and it laughed at him as more than just his nerves screamed in pain, but as his beast did as well. The licking flames filled him with both pain, and dread, and struck terror into his gut until it felt like ice cold enough to burn.

Ice, burning his insides, while fire burned his outsides. The clash of pains sent his whole being into a frenzy, sent his beast roaring into its own level of agony, and overwrote every thought he had except for one: get out.

One of the hunters got up from their friend. They'd managed to get him down and pinned, but only after he stabbed Angela. And after they hit the man several times in the face, Jack could tell his brainwashing was broken. Henry was borderline unconscious though, with the beating they gave him, so that was another hunter Jack didn't have to deal with at least. The one getting up though, she was in Jack's way, and Jack bowled her over, hard enough he could hear the crack of her skull against the floor.

Probably not dead, or at least, not if someone pulled her out of the fire along the wall.

He didn't stop to see if they did. No, he couldn't stop, couldn't control himself, couldn't do anything other than ride the overwhelming, overpowering need to get the fuck out of the fire. It took all his willpower to guide the beast toward the other entrance, instead of letting it pull him back to the safety of the prison cells, where there was no fire. Ahead, was fire, and it clawed and scratched at him as he ran past it.

He managed only a momentary glance over his shoulder to see what the psycho was up to. Angela was on her knees, bloody knife beside her on the floor, and she was screaming. Screaming, and standing. That deserved another glance, and he winced as the woman turned to face him, reached out, grabbed the knife soaked in her own blood, and started running after him.

"I'm going to fucking kill you!" Her voice mixed with the fire, like someone bellowing over the ocean. She ignored the hunters, ran past them, clutched the hole in her stomach with one hand and squeezed the blade grip in the other. The other hunters, their voices blended with the fire, were buried by it as they tended to their wounded, got people away from the flames. But not her, her voice vibrated along the walls and slammed against his ears, piercing the flames like a siren.

That woman was not human.

He jumped through the lobby. If he went fast, the flames had only a split moment to touch him, grab at him, dig at him. Surface wounds. His skin burned away, sending more searing pain up through his body and into his skull. He had to wonder if spontaneous human combustion was really a story about vampires catching fire. Or at least, he tried to wonder, but the beast in his gut suppressed the thoughts, pushed them aside, pushed the pain aside, and let the fear of its bane drive him through the lobby.

His skin was leaving him, ashes, dust to the flames. He was moving fast enough to keep his pants and shoes from catching fire, but his torso, his arms, the flame caught his skin and took it like peeling a sunburn, times a thousand. And it hurt, it hurt until he felt like he was back in that mill with Viktor and Tony.

But the fire was starting to fade, and once he burst through the wall of flame into the center of the civilian lobby, he found much of the fire had faded. Gasoline or other flammable liquids on concrete meant it wouldn't last, and he thanked fucking god that he didn't have to run through more halls filled with vampire bane.

He kept going. He could hear screaming him, all coming from Angela, the others defeated and exhausted. But not her. The psycho continued after him, and made a few loud clicking noises of metal on metal. She was reloading.

Gunfire. Bullets ricocheted against concrete, slammed into the counter as he got past it, and sent sparks flying as some found the bars of the gate ahead of him. Normally he wouldn't be concerned about some bullets, but if she nailed him in the head, he'd be down and wouldn't be getting back up without someone spoon feeding him a mountain of blood. And in his current condition, even a shot to the heart or spine would probably do that as well.

Outside. Oh thank god the outside. The beast finally calmed down, let him take in his surroundings, let him make some decisions, let him think about things other than the overwhelming need to flee, and feed. He just fed, ten fucking minutes ago, but it was gone, used up, bleeding out of him or healing his wounds to at least get his legs working.

Working was a strong word. As he got out onto the street, he fell, and screamed out as he landed on one of the stumps of his arm. Legs collapsed, muscles refused to contract and tendons refused to bend to pull on the bones.

Outside though, he was outside. Good, and bad. Gunfire out here meant cops would be coming, eventually. Cops were also good, and bad. The hunters wouldn't want to be around for that, to have to explain to cops what they were doing with their weapons, or to—bang! More gunfire, more bullets whizzing past him, hitting nearby buildings, shattering windows, and hitting parked cars. The fuck were this many parked cars doing here in the middle of the night in this part of town? Half a dozen more cars than seemed normal. The hunters, maybe? Too many cars for this part of town to be just civilians, and a van was parked beside the prison too.

For a second, he thought maybe the hunters would come pouring out of the cars, each armed with guns and stakes and fire, but they were empty, and he leaned against one as he forced himself back to standing. Running wasn't working anymore, and instead, he limped forward, one leg refusing to propel him like it should, so each step was weighed down by it.

He looked back toward the prison. Only Angela came out. Now holding her wound with her knife hand and bleeding down her leg, she limped after him, gun hand aimed and wobbling. She fired again, and again. One of them caught him in the back, and he screamed as he fell over again, landing on an elbow. But, the pain blended into the mess of agony writhing up and down his punctured, burnt corpse, almost fading away as he got back up, and started limping away again.

The other hunters weren't with her. Why? For fuck's sake don't look a gift horse in the mouth, just move. Go.

He couldn't go, not very well anyway. Best he could manage was limping, dragging his body against the cars, each step a painful lesson in how heavy even his light body could be when injured like this. Antoinette had fought with injuries like this, and only when she had lost an arm and leg did her wounds bring her to a halt. She was a Daeva though, and it was Ventrue and Gangrels that were the more resilient of the clans, that could get a chunk of their skull chopped off and shake it off, that could get up from a train wreck, that could march into a hail of gunfire and ignore the bullets tearing through them. How she managed to do it as a Daeva, he couldn't imagine.

Ventrue resilience was the only thing keeping Jack from slipping into torpor. He grabbed his Ventrue blood, forced it up, felt that piece of Viktor inside him, and Julias, and used it. His body was holding together, just barely, just enough he could keep moving, keep dragging himself away from the maniac with the gun.

"Get back here you fucking leech!" Another gunshot hit the windshield behind him, and the glass exploded over his body as he limped over to the next car.

How the fuck was she keeping up with him? A glance back showed she was struggling, bleeding, limping, but it didn't matter to her, like a wound wouldn't stop her. It was a fucking knife wound, through the back and out the stomach; it should have been enough to stop her. Streetlights lit the red path she was leaving behind, and she announced each drop of blood with a curse, a scream, and many were paired with more gunshots.

She pulled out another magazine, and loaded it, letting go of her wound to do so. Jack looked over his shoulder as he heard her scream, then grunt with impact. She'd fallen. It might have been a good opportunity to turn around and kill her, if he hadn't been in the same boat, stumbling, dragging, fighting the urge to pass out as well. No, he had one option here, and that was to run.

“Fucking killed Johnny, and Mike, and Fran, and Stacey’s dead because of you. You don’t get to just walk away!” She got herself up again, put her hand back on the hole in her gut, and leaned against the cars as she limped toward him. More gunshots, all misses, all decorating the streets beneath him and shattering the glass of car windows beside him. At least the newer cars had windshields that didn’t explode, but older cars weren’t so nice, and bits of the sharp material showered Jack like rain.

Eventually, he ran out of cars to lean against. In this part of North Side, there were no houses around, no neighborhoods, just factories and business buildings. Empty streets, old roads, and older buildings with alleyways between them. Darkness. Some of the streetlights weren’t working anymore, and as he passed through the black spots, Angela stopped shooting. The moment he was back out into the light, more gunfire came for him.

“Stop running and die!”

He only offered a growl. Part of him wanted to insult her, throw a scathing remark or two, but buried in pain and wounds and ashes, with bones and guts exposed, all that came out of him was the noises of the beast. More growls, a few snarls, and one scream as one of her bullets caught his leg.

Not just his leg, his ankle. The shattering of bone was too much, and his shriek sliced the night air apart as he fell down again. Asphalt greeted him with a punch to his arm and chest, and he screamed again as he tried to get back up. Bones broken, muscles punctured, tendons torn, skin peeling off of him as ashes, he lay there and managed to roll onto his back. Get up. Get up. Get the fuck up.

No one was around to help him. Middle of the night, no one was in North Side, not near the abandoned prison anyway. The cars they passed had to be more of her hunters, but they weren't here. Off scouting, planning, taking notes about vampire whereabouts maybe? Either way, no one was around to hear him scream, hear him snarl, hear him shout and curse at the fucking woman as she limped her way over to him. The best he could hope for was the echo of gunshots being enough to entice someone to call the police.

He drove his heels against the road, pushed his body away from her with his weight on his elbows and ass, and ignored the grinding of his bones against the street. Keep moving, don't stop, you're not going to die here.

She came in closer, and closer, hissing a dark laugh and firing her gun again. Missed. She fired again, missed, and fell to her knees with a crunch.

“Kill ... you ... fucking ... vampire.” Even crawling she was still faster than him, and after a few feet she forced herself back to standing, gun hand weighing her down like an anvil tied to her wrist. “Going to ... fucking ... kill you...” She got closer, and closer, blood dripping and her curses growing louder with each drop.

He only snarled.

“Mother ... was right ... about vamps.” She reached him, and stepped onto his ruined leg. She'd probably have kicked him if it didn't risk her tearing open her insides any worse than they already were. “Look at you. Fucking ... growling like a wounded animal. That's all you are, a wounded animal that needs ... to be put down.”

She fell forward, right onto him, but she was smart about it and landed on her knee against his chest. The crack hit his ears first, and then pain came after, but all he could manage was more snarls and growls. Thoughts were almost gone, just noises to his brain now, just meaningless words, and all that came up instead were more animal sounds.

“We’re going to ... purge this town, you fucking ... leech. Going to burn you all out. Vamps, the fucking monsters, whatever else is hiding ... in the god damn cracks of this slut city, they’re all dead.” The knife came out, the one soaked in her blood, and she brought it up as she glared down at him, glass eye piercing into his soul.

She was going to kill him.

He tried to find more of that power, that will, that beast inside him that let him defeat those weird handcuffs, that let him summon thousands of rats, that let him break the minds of three hunters easily. Gone, all gone. He was just a defeated corpse now, holding together as well as a paper bag held water.

But, a smile sneaked its way onto his lips. “The Prince is going to kill you.” A threat of posthumous revenge? A very real threat though, and he let his head settle back on the street as he went limp. God, he wanted to see Antoinette again, so damn badly; the only damn thought to break through his frenzy. Just hold her one last time, say something poetic, kiss her again, and—Angela’s skin started to light up. Heaven, maybe? White light at the end of his puny existence? The dark skin, the soft face but steel gaze glowed brighter and brighter as more light shone upon her; so familiar.

Honking yanked his attention back up from the depths, and he turned his head enough to see an oncoming car. Maybe he could get run over, squash his brains into pudding. Better than letting this psychopath cut his head off.

Angela sat up and held one hand over her eyes, trying to pierce the blinding light of the incoming car. High-beams. And the car wasn’t slowing down. In fact, it was speeding up.

Only at the last moment did Angela actually force herself to stand up.

“What the fu—”

Jack stared on, and watched as the car came for them, the two of them. Two tons of metal roaring, wheels spinning with all the care or delicacy of a child given a rocket launcher. A split second, for a lightning moment, he managed to see the bumper of the car slam into Angela’s body and send her flying. The next moment, a wheel was on his stomach, and he got to feel what it was like to be run over.

It wasn’t that bad, actually. Massive weight crushing his punctured guts into his back, spinning rubber tearing up the already ruined skin, and the impact forcing him to roll were all horrible. But it was disorienting, overwhelming. He didn’t even register the second tire, just a blur of sensory input, of lights and noises and some sort of extra pain adding to the mix. He didn’t make a sound, didn’t move, just let the insanity take him and turn him into a skid mark on the street.

Or at least he thought he’d be a skid mark, but there was a curb. The car hit it, and somehow, some of the crushing weight didn’t press down onto him. He rolled a few times before hitting against that curb, and went still as his mind tried to make sense of what just happened. He’d just been run over, literally, a car had just run over him with its two right tires. Did the left tires hit him? No, almost hit his feet but not quite. He tried to move them; still working.

A groan escaped him, and it turned into a gargled scream as he tried to sit up. Ok, ok, no sitting up. He touched his stomach with his stumps. Still had a stomach, just a mangled, flattened, ruined one. Still intact. Ok, everything was still together, or at least, just as intact than before the car hit him. Ventrue resilience indeed.

Still in one piece other than his hands, and the moment of relaxation ripped away the pain suppression of the beast's anger. The pain returned, the agony, and he let out a wail as his skin, his guts, his bones, everything told him he was dying, like he was being boiled alive, like he was being dipped in acid, like he was being set on fire. Close to the truth, too close, and another groan turned into a gargled sob as that pain came back to him and danced along his charred body.

He turned his head. The car had run into the parking lot of one of the business buildings. Angela's body was over there too, off to the side. Must have been launched like a basketball to land over there. She wasn't moving. Good.

He tried to move, to take advantage, to do something to get away from his current situation, but trying to move his arms was met with one, two, maybe three inches of movement, and other than his head, they were the only things moving much. Couldn't go anywhere, couldn't get away. So close, so damn fucking close, but he couldn't move.

The car was coming back. There was yelling, but not from the car. Somewhere down the street he could hear yelling, from several people, and then gunshots. He had trouble making out what was happening, but, once he heard the sound of bullets hitting metal, he was starting to put together a picture. People were shooting at the car.

And the car came to a stop on the street between him, and the sources of the gunfire. "Get in!" Someone's voice, from the window. A man's. "Holy fuck how is this kid still alive?"

"Jack! Jack you fucking idiot. Holy fucking shit." Another voice, a woman's. A voice he recognized. Triss.

Another sob broke through, but he choked down the second. No time for crying, not yet. Get up. Get up get up get up get up get up.

Wasn't happening. He raised his arm, and managed a small wave of the stump toward the car. Blurs of color and light was all he could make out anymore. That, and the feel of something slipping under his shoulders and legs. Someone else's arms.

"I've seen roadkill in better condition than you." Triss's voice again.

"You ... r-ran ... me ... over." Did she really have to make a stupid joke like that now? He was literal roadkill.

"If I had known you were this fucked up, I might have tried something a little different. Seemed like the only option at the time though, considering a second later she would have cut off your head."

"I—aarg!" He had enough energy to scream, but that was it. Just scream, and groan as the Nos picked him up. Arms dangling, legs swaying, every fiber of his body started sending him warning signs that he was falling apart, that his limbs were going to slip out of their sockets, skin was going to tear in half, and his guts were going to fall out.

It didn't happen. Felt like it would, but it didn't happen. Triss didn't waste time coddling him either, and threw him into the backseat of the car hard enough he bounced a little. More screams.

"Eric, get back there and let him drink."

"What!? You can't be fucking serious," the stranger said. Eric. Jack tried to look at him, to see this man driving the car. Couldn't, not as everything grew heavy, and the blurry colors started to fade into a gray mess.

"Do it! Just put your wrist on his lips and help him bite down."

“You fucking do it! I’m not—” Gunfire again, more glass shattering, and the harsh tink tink of bullets slamming into metal. It sounded so distant now; it shouldn’t have.

“Do it! You’ll be fine. Vamps shouldn’t—I don’t have time to explain shit! Do it, I’ll drive.”

Lots of yelling between these two. They threw some curses at each other, some more noises, and created an almost settling atmosphere of panic and anger, a pleasant change from the torturing chaos of moments before. Almost felt like he had a sitcom on the TV in the background.

Eric jumped in back with him while Triss got into the front seat. Did she know how to drive? Lot of vampires didn’t drive, not in a dense city where it wasn’t needed, where driving came with risks; an accident that showed a vampire surviving a car crash was always a potential problem. For all he knew, Triss behind the wheel was just as dangerous as being under Angela’s knife.

The thought made him laugh, for a moment, before the pain punched him in the sternum and reminded him he was nearly dead and looked dead twice over.

“Fuck, you vampires can survive a lot.” Eric’s voice. He was leaning over Jack, looking down at him. A black man in a nice, casual suit, but covered in what smelled like mud and blood. Weird.

“Admire how awesome we are later, just—fuck!” Triss slammed on the pedal hard, hard enough for the screech of tires skidding on the street to ring loud and split Jack’s ears. He started to slide along the seat with the shifting inertia as Triss made some turns, but Eric held him down. Gunfire joined the screeching, and Eric ducked down against him as glass and metal were pummeled by incoming lead.

“Where the fuck did you learn to drive!?” Eric said.

“I didn’t!”

Fuck, he knew it. Jack would have loved to say something, to protest, but as much as he tried, all he could get out were groans.

“Every cab driver in the city just clenched hard enough to shit diamonds, fucking city girl!” Eric seemed to agree with him.

“Fuck you, cab drivers are horrible drivers.”

“Fuck you we are! You’re the—”

“Just feed the man!”

Eric yelled some more curses, and put his wrist to Jack’s mouth.

One taste was all Jack needed to know there was something weird about this guy. One more taste of the sweet, delicious, amazing, perfect concoction of life-giving power in blood form, to not care that something was weird about this guy. Give it to me.

He reached up with his hands to try and grab him, to pin the wrist to his mouth, to devour him, to absorb his life and sate the beast in his gut that was roaring for more. But he had no hands, and the attempt to squeeze filled Jack with pain. No, just lie down, lie down and relax and drink as much as this man is willing to give you. This strange man, and the strange, amazing blood he was giving you. So good, so fucking good. Was it because he was starving? Near death? It was so damn good.

“This ... feels ... weird,” Eric said.

Triss laughed, the gunfire getting quieter and quieter behind them. “Just wait till Jessy does it the right way. Won’t be weird, just fucking awesome.”

“ ... terrifying.”

“Ha,” she said. The car started to slow down, and Jack felt parts of him relax as both fresh blood entered his punctured body, but also the fear of dying horribly in a flaming ball of metal death abated somewhat. “I called Julias, kid. He’s got a bunch of vamps on the way over, and a bunch of thralls and shit. They’ll clean up the mess, maybe catch some of the hunters. Maybe get that girl’s body and get some answers.”

“Christ, I’m getting lightheaded here.” Eric pulled his wrist away from Jack’s mouth. Or at least he tried, but Jack had bitten down, and the man had to put his other hand against Jack’s head and force it back to pry his wrist loose.

“ ... s-sorry,” Jack said.

“ ... yeah.” Eric, on his knees in the leg space, crammed and twisted, looked at his wrist and the holes Jack’s teeth had made. Didn’t have the time to lick them closed. Didn’t have the energy. “You lost your hands.”

Jack groaned. Triss laughed.

“He’ll regrow them with a night or two’s sleep and a few meals,” she said.

“Regrowing limbs ... you people are fucking insane.”

“As insane as nightmare jungles and a giant spider lady and floating death angel monster.”

---

---

~~Julias~~

“Julias!”

“Triss?”

“No time to talk, on Azamel’s phone. Jack might be at the old prison. Heading there now.”

It took ten seconds to finish the conversation with Triss. It took thirty seconds to send out the message to his nearest Kindred and a host of thralls and ghouls, and have them begin moving to the location. Another five minutes to double check that the occupied prison was running as usual, to confirm it was the old abandoned prison that Triss meant. An hour to beginning cleaning up the mess, and another hour to finish.

Police were directed elsewhere easily enough, and records adjusted to make sure no mention of gunfire in that section of the city existed. Thralls and ghouls poured over the scene, cleaning up blood stains, removing bullet casings, and cleaning out the abandoned prison. No bodies though, despite Jack’s testimony. For the hunters that had died, the blood traces suggested their bodies were taken away. But the body of the hunter hit by the car, the blood pattern suggested she got up, or was picked up, and managed to move some distance before a vehicle took her away.

Supposedly this woman, Angela according to Jack, had been stabbed through the back out the stomach, and then hit by a car moving at a decent speed. He also said she was immune to his mind control, and had a glass eye. A strange woman, the sort that just refused to die. So, maybe she was alive. Or maybe they just read the blood patterns incorrectly, and she was in fact dead. Either way, when his troops arrived only minutes after Triss left with Jack, there was no sign of any hunters, no bodies, and most of the cars around the prison Jack reported were gone, the van too.

What did remain was the bodies of rats.

The phone call hadn’t done the situation justice. The kid had sounded horrible, voice hoarse and quiet on the phone, like he was nearly dead, but he’d managed to get across the details, about being captured by some hunters who wanted details about Azamel. He told Julias about Angela, about Jeremiah, told him about the torture, told him about the threats Angela had made, the suggestions that a lot more hunters were in the city, told him about their plans to cleanse all of Dolareido. And, he'd told Julias about how he escaped.

The cuffs weren't there. The hunters must have removed them from the chair before leaving; made sense if Jack was right and they were special in some way. But there were two withered, bony, disgusting hands, smashed against the wall like someone had kicked them aside, the two hands Jack had told his dominated prey to cut off so he could escape. Quick thinking, rational thinking. He could have hesitated, and looked for another way out. But that could have easily backfired, or cost him precious seconds. No, he'd made the correct call, getting out of the cuffs and chair ASAP so he could react to the situation from a position of power.

But, damn, it took some cold logic and will to make a move like that. Very impressive, very Ventrue. And it would have made Julias smile with pride, if not for Maria's stories about Viktor's hobbies in their last conversation.

Looking around at the hundreds of dead rats, Julias sighed and brushed back his hair with his fingers. A truly horrible sight. Jack had sounded quite sad about their deaths on the phone, but his words hadn't prepared Julias for the amount Jack had summoned, and sacrificed.

Julias would have trouble summoning this many rats.

"Holy shit." Jessy came up to him, stepping around the dead rats in the hallway of the prison. Thralls and ghouls were about, and a few of the younger Invictus Kindred as well, cleaning up the rats and such with harsh chemicals and garbage bags. "Jack fucking did this?"

“ ... apparently.”

“I mean ... god damn. He’s certainly your childe, Julias.”

“ ... or Viktor’s.”

“His childe’s childe then?” she said. He frowned, but she pat him on the shoulder and smirked her jackass smirk. “Viktor was fucking deadly for his age, we all know that. So are you. And Jack is ... um ... well, this is pretty nuts.” She gestured around to the bodies of burned and squashed flesh as the two of them walked into the prisoner lobby, past the thralls cleaning it up, and then to toward the civilian lobby.

Woman had a way with words. Triss would have been as blunt, but purposefully so. Jessy was so blunt because she was oblivious to how direct she was being about a sensitive topic. Made him smile; like old times.

“Did you see him?” he said, “when Triss drove by?”

“Yeah. God damn that kid was wrecked. Really, really, really wrecked. What’s the plan with him?”

“Triss said she’d already got him a quick meal, and now she’s on the way to let him sleep in my mansion stronghold.”

“Trusting a witch with your childe?”

“Trusting my lover with my childe, Jessy. Don’t push it.”

She shrugged, like usual, and walked beside him as the two of them made their way for the prison entrance. The smell of chemicals was in the air, but buried by the smell of burned flesh and hair. So much death surrounded him, he had to wince as he looked around and tried to piece together the insanity. Jack had done his best to recount the tale on the phone, but like with the rats, the exhausted boy couldn't do justice to the madness. Shards of glass were all around, and the bullet holes or marks were everywhere. He'd mentioned a flamethrower too. Damn.

"What's the footage on Azamel's tunnel show?" Jessy said. "You said Triss used Azamel's phone?"

"Triss left the tunnels with the Begotten Mark, and a man I do not recognize. She called me, gave Mark back the phone, and then ran off toward the street. Far as I know, she caused quite a stir on the street. Used her cloak of night enough to keep her teeth hidden, but otherwise caused some mayhem as she and this Eric fellow stole a car from some kine hopping out of it."

"Eric ... black dude? Average height? Shaves his head?"

"Yeah. Know him?"

Jessy grinned a pretty damn big grin, and rubbed her hands together. "I think I might just."

"I'll let you follow up on him then. I have work to do."

"Yeah, deal. And ... I mean, you should be proud, right? Your childe is barely a year embraced, and he's taken down a bunch of hunters and pulled some pretty hardcore animalism shit here." She crouched down next to a pile of the dead rats, and whistled. Gangrels were naturals at animalism in much the same way Ventrue were, though with them, it was more a question of being more in tune with their beasts, rather than a Ventrue's natural affinity for dominating the minds of others. Still, she knew what she was talking about. "I remember Viktor had some pretty impressive stories about when he was younger, and summoning a bunch of animals and shit to his side to wreak some havoc."

"Yeah ... that's what scares me."

Chapter 51

~~Eric~~

“How the fuck did no cops follow us?” Eric said. Beatrice had to stop driving and let him take the wheel, before the dumb woman ended up getting them all killed. “I mean you nearly hit a hundred pedestrians, and I’m pretty sure you killed a dog.”

“I did not kill a dog, Eric. I’ll fucking kill you if you don’t shut up.”

“ ... I’m pretty sure you—”

“I didn’t hit any fucking dog!” She smiled as she said it, or, yelled it. For some reason, it seemed like she was enjoying this, both the life-or-death scenario, but also the bickering.

“We really going to Rich Side?”

“Yeap, my boyfriend lives here.”

“ ... your boyfriend lives in Rich Side.”

“Yeap.”

“You got piercings coming out of twenty different holes in your body, and you got tattoos covering probably half of you. How did you bag a rich guy?”

He expected her to punch him. He’d have deserved it too. Bitter, just so damn fucking bitter whenever the topic came to money, and women, and it went full on acidic when it was the two combined. He didn’t need a fucking therapist to tell him that. Part of the reason he told Ganders he didn’t want to the job was cause he knew what would happen if conversations ever steered in this direction. Didn't know how to shut the fuck up.

But crocodile face laughed, and winked her snake eye at him. "He bagged me, you fucker. Now hurry up."

Bagged her. Rich guy bagged the punk rocker girl. Sounded like something out of a trash romance novel, and considering the smile on her face, it may very well have been a happily ever after ending that would have made Eric puke. But circumstances being what they were, a giant shit show of blood and insanity, he let it slide.

She guided him up to one of the bigger mansions topping one of the smooth hills. He almost suggested she was lying, but she hopped out, pulled Jack out of the backseat into her arms, and started toward the mansion like she knew the place, like she knew the long walkways up to the huge doors, like she knew the guy who owned it like he was her lover.

Well, damn.

"Should I—"

"Come on, you're helping me, in case I need some extra hands. And besides, I have to keep an eye on you. You know you're the only human in the city who knows about us who isn't on a leash?"

"A leash?"

"Brainwashed, dude. You really need to watch some vampire movies." She adjusted the kid in her arms as they walked. A lifeless corpse. She said it was torpor, some kind of deep sleep for vamps, and the lack of heartbeat or breathing was perfectly normal. And it was, considering she wasn't doing them either.

"That mean I can use garlic or a holy cross to—"

“Ahaha! Oh fuck no, oh my god please don’t. If you tried to fight off a vamp with garlic, they’d shove that shit down your throat. With a cross? Well, they’d probably stab you to death with it.”

“ ... lovely.”

“But, hey, Fiona’s a good friend to me and a bunch of the vamps down here in the trenches, Natasha and Jack and Damien, and apparently even that slut Jessy. You did her a solid, so I’ll do you one.” She stopped at the door, and knocked.

Thirty seconds later, it opened, and a man in a suit offered a small bow. “Madam Damor. I—oh my, is that the young Master Terry?”

“Yeah Alfred, it is. Julias’s gonna let him use the basement tonight, already unlocked the shit remotely.”

“Very good Madam. And is this a new member of the fold?” The dude nodded toward Eric. Pretty lame of Triss to call him Alfred; guy wasn’t even old. He didn’t seem to mind though, and he stepped aside to let them in.

He seemed kind of creepy too, and it only got worse as Eric stepped into the mansion. A few more people came by to see who had showed up, and they all had the same sort of subtle smile, the smile a person had when they were happy. Brainwashed? Brainwashed.

Eric couldn’t help but whistle. God damn this was a nice mansion, a classic mansion, the sort of mansion rich people had a couple hundred years ago, except now with air conditioning and LED lights instead of shitty old bulbs. LED lights in chandeliers, what a delightful statement of the sort of place Dolareido could be: classic meets modern; also more commonly known as: pretentious as all fuck.

“Come on.” Triss adjusted Jack in her arms, and continued down the hall, past the ‘humans’, and around a corner to find a door, that led to a hallway, that led to a stairway, that led down, and down, and down.

“Want me to ho ... no, I suppose you don’t really need me to hold him, do you?”

“Fucking course not. Christ man, I’m strong enough I could rip you in half and I mean that literally.” She looked over her shoulder at him, and laughed. Not angry then, just boasting about how badass she was. Reminded him of that Jessy vampire, sort of, in a way.

“I guess, yeah. I ... yeah.” Yeah, he was walking down the stairs of a mansion, with two vampires. The mansion was filled with brainwashed servants, or assistants, or whatever it was called when someone was both a housekeeper, and a slave. They seemed happy, but did it count if it was brainwashing happy? “So who lives here?”

“Not sure what name he uses for records and shit, but we know him as Julias Mire.”

“Doesn’t ring a ... a...” Shit. He stuck out a hand to catch the hallway wall, and breathed deep. Stars speckled his vision, warning him that his blood pressure was low. Well, no fucking duh, he’d given a bucket of it to the kid in Triss’s arms.

Kid looked better, at least. Instead of looking like roadkill after a few crows had had their turns with it, now he just looked like fresh roadkill. All things considered, that was a pretty miraculous recovery. He still had no hands, but there were some weird lumps where the blood, flesh, and skin was at his wrists, like bone was trying to get out. Gross.

“Don’t pass out on me. Or I’ll lock you up in the dungeon until Julias can deal with you.”

“Dungeon, yeah ri—there’s a dungeon, isn’t there.”

“Yeap. Viktor, Julias’s sire, used to own this place. Sick fuck, powerful as hell, did some nasty crap, tortured people, shit like that. He was this kid’s grandsire.”

“You’re telling me an awful lot about your secret vamp society.”

“Nothing that’s dangerous, nothing you can use to prove we exist or somehow attack us. The fuck do you take me for?”

“A loud mouth punk.”

Again she laughed, and the two of them stepped into a tunnel. More tunnels, god damn it not more tunnels. At least these were well lit, with flat walls instead of the curved walls of the old abandoned tunnels. There were half a dozen gates, each that looked ready to kill him if he said the wrong password. But they were open, and Triss walked through them without fear.

“Ah, this is a nice bed. Was fucking Julias on it when we learned Jack here had disappeared. Hope he doesn’t mind.”

Imagining crocodile face having sex was a weird image. She had a killer body, the sort you’d find on a fitness model advertising her dance routine. Muscles, but no steroid abuse, lean and ripped but without hitting the point of amenorrhea. Probably could be one of those new internet ass girl sensations, putting pictures of herself in a thong online and letting the money roll in, if not for the claws and crazy eye and the teeth. And the weird, long tongue he got a glimpse of too.

He looked around the room. A rich man’s underground bunker, with a huge fancy bed, four poster, with big wardrobes on the wall, and a laptop.

“No bathrooms?” he said.

Dumb question, and she looked at him with a raised brow before laughing.

“Vampires don’t shit or piss, man. We’re dead. We drink blood and sleep during the day.”

“Right, right...” He leaned against the wall, and looked around some more at the indulgent decor while the woman put her friend on the bed. “He safe here?”

“We just need to close the gates behind us as we leave, and it’ll lock down until someone either undoes the locks remotely, or at the digital padlocks at each gate.”

“Sounds high tech. Not worried about a hacker trying to get in here while you sleep?”

“It’s also got some giant-as-fuck locks that you lock from the inside, big metal bars and padlocks and shit, old school. If we were staying in the room, I’d get those too, but Jack should be safe with the high tech shit until Julias returns.”

“ ... that is pretty damn secure. Next you’re going to tell me you sleep inside unbreakable coffins that are locked from the inside.”

“I don’t. Pretty sure my boss does, wherever he sleeps.” She set the kid down gently, and pat his head a few times. “God damn this kid, constantly getting into shit. Poor guy can’t go five feet without vamps or monsters or werewolves — or hunters apparently — fucking up his day.”

“ ... werewolves exist?”

“Oh yeah. You think vamps are strong?” She shivered, rubbed her arms, and motioned for him to join her as they left the kid in the bunker. “You saw the shit Fiona and Athalia were doing in that nightmare world. Imagine a ten-foot-tall wolf beast capable of doing that, being that strong, except out here in the rea—physical world. Fucking juggernauts.”

Werewolves. Werewolves. He started breathing faster, and his eyes went wide as he watched the girl’s back and followed her. Werewolves. Wolves. Shit, who had Fiona mentioned?

“ ... Fiona said something about a woman named Avery.”

“Yeah, pack leader of the werewolves here in Dolareido. Why’d Fiona bring her up?”

Shit shit shit. Quick, think fast.

“She asked if I’d seen her, said she might be looking for Jack too.”
Fuck. Fuck fuck.

“Ah, yeah, she might be.”

Shit. Fucking shit fuck. Avery was a pack leader. Pack, leader, of werewolves. Wolves. Oh god, oh christ, fucking hell.

The moon, its voice ... her voice. The taste of blood, of flesh in his mouth. The dreams, running around at night, hunting something. The hunt, the need to hunt, to defend his territory, to scout and smell and feed. He wanted to sink his teeth into something and tear it apart. He wanted to hunt.

Oh mother fucking hell. Every part of him wanted to faint, faceplant right there in the scary hallway underneath the vampire’s mansion; the low blood pressure didn’t help. But he held his weight up, hand to the wall, and forced himself to walk after the scary vampire lady.

“Still lightheaded?”

“Y-Yeah ... definitely ... need to get back home, rest, eat and drink, feed my cat, and call my boss.”

“Ah right, Bloodlust. Just tell your boss you were doing a favor for the Invictus and everything will be fine.”

“ ... Ganders works for the Invictus?”

“Eh the Bloodlust situation is a little weird. But for conversation’s sake, yeah, he does.”

“The fuck kind of world did I get pulled into?”

The two of them walked back up the stairs and back into the hallways of the huge mansion. Triss walked its massive corridors like she knew it inside and out; very much at odds with her punk rocker aesthetic.

“In here, come on.” She pulled open a door, and walked through. It was some sort of meeting room, or living room, or tea room. It was some kind of big waste of money, a room that obviously served no purpose other than to be fancy and entertain guests while they sipped expensive drinks and talked politics or stocks. He felt annoyed just being in it.

He sat down in a chair at one of the tables, and she sat down across from him, a strange expression on her he couldn’t place. Scrutinizing him was his best guess.

He could tell her, tell her he might be a werewolf, tell her about the dreams, tell her ... tell her nothing. You have no proof, no idea if it’s true. Just shut the fuck up and don’t say shit.

“You’ve stumbled onto a big secret here, Eric.”

“So I’ve noticed.”

“It’s a vampire’s city, and I mean that. Vampires own this city, we run it. The Invictus in particular own and run it like a well oiled machine, all money money money, but they bow to the Prince, the ruler, who’s from a different covenant, not Invictus. And Jack? Jack’s the woman’s lover.”

“Prince? Woman?”

“It’s a weird title, genderless.”

“... right.” He set his elbows on the table, and clutched his temples in his palms. “So I’m in deep with the mafia now.”

“Well, I mean other than you owing Jessy a favor, the Prince and the Invictus now owe you a favor ... though I wouldn’t push them on that. They won’t kill you or turn you into a thrall, and you should consider that the favor returned.”

“Guess I should be thankful then.”

“Very. Though a lot of thralls are pretty happy with their setup. Not gonna lie, Dolareido is probably the nicest vamp city in this country, Eric. You got lucky.”

Lucky, yeah, real fucking lucky.

“I ran someone over. Might have ... killed her.” And that was going to make a lovely addition to his nightly nightmares about hunting, this woman’s face the moment the car hit her. Maybe she’d show up as a ghost in his next nightmare, and scare him to death.

“Heh, yeah, she went flying. Surprised that bitch didn’t crack her head open on the hood of the car.”

God damn this woman was callous. She shrugged at him, tapped a claw against her teeth, and waited for his response. This conversation was important; fuck it up and she’d drag him back to the other vamps for a thorough brainwashing. Or, let her know he was thinking he might be a fucking werewolf, and who the fuck knows what would happen.

“You’re being awfully informative.”

“I saw a random human keep it together and help out both a friend of mine, and a vamp with crazy teeth.”

“And a crazy eye.”

“Ha, this?” She pulled down on the normal eye’s cheek, and leaned in a little so he could see it more clearly. “Blood magic made this shit. It’ll probably melt away or something in a few hours and I’ll have to regrow my normal eye.”

“... oh.” The snake eye was the normal eye. Well. Fuck him. “So ... what do I do now?”

“Not exactly sure. I can’t let you just walk out on the honor system. My boss would kill me, or the Prince would.”

“But you said—”

“Yeah yeah, I’m not going to kill you, but I do need to get you under surveillance. I don’t know where my boss is right now, and I can’t take you back to our lair. Guess that means we’re going to Elysium, after I give Superman a call and throw him a quick update.”

~~Antoinette~~

Jack was alive.

She sat in her chair in her main office, and smiled. The Invictus were on the site of the violence, and were cleaning up the mess as per her rules as to how Masquerade risks were to be managed. Some of her thralls were there as well, mostly to observe and ensure the Invictus were doing things correctly. No doubt they thought their methods perfect, and they were methodical, but still, she had cause to make sure they did things correctly.

The video feed of three thralls showed the cleanup, and one of the thralls was standing shoulder to shoulder with the Invictus Kindred, to let them know of her presence. They were all friends after all, cooperative, the covenants in Dolareido. They had no reason to deceive her.

She smirked. Of course they did. If presented the opportunity, the Invictus or Carthians would take her head and then her city, and that was the spice in their relationship.

“How was he?” she said into the speaker on her desk.

“Well, Triss says it’s pretty damn surprising he’s still alive. Said he looked like you did after Lucas’s assault on your tower.” Julias’s voice.

That was hard to imagine. Such damage would kill most Kindred twice over, and to picture Jack with such horrible wounds made her withered heart ache.

“Does he need blood?”

“Triss got him a meal. He’ll need to sleep for a few days, and I’ll make sure he gets some more blood. He’s still young; regrowing his hands will take time.”

She squeezed on the arms of her grand chair, and grit her teeth as she imagined the sight of her poor little Ventrue with his hands chopped off. Such brutal, vivid imagery, one she was quite familiar with from a different age. But to imagine her love, torn, shredded, with hands removed and bones exposed, was too much, and she wanted to tell Julias that his childe should be with her, being cared for by her.

But that would be overstepping her boundaries. As Prince, she had no true boundaries, but it was to the respect of both Julias and the Invictus that they manage their Kindred's condition, and ensure his recovery. Politics.

“Yes ... I imagine it will. I trust you will instruct the boy to come to me once he has healed?”

The man made a small, warm chuckle. Julias was a delight when he wanted to be, when he put aside his new position as council member of the Invictus, and returned to his playful ways.

“I will, Prince. And I know it'll be the first thing he'll want to do when he can.”

She nodded, smiled at the speaker, and pulled her hair over her shoulder to begin combing it with her fingers. “I trust the Invictus are pursuing these hunters with every resource they have available?” A subtle nudge to remind him that the Invictus were ultimately under her control, here in Dolareido.

“Yes Prince. We ... we fucked up pretty bad. We knew of the four hunters from investigating Barry's death, but we didn't know anything about this Jeremiah bastard until Triss brought it up today.”

Ah yes, the man with a name. The taint on her city.

“I will bring this up in the next meeting of the Primogen, Mister Mire. We can discuss the specifics then.”

“I see. Fair well then, Prince.”

She pressed the button to hang up, sighed, and eased her chair about until it was facing the window, and Jacob.

“Jeremiah,” she said. “I did not expect the man to come to this city.”

“You knew his name?” the old monster said.

“A human who has hunted monsters for many decades, but I know none of the specifics.” Trusting Jacob with such information was dangerous, but this problem was bigger than their squabbles, as Jacob proved when he came to her only an hour ago to share what he learned of his meeting with Azamel; or rather, what he was willing to share of it. “I did not suspect the man to come here, quiet as Dolareido is.”

“He wouldn’t have if not for that old bitch.”

She nodded, and sighed as she combined in her mind the joy of Jack’s safety, with the frustrating circumstances that continued to assault her city. Jack had been kidnapped, and not far from where the Invictus had had their ball as well. Was he betrayed? Her sources said the boy had gone to speak with Damien before his capture, but for all the possible reasons Damien might have to betray Jack, she doubted he would. Not for fear of death at her hand, but because the man was not Lucas. Maria, on the other hand, might have orchestrated his death, and adjusted events to make Damien seem the guilty party. But did Maria even know that the boy was the one who had killed Lucas, and would she respond to the knowledge by plotting the boy’s death if she did? Too many unknowns.

The old man headed for the door, and offered her a casual salute as he left. “I’m off. Glad your boy toy is still kicking.”

Boy toy. She smirked at the man, and offered a small wave. His meaningless barbs were just that, meaningless, and if anything, his insults were his way of showing approval. A typical man. The thought made her laugh; Jacob being typical was a pleasant surprise, and one that made her happy. So long ago, the two of them had been friends, of a sort, and perhaps that day could come again.

Alone once more, she let her mind drift to Jack. Daniel was headed toward the old prison, where he could put his mastery of auspex to use to perhaps find where this Jeremiah fool was hiding. How ridiculous, a human hiding in her city, and yet, how very problematic. Kindred, Uratha, and Begotten she could hunt down, use her tools and her sheriff to track down the strange tracks they often left. There were others too, other entities that either hid in the darkness, or in plain sight, such as the Prometheans, the Changelings, or the infernal Mages who forever reaped only chaos for their efforts. She was confident none of these were in her city.

But humans were a more difficult enemy to manage. How does one find and expunge a kine, hidden within the millions of her city?

She sighed, and grit her teeth. On top of all this, Clara's words still echoed in her mind. Someone else was tampering with the realm of spirits, according to her, and it had the werewolf concerned. If it concerned Avery, then it concerned Antoinette.

A new mission for Daniel.

---

“Beatrice Damor, and ... Eric, was it?”

“Eric Tanverson,” he said, nodding. An elbow from Triss in the side was enough to get the man to bow in a similar manner to the Nosferatu.

“I must thank the both of you. If not for your interference, my beloved would be dead.” She waited, to see if either of them would speak, or if they understood that it was best for them to be quiet. Eric opened his mouth, but he caught on quickly, and closed it as she smirked, and stood up. “Miss Damor, I understand that you not only rescued Mister Terry from hunters, but that you went into the realm of the Begotten.”

“Yes, my Prince,” she said. Oh, delightful, that she was learning to play the game, titles and all. “Pretty terrifying shit, nightmare realms. Saw a huge cave, and a giant jungle with two moons. The scariest shit though was that Jeremiah person. Man knew what he was doing. Him and his hunters had special knives that seemed pretty weird, oddly dangerous somehow. And they were really good with their pistols, and Jeremiah himself had grenades coming out of his ass, and—”

Antoinette held up a hand, and nodded. “Hunters are forever experts at the tools of their trade, young Nosferatu. And to our chagrin, their tools have grown impressive the past couple centuries. Where once our largest worries were torches and swords, now we deal with rifles, flamethrowers, grenades as you mentioned, and worst of all, digital communication. In the past, for news to spread between hunters took weeks, or months, and through word of mouth, misinformation was common. Now, if one of these hunters manages to capture a picture of something important, they can share it with their associates anywhere in the world in the blink of an eye. Now, more than ever, we have to be careful.”

“I uh ... maybe I shouldn’t have driven in there with a car then,” she said.

“Perhaps. No doubt the hunters are now educated to your presence and visage, but for the moment, my concern is more so about the revelations you have made to this man.” She gestured toward Eric. Like Beatrice, he was a mess, but unlike Beatrice, he was alive. Flesh, a man, who smelled of blood and the mud of a jungle. A strange odor, to be sure. “I understand that Fiona accidentally brought this man into the fold. Is that true, Mister Tanverson?”

“Er, yeah.” He squirmed. There was something to this Eric Tanverson, something odd, something she could not quite place her finger on. “She was looking for Jack, thought I might have seen him, since I work at Bloodlust. But she mentioned four people, and I had seen those. We managed to follow them, and ... everything ... went to hell.”

Sunrise was in an hour. It had been a long night for everyone involved, but perhaps no one was suffering the stress of tonight as much as this poor fool. Eric Tanverson, an attractive man, black, with a shaved head and face, and some grit to his dark brown eyes. Ganders no doubt hired him due to the sexual allure of his hard personality, the brooding, dark, handsome motif. The total opposite of Fiona.

Such a strange girl. First Damien and now this Tanverson. The girl was too young to understand these bitter fools were sexually appealing, but emotionally damaged, and often incapable of maturing past the point of that damage. She would learn some day, no doubt, about why a girl flirts with a bad boy, but does not bring him home.

“But, um,” Beatrice said, “I am worried about them, or Fiona at least. That Jeremiah fuck was ... he wasn’t normal, my Prince. Didn’t feel normal at all.”

“The hunters have fled the abandoned prison, but I suspect you are right to fear this Jeremiah. I will direct my concerns to him, and see that Daniel’s eyes are kept open for this man.” She stepped around the desk, and began to pace to and fro in front of it, with the two visitors waiting on her word. It was clear to see that Eric was surprised by her; the white hair and red eyes were no doubt the cause, as well as her height. But the man adapted, and she smirked as he stood up straighter. “Have either of you spoken with the Begotten since the encounter with Jeremiah?”

“Um, no, my Prince,” the Nosferatu said. “But, she’s friends with a lot of us. And on our way out, Azamel said Jeremiah’s intrusion was probably just him testing the waters of the lair. He wouldn’t be able to get anywhere from his ... uh, position in the lair? Whatever that meant. She was sure he’d run when Mark arrived.”

Antoinette sighed, a disappointed sigh, and emphasized the sound a little to let Beatrice know she was not happy about the lack of information. And Jacob probably would not be either. It had been a prime opportunity for the girl to learn something about this human named Jeremiah, and instead she had rushed toward her goal. Her goal to save Jack though; thus, Antoinette could only summon so much annoyance.

“And now we have you, Eric Tanverson, a human, who knows of us. A Masquerade violation on Fiona’s part. It—”

“It wasn’t a violation. Shit went to hell and the only way I could save her life was by getting her back to her nightmare world lair thing, or whatever. She—”

Antoinette sprinted into the man’s personal space, appeared there in but a fraction of a second, a window of time the man did not have the reflexes to react to, before she set her hand around his throat. She squeezed it as she glared down at him, cut through his eyes with her own, and forced the man to his knees as he reached up to grab her wrists. The need to breathe was a terrible weakness to have.

“Do not interrupt me, Eric Tanverson. In any other circumstance, I would either see you dead or a thrall at my whim. The only reason I spare you is because your interference has ultimately led to my beloved’s second life being spared. You are in my world now, child. I rule this city, and you are but a tiny cog in its machinery. I am the Prince of its denizens of the night, and people like yourself are normally food. Expendable. Understood?”

The fool man managed a nod, despite how tight her grip was, and despite how she could see the asphyxiation start to manifest on him, with veins bulging and eyes growing wide. Fear. Good. Fear was a powerful teacher.

She let him go, and he fell to his knees, coughing. No room to be kind, no room to spare his feelings, as every month brought with it new hardships that required a firm hand. Her city was falling apart underneath her, and she would have to fix it.

“You will be watched, Eric. I have eyes everywhere. If you so much as even entertain the notion of exposing our kind, then you will join my dungeon as a food source. I will remove your hands and feet, tie you to a wall, drip an IV bag into your veins, and give your blood to hungry Kindred for months before I finally decide to simply stop replacing your source of nutrients. I will let you die of thirst, cold, and alone. Do I make myself clear?”

Her words earned a greater fear still, proper fear, the cold sword strike of fear to the heart, that lasted and carved into the soul. She did not enjoy the use of its power, unlike Jacob, unlike Nosferatu in general, but it was a valuable tool nonetheless. He stood up, nodded, and adopted the most rigid, military posture she imagined the man capable of with his apparently damaged knee.

“Yes ma’am.”

“My Prince, Mister Tanverson. I am your Prince.”

“ ... yes, my Prince.”

Again, something told her there was more to this man, but she could not understand what it was. Perhaps the thrall she would have shadow the man would answer the peculiarity, with time.

“Now that you understand how we do business, here in the heart of my city, you may rest easy, Mister Tanverson. You have done me a great service and I will be sure no Kindred or Begotten or Uratha harm you. Given time, you may find yourself to grow fond of the night life, and of the creatures that live within it.”

“ ... yes, my Prince.”

Utterly, deliciously perfect. The man was afraid of her, and a terrified being was one that could be crafted, molded, altered to fit the desired role. Lucky for Tanverson that she was a kind ruler.

“Since you work at Bloodlust, you will no doubt encounter creatures of the night on a regular basis. They will undoubtedly come to know you, and you will come to know them. And now with the threat of these hunters knowing your face, I will instruct the Invictus to keep an eye on Bloodlust, with a constant Kindred presence. It is in there territory, after all.”

Triss raised her hand up to her shoulder height, like a child trying to get attention without seeming too obvious. How quaint. Antoinette nodded in her direction to give her permission to speak.

“Erik’s actually already in it deep with the Invictus. Jessy’s doing him a favor with some kine business, so now she’s got her eye on him. Pretty sure she wants to bang him.”

Antoinette laughed, and leaned back to set her butt against the edge of her desk as she folded her arms underneath her bosom. “My dear boy, if Beatrice speaks true, you will be bathed in the pleasure of sex and the Kiss all too soon.”

The man squirmed, winced, but nodded. Other men would jump for joy if they knew of the pleasures Antoinette spoke of, and even in ignorance, they would still be excited. Not Eric Tanverson though. No, as she suspected, the man had baggage, was emotionally damaged, and likely wanted nothing more than to disappear from all the changes in his life, these new twists that were thrust upon him against his will.

Perhaps a night with Jessy's flesh wrapped around his member and her teeth in his neck would change his mind? Antoinette tapped a finger on her chin as she looked at the man, and considered. Probably not, but, the man's presence would at least bring a new life to Bloodlust, in a strange way. She looked forward to seeing the results.

---

---

~~Jack~~

Jack woke up.

Well, that was a pleasant change from what a part of him was expecting. How he knew he might not wake up, when he was asleep, he wasn't sure, but there was a tiny part of him that was genuinely surprised that he got to open his eyes and see the ceiling of—where the fuck was he? Groaning, he sat up, pain working through him as the wounds of the previous night struggled to heal.

He had hands. Oh thank fucking god he had hands again. He wasn't sure he'd be able to regrow them at his age, and might have spent a few years without them. Fingers worked, thumbs worked, he could squeeze and grip again, and he tested them all as held them out in front of him.

He was lying on a bed, a nice one, elegant, big. There was a desk against the nearby wall with a laptop on it, and the room had wardrobes and some curtains and a rug and all the fancy frills the rich liked to waste on decor. Seemed like Viktor's sense of decor too, so that would make this the underground bunker in Viktor's mansion.

He looked down. Still in the clothes he was wearing yesterday, and still with some very blatant holes in his body, flesh torn open, parts of his musculature exposed; Kindred insides were dried, withered things, and didn't look very nice with the skin off. He slid his feet off the bed and tried to stand, or at least that was the plan, but the moment he tried to move his feet he fell back and groaned into grit teeth. The ankle still wasn't healed, so he wasn't going anywhere without a wheelchair.

No wonder he'd managed to regrow his hands. All his healing had gone into regrowing them, and hadn't managed to fix anything else.

“Still alive I see.”

Jack twitched, and looked to his side. Julius slid off the bed, and straightened out his suit pants and his white shirt. The suit jacket was on a chair by the desk, and the man sat down as he put on his shoes. Must have slept beside him on the bed; it was certainly big enough.

“I want to say no thanks to Triss, she ran me over. But, considering the circumstances, yeah, I owe her my life.”

His sire smiled, nodded, and turned the desk chair around to sit in it reverse while facing him.

“The Invictus owe you an apology.”

“Because you didn't see this coming?”

“Exactly.”

“Eh, they're humans, Julius. Kind of hard to figure out what they're up to when they blend into the rest of the city so well.”

His sire sighed, but nodded again. No doubt the man was feeling guilty, and every time he glanced Jack's way, he winced.

“You managed to escape though. Maybe not fully escape, but you ... managed to do some impressive shit, Jack.”

“ ... thanks.” Jack lay back on the bed, and gulped on nothing as he pushed aside the pain. Hungry, very hungry, all his vitae gone to try and heal, and he needed more. But Julias already knew that, and would get him a meal from one of his thralls or something. This conversation was too important to interrupt.

“Fill me in on the details.”

Jack nodded, and recounted the tale. He told him about Jeremiah and Angela with the glass eye, told him about being tortured, told him about the handcuffs, told him about how he managed to push past its weird magic, dominate the two hunters, summon an army of rats, told him about dealing with the backlash, running through fire, and told him about getting run over. What a night, what a horrible, shitty fucking night.

“I was ... surprised,” Jack said, “about the rats. I ... I didn’t expect that to happen, to be able to summon so many of them.”

“We were equally surprised by the amount we found. Jessy and I were there to monitor the clean up. Amanda was there too. No one expected to find what we found, to see that many dead rats.”

Yeah, dead rats. Sounded so simple to say, but he didn’t like that so many died for him. Killing humans, seeing them die, drinking someone to death, those were eating him up too, but the dead rats, that was different. The beast inside him didn’t getting them killed.

“ ... so ... what now?”

“Now,” Julias said, “the Invictus act. The hunters underestimated you, and you hurt them for it. So now we begin the hunt, and start the search for their group. Jeremiah and Angela are the x-factors we didn’t see coming, but now we know about them. We won’t make that mistake again.”

“Guess we were too focused on the four humans to consider that something bigger was going on.” Jack sighed, and stared up at the ceiling of the luxurious bunker room. Weight pushed him down into the bed, and more than just his body’s. “ ... do you think Damien had anything to do with this?”

“Because you talked to him last, before you were kidnapped?”

“Yeah. I ... have trouble suspecting him. After all the shit that’s happened between him and I, I can’t see him just betraying me like that. And he did warn me that something like this might happen. I should have been more on guard, more careful.”

“Hard to be on guard for humans, especially in Dolareido where there’s millions of them in a tight space.” Julias turned around, and typed a few things into his laptop before looking back to Jack again. “I’ll get a couple thralls down here for some food for you, kid. Drink up and sleep. You’ll need another two or three days of sleep to heal the rest of your wounds I imagine, at least to the point you can move again.”

Sleep, yeah, he could do that. He could feel it, feel his body, his beast, wanting to slumber and let the damage fade away; once he’d eaten.

“I—”

“I’ll look into the Damien thing, Jack. He might not want to kill you anymore, but Maria might if she ever found out about Lucas. Then again, maybe not. Last I spoke to her, she seemed to understand how vile a man he was.”

“Maybe ... people in love don’t usually act rationally, Julias.”

“True, too true.” The man adjusted his suit, his tie, and started toward the exit. “You did damn good Jack, and it’s no secret this time. Every vamp in the city, and werewolf and monster too, is going to know what you managed to accomplish. The Invictus will honor this, promote you, give you a raise, and see that your future tasks reflect someone of your stature.”

“ ... Julias, give it to me straight ... is this how Viktor started out?”

His sire froze. Rare, to see Julias freeze, to see his shoulders and limbs come to a dead stop, and his hand reaching out for the exit lever froze too.

“You’re worried about it too, then?”

“ ... I guess I am, yeah.” He raised his hands again, and squeezed at the air to make sure they were working, that they were real. “And you are too, apparently.”

“None of us will ever be able to predict where we’ll be in a century’s time, Jack. Viktor was a ... different man. He changed with time, in strange ways, and—”

“I get it, I get it. I have no idea who I’ll be in fifty fucking years, after I’ve killed how many more people. Twenty-one years old, and I’m starting to build up a list.”

“ ... you had no choice, Jack.”

“I know. I know and I get that, and I don’t need you to convince me it’s ok for a Kindred to defend themselves. Hell you don’t even need to convince me it’s ok for Kindred to kill kine; we’re not the same species, we’re the predator, I get that. Just ... fucking christ. I...” Maybe he did have some growing up to do. But he didn’t want to grow up into Viktor. Where the fuck did that leave him? What sort of stupid, sick, twisted game was this, walking some sort of knife edge.

Julias came back to him, stood beside the bed, and looked down at him with a strange look. An adult look. God, Jack hated that look.

Reminded him of the conversations his mom would have with her friends, not long after their dad died. That serious, adult, sympathetic but serious look. A look he didn't want to be on the receiving end of, but he knew he probably damn well needed it.

“Kid, you have me, and you have Antoinette. You have a lot of years to go before you ever have to worry about the things that made Viktor who he was. Honestly, I'm surprised you asked.”

“I ... when I reached out to break their minds, those hunters, and I realized I could, that I could break them like puppets, I ... thought of Viktor, I guess. I knew he could do that too, that he had a talent for it, and then I remembered all the rats he summoned, and ... and I knew, if I wanted to get out of their alive, I had to be able to do what Viktor would do, and willing to do it too.”

His sire winced, reached down, and touched his shoulder. “It was a smart play.”

There was more. He remembered how much he wanted to kill them, these humans that had the fucking nerve to try and capture him, torture him. He remembered the taste of violence on his tongue, and how satisfying it'd been to wreak havoc on the hunters who had the audacity to try and kill him. It was the words, it was how his mind had formulated the thought that got under his skin, that made him think about Viktor.

‘How dare they.’

---

---

~~Eric~~

He still had his job.

One call to Ganders, a five minute call after the meeting with the Prince, to get the situation sorted out. Apparently knowing the name ‘Invictus’ was enough to get Ganders nervous, and excited.

When Eric mentioned meeting someone by title of 'Prince', Ganders about lost it, exclaiming things like 'I knew you were the right choice!' and such, all while Eric just listened. Man loved his job way too much. Dracula's thrall then, maybe? Eric smirked at the thought of the man haunched over, saying 'master, master' over and over.

The only problem was Ganders was only willing to give him two days off. He had to be in for the third. Told him he could sit down for the shift, but he needed to be there, because if what Eric was saying was true, then the Invictus would want him there. Apparently, they'd probably have someone over to talk to him, and set things straight. Delightful.

So, he sat in a booth on the second floor, since the other three bouncers were downstairs, and he waited, and watched. The red lighting, the club's white pulsing light that joined it like a heartbeat, and the darkness of the second floor combined to create an atmosphere he could let his mind wander in. Processing everything that had happened was difficult, and he was worried about Fiona. But as much as the redhead was on his mind, the bigger thing on his mind was the werewolf thing.

Was he a werewolf? Not like he could ignore the dreams and hallucinations, couldn't ignore that the moon had spoken to him, told him to breathe. The moon was whole at first, but the subsequent dreams had shown him the gibbous moon, and those dreams had him out in the wild, howling, hunting. He'd been a wolf. A wolf. A fucking wolf.

Breathe. He just had to breathe.

Fiona said she saw something in him, and she knew about his dreams and shit. He'd love, just fucking love to chalk it up to bullshit, and dismiss everything, but the girl had turned out to be a literal monster. Why would a monster lie to him? Hell, the fact she was a monster meant her words had some credibility, a shit load of credibility, considering the topic. And fuck, that crocodile mouth vampire only had to say the word werewolf, and it clicked like someone turning on a light switch in his head.

Christ, his knee was killing him. If he was a werewolf, wouldn't that fucking heal or something? He assumed if he was a beast of legend, maybe he'd heal shit like—

“Eric!”

A young, bubbly voice yanked him out of his thoughts. Waving hands, bouncing red hair, and a green dress jumped up and down a few times from the stairway top, before running over to him, slipping into the booth with him, and hugging him. Hugging him full contact too, arms wrapping him and body snug to his. Soft.

“Fiona. You're alive.”

“Well dinnae sound too excited.” She rolled her eyes, and plomped down next to him, tight against his side. “Ugh, it got pretty bad after ye left. That ... that Jeremiah beast, he managed to stab me, and Athalia. 'twas horrible! But Mark showed up eventually, and we managed to force them to retreat. Took him a while to show up though, and Athalia got hurt. She'll be fine though.”

Athalia, right, the other monster, the one with the daughter. He almost brought it up, but if Fiona wasn't bringing up this daughter, he probably shouldn't either.

“... I am glad you're alive. Really.” He tried to look sincere, or at least happy, but it just came off as fake. So he adopted his usual, dry face, and Fiona giggled as she smiled up at him.

“She is alive, thanks to you.” Another voice from the stairway. Jessie was back, with Natasha too. Jessie was in a black dress that barely covered her skin, and Natasha was dressed a little more conservatively, a blue dress with a longer body. Why did this Natasha girl insist on coming, when it was obvious she didn't like the club atmosphere, even a relatively tame one like Bloodlust?

"Thanks to me?"

"She t-told us ... that you ... got her t-t-to the nightmare, when she was ... shot." Natasha came up to the table and stood by its side, while Jessy slid into the booth, opposite of Fiona, trapping him. Jackass woman smiled every second she did too, and like Fiona, got snug against his side and pressed her breasts to his arm.

"A kine with some balls," Jessy said. "And hey, now you know about us vamps, and even the monsters. That makes you special, only human in the city not on a leash." She set one of her hands on his leg, and stroked the tender muscle. At least she was being softer than he expected of an aggressive woman like her.

"I understand that ... the P-Prince has some ordered some ... Invictus eyes here all the time now?"

"Yeah." Jessy looked around, tapped her chin a few times in thought, then nodded. "Oh, right, that's me tonight."

His life was, apparently, in the hands of a buffoon. Lovely. It had Fiona in giggles, and she reached out over him to poke at Jessy.

"I need a drink! And ye said we get the booth, Jessy?"

"Yeap."

"... Fiona, unless I'm mistaken, Jessy and Natasha aren't going to drink, and I'm working." Bloodlust wasn't New Vegas, people didn't come to the club to get bottle service, convince girls to sit with them, and waste their money on ludicrous expenditures, modern-day peacocking. People came to Bloodlust because, compared to other nightclubs, it was subdued, quiet, discrete. Hilarious in retrospect, but true. Bloodlust was a dark place, where people came to drink, do drugs, fuck, and do it all with plenty of elbowroom.

Now that he thought about it, Bloodlust was more a lounge pretending to be a nightclub, but it was a specific motif that attracted a certain clientele. And, as he looked at Natasha and Jessy, he smirked. Vampire. The motif was dark, slick, deceiving, sexy, and dangerous. Bloodlust was made with vampires in mind.

“Let the girl have some fun, Eric.” Jessy shrugged, reached out across him to return Fiona’s poke, and laughed. “Just tell the bartender that Jessy sent you and you can get whatever you want for free.”

“Really?”

Oh good god he was going to get puked on before the night was done.

Fiona, giggling, hopped out of the booth, and ran downstairs. Only one waiter or waitress in Bloodlust usually; didn’t fit the vibe to have more, he guessed. People tended to themselves, and they enjoyed their privacy. Semi privacy, considering it was still bright enough to see nearby booths, and the people in them, a little anyway.

“... now that I think about it, I have trouble imagining this place making a profit,” he said.

Natasha chuckled, a couple squeaks almost lost in the repetitive heartbeat music. “It d-doesn’t.”

“No?”

“Nope.” Jessy leaned back, folded one knee over the other in a very obvious manner, and winked at him. “Invictus keep this place running as a place for Kindred to feed.”

“Kindred?”

“Our word for vampire.”

Guess he was right on the money then. The club was made by vamps, for vamps. And he was a bouncer for a place that didn't need a bouncer, for a place concerned far more with creating dark corners for these creatures of the night to get their blood fix.

Sweet mother of fucking god, he was pulled into this crazy world before he ever even met Fiona.

“I'm g-going to go downstairs, Jessy, to talk to Ganders. P-Please be nice to Eric? He helped saved Jack, and—”

“I am going to be nice to him, in all the right ways.” She winked again. Too many winks. Woman had seen far too many movies, nineties movies by the look of her hair, her dress, her attitude, everything.

But, she was gorgeous, no denying that. A little tall, the short blond hair, the built body, muscular and lean but still feminine, but at the same time with broad enough shoulders to show should could throw a mean punch. And she was rubbing his leg.

Natasha rolled her eyes, and walked back toward the stairs, dodging Fiona as the Scot came back up to join them, a bottle in hand. The redhead jumped back into the booth, and set the bottle down on the table. Vodka. He almost laughed. Shouldn't have expected something sweet with a swirly straw, but he did.

“Dinnae judge me!” She poured herself a shallow glass, and took a sip. “See, I can be sophisticated too.”

Uh huh. His smirk, or smile, stuck to him and refused to go away, even as the girl frowned at him, all the while sliding in closer on the booth, and taking a proper gulp of the drink.

“You know,” Jessy said, “this is a rare opportunity for us.”

Eric raised a brow. “Is it?”

“Not for you, for me, and Fiona. You’re the only human in the city that knows about us, who isn’t one of our servants.”

“What ... does that mean for us?” Fiona said, a bit of coyness to her voice; she knew he wasn’t human. And judging from what Jessy and Natasha had said, they didn’t know he wasn’t. It was their little secret then. Or, huge secret, that could get him into serious trouble if he didn’t tell the vampires who now controlled his life.

Eh, he’d hold onto it, and see where this new life took him first.

“That means we can have some fun with him. Kindred manipulate kine all the time, but they’re always oblivious to it. With Eric here, we can make him dance to our tune, and the best part it, he won’t be oblivious to it.”

“And ... I’m supposed to just sit here, and be manipulated?”

“You are, if you don’t want to wind up pissing off the vamps who have been so courteous as to leave you with your freewill intact.” Her hand found his leg again, and then his crotch. “I don’t think you’ll mind the sort of fun I plan to have with you though.”

Giggling all the more, Fiona took another gulp, and reached across with her other hand to slap Jessy’s hand. Which made Eric wince, as impact against his crotch was never a welcome feeling. Both girls giggled.

“Sorry,” Fiona said, and she raised her hand to rub his arm while the other got some more vodka into her. “Jessy, ye hae to be so aggressive, with sex and aw that?”

“Hell yeah. Besides, I took care of that Montoya business, told him to wipe Eric free of his debts and to leave him the fuck alone.” Her hand raised, and she took his chin a bit to direct it toward her, and shake it lightly. “So now he owes me.” Her dominant, assuming gestures would have been offensive, if the woman wasn’t eye-fucking the shit out of him as she did them.

“You took of Montoya, just like that?” He snapped his fingers in front of him.

She mimicked him, snapping her fingers, and gave him yet another wink. “Just like that. Invictus own him. Hell, if there’d been a real problem, I could have paid him off anyway. Not like you owed him that much.”

“ ... it’s a lot, when you have nothing.”

“Well, now you got something. Did the Invictus a favor, so we’ll keep you here at Bloodlust, making decent money and access to all the pussy you could ever want.”

Decent money, fucking hell. He was making great money now, and this woman was treating his new job like it was pennies. How fucking rich were these Invictus vamps?

“Somehow I doubt pussy is going to just walk up and—”

“Eric, really, you have got to get your head out of your ass. Ugh, the dark and brooding thing gets old after a while.” Jessy put her hand back on his crotch, and began to rub, massage, and caress in a surprisingly perfect way, enough to send the signals to his body, and make his shaft start to harden.

Damn, his body was going to betray him that fast? Shit, maybe he did need this more than he thought.

“He does ‘at a lot,” Fiona said. Girl was already getting tipsy.

“So I’ve noticed. Eric, serious question, you want to have sex? With women?”

“ ... I do, yeah, but—”

“And do you want to have sex with me, right now?”

Ok, aggressive was not aggressive enough of a word for this woman.

“ ... you are ... attractive, and ... I mean, I’d be lying if I said—”

“Good. So, servant boy, you are going to get a fair dose of pussy right now, and I’m sure plenty more in the future. Mine, and others.”

He gulped, and blinked several times at the blond next to him. Girl wasn’t blushing, hell she didn’t even flinch, or break eye contact as she met his stunned gaze. She batted her eyelashes a few times in ridiculous flirtation, and continued to rub his crotch until the hardness of his erection grew uncomfortable in his pants. Her abrasiveness and honesty was damn refreshing, and he had to admit, a real turn on.

“ ... ok, what do I—”

“Do absolutely nothing, just sit there and let us girls show you a good time. I’ve been a vamp for over half a century, and I can promise you, you ain’t fucked until you’ve fucked an older woman.” The grinning beast hiked up her skirt, and slid off the thong. She tossed it to Fiona, who giggled, already getting drunk and teetering a little, before she put it in Jessy’s purse on the table.

He gulped again, and waited. Part of him was a little afraid, as he realized this woman must have been at least seventy years old. Holy shit.

“Ever wonder why these booth seats are so damn huge?” Jessy said.

“ ... figured it was to give the place a bigger-than-life feel.”

“Maybe that too, but I was here when the old shit in here was taken out, and Bloodlust put in. Sex was the name of the game, and you can’t fuck in a tiny booth. Now, no more talking while I have some fun.”

He’d expected the brute of a woman to start mindlessly rubbing and really trying to be sexy without knowing how to be graceful or precise with her movements. He was wrong. He wasn’t dealing with some young woman who had a bit of a power trip, he was dealing with an older woman who just happened to look like a younger woman, who had a bit of a power trip. She knew exactly what she was doing, and her hand rubbed up against his crotch in angles toward its base that quickly had his breathing shortened.

Pulsing blood flowed into his crotch, and he looked down to watch as the shape of his erection started to show against his pants.

“If I was a Daeva or Ventrue, I could snap my fingers and have some chick over here sucking you off in seconds. Not really a Gangrel’s thing. Wouldn’t want it to be. We like to get our hands dirty, sink our teeth in, get sweaty.” She chuckled, and leaned in closer to put a playful bite long his jawline. “Well, sweaty when we’re blushing life anyway.”

“Think Julias does ‘at wi’ Beatrice?” Fiona said. Despite the blushing she was radiating, she didn’t move further away. If anything, she was getting in closer, pressing her body against his other leg, and a moment later she turned toward him enough that she put a hand on his leg. Every bit of her smelled of arousal.

“I know he does. Hell I’ve seen the two of them with a woman kine now and then, Kissing them in here, fingering her or having her pleasure the two of them under the table.” Jessy laughed, loudly, not a care in the world for the nearby booths where some people were starting to glance their way. “The bouncer getting it on with one of the customers?’ they were probably thinking.

Eric was powerless to stop his present circumstance. And, maybe for once in his life, that was a good thing. Just lean back, relax, and have sex with the beautiful woman who’s done nothing but favors for you. She’s not Sheryl, she’s not deceiving you; manipulating you sure, but all her manipulations were laid bare for him to see and evaluate. No lies here, just a hot girl taking advantage of you in a way you can’t really say you dislike. If Fiona had protested, he’d have protested too, but a glance down to the small girl beside him showed the opposite. Girl was terribly horny, her heavy breasts pushing her hard nipples against her dress, and her hand on his leg unable to hold still, stroking his thigh slowly.

She stopped stroking, and stared, as Jessy undid his shirt buttons to expose his abs and chest, then undid his pants, and pulled out his shaft. Damn woman winked at Fiona, and gave his hard length a few strokes. Eric had to fight the reflex to cover up, being in a public place, but Jessy’s grip and hungry eyes forced him to hold still.

Fiona stared at his member, and licked her lips. But when she tried to say something, she just let her mouth open, slightly parted, and watched the vampire stroke him.

“Slide forward.” The vampire woman climbed up onto his lap, and put her weight down against the booth with her knees.

He gulped, and slid forward half a foot. The booths were plenty big for it, and he had to admit, it was a more comfortable way to lean back and relax against the back of the seat.

“You’re a damn handsome man, Eric.” Jessy lowered herself down, spreading her legs out a bit more, and a bit more, until the smooth lips of her pussy brushed against the underside of his cock. Wet. God damn. "I look forward to our continued partnership."

"Hey, he's nae thraw." Fiona frowned up at Jessy, but frown melted away as the girl stared at Jessy's slit, at where the girl's pink flesh was spreading further and further apart as she sank her weight down onto Eric.

"Yeah, no thrall. I'll keep him vitae-free, s'long as you keep him on a leash, girl."

"... ah ... aye ... ok." Fiona stopped moving, stopped responding, and stared on as the vampire started to shift her hips back and forth.

So. Fucking. Warm. Wet warmth started to coat his cock, and a small groan escaped him as he melted into the booth while the beautiful, deadly creature grinned down at him.

"Since you know about Kindred, I don't need to give you any BS about going bareback." She slid her hips forward, pressed the opening of her pussy against the head of his cock, and then slid herself back down until her wet lips were snug against where his cock met his testicles. Not penetrating, not yet, girl wanted to tease him apparently, and rub her swollen clit up and down the underside of his length.

He was about to fuck a vampire. Or rather, get fucked by a vampire. He gulped again, and blinked a few times up at the creature as she grinned down at him, her grip on his shoulders and her legs tight around his. Five minutes in and she was wet enough to coat him, for him to feel her hot juices start to trickle down his length and get onto his abs and testicles. Girl really got off on being in charge.

"Fiona, hold him up for me would you?"

"W-What?"

Jessy laughed, winked, and raised her hips. “Come on, it’s fun. Take his cock in your hand, and point it up for me.”

Eric almost said don’t, like maybe it’d have been the nice thing to do, to defend Fiona from this girl’s ridiculous request. But, he didn’t. Maybe he realized Fiona had wanted to explore her own sexual side more, or maybe he was just a man and couldn’t deny how hot it’d be to have the beautiful little redhead next to him get involved in like that.

Her shock and surprise turned into a giggle, a very drunk giggle, and with a shaky hand, she reached out and took his shaft into her grip.

“Oh ... warm...” She offered him a few, testing squeezes, and bit her bottom lip as she shifted her hand up and down the base of his length. “An’ wet.”

“I’m dying here,” Jessy said. “Come on.”

More giggles. Fiona squeezed him a few more times, gentle, and tilted his cock back and forth along his abs. Like a cat playing with a toy. Or a drunk girl playing with one. But, after yet a few more giggles, she solidified her grip, and kept his cock pointed upright.

Jessy laughed too; the Scot’s joy was contagious. Hell, just having the redhead next to him, leaning in, snug to Jessy’s leg, and smiling at him, was making him smile back. Smile turned into a soft moan as his eyes came back to his cock, and watched the vampire begin to sink herself down onto him.

Tight, wet, hot flesh coated him all the more, and he struggled to keep his eyes open as the woman devoured him. She danced a little, swayed her hips from side to side, made each inch send sparks of pleasure down his length as her squeezing insides massaged his glans. Purposeful squeezes, muscles clamping down in spurts, milking him as she worked inch after inch into her.

When her lips found the base of his length, she let out a long sigh, and ran a finger down his cheek.

“I can tell just by looking at you that it’s been a while.” She reached up to one of her shoulders, and eased off the strap. Then the other, easing the strap off until both were falling down her strong arms. She slipped out of them, let them fall off her hands, and she smirked at him as the dress turned into nothing more than a belt around her waist.

Eric gulped, stared, and nodded. Been a while, yeah, and his eyes were locked on the beauty of the creature like an awestruck kid. Jessy was strong and built like Beatrice, but a little taller with a little more muscle to go with. A lean, strong body, muscle, a hard, flat stomach, and somewhat large breasts that almost looked odd on her muscular body. Odd, but beautiful, and the vampire winked at him as she brought a hand up to one of those breasts, and began to cup and massage it in a slow, teasing dance.

“Normally I prefer a rough fuck, beginning to end, but Fiona’s here and I don’t want to frighten her off.”

“H-Hey ... I’m ... nae frightened.”

“Yeah?”

“Aye! Seen worse than this in mah hunts ‘ere in Dolareido.”

“Then...” Grinning a grin Eric recognized, the ‘evil woman concocting an evil plan’ grin, Jessy reached out, and slid two of her fingers into Fiona’s neckline. “Then take ‘em out.”

“ ... I ... ye...”

“You got an amazing looking rack, Fiona, and I for one would love to look at it while I work a couple of orgasms out of your new boy toy here.”

This woman, holy shit this woman. She talked about sex like it was a sport, something to play with, boast about, master. And god damn had she mastered it. Eric could do nothing but sit there, and try and stop gawking so much as the woman began to slowly grind her amazing body back and forth against him.

Fiona peeked left and peeked right. Very dark on the Bloodlust second floor tonight, almost as if Jessy had planned this. Fuck, she had planned this. It wasn't so dark they couldn't see each other's bodies or the other booths, but it was dark enough that people outside the booth would only see silhouettes. The silhouettes would have been blatant though, and there'd be no denying that a near-naked woman was riding Eric's cock as he leaned back and enjoyed it.

The Scot hiccuped once, peeked twice, and then slid her hands up to her shoulders. Her open-back dress was easily undone, a lift of the strap along her neck up and over her hair, and then down onto her waist to let the chest of the dress fall to her legs, and expose her.

They were huge breasts, with swollen, puffy pink nipples against white skin. They were already large, but against her tiny body, they appeared massive, and both Eric and Jessy groaned at the sight of them.

"That," Jessy said, "is an amazing set of tits."

Eric nodded his agreement. He wasn't supposed to speak, but if he could, the only thing he'd have to say would be shitty compliments that didn't do the small, curvy woman's beauty justice.

"... thank ye." Fiona was blushing, but she wasn't covering herself back up either.

Jessy leaned in, planted one hand against the back of the booth beside Eric's head, and tilted her body toward Fiona a little. And, grinning that same evil grin, she reached out, and cupped the girl's nearer breast.

“God damn.”

“H-Hey! Jessy ye wank-stain, ah dinnae say ye could touch!”

“Yes you did. Your nipples are standing up like they're giving an ovation, Fiona, begging to be touched.”

“I—” Jessy put her finger against his lips before he could say anything.

“Ah still ... dinnae ... say...” Fiona's voice faded away as she looked down, and watched Jessy's fingers. The vampire seemed content to bounce Fiona's breasts, pressing up on one of them hard enough to make it jiggle, to make its softness ripple against Fiona's chest, before she did the same to the other. The little woman looked up at Eric beside her, and offered an embarrassed smile.

How easy it was to overpower someone's brain when they were horny. Drunk and horny made it far easier besides that, and the young woman beside him was definitely both of those.

“Come on, it's supposed to be fun, Fiona. Do whatever you want. Touch yourself if you think it'll be hot.”

“Touch myself? Ye stole mah date! Ah'm watching ye fuck 'em right now!”

“I'll give him back when I'm done with him. Then tomorrow you can fuck him all you want.” Jessy ran her other hand up and down Eric's chest, and made some animal growls as she leaned back, letting her hand fall from Fiona so she could put both her elbows upon the booth table behind her. “Unless you're too scared to get sexual?”

Eric winced. Ugh, dirty, so dirty, and ruthless this Jessy. Fiona definitely had a large sexual need, but it was plain to see she was shy and new to all this. Jessy was super old, human and vampire years combined. Not a fair contest.

But Fiona blew up her cheeks like a puffer fish, and snuggled in closer, pressing her body against Jessy's leg and Eric's side.

“Ah should ... do whatever ah want, ‘en?”

Jessy nodded, and started her dance again, but with her elbows still on the table behind her, so her leaning back position had her whole body on display. God damn that stomach, crunching and sliding as the woman squeezed down on his cock and slid her ass back and forth a couple inches.

“Anything you want. I mean, I'm not gonna stop fucking Eric till he's good and dry, cum and blood. But yeah, anything you want. Join in. I think you're fucking gorgeous, so does Eric, and the man has no choice but to listen to us.”

Woman didn't know that Eric may have been something far less manipulatable. Fiona did, but she giggled and nodded, going along with the game apparently. Not like, even if he was a werewolf, he could stop these two women in his current predicament. Trapped.

Fiona turned to him, and slid her closer arm under his, hooking them at the elbow, and pressing her bare breasts into his suit. God damn they were huge breasts, soft except for the puffy nipples pressing into him. She twisted enough to face him more directly, and with her further arm, reached out and across to run her fingers down his body, his exposed chest and stomach.

“Is it horrible o' me tae say ah absolutely loove men wit' ... these?” She traced the lines of his pectorals, lean and defined. “Or ... these?” Down they went, to trace the lines of his abs. “Or these? Ah ... ah loove these.” Her fingers found his hips, exposed as his jacket and shirt were open and spread, and she traced the iliac furrow of his hips and pelvis. Her accent was getting thicker as she got drunker, and it made Eric smile. She sounded lovely.

Jessy laughed, and reached down to grab her dress at her waist. She slid it up and off with all the grace of an ox, and put it beside Eric on the booth as she got comfortable again, leaning back against the table. Completely naked, in a club. If she weren't a vampire, Eric would probably have Ganders up here telling him to make it a little more discreet.

“I think it's ok for women to indulge in a little objectification of men's bodies every once in a while.” The vampire reached out, and set one hand on Fiona's back, since the girl was so close. Fiona flinched, but no dismissing shrug or pushing hand followed; rather, a quiet moan. She wanted to be touched. “Well, I mean for me, I do it all the damn time, but I'm a bitch like that.”

The redhead giggled, and turned a little to face more toward Jessy again. “Yer built like an Amazon warrior, lass.” Her exploring hand traced a few more muscles on Eric's chest and stomach, before they inched their way onto Jessy's leg where it was snug to Eric's side. Like a sneaky spider, she took small steps with her fingers, and walked her hand down Jessy's leg, down her thigh, and onto the woman's stomach as well where she began to do the same thing.

“I know, right? Built for fighting and fucking. The Gangrel way of a second life.” She reached up to get her arms over her head, and showed off her figure, her proportions, her muscular body that worked with her feminine curves and tight waist, and her plentiful breasts that she made jiggle with a few bounces. “But hey, got some soft parts too.” Grinning an animal grin, she reached down for Fiona's hand, and nudged it down lower, and lower, until it found the smooth mons of the girl's body, and then, her clitoris.

“ ... Ah ... oh...”

Eric stared on, and didn't try and hide the groan that came out of him. Jessy leaned back again, and began to grind her hips back and forth in slow, deep, perfect sways, each accented by a hard squeeze of her insides that had pleasure sparks dancing down his cock. But Fiona's touch on the animal's clit was what had Eric awestruck. A woman, massaging another woman's clitoris, while said woman rode him, so he could feel every clench, squeeze, shift, grind, and twist of her body? He had no idea, no idea at all how good this would feel, how arousing it would look, and how much it'd make him melt. No blood left to power his brain, to think about all the shit happening in his life, when all the blood he had available to him was currently between his legs.

"I know that look too," Jessy said. "That's the 'first time with two women' look." Again she laughed, even as her pace grew faster, and some moans started to slip into her voice. "Or at least, first time you've ever enjoyed two women at once, who're actually enjoying themselves."

Not allowed to talk, not allowed to defend himself. Other than a failed threesome that had been awkward, his sexual history had always been one on one. So, he really had no defense anyway. Damn woman was such a jackass about it though. A really, really hot jackass.

Jessy raised her elbows, gripped the table edge with her hands, and increased her speed. Back and forth, she pushed herself faster, fast enough Eric started to move with the impact of each thrust. And then faster again, until what was once an almost hidden bout of sex in the dark, became an obvious affair of rough sex for anyone nearby to notice. And people did notice, though as far as Eric could see, anybody nearby who were staring, stared only long enough to get aroused, and begin their own sexual experiences in their booths with their partners.

Despite Jessy's increased speed, Fiona managed to keep her thumb on the animal's clit. She had to lean in snug to Eric's side, her closer arm still hooked behind his, and she braced against him to keep steady as she kept a thumb against the swollen nub of Jessy's pussy. The blond was half fucking Eric, half forcing her hips forward to rub herself against Fiona's thumb, and the longer she went on, the wetter, and wetter she got. But she didn't blush, or so much as glance over her shoulders to see if anyone was staring. The animal grew faster instead, and growled down at Eric as she squeezed on him hard enough to almost hurt.

Just as the pleasure sparks were starting to grow, and he could feel his warm juices begin to build underneath his testicles, Jessy slowed down. Her insides clamped down, and as the random spurts of clenching waves worked through her muscles, Eric made a quiet moan as he felt her cum start to coat him.

"Feels ... fucking ... amazing ... doesn't it?" Talking mid orgasm, Jessy winked at Eric as she continued her dance at a slower speed, still holding the table to brace herself as she pushed her hips back and forth. Showing off. Each wave caused her flat stomach to roll with the motion, a wave of perfect skin and sexual allure flowing back and forth on his body, all the while trickling more of her juices onto his cock. Her orgasm earned some dark, quiet animal growls, and she quivered a few times, making her breasts bounce lightly against her. But she didn't stop dancing, only slowed down as she milked the waves of her orgasm aftershocks.

"Ye're ... making me jealous..." Fiona set her hand aside, resting it on Jessy's leg and giving the woman's clit a break. Or, maybe the Scot just wanted a better view of where the blond's cunt was spread open on Eric's cock. So very wet.

"Aw, don't be like that. I'm four times your age, Fiona. I had to work my way up to this level of awesome. Besides, nothing hotter than a young woman learning what she likes." Jessy sat up straight, set one hand on Eric's shoulder again, while the other reached out to touch Fiona's leg, and slipped a hand underneath the split of her skirt. "And you, Fiona, I bet you got a wild girl side, right? I think a part of you wants to meet Mister Right, curl up in bed, and have slow, tender, loving spoon sex all the time. But another part of you loves the idea of suddenly finding yourself sitting next to a man and woman having sex in a booth, while the woman reaches under your skirt, and starts to finger you. The thrill of not knowing what might happen next."

Fiona opened her mouth, but instead of a protest, she gasped. Gasp turned into mewl as Fiona turned straight on toward Jessy, pressed her back to the booth, her side to Eric's arm, and began to ease her legs apart. This Jessy was too damn good. A young woman having a wild girl inside of her who wanted to experiment was pretty normal, but to be split between that and a girl who wanted a far more vanilla sexual life was a bit more unique. And Jessy seemed to see that, catch onto it quick, and delight in seeing the conflict on Fiona's face as she eased her hand underneath the girl's underwear, forced it down enough to expose some of the girl's milky skin, the tiny, trim bush of red hair, and then slip her fingers into the girl's body.

Much as this Jessy was a brute, a bully, and an almost savage woman, she certainly knew her way around sex, both physically and mentally. Fiona was helpless to stop her, and stared on at the animal and how her palm was upturned while two fingers eased their way into her folds. Her underwear was still on, but Jessy had managed to pull down the front of them enough for her hand to have free access, and for Eric to see everything, juices included.

Jessy started her dance again, grinding her hips toward Eric's body, grip tight on his shoulder, while her other hand's fingers probed upward against Fiona's insides. And Fiona, snuggling into Eric's side, drunk and topless and so horny he could smell sex coming out every pore on her body, raised her further arm from him to her breasts. While her other arm was hugging his, the further arm reached up to cradle one of her breasts, and began to caress one of her nipples with circling fingers.

Too much, too damn fucking much. He closed his eyes for a moment, breathed deep, and focused on the pleasure starting to flow down from his cock, between his legs, and into his pelvis. Jessy's muscles were working his length without break, back and forth, stroking, massage, soaking, wringing pleasure out of him with practiced perfection. He was helpless, totally outclassed, and could do nothing but force his eyes open, and watch the two beautiful women as he started to cum.

“Hey, you dick.” Jessy slid the hand from his shoulder to his neck, and gave it a gentle squeeze. “Not even a warning?”

“ ... s—”

She put the hand against his lips, shook her head, and laughed as she slid it back to his shoulder, and continued to grind against him. Each pulsing wave of pleasure forced his inner muscles to flex, forced a gush of his cum to pour up his length, and forced him to tremble ever so slightly. And as he did, Fiona turned, and stared at him, his body, and his cock where the vampire's pink lips were spread around his dark skin. His cum was starting to leak out of the vampire, spreading over his skin as her clenching pussy milked it out of him.

Fiona started to squeak like a dog's chew toy, a bunch of little squeaks, adorable, cute, and very sexy, as each squeak made the woman tremble, and hold his arm tighter as she came onto Jessy's fingers. Her breasts shook with her, jiggling with their heavy size, and the softness of them, no longer held in her hand as her free arm reached out to hold onto Jessy's wrist. The vampire growled a little louder, hungry, and she leaned in to Eric until she was only a few inches from his face. She never stopped her dance, muscles squeezing in spurts, each timed with her swaying, and each timed to milk the fluid out of him as it filled his length before flooding into her.

What sort of fucking insane sex world had he been dragged into? A warrior, fucking him dry, while a soft, beautiful little creature clutched his arm, squeaking and mewling, as said warrior fingered her harder. Dolareido was sometimes called Slut City, but fuck, this was a new level of sexual confidence than he was prepared for.

It was sort of amazing.

“If we were back at my place or something, I’d get messy, and rough, you know?” Jessy withdrew her hand from Fiona’s insides, and raised it up to set it along the girl’s breasts. Poor Fiona was gasping, panting, trying to get oxygen into her as she quivered, all while Jessy left wet lines over her pink nipples, alabaster skin, and a splattering of freckles, lit by the pulsing lights. “But I think this will still work.” The vampire reached down for Eric this time, his free arm, and set his hand on her ass. Firm, hard, and large. She took his other as well, and pulled it forward, out of Fiona’s embrace, then back and over Fiona’s head so he could lay the arm upon her shoulders and behind her head.

He almost opened his mouth again, but shut it quick. Not the game. Jessy wanted him to nod, to submit, to just do whatever she told him to do. And hell, he kind of wanted to do just that.

He looked down at Fiona beside him. With her dress pulled down and skirt opened and pulled to the side, she was basically naked, and he gulped as he stared at her body, her short, curvy figure, her huge breasts, and listened to the sound of her panting and exhausted moans. Her underwear glistened with how wet it had become.

“Jessy, ye ... ye’re ... a real slut, ye ken?”

“Yeap.” The vampire took Eric’s hand dangling about Fiona’s side, and guided it to press it to one of her breasts. “Feels good, doesn’t it? Nice, big, heavy, fills the hand. Play with her while I make us all cum again.”

So. Damn. Soft. With his arm out of the way, Fiona was pressing against his side, and only Jessy’s knee between them prevented any major contact. It didn’t stop Fiona though, and she snuggled into him as best she could as she looked up to him.

“ ... Ah think ... Ah may be a bit blootered,” she said.

He rolled his eyes. Yeah, no duh.

“B-But, Ah ... came to Dolareido for a few reasons. Mah home town was boring, an’ Vrall needed prey. But, ‘twas also boring for me too, and Ah needed ... something ... wild.” One of her hands found his where it rested on her breast, and she helped press it to her body, her hard nipple, until the softness of the alabaster breast overflowed his hand. The Red Shoe Diaries confession would have been horribly cheesy and ridiculous, if he wasn’t smack dab in the middle of it, with his hand caressing her breast and his other holding the ass of another woman riding his cock.

Jessy had all the control, and she used it, bathed in it, grinned at him as she started to ease her body back and forth again in a slow sway, each causing her stomach to roll. Those abs, holy fuck. Each slow, rocking motion of her body was joined by a long, massaging squeeze of her cum-soaked insides, and Eric shivered as he felt her warm juices renew. So damn warm, tight, and her squeezing muscles knew just what to do to leave him breathless, each motion causing her wet pussy to massage along his swollen, sensitive glans, and every inch of his length.

But as much as she was fucking him again, she kept it slow, teasing; it was Fiona who was getting the brunt of Jessy’s aggression. The vampire slipped her two fingers back into the little woman's slit once again, and began to finger her, but this time she pulled the hand up with a rough motion that caused the tiny Scot to bounce slightly in her seat. She was going to finger the curvy little woman, and finger her hard.

Eric gulped, and watched, hand still holding onto the redhead's breast as she began to mewl. To hold a woman, hold her breast, feel her snug against him, as another woman fingered her hard and fast, was really hot, no two ways about it. He went comatose mode, mouth parting a sliver as he stared down at the tiny thing beside him, her bouncing breasts, and her spread legs.

“Consider this your introduction to a Kindred's world.” Jessy chuckled, and continued her harder fingering of the tiny woman. Relentless. She started to work her own body a little faster, but it was all secondary, an afterthought, based on where her eyes were: Fiona. Both of them were staring at Fiona, and listening to her bubbly mewls. Such a young thing compared to either of them, and drunk; made Eric feel a bit guilty. But she was more than just a young woman, and Eric forced himself to remember she was more than human too.

Hard to focus on the non-human element, when the very human, very beautiful half-naked woman was cumming again. So soft and curvy, her free breast jiggled and bounced, while the other in Eric's hand struggled to free itself of his grip as Fiona's trembling grew. He didn't let it. He began to caress it, massage it, two of his fingers circling her puffy nipple while the others held the large shape of her breast secure.

Fiona reached out, and grabbed Jessy's wrist with one hand, while her other pressed against Jessy's leg. “S ... slow ... doon...”

The vampire did, for a moment. But after a sinister chuckle, Jessy resumed fingering the curvy redhead, fingers thrusting upward hard enough to make all of Fiona's body shake against the booth, and for her squeaks to return. Squeaks, and juices. Even in the darkness of the club, Eric could see how wet Jessy's fingers were getting, and he could smell sex, smell the body and heat and need coming out of Fiona. The small woman's grip on Jessy's wrist was futile, and the vampire continued to finger her, despite her mewls and squeaks growing quieter, becoming breathless pants as the girl ran out of air.

He held her as she came, felt her heart beating a million times a second, and felt her soft body quivering in orgasm, while bouncing from Jessy's forceful fingering. And through it all, Jessy's dance on his cock got faster, shifting back and forth in a rolling tide. The impact of her arm was making her own body tremble, and Eric's eyes drifted to Jessy, her hard stomach, her smooth lips spread open by his cock, her shaking breasts, and her sinister grin. It felt good. It felt really good.

He was starting to get a picture of what these vampires were like. Maybe it wasn't a very accurate picture, given the few vamps he'd ever known, but this Jessy girl had so much confidence in herself and what she was doing, all Eric could do was watch, and let her shaking, dancing body work him toward a second orgasm.

Fiona went silent. Not because she passed out, but she simply had no air left. Jessy, perhaps feeling a bit lenient, slipped her hand out of the girl's body, and set her soaked fingers onto Eric's chest. The small woman's squeaks returned, as did her trembling, and she leaned her head onto Eric's shoulder as she shivered.

"God damn she's a firecraker," Jessy said. "Look at her, shaking like a leaf. And she drenched me." She traced Eric's chest with her fingers, drawing lines with Fiona's juices along his muscles. "Your turn."

"I—"

"No no, no talking. Just sit back, relax, and cum all you want while I get a drink." The vampire leaned in, grinning the whole way, and put her lips to his neck.

A part of him, the animal in him, wanted to push her off and fight her. She was dangerous, and that new instinct in him was feeling fangs on the neck, feeling vulnerable, feeling exposed, feeling like this dangerous animal might take advantage of him. But, the man in him was a bit too busy melting in a bath of pure sex to care.

When the fangs pierced him, there was a split moment of pain, so short he almost didn't notice it. And then, pleasure. Overwhelming waves of relaxation flowed through him, pouring up and down his body, his tense muscles, settling the pain in his knee and all the bruises. Pleasure amplified, turning the pleasant, massaging grip of her pussy around his cock into an overpowering bliss. Orgasm came moments later, and he let out a low, quiet groan as his cum started to gush out of him once again.

“Jessy, Ganders says we—what are you d-doing?”

Eric forced his eyes open, and looked out to the open space between the booths. Natasha stood there, hands on her hips and a chipmunk frown on her lips.

Jessy's head was on Eric's neck, between him and Fiona, so Eric got to watch Natasha stand there, tapping her foot and growing more and more annoyed. Eric, on the other hand, was doing his best to not pass out, as the vampire's suckling lips poured a strange euphoria over him. He couldn't focus on anything anymore, could barely see Natasha beside him, only aware on the relaxing waves working up and down his body. Each wave earned a gush of his cum, and he made another small groan as he felt the warmth of it coat the vampire's tight, soaked insides. And, as she suckled, her own juices joined his, her insides trembling and squeezing in random convulsions, milking him of his cum.

Holy. Fucking. Shit.

---

---

~~Natasha~~

Oh god damn it.

“J-Jessy, you ... you’re naked!”

The evil vampire woman chuckled, raised her lips from Eric’s neck, and wiped a hand across her lips. She was shaking, in a way Natasha knew meant she was cumming. Right in front of everyone!

“God damn this fucker tastes good.” And of course, not to be deterred by a conversation, the animal woman talked, and moaned at the same time.

“D-D-Don’t drink too much! He gave Jack some b-blood, remember?”

“Yeah yeah. Still, seems he’s got a good amount of blood. I’m pretty happy with him.” Jessy raised her hands, then leaned back as she ran fingers down her breasts and abs, little orgasm tremors still working through her. “Mm, nice and full.”

Natasha stepped around a little closer. Yep, suspicions confirmed. Jessy wasn’t just drinking the man, she was fucking him. Natasha couldn’t help but stare at how her pink lips were spread over the man’s dark skin, and how ... utterly delicious that looked. And then they drifted over to Fiona, and Natasha squeaked as she realized the redhead had her dress down, legs spread, skirt hiked up, underwear pulled down a couple inches, and looked exhausted.

Fiona was only four inches taller than Natasha, which barely put her into the five foot range. A small girl like her, but wow, Fiona had large breasts. The Mekhet smacked herself in the forehead, and shook herself out. Now was not the time to get drawn into Jessy’s insatiable sexual appetite.

“Sat-t-tisfied?”

“I’ll have you know, I am. Since you won’t play with me anymore, I’ve been lonely! The boys have been lonely too. Needed to spice up my life a bit.”

Right, cause sleeping with four ghouls, at the same time, and on a regular basis, wasn’t spicy enough for Jessy. As if to prove that true, Jessy started to work her hips back and forth, hands holding the table behind her, and moans escaping her fangs.

Natasha watched her for a few too many seconds before she reached out, and flicked the naked woman in the shoulder. “Come on, get dressed! And ... cleaned up.”

“Fine fine.” Jessy slid off the man, slowly, teasingly. Natasha again couldn’t control her eyes, and watched as Jessy’s pussy slid off of Eric’s cock, and the thick phallus fell loose against his abs. Traces of juices, and white cum, joined its veins and girth. It was enough to have Natasha craving some alone time with her boyfriends; thank god she wasn’t blushing life. Jessy reached into her purse for a wetnap, and wiped away all the sex that had accumulated all over them, in mere seconds at that, her decades of practice showing through. Nice of her. She half expected Jessy to force the two exhausted victims to clean themselves up.

Fiona and Eric were still conscious. Fiona was understandable, but for Eric to still be awake was surprising, given how much blood he must have lost, feeding two Kindred, and how one Kiss was normally enough to pull a kine into a blissful sleep.

“S-Sorry about her, Eric,” Natasha said. “She um ... she’s ... she’s a slut.”

“Hey, don’t poke the bear. Think I don’t got some juicy stories I can share about you?” Shrugging, Jessy stood up on the floor for everyone to see, slipped on her thong, and then her dress. She made a show of it too, offering a few enthralled viewers a wink.

It probably was best to not poke the bear. Jessy could easily begin a tale of Natasha's sexual exploits with the Gangrel's ghouls, and all the kinky things she'd done with them. Apparently, all a precursor to her new sexual life with two werewolves, that Jessy had somehow orchestrated. She was dumb brute of a woman, and yet, frustratingly intelligent and manipulative when she wanted to be.

Jessy cleaned up Eric, pulled up his boxers and pants, and did them up to hide his privates. And then she began to do the buttons of his shirt, smirking at the bouncer with each one.

"You ok there, man?"

"Yeah, just ... very ... drained."

"Ha! Yeah, Kiss will do that." Jessy pat the exhausted man on the hand, and then walked around the booth to slide in with Fiona. And just as with Eric, she helped put the girl back together. Fiona had not been Kissed, and yet, she looked spent, as if someone had forced a dozen orgasms on the girl; no doubt Jessy had. Well, Fiona had wanted to experience the sexual side of Dolareido, a side she said she'd seen a lot of, but had never actually partaken of.

A first time with Jessy was like learning how to swim in the deep end.

Natasha smiled at Eric as the man struggled to regain his composure. "D-Don't ... be embarrassed, ok? This sort of stuff happens here in Bloodlust all the ... t-t-time. In fact, um, if you're single, I suggest you ... enjoy it."

"Aye!" Fiona shouted, earning a small jump from Natasha. The girl had a bottle of some alcohol, and she poured herself some more of it to drink. "Ah think ah will!"

Oh no, Jessy had corrupted her.

Chapter 52

~~Natasha~~

The Grand Cathedral of Dolareido was a terrifying place, she found, especially from the outside. The statues on the railings of the stairway, on the archways, and on the outcroppings of carved stone along the cathedral's high walls, were nightmare fuel. Six-winged angels destroying demons beneath their feet, and gargoyles with mouths agape and fangs exposed within them. The archway over the main door had a crucifix, with doves perched upon it, as if the only way to find the peace those doves had, to escape the horrors displayed on the outside of the cathedral, was to pass through the gates beneath the cross.

She eased open the giant door of the cathedral, and slipped in.

She'd never understand why a vampire would agree to the philosophies of the Lancea et Sanctum. She wanted her feet firmly on the ground, rooted in evidence, not beliefs that were created to fill the hole evidence hadn't filled yet. So what if vampires didn't know where they came from? That was no reason to suddenly go believing in a higher power, believing that vampires were damned and doomed to suffer lest they fulfill God's plan for them, to be monsters that scare the sheep into the protective arms of the shepherd.

But then, in absence of evidence, what do you do? For her, it meant a lifetime of digging through books and research articles, and now, relics and tomes, searching for truth. Damien was different than her. He had faith. A powerful weapon, and a massive weakness, depending on circumstance. She wanted to know if that circumstance was now, and if Damien had anything to do with what happened.

Maria wasn't here, she knew that; it's why she came now and not later. Still avoiding that conversation, still tiptoeing around that bitch of an elder, still being passive and refusing to be aggressive. She got aggressive with Jacob, maybe she could get aggressive with Maria? No, that wasn't the same circumstance, not at all.

Natasha walked forward, slowly, and took a moment to straighten her business pantsuit. A pistol and two small swords, one of silver and one of carbon steel, were not easy to fit into a pantsuit jacket, but she made do. It would have been easier to leave the silver sword behind, and avoid potential questions from her boyfriends. They'd yet to ask about the extra sword; maybe they couldn't tell it was silver? She did keep it in its sheath. Either way, she had to keep it on her at all times, but it wasn't a strong enough material for proper sword work, hence the need for the other.

She made sure they were all there as she walked through the cathedral toward the dais, and the apse behind that that held the enormous pipe organ. Someone was playing them.

"D-Damien?" she said.

"... Natasha. I wasn't expecting you."

She came closer, and watched the man as his fingers moved across the keys. A pale comparison to Maria's expert fingers, Damien's playing was slow, imprecise, and lacked any texture. His timing was off too. But, he was playing Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata, the famous first movement, and that wasn't exactly Twinkle Twinkle Little Star.

"Is Madam Turio ... Maria t-teaching you how to play?"

"Yes. I expressed interest, and she was more than willing."

"She d-does love old, classical music a lot."

“Indeed. And for good reason. It deserves to be loved. Modern music is ... well, that’s a rant I’m sure someone else could deliver better than I.” The man started playing again, and Natasha watched, a small smile on her lips. Something sexy about a man playing an instrument; a stereotype, but true.

“I’m not hearing the f-f-full p-pipes?” The sound was quiet, subdued, and didn’t have any of the power she assumed a pipe organ would have.

“No. This organ has a digital structure built in. I need to flip a switch to actually use the pipes. But, I foresee months, years of practice, before I’d be willing to try them.”

She nodded. Practical, sound, logical. You build up to something as grandiose as using the pipes in an actual full sized pipe organ.

“Is ... is it harder? Playing an organ, instead of a piano?”

“I wouldn’t know, haven’t played the piano. Madam Turio ... Maria, she says that, when all its elements are engaged, it is the most difficult instrument to play. It is a wind instrument at its core, and ... and I suspect you did not come to talk to me of music, Madam Vola.” The man didn’t know when to use titles, or he didn’t feel comfortable addressing her as Natasha. Maybe some time together could fix that?

“N-No, I ... wanted to talk to you about Jack. And, and you know ... t-t-to call me Natasha. You’re not Invictus, n-no need for the titles.”

“Very well, Natasha. Yes, I assumed the only reason you might visit now would be to talk about Jack. I may not be Invictus, but Maria keeps me in the loop. This whole right hand but not Invictus position she has given me is ... weird.”

“You thought I’d want to talk to you about Jack?”

“You suspect me, don’t you?”

“I ... I mean ... a little?” She squirmed, and leaned against a nearby railing that separated the organ from the rest of the stage. “You can ... imagine why.”

“ ... then let’s go talk to him.”

“What?”

Damien stood up, adjusted his tie, and turned to look at her. The half-shaved head, hair falling down his temple on one side of his head, was oddly fitting his dark suit, something Maria no doubt had him wearing. Sexy.

“Let’s go talk to him.”

---

Julias wasn’t home, but that’s why Natasha called him ahead of time. She couldn’t lie to him though, and spilled the truth that Damien was joining her. The man was hesitant, but he agreed to let them into the mansion and its underground bunker. It wasn’t like Damien would be able to kill Jack and make it seem like Natasha did it or something, and the man had had ample opportunity to kill Jack if he was willing to do it overtly.

So, Natasha knocked on the front door, and waited. Huge place. So huge. To own a mansion in a dense city, in an area where the real estate was kept free of any extra homes or anything that could possibly lower its value, was expensive. Of course the Invictus not only had money, they could bypass the money issues altogether, and turn such fantasies into reality. Only elders got to do something as extravagant as a mansion though.

“Madam Vola, and ... Mister Burksen, I believe?” A kind looking woman in a modern, but not too modern maid outfit answered the door. “I am sorry to answer myself, but Nathan has just let Master Terry feed, so he is sleeping.”

“Y-Yes, um, d-d-did Mister Mire call and—”

“Yes yes, come in, please. Master Terry is awake and expecting you.”

“Oh.” Natasha smiled, and followed after the thrall with Damien behind her. As they walked, several of the thralls stuck their heads out or up from their activities in cleaning the enormous house, and they watched Damien with squinted eyes. Well, they certainly didn’t like him, which was probably because of Julias. In fact, she imagined they were on standby to lock Damien into the bunker room, if something happened to Jack.

Well, she trusted him. Maybe she didn’t trust Maria, but she trusted him. A little.

The servant took them down a stairway, a long and deep stairway, before she gestured with open palm into the hallway ahead. Natasha had seen this bunker before, but Damien hadn’t, and the man stopped to take careful note of each barrier they crossed in the underground.

“... I would say these precautions are overkill, but I guess recent developments would prove me a fool.” He reached out, and ran his hands down one of the spiked gates that lined the path. Natasha pat his hand away from the metal. The gates were pulled aside, out of the way, but Natasha got the impression they’d come out with a hard snap and skewer trespassers if fiddled with.

It was a long tunnel, hardened with concrete. Viktor always thought for the future, and built things to last; understandable elder paranoia about preserving their long lives. In this circumstance, it was protecting Jack, and letting the boy sleep his injuries away. Triss had described the injuries to Natasha, and Natasha had winced with every mention of bone, flesh, sinew, and organs. Her first encounter with the werewolves had been a visceral amount of pain and injury, but she doubted she could compare it to what Jack had gone through with these hunters.

“Hey Natasha,” Jack said. The boy was sitting on the bed, dressed in suit pants and a white shirt, no jacket. He looked gaunt, despite the fresh meal Natasha knew the man had had. Recovering from such life-threatening wounds took time, especially for one as young as Jack.

But he was healing faster than a one-year-old neonate should, from those sorts of injuries at least. Impressive. Julias’s childe, he was.

“Hey Jack,” she said. How nice, to not have to call him Master Terry, or for him to call her Madam Vola. “The P-Prince has been anxious to see you.”

“Yeah, and I’m anxious as hell to see her. Moment I can actually walk around, I’m there.”

“You ... d-don’t want her to visit you here?”

“She could, but she thought it best to let me rest. We’ve sent each other a few messages.”

“Oh, sorry then, f-for ... int-t-errupting your rest.”

“It’s ok. I should be good to go after one more night’s sleep.”

Natasha smiled, sat down on the edge of the bed near the boy, and reached out to touch his shoulder. Even little Jack was much bigger than her, but she still felt the bigger Kindred. She was half a century older than him, in Kindred years; and yet, it didn’t feel like that anymore. The beasts in their guts, hidden, forever tugging at their impulses and instincts, could sense each other, and hers found the boy to not be the little Ventrue he once was. Where before, she knew she could easily best the boy, now, she wasn't sure it'd be so easy.

A powerful ally for the Invictus, indeed.

“Jack,” Damien said. “Glad to see you're well.”

“Thanks. Kind of surprised you came though.”

“People suspect I had something to do with your kidnapping.”

“Ha, yeah I figured they might.” Jack shrugged, and turned a little on the bed, earning a pained wince. “They didn't see how much you pulled through in the tunnels, against that giant spider monster.” The three of them shivered with the memory.

“That is true,” Natasha said. “B-But ... if Maria finds out—”

“I have told Maria nothing.” Damien offered a tiny frown, and slowly paced about the room, eyes wandering its extravagant decor. “Julias, Beatrice, the Prince, the sheriff, Natasha, Jack, and myself all know about what really happened to Lucas. That's a lot of voices that could accidentally let slip an innocent detail that allows the elder to piece together what happened. But, I'm sure we all monitor our words carefully. We're all glad Lucas is gone, and that includes me ... and Maria, to some extent.”

Natasha raised a brow as she watched Damien. It was rare to hear him speak so deliberately. The man who showed up at her door once, stabbed her in the heart, kidnapped her, his voice and his eyes had been wavering and weak. The man who spoke to his congregation, on the other hand, spoke with a solid voice and with solid eyes. That was this Damien. It was a pleasant sight, but also a frightening one; the man was scary when he was an enemy.

“I’d prefer to not let Maria find out, in either case.” Jack fell back against the sheets of his bed, head to the pillow, and looked up at the ceiling. “That Angela woman was a fucking psycho.”

Natasha raised a brow. “The hunter?” Antoinette had briefed her on the Invictus reports, Jack’s reports.

“Yeah. Damien was right that they’d target me, cause I’d be an easy target. But they didn’t come here for us vamps, they came for the monsters.”

She could tell them, about her conversation with Jacob and her eavesdropping of his conversation with Azamel. Always a tough game, figuring out what things were ok to tell your friends, and what you shouldn’t, to keep an advantage in the Danse Macabre. She told the Prince everything of course, but telling the other covenants every little detail was probably a bad idea. Exercise discretion, as Maria would say. Exercise wisdom, as Antoinette would say.

“So n-now, we have a bunch of hunters in the city, and they want Azamel.” Natasha pulled a knee up to her chest, and held it with wrapping arms as she teetered on Jack’s bed a little. “Poor Fiona. When she f-finds out, she’ll ... she’ll feel guilty.”

“They didn’t know about Avery,” Jack said. “They know about the Kindred here, know a lot, but they didn’t know about the Uratha. So, if I can convince Avery to help us out, we might just be able to turn this around.”

Damien came to stand beside Natasha, and he looked down at the two of them with a raised brow. “Easier said than done. Avery hates Maria and Michael, and all Invictus. Only reason she’s dealing with Jack is ... well, he’s Jack, I presume.”

Natasha smirked. Jack was Jack.

Jack raised a hand. "I'm Jack?"

"Y-You know, you're Jack. You um ... you ... um..." How best to describe the Jack effect? "You t-talk where m-m-most wouldn't."

"... so I don't know how to shut up."

"Exactly." Damien nodded, like it was very matter-of-fact information that everyone knew. "The Uratha couldn't understand discretion to save their lives, so they appreciate your forwardness. Perhaps you can get them to help deal with this Jeremiah and Angela, and their hunters, but I think you'll be hard pressed to convince them."

The boy sighed, nodded, and raised a hand to scratched his buzzed head. "Avery likes Garry, or at least, they know each other, and don't seem to hate each other. I might be able to use that angle."

"H-How?" she said.

"Gotta become friends with Garry."

Damien frowned, but shrugged as he took a seat by the desk. Natasha didn't like the sounds of it either. Garry was volatile, like any freedom fighter was, especially when they already had freedom, were convinced that they didn't, and continued to look for things to fight over. Rebels without a cause, damn Carthians. It would be one thing she'd carry with her from the Invictus, a dislike for the Carthian ideology.

"I'm glad you guys decided to visit," Jack said. "Been a bit lonely. I've been ... wanting to break, ask the Prince to visit, but it really is best to wait until I don't feel like my spleen is going to fall out."

Damien shrugged. "You don't need it." Natasha and Jack both raised a brow, and stared at the man, until again he shrugged. "What, I can't make a joke?"

“You c-could say, we might b-b-be a bit surprised.”

Jack nodded, and laughed, and almost screamed as he fell back onto the bed again, holding his side. “Fuck, fuck fuck fuck ... yeah, that’s why I can’t see Antoinette.”

“Sorry!” Natasha said. “Sorry, s-sorry. Um, yeah, you rest.”

“So, I’ll make friends with Garry. And Azamel. Already got Antoinette and Julias and ... Jacob, surprisingly. I’ll make friends with Avery and Michael, and hell, Maria too.” While still lying down, staring at the ceiling, he pointed his hands up at them like the ceiling was going to fall on him. “Cause these hunters are going to kill us all if they get the chance.”

---

---

~~Julias~~

He squeezed his arms around Beatrice, tight, close, as close as reality allowed, and groaned softly into her ear.

“Feeling awfully clingy, aren’t you?” she said.

“Very.”

“Needy guys are such a turn off.”

He chuckled into her. Juices, warm, heavenly, were dripping off of his testicles, despite her words.

The two of them were in Bloodlust, second floor as usual, and she was sitting on his lap, leaning back against him. She’d worn a short leather skirt to go with an almost fashionable black tank top, but had also worn a thong that went high enough on the hip that he couldn’t stop staring at it. Which led to present circumstances, her, sitting in his lap, facing away from him, her legs spread around his, and her slit spread open on his shaft.

She leaned forward, set her elbows on the table, and grinned back at him over her shoulder as she ground her ass down toward him.

“I needed this,” she said. “Just some nice, gentle fucking. Fucking hell, I’m still sore.”

“Getting filled with lead will do that.” He reached out with one hand and set it on her hip, while the other slipped underneath the bottom of her tank top to find her naked spine. Dancing fingers sneaked their way up her back, and caressed the grooves of her spine, and along various tattoos that played with her vertebrae, making beautiful, dark artwork of her lean body.

She moaned, and pushed herself back into him using her hands on the table. “See the Eric dude downstairs?”

“I did.”

“Heh, yeah, I winked at him as we came up here. Fucker knows what we’re up to.”

“Were you hoping he’d come up and watch?”

“... maybe. No secret now, I got a huge love for it. Call me an exhibitionist, but, god damn, something about people seeing me while you and I fuck, really turns me on.” And to prove her point, she raised her hands up from the table, slipped her claws under her tight tank top, and pulled it up enough to hook it over her breasts. There were people in nearby booths, watching, but with how dark it was and Triss’s hair over her cheeks, they wouldn’t be able to see her teeth. And Julias would wipe the mind of any kine who noticed anyway. A bit risky, fucking like this, but she initiated, and Julias could hardly say no.

He looked over at the woman beside them in the booth. A kine, a younger woman, maybe twenty years old. A short human, lacking in curves, but very, very cute. Drained, exhausted, and passed out, her shirt open, and her skirt zipper as well. Comatose, and thoroughly spent, as both Triss and Julias had fingered, licked, suckled, massaged, caressed, and forced the girl to cum her brains out several times as they drank her. And a full belly of blood was more than enough to have the two Kindred on each other immediately thereafter, high-riding thong or no.

Triss was trying to make him not think about Jack, not think about Dolareido, and worry about the hunters. She was trying to make him focus on something more positive, he could tell. And he loved her for that. Antoinette would probably do the same for Jack. Shit, he was already thinking about shit he wasn't supposed to be thinking about. Focus on the beautiful woman in front of you, and how amazing her tight, wet, hot insides felt squeezing your cock.

“So I should have some people over more often?” he said. “Maybe some of my thralls, with a camera?”

“I ... wouldn't mind a camera, actually. Could put it up on screen to watch while we fuck later.” She started to bounce faster, more of her juices trickling down his testicles as she got closer to orgasm. He'd had sex with women who squirted during orgasm before, but with Triss, it was a bit different. The more comfortable she grew with him, and herself, the more she let loose. He loved it. Though, if not for how their fluids would fade away in a short time, he'd be worried about the mess she'd leave on his clothes and the booth.

“I remember a time when you would have stabbed me for the suggestion.”

“Apparently, I've changed. You have too, right? Used to be all happy on the outside, sad on the inside. Seeing a bit of the reverse these days,” she said.

“ ... do I seem sad on the outside?”

“Like you got the weight of being a member of an Invictus high council on your shoulders.”

“Sounds suspiciously like reality.”

“But I know you’re a happier man than you used to be; mostly because I’m in your life, and I’m awesome.” Proving her point, she leaned forward more, weight on her elbows, and started to dance on his cock, literally. She dipped her hips left and right to the beat of the music, each dip causing her insides to clench, and for her small clit-hood chain to dangle and rub against his testicles. She didn’t always wear it, but when she did, he could tell every motion she made was sending pleasure sparks through it and into her, along with everything else.

He leaned back, and watched the most amazing ass in the world grind into him. She still had the thong on, and had her tiny skirt pulled up to sit on her hips along with it, thong pulled aside to cut across one of her large ass cheeks and stay out of the way.

Cumming was inevitable. First him, hands taking her hips and squeezing on her body as he felt the warm fluid gush up through his length, and into her squeezing insides. Moments later, she did as well, and her head fell to dangle between her arms, elbows still on the table, as she started to tremble. She still danced, still kept swaying, but no longer with the beat of the music. Woman was having trouble staying in control as the orgasm worked through, and Julias had lost all control already, just holding on as she milked him, and soaked him.

“At the same time again,” she said, looking back to him. “I’m getting good at this.” And, like she was getting comfortable in a lounge chair, she sat back, and put her back to his chest. Her pussy continued to shiver around his cock, and small trickles of her cum ran down his length to warm his testicles, along with his own. Divine.

His hands slid up, and found her breasts. Firm, handful breasts, and he massaged them as he hugged her against his chest. Nipple piercings were a delight, and he caressed them — and her — until she was melting into him.

“This quick fuck turned into a fifteen-minute tryst,” he said, “not even counting the meal.”

“Fifteen minutes is quick, you jackass.” She elbowed him in the side, but did nothing to stop his caressing of her body. Still sitting on him, still moaning, still shivering as the final waves of orgasm aftershocks worked through them. His were done long before hers though, and he delighted in feeling her pussy trembling, until it eventually forced out his softening shaft.

“I could do five minutes.”

“I’m sure you could do two, Superman, especially with me at the helm.” Instead of covering herself up, she let her head fall back and dangle onto his shoulder. Completely at ease with the idea of anyone seeing her with her tank top up.

The girl really did like to be watched. And whenever a third party was involved, the girl often came her brains out, very quickly. Something about another presence, a third — or fourth — body, being in the room, or sometimes in the bed, that set her blood on fire. If it was possible — and it was — he was sure she’d love it if he was having anal sex with her, lying underneath her, while six thralls stood around her and touched her, caressed her, and fingered her. Mental note: consider doing that for her birthday.

She slid off of him eventually, adjusted all her clothes, and adjusted the sleeping kine next to them so she wouldn’t fall over while Triss got snug against Julias’s side where the kine had been. Arm behind him, his arm over her shoulders, they held each other, and let the blood digest in their systems. The orgasm was the icing on the cake.

“So, you talk to Jack much?” she said.

“Yeah, was with him every day during his recovery.”

“Catch up with him?”

“He works for me, Triss. I’m always caught up.”

“Yeah but, I mean, stuff like ... you know, that emotional crap.”

Doing up his pants, it was hard to take the conversation too seriously. But after a moment, he thought about Jack, and let the gravity of Triss’s curiosity sink in.

“We all struggle with the beast.”

“Jacob doesn’t,” she said.

“No?”

She shrugged, and pulled at his hand that dangled from her far shoulder, arm hooked behind her head. And like a cat, she chewed on one of his fingers.

“Big part of who he is, who the Circle of the Crone are, and the blood magic shit; accepting the beast.”

“You sound like you’re fitting in then.”

“Yeah ... a lot more than I thought I would.” She chewed on his fingers a bit more, catching them between the points of the massive teeth along her jaw. Apparently she’d become a house cat when he wasn’t looking. “But Jack’s a fucking kid, and now he’s got kills under his belt.”

“He tell you about what happened?”

“Jacob did, filled me in on some details he got from the Prince. I knew about the kill on the first night, the frenzy kill, which is a major shitty situation. Dies and kills the same night? Definitely put a scar on him. Then the Viktor and Tony thing, then the Lucas thing, and then the spider monster thing, yeah, all crazy fucking shit, right? But this time it’s people, humans, and killing humans changes you, hunter or otherwise.”

He sighed, nodded, and hugged her a little closer. Killing Kindred was horrible, but at the same time, understandable. They were lone predators forced to share space and a food source; conflict was inevitable, including the occasional casualty. But killing humans was different. Killing a kine was like killing a part of yourself, your old self. Cliche, and true.

“I’ll have to spend some more one-on-one time with him, teach him some more things, maybe talk more about ... my past, I guess. Memories are starting to get hazy.” For the best. Memories of his wife, of his life before his embrace, it was easier to just forget them. Time heals all wounds because time tempered many things, like water against the rocks of a shore, until they were smooth. In this case, memories lost their details, and the visceral edge that they came with.

“Do you remember your first kill?”

“ ... I think so.”

“Cool to talk about it?”

“It was a hundred years ago. All I have are blurred memories. But, it was ... Viktor had me working a deal with a local crime circle, and I ... no, wait, that’s...” God, the memories, digging them up was painful in an almost literal sense. Internally resolved, externally forgotten. But, he could remember a face. “ ... someone I drank ... didn’t know when to stop.”

“ ... that’s rough. Fits right into the super depressed but confident, business dude you were when I met you.”

“And you?” He wasn’t sure why he asked. The macabre conversation was a weird aftertaste to seek after a great meal and great sex.

Many Kindred didn’t talk much about their old lives. All it did was bring painful memories to the surface, and force the particularly younger vampires into depression, as the sharp edges of their still fresh memories killed them with a thousand cuts. But if she wanted to talk about his past, he was happy to learn about hers. Almost felt like being human again, talking about old parts of life that didn’t matter, idle chitchat that lacked the usual emphasis on the now that most Kindred learned to adopt.

“My early years were pretty rough, you know? I figure it is for all Nosferatu. Waking up with fucking crocodile teeth, claws, and snake eyes? Yeah, angry. Then Antoinette executes my sire — deserved — and I’m left just ... yeah, not fun times. Found some scumbag kine, and let loose.”

Yeah, he remembered that. Invictus adjusted reports to hide the details on kills that looked odd, even if they came from someone not in the Invictus. It served no one to leave paranormal evidence lying about. A human getting ripped in half was paranormal evidence.

“Sorry I—”

She elbowed him in the ribs. “Don’t do that, jackass. You didn’t know me then, you got no reason to be sorry. And besides, it’s all turned around in the end. I don’t hate myself nearly as much anymore, and hell, find myself pitying other Nos a lot more than me. Some of them have it pretty bad.”

Yeah, true. Maria was one of the worst cases. To look like a deteriorating corpse for the rest of their second life was not a fate he wished on anyone.

“Jack’s young,” he said. “Younger than you, lot younger than me. I’m worried that, after everything he’s done, it’s going to start eating at him. I warned him long ago that it would, that being Kindred would start to wear on him, his humanity, and he’d have to struggle with that. That was after he killed Mrs. Pavala. Since then, kid’s been through one shit show after the other.”

“Exactly. We got our shit figured out, mostly, long ago, and our shit mountain was smaller in comparison. I’m thinking Jack might need a little more ... I don’t know, just keep an eye on him?”

He smiled at the woman, and nodded. She really cared about the kid. Maybe they’d bonded over their love of metal music, or the fact they both had zero tact.

“I will.”

“Course, he’s also sleeping on Antoinette’s tits near every night, so, I’m sure she’ll help him ... you ever wish I had tits that big?”

“All the time.”

She elbowed him, again, hard. “I wouldn’t be able to bend over without breaking my back! And at the ball? Practically had them out.” She held out her hands in front of her a foot, as if holding giant breasts of her own.

“You really love breasts.”

“I ... yeah, I guess I do.” She pulled up her tank top over one of her breasts, and traced her areola with a claw, where the snake tattoo was biting it.

“ ... you know who had great breasts? Jennifer.” Time to test the waters again. Planting thoughts of Jennifer in Triss’s head, while she was touching herself, was perhaps playing dirty, as Triss wore her arousal on her sleeve. But, sometimes, the best time to get someone to admit to what they wanted was when they were too horny, or drunk, to block their impulses.

“Ha, yeah, everyone got to see them. Certainly no Antoinette, but plenty big, and soft without being too soft.”

“That’s right, I forgot you were groping her while you were getting dressed for the ball.” Like a fly to honey, Triss was with this girl.

“I wasn’t ... ok, I was, a bit. She was all over me, and ... I ... really wanted to touch her, after a while.”

“As long as you don’t engage in full on sex without me, you know I’m ok with you and your Circle being rather open and handsy with each other.” If a hundred years in Dolareido had taught him one thing, it was to be a bit more open minded about sexuality.

“Thanks. I ... I yelled at her, a few nights ago. Kind of got angry at her, and Aaron and Othello, about some Circle stuff.” She pulled her tank top back down, and squeezed his arm as she turned to rub her cheekbone and sides of her crocodile teeth into his shoulder. “Jacob’s happy with me, but I might have upset them.”

He nodded, and hid his smile. Idea.

~~Antoinette~~

She sat there at the grand table of glass, and waited, Daniel at her side, standing and with his hands in the small of his back. Primogen meetings had become far more interesting as of late, to her annoyance and frustration. If all had been going well, then Primogen meetings should have been dull, and borderline pointless. Only when the affairs of her city were in disarray did Primogen meetings truly serve purpose.

Her mind wandered to Jack. One more night, and she would see her beloved. He would be healed, mostly, and she would bathe him in bliss and comfort to celebrate their reunion. She would hold him, squeeze him if his body could endure it, and kiss him a thousand times. She would set his head upon her lap, listen to his woes, and wash them away to the best of her ability.

A Kindred as young as Jack should not have to deal with such hardships, to carry such burdens, to be tormented so and be forced to bear responsibilities as large as his. He managed to pull through, each time, but it was still far too much to ask a neonate, especially one barely a year embraced. It both overjoyed her to know her little Ventrue was capable of such feats, but saddened her to no end to know a boy so young, barely a man, had gone through such strifes.

She smirked as she ran a finger along her jawline. In the future, she would be sure to enjoy all manner of fantasies with the both of them, tie him down perhaps, and torment him with bliss rather than pain. But upon their meeting tonight, she would need a more delicate hand, to hopefully alleviate his undoubtedly troubled, strained mind.

Maria Turio, Garry Tones, Michael McDonald, Julius Mire, and Jacob stepped into the meeting room, each dressed in clothing that spoke of their status and covenant. For the Invictus, that meant suits, except in the case of Maria, who preferred ghostly white dresses befitting women of two hundred years passed. For Garry, that meant jeans and a shirt, but at least they were clean. For Jacob, that meant a robe, something dark, and imposing, because Jacob was Jacob, and there was no changing that old man.

She waited for each of them to be seated, and leaned back in her grandiose chair as she watched them. They knew what this meeting would be mostly about, and it was not the squabbles over the Mirrden district.

“My Primogen,” she said, “I fear yet another source of frustration has crept into my city.” They all nodded. “A hunter, named and known, has journeyed far in pursuit of Azamel. This Jeremiah has hunted Begotten and other beasts for many years, decades, and he brings his hate and loathing to Dolareido.” Natasha had informed her of every detail of Jacob’s conversation with the old monster; no doubt the old Nosferatu knew it too, even as he also told her of Jeremiah before hand.

“We should have gotten rid of her before this Jeremiah fucker showed up,” Garry said.

Michael shook his head. “She’s strong. Getting rid of her would have been a violent affair, and would have cost Kindred lives.”

The Carthian shrugged. Like two dogs trying to intimidate each other, these two Gangrels, forever looking for weakness in the social armor of the other. “You’re the one who’s lost Kindred in this mess. Barry was his name, right?”

“You suggesting this problem isn’t your concern?” Julias said.

“... no, it’s my concern. What I’m saying is, we should have seen this coming.”

Maria raised a hand, like she was parting the ocean, instead of squabbling men. “A calculated risk was made. We didn’t—”

“And now, the person who’s at fault for these hunters showing up like a god damn plague, hates your guts because you’ve set up explosives all over her damn home.” Garry threw up his hands, an interesting counter to Maria’s gestures. She was behaving calmly, but Garry, angry and emotional, was addressing the elephant in the room. Antoinette could appreciate that, as much as the volume of his voice grated on her.

Michael leaned forward, and raised the corner of his lip in a snarl. “We had to get her under control. And now she is. Unfortunately, no one expected her to bring a host of hunters with her, like a bleeding animal on the run.”

Antoinette sat back in her chair, and combed her hair over her shoulder as she watched and listened. The Invictus had made the situation worse for themselves, and for all Kindred, by making an enemy of Azamel. And yet, it was not a decision Antoinette could judge them too harshly for, as she would have done the same, given time.

“I’m actually more interested about the other hunter,” Jacob said. He leaned back in his chair, one leg folded over the other, and tapped a finger on the glass table. A puppeteer, making his puppets dance; this was no doubt the thoughts moving through the man’s mind, as always. The others noticed it too, and they grumbled and groaned as they turned to face the man. “I’ve been informed that Jeremiah has a partner, a true partner, unlike the hunters with him, who are basically his cannon fodder as far as I can tell. His true partner’s name is Angela.”

“Angela?” Julias said. “She’s the one who was torturing Jack, and the one he had to deal with to get out of there. She’s dead ... hopefully.”

“Ah, yes, that makes sense. Then I highly doubt she’s dead, if she’s anything like this Jeremiah, these psychopaths who presume themselves heroes, holy crusaders on their ridiculous quest to annihilate the world of monsters.” He laughed at the comparison. “Did you know she’s Athalia’s daughter?”

Silence befell the room. Vampires did not breathe, and their hearts did not beat; silence was normal for them. But the silence that followed Jacob’s words cut the room apart, and Antoinette feared her glass table would shatter under its impact.

“ ... that ... is news to us,” Julius said.

Antoinette nodded, and gestured to the group. “I think it is safe to say, that it is news to all of us. Are you sure of this, Jacob?”

“Yeap. Beatrice heard it from the man himself. So did that human you’re leaving free, by the way.” Eyeless tapped his fingers in ornate patterns, as if playing rather complicated music, while weaving his web. “It was a tasty detail I was very tempted to keep to myself, but I couldn’t help it, just had to share. What do you think Athalia will do, when we put her between a rock and a hard place, when we have to kill the daughter while her mother watches?”

“ ... you paint an unnecessarily brutal picture, Jacob,” she said. “If what you say is true, and what Jeremiah said was true, then perhaps Athalia will understand that her daughter is a threat. Perhaps she will be reasonable.” Even as she said it, she knew her words ringed hollow. Athalia did not seem reasonable, from her few encounters with her. And no mother, no matter how logical, reasonable, wise or intelligent, could let their child be murdered without great effort to convince otherwise. “Daniel, old friend, you know Athalia better than us. What do you think?”

The sheriff raised a gloved hand, adjusted his glasses, and folded his arms across his chest. “ ... I don’t know. I didn’t know she had a daughter. She’s lived a secretive life, leaving the city, returning occasionally ... She’s intelligent, but volatile, angry, hateful. Fifty fifty that she’ll understand, if we have to kill this Angela. Or at least, fifty fifty she won’t declare war on us if we do.”

Fifty fifty. Those were not chances Antoinette enjoyed, and many years of experience had taught her the folly of gambling, even when the chances were in your favor. You did not create a foundation by taking risks, you created a solid foundation by being more intelligent, determined, and patient than others. The uncertainties presented by Jacob’s information was chaos to her law; which, he no doubt knew, like a child delighting in dropping pebbles in the calm water to see the ripples.

“Assuming we can kill her,” Garry said. “Sure, in a straight fight it’d be easy, especially if Jack was able to handle her. Kid killed what, four, five hunters? Must be some real shit hunters we’re—”

Again, Maria raised a hand, cutting the Gangrel off and earning a frown from him. “Do not underestimate these hunters based on Master Terry’s success in escaping their torture. He has proven far more capable than most Kindred his age, Mister Tones, far more. He is to be rewarded for his advancement in skill, power, and for his determination in dealing with his kidnappers. And I note, that the boy has shown cunning and power most Kindred do not show until they are often twenty or thirty years embraced. You would do well to treat him with as much respect as you would your Carthian Miss Damor.” And, to sprinkle salt in the wound, she grinned at Garry as she leaned back in her chair, and folded her arms across her stomach. “My apologies, ex-Carthian, Miss Damor.”

Jacob choked on a chuckle. If a Kindred salivated when not blushing, Antoinette was sure Garry would have spit on the table in Maria’s direction. But with time, the man shrugged, and leaned back in his chair.

“Should we get the wolves involved then?” Garry said.

Julias nodded. “Eventually, they will be involved. It’s just a matter of when. Jack said the hunters were unaware of anyone named Avery, so it’s unlikely the hunters are aware Uratha are in the city. Why would they be, if they came for Azamel?”

“Well if your childe mentioned her,” Jacob said with a shrug.

“He said he lied about who she was once he realized they didn’t know who she was.”

Jacob tapped his temple several times. “That may have worked. It may not have. In either case, that bitch Avery may be useful.”

Antoinette slapped the table, enough to jar everyone and yank their heads her way. “Jacob, do not play this incident like a game. If you orchestrate an encounter between Avery or her pack and these hunters, purely for your selfish desires, you will damage the city, and the Masquerade along with it. Reign in your desire to see the woman suffer, and she will perhaps be a more strategic ally.” Wasted words. If Jacob was planning to lead Avery and this Jeremiah into a confrontation, he would no doubt perform such a feat with little trail for Antoinette to use to prove his involvement. Still, it was better she be upfront about her desire to prevent such actions, if only for the others to be aware of where she stood.

“If she’ll even be an ally,” Garry said. “She’s here to deal with that spirit mumbo jumbo crap, to bring balance to the Force and shit. For all we know, that could include all us Kindred dead and gone.”

“I thought you were friends with her?” Michael said.

“Friend is a strong word. More like, she doesn’t hate me, while she does hate you.”

Julias shook his head, sighing, and took out his phone to make a note. “In either case, I’ll ask Master Terry to talk to her about the situation. I’m sure Avery can be an ally in our corner, with a little incentive.”

Incentive? Antoinette smiled at Julias, and watched him close as he put his phone away. What incentive could he offer? Money? The Uratha cared little for money. Sex? It was certainly true that Kindred were both talented lovers, but also incapable of reproduction. If a werewolf wished to fuck a vampire, they could do so as much as their deadly, brutal bodies could desire. Oh, a delicious reminder, to ask Natasha about her latest endeavors with her new boyfriends.

“Please do,” Antoinette said. “Let us move onto the next topic. I am opening the door on requests for siring.”

“Are you now?” Jacob smirked, leaned in to set his elbows on the table, and grinned. “Want to build up numbers for the army?”

“No, old friend. It is true our numbers have dwindled, but young fledglings brought into the fold will be of little value in a war against these hunters. Jack is the exception, not the rule, and it would serve us all to remember that, before any feel inclined to throw their young neonates into the deep end.” She knew a time when some overzealous Kindred sired many progeny, in hopes of creating a personal army. It never ended well. “With the many recent deaths of Kindred, we are now tasked with tightening security and defensive measures, but also with rebuilding what was lost. Where we once numbered about three hundred Kindred, we have now dropped to about two hundred and fifty.”

Eyeless shrugged, and pulled on one of his knees to bring it up to his chest, heel to the chair seat. “Most dead at your hand, I might add, and all Invictus and Carthian.”

“Don’t twist the truth of it,” Maria said. “Lucas used the power of that nest to bend the will of malleable Kindred to his side. Lucas is to blame, not the Invictus, nor the Carthians, or the Prince for defending herself against his madness.”

His madness. Antoinette raised a brow, subtle, and watched the corpse woman as her gaze lowered to look at the glass before her. Powerful words to say, about a man who she once loved with all her withered heart.

“The rules are unchanged,” Antoinette said. “Speak with members of your covenant, those you give permission to sire must speak to me, and I will give them the final permission.” The group nodded with her words; the rules had not changed in decades, after all.

“Those two dolls you keep around looking to become Kindred?” Garry said.

“My ghouls are precious to me, Garry. They are not dolls. And, perhaps some day, they will join our second lives, but not now. No, I have no one I wish to sire.” She had not sired someone in a very long time, ages, since Tony. Such a long time ago, the memories were a haze, but she could recall ghostly images of her and her lover Tony, smiling, holding each other. So long ago.

The elders — and Julias — looked between each other, and waited. Not a one mentioned a desire to sire. But no doubt, some of their subordinates would wish to. As long as the Kindred with the desire came to Antoinette, requested the permission, and proved to be an intelligent and stable individual, she would give them permission. To be stable was important, and essential; many Kindred did not take to their second lives easily, and if they could not be a rock for their child, the vicious cycle continued. Beatrice’s sire was one such fool.

---

Her poor little Ventrue. She needed to hold him, hug him, stroke his head and tell him all would be well. She needed to comfort him.

And as she dug through her wardrobes, she realized how true that was, but not because her love needed it; or rather, not only because he needed it, but because she needed it as well. Since his disappearance, all she could think about was holding her love close and washing away the pains of his young life. Such trials on so newly embraced a Kindred must have been terrible, and she wanted to free his shoulders of such a burden.

But that would be foolish. Jack was not a child, he was a man, if a very young one. Trials were important, and it was Jack’s ability to persist through such trials that made him a force to be reckoned with. It was why Mire sired him. It was why Clara liked him. It was why Antoinette found herself drawn to him, for more than simply the honest gaze of his eyes that bared his soul. He would carry his burden, and that was to be admired.

She sighed, and reached into the wardrobe to withdraw a rather fanciful corset, something almost out of fantasy, with a bust carved to look like the hands of gargoyles to hold her breasts.

“What do you think, my pets?”

Ashley bounced once on the center couch of the changing room, and shook her head. “I’m sure Jack would love to be dominated with you wearing that. But you said you wanted to care for him tonight? Got the impression you meant sort of lovey-dovey tender stuff? Not really sexy’n’evil corset type stuff. Which I think makes more sense, cause from what you told me, poor guy must be exhausted.”

Antoinette sighed, but nodded. Despite Ashley’s poor descriptor, it was true Antoinette wanted to ease the boy’s pain tonight, not indulge rather playful kinks.

“... do ... you think Jack will even want sex tonight?” Julee said. She too sat beside Ashley, the two of them in jeans and t-shirts. They would not be joining Antoinette tonight, as the Prince wanted the Ventrue all to herself. “Maybe you should wear something that’ll be fine in case he doesn’t.”

Antoinette nodded and moved onto a different wardrobe. That was true, and perhaps Jack would simply want to hold her tonight, as she wanted to hold him. She needed something that would let Jack know she was all for letting the boy do nothing but rest against the softness of her bosom tonight. And yet, at the same time, make it clear she was more than willing to satisfy his sexual desires if they should arise.

She smiled as she withdrew a rather soft lingerie robe, somewhat see-through, and white in shade. The length reached her feet, and the material showed hundreds of solid white snowflakes of soft fabric, sewn into the see-through flowing waves of its length. Cashmere. Soft, and comforting.

Her two pets clapped twice and nodded in agreement.

Antoinette set it aside, and walked over to sit beside her two precious joys. “Though this night is to be between my love and myself only, I will let him drink of both of you first. The boy has been through much.”

Ashley nodded and bounced a couple more times before hopping off the circular couch. “Definitely, yeah, makes sense. And I heard he got out of that place ... with no hands? Like, got them chopped off? I mean ... wow.”

Julee winced with the words, and shuddered. “Kind of like that time you got all shot up, and that Damien man hurt you.”

Yes, that had been a painful night indeed. But memories of Damien were not ones she wished to dig through, not now. Only Jack mattered in this moment.

A beep on her phone on the nearby nightstand warned her of Jack’s approach.

“Come now my pets,” she said. The two girls hopped up and came up to her. “Go, meet Jack at the stairway, guide him down to the foyer, and instruct him to drink of each of you. And after he has had his fill, he is to come to me in the main bedroom.”

“Yes mistress,” they both said, nodding, smiling. They understood how important this was to her, and they were delighted to indulge her her desire to be Jack’s support.

Perhaps it would serve to consider, if perhaps either or both of her pets contemplated the embrace. She would need to find new ghouls to feed from, new pets, and it would forever change the dynamic of the bedroom. Would her ghouls be welcome in her bed with her beloved, once they were Kindred? Part of her suspected no, and that she would be far too protective of Jack to let other Kindred touch him as she touched him. But then, a part of her thought, perhaps, to let her pets pleasure her and her love, while they enjoyed the new strength and awareness that came with being Kindred, was delight and progression unto its own?

Thoughts for another time. Her love would be here in moments.

---

Her love looked exhausted, weak, and weary.

She had changed her main bedroom, switched blankets for white, added many large, soft pillows to the enormous bed, and added white silk to dangle from the bed's canopy. It was a realm of softness and white elegance now, to offset the trauma the boy had suffered. The plan had been to sit there, upon the edge of the bed, and wait for her love to come to her and enter her embrace. But, that would not do.

She got up from the bed, and walked over to her love, her robe trailing behind her along the marble floor, secured tight around her with its white belt. Her poor love, her poor little Ventrue.

The boy was standing, wearing black suit pants and a white shirt. But his eyes were downcast, and his limbs heavy, one hand raised to push and rest against the vault entrance of her master bedroom.

“Sorry,” he said, “if ... I seem a bit ... shitty, tonight. Just ... ju—”

She hugged him. She set her arms about the boy, and pulled him to her, tight against her, and pressed his head against her sternum as she wrapped him.

“You have been through a horrible nightmare, my love. Please, do not apologize. All I care is that you are well, and safe.”

“ ... thanks.”

She kissed his buzzed head once, twice, and thrice before she finally released her hug, and began to guide the boy toward the bed. Once they reached its edge, she slid her fingers down his chest, and started to unbutton his shirt. “We need not make love tonight, my little Ventrue. Please, I ... whatever it is you desire.”

He managed a small, weak smile, and a weaker chuckle to go with it. His body was limp, and though he had feasted upon her two ghouls, she could see he was still weary. Perhaps not with physical exhaustion anymore, but mentally, each of his motions labored and slow.

“Yeah ... I ... yeah. Guess I’m not feeling too manly for admitting it, but ... yeah I could really just ... use a shoulder ... to cry on.”

She bit her lip, and leaned down over the boy from behind, until her chin was upon his head, and her limbs circling him. “Not manly? Do not be foolish. Boasts of bravado and manly displays of silent endurance? Many a man has been destroyed by the social faux pas of expressing their emotions. And you know that.”

“Yeah ... just ... needed someone else to say it.” He turned and sat down on the edge of the bed, and with a little help from her, slipped off his pants. Now only in his boxers, he crawled backward a little further on the bed, and a little further still, until he was seated upon its center. “You look lovely tonight, by the way.” The weight in his eyes did not leave. If anything, they were pulling his gaze back down to the blankets, instead of her.

That would not do.

She climbed across the bed after him, and sat down upon her butt with her legs folded to one side. A lap, for her Ventrue, on an angle so he could rest his body along the sheets, and his back and head upon her lap. And he did, slowly, like dragging bags of sand behind him as he turned to set his bare shoulders upon her thighs, and his head near her hip.

She smiled down at her little Ventrue, and he smiled up at her, as best as he could muster she was sure. She set one hand upon his forehead, and lightly stroked his hair as her other set upon his abs, and caressed his body.

“Thank you, my love. And you look ... mournful.”

“Yeah, mournful is a pretty good word for it, I guess.” His arms were limp at his sides along the blankets, legs as well, and his head nudged into her stroking hand with gentle need. “Killed a lot of people this week.”

“ ... yes, I heard.”

“And ... had to do some ... painful stuff.”

“Yes. I am ... sorry my love, for more than just your pain.”

“Sorry?”

“Dolareido is my city. For hunters to hide within its walls and enact such cruelty, I am responsible.”

The small boy shook his head, raised his hand, and took hers where it sat upon his stomach. He held it, squeezed it, and stroked her knuckles with his thumb.

“It’s a city, not a fortress, Antoinette. And from what I know, it’s one of the best cities for Kindred. You’ve managed to make a great place for both of us to live. But, yeah, it’s not a fortress, you can’t expect to control everything.”

She frowned at the boy, but the touch of his fingers stroking hers settled the fire. The boy smiled up at her, lighter, and it melted her frown as she held his hand, while her other continued to stroke his head. Buzzed hair was a unique texture, and whenever she ran her hand against the grain of it, Jack's eyes closed in bliss. More than enough reason for her to continue.

“You are correct, my little Ventrue. Still, I cannot help but feel partly responsible. And worse, I cannot help but feel powerless. I admit a part of me would love to lock you up in my tower, so that you would be forever safe.”

“ ... convince the Invictus and I'd love to hang out here for a few nights straight, at least.”

“Good. Convincing them will be easy. And I would love to indulge you some more of my time than usual, my love, with these turn of events.”

“Yeah?”

“Oui, mon amour. And ... you said you wished for a shoulder to cry upon.”

“I did ... yeah.” He sighed, and turned his head a little to face more toward her stomach. “I killed them.”

“You had no choice.”

“Yeah, I know. And you don't need to convince me it was necessary, I know it was. Just ... I had to look into their eyes, you know? Crushed their minds, turned them into puppets. And then there were the rats, and—”

“I understand you summoned many to your aid?”

“Yeah, I used a bunch of them, swarmed the hunters, killed one of them just ... gnawed him to death with rats.”

That was gruesome, and terribly bleak. She felt the weight of his words pull at her, until her eyebrows drifted down to match it. She almost told him such cruelties were a necessity, to defeat your enemies with whatever tools you had at your disposal. But words were not needed here, only her ears.

“Horrible.”

“Yeah, it was. And ... fuck, getting my hands chopped off. I thought I could handle that pain, and I did, but...” He brought his hands up above his head to look at them, before he managed a small sob, and set them to lie upon his face. “I ... didn’t know ... I don’t want to do that anymore. I don’t ... want to deal with that anymore.”

Oh god. If her poor little Ventrue was going to start crying, she would undoubtedly start crying, and that was not something she had truly done in centuries. She slowly pried his hands away from his face, and set them back on his stomach so she could resume touching them, while her other hand once again stroked his head.

“Sorry,” he said, and he forced himself to smile up at her from her lap. “I’m being a baby. After what Damien and his group did to you? I still remember what you looked like, missing limbs, full of holes, and your voice didn’t even waver.”

“Jack, I am older than you can imagine, my sweet little joy. It is not a fair comparison. Never is a Kindred your age forced to deal with such hardships.”

“ ... I take a strange pride in that, I guess.”

“As you should. You have done and managed things that would have more than broken other Kindred of your age. Horrible things. And it hurts me to see you in such pain.”

“I’ll be fine.” His eyes closed, and he leaned his head toward her stroking hand as he relaxed against her lap. “I have you.”

She sighed, long, sorrowful and yet content, that the boy would put his heart in her care. “That you do.”

This was what she wanted. This was, as far as her eyes and her instincts could tell, what Jack wanted as well. The boy simply lay there, resting, eyes closing more as she stroked his head, caressed his ears, and massaged his body with her other hand. Yes, little Ventrue, let your pain melt away.

It was twenty minutes, before she noticed the creases in Jack’s forehead, and the hard clench of his jaw, completely fade away. Exactly as she planned, and all she could have hoped for, to watch his stress disappear, at least a little of it, as she held him, touched him, and smiled for him. For him to let himself be so vulnerable with her, so open, pain laid bare and misery exposed? She loved him, loved him for his honesty, loved him for so many reasons.

The wounded soldier fantasy. Such a cliché that it made her smirk to herself. Had she known that she would ever succumb to its juvenile but poetic allure, she would have denied it. But now, it was simply love.

“I trust Ashley and Julee helped fill your belly?”

“Yeah, thank you for that. I mean, I’ve been fed a few times since the incident; Julias took care of me. But ... yeah, I was still feeling drained, and I greatly appreciate your help.”

“You are most welcome, my love.”

“ ... I love you.” He shifted his head in closer, and rested his cheek against her lower abdomen.

“I love you.” Such powerful, pleasant words, that always forced her old, withered heart to flutter with new wings.

“And ... this is really soft.” He turned his head slowly, slightly, just enough to rub his nose against where the robe covered her stomach.

“It is cashmere.”

His head turned, and his nose pressed up against the underside of one of her heavy breast. “This is really soft too.”

She smirked, chuckled, and leaned down to kiss the boy’s forehead. Which of course, as the boy’s head was pressed to her belly, squashed his face underneath her breast.

“Do you wish to make love, my little Ventrue?”

“I ... not sure, really. Kind of torn. Part of me wants to do nothing but sit here, and just ... rest, rest on you, rest with you.”

“And I would be glad to have you rest upon me, little Jack.”

He smiled up at her, a touch of life returning to his dead eyes. “Part me thinks, maybe, sex would be a great way to take my mind off of this stuff instead. And sex lets me be closer to you. I love being closer to you.”

The desire to be closer, when already close enough to touch, was a delightful ache she knew all too well with her love. She raised her hand from his stomach, and tapped her chin a few times. “Perhaps you should do both? Please, lie here with me, relax, do nothing, and let me take care of you.”

He sighed, each breath useless to a Kindred, and yet so important, so personal how each wavered slightly as the boy again crested on emotional strife. But after a few moments to think about it, he smiled as he handed control to her.

“Yeah ... ok. That sounds perfect.”

It was perfect. She smiled down at her precious little Ventrue, and slid her hand down his stomach to find his boxers. With a little cooperation, she slid them off and tossed them to the floor, so the boy lay naked across the bed, his head and back upon her lap.

She blushed life for him, and kissed the air as she smiled for him. He blushed life as well, and pushed himself a few inches further up onto her lap. His head would have fallen off of her leg, if she did not slip her arm behind and underneath his head, to cradle it against her breast.

Her other hand reached across her chest, and tugged at the robe to loosen its hold, until the robe's bosom was loose about her sternum. She pulled the fabric aside to expose her breast nearest Jack's face, and held him snug to her as she leaned forward slightly so the softness of it pressed to his lips.

His gaze melted, his eyes closed, and he kissed the softness of her. More than kiss, he snuggled into her, against her lap and belly, against her arm cradling his head, and pressed his lips and nose to her as he took her nipple into his lips.

That was all it took, to light her body on fire. She shivered, perhaps trembled a little, as she watched her delicious lover suckle on her breasts, and gazed upon his small body, adorable, and yet defined with lean muscle, so terribly inviting. And she watched how he was relaxed against her, how he was vulnerable and precious, as he suckled and kissed her. To see him so was an utter delight, and she let out a quiet, gentle, long moan as the boy offered her nipple several roaming licks. It felt wonderful, little sparks of bliss that danced along her swelling skin, and tickled their way into her core.

She looked across the boy's body, his delicious, hard abdomen, and down to his rigid shaft. Hair trimmed to nothing, nothing blocked her eyes from admiring the sight of the veined girth rising, and rising, until it came up and over to nearly rest upon his stomach. She reached out for it, and almost mewled as she took its base into her grip.

With one arm and hand holding the boy to her breast, and the other gently encircling his cock, she again released a quiet, long moan, and began to stroke his length. Slowly, very slowly, each inch of his shaft she teased and played with, fingers circling and dancing along its underside as she played with her love. There was no rush, and tonight was about relaxing, melting, letting the boy fall into tranquil bliss as she took care of him. She wanted to take care of him, to let his pains fall away, to feel him unwind within her embrace.

But, as much as her intention was to pleasure her love, she could not ignore the growing heat in her body. His lips, circling her areola, bathing the swollen flesh in kisses and loving, tender licks, was all too pleasurable. Forever obsessed with her breasts, the boy played with them, massaged and caressed and kissed them at every opportunity. With time, he learned how to draw more of her subtle, hushed moans with his breast play, and she had encouraged it. And now, there was no denying that the sparks of pleasure were growing stronger, radiating outward from her breast and down her body until she felt the pleasure between her legs. She was wet.

“My breasts grow sensitive, little Ventrue.”

He pulled away, and smiled up at her as he nudged his nose into the softness, until it spilled over half of his face. “Should I stop?”

“... no. Please, more.” She reached out for his further arm, and guided his hand to slip past the robe, and to her other breast.

He needed little encouragement. Roaming fingers began to caress her, tender and exploring, each digit tracing gentle lines along the underside of her breasts. He cupped its weight, experimenting with how it overflowed his hand, and he massaged it with the softest touch as he did. But soon his fingers found her nipple, her swollen, puffy areola, and he traced its circular shape before offering it gentle tugs, and only the lightest of pinches.

The little rascal managed to crack open his eyes a bit, and smile up at her. Those green, beautiful eyes, melting away, closing once more as he snuggled into her, and suckled on her.

“Forever infatuated with my bosom, my little Ventrue. There is much more I could do for you, besides simply letting you kiss my breasts. Perhaps dance upon your cock, sheathed inside me, and rain delights upon you?”

“Maybe ... later? Just, for now ... just want to ... regress a little, be childish, you know. And ... your tits are so big.”

She laughed, and nudged his lips back to her breast with her cradling arm. She did not want him to stop. Her skin was tingling with bliss, each minute the boy spent kissing her nipple filling her with rising warmth, until she could feel more than a little of her juices on her sex. All the while, she stroked his length, never enough to bring him toward orgasm, but more than enough to be pleasant, and soothing. The feel of him, his cock in her hand, his body snug to hers, was intoxicating, and she shivered as another spark of bliss filled her chest.

And then another spark, and another. A short pant escaped her, just a soft little sound, before she set her hand onto his stomach, and let the pleasure fill her. Jack's eyes opened, but she had trouble meeting his gaze as her eyes half-closed in the bliss of orgasm. The warm sparks filled her chest, reached her sex, and pleasure flowed outward through her body, until subtle tremors danced upon her legs. She cradled the boy to her, and managed a smile during the bliss of it all.

“I am ashamed,” she said. “Here it was my wish to ease your pain, and yet ... you pleasure me.” She sighed openly, almost loudly, and let out a groaning moan as another spark of bliss worked through her core and down to her thighs. For many, many months now the boy had pampered her breasts, and with each night she found them growing more and more sensitive to his play. Or, perhaps, the boy was simply becoming more skilled.

Jack stared up at her, shock written into his face. She came from her breasts, from her nipples, and he could see it.

“Whoa.”

“Ah, do not stare so hard. Is it so shocking? You play with my breasts without end so constantly ... it was bound to happen sooner or later.” She almost blushed. Almost. Such sexual explorations were not new to her, but it had been a very, very long time since someone had brought her to climax from her breasts alone. Her whole body refused to stop tingling, electricity upon her skin.

“Can I ... keep going?”

Another chuckle escaped her. She reached across his body to find his nose, and tapped it with her finger twice before setting her hand upon his pelvis. “Please.”

And as she watched the small man’s eyes light up, she smiled, and held him to her so his lips could envelop her nipple once more. She shuddered, the sensitivity of orgasm only just beginning to pass, and now replaced anew with more suckling.

Her grip upon the boy’s cock tightened, and she began to stroke him in earnest. A drop of precum raised to the tip, and she sighed joy as she pressed a finger to it, and spread it along his exposed glans. Soon the ripe, swollen head of his shaft was coated with it, and she again resumed stroking his length, the new lubricant allowing her fingers to gently nudge and massage the base edge of the bulbous tip.

Through it all, his suckling continued. He started softer this time, perhaps to give her sensitive body a moment to recover, before he started to suckle harder. Lips pulled and tugged at her nipple, before drifting away to plant kisses along the contours of her breast. He came back to her areola, licked it, set more kisses upon it, as his hand began to caress her other breast once more.

A second orgasm did not take long. She cradled her man, held him close, and let go of his shaft to slip her hand about his waist and hold him tighter to her as again, she came. A tremble, a quiver, and her breasts shook, heavy weight and softness shaking against him, his lips, and his hand. She was so terribly wet, and it only grew worse as the boy kissed her breast while she came for him.

Stimulation growing a touch too much, she eased his head down so her nipple was out of reach of his lips by an inch. He smiled at her, and kissed the underside of her breast as she climaxed, each passing minute leaving behind more of the melancholy he had brought with him into her chamber. She returned his smile, and gently eased the boy off of her lap so he was lying upon his back in the center of the bed. She found one, two, eight pillows, and placed them about his arms and behind his back and head to lightly prop up his torso, so that he may relax, and watch.

She kept the robe on. Such clothes play was always a delight, and she laughed as she found the boy's eyes looking at how the robe hugged to her, its belt tight but its chest now loose so her breasts were free. All the better, as she crawled over him, set her knees outside his, and her hands along the blankets beside his shoulders. Her breasts dangled over his face, and she shivered as she leaned down enough to run the heavy, sensitive masses against his lips. He got the game quickly, and did not move his head even as he opened his mouth to kiss her breasts as she slid one over him, and then the other.

A silly game. It made her chuckle, and feel young again; he was good at that, her little Ventrue. She slid further back, lowered her body further upon his, and leaned forward so gravity pressed her breasts to his pelvis. His cock stood at forty-five degrees toward him when this hard, this aroused, and she exploited it, letting her breasts fall with their weight to encircle and bury the rigid shaft. With her knees still outside his and her thighs pressing his legs together, she had more than enough leeway to simply kneel there, ease her body back and forth, and let the angle of his cock guide its path within her bosom.

“Your breasts are so heavy,” he said. She could see his body relax more and more, tense muscles easing into the pillows she set for him, his expression softening into an almost half asleep gaze. Perfect. To hold him at such a precipice of relaxation and arousal was her goal after all, to bring him to climax, while at the same time, letting him sink into comfort and tranquility.

“And now, I confess, very sensitive.” It was no lie. How she let gravity bury his cock between her breasts caused her rocking to lightly nudge her nipples against his abs. They were swollen, very swollen, engorged and tingling and filling her core with the sparks of bliss. She would not cum from anything less than the boy’s lips and fingers upon them, but still, the act of massaging his cock with her breasts was tingling and pleasant as her nipples grazed his abs. Far too sensitive now, but once she recovered, she would want more.

“So I should ... play with them more often?”

“My love, you cannot do more than always.”

“I don’t always ... ok yeah I guess I do always.”

More chuckles. She leaned a little further forward, and brought her chest down toward his body just enough to completely bury every inch of his cock within the soft confines of her breasts. More than large enough to spill over his abs, pelvis and sides, she trapped each inch of his length within the depths of her bosom, and kept him there. His glans was coated in his precum, and as she eased her body back and forth, more joined it, wetting her skin.

It took time to bring the boy toward orgasm this way. Without the proper grip or strength of her fingers or mouth or insides, only the heavy softness of her breasts pressing and surrounding his cock, spurred by gravity, the stimulation against him was gentle. Gentle was enough, enough to have the boy sighing bliss, moaning it, and for more and more drops of precum to coat her breasts as she edged him toward orgasm. Slowly, so ever slowly.

She shivered as she settled back, rested her weight on her ass against his shins, and looked down at where his cock poked out from her breasts. No motion, no more movement, she simply watched, and licked her lips as another drop of precum rose to the tip of his swollen glans. She did not touch it, but instead, let it build on its own, until soon the clear, viscous liquid dripped down onto his abs where they met her breasts. More, she wanted to see more. His body fought for stimulation, cock twitching and pulling toward his abs, begging to be touched, but she would not, and she smiled down at the delicious thing as more, and yet more drops of his precum leaked out of him. A small pool of it began to form near his navel, a testament to his need. Poor boy, gravity was enough for her breasts to squish against and tenderly caress his cock, but not enough to push him over the edge.

It was not until she leaned in, and began to suckle on the head of his cock, in much the same way he did her breasts, that Jack groaned openly, and came.

He flexed his core, and let out a more obvious moan as his eyes half-closed not with calmness, but bliss. And as he did, she lifted her head, and pressed her arms together against the outside of her breasts, so that they hugged tight to his cock. Now, each gentle rock of her body provided proper, tight friction against his cock as his cum gushed out of him, and into the valley of her breasts.

“That ... is ... perfect.” If the boy had not melted before, he was certainly melted now. He struggled to keep his eyes on her, but she could tell he did not want to miss watching, to not see how with each gentle rock, more of his cum dripped out from the crease of her breasts and onto his abs. More, and more, warm, wet, the thick white fluid flowed into the cushioned valley she created for him, until she felt how his cum coated the entirety of where her breasts were squashed against each other.

She continued to rock her body, keeping every inch of him hidden inside her cleavage, until at last the final squirt of his cum coated her. Only then did she cease pressing her breasts together, and again resumed gently rocking her body back and forth over him, so only gravity let her breasts squish around his cock. Cum dripped from her, and covered the boy’s pelvis as she swayed for him.

“Such a delightful mess.” She shivered joy as she looked down, and admired how much he had coated her. Still hard, and the angle created a pleasant sight of his cock poking out from between her breasts, the wet pillows easing back and forth and spreading the mess. “Were Ashley and Julee here, I would have them clean my breasts as I sat upon your cock.”

He quivered a few times, and managed to raise his head up from the pillows enough to look at her more directly. “Sorry, I drained them pretty good. Like ... you just did me.”

“Ah but you are still hard.” She crawled forward, sat her dripping wet sex along his wet abs, and grinned down at him as she looked down at her cum-soaked breasts. “Perhaps instead of Ashley and Julee, I shall do it.”

“I uh—oh ... god.”

She grinned at him, almost beaming with bliss at the sight of his pleasure. She slid back, and started to ease her soaked pussy against his equally soaked cock. Ah, the sensation of his wet, hard girth opening her, the unique texture of an aroused man's shaft, its hard body yet soft skin slipping into her, soaking her with his cum. She inched herself back slowly, until she sat upon his pelvis with the boy fully sheathed inside her. A favorite position of hers to be sure, to sit upon her love, hold him inside her, and control the pace of their love making. As much as Jack had become a talented lover, she was unrivaled.

And like this, she could indulge her vanity. She grinned down at him, his starstruck gaze, and raised her hands to her hair. Arching her back, she jutted out her cum-covered breasts, little droplets of it running down their curves and onto her stomach, and she combed her hair back with her fingers. His trembles told her how enraptured he was, and again she chuckled as she slowly, teasingly, brought her hands down to her breasts.

She cupped their heavy weight, let the size of them spill over her palms, and guided one of them up to her mouth.

“So I just sit here and ... watch you be the most erotic and beautiful thing in existence.”

“But of course.” She grinned all the more evilly with her eyes as she ran her tongue along the surface of her breast. Pleasant tingles returned, and she lightly squeezed on the boy's cock as she felt the pleasure return. With several drops of his cum upon her tongue, she captured the boys eyes, held them, his green into her red, and swallowed down his seed.

“You're going to kill me.”

“Oh? Whatever do you mean?” Again, she ran her tongue down what parts of her breasts she could reach; which was much of the mountain of softness. And with each lick, she kept his gaze, and grinned her succubus eyes at him as she eased another wave of his cum into her mouth. There was no avoiding how her chin and lips pressed to her breasts with each lick, and soon much of the white seed was on her jawline and neck. So much, enough to almost be dripping off of her chin.

Jack set his hands on her thighs, and stared.

It was only a Kindred's seed after all, and it would fade into the tiniest traces of ash in five, perhaps ten minutes. And for that time, she could play with the boy's arousal, bring it to bursting once more without so much as a thrust.

She brought her nipple into her mouth, and suckled, holding her breast with one hand, while her other hand massaged her free breast, trailing lines through his cum and caressing the warmth into her hard nipple. And as she smiled down at the boy, she continued to suckle, and kiss, and lightly lick around her engorged areola, swallowing his cum and letting much of the white fluid coat her lips. She felt the tingling return, the sparks of bliss from having her nipples pampered, caressed, and teased. The pleasure worked through her, filled her chest, and as much as she had planned to hold still during the visual feast for her lover, she started to ease her hips back and forth.

It was almost embarrassing, how quickly she felt the pleasure start to build again. She forced herself to slow down, used her many years of practice and patience to bring the joys to a crawl, to bask in the boy's wide, entranced gaze as she played with herself, and tasted his cum and her skin. There had been many times in the distant past she had enjoyed her breasts on her own, massaged her nipples, kissed them, brought herself to near orgasm, and sometimes into it. Hazy memories from a time long gone. Seeing the look in the boy's eyes as she masturbated with her breasts though, perhaps she should enjoy it more often.

Soon his cum started to fade, and she at last let go of her breasts as she found herself so close, so very close to climax. To be on the edge, to feel her inner muscles squeeze on the boy in need, to feel her juices soak his cock, and to feel her thighs press to him in anticipation, it was all so perfect.

“My breasts are clean once again,” she said, and she ran her hands along them to prove it. “And ... I am ... so very close, my little Ventrue.”

He held out his hands for her.

She sighed openly, lovingly, and let her body fall forward toward him. Her hands found the pillows he rested upon, and she put her weight onto them as she let her breasts dangle underneath her, the heavy weights becoming teardrops over his face, each teardrop larger than his head. Jack opened his mouth, and where she had once been suckling, he began to suckle, pulling her nipple into his mouth with more force than before. One of his hands found her other breast as well, and began to massage her other nipple, pinching it lightly, but not so gently anymore. Enough to send those sparks of bliss through her breasts and into her chest, down through her core and into her pelvis, where bliss flooded outward and down her legs into her toes.

She began to orgasm, rocking waves of bliss working through her as she trembled over Jack. Not a sound from her, only pleasure, her pussy squeezing his length like a vise until she could feel more of her juices leaking from her. She forced her eyes open, but she could only manage a tiny crack through her eyelids. Enough, it was enough to gaze upon her lover as she came upon him, enough to see his closed eyes, his face awash with relaxed joy. He devoured her, suckled upon her, massaged and caressed her, and she melted into his touch.

“S ... stop ... please...”

Immediately the boy let her breast go, and his head relaxed onto his pillow. “Sensitive?”

“Oui. Very.” She leaned in closer, squashed her breasts to his chest and neck, and craned her neck down to kiss the much shorter boy’s head. “I shall let you feast upon me more, soon. But for tonight, please, lie back, and relax.” She leaned in closer still, until her weight was fully upon him, and her tall body covered his in shadow, her lips by his ear. “Relax.”

The boy’s breath came in pants, excitement filling him, and she chuckled as she kissed his ear.

“I said to relax, mon amour.” She started to grind her body against him, pressed her breasts to his chest as her hips began to move back and forth. Wet, so deliciously wet. And the boy was nearing orgasm as well; she could see it in his muscles that refused to completely relax, and his expression that refused to ease.

“Relax, yeah...”

There. All it took was a little coaxing, a little guidance. She planted more kisses upon him as she slowed down yet again, kissed his ear, his buzzed hair, and squeezed her pussy upon his length to edge him closer to orgasm, without ever crossing it. Each stroke brought him pleasure, and with each stroke, she ran her hands up and down his arms, his neck, his buzzed hair, always slow and gentle. Tranquility was the theme tonight, and she milked the boy with total serenity, until he had no choice but to relax into the blankets, and go limp.

Only then did she start to work her hips faster, and only then did she sit up so she could bury every last inch of him into her. She danced upon his cock, set her hands upon his chest, and began to thrust harder. Certainly not rough sex; in fact, she kept the pace quite slow, only barely faster than before. But that was fast enough.

As orgasm danced in the distance, coming closer and closer, she pressed her hands to Jack's chest, and used him for leverage as she drove her hips back and forth in deep thrusts. Her breasts bounced and jiggled with the impacts, and Jack stared at her as she fucked him. His arms were no longer holding her thighs, now limp along the blankets between her legs and the pillows. His head was much the same way, except now it bounced lightly against several pillows with each of her thrusts.

Delightful friction, her swollen clitoris pressing to him with the forward angle. But she wanted a stronger orgasm, and brought her body a touch more forward, so the angle of his cock pointed it toward her navel. Perfect. Delicious pressure, each drive back of her hips causing his cock to hit that spot, to send pulses of pleasure out from her pelvis, and again build the growing warmth of orgasm.

“If you ever feel weary my love, please, come lay beside me, and let your troubles fade away as I tend to you. Let me care for you with the softness of my body.”

“You're uh ... starting to sound like a wife in the 1930s.” He smiled as he said it, again struggling to keep his eyes on her as they drifted half-closed. “Very 1930s. Think I read something like that on a vintage poster, one of those colorful, super sexist ones.”

She laughed, and reached up to jut out her breasts once more as she combed her fingers back through her hair. “I was alive in such a time, my love. Women were to be seen, not heard. It was a man's world, and it was a woman's job to please him.” She rolled her eyes. Such games she and the boy played, and they both chuckled as she again combed back her hair, except this time emphasizing it with dainty swishes of her fingers, as women in such times were encouraged to do. “But I do not lie. It brings me joy to see that I may ease your pains. Great joy.”

“ ... thank you.” His eyes, renewed with weight, but weight of a caring nature, of a sort where she could feel the openness of his soul laid out for her to drink from. Eyes of love.

Oh, her little Ventrue, how those eyes stirred her. She brought hands back down to the blankets around his shoulders, and arched her back as she picked up the pace. His eyes closed once more, but opened yet again, just a crack, just a sliver, enough so he could watch her as she bounced upon him. And, as he began to fill her with his cum, his eyes raised into his eye sockets, and waves of pleasure at last forced them closed.

She needed only three more strokes, before she too was upon climax. As the tingling waves filled her, curled her toes and forced her thighs to squeeze around the boy between them, she leaned herself down upon his small frame. Again she squished him beneath her breasts, and as his eyes drifted open, she kissed his forehead, and continued to ease her hips back and forth. Each gentle sway of her body earned a gush of his cum to fill her, and each clench of her insides earned a wave of her own bliss to join it.

A perfect, utterly perfect way to climax. She held her man, buried him in her softness, and milked his cum until she felt it join her own juices where they connected.

“My insides quiver, little Ventrue. How does it feel?” To talk mid orgasm? Another fun game, and she smiled as she forced her bliss to continue, more clenching of her muscles spurred by her efforts. Each, no doubt, stimulated and caressed the cock inside her, and Jack trembled as her play earned another gush of warmth to leak out of her.

“ ... just want to ... lie here ... forever.”

“One of the few joys of being undead, my love. Forever is within our grasp.” Her orgasm began to fade, as did Jack’s, but through it all she held him, pressed her body upon him, and planted several more kisses to his forehead. Only when the random convulsions of her muscles upon his member ceased, did she sit up straight, and grin down at her little Jack.

“You offering me eternity here, in your bed?”

“You did say you wished for it.” She reached behind her, set her hands on her plentiful ass, and pushed forward on it to bring her hips forward. The angle of course pushed out her breast, but that was also a part of the game, to slay the boy with her body, visually and with its touch, as she began to dance upon his cock. To drag out those last few tingles of orgasm aftershocks was a skill she had mastered, both for herself, and for her love.

“I did...”

The boy’s words sent her withered heart into a flutter, and she stopped her dance as, slowly, gently, the sexual energy of it all drained away, replaced with an overwhelming need to hug her love.

So, she did. She slid off of his softening member, and lay beside him upon the blankets and pillows. Still in her robe, she pulled the boy close to her, and turned him enough so he could face her.

“Such words are dangerous, little Ventrue, and women are particularly vulnerable to them.”

“I—”

“Non non, no words. We have eternity to test these waters. And, I do sincerely hope, my love, that we will spend that eternity together.”

~~Jack~~

He wasn't sure what he did to have deserved such an amazing woman in his life. Was this how Roger Rabbit felt? He'd always envied that rabbit when he was younger, when his mom showed him that movie. Jessica Rabbit woke some strange feelings inside him.

The amazing body Antoinette had was only the tip of the iceberg; though, he did have to wonder about it. She was very tall, and the white hair and red eyes, along with her early-thirties complexion, were a weird mix, biologically. People from Europe at that time period didn't look like that, not even in the slightest, from the height, to the tight waist and massive breasts, to the particularly unusual hair and eyes. She was Ordo Dracul, known for their experiments and search for secret knowledge of what vampires were on a grander scale, so maybe that had something to do with it? When he'd first talk to her and had asked, she said it may have had something to do with Dracula, or something.

But, yeah, tip of the iceberg. It wasn't the ridiculously awesome body she had that was making him relax into her, it was how she wanted to hold him, embrace him, and give him a place to rest his head that was melting him. God he needed that. May not have been the manliest thing, to need someone's shoulder to lean on, but he didn't give a shit. He couldn't imagine a better place to be right now, then in Antoinette's loving arms, and how accepting she was of him. An intelligent, wise, confident woman, who'd never say anything as absurd as 'man the fuck up' or 'walk it off' or any of that shit. Someone he could just be a young guy with, who was having a really fucking hard time.

She cradled his head, and held him to her as he hugged her back. He didn't cry; one step away from it, but crying wasn't really what he needed right now. He needed a soft, safe place to rest, and she wanted to give him that. It was perfect.

They held each other for an eternity; or, twenty more minutes. Still perfect, relaxing, and he took a deep breath as he let the tension fall away. He shivered a few times, some trembles as the body struggled to let go, but, as Antoinette stroked his head and rubbed his back, he melted into heaven.

Chapter 53

~~Jack~~

There was still plenty of time before sunrise, and Antoinette felt like pampering him a bit more. To the pool they went, but instead of using the pool, they stepped down into the hot tub.

“I’m ... pretty drained, Antoinette,” he said. “Came twice, you know?”

She laughed, and reached out to touch his nose as she stepped into the water. “I am sorry, my love, but I know you drank of both my ghouls only a couple hours ago. I suspect you have much sexual energy left for me to feast upon.”

“I ... I mean, yeah I guess.” There was usually some more give and take in their sex, but tonight, Antoinette wanted to do all the giving. He’d asked if she’d wanted him to do more for her, but she’d insisted she wanted to treat him a thousand times over. He could only resist that sort of temptation for so long.

The water level of the hot tub was set to shallow, so when he sat in one of its seats, the water stopped at his knee, and cut halfway along his thighs, covering his testicles but not reaching up to his shaft. Antoinette got on her knees in the water, smiled up at him as she wet her hair, and pulled the long, soaked, heavy strands of white over her breasts. Wet hair, god he loved wet hair.

“I have opened the door for covenants to begin siring again, my love.” She crawled through the water toward him, put her hands on his knees, and eased his legs apart. “Do you have any kine that you wish to see enter their second lives?”

“Um, n-no, not really. And I’m way too young for that, don’t you think?” Though, it would be an interesting thought, to maybe sire some of his family. Recipe for disaster, but the thought was there nonetheless.

He gulped as he stared down at the tall, busty queen while she crawled in closer, and got snug between his thighs. She had to use her hands to lift her breasts, and set them onto his pelvis, each pressing against his legs with his cock between them. With how close she was, and him leaning back like he was, her stomach brushed up against his testicles, and his cock pointed up from between the two enormous, heavy pillows.

“Far too young. I would not encourage you to consider siring until you were at least twenty years embraced, and preferably fifty, to enter your ancilla years. But, you grow strong, quite quickly my little Ventrue.” While her heavy breasts pressed down on the groove of his leg and pelvis each, weight causing them to mold and fit tight to him, she smiled at him as she got comfortable. So, utterly, huge, that gravity caused them to squish and spread out over his lower abdomen, his inner thighs, and his pelvis, their size burying almost every inch of his cock between them.

“Still think it might be a bit beyond me. And I wouldn’t have a clue on who to sire.” He swallowed again as he watched her, how she got comfortable, and adjusted where her wet hair covered parts of her breasts like a dress. She was leaning very far forward, so her ass was in clear view behind her, and the delicious shape of it swayed as she got cozy against him.

“With time, years, you will find yourself involved in the affairs of kine, and some will impress you. You may find them worthy of the embrace.” She reached up, and set her hands on the sides of his waist, her elbows against the hot tub seat he was on. Her smile never faded as she leaned down, and planted a kiss on the head of his shaft where it poked up between her breasts. Instantly, Jack shivered as the pleasure sparks filled his cock, her lips easing back and forth in a slow, succulent kiss, until they wrapped around the base of his glans.

She had cum with those breasts earlier. Actually orgasmed. His suckling, his massaging, had made her cum from having her breasts and nipples played with. He was going to do that every chance he got from now on, but she wanted to pleasure him right now, keep it one sided. And now that she had him in her grasp, he was perfectly ok with that.

“And y-you?” he said. It was the game she liked to play, to keep talking while they had sex. She was a lot better at it than him.

She lifted her head, and pushed her chest forward a little using her knees and arms to brace herself. Using only the sheer size of her bosom, and how gravity kept it squished to his pelvis and thighs, she gently rocked her body back and forth, and tit-fucked him. Gentle, soft friction, each back and forth motion causing her breasts to lightly caress his cock with their weight and nothing more. Normally she used her hands, or squeezed her arms together, to make the contact much tighter. But tonight, she seemed intent on pampering him with soft, gentle sex.

He was pretty sure the next time they had sex, she'd flip the coin and do something far more dominant, dominatrix, but tonight, gentle was the name of the game, and he was loving it.

“Non, it is not something I have considered as of late. Not since Tony have I sired someone, and it will be quite some time before I decide to again.” She slid her hands down from his waist, and pressed her breasts together with her palms. God, his cock completely disappeared inside the mountains of softness, and he shivered as the skin of her breasts pressed against his swollen, ripe glans. Precum rose to the top, and as the woman softly kneaded her breasts together, more joined it.

Satisfied, she let her breasts go, let gravity again cause their massive size to conform along his pelvis, thighs, lower abdomen, and let the tip of his cock poke out from between them. Her lips found it, and she began to suckle on it once more, head inching back and forth so her lips could caress along its sensitive edge where his glans met the rest of his cock. More pleasure sparks, each causing his inner muscles to flex, and each sending warm tingles through his length until he felt the building waves of warmth underneath his testicles again.

The heat of the water on his testicles, as the busty woman bathed his cock with her breasts, was euphoric.

He didn't last long. She was right of course, about the belly full of blood; a powerful aphrodisiac when combined with the right stimulus, like a beautiful naked woman rubbing her breasts on your body. His eyes nearly closed, but he forced them to stay open, so he could look into Antoinette's eyes as she grinned up at him, and raised her head.

She brought her hands back to her breasts, pressed them together, and buried his cock in the softness of her body. The delightful friction of her soft skin rubbing against him, of her breasts hiding and covering his hard girth as it twitched with need, sent more waves of blissful sparks down his length, each earning a hard flex of his inner muscles, and each of them earning a gush of his cum into her cleavage.

"I understand the Invictus plan to promote you," she said as she kneaded her breasts together around him. "Not that the Invictus deal in a simple employee structure, as you know. But I am sure they will provide you with something, beyond fortune. Perhaps a title?" She didn't stop, hands tight on her breasts, making sure each gush of his cum was trapped, until it coated her skin and dripped down onto his abs.

“I ... I uh ... maybe?” He squirmed, wriggled a little, and became one with the seat as he collapsed against it while Antoinette continued to milk him, until his cum pooled into her cleavage, and trickled down over the sides of her breasts, and down strands of her wet hair where they traced the contours of her tits.

Only when the final gush of his cum leaked out of him did she ease up her grip. She smiled up at him from her place between his knees, a smile so warm he thought he'd dissolve into the water, melting away. She set her hands back on his waist, elbows to the seat, and began to gently rock her body back and forth, her cum-soaked breasts molding to his pelvis and thighs once more. His cock still stood upright, poking up from the mess of his cum, while trickling drops of the white fluid slid down off of their bodies and into the shallow, hot water beneath.

The feel of his cum being gently massaged onto his cock, post orgasm while everything was still sensitive, forced him to groan, and reach out to set one hand on Antoinette's shoulder. She turned her head enough to plant a kiss on his hand, before she took his hand in hers, both of them, and set them both on the seat beneath him. She held his hands there, under the water and out of the way, trapped in her grip, as she gently fucked him with her breasts. With both their hands on the hot tub seat, only the weight of her tits provided friction. Gentle, slow, tender breast sex. He was in heaven.

“We should celebrate once it occurs, my love. The Invictus, as always, will be slow to act on such matters. But in about a month or two I presume, you will be honored, and I expect on that night, to celebrate with you.” She leaned down, planted a few kisses on his cock, and some exploring licks too. “Perhaps you should enjoy a night with Julee and Ashley at your mercy? I will be there of course, but I will give you free reign to order them to do whatever you could wish.”

“I ... I admit ... that time the three of you were ... giving me a blowjob at the same time ... pretty amazing.” Three sets of lips, fighting for room on the head of his cock? Felt amazing, and watching Ashley take every opportunity she could to turn it into kissing Julee instead was like watching a boy’s sex dream come true.

“Understandable.” She worked her lips back and forth again, same as before, suction pulling at him and bathing his cock in bliss as her kiss massaged the sensitive skin. “I will leave the choice to you, my love. Anything you wish of them of them.”

“Anything?”

“Ha, anything within reason, but I suspect that will encompass anything you could want.”

So he could make Julee and Ashley do whatever he wanted. Kid in a candy store.

“So ... if I ... wanted one of them to ride me ... facing me ... and you sit behind them, and finger them and Kiss them while I’m inside them?”

She rolled her eyes, chuckled, and resumed the gentle rocking of her body. “Of course.”

“Or ... maybe ... I could lie down, head in your lap again ... and the girls each giving me a blowjob, and—”

“Jack, whatever you wish, they will perform. And I will join them ... to an extent, of course.” She chuckled, that womanly, dominatrix sorta chuckle, a chuckle that told him she’d only entertain requests to a point, before she took control. She did like to do that.

He could tell what she was up to, trying to put some zing back into him, get back that spontaneous, excited spark of his that he knew was suffering as of late. Well, he was a guy after all, and trying out crazy new things in bed was definitely a way to put some spark into him. And to offer him such bliss while currently massaging his cock inside a bed of breasts and his own cum, was catching him when he wasn't in a mindset to possibly say no, or be surly.

She let go of his hands, but he knew to keep them out of the way; it's what she wanted. Grinning, she raised her hands up, combed back her hair, and brought her hands down to press against the sides of her breasts. The soft mounds of perfectness were far too large for her hands to fully grasp, and her fingers partially disappeared into them as she squished his cock with them. Layers of his cum rose up from the tight contact, and trickled down the crevice of her tits once more, flowing down to land on his lower abdomen.

She started fucking him in earnest, faster, using his cum as a lubricant before it faded. Each tight squeeze of her breasts on him was heavenly, the cum-soaked skin gripping and massaging his cock, and sending more waves of bliss down the length of it as his glans disappeared into her cleavage.

He came again. So damn fast, but the sight was too intoxicating and alluring to not have him ready to burst just by looking at it. And of course, she was really, really good. His voice turned into pants, quiet groans, and he watched with wide eyes as another gush of his white cum flowed into her cleavage. She adjusted her grip, slowed down her thrusting, and smiled at him as she buried his cock until it vanished between her breasts. The slow, tight, massaging valley of her tits soon overflowed with his cum, and a small pool of it formed against her sternum, held by the slopes of their size. Hot, wet, tingling, he shivered as the pleasure sparks rippled outward from his legs, and flexing inner muscles caused another gush of his cum to spill onto her body. It trickled down over her skin as it overflowed, and lines of white traced along the outside contours of her breasts, to drip into the water.

When he finally finished, little aftershocks working through his insides, Antoinette chuckled, and sat back, heavy breasts falling off of his lap and jiggling against her chest. The shallowness of the water kept her bosom above the surface of it, and she smirked as she looked down at her bosom, and how it was covered in his cum, to the point some lines of the thick liquid were dripping off of the bottom of the heavy, teardrop-shaped mountains.

“Four times in one night,” she said. “I should let you feast of both my pets before our fun more often.”

“I ... yeah, I mean ... damn.” He tried to make eye contact with her, but it was really fucking hard when she was sitting right in front of him, enormous breasts weighing down on her chest, literally dripping of his cum. And he’d cum so fast the second time, the first coating was still there.

“I hope I have helped relax you, so that you may sleep well today.” She ran one of her hands down her chest to one of her breasts, and traced lines through the white cum, drawing circles onto her swollen nipple.

“I’m staying here to sleep until the city’s clear of these hunters, right? I’ll sleep well every day.”

“Good.” She stood up, and walked out of the hot tub. A minute later, she returned, and the water level of the tub started to increase, surface level rising until it reached Jack’s chin. She let herself sink below the surface until the water reached her shoulders, and washed away his fluids before she came back up.

“I have a confession to make,” he said.

“Oh?”

“I ... really, really love the look of wet hair.”

She burst into laughter, almost a giggle, and swam over to sit beside him. “Hardly a secret, my love.” Her arm found him, hooked around his shoulder, and pulled him to her.

He turned his head enough to snuggle into her side, chin near her breast, and sighed. She’d drained him enough that he could go the next five minutes this close to her tits without turning into a sex-hungry maniac. Five minutes he could spend snuggling into her.

---

They returned to her room, and climbed into bed. Still another thirty minutes until sunrise, but it was thirty minutes to hold each other, snuggle, and actually talk.

“No talk of the plights of Dolareido,” she said. “Talk of normal things, joyful or sorrowful, but of normal things, not of hunters or werewolves or monsters.”

He nodded. “Right, sure, I can do that.”

The two of them were facing each other, Jack in his boxers and Antoinette in a silk nightie, but not a see-through one though, thank god; needed to sleep at some point. She was more lying on her back, and Jack was on his side, his chest pressed to her side, and one arm draped over her stomach. Hers was hooked underneath his neck and was stroking his back. The whole night made him feel like a mix between a woman’s boy toy — no problem with that — and a wounded animal, being nursed back to health by the lovely nurse who found him.

“Been thinking about my family lately,” he said.

“Yes, I can imagine. You are newly embraced, after all.”

“Yeah, I guess. Little things just randomly slip in. I wasn’t very close with my sister, but my mom and I, we ... couldn’t have been more different. We weren’t close, but we weren’t far, either.” His mother was a dumb person, no way around that assessment. Dumb, with a big heart, and with zero desire to analyze reality; he, on the other hand, couldn't stop analyzing it. "She was an airhead."

Antoinette laughed, and her hand upon his back rose to find his head. Scratches, fingernails on the scalp, fingertips rubbing the buzzed hair. Euphoric.

"And you were close?"

"A little. Not sure why, we didn't have a single thing in common. But, I guess my constant complaining and unending attempts to make her do things more efficiently just washed off of her, water on a duck's back."

"I am afraid she and I would not get along then. Such types frustrate me."

"Yeah, she frustrates ... frustrated me too. I'd tell her that too, but she'd shrug and smile, ask me if I wanted some juice, as she was already pouring the glass." He laughed, and let his head fall, relaxed against the nook of Antoinette's chest and arm. "After dad died, she didn't grow bitter or pessimistic, like I did. She got sadder, yeah, and ... and it never really changed. I moved out a few years after that." Much of what he was saying, he'd already told her, as pure data for a conversation. This time it was different. This time it was him talking about his life because he wanted to share it with the woman he loved.

If she could remember the things that'd happened to her five hundred years ago, he'd love to hear about her life too. But, those long-as-fuck torpors elder vamps liked to take, to keep their blood-lust in check, fucked with their minds, supposedly. Maybe Damien's records might hold some information about her past? Doubtful, but there could be a hint about something, somewhere. Maybe they'd hold records about Viktor too? More likely, and worth asking about.

“And your sister?”

“Like repelling magnets, her and me. We never got along, but never really argued either. I ... ran into her, not long after my embrace.”

“ ... that is a very dangerous situation to be in, my love. If she—”

“She didn’t. I ... wiped her memory of our encounter.”

“You managed to wipe the memories of a kine, at that age?”

“ ... yeah.” Reached into her mind, broke it, warped it into a new shape, one with a convenient hole where that memory would have been. Probably the first time he noticed he was using the dominate discipline a bit easier than was expected of him.

“I am sorry that you had to do that, my love.” She hugged him, kissed his forehead, his lips, and his nose. “That must have been a painful experience.”

Yeah, it was. But as Antoinette kissed him, he kissed her back, and smiled at her. It was nothing he couldn’t handle, with a little support from his love.

---

---

~~Julias~~

“Jennifer Denver,” he said.

“Julias Mire.” Jen offered a small bow, and a big grin. She stepped into his mansion as well, once he motioned for her to enter. “And please, call me Jennifer, or Jen. The Circle cares little for last names. How may I bet at your service?”

“Oh, you work for me now?”

“No, but Jacob does suggest I learn to become friends with Kindred stronger than I, more influential than I. That’s you.”

Perfectly understandable, reasonable, and something he would expect a manipulative snake like Jacob to say. It made him laugh, and he motioned for Jen to follow him. She was wearing a dark business suit, knee-length pencil skirt and an undone jacket, white shirt underneath. It would have been odd with how boring it was, if not for how she had only the single bottom button of the shirt done so it was open, no bra, her sternum and the inner sides of her breasts exposed.

He couldn’t blame Triss for literally copping a feel of the woman; she bled sexual confidence, like a Daeva. Her body was a little softer than Triss’s, similar shape but with a touch less muscle, larger breasts, and no crocodile mouth or snake eyes. Same hair too, raven black down to the jaw, though Jen had half of it combed back behind one ear. Her brown eyes were forever both playful and calculating; reminded him a lot of Jacob.

And that was part of his worry. Jacob played the long game, and it wouldn’t have surprised Julias if Jen was manipulating Triss to get to him, in an effort to control him or sway his actions in some way. Time to test those waters too.

He opened the door to one of the living rooms, and once Jen stepped in, he closed the door behind them.

“Sit, please.” He slid into the chair at a table, folded one leg over the other, and set his hands on the knee, fingers netted together. A pompous pose, like a wealthy PhD involved in a conversation about the latest rendition of a famous play. Bombastic. It served the conversation’s purpose.

She grinned a sly grin, and slipped into the seat across from him. “A truly fancy room, Mire. How many living rooms does this home have?”

“Half a dozen, I think? Still haven’t managed to map the place out, might take a few more months of exploration.”

She chuckled, and he listened, and watched, for the telltale signs of misleads. The inflection was normal, and genuine. The change in direction of her gaze was normal, and genuine. The texture of the sound was normal, and genuine.

“I thought, perhaps, you wanted to talk about the troubles of Dolareido, these hunters that plague us,” she said. “But now, I’m getting the impression this conversation is going to be more personal.”

“Astute of you.”

“Thank you.”

“I wanted to talk about Beatrice.”

“Delightful.”

“You’ve managed to worm your way into her heart, in a strange way.” He watched, and waited, expression casual but every faculty he had available to him digging into the girl’s reaction.

The center of her eyebrow’s raised slightly, and her lips parted a sliver as her smile softened. “ ... really?”

Despite himself, a small smile sneaked its way onto his face as well. She wasn’t just glad to hear what he said, she was touched.

“Yes, your combination of honesty, sexual allure, and genuine interest in being her friend has worked. She may not realize it quite yet, but I can tell, she’d like to involve you in our relationship.”

Jen almost started to shiver, like a young girl excited to go out to a party. “I wasn’t sure she took me seriously. I admit I express my sexuality and enjoy it quite openly and often, and thought maybe it'd dissuade her."

"If she agrees, we'll both want you to tone that down. I haven't talked to her about this yet, but I imagine she'll want you to not sleep with any Kindred, or join other Kindred in sexual affairs, if you're going to join us under the sheets." Jen was a Ventrue after all, and she spoke a language he knew all too well: lawyer speak. Like negotiating a contract, he laid out the rules.

"Ah, poor Othello and Madison. But, yes, that makes sense. Honestly, if Triss really wants me in her bed, I think I'd be against sleeping with Othello and his ghouls or conquests anymore anyway. What about my ghouls though?"

"Yes, Triss tells me you have two ghouls of your own. Sleep with them as you like, they're yours, and you might not always be there when Triss and I decide to make love. I—"

"Make love." Jen swooned, and brought a hand to her sternum in a dainty 'catch me I'm about to faint' sort of way. "You two are so delicious together."

Julias smirked, and leaned back, unfolding his legs. "She's my everything."

Jen giggled. That deserved assessment, and he blinked once as he looked at the girl. A giggle, from Jen, when the topic came to romance? Like peeling an onion, this girl had layers he had not expected.

"She's become my best friend, Mire."

"I'm glad she has someone in her covenant. Far as I know, she wasn't friends with anyone in the Carthians. Not good friends, anyway."

“ ... and what of you, Mire?”

“Me? I think you’re an attractive woman, very attractive, Den—Jen. Call me Julias, by the way,” he said, and she grinned playfully as she nodded. “And I greatly appreciate that you are an intelligent person.”

“A shame we never became friends.”

“A shame.”

“Ugh, Julias! That wasn’t your queue to agree, that was your queue to offer ways we could.” She stood up from the chair, and stepped over to stand beside him. “I would be interested to learn your hobbies, your likes and dislikes, and perhaps share with you mine. I’m not looking to become a third wheel or tag-along, Julias.”

“ ... then what are you looking for?” Woman was surprising him every damn second now. Layers.

“I’m not like most girls. I’m not really interested in having a happily-ever-after ending for myself. Not interested in settling down, monogamy, or soul mates, or anything like that. But, to be friends, close friends, best friends, with two people who are? To share the bed of two lovebirds, my friends, as more than just a fling, but as something that will last? Call me weird, but that appeals to me greatly.” She leaned down toward him, and brought in her face until she was only inches from his. “Great writing fuel.”

He tried to smile, but after a while it turned into wonderment, eyes a bit wide and lips lightly parted. “You write?”

“I do. Don’t tell anyone, ok?” She set both her hands onto his shoulders, and slipped onto his lap, both of her legs off to the same side since she was wearing a skirt.

“What’re you doing, Jen?”

“I am ... how would the mighty Mires probably say it ... testing the waters?”

“You don’t need to worry about proving you’re attractive, I—”

“Not about attraction, it’s about connection. Triss is my best friend, but there will be three of us in that bed, and I can say without a doubt, that I would like to form a connection with you, Julias.” One of her hands found one of his, and she guided it to her chest. His fingers found her sternum where her shirt was open, and she smiled down at him from her perch on his lap as she nudged his hand to the side further, and further. Her shirt opened more, and soon his hand found her breast, its size filling his palm, and more.

“You’re going to seduce me to make a connection?”

“No, of course not. But, like I said, I’m not most girls, and how you and I will connect will be a unique experience.” She set her hand upon his where it cupped her breast, and guided it in a circular, massaging motion. Even when not blushing life, Jen’s body was beautiful, and her breast large, skin soft, and he couldn’t help but get drawn into how pleasant it felt in his hand. He also couldn’t stop picturing how alluring a sight it must have been when Triss had her claws on them. “For example, I would love to play poker with you sometime; I can tell you’d be great at it. And I wouldn’t even make it strip poker ... the first time.”

He chuckled, and relaxed. She wanted to be friends with him, a real friend, and not just a set of legs like kine often wanted to be. She wanted more. He had to respect that. Hell, it was exactly what he was hoping for, that this Jennifer Denver wasn’t just looking for a mindless lay; there was a reason he almost never slept with Kindred, after all.

He looked at her breast, and gently nudged his thumb along her nipple, a little larger than Triss’s, with no piercing. It looked amazing, with the open shirt of a great suit nudged aside for him to massage it. And, as Jen lowered her hand back to his shoulder, he did massage it, a little more, and a little more, until the woman made a quiet moan and a small shiver to go with it. Yeah, he couldn't blame his girlfriend for touching them.

There was no chance in hell he'd ever betray Triss, but he wasn't about to invite Jen into their bed without seeing her reactions, without looking into her eyes and fishing out any deception, manipulation, or disingenuous desires. Did she really want to be his friend, Triss's friend, and join them in the bedroom on that level, or was she just a smooth talker looking for a good fuck. The glint in her eye, and the warmth he found there whenever he said Triss's name, suggested the former.

He set his hand down on his leg. "I'd love to play poker sometime. Maybe for higher stakes, like sexual favors? We'd have to invite Triss ... though, if we did that, I'm pretty sure she'd just be under the table all night, serving the two of us."

She erupted into more giggles, and slid off his lap as she pulled her shirt back across her breast to hide it once more. "Friends are hard to come by, Julias. I knew I'd like to be yours for many years now, but I didn't think we'd have anything to talk about, any connection for a bridge to form. Now I realize that was silly, and I'm sure we do, and more than just Triss." She leaned in again, and put a kiss on his cheek, another on his jawline, and then another on his neck. "Please, give me a call, when you're ready to get Triss and I in the same room, hopefully on the same bed."

He pulled out his phone, and pulled up Triss's number. Thankfully, he knew Triss had already gotten her hands on a new phone. "Call you? I was thinking we'd get her over here right now."

"Ha, typical man, no patience."

Julias frowned; a mock frown, but he had a good mock frown, and he lowered the phone.

“No, wait! ... please?” she said.

He smirked at her again, and raised the phone back up as he dialed Triss’s number. Jen could be cute when she wanted, really cute. He couldn’t wait to hear how Triss reacted.

---

---

~~Beatrice~~

She had not expected ‘the’ phone call, not at all. But, fuck it, if Julias was offering to share the bed with Jen, she knew the man would put in due diligence before agreeing to something like that. And she could not deny how excited the phone call had made her. Jen, that fucking fox, in their bed? Fucking yes. At least, hopefully yes, hopefully a good night. Maybe, probably. Should be?

Please don’t be a bad idea.

“Finally! The bed of the great Julias Mire. Lot of Kindred ladies been hoping to get into this.” Jen crawled up onto the bed of the grand master bedroom, and made sure to show off every curve she had as she did, before sitting in the center.

“You seduced my white knight, didn’t you?” Triss said. “Got him to feel your tits and shit, and now you’re taking advantage.”

Julias rolled his eyes, but Jen put a hand to her cheek, like she’d just been accused of stealing a priceless artifact.

“I would never!”

“Grr, don’t make me regret this you bitch.” Beatrice crawled in after her, and pushed the woman hard enough to make her squeak, and bounce across the enormous bed toward the pillows. Had her giggling, a very strange sound to hear from Jen.

“No regret! This is still the bed only Beatrice has managed to get into for ages.” A smirk and a wink later, she sat up on her knees, and started to slip out of her jacket, still in her white, open shirt. She knew what she was saying, that Triss was the first Kindred in a long time to sleep with Julias; which always made Triss feel a little prideful.

Beatrice scrunched up her nose and glared at her. “You better remember that, I—” She almost jumped as Julias dropped a big box on the bed. Her sex toys box. “Julias! You fucking bastard.”

Her Superman grinned a very not-Superman grin, and slid the box in Jen’s direction.

“What’s this? Oh look at this!” Jen tossed her suit jacket aside, and beamed a smile as she stared down into the box. She kept her shirt on, distracted by Triss’s secrets that her asshole boyfriend just exposed to the evil woman. “I see some very large toys.”

“What girl doesn’t have large toys?” Ugh, she was going to have to defend herself now.

Jen, smile getting bigger and bigger, pulled out what was probably Triss’s biggest vibrator, massive, covered with various bumps and grooves. The plug shape of the bottom made its anal purpose obvious. Jen flipped the switch, and dropped her jaw as she watched the huge thing vibrate and swirl in her palm.

Triss slapped it out of her hands, but all that did was spur Jen to dig for new toys. Out came the other vibrators, the various lubricants, the arrays of piercings, and chains to go with them. The choker came out too, which Jen held in front of her for a few moments with wide eyes of wonder, before setting aside, as if it were too sacred for her to touch. She wasn’t entirely off base, with how submissive Triss usually liked to be when she wore it, and how much of an intimate feeling that was with Julias.

Her boyfriend took off his suit jacket, tossed his tie aside, and pulled over a large, fancy chair to sit in reverse style, arms across its back. Not a word, just a big grin as he watched the two women on his bed.

“Oh, you have to wear this.” Jen pulled out one of the nipple chains, and shifted the heavy metal from hand to hand as she slid in a little closer to Beatrice. “I don’t have any piercings, and this just looks like it’d be so amazing.”

Like a kid in a toy store. Triss couldn’t hide the smirk; she knew the feeling.

“ ... fine.”

“Yes! And this one too! And this one. And this one.” First she pulled out a thin chain clearly meant to circle the waist and dangle freely. The next chain was much tinier, and was only a few inches long, meant to be dangled from her clit hood piercing. The final one wasn’t a chain, but a tiny loop, meant to accent her navel piercing, without possibly snagging on anything.

“Going all out on the bling, aren’t you?”

“You’re the one who’s got the piercings, not me.” Giggling all the more, she reached out, and took the bottom edge of Triss’s tank top.

Triss hesitated for a moment. A point of no return, letting Jen begin to undress her. She glanced Julias’s way, and her knight smiled at her, warm, cozy. Her choice.

She rolled her eyes, and raised her arms. Jen didn’t hesitate, and slid the tank top off of her before tossing it aside. Her eyes lit up all the more, and she stared at Triss’s breasts as she reached down, and slid off her own pencil skirt.

Triss, wearing nothing but jeans, and Jen wearing a white shirt with one button done, and underwear, black lace. Much as this was Triss's choice, she had to admit it must have been a very appealing sight to anyone watching, and a glance Julias's way proved it. Man was glancing between the two of them, already blushing like hell and licking his lips.

The two Kindred on the bed blushed like hell as well, no words needed. And, despite herself, Triss felt the heat hit her body in moments. She was excited.

Jen slipped off her shirt and tossed it aside, a smooth motion Triss almost didn't notice, but the topless Ventrue reached out and started yanking on Triss's pant leg. Jen's breasts, soft, heavy, bounced with each yank. "More!"

"Settle down! Christ, you fuck a couple dudes almost every night. Figured this would be pretty normal for you."

"Hell no, they're kindred. This is different. And you're different." That almost sounded romantic, if it wasn't for the mad grin on Jen's face as she pulled on Triss's pant leg hard enough for Triss to fall over onto her back on the bed.

"God damn it girl, fine already." Now she was laughing too. She rolled her eyes again, undid the button and zipper of the jeans, and instantly they were off before Jen threw them to the floor.

Jen was wearing black lace panties, the sort of lingerie that was expensive and meant to be admired. Triss was wearing a plain black g-string, because damn it made her ass look great, and she smirked as Jen stopped her almost frantic motions to stare and admire her body. Her hands slowly reached out, took Triss's thighs, and moved her legs to the side so they were across the sheets together, showing off her ass for the Ventrue. Triss let her.

“Hope your lover doesn’t mind,” Jen said, “if I kind of just ... play with you for a little bit? God that body, like a fucking Amazon warrior.”

“No problems here,” the man said, still watching. Self control in spades. Any other man would have had his pants off and a hand in his boxers by now.

“So you’re both just gonna stare at my body the whole night, is that how this is going to go?”

Jen shrugged, and offered Triss’s ass cheek, the one over its partner and above the bed, a rather hard slap. Predictably, it jiggled slightly, and again Triss rolled her eyes, while Jen’s stared on in amazement, and hunger. Triss tried to be a little more subtle about watching Jen’s breasts, and how they dangled like heavy teardrops with the Ventrue’s sitting forward position.

The evil woman reached out for Triss’s arm, and helped sit her up again, only for her to dig through the pile of jewelry and find the nipple chain once more. Once she was in nice and close, legs touching, Jen leaned in toward her breasts, and used both hands to take one of them, remove the piercing already there, and replace it with one end of the chain. And then, the other, taking her slow time to slide metal out of her flesh, and replace it with fresh metal.

Only once the heavy, black metal chain dangled down almost far enough to reach Triss’s navel, did Jen stop to admire her work. Stare, stare, and stare at her some more.

And it was driving Triss wild. She had an exhibitionist side. She knew it, Julias knew it, and Jen was going to figure it out any second as every moment the girl stared at her, Triss’s body grew hotter. Her nipples were hard, her skin was starting to turn a touch red, and her voice was begin to waver a little. Just a little, just enough that she could notice it, and so could Jen.

“More!” Jen grabbed the waist chain, and hooked it around her. Small enough to rest on her hips without falling any further. And then was the navel piercing, a hoop that lay flat to her abs, larger and fancier than the tiny stud she had in normally. “Last one can wait, cause we have to do some poses.”

“ ... poses? Are you fucking serious? This isn’t a photoshoot.”

“No but, I know if I had the two most beautiful women in the city in my bed, I’d want to see them show off a little.” The girl winked at her, and then nodded with her head toward Julias.

Course he’d want to see that, he was a guy, and everything he got to see was a taste of what he’d get to experience once they got to that part. And Jen seemed more than happy to make it take a while to get to that part. Triss couldn’t help but smile a little at Julias’s own smile, and his rather uncomfortable squirming; dude was super horny and forcing himself to just watch. She and Jen would definitely repay him, but until then, yeah it would be kind of nice to show off.

Just thinking the idea was enough for Jen to giggle, reach out, and pull Triss toward her. Soon Jen was on her back on the bed, her legs spread, while Triss knelt over her, hands against the blankets by her shoulders, her knees between the girl’s thighs, and her nipple chain dangling and resting across Jen’s breasts.

Julias groaned.

A shiver went down Triss’s spine, and she looked to her man to see what he was looking at. Her ass, and Jen’s too, the both of them topless and wearing underwear that really showed off just how fucking awesome their legs and butts were. With Triss’s back arched forward the way it was, it really put the S curve into the length of her body. The chain did work too, pulling on Triss’s breasts enough to make her nipples stand out; not that they needed help, hard as rock by this point.

Triss looked down at Jen's body, and despite herself, licked some of her teeth with her long tongue. Raven hair to the shoulder, like her own. While Triss's body was lean and hard, Jen's was a bit softer, just as thin but instead of abs, a flat stomach. Just as toned of a butt, if a bit smaller than Triss's. And her breasts were larger, softer, all natural, and squished against the girl's chest with the angle. Her nipples were just as hard, standing out on swollen areola, and begging to be played with.

Didn't seem to be what Jen had in mind though. The girl reached up, and grabbed Triss's breasts instead, cupping them and letting the chain spill out between her fingers as she began to massage and caress them. Triss peeked at Julias in the corner of her eye, and shivered again as she saw how much the man was struggling to stay put, to not jump in and take her hard like he sometimes did. Jen could see it too. The girl was putting on this show specifically to drive the man wild, and Triss as well.

Triss hated how well it was working. Fuck, having Julias stare at her like that while another woman played with her breasts was getting her wet, and much as she tried to stop it, a little moan managed to escape her. Little moan turned into a surprised groan when Jen leaned her head upward a bit, and took one of Triss's nipples into her mouth.

Yeah, Jen was good. Jen was really fucking good at putting on a show, too. The girl's hands switched to roaming up and down Triss's back and sides, but also pulling her closer in so Jen had an easier time suckling on her breasts. And she was definitely suckling, pulling on them with suction and lightly shaking her head from side to side to make the chain dangle and bounce.

Triss didn't normally ask for breast play. It felt good, sure, but Triss didn't usually need the foreplay, embarrassing as that was. A kiss on the neck and she was ready to go. But, something about having some fun, letting Jen suck on her tits and rub her body up

