It worked, a little. It tingled on his skin, and he could feel the sharp edge on his desires blunted. He could also feel the readiness of his Beastly instincts lowered, like someone had thrown a big blanket over them. Not a good thing, if shit was hitting the fan. Thankfully the city had calmed down quite a bit, and he could take a breath and focus on other problems.

Once Jessy and Jack got close to the big stage, Hella Vendram stepped out from behind a heavy curtain. Hella was very attractive, a bit tall with a fit body and tan skin, lots of badass scars from her human days, and tonight she wore her dark hair short, very short. He thought she might have been from Brazil, or maybe her kine parents had been, since she had the typical Dolareido accent.

“Just going to show up unannounced?” she asked, half yelling. She wore typical jeans and t-shirt, completely at odds with the decor, but totally predictable for a Gangrel. “I suppose you’re wanting to cash in on the favor.”

Favor? He almost asked about it, but stopped himself. Right right, avenging Barry.

“Not really, no. Not yet at least. We’re here because Michael’s pissed you’re not out there, dealing with the Carthians,” he said.

Hella groaned, and motioned for them to come join her. They did, and they followed her backstage where scene props were, and then down below to the dressing rooms. There was no threat here, nothing to make Jessy or Jack hesitate or look over their shoulders for a knife coming for the back. Of course, Kindred would always be Kindred, and it paid to not be too carefree, but Jack felt more or less relaxed.

Hella used a key to open a secure door, and another to open another secure door. Then it was down, and down, into an underground passage. Stone and metal, deep in the Earth where only a creature that didn’t need oxygen could feel comfortable.

“Last time I was here, I couldn’t find anyway in,” he said. He’d been down there before, and other than what looked like some kind of tunnel through water deep in the Earth, Isabella’s secret path starting from the catwalks above seemed like the only way in.

“You can never be too careful.” She shrugged at him. “There may be more ways, there may not. I have no obligation to tell you.”

Jessy growled, a very animal sound, but nodded. “Yeah, we know, Hella. Kid was just curious.”

Hella smirked, but shrugged again. Good, no follow up meant she wasn’t feeling too aggressive. If she wasn’t on edge, than Isabella might not be either.

After a long journey down spiraling stairs cut into stone, they came out into the cave that was Hella's home. Not the way he came in last time he was here, this time stepping out from behind a heavy curtain, and out onto a higher part of the cave. The very well decorated cave that might as well have been a scene from The Phantom of the Opera. It even had some dress mannequins, and a big comfy, fancy four poster bed.

"No no no!" Isabella, wrapped in some sort of gorgeous, blue, fluffy nightgown that belonged on a woman who'd recently killed her rich husband for his money, walked around the bed. A couple of Kindred sat around it, as did a couple of kine, likely ghouls, and everyone was watching the two Kindred on the bed. "You're not capturing the sheer taboo nature of the act."

Jack raised a brow, looked at Jessy, who returned the confused look, before they both shrugged and followed Hella as she led them down the winding twists on the floor of the cave. Lots of lit candles, hanging curtains, beautiful paintings, a chandelier, it was like Maria's den, except less morose.

On the cave floor beside the bed sat another kine Jack hadn't seen before, and whoever he was, he was out cold. Alive, but comatose, from a Kiss no doubt. The two Kindred on the bed were hidden under the blanket, a white woman and a black man, and the man was currently lying on the girl's back. And, from the smell in the air and the flushed look on her cheeks, they were very aroused; probably them who Kissed the kine.

"Taboo?" Jessy said, smirk on her face as she approached, taking slow steps down the carved stairs of the stone cave. "What's taboo about this? Ass fucking? Not really the best position for that, F Y I. Get a pillow under your hips, girl."

The group of actors and actresses chuckled, but Jack rolled his eyes and shook his head. Yeah, he'd forced Jessy to handle Isabella so he wouldn't have to, but that didn't mean Jessy had to go all ... Jessy on him. Fuck. He really should have asked for something better.

"It's a period piece," Isabella said as she folded her arms across her chest. "I don't suppose you understand what that means?"

Jessy raised a brow, looked to the two people covered in a blanket on the bed, at the fancy old fashioned dress on the foot of the bed, at the field worker's clothes beside them, and then to Isabella. "Oh, I get it. Black dude, white girl?"

Isabella almost snarled, but a sheet of ice covered her cold face instead. "Indeed."

"Harcourt involved?" Jessy nodded to herself, as if she'd come to a great idea. "Dude's smoking hot, and black."

It took every ounce of discipline Jack had to not hit Jessy upside the head. That could wait till later.

"None of the hunters are members of this performance," the Daeva said, glaring.

Jessy raised a brow, and gestured with her chin to the other side of the cave. A few more actors and actresses stood around, chatting, nodding, and holding up various costume pieces in front of themselves. Some sort of feedback group then. Two of the hunters, Dennis and Marge, stood with them, chatting away.

"Jessy, I'm going to speak with the hunters," Jack said. "Can you —"

"Yeah yeah. Don't forget what you owe me though." Jessy winked at him, walked over to Isabella, and sat down on the foot of the bed, big grin on her face.

The more Jack thought about it, the more he realized he'd made a bad trade. Jessy liked confrontation, and considering how condescending Isabella often was, the Gangrel was probably aching for an opportunity to get uppity with her. Maybe Jack could haggle with her over his deal?

He laughed quietly to himself as he approached Dennis and Marge. He hadn't even asked Antoinette if he could make a deal like that, a sex tape or something of them together, to give to Jessy. No way she'd say no, or so he thought, but there was a chance she'd say no. Maybe. Possibly.

Nah. Antoinette was perfectly comfortable with the idea of fucking in front of an audience, both in person, and planet-wide. So comfortable, she'd take requests from the audience for positions, mid sex. He could see it now. She'd be riding him, pull out her smart phone, and put up a global poll for people to vote on the next position. Live voting.

Maybe Jessy and Antoinette, and Elaine, had more in common than he thought?

"Marge, Dennis," he said once he got close.

The group of vampires backed away, offering him small bows. Uncomfortable. One of the vampires was younger than him, but the other few were older than him. They all looked a little frightened. The two hunters, on the other hand, looked terrified of him, which of course soon had the other vampires even more scared.

"Jack," Dennis said eventually. "You uh, you here for us?"

"No. You can all calm down, I'm not here for any of you." That managed to dial them down from nine to eight on the panic scale, at least. "Jessy and I are here to ... speak to Isabella." He didn't mean to pause there; just wanted to avoid telling these guys what they were actually going to say to their boss. But the pause made it sound indirectly threatening, and the group of them, vampires included, stirred and looked over him to Isabella.

“She in trouble?” one of the actresses said.

“Covenant business,” he said. Which only made things worse. Fuck. “Don’t worry about it. So, Dennis, Marge, how is it in Dolareido?”

“Could be worse,” Marge said, a small smile managing to emerge. “I mean, considering we were pretty sure we were dead, when you ... you know. Being stuck in Dolareido is, um, frustrating, but we’re pretty happy compared to the alternative.”

“They holding a grudge for Barry’s death?”

“Nope,” they said together.

“Good. Isabella and Hella treating you well?”

“We’re not really sure,” Dennis said. “How do vampires normally treat prisoners in Dolareido?”

Jack looked down as he held his chin. Tell them? No, probably not a good idea. Maria, Michael, Viktor, Jacob, they all did some pretty nasty shit to kine they felt deserved it, or kine they wanted to use as kindling for their actual purposes. Even Antoinette kept live prisoners indefinitely, as potential emergency blood sources.

“Not like this,” he said. “You guys aren’t true prisoners. You’re an opportunity. The Prince is a peaceful Prince, and she’ll play the long game to make that peace a reality. You two and Harcourt are another tool in her toolkit. Once she’s satisfied you guys understand what we’re about, she’ll let you go.” And if she’s not satisfied, she’ll probably lock the three of you up. But no reason to tell them that.

“How long will that take?” Dennis asked.

Jack shrugged. “No idea. How much of Dolareido have you seen? Er, better question. How much of Dolareido have you seen with vampires doing what they do in it?”

Marge nodded. “You mean, have we seen vamps go on hunts and stuff?”

“Yeah.”

“We’ve seen a few, yes. Been to Bloodlust a few times.” She squirmed a little as she said it. “And we’ve been fed on a few times.” And from the way she wriggled when she said it, that feeding had been intense, pleasurable, and sexual. Dennis’s reaction was identical.

“Anyone slip you any of their blood?”

“No,” Dennis said. “But I mean, how would we know if they had?”

Marge winced and looked down. “Uh, I don’t think there’s been anything like that. But, uh—”

Laughing, Jack put up his hands. “If you’re in with the vamps in Dolareido, it’s like ... winning the lottery, and going on vacation in Las Vegas. Yeah, you’re going to get buried in so much sex and indulgence, you’ll get whiplash.”

“You got that right,” Dennis said, and he smiled at some of the nearby vampires. They returned it.

“Where’s Harcourt?” Jack asked.

Dennis shook his head. “Dunno. Despite her best efforts, I don’t think Miss Leuvion’s been able to convince Brace to get involved in her plays.”

“That the reason she got her claws into you so early? Just ... for the plays?”

“Seems to be a large part of it, yeah. There’s been a few occasions where she’s kinda negotiated with other Kindred to get to talk to us; probably traded for it.”

Jack raised a brow at that. “But, you’re not trapped under Isabella, or Hella. You’re stuck in the city, but no Kindred is allowed to keep you under their thumb.”

Marge nodded. “I guess. She is a bit ... insistent, that we should be careful about leaving the comfort of her care, though.”

Jack frowned at that. Of course the damn woman would be manipulating the hunters, without actually quite breaking the Prince’s decree. He’d fix that before he left.

“Any idea where I can find Harcourt?”

“Probably hanging with the Carthians.”

Interesting. Harcourt had a personality that didn’t exactly fit the hunter mold. Maybe he felt more comfortable in the borderline anarchist environment of the Carthians?

Jack nodded. “Alright, I’ll talk to Isabella, and then ... well, keep your heads down, ok?”

“You mean right now?” Marge asked.

“I mean in general. City isn’t perfectly safe.”

“It is filled with vampires. I mean—”

“It’s not that,” Jack said. “Just ... be careful.” Before they, or the listening vampires could interject, not that they would considering they were afraid of him, he marched back from where he came, to get involved in the conversation between Jessy and Isabella.

Conversation, not argument. Surprising. Considering Jessy being Jessy, he’d expected to find his fellow Right Hand throwing curses at the older Daeva, but she hadn’t. Nope, she’d sat down on the bed with the two actors, and was in the process of ripping the blanket off them.

“No no!” Jessy said, voice louder, but not angry. Impassioned was probably a better word, though Jack had trouble understanding what was going on. “The sex shouldn’t be gentle. He should be grinding into her. Come on, if we’re playing up the rich girl seduces farm hand, it’s been a long, slow tease, right? When he gives in, it should be like an animal!” She gestured to the two on the bed, who were actually having sex — or had been — until Jessy interrupted. Authenticity, or at least compelling performances, evidently meant a lot to Isabella.

“What? Yeah yeah, she knows what’s up. If we have come back down here, we’ll crack some skulls and ruin her next play.”

Hella did not like that threat. The Gangrel prowled over toward them, but Isabella held out her arm and cut her off.

“The Right Hands are correct,” Isabella said, no effort made to hide the ice in her voice. “Mister McDonald does not care for the arts, and we have become too involved in our passions.”

Jack managed a small smile. “I get you.”

The Daeva’s glare could have cut steel. “Do you, Mister Terry?”

Wow, damn. Much as Isabella was a cold woman, Jack half expected her to treat him with at least a little politeness. He'd gotten revenge for Barry, one of their actors. But no, the fact the Right Hands had come to interrupt something important to her meant she was pissed. Time to play diplomat again.

“Yes, I understand, Madam Leauvion. I know how it feels when you get a hook, in the brain, you know? I know exactly what it's like when something grabs you, and you spend all night and day sinking energy into it. It eats you up, in delightful masochism. And for any Daeva, I imagine that that's an even stronger sensation. You want to master your craft, and create works that resonate.” He said ‘resonate’ very carefully, with emphasis and articulation, and the satisfied smile on Isabella's face told him he'd struck home. “And when outside interference gets in the way, it's beyond frustrating, because you know that the energy filling you right now can be fickle. You want to strike while the fire's hot, right?”

“Are you an artist, Mister Terry?” she asked, some ice in her voice gone. “You speak like someone who knows.”

“I've dabbled, when I was human.”

“But not since?”

“No, I guess not. Haven't really had the time.” Or the desire, really. Ever since he was embraced, his mental energy naturally gravitated toward different things, usually anything that involved growing his skill, power, and status as an Invictus. Being a Ventrue had changed him. He used to have a lot of skills, a natural at anything he put his mind to, and it was a bonding point between him and Antoinette. But he wasn't that guy anymore. Kinda sad, really, now that he thought about it.

And because he could not fucking stop wearing his emotions on his sleeve, Isabella smiled as she watched him, catching what he was thinking.

“My troupe are afraid of you, Jack,” she said, and Jack raised a brow at the dropping of title. “The hunters, and my Kindred. The stories about you, about the things you’ve done, the hunters have corroborated them.”

“Is that why you got your fingers into them so quickly? To ask them questions about me?” Ugh, he didn’t want to talk to her. She was mean. Jessy was supposed to be talking to her, and was, and he was the idiot that interrupted that.

“Partly. Partly for more obvious reasons. Partly because I did wish to see them in my work. And, partly, because they are delicious.” She licked her lips as she said it, and it was pretty damn obvious she meant more than just their blood. To seal the image, Hella grinned a big grin beside her.

Time to spoil her night even more, then.

“Right, well, you’ve been hogging them. Let others have a turn,” he said, earning a bark laugh from Jessy.

Isabella scowled, and the ice returned in full force. “I have not been—”

“I really don’t have patience for a back-and-forth of indirectness, Isabella. You know what I mean, and you know what you’re doing. Marge and Dennis are supposed to be seeing more of Dolareido, so Antoinette can convince them we’re not really worth other hunters’ time, remember?”

Fuck. One moment he had patience, and the next he didn’t. Something about Isabella and her deceitful, manipulative attitude really got under his skin, and now that he had the power to rip her into pieces, fear didn’t hold back his tongue.

Yeap, this was why he wanted Jessy to do the talking. With Jessy, getting uppity and angry and stuff was the norm. With him, cutting through the bullshit and getting a point across quickly, was taken a lot more harshly. Both because of his known past as a keeper of the peace, and his recent curse.

“I thought you were a Right Hand of the Invictus, not an assistant to the sheriff?” she said, a sneer slowly creeping across her face. “Michael would prefer we keep them locked down here indefinitely. Yet, it seems like you’re putting your lover’s desires over his.”

Wow, she didn’t back down, like he thought she would. Hell, she’d said it herself, the hunters corroborated the rumors. She knew what he could do.

Jessy was right. Isabella had eyes for growth in the Invictus hierarchy, and she never forgave him for becoming the next Right Hand. And the problem was, she’d just insulted him in front of a group of people. His status was at stake, and to an Invictus, status was everything. He understood that, got that, and fuck him, he even kinda liked that about the Invictus; the Ventrue in him was coming out.

He snarled, very quietly, and took a step toward her, eyes locked onto hers. She took a step back, so did her girlfriend, and the two of them glared at him like angry animals suddenly cornered by a much larger animal. Every Kindred nearby froze. The Beast in his gut roared its triumphant power, and theirs huddled back, whimpering.

“You think I’m Antoinette’s bitch, is that it?” The word choice had everyone staring, and he ground his teeth hard enough his fangs emerged. “Michael wants you to get off your ass, and stop Garry from pushing in on our territory more than he already has. But you’re so self absorbed, you can only think about indulging your obsessions.” He nodded toward the hunters behind him, who had drifted closer along with the other vampires. He was now the center of attention for everyone in the cave. Lovely. “And hey, I get it. I know exactly what it’s like when something grabs hold of you and you can't help but pour every bit of focus you have into it. But instead of a reasonable conversation, you want to be a fucking pain in my ass?" He took another step forward, and again Isabella and Hella stepped back. "You know what Michael wants you to do, and you'll do it. Now you know what the Prince wants you to do it, and you'll do it, because it's the smart thing to do. And because I told you to."

Hella slipped under Isabella's protecting arm, and marched toward him, eyes glaring. "You can't just walk into our home and—"

Jack met her eyes. The world stopped. Everyone watching petrified, and Hella became a statue as she realized what was happening to her. What had happened to her. She was what, maybe thirty years embraced? Not even in her ancilla years. Breaking past the barrier all Kindred — and paranormals — had guarding their mind was easy. More than easy, he had to make an active effort to hold back his Beast and keep it from ripping into her damn mind. It was a gamble he did not want to make, but the situation was quickly spiraling out of control and he had to get it under control, now.

With another quiet growl, Jack pointed at her, and then slowly pointed at the bed. With a quiet whimper and broken eyes, the warrior woman inched her way over to the bed, and sat down on the foot of it.

"Let me make this perfectly clear," Jack said. "This isn't a negotiation. Don't mistake my kindness for weakness or passivity. You're all members of the Invictus. Do what MacDonald says, or I'll make you. You're all Kindred of Dolareido. Do what the Prince says, or I'll make you. Understood?"

Everyone except for Hella and Isabella nodded vigorously. They nodded too, once a few moments of deadly silence passed.

"So this is how it is?" Isabella said. "We're to be enemies?"

“You fucking shitting me?” Laughing, Jessy hopped off the bed, and put a hand on Jack’s shoulder. “Dude’s the best friend you could ask for. He just saved you a whole lot of pain. All you gotta do is listen, and everyone comes out better.” She saluted the two Kindred, waved to everyone else, and turned to leave with Jack.

She did a good job hiding that she was actually pushing Jack to guide him back out of the cave. Good. Part of him kinda wanted to stay and throw a few punches, and he knew that was a damn bad idea.

“Thought you were going to let me do the talking?” Shaking her head, she gently elbowed him in the side as the two stepped back onto the Dolareido sidewalk.

“I was! I was. Just, fuck, I wanted to make sure the hunters weren’t being treated like prisoners.”

Jessy shrugged at that. “Yeah sure, but that doesn’t mean you needed to burn that bridge with Isabella.”

“Hard to not burn a bridge with that bitch.”

“Ha! Agreed. But still, you’re normally pretty good about this sorta shit. What happened?”

Sighing, Jack looked down and stared at the toes of his Invictus shoes as he walked. “That sort of shit always annoys the ever living fuck out of me.”

“Yeah, I get that, but you didn’t let it get the best of you, before now.”

“I didn’t have this curse back then. Now, I can ... I can have Isabella on her knees with the snap of a finger.”

Jessy raised a brow at that. “Damn, that’s badass.”

He snorted. “I feel like a kid who’s found his dad’s gun, a shitty pistol with a quick safety and hair trigger. One fucking mistake and I’m going to kill someone.”

“Better be careful then.”

“Yeah, I know. But fuck me, knowing I can tell an asshat to fuck off and get to work now? It’s ... it’s like god damn fucking candy! Knowing that if I wanted to, I could make her drag her pretty ass into the Invictus HQ, and openly admit she’s being lazy? Hell yes.” He looked up at Jessy, and she blinked at him, apparently not really aware of the sensation. “You’ve never dealt with someone stronger or richer than you, and all you can think is ‘fuck I wish I had the power or money to deal with you?’ But you couldn’t?”

“Eh, I mean I guess? Normally I kinda just ... try, and get beat up for trying.”

He blinked at her, she smiled a big dopey smile, and he laughed. “Not me. I just fantasized about it. But, now I’m the... ‘big dog.’” He air quoted that, naturally. “I can tell an asshat to stop being an asshat. I can genuinely fix things.” And he wanted to fix things. Christ, if he could just fix everything, his purpose in life would be complete. He could die happy.

“Sounding kinda like a dictator there, you know? Waving a big ole ‘I know best, follow me’ sorta flag over your head.”

He winced at that. “I know. I’m not an idiot. I shouldn’t just go around, bullying people into doing what I want them to do, because I think I know best. Setting myself up for a historically cliché fall doing that.”

“Maybe a bit, yeah. But I’m a little more concerned about how things are gonna be after you get rid of the curse.”

“Get rid of it...”

“Yeah.” She nudged him with her elbow again. “You know, that thing you wanted to do?”

He frowned at the street beneath him. “Yeah.”

“Ok, um, you sound hesitant, and that’s kinda scary. Last I heard, this curse thing was horrible, you hated it, and you wanted to get rid of it?”

“I do, I do. But I’ve had it under control for weeks now, and ... and it’s easy to forget the horrible shit, and only remember the good shit.” The power in his fingertips, for one.

“Well, whatever you do Jack, I’ll back you. You’ve earned it. Julias chose well. But take it from someone who’s burned a lot of bridges: don’t burn a lot of bridges. If you do get rid of the curse, the fuck you gonna do if Isabella decides it’s time to shove you around?”

Sighing, he shrugged and looked up at the Gangrel. “I’ll ... ask for your help?”

“Ha!” She clapped him on the back and laughed. “A Ventrue, ask for help when his pride is on the line? I’ll believe it when I see it.”

~~Antoinette~~

“I think I have seen far too many naked bodies the past few weeks,” Samantha said.

Antoinette laughed, and smiled at her childe beside her. The two sat in one of her vehicles, being driven by one of her thralls, a large vehicle, but not quite a limousine. Deliciously overindulgent without being gaudy.

“You spend much of your time with witches and warlocks, my childe. Expect to be surrounded with flesh and sin.”

“It’s not really the image I think of, when you say witch. I think cauldrons and warts and stuff. And warlock just makes me think of Jack, playing video games in the living room.”

Again Antoinette laughed. Young Jack, a boy, indulging his growing mind with the rising media of the current age. Such an image, so at odds with the current reality.

“Then allow me to correct your assumptions, Samantha. Long ago, in the woods distant from nearby villages, Kindred of the Circle of the Crone would gather. Come the full moon, they would sit around a fire managed by their ghouls, and they would pray to old gods, gods of the elements, and gods of forces beyond understanding. Sometimes they would sacrifice an animal to the flame. Sometimes a person.”

Samantha gasped. “A person?”

How silly her childe was. Antoinette had told Samantha all this already, but her childe was the sort of woman who needed to hear information many times, and in many forms, before it sank past her skull. With time, she would sharpen her mind, despite the natural inclination of her first life’s habits. She would have to.

“Indeed. Consider the myths you have undoubtedly come across, about some of the more barbaric acts performed by the occult, hundreds of years ago. Many such stories are simply tales of the terrible things the Circle has done, worshiping ancient gods or pursuing dark magics. And, as you know, many such stories are filled with sex.”

Samantha looked down and shivered; a shiver of delight, not fear. “There’s definitely been sex.”

“I am sure that Jacob, in his younger years, indulged in carnal delights of a similar nature to my own past. Though, some key details would be different. I preferred walls, and beds of silk. Jacob would have undoubtedly preferred fur rugs.”

“And he would have included members of his family.”

“F-Family?”

“The Circle of the Crone embraces an ancient tradition, sometimes called the Family. Kindred are given roles, such as Mother, Father, and others, such as the Maiden or the Whore.” The details and purpose of which evaded her. She was no stranger to secrets; such was the way of the Ordo Dracul. But the secrets of the Circle were far more infuriating, as they rarely wrote what they believed or acted. A culture propagated either by frustratingly cryptic scripture, or through verbal story. “I am sure many in such a tribe would have joined in, and engaged each other sexually during some of their rituals.”

“I ... uh, haven’t had anything crazy like that happen to me.”

“Yet.”

“Yet.” She shivered again and smiled as she looked up to her. “But honestly, I think it’s a little easier to, um, open up, sexually speaking, in that environment I guess? Beatrice and Jennifer are so nice, and they’ve got their legs around each other all the time.” She put her hands up to her cheeks and shook her head, as if the very images going through her mind would condemn her. “Triss, she uh ... Jennifer likes to ... put her whole fist inside her! And not in her, you know, vagina, but in her...”

Antoinette could not help but laugh. “And that startles you?”

“Kinda, yeah. She gets really deep, and you can actually see her fist pushing up against her insides! And Triss cums and she absolutely soaks Jen, and—”

Antoinette leaned forward, and grinned at her silly childe beside her, causing her to freeze solid, an infant caught with hand in the cookie jar.

“You have watched them. Several times.”

“I ... um ... yeah. I didn't mean to! But they have sex with their little cubbyhole cave open so I ... can't help but notice, when I come or go.” Sighing, she looked out the window at the passing houses, and ran her fingers back through her hair. “Aaron doesn't seem to be interested in doing that sort of stuff, but Othello...”

“Ah, Othello. I enjoy the man, as one Daeva to another, but his mind is perhaps on the other end of the spectrum from mine, or any dragon's.” If the man had a mind at all.

“He. Is. Gorgeous.” She giggled, and Antoinette raised a brow at her, but did not stop smiling as she leaned back and watched her childe be a child. “So much muscle! And Madison, she's so pretty, and...” More giggles. “Her poor ass.”

“You have not had anal sex with Jacob yet?”

“Antoinette!” Her giggles disappeared, replaced with shock. “I ... I uh...”

“As I am sure Madison has made abundantly obvious, anal sex can be quite enjoyable for those with the proclivity. I never much fancied it, despite many efforts to. Alas.” She shrugged. “You are a vampire now, sweet childe. Any and all concern with which orifice you indulge should be dismissed.”

Trying to indirectly convince her childe to have anal sex with Jacob was a hilarious topic, but Antoinette kept her face smooth and calm. It was obvious Samantha was indulging her rediscovered sexual desires with Antoinette's old friend, and that was a connection Antoinette found value in fostering.

"I ... I suppose that's true, isn't it? Every time I see Jen and Triss have sex, they're so ... free to um ... use any part of the body."

"Indeed."

She giggled again as a thought struck the sweet childe. "Not sure how Madison keeps herself clean for Othello all the time, but she does. And she ... she really loves having sex with him. Is it because of the Vinculum?"

"With the blood bind, a ghoul or thrall will be forever wholly infatuated with the master, unless steps are taken to break it, such as months without either contact or vitae fed to the ghoul. Such a bond could lead to sexual arousal, but it is no substitute for sexual skill. If Madison enjoys anal sex with Othello frequently—"

"Very frequently. Like, almost every night." She squirmed and wriggled as more dirty thoughts ran through her innocent mind. "She cums and soaks him too, just like Triss."

"Then I am sure the man has the skills and knowledge to earn such pleasure."

Samantha leaned toward her, as if sharing a dark secret only to be shared among close friends, women sipping wine around a table in the living room. "One time, Madison was giving him a ... blowjob. Triss and Jen sat with him and watched. And ... and I did too! Even opened my blouse for him." She cupped her cheeks in her hands again. "I showed him my breasts, and he stared at them, and came in his ghoul's mouth! Ugh, I felt so ... hot, and guilty! I told Jacob later. He just laughed and said next time, I should give Othello a strip tease."

“Of course he did, childe. Though I suspect he would not want you to partake, at least not without his presence.”

“Y-Yeah, but still. In that cave, I could ... I could walk into that cave, strip, and ask everyone to have sex around me, while they watched me. And ... and they would!”

Oh Jacob, what have you done to her sweet, innocent childe? Not so innocent anymore. Antoinette laughed, finger against her cheek, and she smiled at Samantha as she pondered.

“I know I know. Don’t wanna put myself in that sort of situation, buried that deep with the Circle, and suddenly—”

“It is not that, Samantha.”

“No?”

“Non. If you wish to become very close friends with the Circle, then by all means, do so.” And by all means, share every detail with your sire, sweet little Terry. “If you want to swim in the flesh and fluids of the witches and warlocks, by all means, do so. Enjoy yourself. My concern is that you remain aware that you are Daeva, and Daeva can often become obsessed with their passions.”

“I never really thought of sex as a passion of mine.”

“And yet...”

Samantha sighed, dreamily at that, and smiled at her. “And yet, I look forward to seeing Jacob, half because I enjoy spending time with the man, half because the sex is so damn good. Is that shallow?”

“Not at all. As you said, you enjoy talking to the man.”

“I do. He’s ... he’s fun, in a strange, chaotic kinda way, you know?” Another longing sigh. “He makes me feel young.”

“You are young, compared to my old friend.”

“Heh, that’s true, isn’t it? But he seems young too. He laughs, makes jokes, actually funny, witty jokes. He’s smooth, you know? Really ... suave, and smart.” She squirmed some more. “And he’s really, really talented.”

“Go on,” Antoinette said. Samantha always needed a small nudge, to be let out of her shell to share details of her love life. And she wanted to share them, otherwise Antoinette would leave her to her privacy. But Samantha, young and inexperienced, was unaware of her own desires, despite how simple it was to read her. Antoinette could, and Jacob could.

“Last night, at Bloodlust, after the others left, he was kissing my neck, and then he ... slid his hand inside me.” She avoided eye contact with Antoinette, horribly embarrassed, but the sheer joy radiating from her helped her push through. “But then Othello and Madison came back, and when they realized what was happening, Madison sat down beside me, and Othello beside her. And Othello, he started doing to Madison what Jacob was doing to me.” Again she buried her face in her hands, this time while looking down.

“It sounds like a delightful time. Othello’s ghoul is beautiful.” Antoinette leaned in a touch and whispered. “How many times did you climax?” After a small quiver, and while still looking down, Samantha kept one hand to her face to hide it, while she held up the other with three fingers high. “Oh my.”

“I don’t know what it is!” She threw her hands up as she sat up straight and lifted her head, exasperated. “Jacob gets his hands on me, and I just ... melt.”

“The man is ancient, my childe. He has slept with countless women, and from what Minerva told me, he enjoyed using his skill.”

“Ancient. Kinda like you...”

Antoinette smiled, but kept it gentle. “I see where your mind wanders. Oui, what Jacob does for you, I have done for Jack.”

Samantha managed a half grin. “And you enjoy that? The sex being so one sided, I mean.”

“Oh, immensely. To share my skill with him? To please him? Jacob feels the same when he is with you, I am sure.”

She smiled at that, and started to curl her hair around a finger. “He’s spoiling me. And that ... that makes me kind of nervous, honestly. If I was still human, I’d think maybe he was just a horny guy saying and doing all the right things to keep me in his bed. But, he’s a vampire! He could have any human in his bed, any he wanted. A few drops of blood and a kine is enthralled, right?”

“Correct. Three servings. Every Kindred with power is spoiled for choice in my city, sexually speaking.” Antoinette tilted her head to the side and raised a brow. “Are you concerned Jacob is unhappy with you?”

“I was at first. Thought maybe he was just getting close to me, so he could ... I don’t know.”

Ah, perhaps Samantha was not as naive as Antoinette thought, if she considered Jacob’s interest in her to be a way for him to manipulate Antoinette.

“Kindred will forever look for ways to better control wherever they roost, Samantha. Jacob undoubtedly took an interest in you because you are my childe, as a possible means to influence me. Do not hold it against him. I would have done the same.” And she currently did so, in a way. “But since then, you have made it clear he is quite interested in you.”

“All the sex—”

Antoinette put up her hand. “It is not the sex, Samantha. You have made it clear he is interested in you, because of the topics you have shared with me. Jacob does not speak of Minerva lightly, and yet you have told me that he has, indeed, spoken of her to you?”

“Y-Yeah, he has.”

“He’s spoken to you of his tastes?”

“Yeah. He likes jazz.”

Antoinette grinned and relaxed back in the car seat. “Oui. He does.”

The two grew quiet as the large car drove along. The street grew darker as they grew further from the entertainment and business districts of South Side, and quieter, the crowds eventually vanishing. Soon, the car came to a stop at the end of a driveway, and Samantha’s old home awaited them.

“Are you ready?” Antoinette said.

Chapter 129

She felt it the moment she and Samantha stepped up to the comely home. Cold, in the bones, an unnatural sensation that pulsed through her being. Her Beast recognized it, and its instincts kicked in, growling and snarling at the invisible waves of murder and anger that radiated from the house. It did not like being so close to such an aura; Kindred were masters of controlling kine, but had no talents whatsoever that allowed them to manipulate creatures of ephemera, spirit or ghost.

Antoinette had spent centuries learning to affect ephemera and the beings composed of it, largely in an effort to expand her control of everything. One more tool in her kit, to enact her goals on the world. But ephemera and ephemeral beings refused to be cooperative. Every scrap of knowledge she had discovered was uncovered through painful trial and error. The trouble with being a pioneer, was how little help there was to be found, even among colleagues.

Much of her knowledge pointed to the same conclusion: avoid entities made of this strange material. They were beyond the control of vampires, except through strange rituals and ornate symbols hundreds of years of experimentation barely lent meaning to. Tonight, she needed the help of such a frustrating entity, and she was not sure if it could be garnered.

Samantha opened the door, and Antoinette smiled as she followed her in. Best to be pleasant and polite when dealing with ghosts.

Antoinette held up a hand. “Come now Samantha, I am not so disconnected from reality that I do not understand the trials of a normal citizen. I know the price of eggs.”

That, apparently, shocked Samantha, and she glanced at the likely empty fridge before blinking at her. “You do?”

“Of course. It pays to be economically aware of both the grand, and the petite.”

“Oh. I ... I’m kinda surprised. You’re a billionaire.” Smiling sheepishly, Samantha slid off her shoes on a mat beside the door, and stepped into her kitchen. Antoinette did the same. “You don’t have to—”

“Neither do you. This is no longer your home.”

“But it is your daughter’s home.” Antoinette set a hand on her child’s shoulder, offered her a reassuring nod, and a gentle kiss on the forehead. “Now, by all means, show me the house that was once your home.”

Samantha beamed. Undoubtedly the woman delighted in the idea of showing her home to others, with inevitable joy over showing the rooms and bedrooms where Mary and Jack grew up.

And show she did. Antoinette could see Samantha felt slightly uncomfortable walking through her old home wearing a suit and skirt, and doubly so with her sire at her back. But a moment later, she fell into what must have been a routine, something she perhaps once had before Jack disappeared from her life. Did she have a book club? Did other women visit, drink wine and share stories? Perhaps after James died, she looked for solace in friends. Perhaps, after Jack died, she found solace only in the arms of her daughter.

The daughter who had died, and come back to her. The daughter she could not let go of.

Samantha showed her the kitchen, and the living room and its expensive couches. She showed her downstairs, the family room, with its large television and guest bedroom. She showed her the basement, and the 'movie' room James had built. Every minute, she spoke of memories, of her family, of the friends that once visited her and her husband. She spoke of the people who visited when James died, friendships rekindled. She spoke of the people who disappeared, when Jack died, people who could not be near her due to her broken state of mind.

They came to the bedrooms on the top floor, and Samantha sighed softly as she opened the door to Mary's bedroom. Cold. So terribly cold.

"If it wasn't for Mary," she continued, "I'd ... I don't know." With heavier sigh, she moved over to Mary's quaint little vanity desk, and stared into the mirror. "Mary, are you there honey? It's Mom."

No answer, but the temperature in the room did lower. If Antoinette Blushed Life, her breath surely would have been visible in the air.

Samantha traced her fingers along the desk, scooped up a bright blue bracelet, and smiled at it as she plucked it experimentally, its elastic nature gently snapping back against her. "This is Antoinette, my ... my sire. Sire and childe, the vampire thing. She's the one who saved me. Well, Jack saved me, really, and Antoinette turned me so I wouldn't die in ... in that hospital bed." After several moments of painful silence, she sat on the edge of the colorful bed, and smiled up at Antoinette. A weak smile. "And that's good! It'd probably be very awkward if Jack sired me."

"And painful," Antoinette whispered, "for your son, I mean. It comes at no small sacrifice to create a childe." With a smile to match Samantha's, Antoinette sat down beside her on the edge of the bed. The very act earned a startled stare from the woman, as if Antoinette would not dare set her derriere on a simple woman's simple bed. Silly woman.

"It does?"

"Oui. As you know, the Beast itches to escape at all times. It is nothing more than a hungry animal, and understands little of the Masquerade or the Danse Macabre. And ... when a Kindred does something that is, perhaps, rather animal and mindless, from wanton slaughter, to spreading the disease of vampirism, the Beast grows stronger, while the humanity in a vampire grows weaker."

Samantha stared at her all the more, like she had just admitted to murder. "You ... hurt yourself, to embrace me?"

"Ben oui, and I am glad I did."

"But, you didn't even know me!"

"But I knew Jack, young Kindred, and I knew him well. As did Julias, a man I..." Antoinette sighed, reached out, and pat her young childe on the shoulder. Mentioning Julias was a mistake. Her poor childe instantly devolved into a pit of sadness and misery, and she looked down at the floor as guilt washed over her. "Come now, Samantha. Do not blame yourself for Julias's death. Does Beatrice blame you?"

"No ... Sometimes she looks at me, and I can tell she's thinking about what it'd be like if Julias hadn't saved me. But she's never been angry with me."

"Perhaps you should talk with her about him?"

"I ... I don't think she'd like that."

“No, undoubtedly she would not. But rarely are the things we need the things we want, or would like.” Sighing, Antoinette looked around at the room, a dead, young woman’s room, and shook her head. “And unlike many Kindred, you were embraced at an age where you know very well how true that is.”

Antoinette stroked her childe’s back a few times, a gentle touch to remind her that her sire was her friend, and not simply her boss. Hopefully the message sank in. “And yet, there are many Kindred who are forever trapped in the minds they had when embraced. Appreciate the wisdom of your experiences, my childe, and—”

The once cold room grew colder still, and Antoinette looked to the floor as bits of mist began to flow up through the hardwood. The lights flickered, flickered, and died. The unnatural chill built upon itself until Antoinette could almost feel an ache in her bones. She flexed and unflexed her fingers as the familiar waves of death and foreign emotion given raw form filled the room.

A being of ephemera was manifesting itself.

“Oui.” Antoinette considered standing, but did not. Samantha did not, and under the current circumstances, it was likely the better idea, to follow suit.

“Baby!” Samantha smiled, so joyous it was blinding, and she waved a hand at the darkness around them. “This is Antoinette, my sire. She’s the one who turned me, so that I wouldn’t die.”

The blackness remained silent for a moment, and again, Antoinette followed Samantha’s cue to remain silent as well. Ghosts were unpredictable. If Samantha had found a way to communicate with her daughter regularly, whatever approach she used was best mimicked.

“You saved Mom,” the darkness said at last.

“Your brother and his sire saved your mother, young specter. I was merely chosen to be the one who would sire her, to spare your brother the burden.”

“Burden...” A quiet hiss of sadness. Antoinette could not help but imagine a lamenting serpent. “Why’re you here?”

Antoinette looked up toward the center of the room and its ceiling, as movement began to stir within the black. Limbs, a head, leaking mist that fell from a woman’s body where legs should have been. A hint of leg was still visible, but there was no denying the bottom half of Mary’s ghostly form was a classic rendition of a shade. It hurt to see. Whether Mary’s specter was actually Mary’s soul, or the pain of her death scarred the immaterial realm, a scar given form by ephemera, Antoinette did not know. But there was no denying the creature brought Samantha much joy and pain.

No mother should be forced to suffer the death of their only daughter twice. Once alone was too great an injury for most.

“I am here to meet you, Mary Terry. You are the daughter of my childe, after all.”

“Are ... are you taking good care of Mom?”

Antoinette looked to Samantha.

“She is, honey. She is. Very much.”

The ghost, a silhouette against the obsidian, drifted closer to Antoinette. Empty eyes. Terrible, and tragic. How long had it been since Antoinette had come so close with ephemera given form and will that was not a spirit from the Shadow Realm? Many decades, and even then, not with such proximity. That specter had also died a sad, traumatic death, in an equally sad, traumatic circumstance. Such was the way of things, she supposed.

“That’s good,” the ghost said. “Good. Good. Good. Good.” With time, Mary came closer, until only several feet separated the hovering ghost from the two vampires. “Are you here to tell me to leave?”

“Non. Your presence in my city has attracted no attention. Your future will be something to discuss with your family, Mary. I will not intervene.” A lie, but a white lie. “Are you ... stable, Mary? Many ghosts struggle to remain in the physical world. It takes a powerful feeling to keep a specter among the living, and unliving.” And if a shade had the power and raw emotion to remain stable in the physical world, it was generally accompanied by being mentally unstable. One look at Mary’s twitching facial expressions proved that.

Mary hissed, a loud, raspy sound, and the blackness around them shivered with frustration.

“I’m here. I’ll protect Mom, and Jack. That’s all that matters! I...” Her empty eyes lowered, and she drifted down toward the floor. “I don’t want to be alone.”

“Honey.” Samantha got down on her knees on the floor with her daughter, and set her hands on her legs. No attempt to hug her child, though Antoinette could see the woman desperately wanted to. She had visited her child many times, then, since discovering her here, to learn to hold back that reflex.

The fact Mary loved her mother and brother was obviously a great part of why she did not cross over, or disperse. But that would never be enough to create a ghost in most circumstances. Events left scars on ephemera proportional to the emotional weight they carried. Her death carried plenty, to be sure, but not enough to create a ghost.

Jack had later explained to Antoinette that Mary was angry with him. Not long after Jack had been embraced, he had wiped her mind of a chance encounter. A powerful and difficult feat for a young Ventrue, but now that the nature of his curse was understood, to some degree at least, such a display of power made more sense. Regardless, Mary's memory was restored after death. Anger, mixed with love, a concoction that had decimated entire kingdoms in the past. And, according to Jack, Mary had been able to monitor and discern more about what had happened to her, after her death. More anger to fuel the pyre of her ephemeral rage.

And then, there was fear. Perhaps in her first moments of awakening, a moment Antoinette knew was likely followed by dispersal for most spirits that failed to coalesce, Mary realized what had happened. She had realized she was dead, and was now a ghost. Fear of the beyond, of the unknown, perhaps drove her to seek shelter in the one place she could feel safe: home.

The Prince felt a touch guilty for analyzing, but the moment required it. Her research required it.

“Mary,” she said in a soft voice. “Your brother has saved your mother's life from the hunters, and destroyed them. They are dead. He is a powerful vampire with money and resources at his disposal, and he strives to create peace in this city. Your mother is alive, as alive as a vampire can be. She is my childe, and I will protect her, with limitless resources, and the strength of an elder vampire. They do not need your protection.” She offered the watching ghost a small nod, and a gentle smile. “How does that make you feel?”

“I ... I don't know. I'm happy! Happy, and I feel ... lighter. But, but I can't leave! I can't. I can't I can't.”

“You don’t have to leave, baby. You can stay here, as long as you need.” Samantha inched closer, and her knees touched the ghost. If the touch was unpleasant, she did not let it show.

“Mom, you have to be careful. That thing, the thing making the lines, it’s still here. Other ghosts, they see it, and they’re afraid.”

“Lines?” Antoinette said.

“Lines! Cuts, in the world! I can see through them, and sometimes things go through them. And ... and the lines are making something. I don’t want to go there. I don’t!”

The Prince raised a hand slowly. “Mary, listen to me carefully.”

“I don’t want to go there! I—”

“Mary!” Antoinette cut through the specter’s words with a shout of pure ice, a voice she did not want to use. But it silenced the ghost, and left her and her mother staring at her, shocked. Good. “Mary, tell me, have you seen what has created these lines, these cuts in the world?”

She shook her head, body trembling and vibrating. Even as she spoke, she began to fade away. “It’s dark where it comes from, Mom’s sire. It’s dark. Even the strange things that sometimes come through, the ones that can talk and have claws, it’s not dark where they come from. Where this thing comes from, it’s ... it’s dark. So ... dark...”

~~Natasha~~

Someone was watching Maria’s home.

Natasha growled under her breath, and reached for her pistol. Still there, in its vest holster. She reached for her other pistol. Still there, opposite side, and armed with silver bullets. Knives? Still there, one silver, the other normal. A—normal? What metal were knives usually made of? Steel? She whipped out her phone and made a quick note to look up the answer later.

She wrapped herself in Face in the Crowd, and slowly approached the Grand Cathedral from a fair distance. A quick peek up at a nearby building through her binoculars showed an Uratha was watching the building, and a second peek revealed it was Noah. He was a pragmatic Uratha, and probably did the math already that Maria couldn't be trusted. Tash wouldn't be able to appeal to his empathy, like she could Matt and Art. If he saw Natasha going into the cathedral, he'd report it to Avery, and that'd lead to awkward conversations.

So, better he never knew.

As she grew closer to the huge building, she escalated her Obfuscate Discipline, wrapping herself in her best Cloak of Night. Training with Daniel had definitely upped the quality, and she felt pretty sure she could avoid a werewolf's senses, even when moving forward.

She shivered as a deadly memory jumped up from her past. Her, hiding in the darkness, from a group of monsters that turned out to be a bunch of werewolves. That'd been such a terrifying night, and in the end, they'd been able to catch her. Of course there'd been a bunch of them, and they'd been strong enough to rip through metal and concrete in the pursuit. This time there was only one, and she was much better now.

She hopped over the fence. Nothing stopping her from just walking through the front door, except she wouldn't be able to cloak a door opening. If Noah saw the door open but no one going in or out, he'd investigate. She didn't want that. This was going to be a private conversation, and she had to have a face-to-face for it.

Unlike the Hisil, getting into the cathedral through a side entrance would be easy. She walked toward the back of the church, and—and found another werewolf! Caleb, the hothead. Ok, one werewolf keeping an eye on the cathedral, she could understand. Two? It wasn't like the pack was large and had the bodies to spare. Were they preparing to run into Maria's den now? No. Judging from how Noah and Caleb were patrolling at a distance, they were just keeping an eye on things.

That's how wolves did things. They hunted as a pack, but they also had scouts that would roam and stalk potential prey. They didn't just blitzkrieg the enemy like a bunch of Carthians. And that meant she had to be extra careful.

Climbing the cathedral was super easy, compared to the Hisil's version. A hop up onto the slopped roof, and then in through one of the windows. She did her damndest to keep every motion slow, and found a window darkened by one of the cathedral's towers to open. Unless someone was watching with night vision goggles, they wouldn't notice the window gently sliding open, and her slipping in.

The nave was empty. She knew some Kindred occasionally visited, like her childe Vivi. For kine turned Kindred who found their life over and a second life given to them in a corpse that sucked life out of others, soul searching was inevitable. Many who turned to Longinus's teachings were either religious before their embrace, or became religious, in some bid to find meaning in their second lives. She could never understand that way of thinking, but it worked for Damien, and even Vivi.

Now she realized she'd been half hoping Vivi was here. They didn't talk anymore, but not for any drama reason. They just grew apart. It'd be fun to catch up with her, talk about her growing role in the Invictus, and her interest in the Lancea et Sanctum. But if the Uratha killed Maria, there'd be no revival of the Lancea et Sanctum. Damien probably wouldn't be able to do it alone.

Natasha didn't care about the Lancea et Sanctum, not really. She cared about finding the truth. What Mekhet didn't?

She rubbed her arms as she walked down the isle, and stopped in front of the pulpit. A bible sat on its wood surface, and she smiled at it as she stepped around. It was hard to imagine Maria standing up and giving lectures to listening Kindred. It was hard to imagine Damien doing it too, but then, the first time Natasha had ever seen Damien, he'd been doing just that. She'd snuck into Tony's old lair, and found Damien helping out some Kindred with understanding their faith.

She smiled at the memory. A lifetime ago. And Damien had been so strangely suave and charismatic when talking about Longinus, that Tash now had a hard time thinking it was even the same person she knew now. He even had a girlfriend now. A very horny girlfriend. A very drunk, horny girlfriend.

Maybe Fiona enjoyed playing up the stereotype? Fiery redhead from Scotland who loved to drink and fuck? She seemed like an airhead on the surface, but no one who lived in the paranormal world could stay like that for long. No, Fiona was smarter than she let on, and probably just had fun acting like the girl she could no longer be, since a nightmare monster came along and decided to share a body with her.

Tash shook her head, trying to dislodge the images of that night. Everyone topless! Which, now that she thought about it, wasn't really all that shocking, at least not in the amount of new skin. She'd seen the Prince naked, and Jack, and her boyfriends of course, and Jessy, and Eric, and Fiona; she'd caught Jessy fucking Eric one time in Bloodlust, with Fiona right there. Newcomers to her mental catalogue of people's breasts and chests: Elaine and Damien. Elaine looked like everyone knew she looked like, the tall, glamorous, busty blonde model look, with a hint of harshness in her eyes that reminded Tash of her old boss Viktor. Scary. And Damien would have fit perfectly on a Twilight poster.

Matt and Art had teased her unendingly when they got her home, partly because they were drunk, and partly because they saw that Tash had found the situation highly arousing. She'd gotten a bit angry at them, and they apologized. As they fucked her. Damn boys!

But, seeing how comfortable everyone was with each other, had put Natasha into a certain mindset again. She was excited to make her next movie, something really naughty and dark. Maybe too dark? It was just a movie though, a fantasy, not real!

She stopped, blinked, and shook her head harder this time. Stop. Thinking. About. Sex. Ugh, Jessy's corruption was complete, so complete Natasha was thinking about sex while on a dangerous mission, and in a church!

It wasn't just that. What she was doing now could potentially put her at odds with the Uratha, and that meant she might lose Matthew and Arturo. She was thinking about them, because if she made a mistake, they could be out of her life. Bad, because she'd lose out on the best sex she'd ever had, and was getting frequently. Worse, she'd lose out on an amazing relationship with two amazing men, men who cared about her, men who ... might love her.

Maybe she should have invited them? It'd have been really mean to put them between her and their boss like that. Help her, make Avery angry. Pick Avery over her, and hurt her feelings. So she'd made the choice for them, which was kinda mean, too. But this was her choice, and she didn't want them put between a rock and a hard place.

Sighing, she stepped toward the organ in the back, and then around back where the curving wall held a door. Then she went down, and down, into Maria's den. The woman had spent decades carving herself out a long hall in the rock, and Natasha shivered as she looked at the beautiful stone. Tiny lights lit the way, but it didn't take long before she came to the first barrier of bars.

Bars wouldn't stop a determined Kindred or paranormal, but they would stop a kine, at least momentarily. A moment was all that was needed for a quartet of highly trained ghouls armed with sniper rifles, explosives, and flamethrowers to take down anyone trying to break their way in while Maria slept, and that included almost any paranormal who was up during the day. At night, Maria had only one ghoul, a disfigured, jolly man with a hunch back, who happily kept Maria company, and her den clean. At night, Maria felt more than comfortable defending herself against any threat.

So, being the brilliant mastermind Natasha was, she knocked on the bars. "Hello?"

After a few long moments, Maria's ghoul sauntered up to the gate. It took him a while, being that he had to open the other gates in the way too, but he arrived eventually, and smiled at her.

"Natasha."

"Hello Matthias. How are you?"

The man smiled again, mouth a little crooked and warped, and he dialed in a code on the wall panel. The bars raised, and he smiled wider.

"Good. Good." Nodding as if everything in the world was right, the man began the walk through the long tunnel back to Maria's den, and he did it quite slowly.

"Damien here?"

"No. Only me and the master." After a small grunt of acknowledgment, he nodded to her again, and stopped following her. Apparently he'd noticed a bit of dirt on the floor, and since the man was never without his broom, he got to sweeping, leaving Natasha to go on without him.

Natasha returned the man's smile, and gave him a small pat on the arm, his smaller arm. The touch surprised him, and he flinched away slightly, but when he realized what'd happened, he smiled at her again, and got back to sweeping. Far as Tash knew, Maria treated Matthias well, but the man's mind had never really settled into adulthood. He was damaged, and Tash knew to be gentle with him.

She moved on, and after passing a few more gates already opened, she came into Maria's den. A giant dome room, with huge paintings on the curved stone walls and ceiling, hanging curtains, and various desks covered in old tomes. There was a grand piano, and near it against the wall, a very Gothic casket, huge, the sort of casket a rich family would get their dead lord, three hundred years ago.

Maria sat at the piano, playing some classical piece Natasha didn't recognize. Maria was a virtuoso, and could play anything anyone else could. She could play it blindfolded, given a few days to memorize the sheet music. When Natasha saw the movie Gattaca, there'd been a minor bit where the actors mentioned a pianist who had twelve fingers, and how there was music only he could play. Maria wouldn't need twelve fingers.

She wore her usual white dress, something a rich woman might wear by her lonesome, two hundred years ago. White mist leaked from the cracks in her ruined skin, and disappeared on the floor like dry ice fog, something that even seasoned Kindred tried to avoid having touch them. Nosferatu came with many sorts of mutations and deviations, from hidden, huge crocodile mouths and snake eyes like Beatrice, to Bob, a classic Nosferatu vampire from the movies, to Kindred like Maria, who looked like a corpse risen from a lake and possessed by a ghost or something. The mist was harmless though, and Natasha ignored it as she approached.

“Madam Turio,” she said. “I ... H-How are you?”

“Madam Vola.” Her crackling, dry voice was soft, and Natasha almost didn’t hear it over the music. The elder continued to play. “I trust you are doing well?”

“I am.” She came closer, until she eventually stood beside her old boss, and the huge piano she played.

Maria’s eyes didn’t meet Natasha’s, and they didn’t look to the sheet music in front of her either. They locked onto her fingers and didn’t let go, as if she could see something in her ruined skin Natasha couldn’t.

“Does your career in the Ordo Dracul blossom?”

“Um, sorta? It’s ... it’s d-definitely a weird covenant. The Prince is slow to show me secrets, but when she does, it’s...” Scary.

“Yes, I imagine your time with the dragons will be filled with strange things. Terrifying things. That is why you originally left them, is it not?”

“I...” Sighing, Natasha stepped in a little closer, and set her hands on the side of the piano. “It was, and it still is. B-But, I’ve learned a lot since then, and I think I’m ... I’m strong enough now, to deal with it.” She smiled at Maria, and though Maria didn’t lift her eyes, Tash knew her old boss saw it. “You’re part of the reason for that.”

Maria’s playing faltered. Just a moment, a fraction of a second where Maria hit a note a little softer than she should have. That was more vulnerability than Maria ever let show.

“I made your life difficult, Natasha.”

Hearing Maria drop the titles was enough to make Natasha’s hand slip, and she almost fell. That wouldn’t have been a fun way to have this important, and quickly turning emotional conversation with her old boss, with a split lip.

“Y-Yeah, you did. But, you also gave me responsibilities. A lot of p-people think I’m just a ... weak little Mekhet. But you helped me become a Right Hand of the Invictus. Daniel may be my sire, b-but ... I first learned how to take care of myself from you.”

Maria’s playing didn’t falter this time, but she did smile, a tiny thing that her broken lips struggled to make. “Why have you come to my den?”

“I ... w-wanted to talk, about ... stuff.”

Without slowing her playing, Maria sighed and shrugged. “I don’t talk as much as I should, I suppose. Ever since Lucas disappeared, so long ago, I don’t talk to anyone, save for Matthias.”

“What about Damien?”

She smiled at the mention of the young man, and shook her head. “It is painful, to look at the man sometimes. He looks and behaves nothing like his sire, but I can sometimes see hints of Lucas in him. Sire to childe, I suppose.”

“Have you, um, ever considered siring someone?”

“No. I do not wish this Nosferatu curse on anyone.” That was more compassion from Maria than Natasha expected. Maria was a cold, cruel, calculating woman, and to hear her openly admit to an act of empathy was alien to her ears. Maria noticed her notice, and she shook her head as she closed her eyes, still playing. “Nosferatu are twisted, Vola. They rarely sire unless they are compelled by their scarred minds to do so. And what Kindred who do not kill themselves upon awakening and seeing their deformities, slowly grow to be as twisted as their sires. I would not inflict that madness on anyone, unless I had to.”

That, was true. Nosferatu were generally the least counted of the blood clans, because of the reasons Maria said. They hated themselves. Only Nosferatu who were either psychotic, or twisted up with resentment, were willing to pass on their curse. Sometimes, it was easy to forget that not all Kindred could take a friendly stroll in public.

“M ... Maria, I wanted to talk to you about—”

“About whether the rumors about me are true. About whether I am actually delving into dark arts, and attempting to resurrect my lover Lucas.”

Natasha just stared at Maria, which must have looked amusing, because Maria looked at her, laughed a quiet, crackling sound, and looked back down at her fingers as she played.

“You know?”

“Of course I know, young vampire. I do not need to be Mekhet to understand the value of information. I have more ghouls than Matthias, and many thralls. Not long ago, I was council member of the Invictus. I am now the only thing keeping the Second Estate alive in Dolareido, save Damien.” At last, she stopped playing, and slowly closed the lid over the piano keys, before looking at Natasha with an amused, disappointed look. “Surely you know better than to think I wouldn’t know.”

“I ... I um ... It’s just that, it’s...”

“And I know that Avery has taken an interest.”

Natasha froze. “You d-do?”

“Of course. She watches me now, convinced I am up to no good.” Sighing, Maria ran a finger through her long, black, ruined hair, and groaned with frustration. “She lacks subtly. The fool woman is but a child compared to me, and knows nothing of Dolareido. Her first visit was short lived, and her second visit will be as well, if she continues to push me.”

The details of Avery’s first visit were sparse. Kindred didn’t like sharing information if they didn’t have to, and this was quickly turning into a situation where some more information about Avery, and Simon, and even Minerva, would be useful.

After a few moments of silence, Natasha dug deep, found some courage hidden in a corner, and spoke up.

“Maria, w-what caused Avery, and Simon, to kill Minerva?”

The elder looked down and away. “You should ask Jacob.”

“I can’t! He’d ... he’d never tell me.” She’d gotten the man’s attention once, and she’d prefer to not get it again.

“Yes, well, you should hear it from him, not me. And, poor Jacob, Avery still has not told him the details of it anyway.”

“But this isn’t about Jacob anymore. This is about ... about you.” She could say that, right? She promised Avery she wouldn’t tell Maria about what the werewolves were doing, about digging up evidence in the Hisil against her. And she wouldn’t. But Maria already knew about the rumors, so, it was ok to talk about related things, right?

Self deception, the worst kind of lies.

“I suppose it is about me, isn’t it?” She got up and walked toward a big wooden desk, with a huge, well worn leather chair behind it. On top of the desk was a laptop, but mostly it was covered in big old books. The tome of Longinus was obvious, not dusty at all, and she ran a finger along its cover as she settled in her seat. “Rumors abound that I’m speaking with dark creatures in darker shadows, that I commune with demons or spirits, that I enact terrible rituals, bathe in the blood of virgins, and sew together the body parts of the dead, all in some desperate attempt to revive Lucas.”

Those were the rumors, but Tash didn't say it. Maria felt like talking, and years of having her as a boss taught Natasha to shut up when Maria spoke. She didn't do it often, and when she did, it paid to pay attention.

“I cannot blame people for thinking that,” she continued. “I can, however, blame them for thinking I am some heathen witch of the Circle, dancing naked around a sacrifice under the full moon.”

Natasha almost giggled, until she realized Maria wasn't joking.

“They ... d-do that?”

“That, and worse.” Sighing, Maria slumped in her chair, abandoning her normally regal posture, and stared down at the books on her desk. “I let the ants scurry and trade useless rumors. They cannot harm me.”

“M-Maybe not, but the Uratha—”

“Let the Uratha watch. They will find nothing.” She groaned, raised a hand to her face, and half covered it in her fingers like she was clawing away the irritation in her mind. “The damn dogs will find nothing here. Perhaps they would be better off chasing Beatrice? Kine disappear from the streets at an increasing rate, all by her hand. And yet it is I people assume tamper with ungodly forces to resurrect my love?”

“Wait, what?”

“The witch Beatrice, she steals kine off the streets, likely to be sacrificed in some horrible ritual. And what possible reason could a witch her age have to perform such disgusting acts?”

Natasha gulped and looked down. The spirits in the Hisil, the ones obsessed with flesh, they said nothing about Beatrice. What was going on?

“As for Minerva,” Maria continued, “she died because Simon was an impulsive idiot. Jacob and the Prince know more details than I, but Minerva was attempting to find ways to commune with spirits. That in and of itself is not something extreme that warrants murder, and yet, Simon and his pack killed her for it, or something related.”

“Indeed,” Maria said. “What could little Minerva have been up to, to earn their wrath? Doubtless whatever rituals she was performing to commune with the other side were endangering the balance those bloody dogs are so concerned with. And few knew how much Jacob and Minerva loved each other, and how much information they shared.” Growling, she slammed a palm against the desk, and Natasha jumped as the impact sound echoed sharply in the large dome cavern of rock around them. “Suspicion is pointed to me! And yet it is that blasted witch who has the tools to reach across the barrier, to ask the spirits for their aid. Doubtless Beatrice seeks to raise her dead lover, and I ... I do not blame her. The idea has crossed my mind countless times, Natasha. To have that fool in my arms again? I have indeed contemplated the depths of depravity I’d be willing to sink to, to have that in my second life again, and I...” She ground her teeth until Natasha could hear it, and the elder looked down at the table with defeat.

Information overload. Mental note! Learn more about whatever Beatrice was up to. If Julias’s death had hurt her that badly, then doing something crazy, especially with Jacob and Black Blood’s help, was entirely possible. Maybe the spirits had it wrong? Maybe Beatrice was contacting them, and telling them her name was Maria, to throw people off?

And Minerva. Antoinette had only told her a little about Minerva, and Maria filled in the holes. Minerva was doing something to the Gauntlet, and the werewolves killed her for it. But what exactly?

“You’re ... n-not trying to resurrect Lucas.”

“No, I am not. I have delved into Theban Sorcery before, and found it ... well, the details of my exploring will remain my own. But I have touched its secrets, and have found mysteries hidden within the many tomes I managed to recover from Lucas’s archives. Talk of resurrection was rare, and what few authors were willing to speak of it were obviously terrified.” She motioned for Natasha to come closer. After a second’s hesitation, she did, only after becoming painfully aware that she’d told no one she was coming here, and she’d snuck in. If Maria killed her for some sort of resurrection ritual, no one would know. Eep. “Something is amiss in this city, Natasha. I am sure you’re aware of it. Something sinister plots underneath us all. And now werewolves are at my door, as if guided.”

Natasha stared, dumbstruck, and did her best to not look like she knew exactly what Maria was talking about. “You think you’re ... b-being framed?”

“I have done terrible things in my centuries of life, Natasha Vola. In my younger days, I slaughtered an entire village once, when they discovered what I was. Rather than let them arm themselves with fire and force, I killed the group that discovered me, and killed the rest while they slept. Men, women, children.” The elder’s voice was cold, solid, and she met Natasha’s shocked gaze as if her eyes bared her soul. Maybe they did. “I have ... I have done many things. But to violate the laws of God to such a degree? To rip a soul from the great beyond? We are already damned creatures, Natasha. Why would I dare invite such judgment from all the Almighty upon me?”

That, was something Natasha hadn't considered. Maria Turio was a devout worshiper of God, and follower of the path of Longinus, even when she officially served as a leader in the Invictus Council of Dolareido. Everything pointed to Maria being the one doing something sinister in the city, the strange rumors, the talk of resurrection that came out of nowhere, the spirits in the Hisil that spoke of her and a ritual, everything. But Maria was the last person in the city who'd do something as unholy as using dark magic to resurrect someone.

"The T-Testament of Longinus, it doesn't ... support resurrection, in some way?" She'd read the book, but it was large and, just like the Christian bible, filled with vague references, contradictions, and passages that could be interpreted a million different ways. Studying it would have been an exercise in futility.

"It speaks of the unholy act of the embrace, of siring childer, and how vile — and necessary — such an act is. It speaks of the path Kindred must follow, of the work we must perform, if we ever wish to see the light of God. But true resurrection? To be raised from the dead, whole? The Testament of Longinus specifically says only one thing about it: that only God controls the fate of the dead." She shivered as she said it, and set a single hand on the book. "Who am I to defy God's will? No. No, I would never do such a thing."

"Then the rumors..."

"Perhaps started by some Carthian under Garry's influence? To stain my name and cause problems. Or perhaps started by whatever it is that lurks within the city. I do not know. But when I find out, little Vola, I am going to bestow a Nightmare upon them so fierce and horrendous, they will wish they had never been born."

~~Jack~~

“Ladies, uh, I think Elaine and I were going to try out some kinda ... ritual thing, right?” He squirmed and wriggled, but the women burying him didn’t move.

Antoinette, Elaine, Ashley, and Julee all either sat on him or lay on him, and had done a damn good job of pinning him to the bed. He wasn’t getting up without using vitae to do it, and that would definitely spoil the fun mood everyone was in. Ashley and Julee didn’t normally get to enjoy a whole bout of sex from beginning to end without someone Kissing them, so they were in particularly cheerful moods.

“Are you suggesting we should stop?” Elaine said, and she grinned down at him from where she sat on his stomach, her knees snug against his sides under his armpits. Naked, she gently eased her body back and forth along his abs, and a shiver ran through her as Antoinette, sat behind her, slid her fingertips up and down Elaine’s stomach.

Elaine was tall, but Antoinette was damn tall, and she grinned over Elaine’s shoulder down at Jack. She’d sat on his pelvis, with full intent on fucking him after Jack had made a mess on Elaine’s breasts, at least until Jack interjected just now. Yeah, he was an idiot, but it was obvious that being around Elaine sorta broke Antoinette’s normal control. Since her old friend’s arrival, she’d fuck him all night every night with Elaine. Kinda like when friends get back together after having been apart for years, they sorta devolve back into how they were when they last hung out.

Apparently, Antoinette and Elaine were total sex addicts when they got together.

He tried to lift his arm, but Ashley lay along it, pinning it, and she cuddled into it and him as she looked up to watch what Antoinette did to Elaine’s body. Julee did the same for his other arm, and she sighed dreamily as she watched.

And Jack couldn't help but watch too as his lover slid both her hands up to Elaine's cum-soaked breasts, and massaged. First slowly, in gentle, teasing motions that circled the woman's swollen nipples, before sinking her fingers into her friend's breasts until they almost disappeared in the softness. His white cum slipped out from between her fingers, only for Antoinette to spread it around in circular patterns, until her hands cupped the undersides of Elaine's breasts. Then, she squeezed, and drew her fingers forward, like she was milking Elaine, and his cum dripped off the blonde's hard nipples and onto Jack's abs.

"I ... I'm afraid I have to insist. There's only so many hours in the night, and—"

Antoinette pressed her chest into Elaine's back, and her breasts were big enough Jack could see their contours squashed outward by the contact. Her left hand continued to massage the ever increasingly horny Elaine, while her right hand drifted down, and down, and down the tall blonde's flat stomach, before settling on her slit. And with an evil grin, Antoinette slipped her fingers into Elaine's body.

Ashley, Julee, and Jack all stared, hypnotized, as Antoinette fingered Elaine like playing an instrument she'd mastered. The shifting of her hand was obviously massaging Elaine's swollen clitoris, while her fingers curled and pressed against the woman's insides toward her front. And while she did that, Antoinette's left hand continued to play with the woman's breasts, with obvious focus on caressing the woman's nipples, like she might for herself.

Two minutes later, Elaine came, for what was probably the seventh time that night. A couple drops of her juices leaked out from between Antoinette's already drenched fingers, and onto Jack's stomach. As she came, Elaine leaned back, and turned her head enough so Antoinette could happily kiss and suckle the woman's naked neck.

It only got more hypnotic as Elaine, apparently not satisfied, took over breast-massaging duty. She cupped her breasts and caressed her nipples with gentle twists and full, heavy kneading motions, each causing Jack's cum to swirl around on her skin. It freed Antoinette to use both hands on the woman's pussy, and force in more fingers, and more, until Elaine groaned openly. With what must have been five fingers inside her, she pumped her hips toward Antoinette's hand, and smiled like an evil succubus down at Jack, as she again climaxed.

And just like Antoinette, she had no trouble remaining in full control during orgasm. She set her wet hands on Jack's chest, leaned forward, and humped Antoinette's fingers as she came, all the while grinning down at him, her enormous, coated breasts bouncing lightly underneath her. She came again, and again, each earning some loud, pleased groans from the Ventrue, and each earning more trickling drops of her fluids.

After five minutes of that madness, Antoinette finally stopped, and pushed Elaine off him. She wasn't gentle, and Elaine bounced on the bed a couple times, landing beside Julee.

"There, you harlot. Satisfied?"

Elaine laughed, and climbed onto Julee. "Not yet."

Jack rolled his eyes, but he couldn't help but turn his head to watch Elaine as she pressed her breasts down onto Julee, sank her fingers into the ghoul's smooth, tiny slit, and simultaneously sank her fangs into her neck. Julee came in seconds.

"Sometimes I wonder which of us is the Daeva." Rolling her eyes, Antoinette leaned forward, pressed her body down on Jack, and kissed him. "I will be coming to this ritual."

"You will? You uh, normally let Daniel keep an eye on me during this sort of stuff." It was hard to focus on the conversation, with Elaine only inches away, facing toward him and Julee. Her breasts were squashed on Julee's, and jiggling as the woman pumped her hand up and down inside Julee's trembling body. The ghoul's hips and legs went up into the air, and splashing sounds filled the room as Elaine fingered the squeaking girl so hard, the bed shook. It was a huge bed.

“Oui, but I would not be a good ruler if I did not examine things for myself, once in a while. And Daniel is preoccupied.”

The sheriff, preoccupied. He almost asked, but stopped himself. If she said preoccupied, it was probably a secret, and he was happier not learning anymore secrets these days.

“This is a very scary room,” he said. “And, it kinda looks like what I thought the inside of a mad mathematical genius's mind would look like.” He pointed down at the symbols drawn, or etched, into the floor in some sort of version of the Fibonacci sequence, white lines cut into the black marble.

“Perhaps it was?” Antoinette said, smiling at him. She sat at a large table, a very long thing covered in laptops and smart phones and tablets, and several chairs waited for people to sit in them. Only Antoinette and Elaine did though, both looking into their own laptop screens, while Jack stood in the center of the room, on the center of the strange design underneath him.

If this was what it felt like to be a specimen of some kind, trapped in a big glass jar while scientists poked and prodded, he officially now felt bad for the specimens, and Elaine and Antoinette hadn't even gotten to poking and prodding him yet.

“Um, I ... I know you're both pretty high ranking members of the Ordo Dracul, right?”

“Correct,” Elaine said, eyes still on her laptop.

“And from what I know, dragons, they ... do a lot of experiments, right?”

“Correct,” Antoinette said, mirroring Elaine’s tone and posture. Creepy.

“You’re not going to tie me up, cut me open, and examine my insides, are you?”

The two women laughed, the sort of laugh a doctor might make when a patient makes a joke they’d heard a thousand times. A joke they might still find funny, but one they’d heard before. A professional, practiced laugh, and he suddenly felt less like a specimen, and more like he did during his first dentist visit as a kid. Fucking. Terrified.

“We will monitor the situation closely,” the Prince said, with a voice far too similar to the aforementioned dentist. “I do many experiments here, my love. But none of them are gruesome.”

Elaine chuckled, and this time, she sounded less the professional dentist, and more like a crazy mad doctor, like Frankenstein in the movies. “Dragons never share where they do their really gruesome experiments.”

He groaned and hugged himself until he was almost crushing his suit jacket. He’d partly expected to be doing this naked, either because the ritual would require it, or because the two women would want to have some fun at his expense. Wearing a suit was comforting, and he was glad to have it, especially now.

Antoinette tapped a few things on her laptop, and then a strange humming sound filled the room. Jack raised a brow as he looked at the two women, but neither of them indicated that something was wrong. The lights turned off, and Jack spun around in a panic, but again the two women showed no sign of movement in the hint of light that remained. The hum grew louder, and changed in pitch, apparently adjusting as the two ladies did something on their laptops.

Then the chandelier over him turned on. His head snapped up, and he blinked several times as his eyes adjusted to the strange blue light. It wasn't a normal looking chandelier. It was huge, and it had giant crystals where you'd normally find light bulbs or candles. He'd noticed the crystals held strange blue flame when he'd come in, but he just figured it was ornamental or something. Antoinette did spend a lot of money on some crazy aesthetic stuff.

It definitely wasn't an ornament. The blue fires inside the crystals grew and grew, until the whole room was blue. The light danced, never perfectly solid, flickering and swaying the way fire does. Beautiful, but it was pretty unnerving to be directly under a huge chandelier that looked like it belonged in Hades.

“Um, is this the ritual?”

“We are attempting to find the wavelength that the curse operates on, Jack,” Elaine said, “if it operates on one at all. Give us time.”

“Wavelength?”

Antoinette nodded, stood up, and approached him with a tablet in hand, camera pointed at him. “Yes. I cannot elaborate further my love, unless you wished to join the Ordo?”

“Um, nah.” He shook his head, and smiled up at Antoinette as she started to circle him, her eyes still on the tablet with it pointed at him. “I don't think crazy experiments and stuff are really my thing.”

“Oh?”

He laughed. They'd had this conversation before, but it was fun to repeat it. “Money, power, those things I get. Crazy experiments delving into ... weird stuff? No thanks.”

Elaine joined Antoinette, pointing her own tablet at him and tapping on various things on its screen. “You would happily live your second life as a lawyer, I assume.”

“Fuck yeah I would. Arguing for a living? Love it.”

“Lawyers are quite attractive,” Antoinette said. “Though, I suspect much of that is due to the attractiveness some evil characters carry.”

Elaine nodded, and swiped her finger across the tablet. “A man with power, money, and intelligence? Quite attractive. Powerful and forceful? Deliriously so. Why, as a rich, successful lawyer, you could have four women in your bed at the snap of your fingers.”

“Four?” Antoinette said. “How salacious.”

“Hey! I’ve never ... snapped my fingers.” He frowned at the two evil women and put his hands in his pockets with defiance.

“Of course not,” Elaine said, “you are not a lawyer. Once you become a licensed attorney, finger snapping will come naturally. I —” She froze, her eyes widened, and she stared at the screen like she was watching a horror movie.

“W-What? What’re you looking at?”

Antoinette checked Elaine’s tablet, and her eyes went wide as well. Welp, time to get super fucking paranoid.

“It is ... as the Begotten describe,” she said.

“You can see that?”

“Hints of it, of ... blackness, of tendrils that wrap you.”

He groaned and rubbed his head. “Sounds like the curse, yeah.”

“And something else, my love. Hints of the past.”

“The past?”

Elaine glared at the screen, and she shivered. Which of course dialed Jack’s worry up to eleven. The elders didn’t get scared over anything, but the look on Elaine and Antoinette’s face was pretty damn close.

“The Strix,” Elaine said.

“The Strix? Those ... owl things?”

His great grandsire nodded. “Striges, strange creatures of ephemera that haunt Kindred, and specifically Kindred. They stalk us, twist and manipulate, and cause strife of unparalleled insanity. Wherever the Strix are found, tragedy for Kindred follows.”

“Fuuuuuck. You can see them?”

Elaine lowered the tablet, and the look she gave him fucking hurt, like, she was a mom apologizing to their kid that Christmas was canceled. “Two perch upon your shoulders.”

He immediately tried dusting off his shoulders, like anyone would if they found a spider camping out there. “Really? Like ... actually, right now?”

“Worry not,” Antoinette said. “We are looking at the scars of the past. Elaine, if you would?”

With a heavy nod, the elder stepped into the circle beside him, and Antoinette pointed her tablet at her.

“Anything?”

“Non. You are clean, old friend.”

“Good. If those ... things, were irremovable, I would...” Sighing again, she looked down at Jack, and pat him on the shoulder. “I suppose I knew, especially now that you have told me so much, great grandchilde. But I never thought it would be so...”

“You two are really freaking me out. Can I see?”

Antoinette shook her head. “Alas, I cannot record beings of ephemera, or the scars left upon it. The lens we use to gaze upon these living memories is custom, and the software of these devices cannot see what our eyes can.”

Of course.

“Sounds kinda like the Northern Lights,” he said. “I’d heard old cameras couldn’t get them on film.”

“Indeed,” Antoinette said. “I cannot share the secrets I know, but I am comfortable sharing that ephemera defies recording. Entities, such as spirits, or ... ghosts, resist film, analog or digital. When they can be captured, they are blurs, or glowing eyes, rarely more.”

“I guess that explains a lot. If people could actually take pictures of ghosts, then—”

“Then the supernatural world would be known to all,” Elaine said. “The world of the paranormal resists discovery. The Beast knows how to hide us from lens and mirror. Werewolves can somehow twist the minds of those nearby, driving them mad with lunacy. Begotten are ... beyond my understanding.”

“For all we owe these gifts,” Antoinette said, “they are not perfect. Given time, humanity will discover us. They will find vampire and werewolf, monster and spirit, ghost and specter, and I will see to it that when they do, they do not fall upon us with weapons of the future.”

Elaine smiled down at Jack and rolled her eyes, before walking back over to her friend. “Yes, I know of your delusions, Ann.”

Antoinette copied Elaine's eye roll, but didn't retort. "I am sorry my love, that I could not find more. But this does give Elaine and I a starting point." She took both tablets back to the table, turned down the chandelier until it was only a soft glow of blue, and turned the regular lights back on.

"And," Elaine said, "my ghouls have sent more information to us. There is talk of something I did, from well before I met Ann. Something I did involving the sacrifice of animals to quiet my insides."

"Insides?"

"Insides. The journals were always vague, and the few that survived the centuries tell little. And many were ... written by a woman driven mad by urges she could not understand."

He winced and looked down. Yeah, he knew those urges, back when the curse was locked up tight. It'd been slowly turning him into a psychopath, someone that reveled in murder and butchery, and it blinded him to using his brain. Who knew how long Elaine dealt with that before she found a way to remove it? Decades? A century?

And that was a problem, that Elaine had experienced the curse when it was bound and locked up, but never when it was freed. She'd somehow purged it, but it'd still been trapped by the binding at the time. Would whatever Elaine managed to dig up even work for him?

"This ... this new Jack," he said, "in my head. Did he show up on your tablet thing?"

Elaine sighed again, and walked over to the table to rejoin Antoinette. Both shook their heads.

“No, little Ventrue,” the Prince said. “This voice that speaks to you, if it ... if he were a creature of ephemera, I feel confident my device would have been able to expose him. We found marks of the curse, and the scars of the striges, but that is all.”

Groaning, he walked up to them and stood by the table. “Anything vampire-y ever show up on that thing? Like, ever try to see the Beast, or something?”

Antoinette managed a weak smile for him. “I tell you this in good faith. Please do not share it, with anyone.”

“Done.”

“I have attempted to discover the Beast and the soul, but have found neither. I suspect they exist somewhere protected, beyond my reach. For now. My device can see when Kindred use various abilities, those that reach out beyond themselves, such as Majesty or Dominate. But no more.”

“Powerful machine. I won’t tell anyone about it, honest.”

The Prince nodded. “Very good. Of course, Natasha and Daniel know of it, and your mother has seen it as well, but I would still prefer you do not speak of it with them. Secrets can be slippery things.”

He nodded, walked around, and kissed her. “I get ya. Don’t need to be a dragon to appreciate the value of a secret.”

“Yeah, gonna head back to my place. My ... new place.” A mansion. A big, empty mansion.

“Ah yes. That is an interesting problem to have, my love.” She closed her laptop, turned off the tablets, and turned to face him, voice growing serious again. “I would have recommended against creating ghouls or thralls, considering the curse. But then again, you have become an ... infamous figure in Dolareido, and perhaps beyond. Acquiring ghouls and thralls is important, if you are to defend large, unwieldy assets, such as a mansion.”

“Agreed,” Elaine said. “And now that we know we can at least see hints of the curse in Antoinette’s device, or at least Jack’s freed curse, perhaps we could examine anyone with whom he shares his blood?”

Antoinette nodded. “Agreed.”

“I ... I guess you’re right. The curse, or New Jack or whatever, is pretty damn self serving. I doubt any ghoul I create is going to want to betray it, and by extension me. If anything, they’d probably be more infatuated with me than the typical ghoul.” Which brought its own share of scares. The last thing he wanted was a Misery situation.

“It is not all bad, my childe.” Elaine put on the sweetest, most evil smile, and she leaned forward over the table toward him. “Most Kindred’s first ghoul is someone they find physically attractive.”

Uh oh. He knew where this was gonna go.

“Ah, ben oui, you must look at the bright side.” Antoinette turned to face him fully in her chair, and combed her hair over a shoulder as she grinned at him. “If you do bring a ghoul into service, or two, or three, by all means, find ones you are attracted to. I would happily put on a show for them as they watched. Perhaps, with time and trust, they could even join us in bed?”

Jack put up his hands and shook his head. “Let’s, uh, put that idea on hold for a moment then, k? Cause four women draining me dry is already a lot. Seven is—”

“A delightful time,” Elaine said. “Imagine it, Jack. You, sitting back in your lover’s arms, head between her breasts, watching as six women suckle and pleasure each other. Each time a woman was ready for you, just shy of orgasm, they would be placed on your shaft, and would cum immediately. Round and round it would go, women taking turns creating a glorious spectacle. Whoever was lucky enough to have you cum inside them would be rewarded with a Kiss.”

He stared at his great grandsire, and the room went silent as everyone absorbed the utter absurdity that was Elaine’s sex drive.

“You’re crazy, you know that?”

“Pfft. Your lover, the high and mighty Prince of Dolareido, has played such games before, and with larger numbers.”

Jack gulped and looked down at Antoinette. “Uh, you have?”

“I have indeed, but with men, of course.”

He shook his head in a desperate attempt to stop thinking about the images they were putting in his head, before a painful conversation jumped back up from memory. “Ah shit, that reminds me. I made a really stupid deal with Jessy. She wants to ... er, get to see ... us, you know? Like she has with Natasha.” Like the Prince and Elaine had with Natasha too, apparently.

“Ah, I see,” the Prince said, and she leaned back in her chair as she smiled up at him. “Does she seek a live performance?”

“What? No! No ... Well, I mean, she’d probably prefer that, but I think she’d be happy with a sex tape.” Ugh, sex tape. The fuck was he, a useless fashion influencer making headlines for no damn good reason?

“Does she wish to join in?” Elaine asked. “She seemed interested, at Bloodlust. Eric seemed resistant, but I am sure I could persuade him.”

Jack put up his hands like he was trying to stop an airplane from landing on his front lawn. “No! Jesus. That’d be beyond awkward. That night at Bloodlust was weird enough.”

The two women laughed. Would he be so shameless when he was five hundred years old? It was such a long time, it was hard to wrap his mind around it. Hell, neither could they, considering how many memories they’d lost to time.

“I’ll ... think about it, a ghoul I mean.” He turned, took a few steps toward the door, and looked over his shoulder at Antoinette. “You’d really be comfortable with another ghoul in the bed?”

“If she were your ghoul? But of course. You are comfortable with two of mine, after all. I would be comfortable with one of yours.” Her smile turned absolutely serpentine. “Or two, or ten.”

He gulped, waved, and left.

He fiddled with his necklace as he opened the door of the car, and stepped out onto his driveway, two things on his mind: the fact New Jack didn’t show up in Antoinette’s machine thing while other hints of the curse did, and an orgy. The first thought was very depressing. The second was very not. He smiled to himself as the car dropped him off in his mansion, and he entertained what Antoinette and Elaine had suggested.

“You’re one dude, Jack, with one dick. One rather normal-sized dick, I might add. Five women, or more? Good fucking god.” He laughed as he opened the door to the mansion, closed the big fancy door, and sat on the big fancy stairs. “But it would be pretty nice to have some ghouls taking care of this place. Who, though? I shouldn't go picking up random kine as ghouls. I should ... socialize, I guess. Hah, no wonder Mekhet rarely have ghouls, they suck at socializing even more than I do." He laughed again and rubbed his buzzed hair as he looked around.

Images danced through his mind of women dressed in playboy bunny outfits, dusting and sweeping and doting on his every need. He didn't really have any needs beyond blood and someone to take care of the mansion, and an army of playboy bunnies would do that perfectly. And of course, whenever Antoinette came to visit, she'd insist they all get naked and watch the Prince fuck him. After one or two bouts between Jack and Antoinette, then the bunnies would jump in and—

He slapped himself in the face, hard, enough to hear the sound crack. "Jessy. Blame Jessy. This is all her fault. I—"

Knock knock.

Groaning, and happy as fuck he wasn't Blushing Life so he wasn't sporting a stiffy, he got up and opened the door.

"Beatrice, hey."

"Hey Jack. Can I come in?"

"Yeah sure." He stepped back, let her in, and sat down at the stairs once again. She sat beside him, dressed in jeans and a black t-shirt. Black combat boots, too. "How you doing? How's Mom?"

"Heh, your mom? Why don't you ask her?"

"I do, occasionally. But I can't really think straight, knowing she and Jacob are together. Really gets under my skin."

"You hate him?"

“I ... don’t hate Jacob. But the man is—”

“Unpredictable. Chaotic. Fucked up and weird.”

“Ha, to say the least,” he said. “I was talking to him once, when Avery and Clara ran into us. Avery pleaded with the man to let the past go, and he uh ... well Clara got in his face a bit, and he backhanded her. Hard. Would have put any human in the hospital.”

“Yeap, that sounds like Jacob. He really fucking hates Avery. And I—”

“Can’t blame him?”

Triss sighed and lowered her gaze. “Yeah. I know what it’s like.”

“Yeah, you do.” He leaned forward and set his elbows on his knees. She did the same. “The hunters are dead, except for three, and I’ve talked to those three. They seem nice.”

Triss snarled, but it faded quickly. “Yeah, at least Brace does.” After a moment, she started laughing. “God, that moron was hiding behind fallen trees in that fight in Sándor’s dream, and it was like watching a cartoon character. Dude was panicky as fuck, but he just kept hiding and crawling and helping.”

He nodded. “It’s good we can think of him like that, you know? I know we ... we were both pretty consumed with hatred, during that whole ... during the worst time of our lives. And it’s a good thing it didn’t follow us to the point we can’t even think straight, and see every human as a villain. See where I’m going with this?”

“You think Jacob hating all the werewolves is fucked up and wrong.”

“Yeah, I do.”

“There’s just one problem with that, Jack.” She shrugged and let her head droop. “Jacob’s already told them he’d let up if they told him the one thing he wants to know.”

“Yeah, that’s true, isn’t it? Whatever Minerva was doing, Avery thinks it’s worth not letting Jacob know.”

“And you trust her over Jacob?”

“Honestly?” He shrugged, head drooping like hers. “I don’t know. She’s pretty headstrong, but she hasn’t tried to do anything sneaky.”

“Hasn’t she? She’s getting pretty close to Garry you know.”

“Isn’t Garry gay? And isn’t Avery dating some random kine?”

She laughed. “Yeah, I didn’t mean romantically, dumbass. I meant, Garry’s talking to her, more frequently than you’d think necessary. Makes you wonder.”

Ugh, more covenant bullshit. He got up and paced in front of Triss, and she leaned back and watched him; they’d done this dance before.

So, Garry and Avery were getting close, closer than Triss figured was just friendly. The Invictus had tried to get on Avery’s good side, and had partly succeeded, but that effort had mostly stalled with the hunters gone. Avery insisted there were still problems in the city to be dealt with, remnants of the azlu, and other problems from the spirit side of things, mostly on the word of David. If Avery and Garry got really close and chummy, that could be a problem, since Garry continued to push against the Invictus.

“I don’t suppose you could ask your old boss to fuck off?” he said.

“Ha. You know he won’t. And Garry and I were ... I guess we were kinda friends, but he gave me orders, Jack. If I disagreed with him about something, he’d just shrug, hear me out, and if I couldn’t convince him — I rarely could — he’d just tell me to do it anyway.” After a heavy sigh, she shook her head and leaned back. “So, yeah, your mom’s doing well. Like, really well.”

“Oh god, do I dare ask?”

“Haha, probably not. But I don’t mind telling you your mom has great tits.”

Oh god. He clawed at his face with his fingers, a desperate and futile attempt to tear the images out.

“She hasn’t—”

“She hasn’t fucked anyone besides Jacob, despite Jen and Othello’s attempts.” Her following grin had his eyes bleeding. “But, you know, witches do a lot together.”

“That’s my mom!”

“Oh come on, she told me what you told her. You literally told her to have an orgy!”

He paced faster, each turn followed by his head snapping to the side to glare at Beatrice while he waved his arms in the air. “Yeah but that was just a psychology trick! Mom’s kinda ... well, Mom’s Mom. If I want to convince her of something, I hit her with an extreme example, so the normal stuff doesn’t seem so crazy. I was hoping she’d just ... I don’t know, get comfortable using Majesty to seduce kine, and use them to let off a little steam.”

“She’s letting off a lot of steam, I can tell you that.”

“Oh god.”

“I mean, I knew you were a horny guy, Jack, I just didn’t expect it to be hereditary.”

“I’m not hearing this, I’m not hearing this.”

“Dude, your mom’s a total milf.”

Game over, man, game over. He pointed his finger at his temple, pulled the invisible trigger, and died standing up, which sent Triss into hysterics.

“End me.”

“Ah come on, don’t be like that. You think your mom’s comfortable knowing her sire is fucking your brains out all the time? And not just her, but another vampire, and two ghouls?”

He sighed and continued pacing, this time slowly, head drooping and arms limp. Zombie pacing.

“I guesssss. And ... and if those two had their way, it’d be more than just them.”

She laughed. “Really?”

“Yeah. I need to get some thralls, to help manage this fucking mansion. I can do that with Dominate, but the only way to make sure a thrall is totally trustworthy is the Vinculum. Feeding my blood to someone is ... risky. Who knows what’ll happen with the curse. But the conversation went to ghouls from there, and...”

“Ah.” She laughed again, leaned back, and set her elbows on some of the stairs behind her. “Isn’t creating ghouls draining?”

“Yeah. Takes effort to infuse enough vitae into vamp blood so it’ll give a ghoul their powers. But I’m confident I could create ... well, as many as I want, with this curse fueling me.”

“Damn. That’s a lot of tits.”

“I—”

“Don’t lie to me, you little hornball. I know exactly where your mind went when the idea of owning a mansion with a bunch of servants came up.” Grinning at him, she raised her hands up to the top of her head, and held up fingers, pretending to have bunny ears.

He rolled his eyes. “I ... Ok, yes, the idea had occurred to me.”

“Hot. Julias and I”—she winced with the name, but pulled through it quickly—”had some fun with his thralls sometimes. Honestly, it was pretty awesome, having a bunch of kine walking around, naked, doing whatever we wanted, often to us at each other’s request. I think it’s pretty much par for the course any Kindred who gets power starts getting a bunch of kine fuck toys. I say do it.”

“Well, try one Vinculum bind and see what happens.”

“You say that like there are people just lined up, willing to devote their life to a master. I don’t want to force someone.” He frowned at the air, but it faded as a bigger problem presented itself. “I wouldn’t even know where to begin on meeting potential thralls or ghouls. I don’t hang with kine very ... ever.”

She shrugged at that, like it was the simplest thing to fix in the world. “Ask Michael for tips. I know he’s got a bunch of thralls and ghouls. Hell, ask Antoinette? Julias liked to hang out in clubs and stuff, talk to people, get to know them, and when he found someone he thought could use a hand in life, they became a thrall. Though he did pick up a lot of thralls through the Invictus when he got the mansion. He didn't blood bind them though, or at least not very often."

Yeah, Julias was a master of subtle uses of Dominate.

"He was good at that sort of stuff," he said. "I'm not."

"That's why you should ask the Prince. She'll hook you up. I bet she's got a hundred kine she could easily recommend, either as bodyguards, cleaners for your new digs, or fuck toys."

He scratched his head and looked down. "Yeah, I could. But ever since Elaine's shown up, she's been ... acting like a horny, reckless teenager, honestly."

"You're shitting me."

"Nope. You know when you saw us leaving Bloodlust a few days back? Elaine and Jessy got into a bit of truth or dare, and ten minutes later, everyone at the table was topless."

That earned raised eyebrows from the Nos, and she leaned forward, suddenly intrigued. "Everyone?"

"Everyone. Damien, me, Eric, Matt and Art, and Jessy, Fiona, Elaine, Antoinette, and even Tash."

"Holy shit. I mean, it's not like I don't know what they all look like naked already, considering the shit they wear to balls, but still." She tapped a clawed on one of her crocodile teeth for a moment. "Antoinette and Elaine would fuck you in the middle of Bloodlust with an audience, wouldn't they?"

"Definitely."

"Can ... Can I be there when that happens?"

Oh god not this again.

“You and Jessy? Thought you girls were into big, strong guys and stuff?”

She laughed and shrugged. “I mean, sure. But Julias did a good job grooming you, Jack. You’re fit as fuck, and I’d definitely enjoy seeing you squashed between a pair of giant tits.”

He frowned at her. “I’m not sure I want my mom hanging around you anymore. You are definitely a bad influence.” He folded his arms across his chest with some emphasis. “You are banned from seeing her.”

They laughed. It was fun. It’d been a damn long time since they’d laughed like this, hard, loud, not since Julias was with them. God, it felt good.

Once the laughter died out, Triss shook her head. “I’m not here to talk about sex and shit though.”

“Eh? From how the conversation started, thought you just wanted to hang?”

“I was just trying to get you relaxed before I dropped a shit bomb on you.”

He threw up his hands, and groaned. “Thanks, I guess. Shit bomb?”

“I was ... doing some stuff. Witchy stuff. I was talking to Black Blood, and he, uh ... kinda mentioned something I thought you should know.”

Uh oh. Triss doing witchy stuff didn’t sit well with him, but who was he to judge? Blackmailing people and financially exploiting corporations was a nightly job for Jack, and that job could get pretty dirty. Maybe not as dirty as the sort of shit he figured a witch might do, but still. The thing in what she said that got under his skin, was the mention of Black Blood.

“That ... thing, do I want to know what it said?”

“He said.”

“He?”

She nodded. “Black Blood identifies as he, at least ... just, yeah, he. And yeah, you’ll want to hear it.”

“Something tells me I won’t, but, fine, shoot.”

“Black Blood mentioned that he’d seen things like ... the curse before.”

Jack froze. No more pacing. After a heavy gulp, he slowly looked at Triss and winced.

“You think he ... can do something for me?” Please say no, please say no.

“Yeah, I think he can.”

Fuck.

“What else did he say?”

“Not much. I asked, but he said if he was going to tell anyone more details, it’d be you. And...”

“And Black Blood’s a spirit. He won’t tell me anything without making a deal.” Again he threw up his hands before letting them fall, like weights were tied around his wrists. “Elaine’s been trying to help me, but all she has are ancient texts and stuff. Not exactly thorough documentation. Plus there’s the whole issue that I’m the first person in our bloodline to break the binding placed on the curse. She didn't, Viktor didn't, and Julias didn't."

"What about Elaine's sire?"

"Susanna, I have no idea. If she's alive, no one knows where she is. I'm happier keeping it that way." His great great grandsire was worse than Viktor. She was a fucking psychopath, someone who genuinely enjoyed killing, causing carnage, massacring kine, and worse. She was ... everything the Strix would probably want a vampire to be, according to what he knew from the elders of Dolareido. Was the voice in Jack's head actually some sort of residual copy of Susanna?

"You ok?"

"Yeah, yeah, just ... yeah, thinking. Ok, I need to talk to Black Blood."

Sighing, Triss stood up and nodded. "Figured you might say that. I can help, if you want."

"You can summon Black Blood?"

"Yeah." It took her effort to keep her eyes on him, as if she wanted to look down and away. Guilt? Shame? He wasn't sure, but something about Black Blood made her uncomfortable.

"Actually," he said, "I ... I think I want to talk to Jacob too. Might as well get both at the same time."

"Jacob? This about your mom?"

"No ... well, partly. But it's about other things too. He can summon Black Blood, right?"

“Sure, but ... well, Jacob and Black Blood are a dangerous combination, Jack.”

“Ha, think I don’t know that? But I can handle it. Things are different this time.”

“Different? How?”

He looked down at his hands and slowly flexed and released his fingers. “Because now, if Jacob tries something or crosses the line, I’ll kill him. I know I can.”

Chapter 130

~~Beatrice~~

She walked into Jacob's alcove, down its curved path, and stopped at the fur curtain that blocked off his homely hole in the Circle's cave. She'd heard the noises, but decided to barge in anyway. If the two of them wanted some privacy, they could easily fuck somewhere else.

Bingo. Triss smiled as she pulled the fur curtain aside, leaned her shoulder against the curved entrance of his alcove, and watched.

Samantha. Sweet, innocent, naive Samantha, was tied up. Her hands were cuffed behind her back, and judging from the thick chain between the cuffs, they were some heavy duty handcuffs. Daeva were strong, like Nos, but Samantha was a fledgling and wouldn't be breaking through handcuffs like that. But at least they looked fuzzy. Very thick, but fuzzy.

She faced away from the entrance, so she didn't notice Triss, which was perfect cause god damn, this was fucking hot. Jacob was sitting all comfy and lazy with his back against the wall, facing Triss, and the dude was naked save for a gray bandage wrapped around his eyes. Samantha sat on his lap, squirming and wriggling, as the man held onto her hips to keep her from falling back.

Two kine sat nearby, a man and woman, youngish. Jacob's thralls? Triss didn't recognize them, but he wouldn't bring them to the cave unless they were blood bound. They were naked, obviously drained of blood, and had dopey, exhausted smiles on, despite being unconscious. Lots of juices around too. She didn't know if they fucked each other or if Samantha and Jacob did something to them, but either way, damn.

Samantha let out a squeak as Jacob bounced her, his hands hooking her ass. Dude could probably throw a firetruck, so using just his arms to bounce her would be damn easy, enough that he could sit back and watch, as if he wasn't doing a damn thing.

Triss opened her mouth when Jacob noticed her, but slowly closed it. Hey, it was pretty damn hot, watching the beautiful milf obviously enjoying herself. And you should never interrupt a woman about to orgasm.

She didn't have to wait long. Two minutes later, Samantha's whimpers turned into panting groans, and she collapsed forward against Jacob's chest. He set a kiss on her head, and gave Triss a pleased smile. Triss mouthed 'how many times?' and Jacob answered 'three'. Yeap, that was one happy milf.

"Didn't take long for you to really let loose, did it?" Triss said.

"W-What? Beatrice! I—" She tried to push away from Jacob, but she had no hands to do it, and when she tried to use her legs to push away from the wall, Jacob gave her a hard downward yank, straight onto his dick. She squeaked, and her body trembled as she collapsed onto Jacob's chest again. Ah yes, the prolonged orgasm, fucking awesome.

"What brings you to my humble abode, Beatrice?" Jacob said, voice perfectly level and casual.

"Wanted to talk about witchy stuff, but it can wait a bit."

"Good." The man winked at her — it was all in the eyebrows — and gently eased Samantha back, and back, and back. She slipped off his cock with a groan, landing on her back between his legs, and Jacob slid a nearby pillow under her ass.

Triss grinned down at the woman, since she was now on her back and looking up at Triss, upside down. Grin turned into an outright groan when Jacob slid Samantha away a bit, grabbed his cock, aimed it a bit lower, and slid the woman back closer to him.

“Jacob!” Samantha squeaked, lifting her head to look down her naked body to the man. But before she could try and sit back up, Jacob settled his grip on her hips again, and gently bounced her back and forth along the pillow and into his body.

Samantha managed to open her eyes again and look up at Triss, and the fuckton of emotions there were amazing. Embarrassed, panicked, overwhelmed with guilt and shame, and most of all, completely maxed on the pleasure scale. Well, Jacob was old as dirt, and had probably literally fucked a hundred thousand women in his lifetime. Not only that, the fucker knew people, knew them inside and out, knew how to read them, how to manipulate them, how to control them. Or, in this case, knew exactly how to make them cum their brains out.

And sure, of course Jacob could make Samantha climax easily. Sure he'd probably pushed things on her, made her try new things against her will, knowing full well she'd absolutely love it once she gave in. Or, didn't give in, but he did it to her anyway, to great effect. And sure, Samantha was cumming her brains out right now, and probably even harder now that Triss was here to watch; all part of Jacob's plan to turn Samantha into a total sex freak, to be sure.

But none of that was what had Triss struggling to keep her smile hidden. It was how Jacob looked at Samantha. Jacob always had a twisted happy look on his face, typical Joker sorta shit, but now, his smile was soft, gentle, and dare she think it, endearing. He seemed genuinely happy to be pleasuring her. It wasn't like Jacob couldn't sleep with any woman he wanted; his Nos mutation was easily hidden, and the bastard was smooth as silk when he wanted to be. Either with money or a drop of blood or a witty tongue, Jacob could have half a dozen of the most beautiful, big-titted bimbo models in Dolareido riding his dick all night.

He never did that sorta shit though. Hell, Triss was pretty damn sure Samantha was the first woman Jacob had slept with since Triss had joined the circle. Maybe even since Minerva. Whatever his reason, he seemed genuinely happy, even if it was only a little. Certainly not little for Samantha, who was squirming and wriggling and trying to escape, but completely trapped as Jacob gently bounced her ass on his dick. Yeap, they'd switched to anal. And considering how quickly he'd penetrated her, the girl had already been prepped and lubed.

“Who's idea was this?” Triss said, gesturing down at Samantha, and then to the two spent kine.

Jacob grinned at her. “Hers.”

“N-No! It wasn't! I—nnnn.” Poor poor Samantha bucked her hips, and started squirming and wriggling extra hard, only to have her efforts defeated, and rewarded, with more pleasure.

“I think she's got a crush on Othello,” Jacob said. “I'm just helping her release those fantasies, so she's Madison right now.”

“Ah, that explains it.”

Samantha was definitely the sort of milf who'd more or less ride any sort of sexual atmosphere, from what Triss had seen. If Othello had been more into tit fucking Madison, Samantha would probably be using her — albeit much smaller — tits on Jacob. If he'd been more into just lying back and letting Madison ride him cowgirl style, Samantha would probably be doing that for Jacob, showing off her body and dancing on him.

Triss was tempted to voice the obvious comparison between Jack and Samantha, but, nah, no good to ruin the sex by bringing up the mom's son.

“I was trying to convince her that if she wanted, she could invite Othello to watch, maybe fuck Madison beside us. Or, you know, we could both fuck her at the same time.” Jacob shrugged, hands still wrapped around the women’s hips. “But Samantha’s shy.”

Triss laughed, came around, and sat beside Jacob. Just witches doing witch stuff, talking and fucking and talking while fucking. Plus, maybe a different part of Jacob’s personality would come out, if she talked to him now? She’d seen him fuck Samantha before, but never up close like this, and she’d never really talked to him during.

Course, Jacob could probably chat about anything, from politics to chess maneuvers, and it wouldn’t mess with his fucking. Just came with the territory of being five hundred years old. Triss, on the other hand, found sex extremely distracting and enticing, and from her new vantage point, she watched Samantha again struggle and wriggle to try and escape Jacob’s grip, super embarrassed by Triss’s new position. All that struggling just made sex feel better, got everything tighter, and Samantha again erupted into mewls as Jacob bounced her on his dick a few more times.

Samantha’s thighs trembled, her toes curled, and some fluid slowly trickled out of her clenching, empty pussy, down her folds and skin, and onto Jacob’s dick. Yeah, she really was riding Madison’s wavelength. The fact that Triss watched her cum, and cum from pure anal, was hitting all the milf’s buttons, and she groaned again as Jacob resumed bouncing her.

“You two been getting along?” she asked, eyes still locked on the obscene, beautiful display.

“Nope. We hate each other.” Jacob nodded, as if speaking obvious fact, and he nodded toward Samantha. “Don’t we?”

“Jacob you ... you...” She managed to lift her head long enough to give Triss a very guilty gaze, before it fell back, and she succumbed to Jacob’s rhythm.

“So, how long did it take you to figure out Samantha wanted to be tied up and punished, sexually?”

“Five minutes.”

Triss laughed, and leaned against the entrance of the shower. A nearby building had open showers, some old factory that used to do manual labor of some kind. It'd been repurposed into some kind of office building, but there was still an open shower in the basement that the kine didn't use. Far as Triss knew, no other Kindred knew about it save for the Circle, and it wasn't like the other covenants didn't have easy access to showers. The witches didn't.

Jacob stepped under the shower, and Triss whistled as the water hit his hair.

“You know boss, you're a damn sexy guy. Why don't you normally show off more skin? Every other vamp in Dolareido does.”

He was a damn sexy guy. The lean build kinda reminded her of Brad Pitt in Fight Club, but the wavy salt and pepper hair, a few inches long, gave him that mature older man vibe. Of course, when he removed the bandage and turned to face her, that vibe vanished. Jacob's eyes were straight up gone, eyelids too, and they looked like they'd been removed with a serrated spoon. Yeah, better he keep the bandage on.

“I'm shy.”

“Ha! You don't know the meaning of the word, you asshole.”

He laughed, shrugged, and started soaping up. She'd never tell the man, cause she'd never hear the end of it, but dude had a great dick, and she grinned as she looked him up and down as he lathered it. Samantha was lucky. Fucker probably did a ritual on himself to get a dick like that, like Antoinette probably did for the tits.

“Not like muscles indicate much about a vampire’s strength. All vamps know that.”

“Who said it was for them?” He grinned at her, washing the lube off his dick while looking right at her. The dick washing was kinda hot. The empty eye sockets were not. “I deal with plenty of things that aren’t Kindred. As far as they know, my strength is proportional to my size.”

“Strange thought. I’m too used to dealing with vampires, and shit like Jack, strong in a small package. I forget there’s crap out there like Uratha.”

He snorted quietly at the U word, but looked away from her and into the water.

Oh fucking god, the water pooled inside his eye sockets! Jesus fuck. The bastard must have noticed her face, probably all fucked up with disgust, and laughed at her, before he leaned forward to let the water fall out of his eyes. Like dumping out a couple cups.

“Dust and dirt gets in there, ya big baby.”

“Uh huh.” Well, she’d felt weird before, thinking about Jacob in a sexy way. And he was sexy, especially now that she’d seen him making Samantha cum her brains out. But it was probably a good thing he also grossed her out.

“You obviously have something you want to ask, Triss.”

“Maybe I just want to watch you shower.”

“After what I just did?” He pointed at his eyes, and borderline cackled.

“Just look the other way or put the bandage back on, and we’re golden.”

“Ha. Get as old as me and it won’t bother you. You think Maria’s skin bothered Lucas?”

Triss shivered at that idea. “I figured she and Lucas didn’t fuck.”

Jacob threw his head back and laughed even louder. “That old myth that elders lose their taste for sex.”

“Bullshit?”

“Bullshit. Besides, Maria looks fine in the dark.”

Nothing could stop the ugly snort laugh Triss made. “Ha! Paper bag body?” She gestured putting a paper bag on her head.

They laughed again. God damn, it felt weird, and awesome, laughing with her boss like this. She used to talk to him all the time, before Julias died, but it’d never been personal back then, mostly meaningless insults. After he died, the only thing she ever talked to Jacob about for a long time was revenge, the hunters, and Crúac. So, macabre shit. And now her world was even more macabre, more fucked up, with the sick shit she was doing a couple times a week, but it didn’t feel so bad. At least, not when she was talking with Jacob about it, now that their relationship had evolved. Kinda like colleagues chatting about work.

And if things kept going the way they were, with Samantha igniting everyone’s sex drive like napalm on paper, she knew she’d be seeing a lot more of her and naked Jacob. Two more weeks and they’d probably all get together in the same room, fuck their partners, and have a friendly chat while doing it. Just witches, doing witch things.

“Samantha already seems pretty, uh, awoken.”

“What, some kine for foreplay, then some handcuffs, anal, and a visitor?” He laughed again and shrugged. “A century ago, I met a vampire who couldn’t even get horny unless she was tied up, and getting split-roasted by three men at once, while hanging horizontally from a pole like savages were about to cook her over a fire.”

She held her hands out in front of her and tried to mentally arrange the girl and three men doing that. Didn’t exactly fit. “That sounds like it’d be difficult to make happen regularly.”

“Sure, if you’re kine. She was a Kindred. She had a bunch of thralls ready to do whatever she wanted.”

“That reminds me. Any rituals that actually involve having sex?”

After a few seconds pause, Jacob shrugged. “Rituals are mostly about intent. The steps in the ritual create the physical barriers to overcome to give it weight, and mental steps so you can appreciate what you’re doing.”

“Yeah, you told me.”

“Then use your head, dumbass.”

She frowned as she rolled her eyes. “So, if the ritual needs steps, then the steps also need to be a barrier. I can’t just, do something I was already going to do, and call it a ritual. It’s something I need to overcome in the specific context of a ritual.”

The naked man grinned at her. “Look at you, thinking like a scientist.”

“Yeah yeah, fuck you. So, if I wanted to do a ritual that ... I don’t know, affected someone sexually, I’d have to discover the ritual, and in the act of discovering it, will be shown steps to perform it. The steps will probably involve sex, but that doesn’t mean it’ll be easy or enjoyable.”

“It’ll take effort, and vitae, and no ritual is done for free, but that doesn’t mean you can’t enjoy it.” He turned off the water, and got to drying with a towel.

This was an interesting side of Crúac, and she grinned as she felt the buzz of excitement and interest run through her. It didn’t always have to be super dark shit; certainly leaned that way, but didn’t have to be.

“So, have you—”

“Yes, you horny little fuck,” he said, cackling again as he put his eye bandage back on, “I’ve done rituals during an orgy. Many, in my younger days, usually to give me power over people, alter the way they think, and have villages sort of ... protect me, in a way.”

“Protect?”

“Ever see a creepy vampire movie, or read a creepy vampire story, where everyone in the village or city or whatever is acting weird, and they all sorta try and dissuade our intruding main character from investigating disappearances?”

“Oh, I get it. You had the whole town brainwashed. That’s some classic vampire shit. And pretty awesome, honestly.”

“Yeap. But convincing an entire village to get in on an orgy isn’t easy. Convincing them to do it, outside under a full moon, with me at the center with seven virgin girls, each lined up and taking turns sitting on my dick? That took years of effort to set up.”

Wow, that was a damn powerful image. “And the virgins—”

“Enjoyed themselves immensely,” he said, grinning at her. “And since I know you’re a horn ball teenager who can’t see past her own tits: I Kissed every one of them during the act, and then bled my wrists into a ritual bowl.” His grin widened, right into Joker territory again. “Those seven became my ghouls. I had them for fifty years. They protected me and fed me. I had a cave nearby, one you couldn’t climb into without modern climbing gear, unless you were a vampire. During the night, I came out, and—”

“Of course.”

All she could do was laugh. This man was supposed to be a big, bad, powerful Nosferatu, a master warlock, and all around scary fucker. And he was all those things, but he was also a damn silly guy. It was hard to be afraid of someone when laughing at them, and with them. Maybe that was part of his shtick.

“Samantha know about this sorta stuff?”

“Some. I can’t just dump all the crazy on her at once. But, she is coming to appreciate the Kindred life, and the Circle, pretty quickly, wouldn’t you say?” The grin that followed was so perfectly smooth and suave, Triss found herself staring at the man. “Don’t think I haven’t noticed how much the rest of you have taken an interest in her.”

“She’s ... surprisingly fun,” she said.

“Yeah, she is. She’s had a rough life, a damn rough life, but she’s pulling through.”

Triss raised a brow at that, and tilted her head to the side slightly as she looked at the man. If she didn’t know better, she’d think that was some genuine concern in his voice.

He barked a laugh. “Uh, yeah. I happen to be fucking her, in case you didn’t notice?”

She shrugged. “People who barely care about each other fuck each other all the time, for a lot of different reasons. Hell, people who hate each other fuck each other sometimes. And you damn well know that.” No point in giving the man tidbits of advice about the nature of people. He knew more about that than she ever would.

“Aren’t you wise to the ways of the world.”

“Jacob, come on, don’t dodge me. I’m not going to think less of you for liking someone.”

He got his pants on, but instead of reaching for his shirt, he looked at her, face unreadable. “Oh?”

“Yeah. I mean, if she’s the first girl you’ve really ever opened up to since Minerva, then of course you’re going to be ... I don’t know ... feeling a bit guilty about it?” Dangerous waters she was treading. If she said the wrong thing, or crossed a line, Jacob wouldn’t hesitate to break her arm or something. That’s what shit was like in the Circle, good and bad.

He stared at her, and she did her best to keep her eyes on his eye bandage. She also did her best to keep her weight on the balls of her feet, in case she had to dodge a punch.

“Being kind of hypocritical, don’t you think?”

“Uh, what? Not—”

“Julias died months ago.”

She snarled. Ok, if this was the direction the conversation was going to go, if he was willing to get their words dirty, then fuck him.

“You dated him for what, bit over two years? I was with Minerva for decades, kid.” He said ‘kid’ with all the viciousness of an angry mentor, someone who knew where to dig to deal damage, someone whose opinion he figured she thought highly of. And she did.

“You saying I didn’t love him as much as you did Minerva?” She regretted it the moment she said it, not because she might hurt his feelings, but because he wasn’t going to mince words on this topic. And much as she tried to push past it, this topic was still sensitive as fuck. If he wanted to, really wanted to, he could drop a few words and leave her a weeping mess.

He took a step toward her. She stood her ground.

“I’m saying you weren’t with the man long enough for his death to leave too deep a scar, dumbass.”

“I—”

“Shut up.” He came in closer. Again, she didn’t back off, but she damn well knew she should have. He was only two feet from her now, and if he wanted to get in a punch, she wouldn’t even see it coming. “Ever talk to an old person, someone who’s been with their partner for decades, and then suddenly they’re alone? It’s not just that the person they loved more than the whole world is dead, but that a part of who they were is gone. A part of their routine, a part of how they operated. Imagine waking up and you’re suddenly missing a hand. You reach for a doorknob, don’t remember the missing hand, and then walk straight into the door. You can’t even open a can of fucking beans anymore.”

She almost laughed, but the man’s tone crushed the possibility.

“When you lose someone you’ve been with for that long, a part of you is chopped off,” he continued, “and you don’t recover, so much as learn to live with the handicap.”

“But ... we’re vampires, Jacob. We live forever. We get to recover, right? And ... you too?”

“Yeah, we can. But that doesn’t mean recovering from that sort of wound is easy. You were with Julias for a couple years. And yeah, I was happy for you, kid. Seemed like a great relationship. But you weren’t with him long enough to have him become one of your hands. I was with Minerva long enough that she was. So if you’ll excuse me, don’t compare your situation to mine. It’s not about guilt for me, unlike you. It’s about a million things you’re not nearly old enough to understand. It’s about ... testing out a new hand, and trying to my damndest to give it a fair shot.”

Sighing, Triss finally took a step back and lowered her head. It was all true. She’d loved Julias, loved him with everything she had, but a bit over two years wasn’t long enough to develop the same sort of reliance and cooperative existence Jacob was talking about. It meant she would recover, where he might never.

“If ... if Minerva was that important to you, why did you give up on resurrection?”

He snorted a sad laugh, turned, and started putting on his shirt. “Gave up for the time being, Triss. You still have a long way to go with your attempt before you’ve put in as much work into it as I did. And I never really gave up. I’m just ... biding my time.”

“Biding your time?”

He grinned, that usual, half psycho grin of his. “I’ll tell you more about it sometime. But for now, keep doing what you’re doing. Hey, maybe you’ll learn something I didn’t.” He walked past her, and she fell in beside him as he stepped out into the empty night streets of North Side.

“So, about Samantha,” she said.

“You saw her naked and cumming just an hour ago. That horny to see some more of her?”

“What? Dude, I—”

“Give it a few more weeks and I’m sure she’ll let you touch her. Hell, one more week and she’ll probably want me and Othello to fuck her at the same time.”

Triss facepalmed and groaned. “No! Dude, no. I meant, you ... so you really like her?”

He rolled his eyes — all in the head motion — and laughed again. “Yes, you idiot.”

“Good, good.” She nodded, and smiled to herself as she looked out at the empty street, the street lights, and the images running through her head. “You really just, gonna share her with the whole Circle?”

“That wasn’t originally my intention, but the more it comes up, the hornier she gets. Who am I to say no to her desires? Not like I haven’t done all that and worse in my lifetime. Like I said, village, orgy, seven virgins.”

Triss should have laughed, but she didn’t. Instead, she set a claw on her lips, and thought about it, about that milf sitting on Jacob’s dick, except with Othello and Madison there, and Jen and Triss too, everyone just fucking each other and being happy in a very weird, intimate, witchy atmosphere.

“It ... does kinda make me ... feel guilty,” she said. “I know Julias and I weren’t together super long, but still. And ... and we were a little more conservative with the sex, you know? I mean yeah, Jen was always with us, and sometimes we invited some kine, but without Julias, I feel...”

“You know damn well the man wouldn’t want you to feel guilty.”

“Sure, yeah, and—”

“Sexual healing is a thing. Jen’s been trying to help you with that this whole damn time. Hell, whatever happened to that dude she was obviously trying to get you with?”

She smirked at the man. Jacob damn well knew the man’s name was Sándor, and he was doing that guy thing guys did where they pretended to forget a dude’s name. Course, he wasn’t doing it for the reasons a guy would.

“Well, go find him and fuck him.”

She shook her head and sighed. “Dude is boring.”

“He’s a stoic fucker, I’ll give him that. But he’s probably fucking miserable, and I’d bet good money that’s a big part of why he’s so boring.”

“So, you think, what? If I fuck him, he’ll be more fun?”

The asshole grinned at her like a happy pirate. It wouldn’t have surprised her at all if he suddenly broke into a sea shanty. “I think if you and Jen fuck him, he’ll be more fun.”

“Jesus fucking christ. How does Samantha put up with you?”

He hooked an arm over Triss's shoulders, and laughed a merry laugh, again, like a pirate. "That woman has a bigger sex drive than I do, and kinkier tastes. It's just taking her a little bit to uncover them."

"You're corrupting her."

"Not even a little. If anything, she's corrupting me."

They laughed again. The idea of sweet, naive Samantha corrupting Jacob was pretty funny, and honestly, Triss could see it. Samantha was a walking bundle of sexual desire, and if Jacob kept nudging her onto paths the woman very much wanted to go down, it really wouldn't be long before things got super crazy in the Circle's cave. And, much as she tried to find that idea unappealing, Triss didn't. If Samantha and Jacob wanted to fuck right next to Triss and Jen, at this point, Triss wouldn't mind. Samantha's sweetness, combined with the milf vibe, was too damn hot. And, to her surprise, she didn't mind the idea of Jacob being there either. She didn't want to fuck him, but she'd be lying if she said she didn't find him attractive, or the sight of him fucking Samantha insanely sexy.

Sexual healing, Jen said. Sexual healing, Jacob said. Or were they just some horny witches that wanted to escalate the already insanely sexual Circle into full on orgy sex? Probably both.

"Sándor's busy with the other Begotten. Azamel's dying, and he's going to replace her as the leader of their little group, supposedly. Or at least their guardian."

Jacob shrugged, arm still hooked over her shoulders. "Sounds like a powerful individual, politically speaking. Even better reason to get him into bed."

She rolled her eyes again, but some tantalizing images of Sándor drifted up from memory. Him, basically naked, getting dressed by Jennifer for the ball. He was damn fucking sexy, too. But the man reeked of maturity and wisdom, and pain. And yeah, it was obvious now that that pain scared her. The man was just so fucking broken, and it scared the shit out of her to see what losing a family could do to a man, a father and husband.

“Pretty sure he’s not interested.”

“G—” Fucking shit. She sealed her lips. Everyone feeling guilty for everything these days. “You think ... I...”

“I think you should cut yourself some slack, you moron. Guilt is normal. It doesn’t mean you’re doing something bad, just that a part of you thinks you are. And guess what? We’re all idiots, and think things that are wrong all the damn fucking time. You know damn well Julias would want you to move on and find happiness, and get laid. I know damn well Minerva would want me to do the same. Still feels weird, being with another vampire, even one as nice and sweet — and horny — as Samantha. But a big difference between you and me, Triss, is that I’m aware that these feelings are dumb, that it’s ok to feel them, and it’s ok to let them go.”

She did her best to keep her voice steady, but it still came out a little wavery. “Sometimes you make it easy, for me to forget you’re really fucking old, and actually probably know a lot of shit.”

“All part of my charm.” He winked at her — all in the eyebrow — and let go of her. “If you want to keep trying to resurrect Julias, go ahead. Lots of witches and warlocks have tried, and failed, but that doesn’t mean it can’t be done. And if you feel guilty for fucking someone, while trying to resurrect your old lover, don’t worry about it.”

“And if I feel guilty because I ... because I’m trying to resurrect him? Because I’m killing kine to do it? Because—”

The man held up a hand. “That’s part of being a witch, Beatrice. That’s a big part of being a member of the Circle of the Crone. And it’s personal.” He sighed, a serious sigh, and she raised a brow. Jacob saying serious things was one thing, but for Jacob to actually sound serious, to use a heavy sounding voice? That was rare. “You’re stepping into deep shit, but sometimes that’s what’s needed to change the world.”

“What?” She blinked at him, and he looked away. That line, ‘change the world’, he said that with a straight face and a straight voice, and there was just no way Jacob would say a cheesy line like that with a serious voice unless he really fucking meant it.

“Keep working on it. I won’t judge. Stop working on it. I won’t judge. Hell, I think you’re better off abandoning the attempt, Triss, but fuck me, who the fuck am I to judge any of that shit? All I’m saying is, you fucking dumbass, is that it’s ok to do whatever, and feel whatever. There are no rules, nothing written in the sky that says how you should think or feel.”

“That’s, uh, a very anarchist philosophy.”

“Yeap. S’why Garry and I get along.”

After a few more chuckles, Triss took a deep breath and dug up another conversation topic she didn’t want to have.

“Jack wants to talk to Black Blood.”

Jacob’s laugh returned, with a healthy dose of that cocky asshole vibe coming through again. “Heh, of course he does. Who tipped him off?”

“I did.”

“Naturally.”

“He deserves help, Jacob.”

“Does he?”

“Yes, of course he does!” She grabbed the man’s shoulder and forced him to stop on the sidewalk. “Dude, I owe him so fucking much.”

Jacob’s psycho smile faded away, and he stared at her, the sudden silence around them fucking haunting.

“Even after Julias died helping him? To save his mother?”

“Yes, even after that.” She grit her teeth and shoved him. “And don’t give me that shit. You know damn fucking well that was all Julias, dying a stereotypical, valiant death, like he was fucking destined to. And if it wasn’t for Julias, you wouldn’t have Samantha, the first woman I’ve ever seen actually manage to make you smile. Actually, genuinely, really smile.”

Her rant got louder and louder, and only at the end did she notice the subtle smile on the asshole’s lips.

She growled and shoved him. “You asshole. You already knew all that.”

“Catching on, ain’t ya?”

“The fuck? What the fuck are you digging at me for?”

“Just wanted to make sure you really understood your feelings.”

“Oh fuck you.” That hurt. That fucking hurt. Not that he’d tricked her; Jacob tricked everyone, and with the Circle, he tricked in order to teach them lessons the painful way. They lasted longer that way. What hurt was what she’d said, the way she knew Julias was bound to die because of the kind of guy he was. She didn't want to remember him like that.

Jacob grinned, hooked his arm over her shoulders again, and resumed their walk down North Side. "I'll talk to Jack, and so will Black Blood."

"Thanks. And ... fuck, you are so damn hard to talk to."

"Am I?"

"Yes, you are. One minute you're hinting I should join you and Samantha for a good fucking. The next, you're ... making everything hurt."

He chuckled, and half hugged her with his arm. "Gotta come at you sideways to get past the defenses."

"Defenses?"

"Yeah, defenses. Everyone has defenses, in the brain." He pointed at his temple with his free hand. "They try and predict conversations, so they can say shit to defend themselves from others, and from words. They block emotions, and keep shit at a distance." He hugged her a little tighter, and leaned in to bring his lips close to her ear. "You're the best witch I've had in a long, long time, Triss. I'm not gonna let you close yourself off to shit. You want to be a witch? You learn to embrace pain, and accept it. Don't rationalize it or explain it anyway, just accept it for what it is, and learn that it's ok to feel pain."

"The ... same way you do, when learning Crúac."

"Exactly." He gave her a small shake. "Learn that you can do whatever you want, and that you don't need to chase some idealism some fool taught you. It's all ok. Do whatever the fuck you want. No one out there has the answers. No one fucking knows a god damn thing. For sure, no one knows of any correct way to do life.”

She smiled and looked down at the sidewalk. That made a lot of sense, in a sad, and freeing sort of way.

“You probably loved Fight Club, didn’t you?”

“Heh, to a point,” he said. “The allegory was a bit thick. And I wasn’t kidding, about your first point.”

“First point?”

“You said I was hinting you should join me and Samantha. I’m telling you, Samantha would come her fucking brains out if you did. She really likes you two, and Othello and Madison. Especially Othello. Mostly Othello.” He tapped his chin thoughtfully. “I wonder if she’s using me, to get to him?”

Triss rolled her eyes so hard she could see her fucking brain.

~~Jack~~

A few days later.

Triss had told Jack that Jacob would come get him when he was ready, but that it might take a few days. BB — yeah, she called him BB — was busy, apparently, doing who the fuck knew what. Maybe that’s what Daniel was trying to figure out? The man vanished randomly, sometimes for weeks at a time. He was less a sheriff, and more a detective, hunting down random shit that happened in Dolareido.

Sighing, Jack squirmed on the bench in the small room, and watched the two ladies change. The two ladies were, of course, Elaine and Antoinette, and both were trying on some of the latest fashion trends. La DaFraam was an upscale, overpriced fashion store, the sort where you could get something almost straight off the runway, instead of the watered down version that flowed out into the real world over years; Antoinette had given him a small lesson about the nature of fashion.

The store was open all night. All the fancy stores and restaurants in Dolareido were; just that sorta city. It was also the kinda store where the employees wore whatever they wanted, and were strongly encouraged to look gorgeous doing it. Three women and one flamboyant man were the employees tonight. The clientele was obviously supposed to be women, or men easily manipulated into buying expensive things for their girlfriends and wives. He'd never seen so many lacy bras in his life.

Antoinette sat beside him on the bench built into the wall of the changing room, legs folded, hair pulled over her shoulder, and she combed it absentmindedly with her fingers as she watched Elaine.

“Perhaps the red one?”

Elaine nodded, slipped the dress off, and slid into the red one.

“I thought we were looking into possible thralls?” he said. “I mean, not that I mind this.” He gestured to Elaine, and waved his hands toward her ass. She was wearing a black thong, high hip, and holy sweet mother of god there was just something so arousing about watching a woman put on and take off clothes while wearing a thong.

Antoinette chuckled and shrugged. “We are.”

“Veronica Tam, one of the assistant buyers here at La DaFraam.”

“Veronica? The girl with the blue hair?”

“Indeed. She has been exposed to the world of the paranormal.”

“Really? How?”

Antoinette shook her head with a quiet but annoyed sigh. “A chance encounter. Unfortunately, Kindred are not perfect, and make mistakes. Normally, as you know, an Invictus Ventrue would be sent to make sure she does not remember.”

“And I’m to be that Ventrue?”

“No. I am told that the woman did not panic when she discovered a vampire in the act. In fact, it was likely she had seen a vampire before, and had kept it to herself. This was likely a second sighting.”

“Oh, so she’s ... kinda trustworthy?”

The Prince nodded. “She managed to notice the presence of vampires in my city, and did not open her mouth, of her own volition. Likely, the only reason she was caught spying, was due to her raised interest. The vampire who noticed her said she did not attempt to film the act. She simply wanted to see more of the world hidden in her shadow.”

“Ah, I get it. She’s a classic innocent young woman who finds herself pulled into things bigger than she is.” Sounded familiar, too damn familiar.

Elaine laughed, but said nothing as she admired herself in the mirror. Skimpy little red dress, and Jack forced himself to look away and back to Antoinette.

“Oui. And we are going to offer her an opportunity. My file on her says she recently left the arms and money of her parents, and a relationship with a man, only to then move to Dolareido where she lives by herself. She is alone, and struggling to survive, likely deep in debt.”

That was strangely detailed information, and Jack raised a brow at her. Her smile was flawless, best poker face ever, but it was obvious she'd done a little digging outside the usual means. Maybe she'd been looking into getting Veronica as one of her own thralls?

“So, she has good enough eyes to catch a young vamp making a mistake, and enough brains to keep her mouth shut. She doesn't have a support mechanism in her life. And, she went out of her way to look into stuff, without risking taking a picture; just wanted to see shit with her own eyes. Together, it all ... makes her a perfect option for a thrall.”

“Agreed,” Elaine said. She slipped out of the red dress, and instead of grabbing for another, she reached out, took Jack's hand, and pulled him up to her. “Look her in the eyes when she comes in.” His great grandsire smiled at him, and met his eyes. Powerful, deep, brown, scary eyes. “You will see it, plain as day. Instead of the mindless gaze of a sheep, you will find the eyes of someone with—”

“A brain?”

“Ha, in so many words.” Elaine winked at him, walked over to the door to the changing room, and stuck her head out, careful to use the door to cover her naked chest. “Veronica dear, could you come here? I have a question.”

Of course they were going to do this now. Jack almost interjected, but the click clack of Veronica's heels silenced him.

“How can I he—elp!”

Elaine yanked the woman into the changing room, closed to the door, and turned her to face Antoinette and Jack. With hands on the kine's shoulders, Veronica wasn't going anywhere, and she rapid fire blinked in total confusion and shock.

Jack groaned and gestured at Elaine. “You’re going to scare her to death. Probably thinks we’re going to rape her.”

Elaine rolled her eyes, but kept her hands where they were, and the kine close enough her breasts pressed into Veronica’s back and shoulders. “Hardly.”

“W-What’s going on? I’ll ... I’ll scream if you don’t—”

Antoinette lifted a hand and swiped the air gently. “Come now Veronica, you are an intelligent woman, are you not? You understand who we are.”

“Who you are? I ... I...” The pale woman turned paler, and her arms fell limp at her sides. “Oh.”

That was surprising. Veronica looked at each of them, and her eyes fell as she realized the situation she was in, body going limp with submission. Smart, and she was quick on her feet to come to the conclusion that fast.

Veronica was maybe twenty years old, and looked absolutely terrified. Not just terrified cause she realized she was in a room with three vampires, but because she was young and inexperienced with ... everything. Obviously in over her head after moving out from her parents’ place, and trying to make it in a cruel world. Another young person who found out too late that you couldn’t live on a minimum wage like you could fifty years ago. Probably took out a loan, maybe with some unsavory people. To land a job at a place like La DaFraam, she had to know her craft, so she wasn’t stupid.

Stupid enough to be impulsive with her life, like leaving her parents’ money, and how she went looking for a vampire the second time. Smart enough to know how much shit she was in, and make solid efforts to dig herself out of it. Antoinette had it right, Veronica was a perfect option for a thrall. Beautiful, smart, but fucked by circumstance, and in need of help.

She was also fucking gorgeous. A bit short, maybe five two, and quite thin; the short black skirt she wore showed that, especially considering its waist was some kind of mini-corset that stopped below the navel. The whole getup was, what was the word, chic? And sexy. She wore a white top with long sleeves, and a very, very spread, open chest, cleavage that reached the navel, and made sure her large breasts were on display, no bra.

Of course large, because Antoinette and Elaine were apparently convinced Jack could never have too much boobage in his life. And while that may have been completely and totally true, it was ridiculous. He wasn't going to pick a thrall based on the size of their rack. Probably not.

"I love this hair," Elaine said, and she raised a hand enough to run her fingertips along its ends. Shoulder length hair, dyed bright blue, with bangs that cut down along one half of her face. She probably had cute anime posters in her room, or in the modern age, as her smart phone background.

"Th ... thanks," she said, eyes glancing up to get a peek of Jack and Antoinette. Nervous as fuck.

Jack looked up at Antoinette, but she smiled down at him, and gestured to Veronica. All in his hands then. Fine, sure, whatever, because he had loads of experience engaging potential thralls. Ugh, this might just become a train wreck.

"Veronica Tam," he said. The fact it was him talking in the authoritative voice, and not the two insanely tall, one topless, gorgeous women, surprised her. "I'm informed you've discovered some pretty scary stuff, in Dolareido's nightlife." She managed a trembling nod. "We're here to talk about that."

"How ... how do I know you are what you ... imply you are?"

He pulled aside one of his cheeks with a finger hook, and grew his fangs. Her eyes widened, and she quivered, gazed locked onto the sight of his fangs emerging, and then reverting at will.

“Satisfied?”

“Y-Yes.”

“Good.” He leaned forward, and gave her a hard look, the sort of look Julias gave when negotiating with corporate types. It was a good face to use when bullying people, but it was also a good way to make sure someone didn’t lie to you. “We don’t let people run around knowing about us, Veronica. Dangerous.” Her eyes widened even more, and he put up his hands. Shit, that’d sounded like a death threat. “We’re not here to kill you, calm down.” Probably not here to kill her, at least.

“Then ... w-what do you want?”

“My love,” he gestured to the tall white-haired beauty at his side, “informs me you’re in debt, Veronica. Considering how young you are, and that you don’t have access to the assets of your parents, or the support of your old boyfriend, you probably took out a loan with less than reputable types.”

She winced with every word. “Life hasn’t been ... what I expected.”

“And to make things worse, you stumbled onto a nightlife that should remain secret.” He thought the speech was coming along nicely, honestly. Talking with an authoritative style wasn’t that hard. Maybe it was just his Ventrue half having fun?

“I ... I did. But I won’t tell anyone!”

“Indeed.” He grinned at her, and sat up straight again. “You have two options, Veronica. The first option: I can wipe your mind of the encounters you’ve had with our kind.”

“B-Brainwashing?”

“I’d be removing the memories of those encounters, nothing more.” Still, kinda like brainwashing, but no point in making things even scarier for her. Hopefully he wouldn’t accidentally delete her whole brain while he was in there. “The second option: come work for me.” And he gave her the Julias grin, the suave, smooth, flirtatious and confident grin. He’d practiced it in the mirror some more, and thought he was getting pretty good at it.

“Work for you? But, I ... um ... what does that mean?”

“At first, you’ll be taking care of my mansion.”

“Mansion!?”

He chuckled, a very Ventrue, cocky laugh. Damn, it came totally naturally. “With time, you’ll be given more responsibilities, and more knowledge, as your worth is proven. And you’ll be payed handsomely.”

Talk of money had her eyebrows going up. “How much?”

“At least double what you’re paid here. At first. Given time, your salary will grow to be larger.”

If her eyes could have fallen out of her skull, they would have.

“Wow ... Do I, um, get to think about this? It’s such a big decision, and—”

“No. Like I said, we can’t let someone who knows about us go running around. When you leave this changing room, Veronica, either you’ll have lost your memory of us, or you’ll be working for me.”

She sniffed a small whimper, nodded, and looked down again. “I see.”

“P-Price?”

He nodded. “A drop of my blood.”

“What!? But isn’t that how—”

“No, it won’t turn you into a vampire. But it will bind you to my will, Veronica. You’ll be my servant, until I decide otherwise. You will do as I tell you to, and you will be compelled to do so.” He stood up, and looked down at the small woman. “Understood?” He almost scared himself with how easy he found all this, being boss-like and confident. He didn’t feel confident, not at all, but pretending he was hadn’t only become easier the past few years, it’d become downright fun.

She opened her mouth, but no words came out. She just stared up at him, dumbfounded.

“I can assure you,” Antoinette said, “my love will take good care of you. You will be treated well.”

“Very well,” Elaine whispered down at the small woman, voice blatantly husky. No need to say ‘sex is involved’ when a tone like that did it for her. “I can also assure you, you will enjoy having Jack as a master, but you will be required to do whatever he wants of you. Whatever. He. Wants.”

“Again, just taking care of my mansion ... at first.”

She stared at them, completely overwhelmed by the bomb they’d just dropped on her. And, much as Jack knew he sounded and looked confident, more thoughts boiled up that made him nervous.

The fuck would the curse do to his blood? Would it affect Veronica in some strange way? He had to find out, but it'd really suck to learn it made his blood toxic or something.

They waited, and waited, and after a few minutes went by, Veronica took a deep breath.

“I’ll work for you. What ... what do I have to lose, right? I have nothing here, just ... debt from a loan shark, and no friends or anything anymore.”

She’d convinced herself, and Jack. Took guts to come to a decision like that, that quickly.

Jack nodded, and held up his wrist. “Are you sure?”

“I’m ... I’m sure.”

He nodded again, slower this time, and sank his thumb into his wrist. Skin punctured, he held out his wrist to her, and with an effort of will, told his blood to pool at the wound. A single, large, thick droplet of inhumanely dark blood.

Shivering until her knees almost hit each other, she took his wrist, and kissed it. Her eyes went wide, wonder and shock combined, and she let out a small moan.

“Wow. It tastes ... amazing.”

He smiled. Better to let her know he didn’t know what it tasted like. The Vinculum worked on vampires as much as humans, so a smart vampire was damn careful about what they put in their mouths.

“Wonderful!” Elaine said. “May I have a taste of your new thrall, Jack?”

He rolled his eyes, sat down beside Antoinette again, and gestured to the kine. So far so good, not dead on the spot or anything. “Veronica, have you ever had a vampire feed on you?”

“Um, no? I ... How would I know?”

“Pleasure,” Antoinette whispered, with the same husky tone Elaine used earlier. “Extreme pleasure. And normally, the master is the first to taste of a new thrall, Elaine.”

Elaine shrugged, and lowered her hands from Veronica’s shoulders down to her hips. She was so damn tall compared to Veronica, her breasts almost sat on the blue-haired woman’s shoulders.

“But she looks so utterly delicious.”

“Pleasure?” Veronica said. “It won’t hurt?”

Elaine chuckled down at the woman, and sent her into more quivers as she leaned down, and set lips along her neck. “Not at all.”

Jack had seen Elaine feed on Julee and Ashley many times, and every time, the two women loved it. More than loved it, they came their brains out, because Elaine always got her fingers inside them whenever she did. And considering the mischievous look in her eyes now, he knew she was going to do it again.

“I think ... I think I will have the first taste.” He got back up, and stepped in front of Veronica. “You’re mine now, Veronica Tam.” He didn’t mean to say that, or say it in such a dark, gravely voice, it just came out, a statement of pure power. And he knew the curse wasn’t the reason he said it. That was all him and his Ventrue self, the part of him that delighted in the idea of controlling someone else. They hadn’t lied. He’d treat her well. But, damn, out of nowhere, he suddenly found himself saying these things as if he’d said them a hundred times, to other thralls and ghouls that served him. He was her master, she served him now, and that meant he got to feed on her whenever he wanted.

She nodded, and made no effort to move away as he leaned in, and set his lips on her neck. Her whole body trembled, but as he sank his fangs into her skin, her trembling melted away. She collapsed back, but Elaine remained standing, her breasts against Veronica's shoulders, one of them nudging into Jack's face as he drank down his first gulp of the woman's warm, delicious blood.

And he stopped. After what was essentially nothing more than a sip, he licked the girl's neck, closing her bite wound, and he stepped back.

Veronica, panting heavily, stared at him, eyes wide with a new stimulus she'd never felt before. Her nipples hardened, points against the thin white material of her shirt, and her face flushed. She was aroused.

And as much as he'd like to say it was just the Kiss that had her boiling, he knew it was more. The clothes, the blue hair, the adventurous attitude, she'd been half scared and half excited the moment Elaine had pulled her into the room. Having the tall blonde constantly pushing her big, naked breasts into her shoulders had definitely put her in a mood. The Kiss just convinced her body it was ok to give in.

"Wow."

He smiled and sat back down beside Antoinette. "There."

"Do ... I taste good?"

They all chuckled. There was something so perfectly sweet about a question like that, it stroked the Kindred sense of humor just right. Kind of twisted, but true.

“Yes, you do. Very. I look forward to Kissing you again.”

“Kissing?”

“The Kiss,” he said. “It’s what we call feeding. And the next time it’ll be ... well, Elaine, you can show her.”

“Ah, finally.” With a hungry growl, Elaine lowered herself down to the other side of Veronica’s neck, and sank her teeth into her.

“Oh! Oh ... god...” Veronica melted against Elaine’s body, her eyes locked on Jack, and she struggled to stay standing. Elaine kept her from falling, one hand slipping up the girl’s exposed sternum and neckline in an intimate hug, the other sliding down her stomach, and down onto her skirt.

Jack almost chimed in to say something, to tell Elaine to stop. Veronica hadn’t given permission for anything sexual. But he stopped himself. The look in Veronica’s eyes screamed the bliss of the Kiss, the adrenaline of her life being suddenly changed, the danger of her circumstance, and the joy in a chance to show off her body for her new master.

One taste of his blood, and she was already that deep into the Vinculum? It took three tastes. How far would it push her with the second and third dose?

Much as he tried to remain focused on his concerns, or at least not hypnotized by Veronica’s sudden pleasure, there was no chance. Elaine was too damn good. She spread the already very open chest of the shirt apart, and hooked it around the outside of the thrall’s large breasts. She had subtle nipple piercings, studs. Veronica blushed furiously, but all she could do was tremble, nipples swollen and begging to be touched. Elaine obliged, one hand clutching and squeezing the woman’s breast with a little more frantic energy than Jack figured she would; she was hungry.

Her other hand pulled up the thrall's skirt, exposing a black thong, and Elaine groaned as she slipped her hand underneath the waistband, and into the thrall's underwear.

"Pierced," Elaine said between gulps. "I bet there are many hidden decorations to find on this beauty."

Veronica's tried to say something, but it came to a quick end, as Elaine made sure Veronica's first full Kiss was world shattering.

---

Back in his mansion, Jack sat down on the base of the stairs of the ridiculous grand entrance room, or lobby or whatever it was, and sighed. He'd handled the conversation with Veronica well, so well Antoinette said she'd been impressed. Apparently, he did the authoritative Ventrue thing like a natural. Veronica had been thoroughly convinced, and enamored.

"One thrall in development," he said to himself, and he checked off a non-existent list on a non-existent clipboard. "Woo."

He didn't feel good about it, but at the same time, didn't feel as bad as he thought he should have. The choice had been given, and it'd been a good one. Forget, or join. And join was definitely a good option for someone like Veronica who needed some rescuing from shitty life circumstances. But the look in her eyes after she'd taken some of his blood, that was a little unnerving. She'd looked at him like she knew him, like she liked him, and the girl had known him for ten whole minutes.

But, that was the whole vampire human thing. He was a vampire, she was a human. Kindred and kine. Kine, a term that meant cattle, or cows. He wasn't supposed to think of her as an equal, because she was prey, and he was the predator. A part of him knew that, accepted it, and liked that. Another part of him very much did not.

“Julias would understand. He didn’t use the Vinculum, usually. He created most of his thralls with Dominate.” But the man had a knack for Dominate, subtle and powerful, that Jack just didn’t have. Julias could gently nudge people in certain directions, or keep them under his control for weeks, even months. Jack could easily brainwipe someone with the power of the curse and leave them a total empty husk, but to manipulate their minds like a master puppeteer, wasn’t a skill he had. Yet.

Maybe things would be fine? Ashley and Julee had amazing lives, relative to other humans. And with some more years under their belt, Antoinette might embrace them. They’d no longer be slaves to her, and gain the power of a vampire, but they’d also have to deal with all the hardships that came with. Maybe Veronica would find herself in the same situation in the future?

That was assuming nothing was wrong with her. Antoinette and Elaine took her to the tower to check her in the weird, humming machine, ritual circle thing, and if no trace of the curse showed up on her, they’d deliver her to the mansion. His first thrall, an attractive girl with a head on her shoulders. Much as he originally wanted a thrall just to help him with the mansion, she’d be good for collecting information.

And, considering how she reacted to Elaine’s touch, there was no doubt in his mind Veronica would try and seduce him. The look in her eyes, how she’d watched him, basically eye-fucked him as Elaine fingered her, painted a clear picture. The Vinculum was damn powerful, even when only at a third its true strength, and now Veronica was thinking about Jack in a sexual context thanks to Elaine.

Damn it, Elaine. He didn’t need to put sex on Veronica’s mind so damn early in this whole situation. Jack was already spoiled as fuck in the sex department.

Antoinette didn't like the idea of sharing him with other vampires; Elaine was the exception, considering their history. Sharing him with ghouls and thralls though? To her, that was basically like using a sex toy on him. She'd prefer it be her ghouls, or his, to a random kine off the street though, because then she'd at least know where those toys came from.

Elders. They looked at kine like humans looked at sheep. Sure, they cared for them, even loved them, but they raised them as pets, cattle, an animal they could use for self gain. It was still hard to think of them like that. Julias had a hard time thinking about them like that, too.

Knock knock. Fucking hell, again?

"Maybe she'd even open the door for me?" He laughed at the thought. Yeah, it'd be so fucking weird to have someone do that. And yet, they not only would, it'd be damn expected from vampires that his thralls served him like that, opening doors for him and shit. Ugh.

Before he could open the door, he stopped, and grit his teeth. He felt it, the presence of another vampire; no need for Auspex when an elder comes knocking. Knock knock, to the tune of Shave and a Haircut. Which pretty much sealed who the fuck it would be.

He took a deep, useless breath, and opened the door.

"Jacob."

"Jack! Long time no see."

He growled, made no effort to hide it, and didn't move. "Jacob. I— Triss, hey." The other Nosferatu stood behind her boss, and he gave her a nod. She returned it.

Chuckling like an asshole, Jacob took a step forward. Jack very much wanted to stand his ground, and may even push the man back. Maybe even punch him. But judging from the look on Triss's face, Jacob was here to help him talk with Black Blood, and it'd be stupid to bite the hand that fed him.

He could bite it later.

Sighing, he took a step back, and the witch and warlock followed him in.

"Nice place," Jacob said, smiling pleasantly. "Oh my, quite the chandelier."

"You can blame Viktor for the fashion."

"I could," the elder said, "but you killed him, remember?"

He winced at that. Right, he knew that, and so did Triss thankfully. But, damn, it was frustrating just how much better Jacob was at amassing information and using it as a weapon than Jack was.

Well, time to rip off the band-aid.

"How's Mom?"

Jacob's manic grin softened for a moment, and that surprised Jack. Jacob was a master at the psycho smiles, so much he could have entire rooms of people all creeped out of their minds. To see his expression soften into something resembling normal, was strange.

"I suppose you think I'm here to tease you about the fact that I'm fucking your mom? Maybe I should grab a towel and whip your ass with it while I'm at it?"

“ ... what?”

“If we’re gonna throw barbs like idiot jocks in a locker room, might as well go all the way.” Laughing again, he hopped up onto the first stair, grabbed the railing, and hung off it toward the lobby. “I’m game if you are, but I didn’t plan on it.”

“You seriously not going to take advantage of the ‘I fucked your mom’ angle?”

“Nope. Because while it may be hard for you to believe, Clarice, I actually kinda like your mom.”

Kinda like? He rolled his eyes, but the heat in his throat settled. Well, that was better than using her to manipulate him and Antoinette. And, much as Jacob was fucking chaos incarnate, it was hard to dismiss the things he said. He wasn’t a liar, not like that.

“And,” Triss said as she stood beside Jack, “the Circle likes her. She’s fun, and sweet, and a total hornball.”

He shoved her away, and she laughed as she joined Jacob. The two of them were getting along, better than Jack figured they would. Either Jacob was rubbing off on her, or she was on him, and considering the big smile she had on, he guessed the former.

“I suppose I should just accept that Mom’s taking my advice. Taking it in a direction I didn’t predict or want, but, she is. And as long as she’s happy, I’m happy.”

Triss grinned and nodded. “It’s not like we’re not treating her with respect. But I do think we were all a little surprised at how, um ... easily she got into the spirit of things.”

“Obviously it’s because I’m a smooth and sexy fucker,” Jacob said, lifted his eye bandage high enough to expose one of the empty sockets, and winked at Triss. No eyelid, but the wink was obvious from the face muscles, and Triss groaned and pushed him away.

Jack watched the two, arms folded across his chest, and every bit of analytical skill he had running at one hundred percent. Was Jacob legit, or was all this a careful manipulation of Jack’s expectations? Even the softer smile he’d had on for a split second, which told Jack he was legit, could have been faked. Any elder could act their way to an Oscar in their sleep. For now, it did seem like Jacob liked his mom.

“So ... how’s this going to work?” he said. “We doing this here, or —”

“Gimme a few weeks,” Jacob said, “and sure, we could summon here. But it’ll probably save us some time if we head to my altar in Three Kings Cemetery.”

He frowned at that. “Why only now?”

“Say what?”

“I’ve been waiting a few days. Why’d it take so long for you to show up, if we’re going to use that site?” He’d seen that site. Any witch or warlock would have been able to perform any crazy ritual there, considering how much shit was in there. The work had already been done, then.

“Oh, I had things to do,” Jacob said. “And so did Black Blood.”

“Uh huh. Or maybe you just like being a dick to me.”

Jacob, chuckling, jumped off the stair and toward the door. “Yeah, that’s it, Jack. My life choices are made to annoy you.” On the way out of the mansion, he smacked Jack on the back of the shoulder.

---

The crazy cave beneath Three Kings Cemetery was straight out of a horror film. The secret switch hidden in the mausoleum, the hidden stone stairs, the cave itself, the hanging warning sign, and the quiet, constant wailing in the background, it was all a lovely concoction of doom and gloom. Honestly, it was pretty badass and metal, and he could understand why Beatrice found herself drawn to it.

The problem was the badassery and metalness were only surface level. Once you got past that, the Circle of the Crone was fucked up, into some really nasty shit, and you had to have the stomach for it. He'd managed to stomach it, when it meant helping Triss so they could get revenge for Julias. Slitting the throats of a bunch of kine, like sheep, was not something he figured he could do regularly. Even if every kine they'd sacrificed had been a horrible killer, and he knew they weren't, doing shit like that regularly would fuck him up.

He grimaced as they stepped into the main room. The big bowl where Jacob had ripped out the throats of the kine Jack had dominated was right there, huge and rusty and gross, and held up by a bunch of skeletons. Chains dangled from the stone ceiling. Strange symbols were etched into the walls and floor. An unnatural dark fought against the single candle Triss carried, preventing any light from reaching too far, especially to the back wall. No one was in the room, no one spoke, but he could hear quiet banshee shrieks, as if someone had sealed their dying sounds in the walls, deep beneath the cemetery above them. Or maybe they were hearing the dead from the cemetery, angry at them for violating the sanctity of their resting place.

It was the sort of place he wouldn't be surprised to see Sabrina rise from up the bowl, and get revenge on him for killing Viktor.

Jacob walked up to the bowl, turned, and leaned against it, like the rust and blood meant nothing to him.

“We never did talk about payment,” the bastard said.

“He’s not paying us,” Triss said. “He’s already paid me, you fucker. And if I have to, I can summon Black Blood without you.”

Jack folded his arms across his chest, tapped his foot on the stone, and glared at the elder. No need to say anything, or play stupid verbal jousting games with the asshole, not with Beatrice helping him.

“Ha, not for me, stupid slut.” He shrugged, and hopped up onto the edge of the huge bowl. It didn’t budge. “I meant for Black Blood. He’ll want something from Jack.”

“Don’t suppose I can give him an IOU?”

Jacob laughed. Triss laughed. Jack did not. It wasn’t supposed to be funny.

The elder hopped down, rubbed his hands together, and held them up. “Black Blood, I summon thee.”

Black Blood had to have the same sense of humor as Jacob, cause Jack figured it’d take a lot more than that single, short sentence, to summon a creature as insanely powerful and larger-than-life as Black Blood. Jacob said it’d take weeks to prepare his mansion, so maybe it was the hundreds of symbols? Maybe the symbols were exact things, and not just random gibberish? If Antoinette had to get crazy with weird mathematical symbols, crazy weird blue light that was most definitely not just blue light, some kinda hidden machine that made the room buzz, and a special lens to be able to see ephemera, then it made sense Jacob’s ritual room was a lot more exact and designed than it initially seemed.

So, if Triss wanted to summon Black Blood, she'd have to use this room, or any others Jacob created. Or, maybe she knew how to create all the crazy symbols too?

And of course, Jacob's single sentence was enough. The wailing, always just below noticeable noise, increased until it was very much noticeable. A horrible cold filled the room, the sort of cold he felt when he visited his dead sister. Black ooze bubbled up from the stones around his feet, from the cracks in the walls, from the ceiling, hidden in shadow. He forced himself to stay where he was, but with each passing moment, it was clear Black Blood's presence was crossing over to join them.

The candle flickered, but didn't die. The ooze avoided it. Not even vampires could see in absolute blackness, and this deep underground, that's exactly what they'd get if it went out.

"My my, look what we got here." A deep, rumbling voice filled the room, layered with rasp, the sort of rasp he heard from his sister. And it had a Texan accent. The accent was pleasing, but the alien, gravely depth mixed with grating rasp, was very much not, and he winced as the words cut his ears.

"Black Blood," he said.

"Jack Terry. I understand Malachi has been bedding your mother?"

Oh fucking god. He threw up his hands, glared at Jacob, and glared at Triss too. They both chuckled.

"Black Blood, Beatrice told me you know a thing or two about the curse."

"Indeed I do," the darkness said. It came from all around him, no source, and Jack kept his eyes on the sacrifice bowl in front of him for lack of anything else to look at. The skeletons were crying black tears. “The Strix have got their claws into you, boy. Took them a bunch of generations, but they got them into you.”

He forced himself to not shiver at the mention of Strix. “Tell me more.”

The ooze laughed. “And why would I do that? No profit in that for me, boy.”

He rolled his eyes and looked over to Triss. She shrugged. They all knew the conversation would go this way. Well, fuck that.

“You must think I’m an idiot, spirit,” Jack said. “You think you can control me with a carrot on a stick? I’m not going to let you drag me along in a string of manipulative conversations. So how about you shut the fuck up, and I tell you how it’s going to be.”

The room went silent. Jacob said nothing, Triss said nothing, and Black Blood said nothing. The quiet wailing in the background softened, muffled, and the cold aura permeating everything settled. Good. If he’d managed to shock everyone, then maybe he could make some progress.

“I don’t trust Jacob, but I don’t trust or respect you, Black Blood. You might be big and powerful, but everything I’ve seen and heard about you shows me you’re nothing but an opportunist. You’ve never done anything directly. You rescued me and my crew from Sándor’s nightmare, and again, you helped Sándor in his nightmare, to put a stop to Jeremiah’s ritual. But we both damn well know you did that shit for your own personal gain, for acquiring favors, and for learning.” Jack tapped his temple once, and grinned. “Don’t think I don’t know you’ve been up to something, Black Blood, and have been for years.”

“Ha. I think you might be overestimating me, Ventrue.”

“Yeah right. You wouldn’t drop information for Triss unless you knew she’d tell me, and you knew it’d trigger this conversation. So, this is how it’s going to be. You tell me, for free, if you can do something to get rid of this curse, and the likelihood of success. And then you tell me what you want in exchange for helping me get rid of it. Don’t think I don’t have options, Black Blood.”

Better to not tell the spirit what those options were. Damien finding some information about the binding ritual, and Elaine’s experiments, could be a great step toward dealing with the curse. And even Antoinette might be able to help, if he asked her, told her to go nuts with her experiments, even put him on a table and cut him open.

But, all of those options would be slow to produce results at best, and outright torturous at worst. If Black Blood had a direct solution, he wanted to know.

The darkness chuckled again, and Jack folded his arms across his chest as he tapped his foot. Negotiating mode. Black Blood was basically like every corporation Jack had dealt with the past few years, evil and greedy. It’d be in his best interest to treat the fucker like one.

“Tell me, boy, what do you know about diablerie?”

~~Natasha~~

“Uh, Natasha, that’s a pretty dark story,” Art said.

She nodded and looked down, not able to keep eye contact. “I know, b-but it’s ... it’s only a fantasy. The kind you could read about, but seeing it on video might be a ... b-b-bit crazy.”

Matt nodded, and ran his hands along her hair. She closed her eyes, and switched from kissing Art’s length, to Matt’s. At this point, she was a total sucker for hands through the hair, and she beamed up at Matt as she set a suckling kiss on the head of his girth. The hot water fell over them, and she wiped some off her eyes so she could see Matt stare down at her with hunger.

One hand around the base of Matt's girth, and another around Art's. They were supposed to be cleaning up after sex in her apartment, but as usual, the boys had joined her as she showered, despite her protests; at this point, they knew which of her protests were serious and which weren't. And, as usual, the boys had quickly bounced back from their orgasms, and were ready for thirds.

Down on her knees, she shivered in secret delight as she looked up at the two big men watching her work. Something about the way they looked at her, like she was theirs to be used whenever they wanted, was so dirty and wrong, and it sent tingles through her like crazy. It wasn't like she didn't know women had fantasies like this, she just never really thought she'd be one of them.

Now that she had the movie director bug, worming its way through her brain all night every night, demanding she plot and prepare and obsess over it, stories ran through her mind. Erotic plots, full of naughty, erotic stuff.

"I'm all for playing a villain," Matt said, voice wavering a little as Natasha's growing skill sent obvious jolts of pleasure up through him. "I mean, as long as people know it's a movie, I say we really indulge some taboo fantasies."

Tash grinned. Matt got it. They were just fantasies, and they could get really naughty with them. Really naughty! She was just one woman, a small one, and they were two huge guys with big muscles who could be pretty damn scary if they wanted to be. And, more important, she was a rich woman with a skill for tech. Setting up high budget film setups, and then doing some quality editing? She was excited to sink hundreds of hours into the project, and on the next, and the next.

Matthew came first. She gave him doe eyes as she suckled and kissed the fat glans of his cock, and when waves of his cum poured into her mouth, a gentle push of her tongue against his cock caused it to flow down from her lips, and down her body. And seconds later, she did the same for Arturo, hot water flowing down over their bodies as she worked her hand on his girth while her lips wrapped the whole of his glans, and milked him.

Work done, she stood up, and flicked some water at their faces.

“There. D-Done?” she said. Matt nodded, and after a moment of exaggerated contemplation, so did Art. “Good. You’re b-both addicts.”

Arturo grinned down at her, and plucked the soap off the shower wall. “Yeah well, you can blame Dolareido for that. In fact, scratch that, you can blame you for that.”

She yanked the soap from him, and lathered up her loofa. “How so?”

“Matt and I have been in sexual relationships before, like we told you. But even in the most active relationships, we didn’t have sex this much.”

“That’s ... n-not my fault!” She frowned at him, but it didn’t last. “Is it?”

Matthew came up behind her, and set his hands on her hips. Then up her hips to her breasts, where he massaged and caressed. She wasn’t Blushing Life anymore, but that didn’t stop the man from entertaining himself with the softness of her small boobs. And, after having it done to her hundreds of times now, she kinda liked it, standing there and letting the man touch her. It was relaxing, in a weird sort of way. If she'd been Blushing, it'd have worked some heat through her, but without it, it was pleasant, and she sighed contentment as she rested her back against his abs.

"It is," the big guy said.

Art nodded. "Mhmm. You're too damn hot, Natasha."

She rolled her eyes, and ran the loofa up Art's abs. Abs everywhere. Abs she could make really pop on the screen with some lotion and high contrast lighting.

"I'm n-not ... not super hot."

"The fuck?" Art said.

"I'm not like, you know, the other girls." Girls they'd all seen topless now. "They'd all ... look b-better in the movies I want to make."

Matt chuckled, and with her head back against his sternum, the warm vibrations flowed through her. "I admit, they all have big, beautiful boobs."

She frowned up at him, but as she did, the man leaned down over her, and his hands slid down her body.

Art mirrored his friend's chuckle. "Yeah, they do. Can't say I wasn't imagining what motorboating those would be like."

She outright glared at her boyfriends, but again, they both chuckled at her, and Matt set a kiss on her head.

"And yet, all I think about every day and night, is getting inside this tiny, little body," the giant said.

"Yeah," Art said, and he squatted down in front of Natasha so he could grin up at her. "I don't go to sleep, thinking about putting my dick between a couple big tits.”

He laughed, and traced a finger up and down her stomach. “I go to sleep thinking about getting my dick inside this tight, tiny little pussy.” His finger ran down to her mons, and he caressed the soft skin. “You have no idea, Tash, no idea how hot it is to see you penetrated by Matt and me, to see your stomach stretch around our dicks. No idea how great it feels, how your little body—”

She frowned at him harder, and folded her arms across her chest. “P-Pedophile.”

Both men laughed, and Art leaned in, and kissed her. “You look nothing like a kid, more like, one of those tall, skinny models they sometimes use for fashion shows. Just, miniaturized.”

She tried to keep frowning, but she couldn't. This conversation was dumb, and fun, a conversation they'd had before. Both men had assured her they were attracted to her, intensely so, and considering how easily they grew aroused around her, she believed it. Still, after everyone had their boobs out, she couldn't help but feel a little envy, and jealousy when her boys had given them looks.

Sometimes a girl just needs to hear that her man, or men, are attracted to her, right? Ugh, so girly. Antoinette would probably berate her for the lack of self confidence.

She hugged Art, and kissed him. And Kissed him, just a little. And that was dumb, cause then they spent another twenty minutes fucking in the shower. Ah well, at least they were already clean when they were done.

Dressed in her suit, she sat at her kitchen counter and popped open her laptop, careful to not open any apps she couldn't let the boys see; all of them were password locked, too. The boys wandered around in her kitchen and dug through her fridge. They were hungry, especially after she'd taken a small sip of both of them, and they ate food to get energy back. Her fridge used to have only bottles of blood, but now it had raw steaks, too.

If any kine ever looked in her fridge, she'd have a lot of explaining to do. She'd need to get a Ventrue to wipe their mind.

She smiled as she watched them. Both wore jeans and only jeans, and there was something intensely appealing about men wearing nothing but jeans, walking around in a kitchen, preparing food. She supposed vice versa was true, too. Unfortunately just looking at raw steak was enough to gross her out, vampire after all, and she grimaced each time she glanced at it.

“Hey, we don't judge your food!” Art said.

“N-Not the same. I don't think spaghetti is disgusting to look at.”

Both boys grimaced at the mention of spaghetti.

“No thanks,” Matt said. “If it didn't run or fly or gallop before it hit the plate, I don't want none of it.”

“Um, b-beer and wine didn't do that.”

Art laughed, nodding. “True, we made an exception for alcohol. But if we stopped drinking it for a while, or spent a lot of time in the Hisil, we'd probably lose a taste for it.”

“David can't drink it,” Matt said. “Poor guy. Doesn't eat meat much anymore, either. He'll go on hunts in the Hisil and eat a spirit, and that's pretty much the only way he can get nourishment these days.”

“Why?” she asked.

They looked at each other, contemplating. Answering her was probably giving her information Avery would consider secret. But before she could say it was alright, Art shrugged and sat beside her at the counter.

“Werewolves can get closer and closer to our spirit halves, or further. Getting closer changes more than just our tastes, though. It changes how easily we transform into our wolf halves, and changes how easily we get nourishment from different types of food. I could eat a sandwich, if I really had to. David would just puke it up. His body wouldn’t accept it.”

Ah, that made sense, sorta. “And you and Matt are ... b-balanced?”

Matt shrugged and nodded. “I like to think so. The further we are from our spirit halves, the harder it is to get into wolf form. But then it’s easier to get along with humans. Eat a sandwich and stuff, you know? Less chance for instinct to kick in if, say, you hear a gunshot.”

“But if something does trigger your instincts, they can be harder to control,” Art said. “Vampires have similar issues with their Beast, right?”

“I ... I guess.” She never really thought of it as a balance to strike. The Beast was something that ate at vampires, demanded they succumb to its instincts and hunger, and gave no worries about things like the Masquerade or consequences. To her, it was just something to avoid. But to someone like Jessy, it was a source of power and confidence, that she could tap into the Beast’s strength without completely giving into it.

Art’s phone buzzed, and he sighed. “Probably Avery. Gimme a sec.” He stepped away and pulled the phone out of his pocket.

Natasha watched him for a second, but looked away. They had an unspoken agreement in their relationship, that they wouldn’t pry into each other's covenant business. He was a werewolf, a member of Avery's pack, who belonged to the Hunters in Darkness group, called Meninna in the strange language they spoke, them and spirits. Sure, he wasn't a member of a secret organization of mad scientists who did experiments that bordered on insanity, like she was, but that didn't mean she shouldn't respect what secrets he had. Art and Matt did the same for her.

"I'm surprised you haven't brought up Maria," Matt said.

Tash froze and stared at her laptop. Better that than letting Matt get a close look at her eyes, that were probably wide and singing 'I visited her days ago!'.

"Everything's b-been quiet. Avery said she'd give me t-time, so I'll keep looking for evidence."

"Still think she's not up to something?"

Of course she thought Maria was up to something, just, not anything to do with Lucas. Getting that information into Avery's head was another problem entirely. It wasn't like Natasha had a catalog of quality evidence proving Maria was innocent, just her word, and a damn compelling argument.

"You know," she said, "M-Maria is a devout worshiper of God?"

"Right, right, the whole Longinus thing."

"Yeah. She's ... she's a true believer, you know? I worked with her for decades, and she was..."

"Cruel." Matt reached over and wrapped an arm over her shoulders.

"Yes, b-but ... consistent." Pretty much the opposite of Jacob. "I trust her. She wouldn't ... d-do something that went against her beliefs, even if she really wanted to. And the Lancea et Sanctum doesn't condone dark magic stuff." She almost laughed as she said it. Dark magic? What was this, a fantasy story? Fifty years of vampire-y stuff, and the idea of magic still made her reel in shock, that something like that could actually exist. No wonder she ran from the Ordo after Daniel sired her. "Or at least, they don't condone ... doing things that they think God wouldn't like. Resurrection is—"

"It might not be resurrection, you know." He let go of her shoulders, set his elbow on the counter, chin in palm, and winced as he looked at her. "Spirits don't go around, talking about vamps unless they're connected. She's up to something, Tash, and there's no way she isn't. If you think it's not resurrection, fine, it's probably not, but you heard those spirits as much as we did. And Avery and the others have found more spirits, talking about some kind of ritual, with those red wraiths mentioning Maria specifically.

"I ... I d-don't know why they're mentioning her by name."

"Maybe because they're working with her? And that's ... not good."

Sighing again, she closed her laptop and set her chin on it. "I know. I know."

Arturo put his phone away, groaned, put on his shirt and socks, and walked to the door of her apartment. He got his jacket, and tossed Matt his. "Let's go."

"Go, where we going?" Matt hopped up and joined Art at the door. Natasha did, too.

"Got a sighting on those azlu that got away. Clara said there were some that weren't merged, dealing with those tears, right? She thinks she's found them."

“Oh shit, let’s go.” As if summoned to do his destiny, Matt hopped around like a fool, putting on his shirt and socks at the same time, before he slipped on the jacket and rubbed his hands together. If Natasha didn’t know any better, she’d think he was excited. He was definitely energized. They’d told her the Hunters in Darkness specialized in killing Hosts, like the azlu, and whenever the opportunity arose, they were all over it. It was their purpose.

It made her smile. Vampires didn’t have that. Vampires were selfish, and everything they did was to further their own goals; which covenant they stuck with was determined by those goals, not the other way around. Sure, some vampires gave themselves a purpose, something bigger than themselves, but the werewolves did it naturally. To them, their purpose was as intrinsic as their wolf halves.

“Can I c-come?” she said as she got close to Art. “I have tonight off, and—”

A harsh thud interrupted her, and she blinked up at Art, confused. Did someone just slam a door? No. It felt kinda like that, but she didn’t hear a slam or anything. Art had reached out for her, maybe to steady her from the sudden vibration? Earthquake, maybe?

Art looked sad. Very sad. He looked miserable. Why? Matt was bursting with energy and eager to go on a hunt, but Art looked like someone had just ruined his life and told him to accept it.

Tash looked down, and blinked. Something was sticking out of her chest, straight through her blouse. A piece of wood? And it was sticking out from the right spot on her chest to stab her heart. But, that was crazy. Why would there be a piece of wood in her heart?

She blinked up at Art, and the man winced, as if she’d just shot him. Matt started yelling, but she couldn’t hear him, only see the shocked and angry look on his face. She collapsed, Art caught her, and before she could say anything, everything went black.

Chapter 131

~~Eric~~

His dad's face broke into the biggest smile Eric had ever seen, when Jessy lifted her shirt.

"Holy hell," his dad said. He sat up in the hospital bed, and twisted his whole body to face her.

"I know, right? I got pretty lucky, getting this lean without losing the tits." With white t-shirt and black bra in hand, she bounced in place several times. Both men stared, hypnotized. Laughing, she pat her abs with one hand, still holding the clothes up to her collar with the other. "I should do modeling."

His dad laughed. "I think you might be onto something." With a groan, Eric elbowed his girlfriend, and she laughed as she lowered the clothes back on. "Son! You stay outta this!"

"Dad, that's my girlfriend."

Jessy shrugged, and flashed the old man again, complete with a few more bounces and jiggles, before getting her clothes back on for good. "Don't worry you old fucker, I'll send you a picture."

His dad laughed harder, and winked. Which of course sent Jessy into hysterics, his dad too, and Eric had to drag her out of his dad's room.

She continued laughing as they walked the hospital halls, earning some strange looks from doctors and nurses, before they eventually left the building.

"You're spoiling him," he said.

“Yeah well, he deserves it. He looks great.”

“He does. Doc says he’s been busting his ass. Not an easy thing to do, dealing with atrophied muscles and bed sores and diabetes and who the fuck knows what else. He’s lost eighty pounds, and considering the amount of muscle he’s put on, he’s lost more fat than that.” He was damn proud of his dad, but he never expected the promise of tits to be the way to get him moving again. There was probably more to it than that, but on the surface, it certainly looked like tits had been the carrot.

“How long till he’s out of there?”

“Next week.”

She smiled, and slipped her hand in his as they entered the parking lot. “Great. Where’s he gonna live?”

“He still has his old apartment, but it’s a pretty shit place. I’m thinking I’ll set him up in some nice retirement condo.”

“Frander’s Estate?”

“Yeah.”

“Awesome.” She nodded, and tightened her grip on his hand. After a few steps, she swung his arm back and forth with hers, like a kid happy to be out on a stroll. “Invictus own it. Not that that means much; we own almost everything in Dolareido. But yeah, I’ve checked the place out before, some routine Invictus checks and shit. Pretty sweet place, with some very sexy care workers.”

“Uh, I didn’t think he’d be getting sponge baths or anything.”

“Ha! This is Dolareido. If he wants a sponge bath from a pair of sexy care workers wearing bikini thongs, and only bikini thongs, he's getting it, for the right price. Frander's Estate can hook him up."

Oh god, the image of his dad paying women for services like that was enough to send a skin-crawling jolt of nausea through him.

"Please stop."

"Or, if he wanted a massage with a happy ending, he can get that, too, for a price. I don't think the care workers will actually sleep with him, but yeah, sex work is pretty much everywhere in Dolareido." She raised a brow as she looked at him. "You must have known that."

"Yeah, I've known that since my fighting career took off. Got introduced to a lot of stuff like that." Just, didn't really think about old folks getting that treatment, especially his dad. Gross.

"Right, right. You mentioned the parties and shit you went to when you were rich, back at that Bloodlust get together. Didn't seem like you were too into the atmosphere though, back in your heyday."

"I wasn't, but I thought I should have been." A painful lesson, and one learned too late. "Just never really jived on that sorta group."

"Maybe what you needed was the right person to jive on it with?"

He laughed. One thing Jessy wasn't good at, was subtle hints. "Yeah, ok, maybe. That night was kinda fun, awkward as it was. And I am a guy. Breasts are awesome."

"Like father like son?"

"Oh god, don't. You're going to make me puke."

"Ha. That night went perfectly. Elaine's a crazy bitch, and I think I like her." Jessy leaned up toward him and kissed his ear as she whispered. “You know she’d be all over you if you let her.”

He rolled his eyes. “You’d share me with another vampire?”

“Honestly? Not sure. I’m kinda attached to you now, and letting another vamp touch you does sound like it’d make me jealous.” She tapped her chin a few times. “Still want to get a kine on that dick though.”

“Of course.” And after how much she’d helped with his dad, he kinda felt like he owed her. He already owed her a lot, too.

A mad grin appeared, and he eyed her suspiciously.

“So Jack’s gonna make me a sex tape.”

Uh oh.

“You attracted to Jack? Cause of the party? Didn’t think he was your type.”

“Dude, everyone at that little party was smoking hot. Sure, not everyone was exactly my cup of tea, but that doesn’t mean I don’t enjoy coffee occasionally.”

“Wait. Do you even remember what coffee and tea taste like?”

She grunted and elbowed his side gently. “Shut up. My point is, just cause he’s not my ideal doesn’t mean Jack isn’t one sexy little fucker. And I am damn excited to see what he looks like squashed between all those tits.” She held her hands out in front of her chest. “My god, the tits on Antoinette.”

He laughed. “So, assuming I eventually agree to a threesome, is that the sort of person you’re going to find me? Just, find the woman with the biggest boobs?”

“Nah. With you, I’m gonna find someone super tiny, like Natasha. I wanna see someone small try and fit your werewolf dick, you know? See the outline of your cock on their belly while you stretch them to near bursting.” She quivered and smiled maniacally with her words, and rubbed her arms with her free hand, the other squeezing his. “I could get under her, and you fuck her doggy style, and I Kiss her while you fuck her, and—” He elbowed her in the side, gently, and she laughed.

His phone buzzed. He groaned, checked, and raised a brow. “Uh, it’s from Avery.”

“Avery? The fuck she want with you?”

“Dunno. Says she has something important to tell me. And she figures I should bring you, too.”

“Important, but willing to have me hear it?” Jessy frowned as she looked at the sidewalk. “Yeah sure, I’ll go. Bitch will probably make me wait outside, though.”

---

He sniffed the air as he stepped into Avery’s usual apartment building. Something was off. He expected a stronger smell, considering the building was populated mostly by Uratha, and Uratha had a distinct odor. Biological odor aside, they also had a spiritual odor, something he could only get a hint of; Avery told him he’d get a better nose for it as he got older.

“You know, we’ve been talking about sharing you with humans, and maybe a vampire,” Jessy said, “but we never brought up the other options. Fiona’s dating Damien, and I know that choir boy wouldn’t share. And Athalia ... yeah, not her. But what about the other werewolves?” She smirked at him as they started up the stairs. “They got some hot bitches.”

“You know, I’m pretty sure they take offense to being called bitch.”

“What? Why?”

He shrugged. “Guess they think you’re calling them a dog. Wolves got a lot more pride than dogs.”

Her hand gripped his shoulder for balance as she snorted on a laugh. “That’s the insult they take away from that? Not the, you know, being an asshole part, just the reference to a dog?”

“I guess, yeah.”

The snorting laughter continued, until Eric had to slip an arm behind her to keep her from falling down the stairs.

“Bah, it can’t be that serious if I’m allowed to be here. Even if I’m outside the door, they wouldn’t let me close if it was important.”

He nodded, and looked ahead as they stepped into the hallway. A shitty, old apartment building with lots of strange smells, mostly age and the growth and shit that came with it. There was also the smell of Avery’s pack, just, not as strong as it should be. And now that he was only a dozen feet away from the door to Avery’s apartment, he knew he should have been smelling them more. And hearing them more.

Without a word, Jessy reached into her pants under her shirt, and pulled out a pistol. She’d insisted on a quick stop at her apartment before coming here, for an innocent pistol she assured was absolutely required before she went visiting anyone in ‘werewolf country’. It paid to be a paranoid vampire.

“Do come in,” a voice called from the other side of the door.
“Don’t make us force you in.”

Eric and Jessy looked at each other, and then to the ends of the hallway. And out of the fucking air, stepped a few Kindred, on each side. Every one of them had guns in hand, and not pistols. Two assault rifles and one shot gun, for each group.

Evidently, it wasn’t just Eric getting stronger as the months went by. He recognized a few of these vamps from the scuffle he’d gotten in with them on the streets months ago, and they weren’t this sneaky then. They’d been practicing. Whichever of them had been using Cloak of Night, they were damn good to keep two groups from him. Or each group had someone who could, and even then, skilled.

Then again, the last thing he’d expected coming here was a sneak attack from a group of vampires. He’d let his guard down.

“Turner! Mandleson!” Jessy snapped her head to glare at each group, eyes wide with animal rage. “I’m going to—”

Eric put a hand on her shoulder, his eyes also on the two groups. It was enough to calm her down, at least so she didn’t suicide by running at either group. Surrounded by vampires armed with heavy weapons that could rip through the two of them meant they were fucked. Yeah, this was a trap, and they’d walked into it. But he knew how to roll with a punch. She didn’t. If she didn’t calm down, she was gonna get them both killed in some last stand.

Jessy boiled with rage. She knew they were stuck, and she needed an outlet. The outlet became the door someone had told them to walk through, and she kicked it hard enough to break the door frame. She marched in, looking for a fight, but with at least enough control to keep her hands down.

“Jessy, can’t you control yourself for one fucking second?” a voice said.

Sighing, Eric followed her in.

“Garry!” Jessy glared at the man, glared hard, but kept the pistol aimed down, thank god. “Garry you fucking sack of shit, what the fuck is this about? Where’s Avery?”

“What happens after a while?” Eric asked. He stepped into the apartment, and the six vampires in the hallway followed him in. If they’d lowered their weapons, he’d have considered transforming, getting into melee, and beating them to a pulp. Probably a dumb idea. Vampires were fast as hell, and would pick the weapons back up and riddle him with metal before he finished transforming.

Garry shrugged. “You go home. No harm, no foul.”

Jessy threw up her arms, earning a few guns pointed at her. “What the fuck? The fuck do you think you’re doing, holding us hostage for a night?”

“Just making sure some other things go smoothly.”

“Other things?” She stomped up to him, and glared daggers at the man. At least she didn’t punch him this time. “What the fuck are you up to?”

“Private.”

“You don’t get to say private! You’re holding us hostage! You fucking—”

Garry punched her. Eric tensed, but six guns only ten feet away all pointed at him, and he froze in place, every muscle tight and ready to pounce. It wasn’t a soft punch, or a hard punch. It was a vampire punch, and Jessy went down with a crack. She tried to get back up, but she only managed to get to her hands and knees before she stopped. A punch like that would have put a human in the hospital from brain damage, let alone the bone damage. Her jaw was broken.

“You fucker,” Eric said, glaring at the man and making sure his eyes read ‘you’re dead’ in big, bold letters.

“I owed her that.”

“Bullshit. You—”

“Eric, shut up.” Garry sighed, shrugged, and walked up to him. Not a shred of fear on this guy. Even the vampires with guns in their hands looked at Eric like he’d rip them in half if he got his hands on them, cause it was true. But the elder vampire looked at him like he was a pup he could smash around without effort.

Eric growled, but shut up.

“Good dog,” the fucker said. “This wouldn’t have happened if you’d played nice and worked with Avery, Eric. You’d probably be helping her.”

“Say what?”

Shrugging, Garry walked over to the window of the living room, opposite of them, and leaned his ass against the sill. “I suppose it doesn’t matter if I tell you a little. Neither of you are leaving this room until it’s over anyway.”

For a moment, it sounded like Garry was some sort of cliché villain, explaining his master plan. But no, he was just looking for a way to fill the time while he waited for whoever to do whatever. And judging from what he’d said, that whoever was probably Avery.

“Avery,” Garry continued, “is making her move, tonight.” He stepped over to them, reached down, picked up Jessy by the back of her shirt collar, and threw her onto the couch, hard enough it rocked back and forth a couple times.

Jessy almost screamed in agony, but once she settled, she held her jaw in her hands, groaning. Eric sat down beside her, and winced as he examined the wound. She batted him away.

“Ee’ll heal.”

“Yeah, it’ll heal,” Garry said, going back to the window, “so just sit back and wait. No one’s going to hurt you — more — unless you make them. And believe me, I’d fucking love to take this bitch and rip her jaw clean off.” His words earned some harsh glares from Jessy, but she couldn’t start yelling a storm with a broken jaw. “Avery’s got to do her thing, and she wanted to make sure no one got in the way.

“And that thing is?”

The elder bastard smirked, and shrugged. “I’ve told you plenty already. Who the fuck do you think I am? Jacob? Taunting you with half info?” He laughed, a quiet chuckle that reeked of a man who both loved and hated what he was doing. The sort of sound a barfly made when he was going through the motions at his local waterhole, lots of drunk-fueled laughs, even though everyone there knew, including the man himself, that he hated every moment of his life.

Eric knew those sorts of people, met plenty of them, and Garry sounded just like them.

His laughter died away, and eventually, the man sat against the windowsill and looked out into the night. “So just sit tight, and everyone will be happier by tomorrow night.”

The wolf in Eric wanted to transform and rip the man apart. The wolf also realized Garry was dangerous, and could kick Eric's ass in a straight fight, let alone with a bunch of vamps helping him, guns in hand. All Eric could do was agree, and—

Jessy's phone buzzed, and she reached for it. She didn't get far, maybe six inches, before someone had a shotgun two feet away from her head.

“Let it ring,” Garry said, smile fading, voice darkening. “But if I'm guessing right, shit has officially hit the fan.”

“Relax the wrists, fool,” Maria said.

Damien smiled, but kept his eyes focused on the sheet music. Mozart's Sonata Number Sixteen, in C major. A whimsical piece, with lots of broken chords for the left hand, and a flighty melody for the right. Simple enough he could play it without having to look down at his hands constantly, good practice for developing finger awareness.

They continued for a time. Maria sat beside him on the piano bench, and watched with analyzing eyes. Her face was terrifying, as was her body, her aura, and the white mist that leaked from her, but after months of working with her, and learning with her, it all faded to background noise. It didn't bother him. And her harsh attitude didn't bother him as much anymore either. She could be cruel, but after a time, it became apparent she wasn't cruel to indulge some sadistic urge or resentful, deep-seeded hatred.

She was cruel because she demanded the best from those she was willing to work with. If she was being cruel, harsh, critical, it was because she felt the person worthy of her time, and her help.

It probably wasn't the best approach for someone like Natasha. She was a sensitive sort, and would do better with someone who could nurture her. Not Daniel, either. He was just as cold as Maria, but at least without the cruel, harsh approach. Antoinette, on the other hand, was probably a perfect fit for Natasha, someone who could use a soft word and razor sharp wit to help develop the tiny Mekhet's skill.

Damien had no problem dealing with Maria's approach. Harsh, critical words were pretty much the norm in the Lancea et Sanctum, both Lucas's, and from what he knew about other cities that practiced, other bishops. That was life in the church, and it only grew harsher for Sanctified. It was never to be taken personally. Well, almost never.

He continued playing for a while until their lesson was done. An hour of playing increasingly complex music, until eventually he couldn't keep up. And only after he failed to play a piece a few dozen times did she consider the lesson done.

"Is it this hard for kine?" he said between clenched teeth. "Feels like I'm trying to ... to carve into a piece of metal, with a knife."

"Neuroplasticity. The ability for your mind to adapt to new organization. Learning to play an instrument is easy for kine children, but difficult for kine elders, as the mind grows resistant to adaptation."

"Can't teach an old dog new tricks?"

"Precisely. But for Kindred, you have a different barrier. Unfortunately, our minds will forever lack plasticity. But at the same time, our will creates a larger effect, once you learn how to direct it. As you are doubtless aware, it is not only our wounds that heal while we sleep, but changes to our body revert as well. Cut hair regrows. Piercings are pushed free of skin, and holes mend. Tattoos vanish."

“But, if I make a mental effort before I sleep, those things stick around.”

She nodded. “Yes, and what we are doing here is not so different. Playing an instrument is a more complex task, filled with thousands upon thousands of micro changes to your muscle memory and conscious awareness, but still, not dissimilar.”

Forever Kindred had to manage their human half with their Beast. It made things difficult, but if one could master it, like Maria, they could do some truly marvelous things. Becoming a virtuoso with the piano and organ, and using the power of being Kindred to do it, was beyond impressive, more impressive than a kine using biology to master something. Then again, she had centuries to work with, kine didn't.

But he had centuries to work with too, potentially. That'd been a scary idea in the past. Now, he was starting to look forward to it.

“How goes your relationship with the Begotten?” she said, getting up and heading over to her desk. The idle chit chat had never been a thing before, but lately over the past few weeks, it'd become normal.

He smiled. “She's smarter than I thought.”

“Ah, can't have that. Smart women are troublemakers.”

What? He blinked at her, and she didn't even smile as she sat down and started typing. Did she just make a joke?

“Sometimes I wonder about her, though. She's so joyful, but considering who and what she is, I can't help but think she's running from something.”

“No doubt. She is a monster of nightmares. And while I do not think she is the brightest creature, I expect she's more aware of her surroundings, and the people within, than it appears.”

“Agreed. But, how do I approach that?”

Maria raised a brow. “What do you mean?”

“I mean, if she’s smarter than it seems, then—”

“Then what? Do you want to drag her into philosophical conversations? Or politics? Perhaps you wish to talk with her about the nature of Longinus, of God, Jesus Christ, and the journey the damned must take if we wish to ever see the light of the Lord? Or, perhaps you wish to speak with her of the works of Chopin and Beethoven?”

“I...” He turned around on the piano bench to face her, but ended up looking down as he frowned in thought. “I guess not. We don’t talk about those things now, and I know she’d be bored of those topics the moment I got the first word out.”

That earned a smile from the Nosferatu. “She is a classic extrovert, Damien. Her mind is connected to her body in a way you and I will never understand. She thinks thoughts with her mouth, and feels emotions with her limbs. Do not try and change her. It won’t work.”

That, was true. “It amazes me we get along.”

“Normally I would argue you need much in common with a partner for romance to last, and that the old adage ‘opposites attract’ is juvenile idiocy made manifest. But, sometimes, two people of vastly different minds can complete the other. I am sure Fiona has helped eased the weight on your heart, has she not?”

He winced. Fiona may have been smarter than he figured, but Maria was too, and he’d already figured Maria was a genius. It was disturbing how she could understand things about him, when he’d never told them to her, things that were personal and hard to put to words. Not hard for her.

“She ... has. A lot.”

“And I am sure you’re helping her in a way she does not understand, but needs. Perhaps, someday, the two of you will be able to articulate why you enjoy each other’s company so well; you’ll probably verbalize it better than her, and sooner. But nevertheless, you are likely helping her in some fashion you do not yet understand.”

“Should I ask her about it?”

“Perhaps. Such a powerful question could break a flimsy relationship.”

He winced again. Flimsy? Was it flimsy? He didn’t think so. It was just fun sex at first, Fiona taking advantage of his awkwardness and seducing him. And he’d been happy to be seduced, tied up in a spider web and fucked by a terrifying, gorgeous spider monster.

Every time he took a drink of her, and lost himself in the bizarre, intoxicating taste and power of her blood, he loved it. She loved it. They fucked almost every night, and sometimes went back to the jungle so Vrrall could participate. Vrrall liked to tie him up in her webbing, but when it was Fiona, she liked being tied up instead. So many kinks explored, like a bucket list she was having a blast burning through.

And when they were done, there was cuddling, and chatting. The chatting was usually one-sided, her talking about the things she liked, and him reacting to her statements. He liked doing that. Occasionally he’d chime in with his own thoughts, but he preferred listening to her, and she liked sharing her thoughts with him. It was almost as if she needed to say her thoughts to think them at all, and needed him to listen, so she could listen to herself.

Damien frowned, and then smiled. Attempts to think of Fiona filled him with joy, and moments later, desire. Happened every time. It was kind of frustrating, honestly, to forever be distracted. But the thought of her sitting on his lap, legs wrapped around him, hands tied behind her, breasts squashed to his chest, and her whole body wriggling to escape him as he slapped her ass, and sank his fangs into her neck, was glorious. It was the wriggling and squirming, like she was prey trying to escape a predator, that really seemed to strike a chord in him. And her, evidently. Trapped, helpless, struggling fruitlessly to get away as he devoured her, with his cock buried in her, drenched in her juices. They both loved it.

He sat up straight and shook out his head. Good Lord, give him strength, that woman was going to be the death of him.

Maria laughed. She'd been watching him, and considering how damn smart she was, could probably read his mind.

"It's a rare thing to enjoy someone's time so, my student. Enjoy it while you can. You—"

Both of them stood up as a noise echoed through the tunnel and into the dome. Matthias groaned, grabbed a broom, and headed toward the noise, but Maria held up a hand, and clicked on a few things with her computer mouse with the other.

More noises, and this time he recognized the sound of bending and breaking metal bars.

"The Uratha have come," she said.

Damien stared at her. "What?"

Sighing, she stepped around the desk, and wiped off her dress of non-existent dust. "They're on the cameras. Matthias, stay out of the way, no matter what happens. Damien, you..." She frowned at the dark tunnel ahead of them, and let out a quiet snarl. Not for him, but for the approaching werewolves. "You may do what you wish."

“What I wish?” He stared at her before peering into the tunnel. Another crunch, this time louder, and accompanied by some groans and growls. The gates were being opened, forcibly.

“Yes, what you wish. I will not force you to partake in this battle.”

“Battle?” Gulping hard on a dry throat, he hopped over to his desk and scooped up his pistol and silver sword. It didn’t have the length or heft of his proper sword, but the steel sword wouldn’t be as effective as the silver-coated one. Supposedly. The silver bullets would work well; he knew that from testing them on Carter.

Except, there didn’t need to be a battle.

“Battle. They’re here to stop me from communing with spirits. From threatening the Gauntlet.”

“But, I haven’t see you—”

“Yes, I have not done these things. But they think I have.”

“Then just explain!”

She snapped her head to glare at him, and he recoiled. Those eyes were like fire against an icy coldness, against an arctic oblivion. He took a small step back, and tightened his grip on his sword.

“I do many things in my private life, Damien, things I would not have these wolves see. My second life is my own, and I will defend that privacy.”

Oh good Lord, save him from the pride of elders. He slowly nodded as the reality sank in, that Maria was going to stand her ground, and not let werewolves investigate her private life, because she was prideful. Quite the sin. But then, Kindred were not forbidden from sinning. It was just, her pride was going to get her killed.

He stayed where he was, and waited, standing a few feet back and to the side of her. Leave? The only way out was through that tunnel. The werewolves would let him leave probably, but, he didn't want to. Madam Turio had extended him a helping hand when no one else had. He wasn't going to let her die over a misunderstanding.

He set his gun aside for a second, quickly activated the emergency app on his phone along with a short text, and picked his pistol back up. No signal down here, not for a cell tower or anything, but Maria had wifi. With any luck, Jessy and Jack would get his message, and come running. And if they didn't, well, they'd find the mess later, cause he wasn't leaving.

Maria met his eyes, and slowly, her gaze softened. And perhaps, for just a sliver of a second, she smiled, before she looked back to the tunnel, and the sound of yet more crunching metal bars.

It didn't take long for the werewolves to enter the dome. They didn't come far, stopping at where the tunnel opened into the dome, and every single one of them looked ready for war. Not for arms; werewolves didn't bother with weapons. It was in their eyes. Each one of them was ready for a fight, or something more animal than that. They were ready for a hunt.

Maria was in her white, old fashioned dress, as usual. Damien wore his Invictus suit. The werewolves, on the other hand, were dressed like a bunch of Carthians, jeans and t-shirts everywhere. It was a little insulting, honestly, considering who Maria was, and that they were currently underneath the Grand Cathedral of Dolareido.

"Explain yourselves," Maria said, the cold bite of her words enough to silence the murmurs of the werewolves.

"Us?" Avery said. "You know why we're here, vamp. You have some explaining to do."

Maria ground her teeth until Damien could hear it. Eesh.

“I will explain nothing. My personal life is none of your concern.”

“Personal life? It’s not personal when it starts affecting others.” Avery stepped forward, not a trace of fear on her. Either that was dumb, or she genuinely was capable of fighting Maria. Unlikely. Elder vampires were a different breed of dangerous from anything Damien figured a werewolf was capable of. But then, werewolves had a habit of hunting as a pack, while vampires had a habit of going solo.

Not quite solo, not with him here.

“I have done nothing,” Maria said.

“Bullshit. You’ve been talking with spirits, Maria, and whatever you’re doing, it’s fucking with the Gauntlet.” She came closer, until the two short women were only inches from each other. “Fuck, we’ve got azlu in the city for a reason. They’re trying to repair damage someone’s creating. That someone”—she pointed at Maria—“is you.”

“I have done nothing of the sort.”

“Then you won’t mind if we take a look around. I—”

Maria reached out, slow enough that it didn’t register as an attack, and pushed Avery away with one hand. “You will leave my domain at once, or so help me, I will make what Viktor did to you, all those years ago, seem like a discourteous conversation.”

The look on Avery’s face was enough to have Damien tighten his grip on his sword. Slowly, he looked from Avery to the other werewolves. He expected Caleb, David, Noah, Carter, Brianna, Monica, Mason, and Erica. The three he didn’t expect, were Arturo, Matthew, and Clara. All three were here. They didn’t look happy to be here, but they were here.

Damien squinted at Art and Matt, and they both returned it, but it lacked conviction. If anything, they looked guilty, and soon they looked away. Did they do something to Natasha? Probably tricked her, misled her, so she didn't know they were coming here tonight.

That better be all they did.

His eyes found Clara's, and unlike the boys, she didn't look away. But the expression on her face was obvious: sadness. She knew this was going to end badly, but she was here anyway.

Something had convinced them to follow Avery on this mission, and from the looks on their faces, it was more than simple, mindless devotion to their boss.

"Viktor's dead," Avery said, "and we both know you're a pale comparison of that asshole."

Maria clenched her fists at her sides. "Am I?"

Damien gulped and glanced over his shoulder. Matthias stood off to the side by Maria's coffin, scared, worried for his master. With the way the conversation was going, he wasn't out of the way far enough.

"Seriously Maria, we're not here to fight. We're here to stop you. Just show us what you're up to, give us your loci and whatever other tools you're using, and we'll be on our way."

"I will give you nothing." No hesitation. Not a single moment to consider the fact she was looking at a dozen werewolves, and that, unlike during the day, there weren't four ghouls sitting nearby with high-powered rifles.

Maria saw this coming, judging from how she was reacting. Why weren't those ghouls here? If she'd known this sort of situation was inevitable, she should have had her trained guard with her during the night. But they weren't. Why?

"I'm serious, Maria," Avery said. "I've got a dozen spirits calling you out, a bunch of holes in the Gauntlet, azlu running around trying to fix them while they eat up humans doing it, and I know there's a loci nearby. I'm not leaving until this situation is resolved."

Maria took a step forward, again reached out with one hand, and pushed Avery back a foot. Maria rarely touched people, and seeing her push around the alpha of the pack had Damien borderline ready to snap with rising vitae. He leaned his weight onto the balls of his feet, and did his best to watch the pack in the corner of his eyes, while also watching his boss.

"I do not know what you're talking about," Maria said, rage so heavy Damien could feel it. "But you will leave, or I will make you."

What to do what to do what to do. The tension was building, both women waiting for it to snap before they attacked. What would Jack do? What would the sheriff do? Jack would try and play diplomat, and when it failed like it would in this ridiculous situation, he'd use the curse to force peace. Damien didn't have the curse. The sheriff, on the other hand, would make a tactical decision and approach it with cold, ruthless efficiency. Daniel would cut their heads off before they realized he meant to get violent at all. But that approach was lost to Damien as well, since the werewolves had walked in, ready for violence. And he just wasn't fast enough.

He had only one option. When Maria created an opening, he'd have to take it, and disable as many of the wolves as possible. And, if he was going to do this the way Daniel would, that meant kill. He didn't want to do that, but he would if he had to, if Maria could create the opening. And he knew she could. Maria was a Nosferatu. She had absurd strength, and the ability to Obfuscate herself. He doubted Cloak of Night would help her in this situation, but the ability to punch through concrete would.

But, it wasn't her strength or her stealth abilities Maria was known for. People told stories, like children telling ghost stories around a campfire, of Maria's true talent, and it terrified Kindred. It terrified him, too.

He took a step away from Maria as he felt her vitae rise. No need for Auspex, he could feel it. The werewolves could feel it, too. It were as if the vampire had reached into some dark, ancient well, where a buried and forgotten creature of old slept, and had taken hold of its power. She drew it up, and up, an overflowing river of vitae that made Damien and the werewolves alike stare in shock.

She looked past Avery to other others, and whispered. "A gift. Take it."

Silence fell on them. The wolves stopped breathing, stopped moving, stopped anything. Damien stared at them as the terror built up in their eyes, and the Beast inside him shrank onto itself, horrified by proxy. Now would have been the perfect time to strike, but he couldn't move his feet. The aura that radiated from the corpse lady was a wall of cold death, and he couldn't help but stare at her and her victims, as the werewolves slowly realized what was happening.

They started screaming.

~~Jack~~

"Diablerie? I ... I know about it."

"Ha. I reckon you do," Black Blood said. "If I'm guessing right, and I think I am, your ancestor did it, right? Drained some other vamp till they turned to dust."

“How would I know if she had?”

“Don’t try and fool an old soul like me, Jack. I know you were given peeks of the past, and I know that event would have scarred the very essence of the curse. It wouldn’t have forgotten.”

“Uh huh.” He folded his arms across his chest, and tried his best to keep his expression neutral. Hard to negotiate with another party, when the other party knew more. First rule of negotiating anything was learn as much as you can beforehand, and Black Blood already had him beat. Best Jack could do was feign knowledge, until an opportunity presented itself.

The ooze around his feet rippled with the alien voice, rumbled, like a fucking bellowing alligator.

“I know how to free you, Jack. The question is, how much are you willing to help me?”

“Help you? I don’t—”

“Come now, boy. Surely you understand by now,” the black water said.

Jack took a step back as the water began to rise. Triss did too, her eyes going wide as she looked at the rising mound of strange, obsidian liquid. Apparently this was not a common occurrence, and Jack unfolded his arms, as if maybe he could physically fight the spirit if it came to it. He knew he couldn’t. Whatever Black Blood was doing, Jack had two options: run, or wait.

As far as anyone could tell, Black Blood had never directly affected anything, only ever indirectly, working his magic. The only times he’d done anything remotely close to direct, was when in Sándor’s nightmare, and even then he hadn’t been too hands on. He’d interrupted things, but that was it.

But, just because he never did things himself, didn't mean he couldn't, just that everyone figured he couldn't. There was a very real possibility that he could, and Jack couldn't help but consider that possibility as the mound of water grew, and grew, and then exploded outward. He threw up his hands to block the wave, but he might as well have been blocking the ocean. It engulfed him, and Jacob, and Triss, and the candle went out.

“And then there was darkness,” Jacob said, chuckling. They were underwater, but not underwater, if Jacob could talk.

Jack groaned and pushed himself to his feet. Blackness, everywhere. Ugh.

Except, not. The candle was out, but there was still enough light to see by. Creepy, eerie, stereotypical spooky green light. He looked around, trying to find the source of it, but wherever it was coming from, it lacked an origin, just like the spirit's voice.

“The fuck was—”

“Now,” Black Blood's voice said, resonating all around Jack's body, “I can show you.”

He was still in the cave, still with the big ritual bowl, so how the fuck was the spirit going to show him anything? Course, soon as he thought the thought, shadowy silhouettes danced before him.

“You couldn't just fucking tell me?” he said.

The presence laughed. “Where's the fun in that? Now, watch.”

Jack watched, and did his best to ignore the fact he was now inside the black ooze that was Black Blood's body. Triss had calmed down, so this was probably a normal thing for her, though the way Black Blood had decided to engulf them was not. Fucker was full of surprises.

Two shadowy figures stood within the bowl, slow dancing, bodies made of wisps of smoke. A man and woman. The smoke didn't have enough detail for Jack to know if they had clothes or not, but by how they were dancing, he figured they had to be, probably something old fashioned.

“What do you know about diablerie, son?”

Jack rolled his eyes. “One vampire drinks another to death.”

“Ha. You say that like it means nothing, like vampires just go around in their corpses, thinking it's perfectly fine and normal to be sucking on humans, and turning their life into something else, something you varmint call vitae.” The spirit laughed, deep and rumbling, raspy and alien, and Southern, all at the same time.

“You say that like it's unusual for one species to prey on others.”

“It's unusual, boy, for one species to basically be dead when they're not.” Black mist pooled up around Jack, thickening in the strange water that surrounded them, and taking the shape of a human body; it had a head, two arms, and two legs, at least. “There's more to your kind than you'll ever understand. Take it from your pal Black Blood, the vampire is a strange, strange creature. That curse lurking around inside you is proof.” The voice still came from everywhere, but the wisp creature beside Jack posed with each word, as if it was doing the talking.

He was prompting Jack, to try and get him to ask ‘what's this got to do with diablerie?’ in a predictable way. Jack folded his arms again, and said nothing. Which of course only made Black Blood laugh again.

dark part of a vampire, quite as strongly as when they suck the soul right out of another bloodsucker.”

Soul. The S word. Jack squinted one eye at the wisp of smoke beside him, and then looked back at the two figures dancing in the bowl. The man grabbed the woman by the head, yanked it back, and brought his face down to her neck. Fighting, struggling, and not the sexy kind.

“This a memory?” He gestured to the two wispy figures, one dying to the other.

“Indeed.”

“Oh? This man convinced this woman that they were soul mates, destined to be together, forever. So consumed was he with her, he devoured her, down to the soul.”

“Susanna wasn’t fucking dancing with the person she killed.” He’d already told Black Blood about Susanna’s ritual, but the spirit loved his drama and monologues.

“This man,” Black Blood continued, “gathered the ashes of his dead lover, and brought her before the Strix. A tree, deep underground, dead, ancient, a haven for the owls that haunt your kind.”

It was like he’d ripped the memory straight out of Jack’s brain. Holy shit.

“You didn’t mention you already knew about the tree...”

“You didn’t ask.”

Oh this mother fucker.

“What ... what are they?” The bastard knew more. He had to.

“Ah, the striges? The Birds of Dis. Ephemeral creatures that haunt your kind and loathe you for daring to pretend you are human.” Black Blood chuckled, and his voice shook the cave with its deep vibrations. “Can’t say I blame ‘em.”

“I get that they’re ephemeral or whatever, but ... but what are they? The fuck do they care about vampires?” He looked to Jacob when he said it, but the bastard just shrugged and nodded to the wisp beside Jack.

“You may as well ask what is a vampire, and where did they come from?” Black Blood continued.

“Uh, yeah, I did ask that, like, the day after I was sired.”

Triss and Jacob laughed, and Jack couldn’t help but smile a little. Laughter was contagious. Even Black Blood laughed.

“The owls. They’ll never forgive you, vampire, for your refusal to let go of your human half. That’s all you need to know.”

Jack snarled, smile gone and replaced with a flash of rage in an instant. He slashed his arm at Black Blood as he jumped back from him, but all it did was pass through him, like punching smoke.

“The fuck it is! Susanna’s curse is fucking ruining my life! I want it gone! I haven’t done a fucking thing to deserve this. Never even met a Strix.” He’d remember if he ever met a ghostly black owl with glowing yellow eyes, and a need to ruin his life.

Triss stopped laughing, but Jacob didn’t. At least he kept it quiet, unlike the spirit.

“Regardless,” Black Blood said, “the intent of those creatures is not my concern. What I can offer, however, is my assurances that I can extract the curse.”

“Extract?”

Chuckling again, the spirit gestured to the remaining shadow silhouette on the bowl. Whoever they were, they lay flat on some invisible ground, as a swirling mist surrounded them. At first it seemed like it was the strange, only partly real black water that was everywhere, but as Jack squinted, it became clearer that this was part of the memory. A swirling tornado of blackness that fell upon the man, and cut into his chest. All shadow smoke, no detail, but it was enough for Jack to see the man writhe in obvious pain.

But when the tornado cleared, the man got up. The shadow silhouette faded, and Black Blood chuckled his usual chuckle.

“That’s it?” Jack said, gesturing to everything around him. “That’s all I have to go on, that you can actually do something about this curse? That you can ... extract it?” Which didn’t look pleasant at all, from the shadow memory.

The shadow clone asshole hovered behind Jack and around him, with a sliver of a smile — fucking huge mouth — on the wisp’s face that he could see through. Disturbing.

“What? The necklace?”

“The necklace the dragon gave to you. Take it off.”

“Why?”

Shadowy hands he couldn’t feel settled on his shoulders from behind. “So I may see this curse, in your mind, boy. The necklace is suppressing your Beast, and the curse is attached to the Beast, infects it, alters it, changes it. And you and I both know this curse is more than a simple infusing of power and desire.”

“I’m not letting you inside my head, Black Blood. Forget it.” He brushed the wisp of shadow away, and walked toward the exit. Of course, the moment he did, the green light that allowed him to see vanished. “Oh fuck you.”

“Boy, I’m trying to help you.”

“Bullshit. You just want the curse for yourself.” How the fuck some sort of spirit thing would be able to extract a curse that seemed very Kindred specific, he had no idea. All he knew about Black Blood was the spirit was obsessed with the dead.

And, like he said, Kindred were dead.

“You say that like it can’t be two things. Think, son. My good friend Malachi has grown rather attached to your mother, and we both know it doesn’t do her well, seeing you fight this curse.” The spirit’s shadow floated up and over to the bowl, and he sat on its edge as he looked at him. No eyes, but the mouth that cut clean through the shadow’s head seemed to be pointed at him.

Jack glared at Jacob, but with the bandage over his eyes, it was impossible to read him. His smile softened a little, but that could mean anything from a poker master elder like Jacob.

“Very well.” The shadow shrugged, and raised his arms to point at the cave around them. “Dolareido has been my cooking pot for centuries, boy. You know the sort of things I get my hands into. Ever hear of me interfering in a bad way? Have I ever done wrong by you, boy? Ever hurt your Prince, or the city? What have I done to make you doubt me?”

That was true, much as Jack hated to admit it. There wasn't any doubt that Black Blood was up to no good, same as Jacob, but that didn't mean he should automatically assume they were nefarious fuckers. If they could help themselves and help him at the same time, they might just do it, out of the kindness of their hearts. Otherwise, Triss wouldn't be with them, right?

Jack trusted Julias. Julias trusted Triss. And Triss trusted Jacob and Black Blood, at least enough for this conversation to happen.

“So you ... you've extracted this curse from someone before?”

The shadow laughed. “Lived another good five ... days.”

“Five days!?”

“The man had enemies, being a diablerist. Without the power of the curse to protect him, he couldn't defend himself. The idgit.”

Triss snorted on a laugh. Black Blood didn't talk like some sort of ancient spirit of death and the dead. He talked like Yosemite Sam.

Jack paced side to side, looking at the shadow in the corner of his eye, and turning thoughts through his head until he got dizzy. He wanted the curse gone. Sure, his meditation sessions helped suppress the curse, specifically its voice and hungers. Combined with the necklace, he felt mostly safe that the curse and the voice in his head were under control. Mostly wasn't good enough. He wanted to be back to normal, even if that meant throwing all the power away. Walking around with a nuke tied to him that he could accidentally set off at any point was torture.

He stopped, and stared at the waiting shadow.

“Who are you?”

“Me? I’m Black Blood. Haven’t you been paying attention, boy?”

No, he was lying. Sure, his name was Black Blood, but everything else was a lie, had to be. Spirits didn’t behave like this, behave like ... Jacob. Spirits were far more one-track minded, right? He’d seen a few by this point, and they didn’t bob and weave with their words and intent like this, like someone with a human mind would. And the fuck did a spirit want with a vampire curse? What could he do with it? Why was Black Blood so interested in death and the dead? Spirits vibed on human emotion, but death wasn’t an emotion. Corpses were corpses, piles of meat and bone, empty, useless to a spirit, right?

“Don’t fuck with me, Black Blood. Who are you? What are you?”

Jacob’s smile was unchanged, but Triss looked confused, eyebrow raised as she looked between Jack and the shadow.

Silence settled on them for a minute, before the shadow hopped off the bowl, and floated toward him.

“Take off the necklace, invite me in, and I’ll show you.”

Clenching his teeth until his jaw cracked, he took off the necklace, and glared at the spirit like he meant to kill him.

“Fine, come in.”

Black Blood laughed, came in closer, and set his hands of smoke on Jack’s shoulders. And as Jack stared at him, the shadow opened eyes, like someone slicing through rubber with a knife where his shadow’s eyes should have been. Eyes, windows to a soul.

And then, it was just the two of them.

Jack stumbled back, almost falling on his ass as he looked around. This place. This place again.

For just a moment, he thought it was the exact same place where he met the azlu's mind. But it wasn't. The giant dome was there, but it wasn't black. It was Jack colored. His memories danced along the walls, shifting, oozing with every color of the rainbow, altering his memories into a mess he couldn't understand. But it was him.

Last time he was here, it wasn't his mind, it was the empty mind of the azlu's host, a dead person with a body kept alive by the spider's infestation. This time, it was his mind, or at least some sort of pocket of it, one that could allow for interaction. Not like the strange, endless white oblivion, when he'd talked with his Beast. No, this was his human mind.

And the curse was there with him. His Beast, the giant mass of black smoke with claws and talons, feathers and fur, beaks and fangs, all mixing and sliding in and out of its body, stood behind him. Except, maybe it wasn't really his Beast? Or maybe it was, being controlled and pulled along by the curse, the other voice that now lived in Jack's head. Maybe it was attached to his Beast like an infection. Or, like a parasite, one that needed to be extracted.

"You fucking suck, you know that?" the curse said in that deep, disgusting, alien voice.

Jack smirked. "This body is mine, and I'll do what I want with it, and you. Fuck you."

"You silenced me."

"You silenced me! Last time you took over." He swiped his arm through the smoke. Predictably, his arm passed straight through it.

Not like he could win a physical confrontation with a non-physical part of him.

“You’re weak, Jack. Weak, and...” The many heads of the Beast turned from him, and faced the other side of the large dome they were in.

Jack didn’t want to look. He knew what’d be there, and he wasn’t looking forward to having this conversation, but it had to be done. Sighing, he slowly turned on the white stone underneath, and faced Black Blood.

If the god of death truly existed, he would have looked like this. A giant, black skeleton, one that put Athalia to shame. He came out of the ground from a black pool, a slowly turning whirlpool of onyx ooze that dripped off the giant skeleton’s body as he climbed up from the depths of some strange hell to reveal himself. Small strands dangled off his bones, looking almost like the remains of clothes someone might find on a corpse a thousand years old. His eyes were completely empty, endless voids of obsidian. Athalia’s eyes had small white dots for irises, but Black Blood had nothing.

“I reckon you did. Assumptions will be the death of you, boy.” The enormous skeleton didn’t have the room in the giant dome to completely pull himself out of the pool, but he managed his torso and arms, and that was more than enough to tower over Jack forty feet above his head. “Spirits enter the minds of humans all the time. Twist them, mold them, and turn them into perfect tools for their goals.”

Jack ground his teeth, and paced side to side again, looking at Black Blood with each turn. “You’re not taking me over.”

“Ha! No I ain’t. I’d have competition.” The spirit leaned forward, and pointed his giant, black skull at the hovering smoke behind Jack. “This curse of yours, is aware.”

Before Jack could say anything, the Beast grew. And grew. With a hissing snarl, the body of the Beast and curse expanded, taking up more and more of the white stone ground until Jack had to step back to make room. Bigger, until it, he, was bigger than the skeleton half Black Blood managed to fit inside Jack’s mind.

“You,” the curse said, voice dropping an octave until it rumbled inside Jack’s skull as much as the dome, “are no spirit.”

Jack reared his head back. “You fucking serious?” The curse had been reading his mind before, as usual, and apparently agreed with him.

“This thing,” the curse continued with a smoky arm gesturing toward the giant skeleton. “It’s no spirit. It walks and talks like one, it hangs around with them, but it’s no spirit.”

Black Blood did something then that Jack hadn’t expected, something the fucker probably thought too good for a vampire. He got angry. With a rumbling rasp that sounded eerily similar to the curse’s, Black Blood growled, and sank his fingers into the stone like it was made of sand.

“You’re not like the last curse I tasted. You, are aware.”

“No shit.” The curse growled as well, and Jack stared on as he did his best to ignore the growing pain in his skull. This metaphor for a conversation between two demons in his brain was about as comfortable as two dueling jackhammers would have been.

“Ain’t this a surprise. What are you then? A remnant, some shred of will from the Strix? Worthless vermin.”

“And what are you? Some forgotten thing who’s lost everything? All power? All relevance? Dropped at the bottom of world and left to rot where no one would find you?” The Beast pressed in closer, until its swirling mass of beak, snout, fang, and everything else, came within several feet of Black Blood’s face. Several feet wasn’t much when you were big enough to walk over buildings.

“Wait wait,” Jack said, swinging his arms in the air. “How do you know he’s not a spirit?”

The Beast looked down at him, and Jack froze. For all his bravado whenever the two of them clashed wills, there was no denying the Beast and the curse were a duo shitloads stronger than him. They couldn’t hurt him without hurting themselves, but that didn’t change that the power Jack had been given, was at the curse’s beck and call more than his own, and he was looking right at a metaphorical representation of it.

If there was one way he was going to die, it’d be pissing off a metaphor.

“How can you not tell?” the curse said. Well, yelled, and Jack winced as he put his hands to his ears. “Spirits are reflections. They’re shadows. You saw it, we both did. Spirits can only pursue what birthed them. This ... thing,” again he gestured to the enormous skeleton, “is not that. He thinks. He feels. He’s something else. I can smell the presence in him, like a soul.”

Jack almost said something, shut up instead, and stared at Black Blood.

“And you,” Black Blood said, “are residue, leftovers from a dying breed of meddler.” The skeleton raised his head high, and pushed more of his body up and out of the black lake he was still only partially free of. “Jack! You coulda told me this thing was aware. Gonna be hard to pull it outta you with it fighting back.”

“You’re not taking me! You don’t get to have me,” the Beast yelled.

“Ha! Hell you gonna do about it? You ain’t real, curse. Just some shadow, a leftover from your Strix masters. You’ve gone and wrapped yourself around this boy’s Kindred half, but don’t think that’ll save you from me. Why, I’m fixin’ to—”

The curse hit him.

Hit might not have been the best word. An ocean doesn’t really hit something. An ocean crashes. The wave of smoke that poured out of the curse slammed into Black Blood like a tsunami, a weightless form suddenly weighing millions of pounds. Black Blood’s skeleton body fell back, and the small world shook around Jack as the black spirit’s weight dragged over the stone.

No. Not a spirit. The curse said it, and Jack knew it was true, knew it from the first fucking night he ever met the monster. Black Blood wasn’t a spirit, he was something else.

“Jack,” the curse said, and the swirling maelstrom turned to look at him. “The fuck are you thinking? I saved your ass so many times, and you’re going to hand me over to this? This fucking thing? And the fuck do you think he’s going to do with me?”

“I...” Jack gulped and stared up. How the fuck was this happening? What was going on? Yeah, he knew that this whole experience was happening in his head, and if he really wanted to, he could hit Black Blood too. But the curse just knocked him to the ground like ... like he could, like he could fight him off if he had to. Holy shit.

“Well now,” Black Blood said, a rumbling chuckle rising up through him and the whole dome as he recovered. “Seems I underestimated the situation.”

The world went dark. Black mist poured up from around the giant skeleton, up from the pool half his body remained within, and flowed up and over everything. Black everywhere. The curse and Black Blood should have blended into a big mix of obsidian that looked the same, but his brain could tell them apart as easily as red and blue. And, as the seconds went by, it was easy to see the dome was filling up with Black Blood's particular shade of black.

Cold dread poured over Jack like an avalanche, and he fell to a knee. Death buried him, invisible creeping fingers that sank into his limbs, his muscles, and pulled him down until he went to both knees, and his hands. Black Blood hadn't even touched him, and he struggled to keep from getting crushed into the ground.

And the curse suffered the same. It went down with a crash, and a host of talons reached out to brace against the stone, but he couldn't move either.

"Let me make this perfectly clear, curse," the god of death said as he pressed down on Jack, on the curse, and the Beast it rode. "There are rules. I follow them. The only reason I play this game, and don't rip the boy you possess into shreds, is the rules. But don't push me, varmint, or I'll—"

Jack's Beast roared, cutting through Black Blood's words and resonating until Jack's skull felt like it'd burst. Rage poured out of the curse, rage Jack was all too familiar with. The rage he felt when he'd first been kidnapped by Angela and Jeremiah. The rage when they tortured him. The rage when he escaped. The rage when multiple chances to kill Angela slipped through his fingers. The rage when she'd killed Julias. Rage that was partly his, and partly not.

Back then, he'd thought that rage was all him, and that his situation had awoken some part of him that legitimately wanted to rip off Angela's skull and fuck it, just for spite. Some part of him, something animal and insane, wanted to unleash cruelty so inhuman, they'd put nightmares to shame.

That disgusting, abhorrent, overwhelming rage burst from the Beast and the curse, and threw Jack back into the wall of the dome. His Beast swirled, and shrieked, a banshee cry that sounded like a hundred crows going to war, and a dozen wolves preparing for the hunt. A thousand claws struck out from the Beast, each matched with a pushing wind of smoke, each an ocean crashing against the force of a fucking planet.

But it worked. Black Blood snarled an annoyed rasp, and his presence lifted. The explosion of the Beast's rage settled, at least enough for Jack to fall back off the wall and to his feet. His own groan might as well have not existed, with these two titans roaring and screaming at each other. Like, Godzilla and Ghidorah, having a shouting match in someone's skull.

Except, this was his skull. Jack had let Black Blood in, so he could prove he could do something about the curse. He hadn't expected the curse to fight back. But that didn't matter. This was his skull, and Black Blood only got in because he allowed him.

Rules. He said he followed rules.

Black Blood reached out, set a hand on the swirling mist of Jack's Beast, and unleashed his own hell. Raw, cold death radiated from his skeleton palm, and engulfed the dome and everyone in it again. No rage, no hatred, at least not the sort the curse had. Black Blood was simply annoyed, like a god would be annoyed with a gnat. It was more than enough.

With a rasp and roar, Black Blood reached upward with his left hand, and pressed down on the smoke body of the Beast with his other. A hailstorm of black ice rained down on the curse, summoned by Black Blood's raised hand, even as the giant skeleton pressed down on him harder, and harder, until the wriggling mass of the Beast squashed to the white stone. Black shards pummeled him, crushing any attempt for him to form his myriad of limbs into something more concrete.

“Here, in the mind,” Black Blood said with a quiet chuckle, “you can resist me, curse. Out in the physical realm, I’d crush you into paste.”

Except, he wouldn’t, couldn’t. He had to follow rules. Time to take a stab in the dark at what some of those rules were.

“Black Blood! Enough!” Jack yelled.

Black Blood slowly turned his giant skull to look down at him. “You’ve put up with this lowlife for this long, Jack? Color me impressed.”

“I said that’s enough! This is my mind, and you’ll behave like a guest. Let him up.”

That brought the giant to a standstill. They stared at each other for a moment, one small vampire meeting the gaze of a giant black skeleton, currently in the process of crushing into the ground the Beast and curse Jack had considered nuke-level dangerous. Letting him into his mind had been way too risky, stupid move, but maybe there was something to salvage from this.

With a snort, the skeleton released the Beast. Immediately the curse rose to his full height, or metaphorical power or whatever, and shrieked complete, abject hatred at the entity.

“Curse! Enough! Or I swear to fucking god, I will ask Antoinette to lock me up and do experiments on me until she can figure out what to do with you. Months and months of lying around, tied to a table, doing absolutely nothing.”

He wasn't sure if it was the threat of Antoinette removing the curse, or the threat of months of boredom that did it, but the curse calmed down. It shrank down to something only moderately colossal, and hissed and snarled and cawed, but didn't attack Black Blood. Finally, some progress.

"Black Blood," Jack said, stepping in closer. "I have heard your proposal. I have no idea how or why, but I believe you when you say you could remove the curse." With the obvious intent to use the curse for his own personal gains. Black Blood was some kind of entity of death, or dead blood or something, which must have meant he had a bridge to Kindred other beings didn't; Kindred were walking corpses, after all. If the curse affected vampires specifically, and Black Blood could interact with vampires in this sort of way, in this psychic-communication-Discipline-using kinda way, maybe he really could just throw the curse into a jar, and use him like an ingredient in deadly magic.

Course, the curse could hear these thoughts. They could have a nice fucking chat about it later.

"Well then," Black Blood said, emphasis on the drawl, "let me just —"

"I didn't agree to that. You proved you could do it, and that the payment would be you get to keep the curse for yourself. Am I right?"

Black Blood glared at him for a few seconds before speaking. "Yes."

"Then this meeting is concluded. I'll contact you after deliberation." Just like Julias taught him. Position of power. Control the meeting.

The Beast rumbled, a heavy chuckle, predatory and amused. Black Blood, on the other hand, remained silent for ten whole fucking seconds. Might as well have been eternity.

“Very well.” With an annoyed sigh, the huge skeleton lowered himself back down through the huge pool of blackness he’d come up from. “But, make sure to chew on this nugget, boy, before I go. Diablerie was the sacrifice this curse’s original owner used to be blessed by the striges. Imagine then, what some vampire might have to do to expunge it completely, without the help of someone like me.”

Before Jack could ask what the fuck he was talking about, the skeleton disappeared into the onyx water, and moments later, the mind meld ended. A flash of white hit Jack’s eyes, and then he was back in Jacob’s cave. Triss and Jacob looked at him, heads tilted to the sides, and judging from expressions and posture, they’d been waiting a whole three seconds or something. Yeah, that made sense. The mind meld with the azlu had felt like it took minutes, but it’d only taken seconds, from what Clara had said.

“We’re done here,” Black Blood said. “Think about what I said, boy. Might just save your life.” The shadow silhouette fell apart, like droplets of ink in water. And a moment later, the black water that engulfed them fell apart too, draining through the floor, the walls, even the fucking ceiling, defying gravity and oozing away like sentient slime.

“That, was weird,” Triss said. Weirder was how her candle re-lit as the black water left, taking the green glow with it. “His shadow just touched you, and then he says we’re done?”

Jacob laughed. “They had a chat, dumbass, in here.” He pointed at his own temple. “And judging from the kid’s expression, it didn’t go well.”

“It went fine, Jacob.” Jack frowned at the man, and almost laid into him. Who the fuck was Black Blood? The curse was adamant he wasn’t a spirit, and considering Jack’s own suspicions, he had no choice but to believe him. The curse had known the azlu creature was ancient when they'd had the mind meld, said he could smell it on the spider. And for all his asshole attitude, the curse didn't seem interested in lying. Raping and pillaging, torture and mass murder, sure, but not lying.

"What'd he mean?" Triss asked. "About, thinking about what he said?"

"It's personal."

"Personal? He said it could save your life. Doesn't exactly sound personal."

"I'll ... tell you later, ok, Triss? Promise. Just, needs to be between me and him, for now." Hopefully Black Blood would respect that. It wasn't the end of the world if he told Jacob, and Jacob told Triss, but it was something Jack would prefer to get figured out before anyone else did.

The fuck had Elaine done to get rid of her curse?

Back up on the surface, Triss and Jacob left. Said they had their own shit to do. He had no idea what those witches were up to, and he wasn't sure he wanted to know. They weren't involved in the covenant disputes, so it wasn't like they were preparing for war or anything.

He watched their backs as they left, and sighed. Beatrice was becoming more and more like Jacob each passing night, and he didn't like that. Not because he felt Jacob was an asshole. But, he was pretty damn sure whatever sort of dark shit Jacob regularly got into wouldn't help Triss get over Julias.

A couple caws drew Jack's eyes up, and he smiled as his friends flew down to him. Mulder and Scully perched on each shoulder, and he offered each some oats from his pockets. They pressed into his neck, and he gave each of them a few scratches behind the head, before—

You seriously going to let that thing have me?

Jack almost jumped, before he looked down at his necklace, still in his hand. Shit, forgot to put it on.

Just listen to me for once, asshole.

I listened to you far too much. Listening to you has caused me nothing but pain.

Bullshit. But don't distract me, this is fucking important. That thing, Black Blood, he's no fucking spirit.

I ... believe you.

I know. But there's something else. I recognized the smell on him.

Tell me about it. Every time I'm around Mary, that creepy, cold, dead feeling, feels like that.

That's her aura, and yeah, it's damn fucking similar. But I said smell, something you'd never pick up unless you learned how to use your nose like a proper Kindred. Like a proper—

Get to the point.

I smelled something a lot like that fucker Black Blood, every time we found one of those tears.

Ice ran through Jack's veins, and his eyes opened wide as he watched Jacob and Triss disappear around a building corner as they walked off.

You're sure?

Damn fucking sure. I'm not saying it was him, but it sure as fuck smelled like him.

The portal Fiona took Damien and me through was his, according to him. Sky called it a verge? It said the verge was from before Black Blood's time, and that Black Blood had claimed it.

That one was a lot older, and stable. The new tears are the problem. They're the ones the azlu are going for.

Maybe he just ... investigated the tears before we did?

Maybe. Or maybe the fucker's up to something. Talk with Azamel. She's still alive, right? Before the old bat croaks, see if she can piece something together.

That wasn't a bad idea.

Think the Uratha have picked up on this? They can smell spirit stuff.

Probably not. I couldn't smell this part of him until the mind meld.

Nodding, Jack quietened his mind, and slipped the necklace back on. The curse would have protested, but Jack did it quick, on reflex, fast enough the curse didn't know he was doing it until it was done. Thoughts, into the flame. Urges and raw desire, into the flame. And with the necklace on and telling his Beast to settle, Jack could think clearly once again. Just him and his thoughts, in the haven of his mind.

And that's when he realized his phone had buzzed when he'd come back up from underground.

"Busy busy busy. I miss my old job," he lied, and checked his messages.

The first buzz was from Avery. She wanted him to go check out something in Devil's Corner. Ugh, long way from here.

The second buzz had been distinct, and only now that he could think, did he realize what the unique buzz indicated. Damien or Jessy had triggered their emergency app. Checking the phone proved it. Damien had sent out an alert.

“Shit. Shit shit. Where is Damien right now?” He pulled up the Invictus GPS tracker, and couldn't find him, only his last known coordinates. The Grand Cathedral of Dolareido. That meant he was under it, in Maria's dome. “The fuck? Why would he ... fuuuuck.” He sent Antoinette and Michael a quick message, and took off running straight for the Cathedral. It was nearby. He could be there in five minutes.

But if he guessed right, five minutes might not be enough.

He threw open the Cathedral doors, and Mulder and Scully each flew into the building and up high, scouting. No one inside. He ran to the pulpit, up onto the stage, and beside the organ where the curved wall held a door at the corner. He ran down, almost falling over steps as he jumped down them four at a time, down and down, until he came to the tunnel of Maria's den. Mulder and Scully each took a shoulder once again, and he marched forward.

The gate was torn open. Didn't take much analysis to see it was done by hands and claws. Shit shit shit. Yelling echoed through the stone, screams, hollers, and visceral cracks and breaks. They were fighting.

He ran faster, balls of his shoes slamming into the smooth stone as he darted through one broken gate, then another, and another, each one torn open. The Uratha had come, and had zero intention of letting something like rules stop them from their hunt. God, if they killed Damien, he wasn't sure what he'd do. God, if Maria killed all of them, he wasn't sure what he'd do then either.

He came out of the tunnel, and into Maria's den. A huge dome, with the walls covered by history. Hanging drapes and curtains that looked like they belonged in Jack's mansion. Paintings, many obviously Catholic, decorated her walls. A huge piano. An actual coffin. Maria was old school, the sort of vampire people told stories about, stories of fear and reverence. She was the vampire people thought of when someone said Dracula, not Antoinette and the other dragons.

As Mulder and Scully resettled on his shoulders, Jack looked around, and gulped.

Avery, or probably Avery, judging from the lighter color of her fur, held Maria up by the throat in the center of the huge room. The vampire's arms were gone, ripped off, and bits of bone stuck out from the loose sleeves of her ruined dress. She glared down at the werewolf, eyes full of ancient rage, but despite her legs being free underneath her, she made no attempts to kick the werewolf.

More werewolves, all the werewolves, stood around, each fully transformed into their big war forms, and each covered in blood. The place was a mess, with curtains ripped and one of the desks smashed. Their big foot claws had left a lot of huge gashes on the once pristine, smooth stone floor, and shards of metal and wood were everywhere.

One of the werewolves held a large man by the back of the collar. Dead? No, breathing, unconscious. Maria's ghoul, Matthias. A nasty gash sliced across his chest, exposing his muscular body underneath.

And one of the werewolves, one Jack recognized intimately, one that had literally once licked him, stood on Damien, her massive weight and strength pinning his broken, battered body. She half turned to face Jack, and her visible eye widened as she recognized him. But Jack didn't look at her for long, eyes falling and staring hard at his friend on the floor.

One of his legs was gone. And, like Maria's, it hadn't been cut off cleanly by a sword or anything. And it hadn't been ripped off either. The pant leg, the flesh and bone, it was mangled and shredded.

It'd been bitten off. And Clara had clothes stuck to her snout.

Jack met her eyes, clenched his fist, and took a step forward. The pack, who'd already half turned to face him, all turned completely, and in unison. A lot of them had blood on them, and since vampire blood turned to ash in seconds, that was their own blood. A quick glance to the floor showed Damien's pistol, slide back and awaiting a new magazine, while his sword sat on the other side of the den, soaked in blood.

The wounds on the werewolves' bodies hadn't healed, not completely. Some of them audibly sizzled, as if they'd been burned by acid, and still were. At least seven of the werewolves had huge gashes on their bodies, but none of them had cuts deep enough to put any of them out of commission.

He took another step forward, and both Scully and Mulder let out announcing caws. Every single werewolf took a step back, including Clara, abandoning her position atop Damien to get herself closer to Avery, who stood the furthest back.

"Jack," Clara said. "We—"

"You know, I tried. Everyone in this damn city wants to kill each other, or at least jump to violence as their first step in negotiation. But I really fucking tried to help everyone get along. Everyone has their reasons for doing shit, for getting in each other's way, but I thought for sure, if people just talked to each other, everyone could just ... live and let live."

Clara looked down. Even in werewolf form, it was easy to read the shame on her.

“Jack,” Avery said, turning to face him, hand still wrapped around Maria’s throat and holding her up at a distance beside her. “Turn. Leave. This is our business. Our hunt. Go.” As typical of transformed Uratha, her speech was broken, choppy, and harsh, almost like a bark.

Jack took another step forward, and both of his crows took the air, cawing and circling above, like vultures. And again, every werewolf, save Avery, took a step back.

Chapter 132

~~Antoinette~~

Veronica, still unconscious, lay in the ritual circle, bathed in the blue light of her chandelier. Antoinette and Elaine both pointed their tablets at her, observing with keen eyes as the humming machine in the background ran through the various wavelengths the devices were programmed to respond to. They started with the same frequency that had detected the remnants of the Strix upon Jack's person, and moved outward from there.

Nothing. Antoinette breathed a sigh of relief, sat at her nearby table, and logged the event.

"I guess the curse does not spread so easily," Elaine said. "I had thought that, perhaps, since he has loosed it upon himself, it would affect his blood."

"As did I. But it appears we worried over nothing. Did her blood taste different than another kine's?"

Elaine shook her head as she sat across the table from her. "No."

Nodding, Antoinette closed her laptop, and combed her hair over her shoulder. "Très bien. Though, I will perform this test once again, if Jack ever elevates her to ghoul. A drop of his blood might not contaminate, but perhaps if infused with will and vitae, it may."

"Perhaps." Elaine took several of her own notes, sighed, closed her laptop, and leaned back. "I have not seen Daniel for some time, Ann. Where is that old stone?"

Daniel was, as often this past year, searching for the mysterious disturbance within Dolareido. Whether that be through direct espionage, or separating from his body to explore the city as a projection with Auspex, she did not know. Such was the case with Daniel. He would do what he felt necessary, and while he always ensured her he would do as she bid, and that he would not risk his second life needlessly, he pushed himself.

Her sheriff may have been quiet as a stone, but she knew the man cared for her city, as much as she did.

“He hunts.”

“Ah. Keeping secrets, old friend?”

Antoinette rolled her eyes. Such was the game. They both kept secrets from each other, her and Elaine, and it was a mutual understanding that they do so, but never to the other’s detriment.

“Naturally.”

“Mhmm.” Elaine laughed, shrugged, and leaned forward over the table. “Does he still suspect me of foul play?”

“Has he ever?”

“Of course. I doubt he thinks my arrival here coincidental.”

“But he knows it is not. He knows you are here because of Jack, and the curse, and the legacy you have created.” Antoinette smiled at Elaine, her devious smile. “And for other reasons you refuse to share, I am sure.”

Elaine returned the smile. “Naturally.”

They chuckled. Such an old, silly game, the Danse Macabre, one they both laughed at, and yet, one they both played with dedication.

“Though if it is the sheriff’s touch you are after, I am afraid he seems quite interested in Athalia.”

That earned a sneer from her old friend.

“That woman is a pile of hate, rage, and baggage.”

“And Daniel is a rock, a foundation, that she could perhaps use to rebuild herself.”

“Then the sheriff sees potential in her I do not. She is Begotten, forever doomed to fight against hungers greater and more damaging than you or I could manage. And she is a broken woman, a mother who has lost her vile daughter.”

“I think, perhaps, there is more to this than is obvious.” She leaned in, voice softening. “Daniel forever feels a failure, for what happened with his childe Natasha, and how she fled the Ordo in her fledgling years. The man needs a project. Athalia is, perhaps, that project, someone he can help.”

A twinkle danced across Elaine’s eyes. “They are using each other.”

“You know very well we all use each other. That does not mean there is not genuine emotion to be had.”

“Too true.” Nodding, she looked past Antoinette, to the distant thrall sleeping upon the floor. “This Veronica Tam is quite the treat, and to Jack’s physical tastes, I am sure. Did you find her specifically for him?”

Laughing, Antoinette shook her head. “No, but when I examined her file, I knew she would fit well.”

“Fit well on Jack’s length, you mean?”

This again. The woman had a one-track mind, indeed.

“I knew she would fit well as his first thrall for a host of reasons.”

Elaine grinned at her, a knowing grin, stood up, and slowly walked over to the thrall. “Do not be coy. You think I have not noticed the way your eyes brighten, every time you have found a new way to spoil your lover?”

“I do no such thing,” she lied.

“Ha. Ann, I have never seen you as overjoyed as when you are spoiling your little Ventrue.” She reached down, and scooped the unconscious woman up onto both arms, horizontal and against her chest. “Like, a rich man, who delights in seeing his woman light up with bliss when he buys her jewelry.”

“Ugh, do not paint it in such an ugly light. Such a stereotype is unbecoming.”

Elaine shrugged, sat Veronica in a chair at the table, and sat beside her. “I think it is sweet. As you said, we all use each other. The boy clearly enjoys being spoiled, and you clearly enjoy spoiling him. And there is an undeniable connection between you two.” After a nod and affirming smile, she reached out and brushed the tiny thrall’s hair behind an ear, exposing the piercings there. “And from how this one reacted, I am sure she will bring the boy mountains of erotic pleasure. You are not concerned she will attempt to seduce him, when you are not present?”

“I am sure she will try, especially once the Vinculum is complete. But she will fail.” Antoinette smiled at the thrall, and adjusted the shirt with the wide, plunging cleavage, to cover the woman’s breasts correctly. “And besides, it will not be as if she is not allowed to participate. Once the Vinculum is done, and Jack is sure of her loyalty, I look forward to seeing her join us.”

Elaine laughed, a hearty sound, and she shook her head. “You mean you look forward to seeing Jack struggling to handle the sheer eroticism you are planning to bury him in. I do not think he truly appreciates what our stories have implied.”

True. Her love did not grasp that when Antoinette or Elaine talked of sleeping with dozens of ghouls and thralls at once, they were being literal.

“And I look forward to his growth as a Kindred.”

Elaine nodded, but her eyes settled on Antoinette, and a mischievous grin grew. “We spend far too much time speaking of your little Ventrue, and romance.”

“That ... is true.”

“Like young girls, indulging in flights of emotion.”

Sighing, Antoinette nodded, and sat up straight. “And as fun as that is, perhaps we should stop. It is great having you here, Elaine, so that I can, as you said, indulge these flights of emotion. I have had only Natasha to speak with, and she does not appreciate my situation as you do. But, I think you are right. Far too much time, speaking of love and sex.”

She was not sure she believed her own words. Once a cold, tactical queen of Dolareido, and now a lovesick girl who could not think of anything else but her little Ventrue? Perish the thought.

“Agreed.” Elaine’s grin only grew, and she winked. She did not entirely believe her own words either. “Azamel’s end approaches. What are your plans?”

Straight to business then.

“Jack informs me she plans to have Sándor replace her. I see no issue with this. As broken a man as the gargoyle is, I think he will fit the city better than Azamel. She has a habit of—” Her phone buzzed. A message from Jack. She pulled out her phone, and stared at the message. “Merde.”

“Ann? What is the matter?”

“Jack ... believes that Avery is confronting Maria, and he is on his way to stop her.”

“Oh. I can ... imagine how that will go. What do you intend to do?”

“I sha—we shall go.” If worse came to worse, and she had to confront the curse, better to have Elaine with her. “And observe.”

“Observe?”

“Observe. If Maria dies, so be it.”

---

~~Damien~~

Maria’s wrath was inhuman. The werewolves clutched their skulls, and screamed absolute and utter despair, as the elder vampire forced a nightmare upon their minds. Whatever it was, whatever the poor fools were forced to see and experience, it had them horrified. Many reached up and clawed at their faces with their fingers. Others fell to their knees. Matthew and Arturo resisted for a few moments longer than the others, but they too fell, gasping and yelling as something wicked scarred their souls.

All except for Avery. Her necklace glowed a gentle blue for a few moments, hidden inside her white t-shirt, but before Damien could put two and two together, the woman transformed.

She transformed fast. Within seconds, the enormous beast of muscle, short gray fur, and claws erupted from the once small woman. Damien should have reacted, but it all happened so damn fast. Avery should have been on her knees, screaming and crying like the others, but she wasn’t. The pack leader grabbed Maria by the throat with one colossal hand, and Maria’s arm with the other.

Maria's eyes widened with shock, and the Nightmare she held over the pack vanished, her vitae plummeting as she realized what was happening. But it was too late. The werewolf squeezed, and pulled.

The only thing that kept Maria's head attached to her shoulders, was Avery's mercy. The werewolf had caught Maria totally by surprise, and if she'd wanted, she could have squeezed and popped the unprepared elder's head right off. But instead, she ripped off Maria's left arm.

Maria screamed, a sound that shattered the cries of the werewolves, and Damien's paralysis.

He brought up his pistol and fired at Avery. Two caught her in the shoulder, and she dropped Maria's arm; it was already falling apart into tiny cinders and ash. But the werewolf, roaring in agony as silver burned her flesh, turned and put Maria between him and three more oncoming bullets. The bullets hit the Nosferatu's body and stopped, turning Maria's scream of surprise into annoyed grunts. Bullets would do little to a vampire, especially one as old as her. But that didn't mean they didn't hurt.

"Put her down!"

"No." Avery glared at him over Maria's shoulder, woman held at arm's length in front of her. "Drop weapon. Now."

"I—" He didn't get to negotiate.

Maria shrieked like a banshee, and drove her right fist into Avery's wrist. Crack. Avery's roar buried Maria's scream of rage, but the Nosferatu was free, and she wasted no time. She threw herself at Avery's stomach, tackling a monster almost twice her height. Not enough weight to push her over, but the following punch was hard enough to send Avery to the floor, rolling fast, until she hit the wall with an enormous thud.

And because physics were a thing, Maria went the opposite direction, but she landed on her feet. Five feet up against the wall. She hopped off, but before she could land on the floor, a stampede of giant beasts ran toward her. Her, and Damien.

He pointed his pistol and fired at the nearest wolf, one with black fur, one he thought he recognized. Arturo. He knew Art was fast, a breed of werewolf that did cloak and dagger, same as Mekhet, but Damien wasn't prepared for just how fast something that huge could be. The giant wolf ducked several bullets, but two managed to catch his leg, and he fell, momentum carrying him past Damien and into the back wall near the piano.

Damien didn't have time to capitalize. The rest of the pack charged, and judging from the size, and angry roar of the oncoming goliath, he'd just shot this one's best friend. Matthew was bigger than every other werewolf in the pack, and he shook the Earth with each step, claws tearing into the stone as he charged.

Damien pointed his pistol, and shot the beast. One, two, three, four. Matthew kept coming, the gaping holes in his side, shoulder, and thigh, caused by the silver bullets not enough to slow him down. Wincing, Damien pointed at the man's face, and pulled the trigger.

Click. Empty.

He ran at Matthew, and at the last moment slid between the giant's legs. Sword in hand, he sliced at the brute's legs on the way past, and managed to get his silver sword an inch into one of Matt's calves, before he rolled to his feet. Blood gushed and coated the sword, and sizzled. Judging from the roar Matthew unleashed, the silver was working.

Another werewolf ran for him. Monica he guessed, from her position and the darkness of her fur, but the werewolves all looked similar when transformed. He knew she was young, possibly the youngest of their pack, but she was fast. She was damn fast, like Arturo. She caught up to him far faster than Matthew had, and Damien barely had time to turn and face her when the colossal creature slammed into him.

The empty pistol flew out of his hand. He had another magazine, but no way they were going to let him reload. That was the problem with this fight. If he'd been up against other vampires, he could have exploited their solo nature; vampires sucked at cooperation. The werewolves, on the other hand, moved like they could read each other's minds. They moved together, flowed around each other, and circled him and Maria seamlessly. The moment his pistol landed, a nearby werewolf slammed a foot down on it, and kicked it away behind him.

That was fine, he still had his sword, and he drove it down into the werewolf who tackled him. She'd gotten her hands around his waist, her claws into his skin, but hadn't had the chance to tear into him yet. They collided with the floor, and he pulled on the blade, slicing into her back by her right shoulder, and drawing the blade up until it hit bone.

She screamed, a canine scream that blocked out his hearing with how close she was, and she threw him to the side with her one good arm. He somersaulted through the air, landed on his feet, and dashed for the nearest werewolf. They were all close and circling him. Better he take the fight to them, and prevent them from getting into their practiced positions.

He lost track of who was who. Fur, muscle, fangs and claws, they were everywhere, and they were all close enough to cut him open from head to crotch with one good swipe. He ducked under a werewolf's sideways slash, and sliced up with his sword, catching the towering behemoth along the abs. Might as well have been cutting steel. They roared and stepped back, and clutched their bleeding stomach with one hand. Damien's only advantage in this fight was silver. If he could deal a serious wound to every werewolf, maybe he'd have a chance.

Another came up behind him, and Damien dove forward away from them, crashing into the wounded werewolf's shoulder and knocking them over. In the tumbling mess of limbs, he rolled over and out of the way of the attacking werewolf's pounce. Fast as these brutes were, especially ones like Arturo, they still weighed hundreds and hundreds of pounds. They'd never be as fast as him. He sliced out at the arm of the werewolf that'd barely missed him, getting her deep in the forearm until he felt blade hit bone. He wasn't strong enough to cut through werewolf bone, not at this angle, but that didn't mean he didn't get through muscle and tendon.

He got up, and glared at Clara. Avery and some others were fighting Maria, and Damien was doing his best to get to her to help her out. Every other werewolf was trying to catch him, and judging from their swings, were willing to kill him if they had to. Clara on the other hand, watched.

No time to say anything or call her out. Another werewolf came at him, and Damien went up and over, a large jump that left him exposed, but they hadn't expected it. He sliced his sword across the werewolf's head, getting ear and skin, but again didn't have the leverage to get through bone. Nothing bleeds like the scalp, and red fountained over the werewolf, the floor, and his sword. It sizzled over the silver, until Damien could smell it.

The dome shook once again, thud thud thud, and Damien turned to find Matthew charging him. Damien lifted the sword, ready to leap at the man and sink his blade into his chest, but at the last second, Matthew threw his weight down, getting on all fours. For a moment Damien was sure the beast meant to run into him like a charging bull, but Matthew had to know he wasn't fast enough to catch Damien.

Sure enough, another werewolf pounced over Matthew, directly over him from behind, hands out and reaching for Damien. Arturo. Despite the bullet wounds still bleeding everywhere, the werewolf came at him, rage in his eyes, animal hunger, and a need for violence.

Werewolves stood at Damien's sides, blocking his escape routes and forcing his hand. He jumped, up and over Matthew, and over Arturo, but the smaller werewolf — still bigger than most of his companions — reached up mid pounce, grabbed Damien's foot, and brought the vampire down with him as he slammed into one of Maria's desks. Wood shattered, splinters went everywhere, so did a laptop, and a pile of books.

By the time Damien realized what'd happened, Matthew's colossal weight slammed into them, and the three rolled up into a pile. Almost enough weight to break Damien's bones, but not quite, and he scampered away from the pile of claws tearing and scratching in a frenzy, ripping open his suit and skin.

Werewolf claws burn, they burn a lot. It wasn't like a knife, or a claw from any regular animal. Something about werewolves and their claws let them cut into things claws shouldn't have been able to cut, and burn like they were on fire. They cut through his suit like butter, and his skin, but he rolled away before they got too deep.

He jumped to his feet, and turned to face another werewolf. Clara. She walked toward him, several werewolves behind her, struggling to stay standing as they recovered. The silver wounds hurt them, badly.

“Clara,” he said, “don't make me—”

Clara opened her mouth, and roared.

Sound slammed into him, deafened him, and he raised his sword to prepare for her pounce. Rather, he tried to raise his sword. He looked down at his arm as it hung limp, and squeezed the sword as hard as he could, but his fingers barely responded. He tried to lift his arm again, but his body had grown weak, too weak to lift its weight.

Clara's walk turned into a charge, and he stared at her as she sank her feet's claws into the stone. She'd done something to him. That roar, it'd hit him, did something, sapped away his strength and paralyzed him. And she was running straight at him.

Move. He squeezed the sword harder, but his body didn't want to respond. His strength was there, but it was hidden, buried under the roar that echoed through his body, its vibrations seeping into his bones. Move. He poured vitae into his limbs, but they refused to respond. Something was blocking his brain from communicating with his arms.

Move. Move! He focused his mind and told it to ignore the strange vibration coursing through him. Whatever Clara had done, it wasn't something physical. It was a Discipline, the werewolf equivalent, and whatever it was, it was confusing the fuck out of his insides. But, it also didn't last.

The vibration in his body settled, and the moment he could feel strength flow through him again, even if it was only a small amount, he poured every ounce he had into his legs, and jumped.

Clara saw it coming. She reached out and grabbed his ankle as he flew overhead. Inertia turned his world into chaos as her grip pulled down on him while his body kept trying to flip over her. He managed to keep his grip on his sword, and he swung it—

The world turned white, and he screamed. His body collided with hers, draping over her shoulder, and his scream died away as he watched his sword fall, half flying away with his momentum having pendulum swung him into Clara's back. Tink, tink, metal against the stone, rolling away, before Clara rolled him off and set him on the ground.

She growled, and pressed down on him with one foot. Claws sank half an inch into his back, and he yelled as the burning sensation shot through him again.

“Hold still,” she said.

He turned his head and glared up at her. She met his gaze, and the animal rage in them melted away. Slowly, she turned her head, bits of his pant leg dangling off her enormous teeth, and looked to where his leg had fallen. Damien didn't bother looking. The sound of his leg burning away into ash and cinders in a matter of seconds was sickening enough.

He looked over to Avery, and winced. In the thirty seconds of fighting, he'd done a lot of damage to the werewolves, but there were too many of them. Avery had surprised Maria, somehow being immune to her Nightmare, and that'd changed everything. Even as Maria broke the arms and legs of werewolves that came at her, she was just one person, with one arm, and it wasn't long before Avery got her hand around the tiny woman's neck, and lifted her once again. Werewolves healed broken bones in seconds.

And once again, Avery ripped off her arm, her one remaining arm.

“Enough!” yelled Avery, barking voice cutting through the madness around them, and bringing everything to silence. She tossed the limb aside, and it rolled over the floor toward Damien, before it burst into cinders, and faded away. “Enough. Show secrets. Now.” Avery shook Maria, hard, and the tiny woman's legs dangled and swayed, like wind chimes.

“Fuck you,” Maria said, glaring eyes staring hard at the werewolf.

Damien sighed, and let his head drop to the floor, temple pressing to it as he watched Avery and Maria. Jack and Jessy weren't going to get here in time. He'd sent the message five minutes ago, so unless they—

He whipped his head around to the tunnel, and he breathed a sigh of relief as someone stepped into view, a small man with two crows on his shoulders. Well, holy shit. Thank God for miracles.

~~Jack~~

His friends circled above, and cawed a few points of interest. The werewolves were hurt, but recovering. The ones hurt by silver were recovering damn slowly though, and Jack knew they'd take days, maybe weeks to heal from wounds they'd normally heal in literal minutes, if not seconds. And the ones that weren't hurt by silver, did. One werewolf near Maria pushed themselves back to one clawed foot, and Jack winced as he saw, and heard, their leg snap back into place at the femur. Werewolves were ridiculously durable, and regenerated like an elder Gangrel.

Which just meant he'd have to break their limbs multiple times.

“You have five seconds,” he said, and he lifted his left hand, fingers out, “to let her go and get out.”

“Jack,” Clara said, “we are here to—”

“One.” He pulled down a finger, and steeled his gaze at Clara. A silent warning. He wasn't going to pull punches here.

“Jack!” Matthew this time, easy to tell apart from the others by his size. The giant roared. His leg was hurt, still bleeding. “We cannot—”

“Two ... Three...” He nodded toward Damien, and his friend pulled himself across the floor toward the closest wall.

Arturo, and probably Caleb and Carter, judging from how sneakily they moved, spread out from the group, moving to the sides. Despite the silver-inflicted wounds still bleeding, the wolves moved as if the holes and gashes in their flesh didn't exist.

“Four...”

Avery let out a bellowing roar, and threw Maria back against the wall, near her coffin. He'd been worried the pack leader would kill her, but maybe they needed her to find what they were looking for. Or maybe it just wasn't in Avery to be that much of a bitch. Either way, it took Maria out of the line of fire.

Brave of Avery to come at him first. No vampire would do that. Elders didn't do things on their own unless absolutely necessary; they had bigger fish to fry. Instead, they sent armies, underlings, thralls or ghouls, or their childer. He didn't blame them, honestly. Antoinette wouldn't have been able to create Dolareido if she kept risking her neck. Jacob wouldn't be the deadly witch he was now, if he'd gotten his hands dirty every time something needed to be done.

Werewolves worked differently. They thrived on doing things hands on, on dangerous hunts, on growing stronger by testing their mettle, and surviving things that would kill almost anything else. And their leaders taught by example, if Avery was any indication. He knew she'd run at him first, and the others would collapse on him when she'd created the opening. He also knew he could break her, grab her mind and turn into her an obedient dog, and end this whole fight before anyone got hurt.

He met her eyes, reached out, and her necklace glowed blue. Wait, necklace? Werewolves were naked, nothing but fur. Why'd she have a nec—

Her claws met his body, and he yelled out as agony scorched through him. Her grip sank into his shoulders, claws cutting through his suit and into his muscle and bone, and she roared at him as she picked him up.

Ok, so, whatever the necklace was doing, it stopped his mind from being able to reach hers. Good to know, but too little too late. That was one powerful necklace.

“Will do what I did to Maria,” she barked between snarls. “Teach you a lesson.”

Jack knew what it felt like to lose his limbs. It wasn't a memory he looked forward to re-experiencing.

Avery leaned in closer, until her growling snout was only inches from him, and her predator eyes were wide with animal rage. Her grip tightened, and pulled, and holy shit, there was enough strength in that grip to throw a car.

But his arms stayed where they were. The werewolf howled and pulled harder, but vitae coursed through his limbs, through his body, and out from the wounds her claws had created. Blood pulsed out from the holes, against her claws, defying the werewolf's will.

It was Jack's turn to snarl, and he slammed his head forward against her snout. Crunch. Her tight grip gave him more than enough leverage to put power into it, and he grinned as her blood gushed from her wolf snout and onto his forehead. He licked it off his lips. Damn, that tasted good.

Howling in surprise and fury, she let go and fell back, almost falling over as she clutched her face with one hand. The pack was surprised, but only for a moment, and they rushed him from the sides.

But before they reached him, Jack snapped his gaze over at one of the rushing werewolves, and glared. Just like the time he tried to get into Sándor's mind, he was met with a gate, and there was something growling at him from the other side of it. Though in the werewolf's mind, the gate felt more like rough foliage, a line of trees, the entrance of a dark, cold forest tipped with snow and dotted with rocks, and carcasses.

Jack was more skilled now, compared to then, better at controlling the curse. Back then he'd been worried about destroying Sándor's mind if he kicked down the gate. Now, it wouldn't happen. And even if it did, he wasn't going to just let them injure him, not after what they did to Damien and Maria.

And judging from the looks in their eyes, he wasn't sure they'd be able to stop themselves from taking things too far. Supposedly werewolves had a habit of going berserk when transformed into their Gauru form, and after seeing their leader get their face smashed in, several of the wolves roared fury that sent a thrill through Jack's body. Sounded an awful lot like animals going berserk. The thrill dancing up his spine was his curse reacting to their anger, anger that had their eyes wide and their mouths open as they looked at him like he was their next hunt. If he wasn't careful, they'd kill him.

He smashed the thick line of trees blocking him inside the werewolf's mind, and found the human half, Caleb, standing next to an enormous wolf. The wolf snarled at him, and lunged. But it was pointless. Jack snapped a hard glare at the beast, and a moment later, the wolf fell to the metaphorical floor of the metaphorical forest, whimpering, defeated. Caleb fell a second later.

Caleb wasn't immune to his Dominate. And his wolf half wasn't immune to his Animalism.

Back in the real world, Caleb turned, and with a roar of agony and fury, threw himself at the other werewolf charging Jack. The two went down in a heap, and claws found fur as they cut into each other.

Jack faced the remaining werewolf, and did something the fucker probably never expected from a Ventrue. He came in closer. The giant beast faltered, trying to slow so he didn't overshoot and tumble over Jack. An opening, and Jack stepped into it with a snarl and a grin. He poured his vitae into his arm, into the blood that flowed out of his wounds under his suit, and fueled a simple uppercut straight into the titan's belly.

Connection. His fist crashed into a wall of steel muscle, but an Uratha wasn't a giant gargoyle. Muscle bent, and the wolf's body absorbed the impact as Jack's feet were driven into the floor. Crunching ribs and damaged organs, Jack felt them. The wolf went up ten feet into the air, momentum carrying him over Jack's body, and he crashed into the remaining desk, shattering it on impact. It was a darker wolf, with a few gunshot wounds that weren't healing, and he curled up in a ball to clutch their stomach as he vomited blood.

Turning to watch what happened was a mistake. Another werewolf came at Jack's back, and claws sliced down from his left shoulder, down across his back, to his right hip, and his suit jacket and shirt shredded like paper. The claws struck against his skin, but didn't penetrate any deeper than skin deep. Blood gushed out wherever claws met his body, and blocked the inhuman weapons from getting into him.

But the claws still burned, almost as bad as fire would. He felt them cut through the summoned blood, and almost get past it, felt it down where his Beast controlled it. Werewolf claws were not normal claws.

Jack spun around, and grabbed the hand of the werewolf. They'd expected to do more damage, from how they'd stopped after the one slash. Gave him just enough time to get a grip on her wrist, and slam his hand down on it with the other. Bone cracked, and his driving fist crashed down on the wrist hard enough to push the broken bone through the flesh.

The werewolf shrieked and tried to step back, but he held on, and yanked. The pain must have been excruciating; he knew from experience. Before the werewolf realized he'd yanked on her, the momentum carried him forward toward her, and he kicked. He was no martial artist, but a side kick was simple enough, easy enough to use the whole body to drive a shit load of force into. His foot collided with her knee, and she shrieked again as she fell to her side. The moment her shoulder landed with the floor, Jack drew back his other foot, and kicked her like a football.

Physics didn't like that. His right foot drove into the werewolf hard enough to break every rib she had, and send her soaring through the air a good thirty feet, but the impact also meant his left foot flew out from under him. He landed on his palms, and another wolf dove at him. Probably thought he was wounded, or maybe that he couldn't fight on the floor.

He rolled onto his back as the wolf pounced on him, and tried to bite his face off. He got an arm underneath their neck, holding them back, but it only took them a second to realize he was strong enough to keep their teeth at bay. Instead they switched to their hands, and started slashing. Each rake of claws against his skin, shoulders and chest and arm and face, each was met with flowing, dark blood that protected him. But pain snuck through, getting to him, his Beast. Those claws were brutal, and they were going to wear him down.

Jack you moron. Let me out. Let me fight!

Fuck you. You'll kill them.

Only if I have to. I'm better at this than you. Let me kick their asses!

Shut up shut up!

He pulled his feet up underneath him, and kicked upward. With the ground to his back, he had good leverage to drive his weight into it, and his strength up into the werewolf's stomach. A lot of strength. He poured his vitae and his frustration into the kick, and the werewolf flew into the air, up and up, until they collided with the ceiling fifty feet up, hard enough they cracked their skull. Brains rattled, they landed hard, and Jack smirked as they bounced. Heavy things go crack and crunch when they fall from high heights.

He got back to his feet and found most of the pack ready for him, though now they were circling him and weighing their options. Two werewolves had jumped Caleb, and were trying to get through to him. They would. Jack didn't have the time to properly brainwash him.

Clara stood a little further back than the others, analyzing, looking for the right moment. She meant business, despite the sadness in her eyes. It hurt to meet her gaze.

Sighing, Jack reached up and tugged on his suit jacket shoulder. "Not again." A small tug was enough to rip the whole damn shirt and jacket off, leaving him shirtless, and he threw them to the floor as he glared at the wolves. "Just pack up and go, guys. Don't make me crack every single one of you in half until you do."

Taunting them was a mistake. The biggest werewolf charged him, and the whole damn cave shook with each slam of his feet. Paws? Nah, closer to t-rex feet than a fucking wolf's, with how big those claws were. He tore up the floor, literally, as he ran for Jack, and Jack stood his ground. Just a little guy, standing as a t-rex ran at him with mouth open, ready to gobble him up.

Jack met the man's crazed eyes, and reached out again. Again he found the gate of the man's subconscious, and he kicked it open, breaking down trees as he exposed the forest within. Physically strong as Matt was, mentally he was no different than Caleb. The crazy anger and rage that poured out of him, a berserk fury of aggression and need to destroy, none of it saved him from Jack's grip. Crushing his wolf and human halves was easy.

The man slowed, and slowed, and eventually came to a stop. He stared down at Jack, eyes shaking as the man struggled to escape Jack's Dominate. But he couldn't. He twisted and turned, pulled away, but came back a moment later, as if an invisible leash bound his limbs.

"Now!" Jack yelled. "Everyone's going to calm the fuck down! You're going to leave, and—"

Avery appeared over Matthew's head, healed, with something massive and black in her hands. She must have noticed when Jack Dominated Matt, and grabbed it then. Smart. Really, really smart. Smart enemies were a giant pain in the ass.

She threw the grand piano down at him. That was a lot of weight, and wide, and it came at him at professionally pitched baseball speed. The best he could do was raise his arm and block as much of it as he could.

It shattered on contact. The wood came apart over his arm and continued into him. Piano keys, piano wire, wood, it all slammed into him, and as much as the shield his blood provided protected him from any serious wounds, it didn't stop inertia.

The weight of the piano struck him into the ground, hard, and his skull slammed into the stone floor even harder. He heard a crack, and blinding pain flooded him. And then, blackness.

Fucking. Finally.

Don't mind me, Jack. Bit of a drop in your concentration — and consciousness — there. Too bad.

Grinning until his cheeks hurt, New Jack pushed himself back up onto his feet. He poured waves of his vitae into the crack in his skull, and the bone sealed snug. Old Jack was like a child behind the wheel of a Lamborghini. No grace at all, and wasted power.

Bits of piano surrounded him, completely smashed. Avery, panting heavy, stood beside Matthew, and she dragged the man off and away. He didn't fight back; brainwashing hadn't been completed. Damn Avery interrupted before Old Jack could get his fingers into the man's consciousness very deep. Useless kid.

Jack snickered as he watched her drag the sandbag away, and his eyes drifted over to Caleb. His struggles were fading too, faster than they should have. Making the man fight the people he loved was probably too much to ask for without more than few seconds of Dominate and Animalism. If he'd had the time, Jack could make the man slit the throats of everyone he loved in their sleep, but no way he'd get that deep into the man's head in a few seconds, not with all the other werewolves there to stop him.

Clara took a step toward him, and he grinned at her. The shock in her eyes said it all. She knew.

“You fuckers could have left,” he said, “but your noses are so far up your asses, you don't seem to get that you can't just do whatever you want.”

“Jack ... Please, just—”

He leaned down to his bare wrist, bit into it, and gave Clara his best devil's smile as he yanked back his head while swinging his arm out. Blood. His blood. With an effort of will, his blood gushed out from the wound, splattering over the floor in a big circle. Will kept the blood from immediately turning to cinder and ash. Will infused it with the Discipline. Will, would summon his legion.

The moment the ring of blood landed on the floor, Clara dove at him. What a bitch. She landed on him, pinned him, and got to tearing, claws slicing at his chest over and over. Well, he had been distracted. He'd have done the same thing.

But he wouldn't have done it with that look in her eyes. The other wolves, they looked angry, aroused with blood lust, and hungry for the hunt. Her? She looked sad. Fucking annoying.

He snapped his arms out as hers came down for the tenth time in two seconds, and he squeezed on her wrists. She howled, a lovely sound, and stood up to try and get away from him. Being that he weighed almost nothing, she had no trouble standing up, but he came up with her, grip still on her wrists.

"Jack's not home." Grinning at Clara, squeezing until her bones snapped in his grip, he flipped his legs up and pressed them to her chest. And pushed.

The slide and thunk of joints coming out of sockets was beautiful. The tearing of flesh, more so. But what really got his vitae pumping was the shriek of utter agony from Clara, as he ripped off her right arm. He'd planned for both, but physics were a bitch, and once the right arm came off, his pushing pressure against her chest caused him to spin off her, and he had to let go of her left arm so he could land on his feet.

Howling like an animal in a bear trap, Clara fell back and scampered away, getting back to her feet behind Avery and clutching the shoulder socket where her arm used to be connected. The arm, now in Jack's possession, shrank. The fur sunk into the skin, clothes emerged, and the mass vanished, leaving him holding a normal human arm.

"Vampires can regenerate lost limbs," he said. "Maria and Damien will be fine eventually. But still, you deserved this." He winked at Damien as he waved the arm around in the air, and laughed. The man stared at him, not finding it funny for some reason. Church boy had no sense of humor.

He assumed werewolves could regenerate lost limbs, too. But if they couldn't, ah well.

"Jack!" one of the werewolves said, one with a few bullet holes in him.

Damien snapped his head to the dark werewolf. "Arturo."

"Ah, Arturo," Jack said. "I'd make some joke about beating you to death with your buddy's arm," he gestured to the arm, "but we know it'll take a lot more than something like this to kill you." He tossed the girl's arm over his shoulder, reached down, and grabbed something else, something that just so happened to be near him on the floor.

A silver sword.

The werewolves stared at him, some of them with eyes widening as they glanced down at the gleaming blade in his hands. Clara's glare lacked the rage the others had, but there was plenty of fear there, and seeing her take a step back from him as he waved the blade around was just marvelous.

You're not going to kill them!

Shut up and calm down.

New Jack rolled his eyes, and tossed the sword behind him too. Clink clank on the stone floor, until it stopped beside Clara's severed arm.

"Think I need a silver sword to kill you fuckers?" Laughing, he took another step forward, as Mulder and Scully cawed from above. "But you do deserve a beating, the kind your daddy gives before he finishes his last bottle and blows his brains out." Again the wolves stared at him, and no one laughed. Not a drop of humor in the whole damn place.

The moment's rest created a pause in the noise. Perfect. Werewolf ears perked up, and many of the giant beasts turned to look at the tunnel.

"Jack," Clara, voice wavering. "Don't!"

Ah, that's right. Clara'd been with him, when he'd kicked the gargoyle's ass. She had recognized why he bit into his wrist. And now, she'd recognized the noise. Which only made it all the better, cause half the werewolves looked to her, saw the fear, and snapped their heads back to stare at the tunnel with renewed anxiety. Oh it was so fucking good. Only thing that'd make it better would be someone playing creepy horror music on the piano. A glance back showed the remains of the piano, and he sighed. Damn.

When the quiet scritch scratch noise rose to a crescendo of squeaks and claws on stone, the tide broke, and dark brown washed upon the room like vile water. Thousands and thousands of beady eyes flooded into Maria's den, and the werewolves stood there, jaws hanging, eyes wide. Only when the rats made an obvious dash for them did they finally react.

David versus Goliath, except more like, ten thousand Davids versus a dozen Goliaths. Tiny bodies bit and clawed and climbed up enormous wolves, earning howls of frustration and rage from the titans as they did. Werewolves were brutes of aggression and strength, but the fuck could they do when overwhelmed by thousands of rats?

Jack groaned with bliss as the rats flowed over each other and onto the werewolves. The mix of rage and panic was so damn good, he'd be hard if he'd been Blushing. Three of the werewolves threw themselves at the rats, slamming their giant hands and feet of claws around, killing rats by the dozens with each swing. Crunch. Splat. Jack laughed as the werewolves were quickly overwhelmed, and their assault turned into a hopeless defense, the titans doing their best to wipe rats off their limbs as his legion climbed up their bodies.

Laughing, nice and loud — wouldn't be any fun if they didn't see him coming — Jack walked up to the werewolves. Rats poured, scurrying around him, between his shoes, avoiding his steps with ease, and biting at the feet of closer werewolves. Who was this one? David? Carter? Didn't matter. Whoever they were, they looked at him, animal eyes staring, and Jack met their gaze with a wicked grin.

The werewolf dove at him. Mistake. They were probably expecting another fist fight, but now that his legion had come, Jack had a moment to do what he wanted. He reached out with his vitae, his mind, and grabbed the consciousness of the beast glaring at him.

David. The spirit talker. This man's mind was different than the others. They'd had minds that looked like forests, typical Northern forests with creeks, big rocks, bits of snow, lots of pine trees, shit like that.

David's was nothing like that. David's mind looked straight out of a Studio Ghibli film. A serene, glowing lake of turquoise, dotted with small islands of mossy boulders. Dense green grass that looked almost like shag carpet. Giant trees, thick as houses, each with veins in their trunks that glowed the same as the lake. Mushrooms grew out the sides of the trees and boulders alike, some small, some enormous, white with hints of turquoise within. No sun reached past the dense canopies above, but the forest pulsed with light, the glowing veins, the mushrooms, all of it fading in and out in a slow beat.

David sat upon the edge of the lake, and his wolf sat beside him. His wolf glowed, unsurprisingly, turquoise.

“So you’re the one that talks to spirits,” Jack said. “Nice digs you got here. Makes me think I should pop some DMT and hallucinate about forest spirits with wobbly heads.”

David slowly got up and looked at him. Wow. The dude was a fidgety, nervous mess in the physical world, but here in his mind, he looked calm and confident.

“You’re chaos and destruction incarnate,” the man said, voice smooth.

“Ha! You guys marched into Maria’s den and got violent. Insult me all you want, but it’s you fuckers who stepped over the line.”

David watched him, unsettled. A tall white guy with broad shoulders and short, blonde hair, who looked beyond dull, but the way he stood there and looked at Jack, was downright creepy.

“Don’t hurt my family.”

“Oh I’ll hurt em, hurt em until they regret coming to my city. But I won’t kill them, be happy with that.” Jack walked over to a nearby tree, touched one of the larger, pulsing mushrooms, and promptly punched it so it tore off the tree trunk. “But now that we got a minute to talk, I wanted to ask you something.”

“Ask?”

“About Black Blood.”

The man frowned, but it passed quickly, the dude returning to statuesque posture. “What about it?”

“Do you trust him?”

“I don’t understand.”

“Black Blood. He’s up to something. I remember Avery saying once that you guys came here because spirits said you should, that something was up. I know you’ve been investigating the tears.”

“I won’t—”

“We ... we’ve been ... trying to find out who’s been making the tears. We d-don’t think it’s Black Blood, at least not ... directly.” This may have been in their heads, meaning Jack squeezing his throat was just a metaphor, but it was a damn good one.

“You think Maria’s been doing that, instead.”

“Yes. We ... think ... she’s trying to resurrect Lucas, and is going to ... do a ritual that threatens the Gauntlet.”

“And you think Maria’s been doing this, why? What’s your evidence?”

“Spirits ... are working with her. They told me.”

Jack squinted at the man, and his steady eyes. The way he choked out ‘they told me’ was solid, and hit Jack straight to the soul. Whoever this shaman was, he knew his shit, or at least he believed he did. He probably performed some strange ritual or binding to talk to the spirits, something that forced the conversation to happen on his terms.

“So you don’t think Black Blood has anything to do with this?”

“That spirit, it ... it gets its fingers into everything. So maybe. But Maria—”

Jack gave the man a hard shake, and David coughed in his grip. The idiot still thought Black Blood was a spirit. So either Black Blood really was a spirit — he wasn’t — or the fucker was playing a trick on the Uratha. And if Black Blood could convince experts in spirits that he was a spirit, the fuck else could he convince them of?

“Ok, thanks for the info. Now, get up, and go kick your friends’ asses.” Might as well take advantage of the situation. The werewolves were busy trying to stop his legion from biting off their toes. That give him a good ten, maybe fifteen seconds of in-the-real-world time, enough to plant a proper, more powerful suggestion in David’s head.

“I ... I won’t!”

Oh, the fucker was resisting him. How god damn mother fucking cute.

Jack glared into the man’s eyes, and squeezed harder, as black smoke oozed out from Jack’s body. David’s eyes widened, and unlike werewolf eyes, human eyes were infinitely more expressive. The emotions there, painted across his gaze, complete and utter terror, was better than any Kiss could have been.

The smoke poured out of Jack, out of his nostrils, his ears, his tear ducts, and then out from his pores. It engulfed him, onyx smoke, and fangs, claws, beaks, teeth, everything you could find on creatures vampires identified with. The wolf at David's side whimpered all the more, and the man in Jack's grip trembled as his eyes were forced to look higher and higher.

And Jack spoke, his voice an earthquake in the fool's mind that stirred his lake to boil, and his trees to fall over. As each tree fell, splinters and branches rained down on him and David as the trees collided with each other.

"I. Wasn't. Asking."

And with that, he forced his will upon the fool's mind, and placed a single key phrase in the man's subconsciousness. Sick 'em, boy.

He let go of his neck, and let go of the connection on his mind. Back in the real world, David stood five feet away from Jack, ready to pounce but never quite committing. Rats flowed past him, between his legs and onto the werewolves behind them. Ten, maybe twenty seconds had gone by, enough time for some of the wolves to realize what was going on, and that the legion were a distraction.

Well, not really a distraction. The rats bit and clawed, and some of the lucky ones managed to pierce skin, but werewolf hides were tough as fuck. The main result his legion could bring, was pain. The howls and roars of the werewolves as hundreds upon hundreds of teeth bit into their skin, was music to his ears.

His rat servants might not be able to do much damage to Uratha, but another Uratha could.

With a growing smile and cackle, he pointed at the werewolves behind David.

"Sick 'em, boy."

David turned, and charged into the group. And this time, they wouldn't break Jack's Dominate so easily. The rats split apart like the red sea, creating a path for David, and the werewolf sprinted down it full speed until he crashed into one of the wolves. David fell on them, and started biting and clawing. From how the victim shrieked, and how chunks of meat went flying, werewolves were as susceptible to werewolf claws and teeth as vampires were.

Matthew and Arturo didn't like that. As Avery and one-armed Clara tackled David, Matthew and Arturo ran past the chaos and toward Jack. Dumbasses. As they got close, Jack waved a hand, and a few thousand rats poured around Jack's feet and up into a wide mound. The rodents threw themselves at the giant wolves, and Art and Matt stumbled as their shins slammed into hundreds of furry bodies, and their feet turned dozens of rats into chili.

Jack ducked under their sloppy charges, got low, and punched upward, using the floor as his anchor for the uppercut. Oh, the delicious crunch of his fist hitting Arturo's jaw from underneath, the sound of bone breaking, the cut short howl. Fucking beautiful. The dark wolf stumbled back before falling, and the rats poured over him, more and more, until the huge beast disappeared under a carpet of gnashing teeth.

Matthew got his hands on Jack once his partner was out of the way, both hands clamping down. A close up of the giant showed a dozen wounds, and a thousand rat bites, but the fucker still wouldn't go down. He sank his claws into Jack's body, and immediately the difference in power between him and the other werewolves was obvious. Stereotypical tank of the team, a juggernaut, a hulk. A moron.

Jack ignored the titan's power as Matt squeezed on his shoulders. The blood coursing through him was stronger than this fool could tear through, not within a few seconds, and Matt realized it. So of course the idiot double downed and snapped his head down to try and bite Jack's off.

Jack pulled his leg back, and kicked the werewolf in the crotch. With Matt's grip on his shoulders, he had a good anchor to pour strength into the kick, and holy shit, the result was amazing. Werewolves didn't have dicks, not when they were fighting like this anyway, but that didn't mean that part of muscle and flesh wasn't softer. Matthew went up into the air several feet, and fell to the ground, howling like he'd just learned Firefly was canceled.

"You two don't get to spit-roast me, fuckers. Do I look like Tash to you?" Fucking sacks of shit. Jack gave the man a hard kick, and the huge pile of meat spun a one-eighty on the floor, sending rats around as his limbs collided with their furry little bodies.

And the moment he did that, five werewolves jumped him. Holy shit. He laughed as the five titans leapt what must have been thirty feet, and all came flying through the air at him. Fast as he was, he was no Daeva or Mekhet, and the best he could manage was to half duck, before they collided into him. Well, before one collided into him. Werewolves were big as fuck, and even shoulder to shoulder, only one had room to catch him.

He went down with a thunk, and his rats retaliated. They wouldn't let their general lose. They swarmed up over the werewolf holding him, and the poor bastard howled and stood up, letting Jack go so he could swipe rats off his body. Blood, everywhere, rats dying by the dozens to their claws.

On his back, Jack spotted flapping wings above. Mulder and Scully, still cawing, still announcing information to him. Nothing he didn't already know, except that the werewolves were making progress managing the chaos. Rats continued to pour into the tunnel and into Maria's den, unending, fueled by the city and its endless population of rodents, but the werewolves were quickly figuring out how to manage keeping rats off them. Surprising both the wolves and Jack though, was how much damage the rats did to werewolf skin. He'd assumed they'd have trouble breaking through werewolf hide, but then, he should have known better. He knew rats could get through concrete given time, and were making their own progress on cutting through werewolf hide.

The four remaining werewolves fell on him, like raptors looking to tear into a freshly caught fish. Claws and teeth all fell on him, biting and scratching, and he laughed. Was this what it felt like to be them, getting eaten alive by rats?

But as painful as it was, their claws and teeth, for all their strange magical shenanigans, couldn't get through his protective blood shield. Wherever they managed to cut skin, they got no further as blood poured out of the wound and wrapped his body. It coursed and swirled around him, covering more and more of him as the wolves tried harder and harder to rip him apart.

"Get off." He swung his fist out at a nearby knee. Crack. Kicked his foot up at a nearby chest. Crunch. Snapped his other hand up to grab the jaw bone of one of the werewolves, and yanked. Rip and tear. The wolf jerked his head away, but not before Jack ripped the jaw half off to the side, exposing throat and tongue and teeth. More howls of pain, and Jack grinned at the last werewolf.

The final werewolf got up and backed away. Not out of fear, though the beast was obviously terrified. Nah, the titan was just looking for more of his pack to surround Jack, cause one-on-one certainly wasn't working. Smart. Probably Noah, then.

Jack held out his hand. Mulder and Scully flew down, scooped up the silver sword, and dropped it in Jack's palm.

"Thanks, loves," he said in a shitty, fake Australian accent, and he laughed again as he threw the sword at Noah. Easily dodged, but the werewolf was conveniently distracted by a giant mountain of rats that poured up and onto his legs, tail, and back.

Of course, throwing a sword never works like in the movies. You can't just grab a throwing axe, throw it at someone, and expect it to land blade first. It spins a bunch. But thankfully there's a lot of blade on a sword, and it was silver, so all it had to do was touch Noah, which it did. It nicked across his thigh, drawing some blood and some sizzling before it fell to the floor. Damn, that would have been so cool if it'd stuck him proper. Well, he didn't want to use the sword anyway. Fight would be over too fast.

Jack walked toward the remaining werewolves, big grin on his face with each step, and made a show of cracking his knuckles. He was a vampire, so no nitrogen buildup to pop in his knuckles, but still, he tried.

“Guess I'll just have to do this the old fashioned way.”

“Jack! Stop!” Clara again. She clutched her empty arm socket, catching bits of blood that leaked from it. Not bleeding nearly as bad as it should have been. Werewolves healed fast.

Poor girl, so stupid. Every time she looked at him, he could see the sadness there, and every time, it sent scorching heat through him. Not the good kind of heat. Bad kind. Angry kind. The kind that made him want to rip off her other arm and jam it down her throat.

Jack looked past her to David. He'd fucked some werewolf up before one of the werewolves got him in a head lock, and with Noah's help, managed to subdue him, but they had to ignore the rats biting on them to do it. A few of the werewolves were buried in rats, and combined with their wounds, were slowly succumbing to exhaustion. Combined with the bunch Jack had just beat up, Art and Matt included, most of the pack was incapacitated.

Except Avery.

The bitch stood in front of Clara, snout fully healed, and she stared at him with a delicious mixture of rage and growing fear. Finally, he was getting through her thick skull. Finally, she was starting to accept that she couldn't just go around fucking with shit in Dolareido like she owned it, not if she didn't want a vamp like him to come along and fuck her up.

More rats poured into the room. And more. And more. But they didn't swarm the werewolves. Jack stood in the center of the room as his army grew around him, piled high around his legs, and he licked his fangs as he looked around. Slowly, his legion flowed off the injured werewolves they'd buried, and came to join the whirlpool of flesh that built up around him. More, and more. The flowing mound of rats piled high behind him, until it towered over him, while the mound in front of him stayed at waist level.

Groans filled the room, injured werewolves that the rats had taken advantage of and injured a thousand times more. Now without rats covering them, they could recover, but it'd take them a while. They wouldn't be in fighting condition any time soon.

He took a step toward Clara and Avery, and they stood their ground against the oncoming legion, the leader and second-in-command of the pack. Like the Spartans before the Persians at Thermopylae, except this wasn't a movie. And much as people like to forget, the Spartans lost that battle.

"There, I stopped, see?" He slowly turned, and his legion of rats turned with him, as he gestured around at the wake of destruction. A thousand dead rats coated the floor, mixing in with the gashes left in the stone by werewolf talons. Rat guts, rat blood, rat fur, everywhere. But a thousand rats didn't matter, not when ten thousand more swirled around Jack, ready to die for him.

"Jack," Avery said. "Leave!"

Oh the audacity on this bitch.

“You come into my old boss’s home like you own the place. You ignore the rules of Dolareido. You hurt my friend. You hurt his new boss.” He came closer, and his legion followed. “And you actually thought you could hurt me.” He gestured to his shirtless torso and the blood coursing over his skin. They had hurt him, but the injuries were only skin deep. “I should put you in the ground.”

“We are trying to protect city,” Clara said. “Maria threatens Gauntlet!”

“Nah, she doesn’t. And even if she did, even if she fucked up and tore the whole thing down and the city burned because of her stupidity, that’s her choice. This city belongs to us, the vampires. Every kine in it is our fucking slave to kill or eat.” He stepped closer, and again, his legion followed. “They belong to me. The city belongs to me.”

He grinned as he looked to Damien and Maria. Both sat with each other, backs against the wall near her coffin, eyes locked onto him. Damien looked disturbed. Maria was shocked. God damn it felt good to make that old sack of shit surprised. So sure of herself all the damn time, but not anymore.

“It does not,” Avery barked.

“Ha! Yes it fucking does. It—”

Clara roared, and Jack froze. His limbs froze. His vitae froze. Everything in him froze, as the whole fucking cave echoed with the boom of her roar. Like someone set up a fucking explosion in his damn skull, everything stopped listening to him.

And that included the rats.

The swarms surrounding him scattered, rats being rats, and Jack stood there, staring, dumbfounded. Even as he heard the thud thud thud of someone giant running for his back, he couldn't turn around. What the fuck?

Clara collapsed. Whatever she'd done, it drained her of whatever she had left. On her back on the floor, she panted openly, with only enough energy to hold her bleeding arm socket with her other hand.

He had to admit, she was damn impressive. Course it was hard to stay appreciative, when a giant werewolf pounced him from behind. The momentum should have slammed Jack into the floor, but Avery pounced at him too, straight on, and where Matt's claws sank into his back, Avery's claws sank into his chest. Whatever Clara's roar had done, it'd suppressed his blood shield enough for the damn wolves to hurt him.

Matt's claws hurt. Avery's claws burned. Whatever it was that'd allowed her to burn the azlu in the tunnels, something that made her claws glow dark orange, she used it now. And Jack screamed as his skin turned to ash around them.

Feeling flooded him. The vibration in his bones and skin vanished. Paralysis fled. His senses came back to him, his power, all of it. Whatever Clara had done had been temporary, and his control came back to him in a glorious flood of power. His Beast, his slave, its power coursed through him, and his blood shield burst into full strength again, rendering Matthew's claws borderline meaningless.

Avery's claws, on the other hand, burned, and burned. They tore through his blood, and ripped down from his collar to his chest, and down through his stomach.

"Get off!" Jack swung his arm to the side, and the back of his fist collided with her head. He made sure to hit her head, not just her snout, and the bitch went flying, half spinning sideways before slamming into the ground. And as she did, Jack drove his elbow into Matt's gut, hard enough the damn beast, already a wounded mess, fell back as a dozen ribs shattered.

With his power returned and the damn dogs off him, Jack resummoned his legion. They came to him quickly, resuming their protective circle around him.

He looked down at his chest, and winced. She'd burned him. God damn, the bitch had burned him, like she'd come at him with a flaming chainsaw. His ribs were exposed, so was a chunk of his collar bone, and some of the bone was cut through; only thing keeping it together and working was his blood. His guts were exposed too, old withered things, and he scooped them back into his stomach so his blood could get a proper grip on them, and keep them there, before it coursed over his body with its flowing veins once again.

Snarling, Jack spun and looked at Matthew. Stupid dog was on his knees, coughing up a fountain of blood, but his eyes were on Jack, ready to pounce him the moment his body got working again. So Jack drove his fist down at the man's stupid werewolf face, broke his cheek bone, and sent him to the floor.

"I fucking put the fight on pause, and you try and get a sneak attack in on me?" he said, gesturing to Matt, and Avery, and Clara. "Fucking hell, that's pretty damn good. I figured you'd die with your honor, but nope, you guys fight dirty when you need to. I can respect that." He walked over to Clara and squatted down over her. "Gotta admit, you've surprised me. No wonder you're second in command."

She growled up at him, but made no attempt to hit him. Not like she could do much exhausted, and with an arm missing.

"Good girl." Smiling down at her, he leaned down, pat her cheek, and gave her doggy snout a quick kiss.

An angry roar announced Noah's charge. Ah, Clara's magic roar earlier had broken David's brainwashing, the surface brainwashing anyway. So naturally Noah decided to come at him while he was distracted.

Jack pointed a hand at Noah, palm open, and five thousand rats poured up in front of Jack like a tsunami. The mountain of meat crashed into the injured wolf, and buried him in biting teeth and claws. He bit and clawed in return, but the werewolf disappeared under the swarming bodies like one of those diggers in The Mummy. Only one of his giant clawed hands remained visible under the pile, twitching with spasms.

David stood there, frozen, shell shocked from his broken brainwash. The werewolf beside him was apparently smart enough to learn they'd been beaten, and just stared at Jack.

He loved that stare, the jaw agape, eyes wide, body frozen stare. The petrified stare. Seeing it on their faces despite the fact they were in their big war form was intoxicating.

He looked around at the rest of the pack as they watched Noah get eaten alive. The rest of them were battered, beaten, bleeding from a million holes, and struggling to stand. His legion left them alone for now, making an example of Noah, and only once the man stopped struggling against the swarm, did Jack pull his legion back.

What was left was a Jackson Pollock of blood. The rats had gotten through a lot of Noah's skin in that swarm, and had shredded through tendons. Wrists, ankles, behind the knees, under the shoulders, all the soft places, torn up. But the fucker was alive, and he'd live, given what Jack had seen these dumb dogs survive; they'd live through anything barring cutting off their heads, or cutting them in half, heh.

"Now, for the rest of you!" He swept his hand toward the rest of the pack. "I'm not going to kill you. Calm the fuck down, before I put you all in the ground." Please, please give him a reason to kill you. To feel their worthless hearts pop in his grip, splat. To break bones. To see fear in their eyes before death takes them. God, he wanted that.

Avery, wobbly and shaking, rolled off her side and onto her foot and knee, half kneeling. She tried to get up, but Jack skipped over to her, and kicked her in the chest. The impact sent him back, but his legion caught him, keeping him standing so he could watch as Avery fell onto her back, clutching at her chest. More broken bones.

“Fuck me, look at this,” he said, and he gestured to his chest. Avery had wounded him, badly. Only thing keeping him upright was the Discipline Juggernaut, and his mastery of it. Blood flowed around and over him and over the wound, like crimson snakes, but her claws had burned him, greatly. He wouldn’t be healing the four giant gashes slicing him from neck to waist anytime soon.

“Ha! I said I won’t kill her. Didn’t say a damn thing about not hurting her.” He stepped over Avery and over her waist, grinning down at her. She tried to move, but was struggling to breathe. Major impact to the diaphragm and a bunch of broken ribs could do that.

She did manage to growl though. So naturally, he sat down on her sternum, forced her hands aside, and punched her in the face. Her head snapped to the side, and bits of teeth flew out.

“Let me make this perfectly clear,” he said between chuckles, and he punched her again. “You crossed a line. This is not like back then, when you and whoever that Simon dude was decided you could just kill one of us and not suffer consequences.” He punched her again. Blood soaked his fist. “While you’re in Dolareido, you answer to us, to me, and not the other way around. You don’t get to waltz into my city and think, just because you have a holy mission or what-the-fuck-ever, that it gives you the right to—hey!” She tried to get a swipe in at him, but he bat her hand aside, and punched her again, in the snout again, and broke it again. “Don’t interrupt me when I’m talking.”

“Jack! Please! We understand!” Clara got up. Not werewolf Clara, normal Clara. Human again, she held her arm socket tight to her, blood dripping between her only set of fingers, and she wobbled worse than a drunk prom date.

“I know you understand. I bet the rest of you do, too.” He looked around at the group. More of the werewolves had managed to get back up, wounds healing, but they were still beat to fuck. Thousands of bite marks, not to mention the far heavier wounds Jack had inflicted personally. Werewolves were awesome like that. He could beat one into a pulp and they’d live, only so he could do it again. Some of them even looked ready to charge him again, but his rats swirled around him and Avery, daring the dumb animals to try.

“Then stop, please!” Clara begged.

“No.” He grabbed Avery’s oncoming claws, and twisted, breaking one of her fingers back until it hit her forearm, while the other gripped her wrist, squeezed, and slowly twisted her arm out of the way despite her every effort to stop him. “It’s the old farts like this one that need the biggest punishment. They just won’t learn.” Cackling, he set his free hand to her throat, and squeezed it as well. Big throat though, and he couldn’t get a proper grip on it. Didn’t matter. He threw Avery’s wrist aside, and punched her again. Not much left of her face anymore, and her blood gushed out of the gory mess. It soaked the floor.

The pack winced as he did it, and he could tell they were weighing their options. Attack him again, and risk getting more hurt, or even killed. Or just stand there and watch their boss get beaten black and blue for being a bitch.

David looked especially guilty, and Jack winked at him. Oh, he had plans for that man.

Through a garbled mess of blood and missing teeth, Avery gargled up something.

“I’m sorry, what was that? Speak up.” He stopped punching, and gave her broken snout a few light taps on the side.

“I ... concede.”

Laughing, Jack stood up, and rubbed his drenched hands together. Blood dripped from them and down onto the werewolf’s chest.

“There. Was that so hard?” He stepped back from the bitch, and held up his hands. “Fight’s over. You don’t have to go home, but you can’t stay here.” Nobody laughed. A shame. Jacob would have laughed.

The werewolves looked at each other, then at him. They struggled to stay standing, and some of them didn’t even try, trapped on the floor by their injuries. But everyone looked at him like he’d stab them in the back the moment they exposed their flank.

“Seriously, dumbasses, fight’s over. I could kill every single one of you right now if I wanted to, but I won’t. You can thank Jack for that.” There, you see, shithead? I can play nice. “So heal up, scoop up your wounded, and go.”

Well, he supposed he did look pretty scary, standing there with thousands of rats circling him. The rats climbed over each other, occasionally creating mounds a few feet high, before the mound collapsed and the rats flowed over each other like water. Thousands of tiny chitters. Thousands of tiny claws, scratching the stone floor. Thousands of whiskers and beady eyes looking around for their next target. They’d liked the taste of werewolves.

Clara was the first to listen. She really was smarter than the rest of them. Course, being that she only had one arm, she couldn’t do much, but it started the chain reaction. Slowly, more of the werewolves transformed back into their human selves, and scooped up their wounded.

“Clara, take this,” Jack said, and he snapped his fingers. Immediately a hundred rats fled to the side of the room, and returned with precious cargo. Her arm.

She snarled at him, and turned her back to him, the first to do so. Brave. Caleb helped her pick Avery up, hooked her arm over Clara’s shoulders, and the two dragged the broken woman away. Transformed back into human form now, Avery was just a tiny thing, and her face looked worse than as if she’d just told her drunk, abusive husband about her affair.

Well, if Clara didn’t want her arm back, whatever. He snapped his fingers, and the rats devoured it, coordinated and quick. Piranha would have been envious with how quickly the rats gobbled it up. They would have been petrified by how easily the rats devoured the bones, too.

Watching the werewolves — now human — go was delightful entertainment. Each left a blood trail behind them, and Jack breathed deep the smell of it. He should have taken a drink of one them, but that was hard to do in the middle of a battle. He’d been lucky to get the moment he had to get his claws into David.

Ah, David, their shaman. The man looked at Jack again, and Jack finger waved at him, big grin on full broadcast. David looked away, and helped the more injured werewolves leave.

Jack watched them go, and only when they were truly well and gone did he turn around, and walk over to Maria and Damien. Maria still looked shocked, but as Jack approached, Damien went from disgusted, to anxious, like he expected Jack to attack him. Matthias sat nearby, frozen solid.

“You won’t have to stake me, buddy,” Jack said, squatting down in front of his friend. “You didn’t ruin it for me this time. I got to have the fun!” He clapped his hands together once, and blood splattered everywhere. Neither Maria nor Damien blinked, each staring at him like they didn’t know who he was.

“Jack,” Maria said at last. “Or ... curse?”

He laughed. “Come on, this is getting old.” He leaned in, and grinned at the two vamps. “Just call me the Ripper. I know you’re all thinking it.” He paused, gave them each a dramatic, evil grin, and stopped, once he thought about it. “Or, you know, Ripper, if you don’t wanna get all classics about it.”

The both blinked at him, then each other, and him again. Jesus fucking christ, no one in the whole damn city had a sense of humor except that Jacob asshole.

“Very well,” Maria said. “I ... have to thank you, Ripper, for saving me.”

“I was nearby when I got Damien’s alert. Surprised Jessy didn’t show up.” Shrugging, he reached down and held out his hand for Maria. She looked at it before glaring up at him, and he laughed. “That reminds me. Maria, there’s something I’ve been wanting to tell you.”

“Jack...” Damien said, eyeing him.

Oh the grin on Jack’s face. He knew it was there. There was no way he’d be able to hide it. He squatted down in front of Maria again, and leaned in a little closer.

Don’t!

“It was Jack.”

“What?” she asked.

“Jack.” Oh god this was gonna be amazing. “Jack is the one who killed Lucas.”

The explosion of shock on her face was perfect, and he felt his cheeks ache with his growing smile. Silence followed, and Jack glanced at Damien and his angry face, before looking back to Maria, waiting excitedly. This was too good.

“You ... you mean ... you killed Lucas?”

“Nope, not me. I was just a whisper in the boy’s mind, back then. Jack did it. Tricked Lucas. He possessed Damien here, and just when Lucas thought he’d won, he made Damien cut Lucas’s head, clean off his shoulders.”

“You’re ... lying...” Eyes locked, unable to blink, she looked at Damien. If he’d had time to prepare, he’d probably have been able to lie about it, but right now, all Maria had to do was catch a glimpse of Damien’s eyes, to know New Jack was telling her the truth.

Jack got up, and laughed, and laughed, and laughed some more, as he walked away from Maria and Damien, and headed back to the surface. His legion followed, spread out and carpeting the floor like a living, breathing flood.

There. Remember what Black Blood said to the vamp he helped? Five days, before one of his enemies got him. Try surviving without me now, Jack.

Chapter 133

~~Antoinette~~

“There they are,” Elaine whispered.

Antoinette nodded, and took the binoculars from her. High up upon the enormous cathedral, the two elders watched the city, the streets beneath, and now the fleeing werewolves.

“Twelve,” Antoinette said. “They all live.”

“You sound disappointed.”

“I am ... torn. Avery does not deserve death, nor does her pack. But they are a thorn in my side.”

“From what I hear, they think they are going to save the city.”

Antoinette sighed and shook her head. “Perhaps. But they will make enemies of us all doing so.”

The werewolves looked horrendous. Whatever Jack had done to them, assuming it was Jack, he had spared them, but he had also broken them, thoroughly. As hundreds of rats flowed out of the cathedral, hidden in the night and disappearing into the black of Dolareido, the twelve werewolves dragged themselves back toward their homes. Most lived near the Carthians, but Clara and Carter did not. And yet, despite their homes being in the entertainment district, they went with the pack, with Avery.

They no longer felt safe near the Invictus. That thin thread was now broken.

“Perhaps Maria is the one who injured them?” Elaine said. “She is quite the deadly woman, after all.”

“Rats flee the cathedral, by the thousands.” She handed the binoculars back.

Elaine took them, and Antoinette watched a smile slowly spread on the woman’s lips. “Impressive, to summon so many.”

“The curse is disgustingly powerful. And disgusting.”

Sighing, Elaine lowered the binoculars and met her eyes. “It was not all bad.”

“You remember such details?”

“I can remember ... the thrill of it, of the power. I can remember the sense of purpose and rage it gave me. But I never broke it free of its bindings. I could never do that.” She gestured far down below, underneath the gargoyle they stood upon, down to the scurrying lines of black that flowed over the gutters.

A glint of something crossed Elaine’s face. Envy, perhaps?

“You could do that now.”

“Not without great effort.” Sighing, she shook her head. “With the power of the curse unleashed, an elder vampire would be beyond formidable.”

Antoinette watched her friend for a while, reading the expressions Elaine felt comfortable surfacing. To summon an army, a legion of rodents, was indeed an impressive feat for a Ventrue of any age, let alone one as young as Jack. However...

“It would not be worth it, old friend. You have not spoken with the curse unleashed. I have. It is abhorrent, disturbing, and twisted.”

“Then, perhaps, my ignorance shall be alleviated tonight? The army of vermin, the fleeing werewolves, I surmise the curse shall step out of the cathedral any moment.”

Sighing, Antoinette nodded. In all likelihood, Jack had unleashed the curse once again tonight, and she was terrified to learn the results. The werewolves left the cathedral alive, something she would not expect the curse to do, but then, maybe the curse had the forethought to consider ramifications. Maybe, instead of thinking of the curse as a compressed vortex of rage and sickening tastes, she should think of it as a malevolent villain, quite capable of intelligent decisions.

The thought was beyond putrid.

They waited another ten minutes, but nothing came of it. Jack did not step out from the cathedral, and there was no ignoring the dreadful aura that emanated from the building. He lurked within.

After a frustrated groan, Antoinette hopped down from the cathedral rooftops, and landed before its grand doors. Once Elaine joined her, they pushed them in, stepping over the blood of the werewolves, and walked into the church.

She did not enjoy the cathedral’s presence. Not for lack of beauty; it was a marvelous structure. It had been built without her permission, Lucas testing the limits of his political power. But Lucas was gone, and the cathedral, forever a reminder of the fool and his delusions, was a testament to his failure. And Maria, the poor soul, was attached to it.

It was dark in the cathedral. Distant streetlights managed to penetrate the stained glass windows, but only just. The candles that usually dotted the nave and chancel were extinguished, and the towering organ looked monolithic in the darkness.

In the third row sat a young man, shirtless, with a dozen cuts on his skin, none deep. He sat leaning back, arms hooked over the back of the pew, his head looking to the crucifix that stood before the pulpit. On the pew in front of him sat two crows, perched upon its back, and turned to face their master.

The two birds looked to the approaching elders, and both let out annoyed caws as Antoinette and Elaine drew near.

“Jealous?” he asked.

Antoinette blinked, turned back to Elaine who only shrugged, before she looked back to Jack. “I am not sure I—”

“I was talking to Mulder and Scully, dumbass.”

Antoinette froze, five feet back from the pew Jack sat upon, and she clenched her hands until her nails threatened to pierce her palms. Again she glanced to Elaine, and found her friend’s eyes wide, locked onto Jack. The boy had proved Antoinette’s concern and disgust with his very first sentence.

“Maria and Damien are downstairs,” he said, “alive, but not looking too hot. Maria will be out of commission for a few weeks or more. Maybe months. Damien too. Avery really fucked them up.”

“And yet you did not kill them,” Antoinette said.

“Who, Avery? Nah. Coulda. Hell, I was tempted. But then I’d have this jackass screaming at me for the rest of eternity.” He pointed at his temple. “And burning bridges is never a good idea. Unless it’s a really big bridge that would burn spectacularly.”

The ambiguity on whether he meant a metaphorical bridge or not, did not sit well with her.

“Jack,” she said, “I—”

“Jack the Ripper.” He laughed again, reached out, and lightly scratched one crow behind the head, and then the other. “Everyone’s been thinking it. Might as well go with it.”

The Ripper. She grit her teeth and walked down the isle a little further, until she stood beside the pew her lover sat within. Of course, it was not her lover, but the curse that fought for control of his body. She would not dignify it with a name.

“Where is the necklace Elaine gave you?”

“Here.” He waved his right hand a little, before setting his arm along the back of the pew once more. “Still intact. Jack took it off when he saw shit was about to get hairy. Can’t fight a dozen werewolves with his Beast being squashed. And in the fight, he let his guard down, so I came out to play.” The following laugh had her gritting her teeth.

“I see.” She stepped a little further down the isle, so she could look the curse in the eye. But her eyes fell to his chest instead, and she took a slow, deep breath.

She could see his rib cage. Four enormous claw marks cut from his neck down to his stomach, and each left lines of burned flesh and ash along the outside of the wounds. His ribs had been cut through, as had his abdominal muscles. Kindred blood slowly pulsed within the wound, keeping his innards inside, but wounds of that caliber, wounds that looked to be caused by blades of fire, would take an elder days, perhaps weeks to heal, no matter the amount of devoured blood.

“Avery got me pretty good.” He chuckled, gestured to his chest, and winked at her. “But I got her back.”

“You must be hungry,” Elaine said, joining Antoinette’s side. “Defeating a dozen werewolves and now recovering from those wounds will be draining.”

“Yeap. That reminds me, how’d it go with my new thrall?”

Antoinette could not keep a small frown from escaping. “Your taint does not poison her.” And she is not your thrall, demon.

“Ha! Shame. I was hoping it’d turn her into a super thrall or something.” He shrugged, and held out his hand sideways. One of the crows hopped onto his finger, and flapped its wings a few times, as Jack brought it in close.

“You were waiting for us,” Antoinette said.

“Jack sent you a message, right? Michael should be here soon, too. Probably with a bunch of ghouls and Kindred.” Shrugging again, he set the bird back on the pew in front of him. “I’ll be gone by then. Jack can handle the clean up.”

Antoinette nodded. “It is Invictus procedure, to deal with—”

“Not that clean up. I mean with Maria. She’ll ... well, she’ll be out for blood.” He laughed, a twisted, corrupt sound, and Antoinette’s spine shivered as if a ghost dragged its nails across her bones. “Garry’s gonna be pretty happy. I figure he gave Avery the nudge to actually attack Maria. Mission successful, sorta. Maria won’t be defending shit for a little while, which means Garry’s gonna go on the offensive. And you know Michael’s gonna have Jack front and center dealing with it.”

Antoinette grit her teeth and looked to Elaine. Her friend stared at Jack, eyes occasionally drifting to the two crows, before she looked to Antoinette. The curse was correct. Garry and Michael had been pushing at each other’s borders for months now, skirmishes, occasional gunfights, and far worse, economic warfare between Xnomina and Terra Den.

That was their prerogative. Antoinette enforced the Masquerade in her city, but if the Invictus and the Carthians decided to slaughter each other, that was not her concern. If they crossed a line and brought the attention of the kine, then it was. But she had no stake in either covenant, at least, not before she met Jack.

“And you,” Jack said, and he snapped his head to look at Elaine. The sneer on his face turned Antoinette’s stomach. “You might have abandoned the gift you were given, but a lot can happen in hundreds of years. I won’t let you kill me, great grandsire. And I won’t let you have me, either.”

“Have you? I—”

Jack waved her off, like dismissing a child, and he looked past them to the crucifix beyond. “Christ, that fight drained me. Won’t be long before Jack takes over again. And the meditation, this stupid necklace”—he waved the small thing in his right hand around—“it all works. Shuts me right up. Problem is, Jack isn’t good enough to handle the shitshows coming his way, and he knows it. He’ll rely on me again, like he relied on me tonight.”

“He does not need you,” Antoinette said.

“Yeah, he does. And if someone finally manages to remove me or kill me, someone’s gonna kill him.” Laughing again, he looked down at the necklace in his hand, and slipped it on around his neck. “Good luck.”

His head lowered, and the boy drifted into torpor. Elaine and Antoinette exchanged glances once again, before looking to the birds. Mulder and Scully sat, and waited, and only when the boy raised his head once again did they caw a greeting.

The boy blinked at the two birds, then at Antoinette and Elaine, and then down at his chest.

“Holy shit this hurts.” He clutched his arm over his chest and groaned. “Fucking fuck this hurts.”

Sighing with relief, Antoinette sat down beside her love, and touched his shoulder. “Avery was a terror when she first visited the city, decades ago. Now she is a force to be reckoned with, I am sure.”

“You’re telling me. I knew she could do some crazy shit, but sweet fucking...” He reached out for her shoulder and clutched it tight. “Can we get out of here? I need to get away from here, from Maria. Need a drink, and sleep.”

“Yes, of course. But why flee Maria? She owes you her life.”

He shook his head desperately, and forced himself to stand. The shifting crunch of his broken bones, held together only by his dark blood swirling within his chest cavity, looked excruciating. How had the curse held a conversation as if pain did not bother it? For an elder to ignore pain was easy. For a neonate, it was nothing of the sort.

“She ... she knows.”

“Knows? I—”

“She knows, about Lucas.”

Antoinette frowned as she helped the boy out into the isle. Caws announced the two crows taking flight, and they found perches above to watch as Antoinette guided Jack out of the church.

Naturally, a dozen Kindred stood outside, Invictus, along with a dozen ghouls or thralls. Everyone was armed, swords, knives, shotguns, assault rifles, only weapons that could do damage to a werewolf. No Michael to be seen, though. Perhaps Damien had contacted him.

“Twenty three suits,” Elaine said with a grin. “But you are late. The werewolves are gone, and Maria and Damien need treatment. They await below.”

The vampires and ghouls looked at each other, and then to Jack. And waited.

“Sir?” one of the Kindred asked, stepping closer to the Invictus Right Hand.

Groaning and clutching his stomach, other arm wrapped over Antoinette’s shoulders, he gestured to the church nave behind them.

“Elaine’s right. Get in there and talk to Matthias. Get in a crew for clean up, and get Maria and Damien something to drink. They’re in worse shape than me.”

Several of the ghouls gulped at that.

“Yes sir.” Nodding, the crew rushed past.

As they did, two crows flew out through the open doors and perched upon a nearby gargoyle. Jack’s friends, and protective little creatures. Sometimes they joined her in her tower, and she had a feeling they would again tonight.

“Sir,” one of the Kindred said, and she stopped in front of them. “Do you want a drive back to your home, sir?”

“The apartment isn’t saf—oh, right, the mansion.” He groaned again and let his head drop.

“I think Mister Terry would prefer to stay with me this day,” Antoinette said, earning the nervous gaze of the young vampire.

“Y-Yeah.” Jack nodded, and managed a dismissing wave with his free hand. “Mister McDonald will get a proper report tomorrow night. In the mean time, notify him that the Carthians are going to be a problem.”

“Yes, Mister Terry.” She nodded, and followed the others into the cathedral as she pulled out her phone.

Maria knew where the mansion was, and if Jack spoke truly that she knew the boy was responsible for Lucas’s death, it was not entirely safe. If Jack slept within its depths in a secure room, it would be, but that did not mean the Nosferatu would not see the mansion burned atop him, and leave him a surprise gift upon awakening: explosives, and mountains of them.

Once the boy had the ghouls and thralls to defend his territory, he could play the game, but until then, he was vulnerable. The curse had a point.

But, the curse failed to understand something about people. Not everyone was cynical, and full of rage. Not everyone was bound to an endless cycle of destruction. The curse likely thought Maria would come for Jack, a slave to her emotions, and willing to sacrifice everything for them. But Antoinette knew better.

She would protect her love for the moment, in case she was wrong. But come tomorrow night, she would have a chat with Maria Turio, and see if her suspicions were true.

~~Beatrice~~

“Holy shit,” she said.

“Holy shit indeed,” Jacob said.

The two of them sat on a nearby roof, low, and both pulled out their best Cloak of Night. Elaine and Antoinette were near, on the cathedral’s roof, and if Triss and Jacob weren’t careful, they’d be spotted. Jacob figured the sheriff wasn’t around if those two were together, but even if that was true, those two were elders. Just cause they didn’t have Auspex didn’t mean they couldn’t spot them.

Jacob's Cloak of Night was infinitely better than hers. It felt like wearing an ocean of darkness, compared to her, a pond. Hell, like this, she could walk right up to Joe and punch him in his stupid face and he wouldn't see it coming.

Beneath them, a dozen people walked past. She recognized every one of them. Uratha. And they were beat to fucking shit. Soaked in blood, holes all over them, and one of them was missing an arm. Holy mother fucking shit Clara was missing an arm. And the smallest person in the group, Avery, barely had a face anymore.

"Jack ... Jack wouldn't do that."

"Nope. The curse did that." Jacob chuckled, barely more than a whisper, and pat her on the shoulder. "But they're all alive. Damn."

"You were really hoping Jack would kill some of them, weren't you?"

"Of course."

"Did ... did you know this was happening tonight?"

The elder Nosferatu grinned at her, looked below, and didn't answer. Which was an answer itself. He knew. He fucking knew Avery was going to attack Maria tonight. He knew Jack would be in his ritual room while it was happening, and immediately make a dash for the cathedral when he left. Maybe he hoped Jack would be too late, and Maria would be dead or something.

The fucker arranged for Jack's meeting with Black Blood, to happen tonight, so this shit show would happen without his interference, or at least delay it. And most importantly, he'd probably been banking on the curse killing some of them.

"Jacob, you are a giant, fucking colossal asshole."

“I know, right?” He chuckled again, and gestured down to the werewolves walking past. “I could kill them, right now. I could jump down and end their fucking lives. I’d kill everyone except Avery, at first. But then I’d Kiss her, and drain her nice and slow, make her enjoy it, so her last moments were filled with self loathing.”

“Dude, you need to let this go.”

That, was dumb. Jacob snapped his bandage-covered eyes toward her, and slowly, he withdrew his hand from her shoulder.

“You had your revenge, Triss. I haven’t.”

“And you know it’s not the same. Jeremiah and Angela were fucking insane.” Christ, just saying Angela’s name filled her with rage. Then remorse, and frustratingly, guilt. “And they would have killed us all if they got the chance. Avery’s just trying to help.”

Sighing, the man shook his head. “Don’t give me that shit you little fucker. You killed her for revenge and no other reason. And for all your tiny little brain can manage, it can’t understand the larger picture here. You don’t get to rationalize bullshit. You don’t get to dismiss an action, because it fucking fits your world view at the time.”

“I—”

Jacob’s grip found her throat, and she froze, staring at him, as the man held her second life in his hands. “Listen to me, and listen closely, young witch. Rules, ideals, morality, these are inventions. People made them up. There are no good guys, no bad guys, no villains or heroes. There is no God in the sky telling us what we should or shouldn’t do, and no permeating energy in the universe guiding us onto a path of zen and inner peace. There’s only one fucking thing in this whole god damn plane of existence that’s real, and that’s the actions we take.” One hand still holding her throat, he pointed at his temple with the other. “You’ll never be a true witch until you understand that. All that matters, the only thing with any meaning or value, are actions. Say what you want, think what you want, rationalize, appeal to whatever god or morality you want, none of it matters. The only thing that fucking matters, is what you do, or don't do. And Avery took something away from me that I can never, ever replace." He leaned in closer, and tightened his grip. "Do you really think you can convince me, that I shouldn't get my revenge?"

He let go, and turned his head back down toward the werewolves. Even with the speech, his Cloak was perfect.

"I ... I guess I can't." Sighing, she looked at the street as well, and furrowed her brow as rats poured out of the cathedral. Barely visible from a distance, the tiny, dark bodies disappeared into Dolareido, vanishing into dark corners, gutters, and a million crevices the city provided them. "But, it's not all that shit I was thinking about, dude. I was ... thinking about you."

Jacob said nothing, face still pointed to the street below, but his usual jackass smile was gone. She had to be careful.

"I mean, I don't think you'll be happy if you kill Avery, you know? Cause, yeah, anarchy and nihilism and all that, but I don't think you could ever be happy being a fucking killer. I mean, you are, but not that kind of killer. Avery's just trying to save lives and shit. And ... and you seem pretty happy with Samantha. Right?"

Using the Samantha word managed to make him wince, if only a little. For all the crazy sex Jacob and Samantha had, to the point every witch had seen the woman naked and cumming by now, there was more to their relationship than mindless sex. Sometimes they went into his alcove, and came out a few hours later, no sex had. A few hours, talking. Clearly they had some sort of connection.

"I like her, Triss. I like her a lot. But I'm not going to abandon my plans because of..." Sighing again, he crouched lower on the ceiling as Antoinette and Elaine jumped down from the cathedral, and walked inside. “Whatever, it doesn’t matter. If I killed Avery now, people would blame this on me.” He gestured to the church, implying whatever it was Maria was up to. “Avery can wait.”

Triss nodded, and made damn well sure to not ask about what the fuck he meant by plans. Old as the bastard was, he probably had a dozen plans in motion at any given time, some of them probably decades, even centuries old. Better she didn’t stick her nose into shit; it might get stuck.

“Think Jack’s alive?” she asked.

“Overheard the wolves say he was. Maria and Damien too.”

“Really?” Damn, fucker was multi-talented to overhear that.

“Yeap. They injured the both of them, badly. They’ll all be out of commission for weeks, maybe months.”

“Daaaamn.” She shivered and rubbed her arms. For Maria to be seriously injured was a big deal. Yeah sure, Damien too, quick little fuck, but Maria was a force. Everyone was terrified of that bitch and her mastery of Nightmare. If they hurt her and Damien badly, then the Lancea et Sanctum was out of commission for a while. Which meant...

“Jacob?” she asked.

“Yeap. Now that Maria’s out of the picture, Garry’s going to push on the Invictus. He’ll strike while the iron’s hot.” Grinning, Jacob got up, and jumped away, back toward their cave.

“The fuck? Wait for me!”

~~Eric~~

Garry's phone buzzed, and he checked it. The frown on his face said it all. Whatever had happened hadn't gone exactly the way he wanted, but not as bad as it could have gone for him, either.

"Alright, get out of here," he said, slipping the phone back into his pocket.

Jessy, still cradling her busted jaw, gave the man the finger. She'd managed to get the jaw back in place, and her vitae or whatever was doing work to keep the bones together, but she didn't want to risk fucking it up more by talking yet.

"The fuck happened?" Eric asked.

"Go ask Avery about it. Or Jessy, once she gets debriefed." He shrugged, leaned back against the sill, and sighed. "That Jack, he's a real fucking problem, you know that?"

"Jack? You mean the curse?"

"Yeah, the fucking curse. Jack's gonna kill someone at this rate. Someone he wouldn't want to kill."

"Wha—"

"I said get out of here." Garry dismissed him with a hand wave, and a half dozen vampires pointed their guns at Eric.

Sighing, Eric and Jessy got up, and did as ordered. No one shot them in the back, or stopped them from leaving. They just walked out, and it was like nothing happened.

Snarling, Jessy pulled out her phone, and her eyes went wide. "Holy shit!" And of course, the talking was quickly followed by a groan of pain.

"Don't talk. We should have your jaw in a sling."

“It’ll heal by tomorrow night,” she whispered, slurring her words together so she barely moved her mouth. Healed by tomorrow, sure, but aching and fucked up for days. Sighing and groaning, she stared into her phone and texted something in it before showing it to him.

Tash’s, ASAP.

---

Jessy opened the door with her key, and they stepped into Natasha’s apartment. Clean, a lot of function over fashion. Very Natasha.

“Natasha?” he yelled. “Hey, it’s Jessy and Eric.” No answer.

Jessy grumbled and stomped forward, immediately regretted stomping and hurting her jaw, and instead gently walked her way around the apartment.

Eric sniffed the air, but it was hard to smell Tash. Not cause he couldn’t smell vampire, he could, plenty, but vampires didn’t smell very different from each other. Hints of ash and dust and not much else. But he followed what he could smell, and did his best to ignore Jessy’s scent as he drifted toward the bedroom.

Oh shit.

“Jessy, she’s in here.”

Jessy came in after him, groaned, and sat down on the bed beside her. A stake stuck out from her heart, a classic wooden stake, though thin, and shiny. Laminated? Whatever it was, it didn’t smell like wood. Smelled like nothing.

Without ceremony, Jessy yanked out the stake and threw it away, hard. It dented the wall before it bounced on the hardwood floor.

Eric stood beside her, and waited. He’d have to do the talking for Jessy.

Natasha sat up with a jolt, and Eric tensed like someone had just thrown a bomb into the room. Guess they woke up from a staking the same way they woke up come dusk: violently.

“What, w-what’s going on!?” Natasha spun around on the bed, and Jessy ducked her head back seamlessly, dodging a near backhand to the face. “Jessy? Eric? I—”

Eric put up his hands. “Calm down. You’re in your apartment. We just pulled a stake out of you.” Sighing, he picked up the stake and showed it to her. “Sunrise isn’t far off.”

She stared at him like he’d just explained the world was ending. But slowly, her eyes drifted between him, the stake in his hand, and Jessy, still at her side.

“Jessy, you—”

“Her jaw is broken. She’s trying to avoid talking.”

“Yeah,” Jessy whispered, wincing as she did. “You ok?”

“I ... I’m fine, I guess. I...” Her eyes fell, and she stared at the bed. From looking like a surprise apocalypse had hit, to looking like her heart had just been ripped out by her boyfriends, was—oh shit.

“The boys did this to you?” he asked.

Natasha winced, and scrunched up the bed sheets in her hands. Slowly, she pulled them up to herself, half covering her legs, and she buried her face in them as they pulled over her knees.

“The ... the p-p-pack went to confront Maria.”

“Jessy shared some details with me on the way here,” he said. “Apparently, Damien sent out an alert when they arrived.”

“He was there?” she asked, lifting her head from her blanket and knees.

“Yeah. Jessy got the message, but we couldn’t do anything about it. Garry had us locked up.”

“W-Wh—”

Eric held up a hand. “Jessy will fill you in. But yeah, Garry wanted us out of the way while Avery dealt with Maria. Was hoping Avery and the gang would kill her, I suppose.”

“But she didn’t?”

“No. According to what Damien’s told Jessy in the past ten minutes, the werewolves kicked their asses, pretty badly. It was looking bad, but then Jack ... Jack showed up.” The room went silent. If Eric didn’t know better, he’d figure the temperature of the room dropped, cause he sure as hell felt ice prickling his skin. “Is he really that bad?” he asked. “I mean yeah, Jessy and I found him dealing with that ... giant ... spider monster ... solo.” Dumb question.

Jessy nodded, slow, and not because of the pain in her jaw.

“I ... I haven’t seen him cut loose myself,” Tash said, “b-but Antoinette and Elaine think he’s dangerous. Super dangerous. And you mean he, um, d-did that ... to Avery?”

“Nearly killed her and everyone else in the pack,” he said. That was probably not the best way to word it. Natasha looked at him, eyes so wide he could see the white around them, and he put up his hands. “Nearly. No one died.”

The relief on her was blatant. “Good.”

“Good?” he asked. “Because of Arturo and Matthew? They’re the ones that staked you.”

She nodded. “It was Avery’s order. She t-texted Arturo something, and they were leaving, and then he ... he got me.”

“I mean, I get that it’s not deadly to a vampire. But still, I figured you’d be—”

“I am angry,” she said, voice a lot steadier than he’d ever heard it. “I am. W-With Avery, and the boys. But ... not as angry as the Prince will be.”

---

Stupid idea? Stupid idea. His life in a nutshell.

Sighing, he walked back into the apartment building, back up the stairs, back down the hallway, and back up to Avery’s door. A small knock and a few seconds later, he was in the apartment with a dozen werewolves. No Garry, and no other vampires with guns this time either.

The pack looked like shit. For a second, he’d thought they’d gotten into a fight with a swarm of killer bees, considering every one of them was covered in red welts. But they weren’t welts, they were holes, many of them still bleeding. Bite marks?

It didn’t stop there. Broken limbs, broken fingers, gashes, giant bruises, the works. The whole group had been thoroughly trashed. Some of them looked on the verge of tears as they sat around, licking their wounds; metaphorically.

“Holy shit,” he said. “I—” Words stopped, and he stared hard at Clara, and her one arm.

She looked away and shook her head. “It’ll grow back. In ... in time. A month ... or two.”

One of the joys of being a supernatural creature, especially a werewolf. He wasn’t sure it made up for the apparent lifetime of strife, but still.

“What are you doing here?” Avery asked. She lay on the couch, TV off, with her head on the couch arm, and face looking up. It was barely a face. He’d seen lasagna with more defined facial features. “Looking for an apology?” Her words were a slurry mess, what with her destroyed and swollen lips and probably tongue, too.

“No. No, I figure you were doing what you thought you needed to do, so you could save the day.” Sighing, he looked between the group another time, and eventually his eyes settled on Matthew and Arturo. “How’s that working out for you?”

They looked away as well. Lot of guilt in the room. Except from Avery of course, who sat up and glared at him between puffy slits of red flesh for eye sockets.

“Might have gone better if you were there to help us.”

“Me? Why would I go?”

“Because if the Gauntlet comes down, this city goes down with it. Millions die. What about that aren’t you getting?”

“City’s been doing fine for hundreds of years.”

She shook her head. “Things are different now, and you fucking know it. The azlu showed up for a reason.” She gestured to David, and regretted it immediately, wincing and groaning before lying back down.

“So your plan is, what, to burn every bridge you’ve made?” he asked.

“Garry wouldn’t do anything he couldn’t recover from, politically. If he killed Jess, he’d start a war with the Invictus, and he’d be the bad guy. Can’t have that.”

Eric stepped around the couch and frowned down at her. “You mean that war he’s been slowly building up to, with Terra Den and the territory skirmishes?”

“Yeah, that war.” She shrugged, regretted that too, bit back a yelp, and relaxed back on the couch. “He promised me he wouldn’t kill you or Jessy.”

“He broke her jaw.”

“Like I fucking care.”

Muscles tightened, fingers curled into fists, and he glared down at the impulsive asshole as the wolf in him not-so-quietly suggested he kick her ass. It’d be easy right now, and dirty as hell.

“So what now? Maria’s still alive, and she’s going to want revenge.”

“Like I’m telling you anything.”

“You—”

“Eric, it’s obvious by now that you have no intention of joining the pack, or any pack. You’re a ghost wolf, and you’ve thrown your lot in with the vampires. That’s why Garry agreed to lock you up with Jessy for the night.”

He folded his arms across his chest, and glared. It wasn’t a good glare. He couldn’t muster up that kind of anger, put it all on the surface like that, like Avery could.

“I’m not a vampire. I’m not Invictus.”

“Sure. Whatever. Doesn’t matter. I’ll deal with Maria, or Garry will. I’ll do my fucking job cause it’s the reason I am what I am. It’s why Luna gave me this gift. And gave you this gift.” She gave him the finger — not the gift she was talking about — and relaxed on the couch as she closed her eyes. “The problem is Jack.”

Wait, Garry will? Shit. If Garry wanted to make a direct move on Maria, now would definitely be the time. But from what he knew of vampire politics, it'd be risky.

“Jack. He—”

“Is possessed by something evil as fuck,” she said. “He kicked our asses, and enjoyed every second of it. I got him good and he shrugged it off. Jesus, if something pisses that kid off in the wrong place, he's going to kill everyone.”

---

~~Natasha~~

Jessy rubbed her shoulders and hugged her. The two sat on Tash's couch, in silence, watching the news that was on mute. Kine news was borderline meaningless to them, but she didn't know what else to do.

“Should we get ice cream?” Jessy asked, barely moving her mouth as she did.

Natasha managed a small chuckle, but it was soft and weak, and died a second later.

“It's not a b-break up, Jessy. They ... they did what they did because Avery w-wanted me out of the way. Probably thought I'd interfere.” Avery was smart enough to know Tash was still on Maria's side. Which was wrong. Tash was on the side of the truth, on hunting evidence, on understanding that events occurred with details, nuance, and degrees of granularity. People like Avery and their ‘stop something at all costs’ attitude were a menace. And stupid. The bitch was smart, and stupid, and that made her dangerous.

“Then they coulda just gone and did their thing without telling you! Staking you is crossing a line, Tash.” Jessy shook her head, groaned in pain, and then shook Natasha, softly. “Dump their asses. Then we can rent a few romance revenge movies and binge.”

Tash rolled her eyes, and leaned her head into Jessy’s shoulder. Much as Jessy was basically a man in a woman’s body, she tried to do the girly girl thing, even if all she had were clichés.

“They might have d-done it anyway,” Tash said, anger bubbling up, “even if Avery hadn’t t-told them to. Art and Matt, they ... p-probably thought I needed to be protected from what was going to happen.”

“You don’t need protecting! You were a Right Hand of the Invictus. You—”

“They weren’t p-protecting me from getting hurt. They were protecting me from ... from seeing something b-bad happen. M-Maybe to them, maybe to Maria.” And that, she had to admit, was a genuine concern. Natasha knew her strengths and weaknesses, and seeing horrible things happen to people was definitely something she struggled with.

“Bullshit. You’re stronger than that, Tash. You can handle things others can’t. Just because you haven’t turned into a hardass doesn’t mean they’ve got something you don’t. If anything, it’s the shitheads like Maria that are broken. They’ve lost something that you haven’t.”

Natasha smiled. Jessy was half right, and it felt nice to hear it, even if it was all mumbled.

“As m-much as I’d like to hang and watch movies, I need t-to report back to the Prince. And it’ll be sunrise soon.”

“Gonna tell her what the boys did?”

“It w-was Avery’s order. I have to.” And she might have told her even if Avery hadn’t given the order. What the boys did, it wasn’t just a huge violation of her trust, it was a huge strike against the Ordo Dracul in Dolareido. It was bigger than her, and she wasn’t stupid enough to think her personal feelings on the matter meant she could hide what happened.

“Damn. Shit is gonna hit the fan. Carter and Clara are definitely losing their apartments.”

“We need more information. We—” Her laptop, sitting on the nightstand beside her, rang. Jack’s avatar came up.

“Speak of the devil.”

Nodding, Tash accepted the call. Both women winced openly.

Jack sat in front of the screen, leaning back in a nice leather chair, one elbow on its arm and his forehead resting in his palm and fingers. Two crows sat upon his shoulders.

For a single, fleeting moment, Tash thought he looked like a king, a weary king, one who’d come back from war with its scars on his person and soul. Certainly on his person. He was covered from head to toe in cuts, and four huge gashes ran from his neck to his pelvis, deep enough the girls could see his insides.

Jessy leaned in over Tash’s shoulder, and groaned like she was in pain. Sympathy pain, probably. “Jack! Holy fucking shit dude, what happened?” And then she groaned in real pain from her jaw.

The boy sighed, eyes still hidden in his left palm, while his right hand found his buzzed hair and rubbed. Blood, everywhere, and not his own.

“Yeah, I did,” Jessy said. “But Garry had me and Eric held up. Didn’t want us interfering with whatever happened.” She frowned and rubbed her face. “Fucker broke my jaw. Only just got it working. God, you have no idea how much this hurts.”

Slowly, Jack revealed one of his eyes between his fingers, and stared at Jessy. She stared back. And they started laughing. Which of course ended quickly for both vampires, Jack clutching his gut with his other hand and groaning, while Jessy held her jaw and copied the sound.

“He let you go though?” Jack asked.

“Yeah, after Avery did whatever she planned to do. Which, from Damien’s text, you put a stop to.”

“Yeah, I guess. You ok Tash? You’re looking kinda ... I don’t know.”

She nodded and looked down. “It’s ... um ... the boys, they ... staked me, b-before they joined Avery.” It hurt saying it. It hurt more, seeing her friend’s eyes furrow with rage.

“Jesus. Avery’s order?”

“Y-Yeah.”

“Well, I ... the curse beat her face into a pulp, if that makes you feel any better.”

“Y-You know what? It does.” She nodded sagely, earning a warm chuckle from the woman beside her.

“Damien didn’t go into much detail in his texts,” Jessy said, “just that you stopped Avery and kicked their asses. But he also said some things went down that were pretty bad. Wanna elaborate?”

He groaned again, and rubbed his forehead in his palm. “Maria knows that I killed Lucas.”

Tash froze. “What? H-How?”

“The curse told her. To fuck with me.”

“What a fucking asshole!” Jessy said. “But, I mean, it’s not like Maria can just kill you anymore, right? You got that curse protecting you.”

Jack peeked through his fingers again, and looked to Jessy, hidden weight pressing his whole body into the chair harder than it had a moment before.

“Yeah. Until that situation gets sorted, I’m gonna sleep here at the Prince’s. I’ll talk to Michael tomorrow night.”

Jessy shook her head. “Dude, you’re gonna need at least a week to —”

“I know, I know. But it has to be done, before Michael does something ... uninformed.” Sighing, the young man closed his eyes, and they disappeared behind his fingers again as he cradled his forehead. “And things get worse.”

“Course they fucking do.”

“We can’t trust Jacob.”

Tash blinked, and looked back at Jessy before Jack again. “Um, I d-don’t think any of us trust Jacob.”

“Dial it up to eleven, cause I’m convinced Black Blood and him are up to something.”

“B-But, what about your mom?”

He shook his head again. “Don’t tell her. I’ll talk with Antoinette about it, and I know she’ll agree. Telling Mom will only tip him off.”

Every time Jack got involved in anything, the weight on his shoulders grew. Now, he looked like he was being crushed by a mountain, face still half hidden behind his hand, while his other gripped the arm of the chair like he wanted to kill it.

“He ... he seems to like her, Jack,” Tash said.

“I think he does, too. But you and I both know elders will sacrifice almost anything to reach their goals. No offense to Daniel or Antoinette, but Jacob is the most dangerous vampire in this city. The fucker is too smart, and underneath all that Joker bullshit, I know he’s a calculating villain, playing for the long game.”

Sighing, Tash nodded, Jessy did too, and Tash leaned in. “Um, Art and Matt ... are they...”

“Clara and Avery got the worst of it. Art and Matt took a decent amount of damage from silver, from Damien, but they’ll be fine. Not sure how long it takes werewolves to recover from silver damage, but if it’s anything like vamps and fire, they’ll probably need a few weeks or more.”

Sighing heavier, she leaned back into Jessy. “I ... I guess I should be happy about that.”

“Nah,” Jack said. “I get it. And I saw the looks in their eyes. They looked guilty as all hell. Clara did too, considering she bit off Damien’s leg.” Both women winced audibly. “And I ... the curse, he ... tore off Clara’s arm.” They winced louder. “Far as I know, werewolves can regrow limbs, right?”

Tash nodded. “Y-Yeah. She’ll be fine! D-Don’t worry.” Her words didn’t seem to help much. The poor man sighed, and Tash struggled to not wince again as she watched the flesh through his gashes rise and fall. “She ... she won’t blame you.”

“Sure about that?” He lifted his head and leaned back in the chair, and Tash could practically see the weights tied around his neck. “I ripped her arm off, Tash.”

“You didn’t! The curse did.”

Slowly, his fingers found the necklace he wore, and gently fiddled with it as he looked down.

“I could make some sort of comparison I suppose, between me and an owner with a dog. Who’s to blame if the dog bites someone? But it’s a pretty weak comparison.” He shrugged, and groaned for the effort.

Tash didn’t believe him. He thought it was an accurate comparison. Or, he felt it was accurate, even if he knew it wasn’t. Guilt was a horrible thing.

“Jack,” she said softly. “I ... can I talk them? The Uratha. I want to ... I d-don’t know, see if there was anything I could have d-done.”

“I’d give them their space for now, Tash. After tonight, shit’s gonna happen. You say Garry held you hostage, Jessy?”

“Yeap.”

“Then we have no choice but to assume Garry and Avery are working together. Now that Maria’s injured and out of the way, I fully expect Garry to make a move on the Invictus, and he’ll use Avery.”

“How?” Jessy asked. “Not like Avery’s gonna agree to join a covenant war.”

“She still thinks Maria’s up to something. Until I convince her otherwise, she’ll consider Maria and the Lancea et Sanctum to be overt enemies. And we know Michael will back Maria. Then there’s the whole thing with Terra Den and Xnomina, and...” He looked up, took another deep breath that showed his insides, and hardened his gaze as he looked back to the two of them. “Shit’s going to hit the fan, Jessy. And honestly, I’m not sure the Prince is going to do anything about it.”

Jessy got up and paced circles around the couch and nightstand. “Why didn’t Garry just kill me, then?”

“Cause he’s gotta play this right. If he oversteps, the Prince and the sheriff will call bullshit and interfere. And it’ll be hard for Garry to convince all the Carthians to go to war if he starts it with a sucker punch. But if he can get the Carthians and the Invictus to slowly boil up to more violent skirmishes, well, we’ll be at each other’s throats before we know it.”

Jack was right. Vampires weren’t soldiers, or robots. They were loners who only wanted to be left alone so they could feed and fuck. Garry couldn’t just say ‘fight!’ and have a hundred Carthians throw themselves into a might grinder. Lucas only managed that using a strange, magical influence from Tony’s old den. A loci, according to Antoinette.

But the Carthians and the Invictus already hated each other. If Garry built up the situation and got everyone on board through time and circumstances, then they’d fight for him, like they did against the Lancea et Sanctum. And if he built up the situation over time, like the Cuban Missile Crisis, the Prince would have a hard time saying either covenant was specifically at fault. She’d default to a neutral position, as long as the covenants didn’t damage the Masquerade or her city.

Jessy sighed and nodded as she paced. “And with Maria and Damien out of the way for a while, and you too for that matter, Garry has the room to push a little harder, all without ever making himself look the bad guy.”

“Yeap,” Jack said. “I’m guessing in the next week, he’s gonna incite some violence over some territory the Invictus have had for a while, that you guys probably took from the Carthians in the past decade or so. Something he can claim rightfully belongs to the Carthians.” He leaned toward the camera, the motion enough to have Tash frowning and looking away from his torn open torso. “And if he starts a war, you know what Michael is gonna ask me to do.”

Tash didn’t meet his gaze. Slowly, she nodded, and leaned back on her couch.

If the Carthians and Invictus actually went to war, Michael would ask Jack to kill Garry.

~~Damien~~

Matthias lay beside Maria’s coffin, unconscious, drained, and happy. Maria lay within, its door open, and the coffin upright against the wall.

“Secure, sir,” one of the thralls said. A woman in an Invictus suit, with an ear piece and sunglasses. She looked ridiculous wearing sunglasses inside, but the Invictus generally preferred when their trained thralls and ghouls all looked the same.

He nodded, leaning on his crutch. “Very well. Leave us.”

The thrall raised a brow, visible over her glasses, before she looked to Maria. Maria nodded, as Damien knew she would. The thrall, realizing her mistake not trusting the word and obeying the command of a Right Hand, gulped, nodded to Damien, and left.

The place was still a mess, but the blood had been wiped up, area bleached and coated in other cleansing chemicals, and emergency repairs made to Maria's gates. It'd be safe to sleep in. Maybe not as much as before, but enough for one night at least, especially now that Maria's specialist ghouls sat within the tunnel, fully armed.

Sighing, Damien hobbled over to the coffin, and stood there, eyes downcast.

"Madam Turio," he said.

"Mister Burksen," she said.

"I..." He frowned, still looking down. What to say? How to say it? "I..." Coming up with what to say was a part of the problem. He'd left Maria in the dark too long, and trying to come up with a convenient explanation for everything felt hollow and wrong. "I'll ... be honest with you, about anything you ask. Swear upon the Lord, Longinus, and my soul."

She stared at him, expression unreadable. Angry? Sad? Disappointed? He'd have an easier time reading a stone wearing a mask.

"Mi ... Damien. You fought well tonight."

He lifted his head, and stared at her. And for the first time probably in the woman's life, she looked away first, unable to hold his gaze.

"You don't want to know about what happened that night?"

"What's there to tell, Damien? That ... Ripper creature made it clear. Jack, forever surprising us, managed to ... defeat a Kindred fifty times as old as he, in a battle of wills?” Sighing, she shook her head again. “The boy is a marvel, but there are limits. No, if Jack managed to break your will, then your will was compromised beforehand.”

“It—”

“Compromised by Lucas and his insanity, Damien. You lost faith in him, because he no longer deserved your faith.” She shifted in her coffin a little, and snarled in pain; probably tried to lift the arms she didn’t have. “He’d become a twisted man, and you saw that. He dragged you into Hell, and you went, despite your wavering faith. And in the end, it was a weakness Jack exploited. Am I correct so far?”

“Y ... Yes, Maria.” He looked down and squirmed in his shoes. Shoe. “In a way, it is—”

“It is not your fault Lucas died, Damien. And it is not Jack’s.” Pain wracked her voice, causing it waver, as if she were about to cry. “Lucas, and Lucas alone, bears the weight of his demise.”

Damien came closer, and forced himself to look Maria in the eyes. She was about to cry. If she’d been Blushing Life, tears would have touched her cheeks.

“You won’t kill Jack?”

“Of course not. I ... I am not some mindless, emotional woman, lost to reason in the wake of grief. I...” She shook her head. “Please, close my coffin and leave m—”

“Maria.” He interrupted her, and that was not something you did to an elder, especially Maria. “Why weren’t your ghouls here tonight?”

“What? Matthias—”

“Not him.” He gestured past him, down to the tunnel to the ghouls armed with rifles, too far to hear the two vampires speak. “Them. Your day guard. You knew the Uratha were a danger. You knew they’d come for you eventually. And yet you ... didn’t prepare.”

She slowly lifted her gaze to him, and it melted away in shame.

“I have my reasons.”

Sighing, he came in closer again, until his feet almost touched the bottom of her coffin.

“Maria. I saw the look in your eyes, when you asked me to leave. You were happy I was willing to stay, but you also wanted me to go.”

“I—”

“Don’t.” He leaned in closer, and grabbed the edge of her coffin with his free hand. It was a huge, heavy thing, black and filled with white lining, and as scary as Maria looked, it fit her well, like a vampire throne. Except now, it looked less a throne, and more a true coffin. “Just don’t. You were hoping they’d kill you, weren’t you?”

She didn’t have to say it. Her body sagged, and the once proud and mighty Nosferatu lowered her gaze again.

“Damien, do not pry. My business is my own.”

He snorted. “Bullshit.” Her gaze snapped up, but he held his stare. “Maria, if it wasn’t for you, my dreams would be dead and I’d be eating out of the palms of the Invictus for scraps. If it wasn’t for you, I wouldn’t know a damn thing about how music, or history, or ... what women want.” Because for some reason, their conversations often drifted in that direction. “I fought to keep you alive tonight, and it wasn’t for any covenant reason. I stuck around, even when you said I could leave, because I genuinely wanted to keep you alive. By God, Natasha wants to keep you alive!”

That earned a few blinks of surprise from the armless woman.

“She does?”

“Yes! She’s been trying to convince the Uratha that you’re innocent of their concerns for weeks. Matthew and Arturo had to stake her tonight, cause they knew she’d interfere.” Hopefully Tash wouldn’t mind him sharing some of the info he’d gotten from her latest texts tonight.

“How horrible.” Her expression didn’t match her words. Much as she was depressed and distraught, knowing that Tash had been trying to help her managed to edge a tiny smile onto the corners of her lips. “I had no idea, about Natasha. She asked about Lucas before, and ... and what things I might do, but I didn’t realize she’d vouch for me.”

“Maria, you are a scary woman. Most of the city is terrified of you. But no one wants you gone. You’ve never earned anyone’s ire, except for that asshole Garry. Why ... why would you let yourself die?”

“Because! Because ... I am tired, Damien. I am tired of this life. I am tired of this Nosferatu curse, and looking like a corpse. I am tired of struggling against other Kindred like Garry Tones, or the Prince. I am tired of ... being alone.”

His turn to look down and away from her gaze. “I ... I don’t know how anyone will be able to replace my sire for you.” She wasn’t wrong. She looked like a corpse pulled out of a river. Only another Nosferatu could ever form a sexual bond with her, or someone strange like Lucas. “But that doesn’t mean there isn’t one. And that doesn’t mean you can’t have friends, like me.”

After a heavy, long sigh, she leaned her head back against the cushion of the coffin, and closed her eyes. “You are right, of course. I ... will not be so reckless with my life in the future, Damien.”

“Thank you.” Unfortunately, a short conversation wasn’t going to solve all of Maria’s troubles. A century of talking wouldn’t.

“And ... thank you, Damien, for ... for more than simply standing with me tonight. I have ... enjoyed our time together.” Her smile grew into something almost reaching genuine contentment. “Do not think that because I have lost my arms, and piano, that you are to stop practicing.”

His frown faded, replaced by a smile to match Maria’s. “I won’t.”

Perhaps a short conversation could do more than he thought it could?

---

“Damien! I—what the fuck!? The fuck happened to ye?”

“Werewolves happened.”

Fiona gasped. “Eric?”

“No, the others. They attacked Maria. I was there.”

“What the fuck? Did—”

“No one died. And I can tell you more tomorrow night.” He sat down on the edge of his apartment bed, set the crutch aside, and the moment he did, the weight of his body pulled him down onto his apartment blankets. All energy, gone.

“Sunrise is in twenty minutes,” she said.

“I know. I ... I asked you over, because I need a drink.”

“Ha! Ye silly dobber. No need to dance around it.” She smiled down at him, standing in front of him by the bed, and looked him up and down. Slowly, the smile faded, and her eyes rested on the lump where his leg should have been. He’d changed his suit, and had folded up the pant leg and tied it off at the missing stump, halfway down his thigh.

“It’ll grow back,” he said. “And—” He stopped himself as he watched her. Every second, her eyes grew heavier, and heavier, until she stared at the floor. Her shoulders quivered, and her breathing cut short with a few, quiet rasps. “Fiona, are you ... are you crying?”

“Aye! Of course I’m cryin’, ye wankstain!” She plopped down on the bed hard enough he bounced. He almost hissed or groaned in pain, but bit it down. Fiona never cried, and he didn’t want to interrupt.

“We were nae dating back then!” Tears ran down her cheeks, and Damien stared, speechless. “And ... and I ahways have tae smile! Cause if ah didnae smile, no one would smile. ‘N folk keep getting hurt, ‘n... ‘n ... ya didnae call me!”

He stared at her, processing. Fiona, crying. Fiona, accent as powerful as it got when she was drunk, but there was no smell of alcohol on her.

“I only had time to trigger my emergency app. Auto message to Jessie and Jack. I—”

She backhanded his shoulder. Not with any real power, but with the strength of a weeping little girl. It hurt more.

“Everyone’s ahways fighting! I’m trying tae be positive, ye ken? Ahways smiling. But every time I look, someone’s hurt, and now tis ye!” She grabbed the arm she’d hit, and hugged it tight to her side. “I left home cause I knew, if I stayed, folk would get hurt.”

“You said you left because nothing happened there, and there wasn’t much to eat.” She’d also implied it was a boring as hell little Scottish town, but better to not say it.

“Aye, and that’s true, but ... but I knew, ye ken? I knew, around me, folk would get hurt. I didnae want that! I came here cause Dolareido was supposed to be fun, and ... and no one I knew would get hurt. And...”

She wept. From perfectly calm, even happy one moment, to a fountain of tears the next. Not happy then, fake happiness? Or maybe she had been, but the reality hit her too hard this time for her to keep it at bay? He didn’t know. She wasn’t as simple as she appeared, or as dumb as she pretended to be, and the more he learned about her, the more he was convinced she didn’t know how complex or smart she was either.

He slipped his arm out of her grip, onto her shoulders, and hugged her close to his side.

“I won’t be dying any time soon, Fiona,” he whispered. “The hunters are gone. That threat has passed. Avery was put in her place by Jack. That threat is ... under control.”

“But, I hear Garry and the Invictus are gonna have a go?”

“They might, yeah. But if that happens, I can handle it.”

“And the tears! Azamel still says someone’s up to something! Dolareido could—”

He hugged her tighter, and she twisted so she could wrap her arms around him. Seeing him without a leg triggered something in her, made everything more real for her, like he was a soldier come home from war. What to say to her, then? Fiona was young, and despite the huge burden she had to carry with being Begotten, still young at heart. Amazing as she was, maybe he needed to say something a little softer?

She laughed between her sobs, and buried her face into the side of his chest. “Liar.”

Ok, maybe not that.

“I ... I’m not going to go anywhere, Fiona. I’m not going to die.”

“But—”

“And if shit happens again, I’ll make sure to message you, ok? We can set up a system, like Tash and Jessy have. If Azamel lets you.”

“Azamel is ... is nae going to be around much longer.”

And there was that. The only parental figure Fiona had in the city was dying. Her world was being turned upside down over and over, and seeing him lose a leg probably snapped whatever foundation she’d felt comfortable building.

“Then we can talk with Sándor. Cause if ... if I’d known...” If he’d known she would react this strongly to seeing him hurt again, he might have taken Maria’s offer to just walk, cause he couldn’t have Fiona cry like this, never again. If he’d known Fiona was this ... this... “I love you, Fiona.”

She froze. The sobbing stopped, and her arms stopped squeezing. She didn’t pull away, but she’d turned into a statue.

“Yer ... yer just saying that to make feel better, about ye nearly dying.”

“No. I’m not.”

“Yer ... just being nice, cause I’m crying like a baby.”

“That’s not the reason either.” He turned his head and put a kiss in her big, frizzy red hair. Maria was a big part of the reason he’d said the words. She’d helped him see Fiona in a new light. And, honestly, seeing Fiona now, crying, over something very real, helped him see her differently again.

“I ... I...” She rubbed her face into his chest, and squeezed him again. “I think I do, too.”

Relief flooded him, but a moment later, he laughed. She pulled away, frowning at him.

“Sorry! Sorry. Just ... think?”

“Aye! Think! I’m nae some old bawbag like ye.” She buried her face in his side again, and this time hit him with her forehead a few times. “I dinnae know what ... what it feels like, ye ken?”

He closed his eyes, let her hit him with her head a few times, and a few times more, before he hugged her tight to his side. He set his cheek on her hair, and rubbed her arm.

“It feels like ... like, you want to hold them tight in some desperate need to be so close that it’s impossible. It feels like, you want them around you all the time, even just sitting near them. You want to hear their voice, all the time. It feels like you want to touch their body every night. And it feels like ... if you saw them wounded, you’d find yourself bawling uncontrollable tears. You wouldn’t be able to help yourself. If they hurt ... you hurt.”

That quickly went from soft to not soft, but it seemed to work. Fiona burst into loud sobs again, and hugged him even tighter.

“Aye! Tis like that.”

He smiled into her hair, and grit his teeth against the pain. He had half a femur, and all the flesh around it was just a chewed up lump. It hurt, immensely, but holding the crying little redhead was far more important. The moment was too meaningful to let something as meaningless as pain ruin it. He didn't want it to end. Anything, he'd give anything, if he could keep holding her like this.

But sunrise was coming. Fiona, sniffing, pushed him onto his back, helped him get settled, and set her neck to his lips. Despite the rush, the thrill, the intoxicating impact of her monster blood on him, and despite his need to stay up and talk with his ... his love, he succumbed to his daily sleep.

~~Jack~~

Elaine smiled, finger waved, and left, leaving him alone with Antoinette in her master bedroom.

He collapsed onto the bed, naked, and dragged himself toward its center, before collapsing again. Even with a stomach full of fresh blood, he felt like total shit. His wounds had closed enough that his insides weren't visible anymore, thanks to the meal, but he could feel how fucked his innards were.

He could also feel how quickly he was healing. Ventrue and Gangrel were tougher than other blood clans, harder to injure, and could generally regenerate faster than the other blood clans. Gangrels especially, considering how easily they could morph their bodies with Protean. And Jack was probably healing faster than Michael could. The curse was a scary fucker.

Sighing, he touched the necklace around his neck, and shook his head. "Not taking this off anytime soon."

"Oh?" Antoinette said, sat nearby at her vanity desk. He couldn't see her, with his eyes pointed at the dark marble ceiling.

“Oh? You ... you talked to him, Antoinette. Twice now. You know how fucking horrible he is.”

Her sigh was audible.

“Oui, quite. But he also accomplished something tonight I fear you could not have done on your own.”

He almost yelled a retort, but after a few seconds to think about it, he laughed. She was baiting him. “Yeah, ok, Emperor.”

“Quoi?” She chuckled softly. Yeap, he’d caught her leading the conversation. Tricksy Prince.

“You know if I rely on this curse thing, until I can’t function without him, my journey toward the Dark Side will be complete.” He shook his head and spread his arms, still staring at the ceiling. “I have to get rid of him, before that happens. And if I find myself in that sort of situation again, I’ll talk my way out of it, instead of using my fists.” Not that he thought words would have worked tonight, but stranger things had happened.

“Ah. Forever thinking ahead, my love.”

“I guess, yeah.”

Movements in the bed, indents and shifting sheets, announced Antoinette’s approach. Slowly, she sank onto the sheets beside him, naked as well, and kissed his cheek.

“The necklace works well, then, if you had to remove it.”

“It does, thank god. But it’s not a perfect solution. The only perfect solution is just getting rid of him.”

“The Ripper.”

“Oh god please don’t. He doesn’t deserve a name.”

“Agreed.” Nodding, she cuddled into his side, careful with her arm, and kissed his neck. “For all the horrors that happened tonight, no one died.”

“Yet. Garry’s going to take advantage of this situation, and people are going to die.”

“Perhaps. But it has not happened yet. Peaceful resolutions have been found in more hectic situations. Do not lose hope.”

He turned his head, and met her third kiss, eyes closed. It would have been awesome if he could just ask her to deal with Garry for him, but she’d say no. It wasn’t her place, and it didn’t make sense for her covenant goals.

“I hurt Clara.”

“Oh, my dear Jack.”

“I ... ripped off one of her arms.” He knew she knew, but she hadn’t mentioned it yet. And he had to talk about it.

Antoinette sighed, and nuzzled her cheek against the top of his head. “It must have been horrible.”

“It ... it was, yeah. The curse was driving, and he ... fucking brutalized them.” The sound of snapping bone, shrieking werewolves being eaten alive, and the sensation of Avery’s face collapsing over and over to his fists, it was all burned into his memory. But the worst of it, was the look on Clara’s face, when she saw him get back up from the remains of the piano, turned.

“She will regrow the limb. Uratha are resilient.”

“Thank god. If I’d permanently fucked her like that, I—”

“The curse did that to her. Not you.”

“Yeah, yeah I know.”

Nodding, she sat up, twisted a bit to look down at him, and smiled. “I admit, I am somewhat relieved.”

“Relieved?”

“For such a horrible thing to occur, for the curse to unleash itself upon the Uratha, and for Maria and Avery to confront each other so, and yet no one perished? And better still, the necklace works better than I originally thought. I know there are many trials ahead, and that Dolareido suffers inevitable mayhem not seen since I enacted the purge. But all things considered, tonight could have ended so much worse, my love. Do not be so hard on yourself.”

“And Maria?”

Her face drifted down, and she sighed as she traced her fingers down his chest, softly, careful of his wounds. “I will speak with her privately. But I suspect it will not go as badly as you believe.”

“Uh, I killed the love of her life, Antoinette. She—”

“She knows what sort of man Lucas had become. Give the woman some credit, Jack, she is wise.”

He held up three fingers. “Three, Antoinette. Three elders, off their rockers with madness, have nearly killed me. Lucas, Tony, Viktor.”

She laughed. Such a nice sound, despite its almost villainous tone. She just had that sort of voice. “Maria is different. I will speak with her, I promise. And if I must, I will extend my protection to you officially as the Prince, since you killed Lucas in my defense.”

That was an interesting political angle. Antoinette had to be careful with whatever things she did as Prince; making enemies of both Invictus and the Carthians at the same time could get her killed. But, if she could make any decision she made seem reasonable, arguably defensible, then she could interfere with their business without risking her political position.

The Danse Macabre was such a pain in the ass.

“And Avery? She’s not happy I interfered.”

“You did, but you also let her live. She would be overstepping herself if she attacked you. And with the curse—”

She frowned, a subtle expression, and she set a finger on his chin. “I want to be rid of it as much as you, my little Ventrue, but while it remains a tool, it would be foolish to discount it. A logical man such as yourself understands the value in accounting for all assets, yes?”

Damn, she was smart, using his own habits against him.

“Yes.”

“Indeed.” With a wicked smile, she traced the gashes on his chest; closed, but the discolored skin showed where they were. “And do not think that because I am Prince, that I would let tragedy befall you, even if it were an inconvenience to my position.”

“Uh, you saying you’d fight Garry?”

“Non. I am saying that I would not let him kill you, and I would officially remove you from the conflict, if he somehow managed to defeat you.”

He couldn’t help but grin at that. “So, dead as far as the covenants would be concerned, but not actually dead.”

“Exactly.”

“And sort of ... your prisoner, I guess?”

“Mmm. Precisely.” Grinning again, she leaned back in closer, and this time made sure to softly press her breasts against his side, a bit of her weight on his shoulder. She caressed his buzzed hair, and instantly, he melted. “Tomorrow night, you should take some time to speak with Veronica, and introduce her to your home. I will speak with Maria.”

“And ... and Tash, she—”

“She has informed me of what transpired. I will be speaking with the Uratha about that as well. Make no mistake, they harmed one of my dragons, and there will be consequences. But for now, worry not. Sleep.” He couldn’t see her mouth too well with how close she was, but he was sure he saw a smile there, absolutely serpentine.

Sighing, he nodded, and felt himself drift away as sunrise came. And as soothing as her touch was, he couldn’t get Clara’s screams out of his head.

His daily torpor had not been fun. Lot of nightmares, swirling images of Damien and Maria getting torn up by werewolves, and of Clara, getting her arm ripped off. Him, ripping it off. Other images hit him too, like what he’d done to David’s mind, and when he’d turned Avery’s face into pulp, but it was Clara’s face that kept coming back, over and over, haunting him.

The curse, Ripper, whatever, didn’t have to hurt her like that. She’d regenerate the limb, but that didn’t mean he had to fucking rip it off. Totally unnecessary. The curse had done it to spite him. And he’d told Maria about Lucas, to make Jack rely on him.

Well, it wouldn’t work. Fucking jackass.

He got into an Invictus car with his new thrall to be, and soon, they stood at the door of his mansion.

“This is really yours?” Veronica struggled to stay standing, because she was still low on blood from yesterday, but also because she looked up and up and up until she almost fell over. Big, tall building.

“Yeah. Viktor Honors owned it, my grandsire, Elaine’s childe.”

“Child?”

“Childe, with an E at the end. Elaine sired him.”

“Oh right! I get it.” She nodded, rubbing her hands together nervously.

“Viktor died, then his childe Julias Mire, my sire, gained it. Then ... he died, to some hunters. You uh, may have heard about it on the news, about crows swarming a hospital.”

“Oh my god, that was your sire?”

He set a hand against the door, and half laughed, half sighed, as he looked down, shaking his head. “That was me.”

“No way. No way! You—” She squeaked and jumped back as two crows swooped down out of nowhere. And of course, low on blood as she was, she fell. But Jack caught her, snapping his hand out and catching her wrist.

“Yeah, me,” he said. Mulder and Scully cawed a few questions at him as they settled on his shoulders. “I’m alright, I’m alright. Still pretty torn up, but the cu ... I heal quick.” Nodding to no one, he let go of Veronica’s wrist, offered her an assuring smile, and pushed the door open.

The entrance of the mansion was absurdly fancy, with the giant chandelier and the enormous staircase with curve railings, and red curtains and some giant paintings, all the beautiful Victorian stuff. Except the dust, that sucked.

“This is yours? I ... I can’t even imagine how much this would cost. In this economy!”

Laughing, Jack hobbled over to the stairs clutching his stomach, sat down, and pulled some oats out for his friends. They pecked away, and Veronica stared at the two birds as much as the mansion around her.

“I was barely earning more than minimum wage over three years ago, Veronica. Now I ... well, salary isn’t really a thing. The Invictus pay me, but there’s the Xnomina corp, and contracts that I affect as a Right Hand, and—” He stopped himself, and laughed again. God, Julias had info bombed him the first week of his life as a vampire, because he knew Jack liked that. Jack should probably go slower with someone he didn’t really know. “I’ll ease you into it. All you have to do for now is clean this place.”

“By myself? It’s, uh ... pretty big.”

“No. I’ll be recruiting more thralls into service, but for a little while at least, you’ll be on your own.” Mulder flapped her wings at Veronica, and Jack chuckled as he nudged his head into the bird’s body. “Calm down. She’s my employee.” Slave. The word was slave. A happy, well-treated slave, and soon to be well-paid slave, but a slave, bound to the Vinculum. Never forget that she’s human, Jack, and you’re not.

He really shouldn’t have been so hard on himself about it. He gave her a fair deal. Memory wipe, or become a thrall. But it still ate at him.

“Can they understand you?” She stepped in a little closer, eyes on the birds. No disgust, but plenty of apprehension.

“Crows are damn smart.”

“Uh, not that smart.”

He laughed and nodded. “Vampires have lots of special abilities, like being able to talk with certain types of animals.”

Her eyes went wide. “Really?”

This, was strangely fun. She was so new, and innocent, but also interested, and smart enough to figure things out, to understand implication and impact. Antoinette knew what she was doing, picking Veronica for him.

“There are five types of vampires,” he said, and he held up five fingers. “Well, probably more, but most cities have five, including Dolareido. Ventrue like myself are naturals at Animalism, speaking with animals and controlling them, and Resilience; we’re damn hard to kill. But all the blood clans can do these things, too, just not as well.” Well, Gangrels were naturals at those things too, but no need to confuse her yet. “An ability unique to Ventrue, however, is Dominate. Which is ... brainwashing, essentially.”

She gasped, but didn’t recoil. If anything, she only grew more intrigued.

“Wow. Um, is that what you’re doing to me?”

He winced, but quickly wiped the expression away. He was the vampire, she was the thrall. Maybe some day he’d embrace her, or another Kindred would, her Vinculum would be broken in her first death, and she would rise a vampire in her second life. But for now, she was human.

“No.” He pressed his thumb to his wrist hard enough to pierce his skin, and a small effort of will brought his dark blood to the surface. “Any vampire can create a Vinculum between thrall or ghoul, and master. Serve me well, and your future will be limitless.” No wonder Julius didn’t like doing this. It felt very vampire-y, like, the dark kinda things vampires did. The sort of things the Beast wanted to do.

She beamed at the sight of his blood, leaned in, and kissed it off his wrist. A second later, she groaned, and her eyes fluttered. If he didn’t know better, he’d think she’d just shot heroin.

“Why ... why does it taste so good?”

“One of the great mysteries,” he said, smile subtle. “Be careful what you drink. My blood won’t make you immune to the blood of other vampires.” Nodding, he slowly slid his finger back along the wound, and the skin closed underneath the finger, like a magic trick. Predictably, Veronica gasped, and he outright laughed. She was fun.

She smiled at him, and her eyes lingered. There it was, the haze of the Vinculum. Another dose and she’d be completely bound, and willing to do nearly anything he asked. Hell, two doses was apparently enough to have her physically interested in him. Very interested. If he asked her to call him master, strip, and give him a blow job right now, she probably would, and enjoy doing it.

There was definitely a thrill in that. Thrill in being the master, and he could see she’d find thrill in being the submissive. But no thrill was going to tempt him to cheat on Antoinette. And, knowing Antoinette, she’d invite Veronica into their bed eventually anyway, inevitably satisfying his new thrall’s sexual desires.

Jack leaned back, and looked his thrall up and down a few times. Which immediately got her blushing, and she looked away as she rubbed her hands. Sure, he’d used an assertive gaze, but her response was so damn strong. No wonder some Kindred acquired a bunch of thralls and ghouls, and just spent all their time fucking and feeding on them.

He got up, scratched Scully and Mulder behind the head, and walked toward a side hall. “Come with me.” Talking assertively, commandingly, it came naturally to him. No mental effort required, he just opened his mouth, and the once young, human Jack vanished, replaced by the Ventrue. It felt good to be in charge.

“Where we going?”

“A tour of the mansion. And then a tour of my sleeping cell.”

She jogged up to catch up to him, and walked beside him and slightly behind. A glance back showed her eyes on the birds, a smile of wonder still on her face.

“Wait, cell?”

---

“Oh my god, you have a dungeon.”

She chuckled. He didn’t. Slowly, he gestured to the cells. His own room wasn’t in this particular wing of the underground labyrinth, but its tunnel was connected to this one’s, making it a good opportunity to show her the dark side of being a vampire.

“I have no plans to ever mistreat you, or any other kine, Veronica,” he lied. Never mistreat her, sure, but how many kine had he killed so far? “But not all Kindred are like me or my sire. Julias’s sire, Viktor, was a brutal man. He tortured and killed hundreds of kine to death over the decades, right here in these cells.”

“Jesus.” Her eyes went wide, and she took a small step back from the cell, and from him, too.

Mulder and Scully cawed a few times. They felt it, the death, the horrible things that coated the walls, invisible but permanent.

“Don’t worry, he’s gone,” he whispered.

“Um, what?”

“Talking to my friends.” He pet the heads of each bird again, before he stopped and looked at one cell. “You don’t have anything to fear from me, Veronica, at least not me consciously. But all vampires can do”—nasty shit that will give you nightmares for the rest of your life—“horrible things, when the circumstances are right. So, always be on your guard, Veronica, even from me.”

He glanced over his shoulder to her, past Mulder, and found a scared, and intrigued woman. Scared was good. Intrigued, not so much.

“You’re, uh, kinda scary for a little guy, sir. Um, no offense!”

He laughed and shrugged. She’d made him laugh, that was good. Great, even.

“It’s ok. Yeah, I am small, but size means little to a vampire. I...” How much to scare her? It was important she understand the reality of the situation, but if he utterly terrified her, she’d probably snap and run, and he’d have to wipe her mind. “I was in a fight last night.”

“Oh. Is that why you’re limping?”

Sighing, he nodded, and started the walk back to his wing of the underground tunnels. “No harm in telling you. I fought some werewolves.”

“Werewolves!?”

He nodded, and pulled open the gate to a neighboring tunnel. “I ... defeated them. Lot of broken bones, lot of blood.”

“You, by yourself?”

“More or less.” Further, into the tunnel, he opened another metal gate. “I made enemies last night, Veronica. And you need to know, because now that you’re my ... mine, my enemies are your enemies. I’ll do my best to keep you out of the line of fire, but know that your life is in danger while you work for me. You’ll be taught basic self defense, and more importantly, how to use weapons. Pistols, and shotguns.” The easiest for civilians.

“Oh god. What have I gotten myself into?”

He smiled at her as he opened the last gate, showing his bed. “If you’re as smart as some people think you are, you’ve found a road to a long, long, long life of intrigue, adventure, and power.”

Her eyes twinkled. “Oh my.”

Chapter 134

~~Jack~~

He knocked on Damien's door. Someone very much not Damien opened it.

"Fiona," he said, smiling.

"Jack! How are ye, ye bawbag? And who's this lass?"

"Veronica, meet Fiona, Damien's girlfriend, and ... a paranormal creature."

Both Jack and Veronica were dressed in suits, though Veronica's was less fancy. It was how Invictus did things. Vampires and their servants were well dressed, but it was obvious who the master was.

Fiona, on the other hand, was wearing a white button shirt, and nothing but. Damien was above average height, while Fiona was short, almost short as Tash; the shirt covered her enough to hide her ass, but only barely.

"Paranormal?" Veronica's eyes lit up, and she shyly waved at Fiona. "Hi, Fiona."

"Hi Veronica! Jack, ye here to see Damien?"

"Yeah."

"Damien!" She turned, hopped a bit, and waved down the hall. "Jack's here to see ye!"

Jack facepalmed. "I coulda done that."

Fiona stuck her tongue out at him, skipped down the hall, and came back with Damien, the biggest smile Jack had ever seen on her lips. Even Damien had something of a smile on, a bit awkward, and a bit happy, an emotion the man didn't show often. Something had happened between them.

"Damien," Jack said, and he sighed as he looked the man up and down. "Looking better. How long till the leg comes back?"

He shrugged with one shoulder, other locked onto the crutch he leaned on. "Fiona's blood is damn strong. A few weeks?"

"Yeah but those werewolf teeth are strong, too."

Maybe he should have worded that better. Damien winced and looked down at his missing leg, hidden inside his suit pants, folded halfway down the femur.

"Jack, about Maria."

"Antoinette's talking to her tonight," Jack said. "She seems to think Maria won't be as big a problem as I think."

The Mekhet nodded. "I agree with the Prince, then. Maria's not as ... obsessive as we thought. I think you'll be fine."

He had a hard time believing that. So far, elders were the ones that were either the most logical and wise, or the most insane and willing to burn everything to a crisp for their pursuits. But if both Damien and Antoinette were on the same page, maybe they were right? Maybe Maria wouldn't do everything in her power to catch him, tie him up, and slowly set him on fire? Nice thought, but he probably just jinxed it.

"Veronica, Damien. Damien, Veronica."

Veronica finger waved. Damien nodded a greeting.

“New thrall?” he asked.

“Yeap. I’m taking her around and introducing her to friends. She’ll be at the mansion most of the time, so, figured she should know who she can trust.”

“Ye can trust me, lass!” Fiona hopped past Damien, grabbed a very startled Veronica’s hand, and shook it with way too much energy. As long as Jack had known Fiona, she’d always been a happy hyper kinda girl, but this was a new level of enthusiasm. “Ye gonna build yerself a harem, Jack?”

Again, Jack facepalmed. “I didn’t plan on it.”

“That’s nae a no.” Giggling, Fiona slipped back into the apartment and beside Damien, and she cuddled his free arm to her side. “Lass, yer master’s dating the horniest, most beautiful vampire in the world. Be ready for—”

Damien nudged her side, and she giggled.

Veronica blinked at Fiona several times, probably also surprised by how bubbly the girl was. Well, bubbly was good. Bubbly was great. It was a nice reminder paranormals didn’t all have to be edgelords.

“Did you want to come in?” Damien asked.

Fiona shot Jack a quick look, complete with a harsh glare. Very much a ‘go away!’ glare.

“Uh, sorry, can’t. Like I said, showing Veronica my friends, so she knows who’s who, and meets them. Presence is important.”

“I’ll talk to you later then.”

Fiona smiled a thanks for Jack, waved, and took Damien back to his bedroom, bounce in her step relentless.

Back on the street, he walked the sidewalks of Dolareido with Veronica at his side, her slightly behind him. He didn't ask her to do that, she just did it. And he'd be lying if he said he didn't kinda like that. The Ventrue half of him was happy. He had to be careful, or this whole situation would feed his ego until it burst.

“Uh, Fiona,” Veronica said, “ ... she said something about a harem?” She leaned in close enough she could whisper it and be heard over the street traffic.

Jack half laughed, half groaned, and motioned for her to walk beside him. She did, nervously, and he smiled at her.

“You and others will be responsible for my property. With training, you can become my day guard. With more training, you can become ... a lot of things. But, harem? That wasn't my plan. It's just ... sex and vampires go hand in hand. Cliché, I know, but you remember what happened when Elaine Kissed you.”

The thrall shivered and blushed. “That was ... amazing.”

He raised a brow as he looked at her. Sure, Julias had taught him a lot about reading people, but Veronica made no efforts to hide what she was thinking. She enjoyed that night.

“And I won't lie, Antoinette has two ghouls — thralls that have been elevated and given immortality — that join us in bed all the time. She, Elaine, and—”

She grabbed his arm, and her eyes went wide. “Immortality?”

He grinned at her. “Told you there'd be perks.”

Slowly, she let go of his arm, and shivered again. He recognized that shiver, the sensation of a new reality finally sinking in, the mind opening and letting in a myriad of unthinkable futures. It was quite a rush.

He started walking, and she meeped as she dashed to catch up.

“So,” he continued, “while I will be creating new thralls, you’ll never be asked to do anything sexual. Give blood on occasion, yes, but nothing sexual. And ... if you did want to do something like that, Antoinette would be there. We love each other, a lot.”

“I know. I saw it in your eyes, and her eyes, when you looked at each other.” She giggled as she joined his side again. “You’re so different from each other! And she is ... uh ... well.” At first she used a single hand to reach up and suggest height. Then, after a shy glance, used two hands to suggest a giant bosom.

He laughed. He couldn’t help it. Every moment with Veronica was like taking a kid to Disney World; evil corporate greed included, given he was Invictus.

“Holy shit.”

“Elaine, too.”

“Holy shit!”

“And you don’t have to commit to anything like what Fiona was suggesting. I’ve put enough on your plate as is.”

She blushed again as she looked down. “Well, this is Dolareido. I’ve done some crazy things, and I liked doing them.”

He smiled at her, knowing damn well he was giving her that ‘I knew that already, I’m your father’ kinda look, and kept walking. It wouldn’t exactly be fair to assume she’d done crazy things, just cause she lived in Dolareido. He’d been born and bred in Dolareido, and did absolutely nothing crazy his whole life. But, she did have blue hair, nipple piercings, and a clit hood piercing, according to Elaine. There was some fire in her, and she wore it on the surface.

“Next up on the list. Jessie and Eric.”

---

He sent Jessie a text, and she directed him to Bloodlust, which of course meant loud EDM, lots of red light with bits of pulsing white that made the whole place feel like the inside of a literal heart, and lots and lots of drugs and sex.

“Ever been in here?” he asked.

“Not Bloodlust, no. It’s super expensive! And fancy and stuff. I’ve been to nightclubs, and a couple raves. But not here.”

Well, this would be quite a night for Veronica then. He walked up to the bouncer, and without a word, the bouncer stepped aside and opened the door for them; Invictus employee knew him on sight, after all. Veronica followed Jack in, and a glance back showed the utter awe on her face as she looked from the bouncer to Jack. Every moment was a new revelation for her, and Jack couldn’t help but enjoy it. This was too damn fun.

And he needed that. After what happened last night, he deserved a little fun, right?

People stepped aside for him as he walked past the bar, and stood before the dance floor. Some of them recognized him, but most didn’t. Maybe it was his limp, and how he avoided any hard steps to not put pressure on his insides. Maybe it was his eyes, and the confidence he carried, confidence he’d slowly built up over the past three years and then some. Or maybe it was his aura, the vampire aura of the Beast even kine could occasionally sense. Whatever it was, kine stepped aside for him, and Veronica stared at him all the harder as they did.

Up on the second floor, he looked around at the booths. The closest one had a couple of Invictus vampires in it, two women. A kine male sat between them, and was being treated quite nicely with both vampires pressing their barely covered breasts into him as they nibbled on his shoulders and neck. Both had a hand in his pants, which Jack was thankfully unable to see with the table in the way. Judging from the look on the man's face, he was swimming in bliss.

Next booth had a male vampire, with a woman riding his lap, facing him. She had her dress down and off her shoulders, and she pressed her fake breasts into his chest as the man drained her.

Next booth beyond that had a scene Jack had actually seen before. No vampires here, but two male kine sitting outside of two females, with their hands up their girls' skirts, fingering them hard enough to make the two girls shake. They were loving it, and they buried each other in kisses and fondling hands.

Jack walked past them all with only a short lived glance, though he could tell Veronica wanted to watch, even if she didn't realize it. Moving on was enough to have Veronica chasing after him, and he smiled to himself as she did. The vampire in him loved that.

"Jessy, Eric," he said. "Oh, Natasha, hi. This is my new thrall, Veronica. Veronica, this is Jessy, a fellow Invictus, and Natasha, a member of the Ordo Dracul. Vampires. And this is Eric, a bouncer here, and a werewolf."

"Hey."

"H-Hello."

“Hi.”

“Hi,” Veronica said, and she gulped. Not audible this time, considering the music, but Jack noticed it anyway, watching her in the corner of his eye. She wasn’t just some random, pretty kine following him around. She was his thrall. Little kernels of awareness tickled up through his consciousness, demanding he pay close attention to her, protect her, and watch out for her.

Jesus, no wonder Antoinette felt so protective of Ashley and Julee. Veronica was his thrall, only dosed twice, and he couldn’t help but notice how much the Beast in him demand he protect what was his. If she ever became a ghoul, would he go shopping with her, pay for a decade of education, and keep her at his side at all times?

Daeva did that. Daeva were more protective of their ghouls, and anyone they fed on a lot, compared to other blood clans. So maybe he’d never have the same relationship with Veronica as Antoinette did with Ashley and Julee. Maybe he would. Antoinette treated her ghouls like they were precious, and that they’d leave the care of her nest some day. She was their master, but it was a strangely nice relationship, which was kind of twisted to think about. As long as he kept his head, and didn’t let the Beast consume him, he could keep his relationship with Veronica balanced and healthy, and some day, let her go. Hopefully.

“So, Jack,” Jessy said, and her grin grew. “Harem?”

He threw up his hands. “The fuck? Did Fiona text you?”

“Fiona? No. Why?”

He grunted and groaned as he facepalmed. “Not everyone needs a harem like you, Jessy.”

Veronica gasped and looked between Jessy and Jack. “She has a harem?”

“Had,” Eric said with an eyeroll. “Then we started dating.”

Natasha managed a weak smile as she looked to Jack, but it brightened when she looked to Veronica, and held up four fingers. “She has four ghouls. B-Big guys, and she’d ... well, you know. And at the same t-time!”

“Uh, you joined me in that orgy a few times, last I checked, Tash.” Jessy shrugged. Totally shameless.

Poor Tash. She winced and lowered her head, her plan having backfired. Jessy was shameless, but Tash was not. Jack almost made a comment about her having two boyfriends, and how awesome that was, no need for the shame. But, that could change very soon for all he knew.

Jessy pat her friend on the shoulder, and smiled at Veronica. “You are the sexiest thrall I have ever seen. Love the hair.”

“Thanks!” Veronica perked right up, and looked around with renewed vigor. “I ... I didn’t realize this place would be so, so um...”

“Full of sex and kine ready to be Kissed,” Jessy said. “Jack, can I have a taste? Or, you know, maybe borrow her? She’s very—”

Jack aimed a fist at her. “No. Bad. Down.”

“Aw come on! I lent your mom my boys!”

“She didn’t fuck them!”

Jessy frowned and looked between him and Eric. “But, I need a girl to—”

Eric slipped an arm around Jessy’s shoulders, and pulled on her hard enough to bring her down into his lap in a sort of capturing hug. “Nice to meet you, Veronica. Don’t worry about anything she says, Jack won’t let anything happen to you.”

Veronica giggled as Jessy wrestled to get free. “This is all so new to me. It’s kind of hard to believe that ... that there’s two vampires and a werewolf in this booth. I—”

Natasha lifted her head, and pulled a cheek back enough to expose her teeth. On cue, she grew her fangs, and Veronica gasped. She did love to gasp, but it was warranted, considering how much her life had turned upside down in record time.

“You uh...” Eric shook his head. “You don’t want me to prove it.”

Jessy snorted on a laugh, but nodded. “Probably for the best.”

Veronica almost asked, but Jack waved at his friends and walked back toward the stairs, and she darted after him. But despite her enthusiasm to follow him, a glance back showed her stalling a bit, eyes dancing around to the booths again. One of the women was sitting on a man’s lap, facing away from him, and had pulled her top down so the dress was hidden by the booth. Diamond nipples bounced around on her jiggling breasts, and the kine smiled at Veronica as her mouth opened with moans, lost to the music.

Veronica stared, until Jack started down the stairs, and she squeaked and dashed after him again.

---

“Your friends are nice,” Veronica said as she glanced around at the hall leading to his apartment.

He laughed and shook his head. “They can be, yeah. Jessy is a total sexaholic though, so be careful around her.”

“She won’t—”

“She won’t do anything without my permission, but that doesn’t mean she won’t put you in some extreme situations to tempt you.”

“Extreme?”

“Honestly? I expected to find her at the club, fucking Eric. She might have, if she’d known you were coming, even with Tash right there.” It’d hardly be strange, considering the group’s sexual history.

“Oh.” She giggled and shook her head. “She’s aggressive.”

“Very, and about everything. Tash is her opposite. She...” Sighing, he rubbed his hair, and opened the door. “There’s a lot of shit going down, between us and the werewolves.”

“Eric?”

“No, not him, the other werewolves, a pack of them. Tash dates two of them, and then shit went down yesterday and ... Best to not bring it up unless she does.”

She nodded, and followed him into his apartment. “Wait, two?”

“Yeah, two big guys.” He held up a hand indicating their heights. Seriously tall Art, and giant Matt.

“But she’s so tiny!”

He shrugged again and sat down on his couch. Not a fancy hall bench or whatever, just a nice, high quality couch, black leather, comfortable as hell. One of the things he loved that didn’t belong in a luxurious mansion. Or, maybe it could? It was his mansion. Maybe he could have a room dedicated to being comfortable instead of just looking it, while not being it. Or maybe he could just redecorate the whole damn thing like rich kids did these days, and have it all set up with black leather and shit.

“We all have our kinks,” he said. “You saw Antoinette and Elaine, and the type of women they are.”

Veronica giggled again, and sat down beside him. “You’re lucky.”

He winced and shook his head. “Luck in love? Extremely. In sex and money and power? Yeah, extremely. But I’m not telling you about the other shit, the unlucky shit, and it’s going to stay that way, for a long time. Don’t want you getting involved.” Fuck, it was really hard to not sound like some emo tragedy case when describing his situation.

“But you just told me a bunch of stuff.”

Laughing, he leaned back and clutched his chest as pain hit him, ending the laughter with a grunt. “Just the surface stuff, stuff all the Kindred in Dolareido know about. Nothing another Kindred might want to learn about, and use you to do it.”

“It sounds like you have a lot of enemies.”

“Enemies is ... a strong word.” He pulled out his phone, and flipped to a picture. “Here. We won’t be visiting these people, but yeah, this is Beatrice. She dated my sire. That’s him, too.”

Veronica smiled wide as she took the phone. Sharing pictures of people and talking about their lives, that was the sort of thing she probably did in her free time, before Jack adopted her. A social woman. Maybe she’d rub off on him.

Veronica’s smile turned to gasp, and she blinked at the picture on the phone. “That mouth is terrifying! And ... and she’s showing her tits! Ooh, the man behind her is handsome.”

“Ha, yeah, Triss and Julias. She took the picture and sent it to me. She’s a Nosferatu. They all have disfigurements, random. One of my old bosses looks like a corpse, and she leaks mist out of her skin. Basically a walking, talking graveyard.”

“And your sire didn’t mind Beatrice’s, uh, Nosferatu features?”

“Nah. Crocodile mouth? Snake eyes and claws? Barely registers as strange for a vampire with a few decades under their belt.”

“She is beautiful, in a strange way. And scary, but wow...” She ran a finger down the picture over Triss’s exposed stomach. “How does she keep a figure like that? I—”

Jack laughed. Oh god. “She’s a vampire. She’ll keep the figure she had when she was embraced. The abs, the hair, the muscle, it’s permanent. She could get a haircut, and tell her body to not regrow it during her daily sleep, same with the tattoos and piercings. But otherwise, yeah, her body is permanently like that.” He pointed at his head. “Alas, I buzzed my head a few days before I was embraced. I’m stuck like this.”

She giggled. “Still, you’re so fit, and so’s she! It must be nice to be like that forever.” Her smile faded, and her finger slid over to the man beside Beatrice. “And Julias. He’s ... gone now?”

Not forever, not at all.

“Yeah, killed by hunters. We got revenge, but ... yeah. She was damn happy, back then.”

“But not anymore.” She lowered the phone, furrowing her brow.

“She’s a member of the Circle of the Crone, now, and since Julias died, she’s gotten really deep in it. Neck deep.”

“Circle of the Crone?”

“Witches,” he said. “Like, hardcore witches. Think orgies and sacrifices under a full moon in the middle of a forest, while someone wears the skull of a horse for a mask, witches.” That got her eyes super wide, almost comically so, and he smiled as he took his phone back.

“Scary.”

“Yeap. But Beatrice is a close friend. If she shows up, you can trust her. Maybe not her boss — a dude with a bandage over his eyes — or her friends, but she’s trustworthy. Jessy, Damien, Fiona, Natasha, let them in if they show up at the mansion.”

“Um, b-but not Eric?”

“Eric.” Jack sighed, leaned forward, and set his elbows on his knees as he considered. “The other wolves in the city are proving to be a problem, but Eric’s not part of their pack. But, he’s not a vampire either, and not part of any covenant. So ... if he shows up with Jessy or the others, it’s fine. Alone? Much as I hate to say it, tell him to leave.”

She gulped and nodded. Telling someone like Eric to go away would be difficult for her.

“And, um, Fiona? She’s...”

“Monster?”

“Monster.”

“I ... don’t understand.”

“Neither do I, honestly. There are vampires, and werewolves, and ghosts, and—”

“Ghosts!?” She sat up straight, eyes wide, like he’d just dumped ice down her back.

“Ghosts, and other classics.” Damn she was adorable. Probably how Julias felt about Jack, every time he dumped a new info bomb on him. “But Fiona, and a few others, they’re ... they’re monsters. Like, monster monsters. The things that creep under your bed, or hide in your closet. The presence that comes up through the drain and drowns you in your own bathtub. The creature that lurks beneath the water, or hides in the trees. Unique individuals, monsters of legend. Things that literally feed on your nightmares and...” Yeap, that was too much. Veronica stared at him like he’d just shot her mother. “The ones in Dolareido are not our enemies, but they are ... well, think Pennywise. You should probably—”

She jumped off the couch, and turned around in place several times as she clenched her fists in front of her, and squealed. “Nooooo!”

“What!? What?” He jumped up as well, and that fucking hurt.

“I’m afraid of clowns!”

He stared at her, and laughed, laughed hard enough he groaned and fell on his ass a second later, clutching his guts.

“None of them are clowns, but they’re all monsters, feeding on fear and able to create and feed on your nightmares.”

Veronica sat down again, shivering. “Very scary.”

“Very very,” he said. “But they’ve been some of my greatest allies. Fiona looks like a simple little redhead, right? But she’s a spider monster.” Veronica almost jumped up again, but he put a hand on her shoulder and kept her down. “Not an ugly spider. Strangely sexy, in a weird way.” And, if he guessed right, Vrallar’takla of the Eight Blade Arach would enjoy taking advantage of Damien’s current weakness, like a spider indulging in trapped, wounded prey.

“I have a hard time thinking sexy when I think spider.”

“You’d change your mind if you saw her. You know, once the fear part past, cause she is terrifying too.” He scrolled through the pictures on his phone, and brought up another. “And this is my mom, recently turned vampire, sired by Antoinette.” And probably with the witches at this very moment.

“Oh! Oh, she’s pretty.” She wanted to say more. Probably something about how strange a scenario that must be, Jack dating his mom’s sire. A soap opera drama just waiting for a lit match.

“That’s from before she was embraced.”

“Who’s that beside her?”

Jack managed a weak smile, but didn’t put the phone away or change the picture. Instead, he looked at it, and let the memory hurt him, just a little.

“That’s my sister, Mary. Hunters killed her, trying to get to me.”

“I ... that’s ... horrible.”

“Yeah, it was. And that’s why I killed them.”

She stared at him, stared hard, trying to tell if he was joking. He held his face stone cold, and a new reality finally sank in for her. Jack, her master, had killed before. Multiple people. Deliberately.

Nodding, he got up, and motioned around. “Let’s check and see if there’s anything in the apartment we should bring.” Time for a change of topics before things got too heavy. “You can—”

He stopped, raised a brow, and slowly turned to face the door as his Beast announced an approaching presence. A powerful presence, another Beast, and a familiar one.

“Jack? M-Master? What—” A few seconds later, a knock came from the door, and she stared at it. “Oh my god.”

“Vampire thing. That’s another vampire.”

“Oh, so I ... Right!” Shocked but still smiling, she hopped over to the door and opened it. “Elaine! I ... uh...” And of course, her face turned bright red.

“Veronica Tam, how lovely to see you again. May I come in?”

“Um! Uh ... is ... is that a vampire thing? The whole invite thing?” She looked back at Jack, and he laughed again, shook his head, and motioned for Elaine to come. “Yes. The master says yes.”

How’d she know he was here? Probably had her own thralls or ghouls in the city, keeping tabs on him.

Chuckling, Elaine stepped in. It took Veronica a moment to understand why Elaine didn’t close the door behind her, but she got it and closed it. Jack didn’t really want her to do any of that shit, especially not in an apartment, but it was too much fun watching her figure it all out.

Elaine turned, looked down at Veronica, met her eyes, and said, “Sleep.”

Veronica fell back, body gently collapsing against the wall. She sank down into the corner, instantly sound asleep.

“Elaine? What the hell?” He stood up, but failed halfway and fell back down, guts fighting against him. That was a damn impressive display of gentle but powerful Dominate.

“Calm yourself, Jack. I wish to speak to you.”

He frowned at her, eyes scanning for threat. Antoinette was out talking with Maria and some other stuff, and it wouldn't surprise him if Daniel was keeping an eye on her. Elaine, here, alone, was strange.

“You could have talked in front of her.”

She shook her head, and sat down next to him. “No, I could not. This is important.”

“Then the Prince—”

“This is between you, me, and the curse, Jack.”

He clutched at his chest with one hand, while the other gripped the arm of his couch. His eyes scanned her again, hunting for intent. His Beast stood up, ready for a fight. There was something in her gaze that struck him cold.

“What, you want to talk to him? I'm not taking off the necklace.” Not unless he had absolutely no other choice. Problem was, he was beat up and healing, and Elaine was five hundred years old. She was deadly powerful.

She didn't come over here to exploit him, did she? No, no way. That wasn't smart, not while she was in a city where the Prince was his lover. Relax, Jack, relax.

Except, remember what Black Blood said. If the curse was something the Strix placed on Susanna, because she fueled the ritual or whatever it was, by committing diablerie, how did Elaine get rid of it? It wasn't a train of thought he wanted to go down, but Black Blood had sewn the seed.

“And I will not ask you to, great grandchilde of mine.” She smiled softly as she said it, and turned on the couch to face him. “But, I must know more.”

“What? Why?”

“I have dedicated centuries to the study of rituals and curses, childe. Many in the Ordo have. Antoinette knows that, but she would prefer to keep you out of the hands of the others.”

Jack winced, half from clutching his chest, half from imagining the sort of shit other dragons might do to him. And Elaine was one of those dragons.

“You ... wouldn't tell me that, if you'd planned to stake and abduct me, throw me in a box, and do experiments on me.”

She laughed, a hearty sound, and lightly touched his shoulder. “If I wanted to steal you away and dig into what makes the curse tick, I could have done that at many points. But if I did that, I would spoil the friendship I have with Ann. And that is not a friendship I would damage lightly.”

“... that's really the only reason, isn't it? If it wasn't for her, you'd do exactly what I said you would.”

Silence fell on them, and Elaine held an unwavering, analyzing glare as she met his eyes.

“Perhaps,” she said after a few seconds. “I am not Viktor. I am not so cruel as to ignore that you are an individual, with desires, needs, and a soul of your own. But I will not lie. If you and Ann were not in love, and hopelessly so, this conversation would be much different.”

He met her gaze and held it. It was scary, meeting the eyes of someone so old. She acted the horny-older-power-woman well, but like Antoinette, it was a mask, one she probably wore so perfectly and so often, it'd become part of who she was. Beneath it though, there was a different person. Antoinette had exposed her soft side to Jack an eternity ago, that first time at Bloodlust. Elaine though, he still had no idea what kind of person she really was.

“Alright,” he said. She had him at a disadvantage. Better to play along and see where this went. “What do you want to know?”

“He speaks to you, does he not? I want to know about his desires, Jack.”

He frowned again. Antoinette usually called the curse ‘it’, and resisted doing otherwise. Elaine didn’t.

“Not sure what to tell you that you don’t already know, Elaine. I —”

“Describe to me, in detail, little Ventrue. Describe to me ... how it feels, this personality that roams your mind. Describe to me the hate and rage. Describe to me the carnal lust this creature has for violence. Describe to me what it is like when the curse takes over, in minute detail. Describe to me the parts you do not wish for Ann or myself to know.”

He stared at her, blinking a few times as he processed what she was saying.

“Why?”

She leaned in, and her usually playful gaze turned into something a lot more desperate than he’d ever seen an elder show.

“Because, Jack, I need to know, and”—she gestured to the necklace—“you owe me.”

Sighing, he nodded and rubbed his head. “Alright.”

~~Damien~~

Fiona turned off the lights, helped him sit on his bed, undressed him, and slipped him under the covers.

“I’m a vampire, Fiona. Blankets—”

“Aye, I know, but this is fun!” Nodding, she threw off his shirt she’d had on, exposing her small body, her huge breasts, and all her delicious pale skin and freckles. “Ha! I saw that.”

“What?”

“Ye licked yer fangs!”

He blinked, and licked them on purpose. “I did no such thing.”

“Liar.” Giggling, she rolled onto his chest, carefully, and set her weight on her knees and elbows around him. At the same time, she kept her body low enough to lightly press her stomach against his, and her breasts against his chest. “Boob massage!”

“Uh...”

“Yer the wounded soldier. I’m the innocent lass who takes cares of ye, and falls in love with ye.” She giggled when she said love, and kissed him. “Looove.”

He wasn’t sure boob massage was a proper treatment for anything, but he wasn’t about to stop her.

“You don’t seem to mind that I’m missing a leg.”

“What? Cause yer aw mangled and broken?” She shrugged. “Vrall’s seen worse. And it works better with the fantasy.” Nodding, she kissed him again, and groaned. “Loooove.”

He laughed. “You seem happier than usual.” Which was saying a lot. She’d been crying last night, but before then, she was always bubbly happy.

“Of course, ye goose.” She pressed her body down against him a little harder, flattening her breasts against his chest, and earning a groan from him. “Now, fuck me!”

He raised a brow. “I’m missing a leg.”

“Yer fine!”

“And I Kissed you just last night.” He brushed some of her frizzy hair aside to expose her neck. The bite wound was healed, as it always was when a vampire licked it.

She nodded, grinned, and then collapsed on him, on purpose. With all of her weight on him, he groaned again, in pain this time. The leg still hurt, a lot, but vampire healing and her potent blood had already sealed the wound, if only barely. Werewolf teeth were something else, and definitely not just regular teeth. The beating he’d taken elsewhere from the tackles and impacts was fully healed though, and he sighed bliss as he hugged Fiona softly to him.

“I am tired,” she said. “But ... but we said the words! The love words! There has to be sex.” Nodding, she pushed her weight back up onto her knees and palms, and crawled forward. Grinning at him the whole time, she slid up until her breasts dangled over his face, before she lowered herself down, and eased herself left and right, literally dragging her soft, huge, heavy breasts back and forth over his nose and lips.

It felt amazing.

“Um...”

“Ye think the Prince does this with Jack? The lad is always getting hurt.”

“I know she does.”

“Ha!” Giggling, she continued, slowly and softly caressing his face with the supple skin of her bosom. “Yer face is always smooth.”

“I shaved the night I was sired.”

“That explains it.” Nodding again, she gently eased herself back, and lowered herself until her lips found his neck. “Drink more.”

“More?”

“Aye, more. Ye still need blood, and I want to try something.”

He frowned, but it was hard to ignore the Beast in him demanding he do as she asked. He was wounded, badly, by a supernatural creature with teeth that burned like fire. More blood was needed to heal the extreme damage, and to regrow a leg.

But her blood was powerful, and special. Drinking it filled him with a dark hunger, made him want to pin her and fuck her until she collapsed. Hard to do that with a leg missing, and he didn't want to drink from her two nights in a row and risk hurting her. She wasn't Uratha. She didn't regenerate as quickly as they did, or Kindred for that matter. Vrall did, but unless Fiona was in her lair, Vrall was something she temporarily summoned, not something she was. Except, she still kinda was? Begotten were strange.

“You sure?”

“Aye.” She slowly eased herself back and forth along his body, and he gulped back the desire to groan. “Ye need to eat, and there is something I do want to try.”

Slowly, he slid his hands up her naked back, one for her shoulders, the other up into her hair, and he held her to him as he sank his fangs into her neck.

He fed on her fairly often, usually accompanied by sex. It was sort of routine by this point, but one they both loved. But no matter how many times he fed on her, there was no getting used to the strange, alien, overwhelming sensation of the Begotten's taint on her blood. Power, a dark hunger he couldn't quite identify as anything other than ravenous, it flooded his body as the warm, thick liquid filled and coated his insides.

The pain in his leg faded, and he squeezed Fiona to him harder, squashing her breasts to his chest as he devoured her. She whimpered as she squirmed in his grip, body quivering with the pleasure of the Kiss, even as it fought against the oncoming exhaustion it caused. The taste of her, and the sound of her mewls, had him hard in moments.

With a predatory groan he almost didn't recognize, he stopped the Kiss, and licked her bite wound closed. Trembling, she rolled off him, dislodging the blanket a bit as she collapsed onto her back. Her breasts spread and flattened against her chest, and her large, pink nipples swelled against her pale skin; he couldn't help but notice.

If he'd been in better shape, he'd have rolled her onto her stomach, lifted her ass up, and fucked her from behind, hard, spanking included. But no matter how much his Beast told him to do just that, he was missing an entire leg, bit off halfway down the thigh. Tossing Fiona around was just not in the cards.

He smiled as he watched the busty little woman breathe heavy, breasts rising and falling, her eyes closed. So damn beautiful.

“Fiona?”

“Aye. Just ... need ... a moment.”

“A moment for what? I—”

The world went dark. It'd already been dark in the apartment, lights off, but it went completely dark. He couldn't see his hands when he held them in front of his face.

Flickering lights, gentle in the black, each announced with the quiet clicks of very old fashioned light bulbs, bathed the room in a new light. Ok, he had not expected that. From lying in his bed one minute, to lying in someone else's bed the next. Where was he? The bed was smaller, a bit uncomfortable, and a metal tray stood beside him. A metal chair sat nearby, and so did a door with a small glass window, with some shadows drifting by it.

Yeap, this was a nightmare. This was Sándor's nightmare, the haunted hospital.

“Uh, I thought Sándor owned this?” Hopefully Fiona, or Vrall, could hear him, cause he didn't see her anywhere.

“He gave it to me,” the darkness said in a dark, quiet rasp, Scot accent gone and replaced with some vaguely Portuguese.

“Are ... are we here, so you can treat me? Patient at a hospital? I don't see that wo—” He shut up quick as from the dark corner of the room, eight giant spider legs crept out. They stabbed the floor and walls with their sharp points, but silently, her motions smooth and deadly quiet as she approached.

“You are here to satisfy me, Damien. Fiona enjoys being submissive, but I, as you already know, do not.”

Well, she was right about that. He didn't sleep with Vrall often, but when he did, he spent the whole time bound up and being a healthy mix of scared and aroused. He enjoyed it, but that didn't mean she wasn't a terrifying creature.

She slipped out of the dark corner, human-ish body floating, held up by her spider legs. No eyes, but giant horns that came out of her skull, and out from her where eyes should have been, curling back to join the others and creating a beautiful, black crown. Dark skin, like metal. A very sharp jaw and tiny, black lips. And a spidersilk dress that did a really bad job of hiding her inhuman, amazing proportions.

Chuckling, Vrall used her many legs to pull pillows and blankets together, set them behind his back, and propped up his torso with them, making the bad hospital bed comfy. Terrifying, being in what looked like some sort of hospital bed, back before medicine was all that advanced, but comfy. But then those spider legs spun some web, and wrapped, and wrapped, and wrapped him and the bed together. He relented every time Vrall wanted to bind him, but this time, he couldn't have done anything even if he'd wanted to.

That kinda added to the thrill, honestly.

He gulped as he glanced out the door again, and noticed more shadows shifting under the doorway.

“There is no one here but us,” Vrall said. “This chamber in my lair is empty, save for you, and myself. Ignore the creations of this nightmare. They are only as real as the delusions of your own dreams.”

He nodded, and did his best to relax back onto the pillows. The nightmare chamber was a stark reminder that being a vampire and being a true monster were not the same thing.

“I can smell the fear on you,” she said. “You don't like hospitals?”

“I uh ... guess they're kinda creepy?”

She laughed. “You are my patient, and this hospital, my hospital, is where I shall nurse you back to health. A lot more interesting take on the soldier and nurse fantasy, wouldn't you say? A monster, finds a man wounded, and she saves his life. At first he is afraid of the monster, but after a time, they fall in love."

He squirmed a little. Yep, completely trapped. He wasn't getting up until she let him.

"In love," he said softly, and she sighed happily. "And, uh, definitely afraid." Nightmare hospital. Surely he wasn't the only one who thought a hospital, dark, with phantasms and whatnot of people who died from diseases or surgery gone wrong, roaming its halls looking for revenge on the living, was a terrifying nightmare.

"I will have to distract you." Nodding, she slid her claw fingers against her shoulders, palms out, slipped them under the hooks of her dress, and cut the spider silk fabric.

Fiona had large breasts, and so did Vrallar'trakla of the Eight Blade Arach. That was where the similarities ended. While Fiona had a beautiful body, small, curvy, soft but thin, Vrall was a much taller, skinnier creature, with long curvy legs, and an inhumanly tiny waist. And with how lean she was, with a small torso, her breasts dwarfed her chest. Dark, steel-colored skin, with a darker shade for her lips and swollen nipples.

With her weight on spider legs spread out around the room, blade tips against the floor and walls with the extreme precision and delicacy of a real spider, the hovering woman set herself horizontal over him, still hovering. Her heavy breasts hung underneath her like massive tear drops, legs stuck out behind her, and she lowered herself down onto him below where the spiderweb bound his waist. With a sly, tiny smile, she continued to descend, like a spider approaching a trapped meal, and soon her breasts settled along his thighs and pelvis. As her torso slipped between his legs — leg — she licked her lips, and snuggled herself in as close as she could to him, squashing her breasts to him until his cock lifted between them and pointed up, nearly reaching her chin.

It didn't bother her that he was missing a leg. Well, Vrall had probably seen a million worse things in her lifetime.

“You've fed on Fiona, and took deeply. You must be bursting.” With her elbows outside his hips and on the blankets, she set one hand — two long finger claws and one claw thumb — along his covered stomach, while the other slid down his pelvis to his shaft, and with the smooth backside of a claw, guided it straight up toward her sharp chin, between her squashed breasts. Licking her small lips, she gently slid the claw up and down between her bosom, smoothly gliding along his skin.

“I...” He almost said something stupid, like ‘only partly, because a lot of that blood is going toward healing the leg’. But the truth was, Fiona's blood always elicited arousal in him, and a lot of it. A lot lot. It made him want to pin her down and feast on her as he fucked her into a coma. The only thing that kept him in control now, was half the blood going to healing the leg, and being tied up.

Vrall chuckled, a quiet, whispering sound, and slid her claw up to his glans. “I'd be lying, if I said I didn't enjoy how large you are between the legs, Damien. There are things I can do, I couldn't do otherwise.” Slowly, she traced circles around his glans, almost using the tip of her sharp claw but never quite. Little sparks of pleasure danced on the ripe skin, each accompanied by a small jolt of fear, and eventually, a small drop of precum. She let out a raspy groan, and he wasn't sure if it was because of his obvious arousal, or the fact that, despite all their time together, she could still scare him.

With his girth still between her huge breasts, she tilted her head down and down, and set a kiss along his glans. He quivered at the explosion of sensation, sparks dancing along his sensitive skin, and rippling waves of pleasure working down into him until the bliss spread outward from the base of his cock. Muscles flexed, and cum gushed up through his length, hot and overwhelming.

Vrall smiled, and gently kissed his glans, softly suckling as several gushes of his cum soaked her dark lips. It flowed down back onto his length, and onto her breasts, coating her dark skin in thick lines of white.

“Already? And quite a lot.”

“It’s ... your blood, I—”

“And, I think, you occasionally prefer Vrall over Fiona. I think you rather enjoy being bound and helpless, on occasion.” Before he could defend himself, she laughed again, and waved a single, huge claw at him. “She doesn’t mind the occasional sharing with me. And I, her.”

“I—”

She tapped on his abs through the spiderweb with a claw, shaking her head. “Relax, my love. I am Fiona, and not. There are no secrets between us.”

Love? He hadn’t really thought about Vrall when he told Fiona he loved her. But then, Vrall was right, she was and wasn’t Fiona. He loved Fiona, so he ... loved and didn’t love Vrall?

Stop thinking, and just relax, like she told you.

Damien took a slow, deep breath, relaxed back against the mountain of blankets and pillows he was tied to, and watched as the beautiful spider creature nuzzled her chest toward his pelvis again. He had cum a lot, thoroughly coating his large cock that Vrall seemed quite enamored with. Chuckling again with her dark, raspy voice, she slowly shifted from side to side, nudging her cum-covered breasts around his length. The weight of her heavy breasts meant they massaged his girth with each motion, supple skin spreading his cum more.

She stopped, and smiled at him again before she leaned her head down, and took his cock's head into her mouth entirely. Her could feel the flat side of her fangs, four of them, pushed to the top and bottom of her mouth so they wouldn't hurt him. And he could feel her small tongue gently tracing circles around his sensitive skin, while her small mouth and tiny lips, barely able to fit him, massaged back and forth along the base edge of his glans. The suction and grip of her lips, were very, very tight.

Fiona, for all her unquenchable sexual desire, was relatively new to sex. Vrall apparently had centuries of varying sorts of experience, and if she wanted to make Damien cum a second time in four minutes flat, she could, and did. The right pressure along the base edge of the head of his cock, massaging tightness from her taut, wet lips, all while her tongue caressed and teased him, was just too much. He squirmed for a few seconds, before another hot gush of his cum flooded her mouth.

She smiled around his cock, eased her motion, but kept him inside her, even as she let his cum flow out from her lips. More streams of white coated his length, and the two breasts squashed between his thighs and onto his pelvis. With her blood filling him and driving his body insane with desire, his orgasms were always long and powerful, and he stared down at the spider monster as she milked him for more cum, until her breasts were coated.

“Two,” she said once lifting her head.

Shaking as the climax settled, Damien gulped and forced his head up. “I—oh dear Lord.”

Using her spider legs, Vrall lifted herself up, stood upright with blade-feet dangling in the air, and turned herself upside down, a slow rotation that took time as her spider legs stepped around and around the walls. Once completely upside down, she smiled at him again, before she descended onto him. One of her hands took his cock and pointed it up to her, while her other slid down her own stomach before slipping between her thighs. As she took the head of his length into her mouth again, she masturbated, and Damien stared as the strange upside-down position showed off her body in a way he'd never imagined. He could see everything, her flat, tiny stomach, her curvy legs, the underside of her jaw as her lips spread around his cock, and most hypnotically, her cum-soaked heavy breasts dangling upside down, and gently jiggling with her motions.

“Um, Vrall, you don't need the acrobatics to—” He sucked in a breath, and forced himself to keep his eyes open, gaze locked onto the underside of Vrall's jaw and throat, as she lowered herself down and down until her lips found the base of his girth. Again, a jolt of fear ran through him. She had four very long fangs in that mouth, and their flat, smooth sides slid harmlessly back and forth along his cock; they were bent out of the way, like a snake's. Fear melted away, or at least drifted into background noise, as he enjoyed to the tightness of her lips, and her throat.

Her slender neck bulged, showing how deep she'd taken him, and he shuddered as she again lowered herself until her lips kissed where his cock met his pelvis. With her large breasts hanging upside down towards her collar bone and shoulders, he had to look between them to see how her mouth slid up and down, and how her neck distended to fit him. They rippled with her subtle motions, and his cum trickled down them and onto his pelvis, and where the spiderweb held his abs.

Her hand between her legs worked faster. How she managed to not hurt herself as she masturbated, he had no idea. Spider precision. How she managed to not hurt him with her fangs, he had no idea. Vrall wasn't human, not even close, but damn, there was no denying how insanely sexy everything she did was. She swallowed his length whole again, her throat bulging as she kissed and suckled the thick base of his girth. Slowly, she nudged her head around and around in a small circle, and Damien outright groaned.

With her legs pointing up, and one hand caressing her clitoris, her other reached down and teased his testicles. Sharp, very very sharp claws traced along the soft skin, hard enough he could feel the sharpness, but not hard enough to hurt. She must have felt him clench in preparation for pain though, cause her throat clenched up as well; probably trying to laugh. Gently, she cupped and teased his cum-soaked testicles instead, caressed, and massaged them, sending pleasant, soothing waves up through his pelvis that felt very much at odds with what was happening. He was bound to a bed in a haunted, abandoned hospital, and a giant spider lady was hanging upside down over him.

He couldn't help but push his hips upward toward her as a third orgasm hit him. Vrall kept him buried, and made no effort to move. Based on what her hand was doing between her legs, she liked what he was doing, that he was struggling to fuck her throat despite being tied up. Struggling, wriggling, she liked it when he did that, and he couldn't not do that as her slender neck and tight throat milked him.

Eventually he collapsed, and the spider lady slowly lifted herself up, lips squeezing tight as she did. Gripping, warm flesh along his cock's tip in post orgasm was almost painfully pleasurable, and he moaned quietly as she eventually lifted herself off him. And when she tightened her lips even harder over his glans, he groaned loudly.

Chuckling, the spider lady slowly turned herself upside up again, hovering in the air over him. How she managed to smoothly adjust eight massive, long, multi-segmented, extremely pointy legs, without so much as making a sound, he could not fathom.

“Vampires are such wondrous children of the Dark Mother. A belly full of blood, and your hunger is replaced with desire. A belly full of my host's blood, and you're a slave to it. Exquisite." Slowly, she lowered herself, and set the little lips of her tiny slit against the underside of his cock, pinning it to his abs. Hot, and dripping.

He didn't believe vampires came from the Dark Mother, and Vrall knew that. But now was definitely not the time for a theological debate.

She slid forward, dragging her drenched pussy over his length, and without using her hands, arched her hips back and slid back, guiding his cock's head against and into her tight entrance. He shivered as the monster's gripping depths devoured him, and she wasted no time taking him to the base until he could feel how much he was stretching her.

Chuckling, she lifted her human-ish legs, set one of them on his chest and over his left shoulder, and then folded the other leg over it, also setting it along his chest and over his left shoulder. He froze as those razor sharp legs settled an inch from his left ear. The spider monster didn't have feet. Instead, her long shins came to razor sharp points, similar to her spider legs, and if she wasn't careful, she'd stab him.

Of course, Vrall didn't have to use two arms or two legs to do anything. Her eight spider limbs lifted her up, brought her forward a couple inches, and pulled her back and down in a circular motion, a fucking motion. And she watched him as she did, keeping her two legs where they were, crossed at the knee, gorgeous thighs pressed together, while she hugged herself, arms under her breasts. Chuckling, she traced the blunt side of her claws along her breasts, drawing lines through his cum toward her dark, swollen nipples, all the while she bounced back and forth on his cock, controlled by her spider legs.

Somewhere in the back of his mind, he knew Antoinette probably did this with Jack, sit on him like she was getting comfortable on a chair or couch, and fuck him in that position. But Vrall had an advantage, with her spider legs allowing her to bounce on him without needing to use any other muscle. She truly was just sitting on him, like he was furniture, or helpless prey ready to be eaten, but either way, it was strangely arousing. It was strangely awesome.

He'd never stop wanting to feel Fiona squirm, struggle, beg, and cum when he was in control, but he had to admit, there was something terribly alluring about a powerful woman in full domination mode.

“Who is tighter?” Vrall asked, voice steady, smile wicked. “Fiona, or myself?”

“I..” That was a trick question if there ever was one. “You’re both quite tight?”

She laughed again, and ran one of her claws up along her horns, not unlike a woman running fingers through her hair. Vrall had no hair, but the myriad of horns were fascinating and marvelous, and he stared at her as she combed her claws over them.

His eyes closed as her insides clenched, and wet heat trickled over him. The spider monster let out a raspy groan, and slowed her bouncing. Eventually she came to a stop, still sitting on him, and she smiled at him when he finally opened his eyes.

“Oh, not four?”

“Um, no, not yet.”

“Well, close your eyes, little fly, and enjoy. I aim for five. Or perhaps, six?” Grinning, she started bouncing again, and Damien groaned as his eyes closed again her soaked, squeezing insides milked him with expert control.

Vampires could get addicted to sex, with the Blush of Life letting them do some pretty interesting feats of sexual endurance. And with Vral exploiting how strong and strange Fiona's blood was, and the effects it had on him, he didn't know that that sort of addiction was a very real possibility.

"And," she continued, "I think we will have to continue this treatment, several times a week at least."

He melted into the bed, and gave into the spider monster. Of all the things to be concerned about, getting on the good side of his love's monster half wasn't one of them. He already was.

"I can agree to that."

"As long as you treat my host well," she said, "I will treat you well, vampire. I have not even begun to share with you the pleasures I am capable of." He winced as the woman clenched on his length hard, and she chuckled on him before letting out some more raspy groans. Her juices flowed over him, almost boiling hot, and it wasn't long before his joined them. "There. Four. I think I will aim for six. And you will not be going anywhere until they are had."

Lord, protect him from sexy horny monsters.

~~Antoinette~~

"Wait here, Daniel."

The man sighed, a quiet and subtle thing, before he sat within one of the pews. Which surprised her. Daniel shared much of her hatred for the Lancea et Sanctum, from centuries of conflict dealing with their absurd beliefs. The Ordo Dracul valued knowledge. The Church valued faith, and if they discovered knowledge that cast faith into doubt, they destroyed it.

Simply standing within the cathedral that once represented their existence in Dolareido had rage bubbling underneath her skin.

Daniel adjusted his glasses, and nodded toward the cross far above the pulpit.

“Sometimes,” he whispered, “I have to admire their faith. Sometimes, I wonder if, perhaps...” He shook his head, and straightened his spine. “If something happens, I’ll hear it.”

She nodded, and continued down the isle of the nave. Despite her desire to simply ignore everything about the cathedral and its contents, she could not help but stop and look up at the cross. A symbol of faith, of the sacrifice of Jesus Christ and his Father. But to her, it represented nothing but frustration, an enemy, the banner hoisted by fools who would cast the world back to the dark ages with their fear and self loathing.

And yet...

Sighing, she continued on, and stepped down the path into the depths of the Earth, to Maria’s den. Once it had been Lucas’s, before the purge, and now it belonged to Lucas’s lover. Following the purge, there had been an unspoken understanding between the two women that, as Maria did not interfere with the purge, the least Antoinette could do was leave the cathedral standing for her. It was an agreement she did not intend to cease, but the following conversation could change that.

At the first gate, she frowned at the destruction and the shoddy, temporary repairs. Bent bars, ripped apart and destroyed by large hands with claws. Feats of strength Antoinette could accomplish now, but not during her neonate years. Even during her ancilla years, bending such massive bars would have required great amounts of vitae. To werewolves, they were minor obstacles.

An elder Daeva or Nosferatu could surely overpower a werewolf of any age, but only with the might of centuries under their command. Neonate and ancilla Kindred would have a much more difficult time managing the insane power and strength Uratha came to almost immediately upon their first transformation. A pack of werewolves, all with such power? A threat to any elder, to her, to Daniel, and to Maria.

Antoinette waited. No need to knock, not with Maria's elite guard standing within the long tunnel. Soon one of the ghouls came to her, bowed at the neck, and opened the gate. Antoinette returned the nod, and said nothing as she followed the ghoul to the next gate, where yet another ghoul opened the path. Four ghouls, four gates. Four more ghouls waited within the great dome, and Antoinette was not so confident as to ignore the threat they posed. One of them was armed with a flamethrower.

"Prince," Maria said from within her coffin. The large, black coffin sat upright against the back wall of the dome, and the pale woman stood within, leaning back lightly against its soft, white lining. It matched her dress. After meeting Antoinette's eyes, Maria looked to her nearest ghoul. "Go, and take the others to the first gate. Wait there until the Prince leaves."

The ghoul nodded, and took her companions into the dark of the long tunnel.

"Madam Turio," Antoinette said, and she stopped twenty feet from the armless woman. "You know why I have come."

"Yes, I imagine I do." With a heavy sigh, Maria stepped out of the coffin. Antoinette almost stopped her, but Maria would not let an injury as blazé as losing her arms keep her from standing tall and proud. "I do not envy your dilemma, Prince."

"You refer to the curse."

“Yes. Jack the Ripper, as predictable a name as that is ... is far more horrendous than I imagined. Mister Terry described its power and its desires to us before, but I couldn't have imagined.”

Antoinette held her poker face, but the conversation had moved in a direction she did not expect. And Maria knew it. Was this how it was to be, then? A jousting game, until the conversation eventually reached its inevitable topic? Very well.

“Twice, I have seen this curse's power first hand,” Antoinette said, “and its grotesque personality. My love's measures to keep it under control have proved successful, but they limit him. I understand he engaged the Uratha without those limits, and in the chaos, the curse was unleashed.”

“Correct. I ... appreciate what Jack has done for me, Prince. He knew the risk, and yet he went to war for me.” The woman stepped around a nearby desk, sat, and motioned toward a nearby chair with her head. “He is a valuable asset to the Invictus. And he is valuable to the Lancea et Sanctum, in a way.”

Antoinette smiled, grabbed the nearby chair, and set it near the desk to sit. As infuriating an idea as it was, that her lover had helped the Sanctified, Maria recognized it. But that was not the reason Maria would not wish to kill Jack. No, Maria's reason to spare the boy would be far more personal. All Antoinette had to do, was get the bloody woman to admit it. Easier said than done.

“My love has surprised us all, time and time again. But it is not his prowess that draws me to him, Madam Turio.”

“Oh?”

“The boy is unfalteringly honest, down to his soul. He strives for fairness in all things, and will pour his everything into any task he deems necessary.”

The Nosferatu smiled at that, and looked down at her desk. “Yes, quite true.”

“And ... he does not needlessly engage in violence. He’s committed to the city, to the Invictus, but also to his humanity. He spares those he can, when he can.”

Maria’s smile faded, betrayed by a frown. “Who is he to cast judgment, on who deserves to live?”

Antoinette leaned closer to Maria, forcing her to look up, and she met the woman’s eyes. While Maria may have been expecting a harsh glare from her, Antoinette instead softened her gaze, and offered her fellow elder a piece of her genuine side.

“He is a loving man who seeks to save all those he can. You have not seen him, as I have, Madam Turio, racked with grief.”

“You honestly expect me to believe Jack regrets killing Lucas?”

Ah, there it was. To get the Nosferatu to admit the true nature of the conversation, and abandon subtext, was the first chip in her armor. To convince her, Antoinette would need more.

“I expect you to use your eyes, consider what you know of Jack, and to combine that with what I am telling you. The boy—”

If Maria had arms, she would have slammed them on her desk.

“You! You, who first attempted to take Lucas’s life, fifty years ago. You, who set a purge upon the Lancea et Sanctum. You, who slaughtered Kindred old and new alike, because they had the nerve to believe in God! You expect me, to listen to your poisoned words?”

Antoinette leaned back, and let the woman’s wrath pour over her. It was a familiar rage, one Antoinette knew from many strifes in her past; the details were lost, but the emotions were unforgettable, seared into her mind. Maria felt rage she could not reconcile, rage that fought against her reason and judgment, against her wisdom and experience. Rage that had burned for decades, and would not be crushed without struggle.

As much as Antoinette felt more than confident she would win a battle against an armless opponent, even one as strong as Maria, that did not mean a battle of wills would end the same. Maria's Nightmare was renown, and terrifying. Of course, the woman was seriously maimed, and such damage left her in extreme disrepair. For all the elder's posturing, she was likely barely able to remain out of torpor for this conversation. A stiff breeze could defeat her in this state, but that did not mean she could be so easily managed in the future. Antoinette had to choose her words well, lest the elder's Nightmare be a true concern in the future.

And for all the frustration the blasted woman provided Antoinette's life, Maria did not deserve death.

"Yes, moi, Maria." Enough games. "And yes, I despise your religion. I despise fools such as yourself, so void of intelligence that you latch onto a feeling, an emotion, and call it faith. The fact you have the audacity to act upon faith as if it were proof itself of a higher being, and worse, that a higher being condones and encourages your behavior, disgusts me. How dare you." Before Maria could retort, Antoinette put up a hand. "But that is not the reason I enacted the purge, and you know that. Lucas vied for power, and plotted my demise. He wanted Dolareido for himself, and his methods became brutal, and savage. I hunted him, and killed those that protected him and served him, because it saved the lives of Kindred and kine, and my city. And..." She leaned forward again, and met Maria's anger from mere inches away. "And he had become unstable, as you know Viktor had before his death."

"He..." Maria glared at her, but it was clear Antoinette had won the joust. Sighing, Maria sat back and sank into her chair, defeated, but not by Antoinette. Defeated by her own wisdom and understanding of the reality Antoinette described. She had merely needed a push toward it. “He was not always so savage, Antoinette. He did not always desire to rule, or to crush others under his heel. He did not always dream of ... He...” Her eyes fell, and fell, and her soul fell with her.

Antoinette matched her sigh, and set her hand on the woman’s desk. The implication was clear: if Maria still had her arms, they could have exchanged a touch.

“I know, Maria. Tony was not always a bitter, resentful man, either.”

“You killed him, didn’t you?”

Antoinette smiled. The woman was dangerously intelligent, when she wished to be.

“A misleading word here. A touch of bait there. Viktor and Tony clashed, and to my delight, both died to their own foolhardiness.” No need to bring Jack’s involvement into the conversation.

“I can’t imagine doing that to someone you loved.”

“I ... did not enjoy it, Maria, but it had to be done. And we had loved each other, many years before, but not by then. His descent into cruelty was a process of decades. For Lucas, I am sure you would have felt the same way, if given time, and if you had not been given fifty years to—”

“To look upon my memories of him with rose-tinted glasses?”

Antoinette sighed again, and offered the Nosferatu a weak, knowing smile. “No one is immune to the influence of time, Maria. I am lucky, in a way. Tony became my enemy, leaving me with few options, and with years of the man antagonizing me and my city, I did what had to be done. But, it hurt, Maria. Not a night goes by I do not blame myself, at least in part, for the Kindred Tony eventually became.”

“And Elaine? Viktor’s sire?”

“I suppose that secret has spread throughout the city, at this point.”

“Of course.”

After a heavy nod, Antoinette sat back and shook her head. “She knows it was my plan that led to his death, and she feels as I did about Tony. A childe we both created. A childe that grew and evolved into something horrible. Failures both, and we are partly to blame.”

Maria snorted on a laugh, and Antoinette raised a brow.

“Sorry. It’s just, three women, elders, all who’ve had the men in their lives devolve into cruel, savage beasts? God has a sense of humor.”

Antoinette laughed. “I suppose she does.”

Maria blinked at her, and returned her laugh, though it was short lived, ended by a harsh wince of pain.

“Jack is safe from my wrath, Antoinette,” she said, and Antoinette again sighed, this time in relief. “Though it may be in his best interest to avoid me. I ... was more comfortable, when I thought you or Daniel had taken Lucas’s life. Knowing it was Jack, I’m still not sure how I feel. Are ... are you sure it was Jack, and not the curse?”

“It was Jack, Maria. Lucas had won that battle, thanks largely due to you giving him permission to abduct Natasha.” As predicted, her words made the elder frown, half in anger, half in shame. “Jack managed to surprise Damien with his fortitude and strength of will. And ... and that was that.”

She nodded. “As I surmised. If ... if you would leave me now, Prince. I must think on this.”

Nodding, Antoinette stood, and offered the woman a half bow. “Thank you, for listening, Maria. And now, I must ... deal with another problem, for another.”

---

“Natasha dear, could you come join me?”

“Um, s-sure. Where are you Prince?”

“I await in cell 16.”

The pause in her student’s voice spoke volumes. She had informed her student of what was to be done. Now it was Natasha’s turn.

“On the way, Prince.”

Nodding, Antoinette ended the call and lowered the phone. “She will be here soon.”

“Are you sure this is a good idea?” her sheriff asked. The uncertainty in his voice was quite out of place. “She won’t respond as well you think.”

“I do not think she will respond well, Daniel, but she will respond. This is an important moment in her growth, and an important moment in our balance with these wolves.” She gestured to Matthew and Arturo.

The two men stood there, arms apart and over their heads, held up by chains. Both were conscious, though both were in terrible shape, riddled with injuries that had obviously been caused by silver. For all Damien's faults, she knew firsthand how dangerous the Mekhet was. It did not surprise her he had managed to inflict such damage upon Avery's pack before his defeat.

The men were clothed, typical jeans and t-shirts. She had been tempted to strip them, to rob them of dignity as well as their freedom, but such crass methods were unnecessary for this action.

"You don't think we could transform and break free?" Arturo said. He pulled on the chains idly, causing his body to pull into the air a few inches, but the chains holding his ankles soon halted the movement.

Antoinette gestured to Daniel. "My sheriff does not need a silver sword to decapitate you, fool, transformed or otherwise. And..." She stepped forward, and set her fingers against the man's chest. Tall as Arturo was, they matched heights. "I need no sword to rip you in half, stupid man." Before he could respond, she waved the hand and took a step back. "Enough. This bravado is pointless. You are trapped, and Avery does not know where you are."

Matthew sighed and shook his head. "She can track us."

"If she realized you were missing. She does not, yet." If only these wolves understood how meaningless their words were. "Do not worry. Your fates rest not in my hands, but Vola's."

Both men winced, and looked down. If guilt were a spice, the two boys could be ground for ample supply.

After a couple minutes of silence, save for the panicked heartbeats of the two wolves, Natasha appeared in the hallway. And in her hand, she carried a stake.

---

~~Natasha~~

She stepped into the cell, and forced herself to look up at her boyfriends. They managed to meet her gaze, but only for a second, before they both looked away.

“Can ... can I speak t-to them alone?” This wasn’t the cell they’d once put Sándor in, with powerful chains capable of holding true monsters. If the boys transformed, they’d be able to break free, even with their injuries.

But they wouldn’t. If they did, Daniel would open the door and cut them into ribbons.

“Yes, Vola. Do be careful,” Antoinette said.

“They won’t—”

“Not of them. For them.” The Prince smiled at her, and once Daniel stepped out of the room, she closed the door.

A few LEDs built into the ceiling lit the room, enough she could see the boys’ faces, and how uncomfortable they were. Physical pain, yes, but it was shame and guilt that had them looking so ... defeated.

It made her feel good for a whole two seconds. Satisfaction melted away, replaced with only sadness, and a desire to hug her stupid boyfriends. But Antoinette taught her well, taught her to recognize those emotions, accept them, and ignore them. Maybe after a chat she could listen to them, but for now, those emotions would only blind her.

She slowly walked around the two boys, and her footsteps echoed softly in the cube room. She looked down at the strange stake, and tapped it lightly in her hands as she came around to stand in front of them again, before continuing to circle them.

“Tash,” Art said. “We’re—”

“Shut up,” she said, startling herself. More venom slipped into her words than she meant to. Channeling Jessy a bit there, maybe.

She walked around them a few more times, tapping her stake intermittently as she juggled possible conversation threads. What would happen if she started yelling? She ran a few scenarios through her head. What would happen if she softly asked for an explanation? She ran a few more scenarios. What would happen if she started crying? She ran a few more scenarios again, and frowned at herself. That last one was dirty, emotional manipulation.

Eventually she stopped in front of the two boys, and held up the stake.

“This w-wood is treated. There’s a very thin coating of something on it, just enough so that it d-doesn’t smell like wood.” She stepped up to Matthew, and lightly pressed its tip against the huge man’s shirt at the navel. “Do you have one, too?”

Matthew met her gaze, and nodded, before lowering it again.

“How long have you h-had it?” she asked.

Matthew turned his head, looking away. He’d only do that if this was pack issue, which meant Avery told them to get these.

Natasha reached underneath her suit jacket, and pulled out her silver knife. Both boys pulled their heads back instantly, and she quickly held up one hand palm forward.

“I’m n-not going to hurt you. Do you ... d-do you really think I’d do that?”

Art grimaced as he stared at the blade. “I did stab you, Tash. I ... wouldn’t exactly blame you, if you returned the favor.”

She rolled her eyes, took a step back, and leaned back against the wall. “I think D-Damien and Jack got enough revenge for that.” She gestured to them and their bodies. Their t-shirts didn’t do a good job hiding the nasty bruises, car-crash level bruises, or the nasty tears in their flesh. The particularly nasty wounds were wrapped in gauze, and she could smell the blood and damaged skin. Silver had done that.

“Yeah,” Matt said. “Damien’s fast. But ... honestly, Jack was the bigger problem. Sure, we’ll heal faster from what he put us through, but if he’d wanted to...”

Art groaned. “We’d be rat shit by now.”

Tash expected such a remark to be laced with sarcasm, but Art’s voice had been solid, and he met her eyes with a rigid stare. Jack had scared them, badly. Not even their violent encounter with Jacob in his cave had left the boys this unnerved.

“Jack is...” Sighing, she shook her head. “Is not your concern. As long as you leave K-Kindred alone, he’ll leave you alone.”

The boys looked at each other, and then to her, obvious disbelief in their eyes. They weren’t simply afraid of Jack, they were concerned about him, the way villagers would be concerned about a nearby volcano about to erupt.

“The Prince,” she continued, “didn’t capture you to t-talk about Jack. She captured you, b-because you assaulted one of the Ordo Dracul. She has exercised her right as P-Prince of Dolareido, to take revenge on transgressions against her covenant. Against ... m-my covenant.”

Matt sighed and let his head droop. “Tash, we—”

“I know. You didn’t want to hurt me. Avery t-told you to keep me out of the way, and you knew you only had one way to ... t-to do that.” She stepped up to them again, and looked up at each of them. Each managed to hold her gaze for a few seconds longer this time, before they both looked down. “You attacked me, a dr-dragon. And you ... you betrayed my trust, your girlfriend. You d-don’t get to do that! Ever!” Heat shot up through her, and she poked the tip of the stake against Art’s stomach.

Art pulled back enough to stop the wood from penetrating skin, but bound as he was, he didn’t get far. And slowly, as silence settled on them, the two boys lifted their eyes from the floor and looked at her. Sadness, sadness she felt, and understood.

This wasn’t just an issue about their relationship. Worse, it had almost nothing to do with that. As much as a part of her wanted to make it personal, to make it sting even more so she could be angrier with them, that wasn’t analyzing the situation accurately. They did what they did because they were a member of Avery’s pack, a group with their own motivations, same as any covenant. And when it came time to decide between their relationship with her, or their pack and their pack’s goals, they picked their pack.

And that hurt. It hurt so damn much, because she knew, if the situation had been reversed, she’d probably have done the same thing. If Antoinette told her the city was in danger, that her friends were in danger, and that she had to trick and lock Art and Matt up for a night so she could do something they didn’t want her to do? Yeah, she’d have done it, and she’d have hated herself every minute of every night from thereon out.

That’s what the boys were feeling now. The sadness, shame, it was carved into them in big bright letters, made even worse because their mission had failed. They’d lost everything.

Maybe if she was Antoinette, or Elaine, she’d punish them. Maybe if she was Jessy, she’d hurt them. Maybe if she was a witch, she’d cast a spell on them. Maybe if she was a Carthian, she’d wreck their car; they didn't have a car, but still. Maybe if she was Invictus, she'd seize their assets and leave them living on the street; even less of a concern to them than a car.

But she was Tash. She just didn't have that kind of hate in her, and she knew it. Even now, she wanted to free them, apologize for what Antoinette and Daniel did, even apologize for what Damien and Jack did, and take care of their wounds. She wanted to snuggle up on her bed with them, cuddle, have lots of gentle sex, then rough sex, and Kiss them to end the night in bliss. She wanted all this stupid pain to go away.

"I ... I carried a silver sword, b-because I had to. Because I was told to. I bet it made you nervous, knowing I always had that. But I never hid that from you! You knew I had it! I..." Sighing, she shook her head. Avery probably told them to keep the stakes hidden; that explained why they were treated so vampires wouldn't be able to smell them.

Every way she looked at this argument, it always ended on how the boys chose to listen to their boss when push came to shove.

"You'll ... b-be staying here tonight," she continued. "And maybe longer, until I say otherwise. If Avery c-complains ... fuck her." She glared at each man, frowned her best frown, and left. Once the door was closed behind her, she leaned back against it and hugged her arms tight to her, body shaking. Don't cry. Don't cry.

"Natasha?" Daniel said.

"Sire. The boys will be staying here t-tonight. If that's acceptable?" Her best official voice wasn't doing too good either, wavering.

"Yes, Natasha." He looked at her, adjusted his glasses, and did nothing. Or that's what she thought he'd do, cause that's what he always did. Her sire was reliable, but had all the empathy of a stone; it still boggled her mind he sired her. But after looking at her for a moment, his expression softened a little, and he sighed quietly.

He looked sad.

“W-What?”

“Natasha, I ... I’m hardly one to give advice about this sort of thing. But, take it from someone a lot older than you, someone who’s made a lot of mistakes in this department. If you love them, make it work.”

She stared at the stranger in Daniel’s skin, jaw slowly dropping. “Sire?” Thank god the cell door was soundproof when closed.

“We’re not kine, Natasha. We live a long time. You can’t make an excuse about career, or even a covenant getting in the way, because what do those matter to immortals? If you genuinely love them, make it work. Because, in a hundred years, they’ll be gone, and you won’t be. You’ll spend a hundred years more hating yourself and the happiness you could have had.” He cracked a tiny smile, before wiping it away with the thumb of his glove. “The memories are worth it.”

Daniel didn’t like to talk much. He preferred to let people come to their own conclusions, and that included how he handled his role as sire. At this point in Natasha’s second life, Daniel was sire in name, but there was no dependent connection between them. She was her own vampire, and Daniel was her superior in the covenant, nothing more.

To hear him talk like this, like a sire would to a fledgling, struck her still.

“They ... they attacked a dr-dragon. I—”

“And they should be punished for it. But if they love you, they’ll take that punishment with a smile if it means they get to stay with you.”

“They betrayed my trust!” She stomped her foot and glared up at the man, fists clenched.

“You know why they did. Is it something you can put behind you, and something they’ll apologize for, genuinely? Or not?”

“I ... I...”

He put up his hands lightly, palms toward her, and shook his head. “Like you said, they’ll be staying here tonight. Think about it.”

“I will. I ... w-will.”

Chapter 135

~~Jack~~

As the two of them sat on his couch in his old apartment, he spared no detail. It wasn't exactly new information for Elaine; they'd have this conversation already. But it was obvious she wanted more info about the emotional side of the Ripper, about how he thought, how he felt, how the fucker took over Jack and basically became a new person. She wanted the information Jack had kept a little vague, to spare Antoinette. Of course, the Prince likely inferred a lot of it, but that didn't mean Jack was going to say it.

He described to his great grandsire, what it felt like to want to see someone die. Not delight in killing, because as horrible as that was, it didn't really get across how alien, weird, and absolutely fucking vile the curse was. To actually want to see the life go out in someone's eyes, because it scratched an itch that was basically existential for the curse, that's what Jack told her now. The Ripper would forever be furious, even if he piled a mountain of corpses, and fucked one in front of his next target, instilling disgust and fear in enemies and prey alike. A strange mix of unadulterated rage and carnal delight, aggression and hunger swirled into something only a genuine psychopath could empathize with.

He described what it was like before the curse was released, when those emotions and desires mixed with his own, and Elaine nodded as she closed her eyes, reminiscing. How much of her savage past she could remember, he didn't know, but based on the subtle smile, she could remember enough, and she sorta missed it. Missing it was not the reaction he expected to see, but if she expressed it now, it was because she felt comfortable letting him know she did.

Good thing Veronica didn't get to hear any of this. She'd run from Jack, screaming.

"Truly an abhorrent creation, this Ripper curse," Elaine said, opening her eyes.

"You uh, don't really seem like you think it's abhorrent."

She shrugged and leaned in closer. "When you have seen murder and carnage on the scale that I have, you become ... jaded."

"And, what? You miss not being jaded? You miss the thrill of killing people? Cause I've never been thrilled. The curse has, I haven't. Killing people just ... hurts, and makes me sick."

"I do not believe you."

"What? I—"

She came in so close, she could have kissed him. "At the height of blood lust and violence, in battle, where emotions run rampant, even kine can give into an urge so primal and instinctual, that killing becomes satisfying. And you, my childe, have a Beast, a part of you that both understands that, and craves it, as all vampires do. Try as you might to deny it, the Beast is not some dog on a leash you can order. It is a part of you, and it delights in the kill."

She had him there. Much as it sucked to admit it, the vampire part of him enjoyed killing; at least, when it came to securing power, safety, or resources. Hell, even the human part of him found an inkling of satisfaction from it, hidden underneath all the nausea and terror. But it wasn't the same as what the curse wanted.

"What are you driving at?"

"I simply wanted to ... see, a part of you I know you keep from my friend. You are far too self sacrificing an individual to let Ann know how truly depraved the emotions of the curse are, and how his desires affected your own, before your separation.”

What a load of crap. She wasn't lying, but it was a half truth; fucking worse than any lie. And she knew he knew that, from the twinkle in her eye.

“Come on Elaine, enough with the games. I suck at them. Just tell me what you want.”

She sighed, her fun ruined. “I seek to understand the curse, Jack.”

“Understand?”

“The Strix placed it upon my sire, so many centuries ago. She sired me. I sired Viktor, and so on. The curse infected us and spread through us. The curse colored our perceptions and emotions for ages. I left Viktor to his fate, and disappeared into the world to find the ritual to save me from its influence.” She glanced down, weight pulling her eyes to the floor, before she corrected the error and smiled at him again. “And before then, as I once told you, I ran with wolves through forests, and I gave into the curse's lust for violence and death.”

“But you regained control of yourself, right? I mean, you came back to civilization, sired Viktor while you still had the curse, and—”

She held up a hand. “Its dark urges danced within me without relent, but by then I had learned to coexist with them. I pretended to be a creature of the night, but one with a secret; seducing a rich man was easy. Viktor took me to his balls and gatherings, and dressed me in clothes to make me presentable. And when people were gone, I would fuck him, and Kiss him, and feed him my blood. Eventually, I sired him, in the darkness and the empty streets of night. I fled soon after, leaving Viktor to his fate, as I only then finally realized the curse had to be removed.” Sighing, she turned back to face the wall with the television, and the nearby door where

Veronica was out like a light. “I remember no details, as confounding and frustrating as that is. I can vaguely remember running through the dark, naked in the woods. I can remember blood, and pain. I can remember hunger and desire, wanton violence, urges that overwhelmed me, boiling up from the curse.”

“And you want that back?”

“I want to understand, and appreciate it, in a way that...” Elaine sighed, and slumped. Seeing a five-hundred-year-old vampire slump, posture ruined and back curving into the couch, was a really strange sight, and Jack raised a brow. “I suppose I am seeking punishment, for passing this curse on, and then leaving Viktor to deal with it. I did not know that would happen, and yet, I feel guilt for it.”

He half frowned, half smiled. The whole situation was confusing, and he couldn't for the life of him figure out what she wanted. And it seemed like, neither could she, cause there was more to it than a guilt complex.

“I can remember in vivid detail what it was like before I freed the curse, Elaine. I couldn't even say Angela's name without frothing at the mouth with overwhelming, ridiculous, juvenile rage. But I also felt power with it, power and bloodlust and even bits of strange bliss.” He scratched his hair, and slouched back into the couch too, almost touching shoulders with her; woman was too tall. “So, there were tiny bits of pleasure, from feeling that kind of power, very dark side. But mostly it was just pain and self loathing, when the rush was over. I felt ... inhuman.”

“But you are not human. You are a vampire.”

He frowned at her and shook his head. “Is that what this is actually about? You're ... missing that part?” It was a pretty old story, and an integral one to Kindred, far as Jack knew. Vampires had to fight against their Beastly nature, every night of their second lives, or they'd rot away and become nothing more than a draugr, a mindless husk only capable of hunting and killing.

She looked away, and unless he was seeing things, that was shame on her face. "It has been a long time since I have felt ... I do not know. Human? Empathy is a difficult thing for a vampire as old as I. Emotions are difficult to summon. Antoinette and I, much of our friendship is based on shared goals, playful rivalry, and sexual compatibility, not empathy."

He tried his hardest to keep his face straight when she brought up sexual compatibility. Fail. She laughed, and her shame melted away, making him smile.

"I get it, you know? Antoinette and I have talked about this before, about what it's like for her, being as old as she is. For a long time, she thought our relationship was really just her, uh, mooching off me."

"Mooching?"

"Yeah, cause I got this habit of wearing my emotions on my sleeve, when I'm comfortable with someone. I'm honest, to a fault, and Antoinette says she can see it all in my eyes. And she says she feeds on that, and..." Sighing, a happy sound, he relaxed back against his couch again, and smiled at Elaine. "Is that what all this is about? This interest you have in this curse? You came to Dolareido to investigate me, because Antoinette told you how psychotic the curse is, and that triggered ... what, some emotional memories?"

Her face slowly smoothed back into a stony visage. "Perhaps."

Bingo. There was more to this than a guilt complex, or a hunt for understanding the curse.

"Elaine, I'm sure you have a lot of reasons for coming to Dolareido, and more than just what we're talking about right now.

But, the curse? It's not human either, and I don't even think the Beast can feel the sort of joyful hate and rage it does. Yeah, humans can crave violence, and be angry, and the Beast can crave the hunt, but the curse isn't like that. It's ... it's so much darker. It's ... the sort of mindless rage and hate you'd expect of ... a ghost, tormented for years and devoid of any reasoning." He groaned and shook his head. It was too easy to see Mary becoming that ghost. "Mindless hate, and the animal aggression you'd find in a wounded, rabid, starving animal. The weird joy I felt back then, what the curse feels, it's sick, and twisted, and no human — or vampire — could ever feel that way. You don't want that, ok? You're better off."

She slowly frowned and looked down. "Am I?"

"Yes, you are." He sat up, and set a hand on her leg. That shocked her. Whenever they interacted, he made sure to avoid touching her; she was a sexual woman, and he didn't want to trigger something Antoinette might disagree with. But now, he squeezed her knee gently, and smiled at her. "Antoinette's told me a lot about what it's like, being as old as her. And I know a thing or two about the shit you must have dealt with, when you still had the curse. So, how about instead of plotting whatever you're plotting, scheming whatever you're scheming, just hang out in Dolareido for a while?"

And just like that, her frown turned into a smile. Slowly though, carefully, like how she probably approached everything, including this conversation.

"To what end?"

"Well, you're my great grandsire. We're family ... in a weird sort of way. And, well, you've got that thing going on, the whole 'I smile a lot and I'm a powerful seductress, but I'm secretly depressed' thing going on. Maybe hanging out here for a while will help."

For all the ancient elder's self control, he managed to earn a proper laugh out of her, complete with a cough of surprise.

“You, little Ventrue, are a delectable, and dangerously discerning individual. You are nothing like your mother.”

He grinned at her. She was only half right. He got his dad’s brain, sure, but he got his mom’s heart.

Triss leaned back against the mound of blankets in her alcove, and a quiet, deep groan worked its way up her throat, as Jennifer kissed her clitoris and piercing. Triss was trying to think about all the shit that’d happened, about Black Blood’s conversation with Jack, about the curse, about her old boss Garry about to start shit with the Invictus, but it was damn hard to think at all with a sexpert molesting her.

Triss turned her head, set the side of her face on the blankets, and looked out of her alcove to the big cavern. Othello wasn’t there. Probably out with Madison. Hell, maybe he was actually out doing witchy things? Dude was dumb, but you didn’t live to be his age without picking up at least a few things.

Ripples of pleasure spread outward from her insides, and she clenched down on the two fingers pressing up toward her pussy through her ass. The rolling waves hit her, head to toe, and she quivered as Jennifer eased her kissing, but kept her lips around her clit, while fingering her harder. Slut knew exactly how to make Triss cum, and milk her for it.

As the waves passed, Triss relaxed back against the blankets, only to tense up again as her ears picked up on some noise. But after a few seconds, she recognized the footsteps, and she relaxed again as Samantha inevitably came into view, Jacob behind her.

“Oh!” Samantha said, and she brought up a hand to cover her mouth. “You ... you two, always out in the open!”

Triss shrugged. Jen sat up and laughed. Jacob grinned, gave Samantha a playful slap on the ass, and shoved her. Samantha squeaked as she fell, landed on Jennifer, and on Triss at that, one of her hands planting into Triss's abs.

“Jacob, you fucking asshole,” Triss said, rolling her eyes.

She expected Samantha to get up instantly, embarrassed as she was. But she didn't. Samantha gulped, looked Beatrice straight in her snake eyes, before her gaze drifted down over Triss's body, her tattoos and piercings, her abs, and down her smooth mons to where her clit-hood ring sat. A small chain dangled from the piercing tonight, something Jen asked for, and it jingled as her friend continued to finger her ass.

Jen, a total jackass, pumped her fingers up and down harder, now that they had a guest, earning a burst of pleasure from Triss and her clenching slit. She'd just cum, and Jen was never happy till she'd gotten a few more out of her, the damn woman.

Again, Triss expected Sam to back off. But again she didn't. She stared down at Triss's flexing stomach, her spread thighs, her bouncing clit chain, and the two fingers working up and down in her ass. Insides already swollen and aching with pleasure, it didn't take long for Triss's muscles to boil, and waves of pleasure to spread out from where Jen's fingers pressed up against her pussy. Plus, the damn chain kept bouncing around, hitting her engorged clit over and over.

She came again, and clenched down on her empty cunt, hard. A tiny shot of juices landed on Jen's wrist, and then another, and another, as the damn Ventrue fingered her even harder. Didn't take Jen long to have Triss's thighs rippling with the impact of her fingers. Only after the fifth little squirt did Jen finally ease up; stayed inside Triss, gently curling her fingers up again and again to milk Triss like a damn cow, but at least eased up.

And even as Triss came down from her orgasm high, dragged out by Jen's constant milking, Sam didn't back off. Hell, she looked utterly hypnotized, eyes still locked onto Triss's slit and where Jen's fingers spread her thoroughly lubed ass. And Sam's hand, still pressed to Triss's abs, gently flexed and unflexed at the fingertips.

Reality came flooding back to the Daeva, and she yanked her hand back with a gasp.

"Sorry! Sorry. Just, you ... you're so beautiful."

"Ha, beautiful?" Triss pulled some of her dark hair aside and exposed her crocodile fangs, and, of fucking course, the lack of cheeks.

Sam shook her head. "Yeah, those are scary. B-But..." She looked behind her to Jacob, before she looked back to Triss with a smile. "And your abs are amazing."

Triss burst into laughter, and pulled herself back up a bit to sit more upright on the blankets against the alcove wall. Jen didn't take the hint. She just lay between Triss's thighs instead of kneeling, got comfy on her side, and continued fingering her ass.

For a brief moment, Triss remembered a moment with Julias. Him, her, before shit got crazy, before Jen, before the hunters. She'd admitted to him then that she really got turned on by the idea of being watched; they promptly fucked on the couch, after she'd spent some time masturbating for him. Christ, that was a fucking lifetime ago.

And now she had a fucking audience. Jen watched of course, cause the damn slut loved to watch her handiwork. Othello and Madison were often around, and they took a peek, frequently. Hell, even Aaron took a peek sometimes. Sam and Jacob though? Jacob had probably experienced every kink known to man and then some. Him seeing Triss get fingered in the ass didn't mean anything. But Sam? Sam was brand new to the world of vampires, and the world of kinky sex. And she was, evidently, a total hornball. Having her around, watching Triss, totally hypnotized by it, hit Triss's horny bone in just the right place.

Triss relaxed back against the blankets, spread her thighs a bit more, and cupped one of her tits and massaged it, while her other hand reached down and massaged her pussy's lips. Hey, she liked Sam. Sam was nice. Sam was randy as fuck, twenty-four seven. Having her watch had Triss wanting to show off, and she did just that. She spread her slit's lips as she massaged them, and clenched down several times, knowing full well it'd put her insides on display, and all the juices leaking out of her.

Sam stared, frozen like a statue. Her eyes drifted some more, running up Triss's abs again, and the snake tattoo, up from its tail above her clit, to where it coiled around and bit into one of Triss's nipples. Her eyes drifted down again, and stared hard at Triss's spread open pussy as pleasure tremors shot up through Triss's body, causing her to moan, and squirt a couple more tiny splashes onto Jen's wrist. Damn, Sam was totally into watching.

Which suited Triss just fine.

A few hours later, Jacob and Samantha came out of his alcove, and into the center of the cave. He wore a suit, and Samantha wore nothing but a blanket. The man grinned at her, kissed her, and left, leaving Samantha standing in the cave alone.

So Samantha did what she always did when Jacob left, disappearing into the night to do whatever the fuck the man did in his free time: she came over and stood in Jen and Beatrice's alcove entrance. Jen and Triss were still naked, sitting and leaning back against their blankets and pillows, talking, about Jacob, about what he did those few nights ago, about Jack and the werewolves and Garry's inevitable push against the Invictus.

They shut up though, when Sam joined them. She had a necklace on, a subtle thing, and she fiddled with it with a finger and thumb as she walked over to them. Gift from Jacob, maybe?

“You two,” Sam said, “you never cover up. Even after I ... saw.”

Triss shrugged. “I used to, but after hanging out with these horny witches for, what, over a couple years now Jen? Don’t even notice the nudity anymore.”

Jen nodded, and nuzzled into Triss’s side. “It hardly matters to any vampire with a few years under their belt, let alone members of the Circle of the Crone. I imagine if you wandered your Prince’s tower enough, Samantha, you’d find Antoinette naked with her lover all the time.”

Samantha groaned at that and shook her head. “Ugh, don’t say that. I don’t think I could handle seeing Jack and my sire having sex.”

Triss laughed and shrugged. “That white-haired bitch seems pretty damn happy with him, so he must be good at it.”

“That’s worse! Jack is too young to be good at sex!”

Triss and Jen laughed, and Sam laughed too, eventually, and sat down with them. She didn’t do a good job keeping the blanket snug, exposing her legs quite a bit. Yeap, the witches were rubbing off on her.

“Keep your head down from now on, Sam,” Triss said.

“Because of what happened a few days ago? Antoinette told me about it. Jack ... I haven’t talked to him yet.”

“Probably should give him some space. I got a peek at the aftermath, and he was pretty beat up. I’m sure the Prince is pampering him while he recovers, but he'll ... well, knowing Jack, he'll want to deal with shit on his own and keep you from seeing it."

Sam sighed, and leaned back against the pile of blankets, only a couple feet away from Triss. "Yeah, you're right. Jack's too damn stubborn to ever ask for help, unless it was tactical."

"Ha, tactical. Yeah, that sounds like Jack." Triss shrugged and gestured to Sam with a hand. "Awkwardness aside, you must be proud of him. He's changed the Danse Macabre for the whole city in just a few years."

"I am! I am, but ... I'm worried for him. People ... Kindred die, and it's so scary, hearing about all these sad things."

Before Triss could say anything, something along the lines of 'yeah it sucks', Jen tapped Triss on the shoulder.

"Samantha," Jen said, "it is scary, and horrible. No one should have to go through what you did, or Beatrice, or Jack. But, you're immortal now. Don't make decisions to avoid pain or awkwardness in the moment. Play for the long game."

Samantha sighed and nodded, looking down at her knees. "How long?"

Jen reached across Triss's leg, and tapped Sam on a knee. "You were probably saving up your RSPs before you were embraced, yes?"

"Yes, of course."

"Well, make all decisions the same way you made that decision. Plan for things twenty to forty years in the future, because it's a reality that you'll see those years. Not only will you see them, you'll be stronger, more powerful, smarter, and better equipped to reap the benefits."

Slowly, Sam's frown faded, and a smile appeared. She was finally getting it.

"I won't be old and weak in thirty years. I'll be even stronger than I am now."

"Yeap," Triss said. "Don't make the mistakes I made."

"Mistakes?"

"Ha, yeah. I hung around in crypts for twenty years, wasting my time fighting the Invictus as a Carthian, and pissing away my years cause I thought ... well, I didn't think. I just reacted to shit around me, cause I was angry."

"Angry?"

Triss pointed at her face. "Nosferatu asshole stalker embraced me. Not my choice. I woke up with a hunger for blood and a crocodile mouth."

Samantha winced and looked down again. "That's horrible."

"Yeah, it was, and it really fucked me up for a long time. But if I'd pulled my head out of my ass and stopped looking back at the human life I missed, I could have learned to enjoy actually being a vampire. Could have met people like ... Julias. Could have made a fortune. Could have gotten laid more. Could have done a lot of things." She was doing that now, just not in a way she could have possibly expected. Becoming a witch, learning rituals, learning to control the world with what was basically magic, no fucking way could she have predicted that. "Besides, a lot of Nosferatu have it worse than Jacob or me. Bob in the tunnels looks like one of those classic, creepy gross vampires. Liliana is usually with him, and half of her face is covered in eyes. But, if they can pull themselves together, maybe they'll grow up to be the next Maria."

They all shivered. A pretty awesome goal for any Nosferatu, but at the same time, Maria the corpse lady was fucking terrifying.

“Yeah, I can do that. I can play the long game,” Sam said. “But, all these horrible things are happening right now!”

Jen nodded. “That’s why Garry and Michael, and Antoinette for that matter, aren’t just throwing themselves into the grinder haphazardly. They’re old, and they’d like to get older. This war building between the Invictus and Carthians has been decades in the making, Sam, and Antoinette’s playing for centuries. So she’s going to sit back and wait, and only act when she sees the perfect opportunity.”

“B-But, Jack’s going to get hurt, and not in decades, but maybe in these next few months! And—”

Jen held up a hand. “The boy continues to surprise everyone, Samantha. Trust him.”

She frowned, a motherly ‘I know my son’ sorta frown. Sure, she probably trusted him to be efficient and effective at anything he put his mind to, but didn’t trust him to rely on other people for personal shit.

Beatrice laughed and looked at Jen. Jen traded a look with her, and a memory sparked between them, turning their smiles into sad little frowns. Now? Might as well be now.

“Hey, Samantha,” Triss said.

“Yeah?”

“What’s Antoinette told you about Elen?”

“Elen? The hunter, or, uh, the old woman that worked with them? I know Jacob has her locked up somewhere, but that’s it.”

Sighing, Triss sat up, Jen too, and they both leaned in. Samantha gulped, and leaned in as well.

“Jacob’s given me the witch,” Triss said.

Samantha raised a brow. “Witch, like you?”

“Er, kinda? She’s different. She’s more like a ... I don’t know if there’s a word for it. Fleshmancer? She uses blood, muscle, bones, all that kinda stuff, and somehow manages to do some very fucked up shit with them. Like, that old Egyptian thing, haruspex? She’s done that, with humans.”

“Oh god!”

“Yeah, lot of fucked up shit. But she’s, uh, pretty much dead in the head. Think major dementia, but worse. She’s a sick, ruthless bitch, but so clueless, she’s running on autopilot. And I’m trying to make her work for me.”

Samantha frowned at her. “What? Why?”

“Because I ... it’s...” Jesus, how to say this and not sound like she was insane. “She can do some amazing things, you know? Jeremiah and Angela, they used her as a weapon, but I’m thinking she can do some good. She can do things that ... maybe...” Yeap, she was going to sound like an insane person. “She might be able to give me back something. Hell, maybe you, too.”

“Get us back something? What?”

Time for the hard part.

“I think Elen can ... can maybe rebuild people, people we’ve lost.”

Samantha stared at her, not understanding her. But slowly, her eyes widened, and she sat up straight and away.

“You ... you don’t mean...” The Daeva’s hand shot up to her necklace.

Beatrice held up her hands in surrender before lowering them. “I’m trying, just trying. Jacob says I’ll probably fail, but still thinks it’s worth chasing, you know? There’s something here, a chance, and I’d be a fucking moron not to try. I have to ... to try something.”

Triss took a peek at Jen. Her friend looked back to her, but her sad gaze fell to Samantha, who was looking more and more excited by the minute. Watching her face was like riding an emotional rollercoaster by proxy. Excited, then happy, then scared, then sad, then angry, then excited again.

“That’s scary, Beatrice. That’s really, really scary.”

“You’re telling me. But I have to try. I owe it to...” Did she owe it to Julias? The man died a hero, and left her. Did she owe it to Jacob? He’d given her the tools, but she’d put in the time, the pain, and the misery. “I owe it to myself to try. If I can have him back, if even for only a little bit, then it’s worth a try, right? It wasn’t fair, what happened. It wasn’t fair to him, and especially not...” No need to say it. It wasn’t fair to Mary, just a girl who happened to be related to someone involved.

Samantha clutched the blanket around her with one hand, and her necklace with the other. “No. It wasn’t fair.”

“So, I’m gonna try. Crúac rituals, they’ll help. There are things I can try, and some of them are nasty, but I’ll try them.”

“Will ... will anyone get hurt?”

Triss shook her head. “Only people who deserve it, and even then, only when I have to.” Before Samantha could ask what she meant, Triss shook her head again. “You’re happier not knowing the details, Sam. Just be happy knowing the only people getting hurt deserve it.” After a few seconds to process, Sam nodded, and Triss continued. “The issue isn’t that, though. The issue is Elen can’t do much without her book.”

“Book? Oh! Oh, the stuff my sire took, after Jack beat the hunters. Oh ... oooh...” She gulped and looked down. Yep, there it was, realization of what Triss was asking. “I ... don’t know if I can do that.”

“This isn’t a request you have to say yes or no to, Samantha, not now at least. But think about it, ok? I’m gonna keep trying. I have time, all the time in the world, and Elen’s immortal, somehow. She’s not going anywhere.”

Samantha clutched her necklace a little tighter, before letting it go and grabbing her blanket with both hands. “You can’t just ask Antoinette for the book?”

Jennifer spoke this time. “Antoinette and Jacob are old friends, Samantha, very old friends. But the Prince doesn’t trust him or the Circle enough to simply give us something that dangerous, especially after what we saw Elen do with it.”

“I know Jacob and my sire have a history,” Samantha said, raising her eyes, “but she can’t think that badly of him, if she’s letting me date him, right?”

Triss shrugged. “Not really the same, I guess. She probably trusts him with him a person. But with ... power? Probably not so much. But you’ve been seeing Jacob for a little while now, what do you think? Can you trust him? Me?”

Samantha thought about it, tapping her chin a bit as she did. On the surface, Jack’s mom didn’t seem like she had a lot going on upstairs, but at this point, Triss wasn’t going to assume anything. Sam was Jack’s mom, and Jack was too damn smart for a kid his age.

“I ... think I can,” she said. But before Triss could smile, or say something to encourage her, Sam looked at her, and the heaviness there struck Triss cold. “But, is this whole thing really a good idea? I’ve talked to my daughter, Triss, since she died. Multiple times. And it kills me, every time.”

“This isn’t the same!” Shit. Triss pulled back and winced. She didn’t mean to raise her voice like that, shocking her own damn, idiot self. “I’m not looking to get a glimpse of a ghost, Sam. I want him back.”

“I understand. I do! But ... but Julias would want you to be happy, right? And, I don’t know, you’ve seemed happy.” She smiled a little, and squirmed a bit, obviously entertaining the memory she had of Triss get fingered just a few hours ago. “I mean, I don’t know, I don’t get to see a lot of what the Circle does, but every time I’ve seen you, Triss, you’ve been mingling with Jen, Othello, Aaron, and even Jacob, and you ... seem happy.”

Silence fell on the alcove. Triss managed a glance at Jen, and her friend smiled at her as she set a hand on Triss’s leg. Yeah, Jen knew Triss was slowly but surely coming out of her pit of depression, and was, in a strange way, finding a place for herself in the Circle. Every day, she got over Julias a little bit more. Every day, his smile, his touch, the sound of his voice, they faded, just a little bit. And that terrified her.

“I still have to try.”

Samantha nodded with a weary sigh, the sound someone made when they knew exactly what the other was going through. “I understand. And I’ll ... think about it.”

~~Jack~~

A few days later, it was time for Veronica to become a full thrall, bound by the Vinculum. She'd not only managed to digest a lot of information about the paranormal world, she did it without freaking out. Apparently it was common for new thralls to crack when they found out ghosts and vampires and shit were real. But not her. The world of the Danse Macabre and the Masquerade intrigued her, a lot, and she found it infinitely more interesting than her old life. An ideal candidate for a potential vampire, if it ever came to that.

Well, either way, he was damn impressed. The young woman was smarter than she seemed, and seemed to enjoy her new life. She hadn't moved into her new apartment yet, but she was damn excited to do it, now that she could easily afford it. If she ever became a ghoul, she'd probably live in the mansion, but for now it was better she had her own place.

So, after some deliberation, and after his wounds healed — way too fucking fast — he gave his new thrall a call, for the final dose. And of course, he gave Elaine and Antoinette a call too, cause he had no fucking clue how it was going to go.

Elaine and Antoinette stood within the lobby of his mansion, and they watched with delighted eyes, as Veronica suckled on his wrist. He didn't think the third dose needed to be such a big one, but Antoinette suggested it should be, to commemorate the big moment, and to help the thrall associate the pleasure of ingesting vitae, with their new found adoration for their master. And as dark and twisted as that sounded, there was no denying Veronica was drinking his blood like it was the most delicious thing she'd ever tasted.

“Wow,” she said, and she stumbled back before slowly lowering herself down to sit on the stairs. No crazy rage consumed her, nothing that suggested the curse affected her. Thank god.

Jack smiled, healed his wrist, and looked to Antoinette and Elaine. Veronica looked buzzed on pleasure, while the two elders looked lost in ancient, joyful memories, their eyes only half watching the thrall, and their smiles subtle.

“The Vinculum is complete,” Antoinette said. “How do you feel, Veronica?”

“I feel great! And...” She blushed as she looked down and squirmed on the stairs. “Wow. Um, I ... what now? Master?”

Jack shivered. Master. He hadn’t asked her to call him that, and he hadn’t planned on it. But, damn, it felt nice.

The two elders chuckled, looked at each other, and exchanged some psychic conversation only women were capable of.

“I think tonight,” Elaine said, “you should pay your friend what she is owed, no?”

“Friend? Owe? What—oh. Jessy. Damn.”

“Jessy? What about her?” Veronica asked.

“She, uh...” Wow, how to say this without freaking her out. “She wants to see Antoinette and me having sex, because no one in this city cares about privacy. She did me a solid, so I owe her. And of course Jessy wants a sex tape as payment.” Or more like, that’s what he’d sold her, cause he was an idiot.

“Oh. Um—”

“Would you like to come and observe, in person, dear sweet creature?” Antoinette said, in a deliberately deeper, huskier tone. “I do love an audience.”

Jack put up his hands. “You don’t have to—”

“I’ll do it!”

---

Veronica spent the next twenty minutes ooh’ing and aw’ing as Antoinette guided them through her tower and down into its beautiful underground labyrinth, far prettier than the underground tunnels under Jack’s mansion. Those looked like torture cells dug underground for World War One.

Veronica gasped for the millionth time when they stepped into Antoinette’s bedroom. The vault door surprised her. The giant room delighted her.

Within the room awaited Ashley and Julee, and Jack rolled his eyes as he found the two girls setting up cameras and professional lighting.

“Uh, what?” he said, gesturing to all the obviously professional filming equipment. Two cameras on tripods, one handheld, some light umbrellas, and a whole bunch of other stuff.

Antoinette shrugged. “This is but a small selection of my tools for recording.”

The prince’s two ghouls giggled as they bounced over. Naked. Oh boy.

“Is this the new girl?” they said together, and they smiled as they looked Veronica up and down.

“Um ... hi,” Veronica said, and she gulped as she looked between the two slightly taller girls. She hadn’t expected nudity, not yet anyway.

“Hi! I’m Ashley. This is Julee. We’re the Prince’s ghouls. And you’re Veronica, Jack’s new thrall? Wow, you’re pretty. Love the hair.”

Veronica blushed and squirmed in place, and cast a few nervous glances to Jack, expecting him to save her. Despite her enthusiasm on being a part of this, she was looking a little anxious now. Poor girl had no idea how crazy tonight was probably going to get.

“Are the cameras running?” Antoinette asked.

Ashley nodded. “Mhmm, set to the center of the bed. And she just has to press the red button on the handheld and it’ll record.”

“Excellent. Now, come here.”

Ashley and Julee came to join them, smiling, and they both shivered as Elaine and Antoinette took them into their hands. Naked and standing with their backs against the stomachs of the two older women, both younger women smiled at him and Veronica as Elaine and Antoinette ran hands up and down their naked bodies. The two ghouls watched him and his thrall, and erupted into squeals, and then melted into bliss, as Elaine and Antoinette devoured them. More than devoured, fingered. Antoinette took Julee, Elaine took Ashley, and the two vampires put both ghouls on display as they fingered and Kissed them, driving both girls to orgasm in record breaking time.

Veronica moaned as she watched, quiet enough she probably didn’t realize she did. Her nipples pressed hard against her white blouse, and she struggled to keep her hands at her side.

Antoinette lifted her fangs from the now unconscious Julee, and grinned at Veronica, before she and Elaine set the two ghouls gently on the floor at the foot of the giant bed. Nodding, Antoinette began to undress, slowly undoing a button of her suit, and then another, eyes on Veronica as she did.

“Veronica,” she said, “you may be Jack’s new thrall, but he is my love, and I his. Understand?”

Veronica gulped, and nodded.

“Excellent.” She slipped out of her suit jacket, her shirt, and then, her bra. Veronica’s eyes went wide as she stared at just how absurdly busty the Prince was. “However, I am a sharing lover. Am I not, Elaine?”

“Charitable beyond words.” Laughing, Elaine set her own suit on the floor, and slowly slipped out of her underwear, exposing her smooth mons as she slid the fabric down her equally smooth legs.

“Indeed. So, Veronica, if you perform well tonight, I promise you will be quite satisfied.” Antoinette gave a devil smile and looked to Jack, checking in if he was ok with what she was implying. He was, cause he was a guy, and when in doubt, he had to listen to his penis.

“P-Perform?”

Nodding, Antoinette slid out of her own underwear, grabbed the handheld camera, and brought it to her. “You shall record us. If you can remain focused on that task, and not touch yourself in any way, you will have what you desire. Understood?”

Veronica gulped again, so hard they all heard it, and she took the camera. “Yes, Prince.” She had a hard time taking her eyes off Antoinette’s now completely naked body. It was a lot of smooth, pale skin.

“Wonderful.” With a hearty, villainous chuckle, Antoinette crawled onto the bed. Elaine joined her, also chuckling with similar dark tones as the two elders found the center of the huge bed. They were having fun.

It was going to be one of those nights. Whenever these two fed together, it was like they’d become possessed by sex spirits; in Dolareido, that was perfectly possible. Both of them already Blushed Life due to the meal, and both smiled at him with hungry succubus grins as they got cozy on the mattress.

He managed a soft smile for the obviously nervous Veronica, and stripped. “Don’t worry. Just point the camera at”—where the hell would Jessy prefer the camera point?—“wherever the action is. No need to get artistic. We already got a professional setup also filming.” He gestured to the other cameras already recording.

“Yes Master. I ... oh my.” She stared at him, eyes wide, and ran her eyes up and down his body as he tossed aside his suit, and Blushed Life. It took her a few seconds, but she managed to remember the camera, and she brought it up to point at him as she pressed the button. And, without even trying to hide the fact, spent a lot of time with it pointed at his body, his abs, his shoulders and chest, and his penis. And, well, considering he’d just watched two ballerinas get fingered into a mess of orgasms, and now had two well-fed, very horny women waiting for him on the bed, he was already getting erect.

Veronica licked her lips, breath quickening, but kept both hands on the camera.

He walked over the side of the bed, and both elders turned to face him, Elaine pressing her body into Antoinette’s back. Without missing a beat, she spooned with the Prince, propped her head up with her left hand and elbow, and reached around Antoinette with her right hand. Her exploring digits slid down his lover’s body, traced lines along her breasts, her waist and stomach, and then to her mons. A moment later, she set a single finger against Antoinette’s clitoris, and began to gently caress it as she grinned at Jack over the Prince’s shoulder.

“You have spent night after night indulging yourself with our breasts,” Antoinette said. “Perhaps, you would like to actually have sex with us tonight? Silly boy.”

Silly boy. It wasn't a tease she normally used. Elaine brought out a playful, dominant side in Antoinette. Normally she was in charge, but tender and inviting in contrast to her normally cold and domineering presentation. When Elaine was involved, Jack could see an older part of her personality emerge, something that wanted to play with him like a cat would its toy.

Well, he was perfectly cool being a cat toy.

He shivered, met their ancient gazes, and climbed up onto the bed with them, Veronica following. She didn't climb onto the bed, but she leaned over it, and kept the camera pointed. He knelt beside Antoinette in front of her midriff, all while the two ladies watched him with desire, and Elaine continued to massage his lover's clit in that super gentle, pre-sex kinda way.

"So, uh ... how to do this?" He gestured to the cameras and to Veronica.

Laughing, Elaine rolled onto her back, and Antoinette mirrored her. They scooted back further up the enormous bed, set their backs on the mountain of pillows so the two of them were half sitting, half leaning back, and resumed their dangerous smiles. Elaine lifted her left leg where it pressed into Antoinette's, slid it between her friend's, and used it to help pull the woman's legs apart. Chuckling, Antoinette complied, and spread both her milky white thighs.

"How about," Elaine said, eyes finally sliding off Jack and down onto Antoinette, "you enjoy your lover, for now. I will join in momentarily." The Ventrue turned onto her side again, snuggled into Antoinette's side, and resumed her gentle caresses of Antoinette's pink labia. They grew redder by the second as they swelled, the Prince's body on a hair trigger considering she just fed, and fed to the point poor Julee was comatose.

Plus, with Elaine, Antoinette got aroused very, very quickly, despite how her eyes remained fixed on him. Something about treating him to a second pair of curvy hips and huge breasts really set her on fire. Soon to be three pairs, given her intentions.

“Skipping foreplay?” he said.

Elaine laughed. “Good heavens, no. I will handle foreplay. You, come, enter your darling Prince, and engage in some slow, romantic, tender, and caring love making.”

Not exactly what he figured Jessy would want to see. He raised a brow, but a nod from Antoinette sealed the order, along with her reaching behind her to grab a pillow, and set it under her butt, elevating it. He crawled over and between Antoinette’s legs, slid his knees under her thighs, and with a single hand, guided his hard length down, and into her slit. Wet, warm, she squeezed invitingly, and smiled her succubus smile at him as he slowly sank his length into her. And as he did, Elaine continued to caress and massage her clitoris, using two fingers now, and a little more pressure.

Veronica stepped around the bed toward the head, and leaned over the bed some more, groaning quietly as she did. The audio would get picked up by the camera, but Jack knew Jessy wouldn’t care. Hell, she’d probably like it.

He groaned as his eyes roamed over Antoinette’s mountainous breasts, flattened to her chest and spreading out over her ribs, but still massive. And after a second, his eyes fell to Elaine’s breasts, and he watched where they squished to Antoinette’s side. At least, he watched until Elaine grinned at him.

“Sorry,” he said after a few more seconds of staring, eyes on Elaine. “About, uh ... you know, the breast obsession.”

She laughed, even more warmly than before. “It is quite alright, young Ventrue. I am a buxom beauty, after all. I have seduced many with these breasts of mine.”

“I believe Jack’s obsession transcends typical masculine enthusiasm,” Antoinette said. “I believe we have entered fetish territory.”

“You are hardly one to talk, old friend. How many times have you cum to this boy’s lips around your nipples, hmm?” Rolling her eyes, Elaine snuggled in tighter to Antoinette’s side, and the Prince lifted her arm so the woman could press her chest into Antoinette’s ribs. The Ventrue’s two huge breasts squashed into Antoinette’s right breast where it pulled to the side of her torso, and pushed it back up onto her ribs somewhat. She did it on purpose, knowing full well the sight of their breasts smooshing together and molding into heavenly shapes was utterly hypnotizing to Jack.

“Dozens,” Antoinette whispered as she gently pushed her hips up to meet his in a gentle, excruciatingly slow rhythm. “Hundreds.”

Elaine nodded, validated, and she nuzzled her head onto Antoinette’s shoulder, planting a few kisses along the Prince’s alabaster skin as she did.

“You have been blessed.”

“Her, blessed?” Jack said. “I’m the lucky one, here.”

It was Antoinette’s turn to roll her eyes. “She means, because we can engage in sexual delights until Hell freezes over, and yet, you continue to drown me in your enthusiasm and desire.”

That, was true. He couldn’t help himself. The sight of her naked, combined with her confidence and desire, lit his body like it was kindling, even after they’d fucked hundreds and hundreds of times, with Antoinette drowning him in a myriad of kinks. The fact those kinks were very one-sided, like two-girl threesomes, or four-girl fivesomes, was icing on a very delicious cake.

“And,” Elaine continued, “how easy it is for a horny young Kindred to find himself unable to resist his hunger for his prey, fucking them as he feeds. And yet you do not.” She grinned at him, then Veronica, and then the camera.

Ah, cheating. He supposed that was true. Mentally, he wasn't capable of crossing that line. And to a paranoid creature like an elder vampire, that must have been a rare trait to find in another. His self control with Veronica must have settled some small fears in Antoinette's mind, too.

Elaine's massaging fingers grew faster, much faster, and Antoinette let out a quiet, relaxed sigh, as her insides started to spasm. The taller Ventrue kept up the pace for a minute, quickly pushing the Daeva up to orgasm, before she relented. The three of them watched Antoinette's body, admiring how the gorgeous goddess shivered subtly with climax, how her enormous breasts rippled on her chest and around her ribs, and Jack in particular indulged in the amazing sensation of her insides squeezing like a vise.

Antoinette laughed, reached up, grabbed his shoulders, and pulled him down to her. She wanted him to lie down on her, which was definitely one of their more intimate styles of lovemaking. If she felt comfortable doing this in front of Elaine, or Jessy for that matter, he was hardly one to deny her. He pulled his legs out from under hers, lay atop her, and rested his head between her breasts. Naturally, as she always did, Antoinette set her hands on his back, caressed and massaged his spine and shoulder blades, while her biceps pushed her breasts together up on her chest for him. Pillows. Giant, soft pillows. Heaven. She couldn't use her right hand this time, with her arm out so Elaine could cuddle in close, but Elaine's body helped keep her breasts together instead.

When Elaine started to move, he turned his head to face her, but he kept it resting on the glorious mountain of pillows as he watched her. She slid down a few inches, and with the hand that'd earlier been massaging Antoinette's clitoris, she cupped the underside of the Prince's right breast. Jack watched as Elaine leaned in closer, until she was only inches from Jack's face, and with a devilish twinkle in her eye, she wrapped her lips around Antoinette's right nipple.

Antoinette sighed with bliss, and nudged her hips toward Jack. He almost didn't notice. He was too busy staring at how Elaine suckled and licked his lover's areola, how she grazed the sensitive skin with her teeth before kissing the nipple, and how when she pressed her face down into the softness, the enormous breast molding to swallow it in supple skin. Veronica had the same idea. She climbed onto the bed, probably hypnotized as well, and did her best to keep the camera steady as she came in closer, only a few feet away, as she pointed the camera down at Antoinette and her breasts.

As much as he loved sucking on Antoinette's nipples, there was definitely something to watching someone else do it. Ashley, Julee, they'd all done it, but Elaine showed a mix of patience and skill that left him speechless. Every kiss, every lick, every suckle and every nudge, it was so perfectly timed, while at the same time obviously meant to be a spectacle for him and the camera. Elaine may not have had the obsessive need to show off like Antoinette did, but he could see that where Elaine drew a more sexually aggressive side out of Antoinette, Antoinette drew a desire to show off out of Elaine.

No wonder the two of them were so dangerous together.

Antoinette's left hand drifted up Jack's back, and guided his head to her left breast. He groaned into it as he devoured it hungrily, opening his mouth and trying to encompass as much of it as he could; not much, compared to how much was there. It earned some more chuckles from the Prince, and quiet, controlled moans, when his hungry mouth slid higher, and greedily devoured her nipple.

He turned his head to watch Elaine, and she did the same for him, as the two of them suckled on the Prince's breasts. Antoinette pushed her hips up into him, and he nudged his body back and forth, bathing his cock in the tight, hot friction of her wet pussy, but his focus was wholly on her breasts. He mimicked Elaine, suckling and kissing in a rhythm soon in time with her.

Antoinette's insides clamped down on him hard, and her left hand pinned his head into the softness of her breast. And she did the same to Elaine, right hand burying the woman's face to her as another orgasm hit her. She came fast. He wasn't sure if it was because of the meal, Elaine, all the breast suckling, or that she'd suddenly become the center of attention of Veronica's camera. Probably all of it.

The two of them eased up on their suckling, and Jack groaned as he felt his cum begin to stir, heat building between his thighs and behind his testicles. But he didn't cum, not yet. As Antoinette came down from her climax and let the two of them go, Jack lifted his head, stared down at her lightly shivering, amazing body, and dared not move an inch. The electric pleasure running down through his length had him so damn close to orgasm, it took every ounce of effort he had to hold still.

"Oh, such self control," Antoinette said with her devil smile. "Elaine, be a dear and help the poor boy?"

Laughing with more warmth and merriment than Jack expected, Elaine sat up, and crawled behind him. Behind, and on top of him. He gulped as he looked up at Antoinette from between her breasts, and shivered as he felt his great grandsire's body press down on his. Her leg legs mixed in with his and the Prince's. Her pelvis pressed down on his ass. Her heavy, large breasts pressed down on his head, shoulders, and neck, and soon, he was staring up at Antoinette from between four breasts, all fighting for space against his body.

With Elaine behind him, pressing her body down on him, he was thoroughly pinned, and he shivered under the sensation of her breasts molding to the shape of his neck and shoulders as she pushed her weight into him. Now with both arms free, Antoinette slid them down his body and pressed them against his lower back under Elaine’s stomach, her biceps pushing her enormous breasts up to keep them mountainous. She smiled at him, obviously delighting in squashing his head between four breasts; he certainly was. And for some damn reason, having it filmed didn’t bother him. Hell, he was kinda liking that too.

Elaine pushed her pelvis into his ass, and quickly found a fucking rhythm. Each time she pushed her body into him, she drove his hips forward, burying him that last inch inside his lover, and pinning his body to hers. Elaine made sure to press her whole body down onto him too, and when he looked up, he could see her head hanging over his, grinning with the same devil smile Antoinette had. And of course, each thrust of hers meant the four breasts currently enveloping his shoulders and head jiggled, the ripples in their soft, heavy tits traveling into his neck and cheeks.

He melted onto his lover as the two women squashed him in legs and boobs, and came inside her. Veronica moaned again, her blush returning hard, and she slowly panned the camera up and down the body of the two women sandwiching him.

“Ah, there we go,” Elaine said. He managed to look up at her for a moment, and how she kept her head hanging upside down over his so she could grin at him as she pressed her body into his back, breasts into his shoulders and neck. But apparently that wasn’t enough, because she pressed harder, and everything went black as her torso and breasts buried him, and his face sank in between Antoinette’s breasts. Elaine kept thrusting against his ass too, and he moaned quietly into their breasts as the warm sparks of pleasure traveled up and down his cock, each earning a flex of his inner muscles, and a following gush of cum into his lover.

Elaine only stopped when his cum stopped gushing into Antoinette, and she pushed herself up. She didn't get off him though. Apparently, she was happier staying on top of him, with her breasts hanging and nudging against his head.

“Elaine,” Antoinette said, and she gave her friend a small wink.

Elaine laughed, slipped off Jack, and walked off toward Antoinette's nearby vanity desk. “So we are doing that, tonight?”

“The timing is perfect, non? I think this will be a most enjoyable experience. And visual delight.” Antoinette reached down, flipped him over onto his back, smiled at him, and then smiled at the camera. She reached back, set some more pillows behind her so she was a little more propped up in a sitting position, and she pulled him snug to her belly, so that her breasts rested on his shoulders.

“Uh, what're you going to do to me?”

“Elaine is going to treat you.”

“You two treat me almost every night.”

“Oui, but I think tonight will be especially fun.”

He raised a brow, looked up at her, and melted as she grinned at him. Whatever it was she was thinking, it was fun for her. If she was having fun, he was having fun. No thinking about stupid shit like curses and ghosts. Not even thinking about the fact they were being filmed. Nope, just two lovers and their friend, having a lovely night of sex.

Elaine returned with a bottle of lubricant in her hand, hand towel in the other, and she crawled along the bed back toward him. Like Antoinette, whenever traversing the bed was necessary, she made sure to crawl like a strutting cat, back arched down, and breasts swaying underneath her; Veronica was quick to get that on film, too. As he stared at Elaine, she came up to his legs, straddled them, reached down, and poured lubricant onto his cock.

“You have soaked my breasts and sex in cum over a dozen times, since I have arrived in the city,” she said, eyes on him, one hand spreading the lube, the other drizzling it onto him. That was a lot of lube. It was already coated in his cum, and Antoinette’s, but if she was going to tit-fuck him over a long time, it was a good idea to get some fresh lubricant.

“Y-Yeah,” he said.

“But we have not had anal sex, not once.”

“Umm...” Whoa.

She set the lubricant aside, used the towel to dry her hands, and inched herself further forward along his legs. Eventually, she slowly lowered her pussy down onto the underside of his cock, and pinned its length along his lower abs. Her swollen labia leaked wetness around his girth, and he shivered as she eased her smooth slit back and forth an inch. And sure enough, Veronica came in closer, and pointed the camera straight at where Elaine’s pussy spread around his girth. One of his thrall’s hands squeezed the blankets, as if afraid she’d touch herself if she didn’t.

Grin unending, Elaine leaned forward, set her left hand on his chest, grabbed his length with her right hand, lifted her ass up, and guided his length up to tease his glans along her folds. But, she guided it back further, and as her grin grew even more, she slowly started to lower her ass onto his cock.

“My dear friend has told me you have yet to enjoy a woman’s ass?”

“Um.” He looked up at Antoinette behind him, who shrugged and nodded. “She told me she doesn’t really enjoy anal, and considering how spoiled I already am, it’s not like I was going to push the issue.”

“She may not, but I certainly do.” Her ring of muscle clenched and unclenched, and between each clench, the elder lowered her large, curvy ass down further and further onto his cock. Holy fuck, that ring of muscle squeezed so hard, it brought everything to a standstill, and he shivered as the elder shifted her hips about, working the lubricant around and around. Deeper, the texture was different, but still hot and soft, and he gulped as her clenching sphincter swallowed another inch of him.

Veronica let out a quiet meep, and crawled down the bed a few feet so she could film from behind. Yeah, Jessy would definitely want that.

Eventually, Elaine’s ass found his thighs, and she let gravity bury her balls-deep on his cock. Her hands found his chest, and she teased fingers up and down the muscles, while he stared at her stomach, her smooth mons, and how with her sitting like that, he couldn’t see where he penetrated her. It almost looked like they were having regular sex.

At least it did, until Elaine leaned back and set both her hands on his legs. Veronica squeaked again, and came back to sit beside Jack and Antoinette as she pointed the camera at Jack’s pelvis. Tilted back, it was obvious how Elaine’s asshole was spread around his cock, and how her gorgeous, empty pussy above clenched in spurts, only to leak some of her juices down onto him.

Laughing and grinning at the camera, Elaine reached down and teased her clitoris, catching it between two fingers and softly running the two digits up and down along the soaked, very swollen flesh. It earned more clenches, clenches Jack felt, the thin wall of flesh between her two holes allowing him to feel the different ways her insides flexed. And with her leaning back like that, his cock's natural up-and-forward angle pressed up toward her pussy.

“Jesus,” he whispered.

“Jesus,” Veronica whispered.

Antoinette laughed and rolled her eyes, but said nothing. She kept him snug on her stomach, his head between her breasts, her breasts on his shoulders. Her hands teased his chest and abs, fingertips sliding up and down his skin, but her eyes were locked onto the sight of his cock as well, and where it entered her old friend.

“Quite the sight, is it not?” Elaine asked.

“I ... yeah. But uh, is it pleasurable for you?”

She licked her lips as she looked down. “Aw, a gentleman, to be concerned with my pleasure. But do not worry. I enjoy this quite a bit.” Her caressing finger sped up, and Jack sucked in a quick breath as her insides clamped down. “Plus, I have only moments before devoured a meal. Moments after that, I suckled upon my friend's breasts, and then rubbed my naked body against her lover, as he filled my friend with his seed. I”—her voice grew deeper and huskier as she gazed down at him and his body, before grinning at the camera—“am very, very close. At this point, I stiff breeze could drive me to climax.”

Leave it to a Ventrue to be blunt as fuck, but bombastic about it.

He groaned as she set both her hands on his legs again, and started to bounce. Her ass jiggled as it collided with his thighs, and he stared at her body as she rode him. Her huge breasts rippled almost like water against her chest, and her flat stomach rolled with the motion of each downward bounce. Her drenched ring of muscle clenched on his cock hard enough he worried she might hurt him, but she was an expert. She inched her hips forward a little as she bounced, each downward motion causing his cock to drive up and forward toward her belly and pussy from the inside, before her ass devoured his length completely.

Three minutes later, she was cumming. Her bounces slowed in pace, but increased in strength, and she continued to lean back with her hands on his legs as she milked her orgasm. Every couple of seconds, she lifted her butt off him, then slammed it back down, causing her breasts to almost jump off her chest before settling down, hanging with their mass. Her insides clenched once she devoured him, the lubricant allowing the skin to keep sliding. And her exposed pussy clenched on itself, causing more juices to leak out of her. More, and more.

Veronica gasped, and brought the camera in close, and close, until she was almost blocking Jack's view. She had the camera pointed straight at his cock, Elaine's trembly slit, and the juices leaking out of her. Yeah, vampires made a mess when they had sex. Not exactly the most ideal way for Veronica to learn that, though.

Elaine stopped bouncing, and instead slowly ground her hips back and forth an inch while keeping him buried to the hilt inside her ass. She grinned at him, but he couldn't tear his eyes away from her clenching pussy, and how the pink slit, a little spread with her thighs apart, leaked more juices. That was a hefty orgasm, and her body quivered with it, tremors working through her and causing ripples to dance along her thighs and heavy breasts.

“And,” she said as she stopped shivering, “after the first taste of bliss, the following are always much, much easier to catch.”

He managed a slow nod, but otherwise said nothing, just watched as the busty blonde grinned down at him.

“Hmm. Non. Something else?”

Elaine tapped her chin, thinking, and turned one-eighty, putting her legs on the right side of him. She leaned back over his left side, pressed both hands down against the blankets underneath her, and arched her back, pushing her breasts up toward the ceiling. Oh good god. Each position earned a tiny groan from him, and a louder one from Veronica, as she slowly panned the camera up and down Elaine’s body.

“A swimsuit model, perhaps?” his great grandsire asked.

He almost said something, like ‘yes fucking please’, but stopped himself. It was a game, a game they played often. Tease him until he came. He loved this game.

The Prince shook her head. “Non.”

“Picky, are you not?” Rolling her eyes, Elaine turned away from him, straddled him with knees outside his legs, sat up straight, and reached her hands up. “Perhaps, a voyeur, spying on a woman as she showers?” She ran her fingers back through her long blonde hair, elbows up and out, and ass gripping hard despite her very slow, sensuous back-and-forth hip motion.

He sucked in a small breath, and Antoinette chuckled.

“I think you have found it, oui.”

“Ah. Your lover is a dirty boy. Quite reprehensible, to spy on a woman while she bathes. Something I am sure that harlot Jessie would gladly do.” She turned her head enough to get a peek at him and the camera over her shoulder, but she didn’t stop grinding her ass down onto him, and she didn’t stop playing with her hair, either. With her elbows up and her back arched lightly, her heavy breasts were visible from behind, the outer curve of each jiggling slightly with every forward thrust of her hips.

And, of course, her ass was on full display. She was a curvy woman, like Antoinette, thin with the discipline of an athlete, and blessed with the genetics of a curvaceous goddess. So, like Antoinette, she had a great ass, and when he wasn’t staring at the teardrop curve of each of her breasts visible along the sides of her torso, his eyes were locked onto her ass, and where his cock penetrated it.

He was cumming a minute later. And Elaine, chuckling the whole time, milked him, grinding and swaying and posing for him relentlessly, even as his hot cum gushed into her and soaked everything inside. Veronica whimpered, and slowly panned the camera up to his head where it sat between Antoinette’s breasts, and then back down over his chest, his crunching abs, and where his cum trickled out of Elaine’s ass down onto his pelvis. Elaine’s muscles trembled, clenching in random spasms a few times, and warmth flowed down onto his testicles. She was cumming too. God damn, she really did enjoy this.

Elaine turned to face him again, without removing his length from her insides. He groaned as the movement reignited pleasure along his sensitive skin, and caused more of his cum to trickle down his length out of her. And of course Veronica groaned as well, and she leaned in so close she finally did block Jack's view, all so she could get a closeup of Elaine's pussy.

Chuckling, Elaine leaned forward, weight on her knees, and slid forward an inch, guiding his cock to press forward toward her pussy. Apparently she wasn't done. She smiled at the camera, at Veronica, and bounced. She raised her hands to her breasts, and played with them, squeezing and massaging, all the while driving her hips back and forth on Jack's body.

"I can be Antoinette," she said between a few planned, expert moans, "dancing for her lover." With a wicked smile, she slid her hands up to her hair and combed her fingers through it, elbows up and out again, except this time with her body facing him, and her hips moving seamlessly. And as Jack stared, she twisted her hips in a circular motion.

He recognized that dance. That was a belly dance, the slow, sensual kind. The Ventrue riding him slowly twisted her and shook her hips left and right, while constantly driving them back and forth. She slid her hands down her body, elbows still up, until her fingers found her breasts where she traced playful circles on the huge, rippling mounds.

She bounced faster, driving her ass back and forth, until she sighed with pleasure, and slowed. More juices trickled down her pink lips and onto his body, mixing with his cum still sneaking out of her gripping ass and onto his cock.

"You're not human!" Veronica said. "This is ... just ... oh my god, how you are doing that?"

Elaine and Antoinette looked at each other, and laughed.

“I think your new thrall has earned a taste,” Antoinette said, and she ran her fingers down Jack’s body, down his abs, and down to the wetness Elaine’s empty, clenching slit dripped onto his pelvis. “I think Jessy will be satisfied.”

Jack peeked over at Veronica. The poor girl was delirious with arousal. He could smell it, and so could the elders. Her face was red with embarrassment, but also excitement and desire. And she had earned it; she still held the camera up, pointed at Elaine, slowly working the woman’s whole body.

“I think you’re right,” he said with a grin. Ok, yeah, this was fun.

Veronica gasped, and beamed at him. Her eyes melted with desire as Jack groaned, pleasure rippling through him as Elaine slipped off him.

Chuckling, Elaine grabbed his ankles, and pulled him off Antoinette and toward the bottom edge of the bed like he weighed nothing. She motioned for Veronica, and the girl bounced off the bed and joined them, standing before Jack. Elaine took the camera from her, sat down beside Jack, and helped him sit up as Antoinette also came to join them. The tall elder stood behind Veronica, and folded her arms across her chest as she watched, smiling, one of her fingers teasing a swollen nipple.

“She is yours, my love, your pet. Give her her commands.”

Veronica, standing a foot in front of Jack, nodded excitedly. “Please, Master?”

He groaned softly, and licked his fangs. The Ventrue side of him almost came right there, with how his thrall, his pet, said ‘master’, and looked at him with doe eyes.

“Strip.”

She mewled, and obeyed. Antoinette helped her, undoing buttons and taking her clothes as she shed them. Short, with pale skin, thin but soft, with large breasts that covered her ribs. The blue hair contrasted it perfectly. The three vampires each took a moment to admire the pierced nipples, the pierced belly button, and surprisingly, the tiny chain that dangled from her clit hood. When did she put that on?

“Am I ... attractive enough?” she said, arms shaking at her sides, and eyes drifting back and forth between Elaine and Antoinette. The two elders chuckled quietly, but Antoinette looked at Jack with an obvious ‘make her feel more secure’ gaze.

Jack smiled at his new thrall, and held out a hand for her. “I’d be lying if I said I hadn’t thought about fucking you since Elaine kissed you that first night, Veronica.” Her eyes lit up. “Now, sit on my lap facing me, and take all of me, slowly.”

Her whole body shook with adrenaline, and she took his shoulders into her trembling hands. He couldn’t wait to Kiss her, and not just because of the effect adrenaline had on the taste.

The difference between Veronica and the two elders was instantly apparent. She whimpered as she lowered herself down onto him, eyes locked onto his abs and below. Antoinette and Elaine normally controlled their descents, and used subtle dancing rhythms as they devoured him. Veronica was struggling to not collapse with need, and every inch she took him was met with shivering muscles and hot, dripping juices. She’d been on edge for a long time.

Her groans filled the room as she took him to the base, and she stared down at her spread lips, and the tiny chain dangling from her clit hood. It rested against Jack’s skin where cock met pelvis, only an inch long, and he smiled at Veronica as he looked down as well. That was an interesting sensation. That, was a fun sensation.

Elaine kept the camera pointed at Veronica's body, aiming it over Jack's shoulder so she could pan it up and down over the thrall, slowly but constantly drifting between her breasts, and to where her spread pussy soaked Jack. Antoinette stood behind Veronica, and set her hands on the thrall's trembling shoulders gently. The look in her gaze said it all: you're in charge of her, so have fun with her.

Now Jack understood why the two elders often had evil smiles on, cause he couldn't help but smile like a villain as he met Veronica's desperate gaze. She was so horny, so desperate for stimulation, so overwhelmed with the insanity of her situation, and so compelled by the Vinculum, her body was already a hair's breadth away from cumming. And seeing her that close, made him want to tease her.

"Happy?" he said to her.

"Yes, god, yes."

"And you want more?"

She mewled as she squirmed, desperate and boiling. "Yes, please."

"Then, hold still."

"What? Master, I—"

"Hold. Still." He set one hand on her hip, while his other reached down, and picked up the tiny chain by its end. And as he met his thrall's desperate eyes, he lightly jingled it.

"Nnnn!" She squeezed his shoulders, her jaw dropped, and her mewls turned into squeaks. Wriggling and squirming, she stared down at her clitoris, where it nudged against his pelvis whenever she involuntarily moved her pelvis forward, and moreover, how her piercing bounced along it. And she squeezed, hard, from even the smallest jingle, causing more of her juices to leak onto him.

There was only so much holding still she could do, before she started moving her hips. She tried to keep it hidden, but between all her mewls and whimpers and desperate squeezing on his shoulders, she started rocking back and forth. He didn't stop her. Her own attempts to stop herself, and simply being unable to, were delicious to watch.

She came, and her body turned into a writhing mess. Her muscles clamped down in spasms, and a new coating of hot juices trickled out of her as her insides milked his cock. He let go of the chain, set both hands back on her hips, and watched his thrall cum her brains out.

“Oh god, oh god!” Mewling, she leaned in closer to him, huge breasts pressed together by her elbows, hands still on his shoulders. She trembled like a leaf.

His evil smile grew, and he slid his hands up her sides, and up to her back. Antoinette let go and stepped back as Jack slowly pulled his thrall in closer, and the kine melted into him as he held her, her huge breasts overwhelming his chest in supple softness.

He breathed in her neck, the smell of life, of sex, of desire and sweat and juices, and hidden blood. He growled into her throat as he pressed his lips to it, and hugged her all the tighter, cock hardening until it hurt in anticipation. He was the predator, and she was his prey. His thrall. His, to devour and fuck and command.

He sank his teeth into her, and Veronica squealed as her whole body clamped down. Every muscle flexed and tightened, before relaxing into the bliss of the Kiss. Her warm blood flooded his mouth, and he growled into her more as he drank down the delicious liquid of life. And as he did, he grabbed her hips again, and forced her back and forth a couple inches on his lap. Not fast for either of them to cum, but more than enough to have pleasure building for them as the Kiss overwhelmed them with bliss.

Before Veronica passed out, he stopped. He licked her wound sealed, and let out a heavy, satisfied breath as he looked up at Antoinette. Even as he did, he kept moving his thrall back and forth on his cock, so hard now it might explode.

Antoinette grinned at him. “Have fun with your new pet, my love.”

He growled into his limp thrall’s body, picked her up, and set her on the bed behind him. She barely managed a squeak as he set her closer to the center of the bed, turned her over onto her stomach, and pulled her up onto her knees. He got on his knees behind her, aimed his cock at his thrall’s dripping slit, and slammed into her, balls deep. The result was powerful. Veronica’s body trembled, and her ass rippled with the impact, all while her depths clenched in desperate need. Her chain jingled against his testicles, undoubtedly teasing and torturing the poor girl’s now overly sensitive clitoris.

Antoinette crawled onto the bed, slid closer, knelt beside him, and with a husky little chuckle, slapped Veronica’s ass, hard. Jack froze as his nearly unconscious thrall whimpered, exhausted, but her insides told a different story. She squeezed harder than ever.

“Holy shit.”

“Indeed,” Antoinette said. “She is that type, as many are. Go, give into your more ... masculine urges, my love. Fuck her until she bruises, spank her, choke her, she will love it.”

He gulped, stared down at the extreme hourglass figure of his tiny thrall, and how her butt rested snug to his pelvis. And after a few seconds of hesitation, he slapped her ass. Veronica managed a squeal this time, quiet from how exhausted she was, eyes still closed, but her mouth was open with her constant panting, and her insides gripped him like a vise.

He growled, tightened his grip on her hips, and fucked her. Hard. Like a jackhammer, he pulled his hips back and slammed them forward, while pulling his thrall in to meet each thrust. Each impact was hard enough to shake the enormous bed, and earn desperate little mewls from Veronica as she quivered. A moment later, he slapped her ass again, hard enough the skin turned pink, and the woman came instantly.

But he didn't stop. Ignoring her whimpers, he pounded into her again and again, refusing to let up just because she was cumming. Her muscles clamped down in a desperate attempt to slow him, but he pushed through her drenched, boiling squeezes, and sank himself to the hilt again and again as fast as he could. A small part of him told him he should probably ease up, or the poor girl might get hurt. A bigger part noticed the wetness around his testicles growing, and growing, until each thrust made a splashing mess.

It only drove him on. He slapped her other ass cheek, earning more clenching spasms from the little thrall, and he fucked her hard again. And again, more of her juices splashed over his thighs as each slap of his testicles against her clit and piercing sent liquid everywhere. Her quiet whimpers and mewls grew quieter and quieter, but he continued, stopping every so often to give his thrall another good slap on the ass, drawing another hard clench out of her trembling insides, before he fucked her again.

Finally, as the boiling heat under his cock rose up and flooded his length, he slowed his pace. He thrust into her, and stayed balls deep inside her as his cum filled her. After a second, another hard thrust, testicles slapping her clit piercing, and more hot juices trickled down their skin, some of it hers, but now some of it his. He spanked her again, pulling a desperate, weak little squeak, and earning another little squirt of her hot juices onto his testicles.

And of course, Elaine filmed it all. She panned around, made sure to get Veronica's side and probably show off how great her profile looked with her ass in the air. But she spent most of her time beside Antoinette, looking over her shoulder, with the camera pointed down at Veronica's ass, and how her tiny pussy was spread around his cock and drenching it.

Just as Jack was about to pull out, Antoinette knelt behind him, pushed her stomach and breasts against his back, reached around him, and grabbed Veronica's hips. Second time in one night he got sandwiched between two women.

“Again, my love. Again.”

He blinked up at her, up at Elaine, who just kept filming with a big grin, and he looked back down at Veronica. She was still awake, eyes partly open, but with her cheek against the blankets and mouth open, she did little more than drool and whimper. And her insides continued to spasm, silently begging him for more.

With his lover pressing her body against his back, Jack set his hands on Veronica's hips along with Antoinette's hands, and fucked his thrall again, and again. They kept going until she couldn't squeak anymore.

Chapter 136

~~Jack~~

Ten days after the incident.

The ‘incident’. It was the nicest way they could put it, and the most succinct way. It also let them talk about it without putting everyone on edge too much. Avery and Garry had thrown the first punch, because Avery was convinced Maria was up to something, and Garry pushed her into acting. Pushed, or tricked, because even Carthians were Kindred, and never did anything directly. Easier to call it the ‘incident’, instead of ‘the opening act of what was going to be war’.

“You gonna be alright?” he asked Veronica.

She nodded, smiled, and waved. “I will. Mulder and Scully will caw if something happens, right?”

“Right.”

“And,” Jessy added, leaning against the open door of his mansion, “you got the Invictus emergency number. Speed dial it and some armed thralls and a clean up crew will come running.”

“She can call me, ya know,” Jack said.

His partner shrugged. “You’ll probably be busy if something happens. But don’t worry about it, Veronica. No one’s gonna attack the mansion, not with your master’s reputation.”

Mulder and Scully cawed from a nearby statue outside, some old shitty thing from Viktor’s past. And a few more crows beyond that cawed as well. Friends of his friends. Jack smiled at them, waved, clicked his tongue a few times, waved to Veronica, and left with Jessy.

It didn't take long to find the first tunnel entrance, one of the old, closed doors to the abandoned subway. Locked doors weren't a problem for Kindred, and Invictus had keys anyway. Past that, they took a trip down one of the tunnels, found a closed-off service ladder, went down again, and were in the deeper level of the tunnels. He didn't expect to run into any of the Nosferatu that lived down here, but this was the tunnels they typical slept in. It was also the tunnels that connected to Azamel's favorite spot.

“So, dude, watched the tape last night.”

Oh god damn it. That was going to make this whole night an awkward pain in his ass.

“I don't suppose you can not—”

“Dude, where was the tit fucking?”

“I ... what?”

She held out her hands in front of her, as if holding giant breasts. “I was looking forward to seeing some tit fucking. Cause, I mean, come on.”

This woman, good god. He laughed, and laughed, until he had to clutch her shoulder to keep from falling over.

“Sorry. It just didn't come up.”

She grinned at him, one of those playful grins she made a lot these nights. Something happened between Eric and her, probably in the 'love you' department, and the woman was unusually happy all the time these nights, like Fiona had become.

“Still though, when Elaine got on your back, and the two of them just flattened you between their tits, I could literally see your cheeks get squished. It was fucking adorable, and hot as hell.” She shivered and bounced in place a few times. “Hell, it was all really hot. Elaine, posing like a fucking fashion model, mid ass fuck. Veronica, soaking that dick each time you spanked her. Fuuuuck that was good.” She hooked an arm over his shoulders, and walked with him down the tunnel, grin only growing. “I can guarantee she’ll be masturbating to that every night until ... well, every night, except the ones she gets to fuck you again. That on the menu? Maybe more movies, too?”

“If this were any other job, I’d get you fired for sexual harassment. And then sue you. This is not appropriate work behavior.”

“Aw, come on. Dude, you were totally rocking it in the video. Even Eric said you were in great shape. You look tiny in the suit, but naked, you’re gorgeous.”

The compliment shouldn’t have worked. Hell, if anything, knowing Eric watched the tape should have made him feel uncomfortable. But he was so desensitized to sexual embarrassment at this point, he just couldn’t feel awkward anymore. And the fact people liked the sight of him naked was an ego stroke he couldn’t deny.

“I didn’t plan on making anymore movies. But knowing Antoinette, she’ll bring it up again. Or just, you know, invite you and others over to be an audience.” She had the facilities to basically set up a stage play, except it’d be a bed, and Jack and Elaine and Antoinette would be on it. Probably the ghouls and thrall, too.

“I’d totally be down for an invite.”

“Yeah, I figured.”

She laughed, and Jack groaned. At this rate, everyone in the damn city would know they were down here, or at least everyone who already lived in the tunnels, the younger Nosferatu specifically. But, maybe hearing him joke around with Jess would endear him to them a bit? All the neonates avoided him, and that stung sometimes.

“I want to get Tash in on seeing me fuck Eric when he’s transformed, but I’m not sure how. When he’s transformed, cameras and shit don’t work right, so I can’t just record it or do it live and stream it.”

Good fucking god.

“Whyyy?”

“Fuck, I dunno. Eric says Luna or the moon or whatever might actually be, like, an actual deity or person or something? So she or it is kinda, I dunno, keeping an eye on things and fucking with nearby tech? Which is all sorts of creepy, the idea of a moon chick watching us and—”

“Not that! Why do you want to Tash to see Eric transform and have sex?”

“Fuck dude, why not?” She shrugged and let go of him. “She has two werewolf boyfriends. I’m hoping—”

Jack shook his head and waved a dismissing hand. Ugh, the woman did not get it. “Tash kept her boyfriends locked up, in chains, for three days before she released them. Art and Matt have an official warning from the Prince that they crossed a line against the dragons, and that they’re on thin ice; the Prince told me Tash agreed with it, too. Those two wolves owe the dragons, and the Prince is going to collect. You really think that relationship is still going?”

“Hell yeah. Those two idiots got it bad for that girl.”

That was not the response he expected.

“Um, they betrayed her trust. And, you know, staked her. Staked her! Ow!”

Of all the people he expected to be understanding about this, Jessy was not one of them. Hell, Jessy was the first person he figured would throw fists over something like this.

“I get that,” she said. “And hey, when Tash told me what happened, I thought for sure those two morons were done, relationship over. But I’ve seen them since it happened, you know? They’re miserable.”

“Being locked up in a cell for a few nights, dangling from chains I might add, can make anyone miserable.”

She shook her head. “Not like this. If they were kine, I’d expect them to be pissing their money away on booze right about now, brooding over the relationship they destroyed in a bar or something. They’re totally fucked up.”

Sighing, Jack stopped and faced her. “So, what, you think she should forgive them, because they’re sad?”

“I don’t—”

“Cause honestly, if I’d been them, I’d have done the same thing.”

Apparently that was not what she’d expected to hear. “The fuck?”

“And I bet Tash would have done it, too.”

“You can’t be serious.”

“I am. And come on, Jessy. If Michael, your sire, told you shit was about to go down and the Invictus were needed to fix shit or mountains of people were going to die, Kindred included, you’d do it, too. Maybe not for the Invictus, but to save the lives of hundreds of paranormals, and millions of kine? And you know damn well you’d lock Eric up against his will if you thought he’d stop you.”

“I ... fuck, I don’t know! I’d ... fuck me, I don’t know. I’d have talked with him first! Avoided needing to lock him up at all.”

“Even if Michael told you not to talk to him about it?”

“Fuck, I ... fuuuuck.”

It all boiled down to logic, something he knew Natasha understood. It probably ate her up, knowing that, if the roles had been reversed, she’d have done what Matt and Art did. Shame, guilt, all that shit Jack was all too familiar with, just not in the same context, thank god. Art and Matt did what they had to, because they knew Natasha would interfere, and to them, keeping her alive was more important than their relationship to her.

Tragic, cliché, but very real. It was a sad story. Art and Matt liked Natasha, a lot, probably loved her. But the situation just didn’t allow for that relationship to continue without issue. Vampires of different covenants often didn’t get close to each other, because they often ended up on the opposite side of issues, either because of personal beliefs or the orders of their superiors. Avery thought she was saving lives, and so did her pack. It sucked, a lot, that Avery went up against Maria when Natasha was convinced of her innocence. But Avery was convinced, still was, and the only reason she and her pack weren’t banned from the city — or dead — was because she didn’t try that shit on Antoinette.

A weird, tricky situation. It always was. No chance any of these groups were going to get along smoothly, no matter how much Jack tried.

But he'd keep trying. Once Avery was healed up, and maybe a little less angry about getting her ass kicked by Jack and the Ripper, he'd talk to her, and maybe Matthew and Arturo, too. But for now, Azamel.

"It sucks," he said. "It really fucking sucks for her. But the boys did what they did cause they didn't want her hurt or dead, and because they knew they had a job to do, a job they would sacrifice themselves to do. Can you imagine her asking them to put her before the beliefs of their pack? Hell, they genuinely think they're saving the city, the whole damn world, from some nasty shit. And I don't blame them, after all the shit I've seen; that you've seen too, FYI."

"Then, the fuck do we do? The boys are miserable, they really don't want to lose Natasha, and I like them. And Natasha's miserable, cause the boys put the pack before her, and betrayed her trust, and—" She threw up her hands. "The girl finally manages to get some good dick, regularly, and stupid shit up and ruins it."

"We do nothing. Er, well, I try my best to smooth shit over with Avery, and hopefully convince her she's wrong about Maria, but otherwise, yeah, I have no idea. It's up to Natasha if she can forgive them, and accept that there's just some aspects of their relationship that won't ever be ... rectifiable? Werewolves aren't vampires. They're wolves. They have a pack, and they serve that pack." He smiled, a pathetic little thing, and started walking again. "Vampires aren't that selfless."

"Ha, yeah, I guess we're not." She hopped up to catch up to him, and pat him on the shoulder. "You're a bitter old man trapped in a kid's body, you know that?"

"I do." She wasn't the first person to say it.

"I wonder how Eric feels about it," she said. "He's got no pack, but he is a werewolf. He's got a higher calling and shit."

“I dunno. He—”

They both stopped, and stared into the darkness of the tunnels ahead of them. Flickering old lights were the only thing illuminating the dirt, dust, cracked concrete, and ancient tracks of the old subway. Up ahead at the furthest visible bend in the tunnel, one of those lights turned off. And then the next one, and the next one. They didn't pop, like old lights did when they went out. They shut off, like they lost power, except they were on the same circuit; should have all died immediately.

Jack looked behind him as the lights kept going out until the looming presence enveloped them, and buried them in darkness. The smell was next. He snarled and wiped his nose, but there was no covering the smell of rot and decay.

“The fuck?” Jessy said, wiping her nose as well.

“Mark.” With a heavy growl, a shit load more sinister than he'd ever do in the past, Jack took a step further into the black. So dark he couldn't see shit, even with Kindred eyes. Fiona and Athalia might be able to see in blackness like this, but vampires were fucked.

“Mark? Explains the smell.” Sniffing, Jessy walked forward a little; easy to tell from the sound in the absolute silence. “The fuck you want, Mark?”

Silence was their answer. What an asshole.

“Mark,” Jack said. “I'm here to see Azamel.” More silence. “Look, I need to speak with her. Shit's about to ... get hectic.”

A quiet, hissing rasp filled the air, and Jack froze. Vitae pumped through his limbs, under his skin, ready to defend him from a surprise slash that might come out from the dark. He knew that rasp, and didn't like hearing it now.

“Athalia?” Jessy said. “Come on guys, we’re not here to pick a fight. Let us talk to Azamel.”

“Azamel is dying,” the darkness said, in a voice fitting darkness all too perfectly. “Let her die in peace.”

Jack shook his head. “I know, and I’m sorry, but the Invictus and Carthians are going to use every tool they can in this shitstorm coming our way. I need to talk to her.”

A few more seconds of silence before another hissing rasp. “Why?”

“Because I want to do everything I can to keep the Begotten out of it. And ... and because I’ve learned some things, about the things we’re worried about.” And this was where shit might get awkward. He hadn’t exactly been upfront with Jessy about their search for the mysterious force acting in Dolareido, the thing Azamel warned them about, the thing he was pretty sure was Black Blood. But with shit getting more and more problematic, now was as good a time as any to tell her.

“Let them come,” another voice said.

“Sándor.” Jack sighed relief. Mark didn’t like Jack. Athalia didn’t like Jack, especially not after everything that’d happened. But Sándor was a voice of reason; plus, he owed Jack.

The darkness melted away, leaving Athalia and Mark standing in the distance, a lot further than the woman’s eerie voice had suggested. Sándor walked past them and up to Jack and Jessy, face neutral, as usual.

“Jack.”

“How’s it going, Sándor? I have to say, the Prince is pretty happy with how things are going with the Begotten, since you’ve been added to the city's ... paranormal scene." He almost used the word family. Nope, bad idea, especially with Sándor and Athalia.

"Considering your hungers."

"I have a lot of practice controlling my hunger," he said, voice ever flat. "And Azamel is smart, and wise. She knows a lot of ways to feed without exposing ourselves, leaving a trail, or killing someone."

Wow, those were a lot of long, complete sentences. A big step up from how Sándor usually talked.

Jessy laughed. "Sounds like she's gotten smarter since the last time she was here. Apparently, she caused a lot of problems last time she lived in the city? It was before my time."

Sándor nodded, not a smile or a frown anywhere on his face. Dude was totally stoic. If Jack put him in a room with Daniel, it'd be like watching two trees talk. He was tall, not as tall as Daniel but still tall, a white European dude with dark hair buzzed short like Jack's, and some gruff on his face. Right now he wore some jeans and a black shirt, typical wear for anyone hanging out in old abandoned tunnels, and a glance Jessy's way showed she noticed the muscle definition through the shirt. He did look healthier since the last time Jack spoke to him, and especially since being under Jeremiah's control.

"It was a long time ago," Sándor said. "And, if you want to speak to Azamel, I'll allow it. But be brief. She grows weaker by the day."

Jack winced and looked down. Much as that wasn't his fault, he still felt guilty about it.

Then again, Antoinette told him Azamel had some pretty lofty plans, the sort that put Dolareido in danger. Ruined plans, now. He shouldn't have felt bad for her. But, he did.

Jack and Jessy nodded, and Sándor took them to Azamel's hole, a big room with a large concrete stage in the center that once probably housed engineering equipment or something. No shitty old cushioned rocking chair this time. Old Azamel lay on a bed, coughing weakly, but true to form, she had a lit cigarette in hand, and she took a puff on it between coughs. No point in telling her to lay off it now.

Athalia and Mark hopped onto the concrete stage and sat with her, each taking a small chair near her bed. Somehow, these strange, disturbed individuals, were a close family. Sándor climbed onto the stage as well, though it was obvious the man didn't really feel comfortable getting as intimate as the others, preferring to stand off to the side.

Sándor motioned for Jack to come up, and he winced as he climbed onto the stage with them. Athalia and Mark both frowned at him, but he knew they didn't blame him for the situation. They did, however, not want him there, that much was obvious. Still, annoyed as they might have been, Azamel raised her free hand and gestured for him to come closer.

"Azamel," he said softly, and he stood beside Athalia as he smiled down at the old woman. "You look like shit."

She coughed, and managed a small grin, before giving him the finger. Not a very good middle finger, other fingers barely able to bend, but she managed.

"Jack. What do you want?" Despite her attitude, she did look like shit. Paler, skin more sunken, veins sticking out, hands trembling. Horrible, fucking horrible. Jack never knew his grandparents from either side of his family, but they were all dead, to various things. Never in his life did he ever see a family member on a hospital bed until the hunters ruined the life of his mother, and killed his sister. This was different. This was watching someone wither away to disease and age, not stab wounds. This was a sickening reminder that vampires were immortal, and everyone else was very much not.

“I wanted to talk about the shit that happened last week.”

“You let your curse unleash mayhem and carnage.”

“Let ... is a strong word.” He clutched Elaine’s necklace. “I had to do something, but letting the curse out was an accident.”

Athalia snorted, but her eyes were down and refused to look up.

“I am aware of the situation, Jack,” Azamel said. “It does not concern us. We’ll stay out here, until...” She coughed, grabbed a nearby bundle of paper towels, and hocked up something into them. The paper turned red. After a heavy groan, she cleared her throat and tossed the paper towel into a garbage bin beside her. It was full of them. “When I’m gone, Sándor can do what he wishes, but he assures me he’ll remain neutral as best he can.”

“Neutral, like how you tried to recruit Eric?”

The old monster frowned as she glared at him. Only the small pile of pillows behind her back and head kept her upright enough to look at him. “Yes. I saw these problems coming, vampire. Maybe not this curse that infects your bloodline like a virus, but everything else. Something is out there, and the werewolves are chasing it. But they’re mostly blind, and they’ll attack anything they think looks — or smells — like what they’re hunting. They were bound to stir trouble with the covenants, like they did with Fiona.”

He sighed, grabbed a nearby, empty wooden chair, and sat with a groan of his own. “Alright, so, the rest of you, you’re going to stay out of this?”

Mark nodded. Athalia finally lifted her head long enough to look at him, frown, and nod. Sándor nodded as well.

“Fiona,” Sándor said, “is a different matter. She’s grown extremely attached to Damien.”

Azamel shook her head. “She is a butterfly. She will tend to her new love, but war? She will not go to war, and Damien will not let her.”

True. Damien knew better, and he wouldn’t want Fiona getting involved anyway. But that didn’t mean that she wouldn’t, if push came to shove.

“I’ll talk to her,” Jack said. “Much as I should be pushing to have as many helping hands as I can get on my side, First and Second Estate, it’d be better if the Begotten stayed out of this.” Everyone nodded. “Now, the other thing I wanted to talk about. I’m ... really leaning toward Black Blood being the thing that’s going around making new tears, and he’s probably the thing you warned us about.”

Azamel groaned and shook her head. “We’ve found tears in the dream realm, and other realms you cannot imagine. Black Blood is a spirit, and is limited to—”

Jack held up a hand. “Yeah, I get that Begotten are special monsters capable of getting all Cthulhu on me and going to different dimensions or whatever, but that doesn’t mean you’re the only ones that can. And Black Blood, I ... there’s something more going on with it, him, whatever. Don’t think of him like other spirits.”

Sándor spoke up, drawing a raised brow from everyone. “Black Blood is the reason I was able to break Jeremiah’s ritual on Azamel. The entity wouldn’t help us, if he was this threat Azamel’s worried about.”

“Unless he wanted you to owe him one,” Jack said. “Or ... some other reason. All I know is, Black Blood’s already told me that a lot of the old tears in Dolareido, really old ones, are his. Whether he made them or someone else did and he claimed them, I don't know. But now there are new tears, and—”

“Um, the fuck?” Jessy asked, with a bit of bite in her tone and hands in the air.

Yeah, he knew that was gonna happen. With another groan, Jack looked over to Jessy, wincing the whole time. “You know some about it already, Jess. But shit's been going on for a while now, something we've all be trying to hunt down, something going on in the shadows and cracks of the world.”

“Cra—”

“Literal cracks of the world. Like, dimensional shit. Something's going on out there, doing something, and we don't know what yet. But Azamel and others think it threatens Dolareido. So we're tracking it down. Avery thinks it's Maria. I think it might be Black Blood.”

Jessy stared at him, eyes wide, before she threw up her hands. “The fuck did you tell me that for!?! God damn it, now I gotta keep it secret! Holy fuck, I don't want Black Blood as an enemy!”

Despite himself, he laughed. “Come on, you had to have some idea, right? The mysterious meetings and shit.”

Frowning, she paced in place and shook her head. “Plausible deniability, man. Fuck.”

Sándor snorted, stepped closer to the edge of the stage, and glared down at Jessy. Glare was too strong a word, cause the man didn't put out much emotion, but the impact was still the same. Jessy met his eyes, and everyone went quiet.

“I’m new to the city,” Sándor said, “but I’ve been given a home here. However brief my stay, I’d prefer to help as much as I can. So keep this a secret, vampire, or you might risk everything.”

Jessy winced all the more, threw her hands up again, and paced around like an anxious canine. “God damn it.”

“Sorry Jessy,” Jack said. “But you needed to know; you’re my partner. Normally it’s me and Damien dealing with this, but, yeah, you’re in the know, now. If it’s any consolation, Natasha knows about it, too.”

That got her attention.

“Natasha knows?” She frowned, but with less anger. He recognized that look. Hearing that hurt her. “She didn’t tell me. I mean, she ... she kinda hinted at some stuff, but...”

Athalia snorted, got up, and joined Sándor’s side, glaring down at Jessy. “She didn’t tell you because you have a big mouth.”

“Hey, fuck you!”

Athalia shrugged and gestured to Jessy as she looked at the rest of them. “It wasn’t a good idea to tell her, Jack.”

“I’ve worked with her for years,” he said. “I trust her. Besides, she’s dating a werewolf, and sooner or later Eric would figure out something was going on, too. Avery’s probably told Eric as much, he just doesn’t understand the scope.”

“So I can talk to Eric about this?” Jessy asked.

Jack sighed and shrugged. “Use your judgment, I guess. He is a werewolf. He’s going to get involved one way or another.” Eric was still a bit of a question mark. Sure, Jack wanted to trust the man, but he was an Uratha, and if Avery and her pack were any indication, the werewolves couldn't ignore their instincts. Those instincts evidently included dealing with the Gauntlet, like it was fucking existential for them.

"Ugh." She threw up her hands yet again, and paced around some more, eyes on the ground and face in a permanent frown.

Azamel laughed, and coughed, and laughed some more. "You trust people far too easily, Jack."

"Yeah well, friends at your back are worth the risk." He gestured to the three Begotten around Azamel. "Aren't they?"

The old woman smirked, and took a puff of her cigarette. "You're a vampire. What does a vampire know of friendship, and family?"

"Plenty." Jack leaned over Azamel's side and met her eyes. "Black Blood. I don't know what he's up to, but I have some evidence that proves he's either responsible, or at least has involved himself, in these new tears we're finding."

The old woman gestured to Sándor. "Then, Sándor, when you find the next tear, take the boy to it. If he's found a way to trace these tears to the spirit-not-spirit, let him prove it."

Sándor nodded. "Alright."

Nodding, Jack got up, and turned to leave. But, stopped, and turned back to face the old monster. "You know, you've been a pain in the ass for a lot of vampires in Dolareido, Azamel."

She grinned at him. "Good."

"But I never wanted this to happen to you. I ... I'd be happier if everyone just fucking got along and found a way to coexist, you know? Even ... even the hunters. Let them hunt the assholes, but not everyone, right? It doesn't need to be like this."

Athalia snorted again, but didn't meet his gaze. She sat with Azamel again, and sighed as she shook her head, looking down.

"Your naivety," Azamel said, "is heartwarming. And besides, your Prince is doing good work. I understand one of the hunters, Brace Harcourt, has been seen with Clara Moreno."

Jack raised a brow. "Really? When?"

"Two days ago."

Clara hanging with Brace? He had no idea how to feel about that, except, a little bubble of something tickled up his gut, something he didn't like the feel of.

Felt a bit like jealousy.

---

Sándor took him and Jessy back through the tunnels.

"I can't believe she didn't tell me," Jessy said.

Jack shook his head. "Come on, you know why. The less people that knew, the better. Hell, you didn't want to know when I told you just now!"

"Yeah but that's a professional call! One I can understand. I know shitloads of things I don't tell you or other Invictus. Tash though, she's my best friend."

Jack looked to Sándor for help. The man kept walking, and avoided eye contact with all the smoothness of a statue.

"Well, you said yourself you didn't want to know."

"But this is big shit! And you didn't tell me, and neither did Tash, and ... Arg, you not telling me doesn't bother me at all. Invictus being Invictus. Tash not telling me though, that stings. She's not even Invictus, she..."

"She understands this is a big problem, bigger than her, bigger than you, and didn't tell you at the risk of the friendship."

She winced. "Which sounds an awful lot like what Art and Matt did to her, doesn't it?"

Jack smiled. "There's a small comparison to be made there, yeah."

"Ugh. I suck at this shit. I just wanna go home, fuck Eric, have a snack, fuck some more, and maybe push around a few Carthians for being shortsighted assholes. I don't want to do this cloak and daggers crap! Do I look like a Mekhet to you?"

He shook his head. "Nope."

"I don't want to play political games and move pawns against each other in this Danse Macabre shit. Do I look like a Ventrue to you?"

He laughed. "No."

"I don't want to paint or dance or sing or act in one of Isabella's stupid plays, I ain't no Daeva. Bitch doesn't even do musicals! I don't want to scare people with a BOO in the shadows, either. I ain't no Nos. I just wanna hang around and fuck and claim my shit as mine like any self respecting Gangrel does."

He nodded. "Perfectly reasonable. Unfortunately, not in the cards. I've officially pulled you into this cloak and daggers, pawns and secrets game. Now suck it up, princess. I need someone who can stick with me officially as a Right Hand, but also knows about this shit I'm sure Black Blood is up to, cause I know it's gonna come out of left field and fuck everything up somehow. Do I have your sword?"

She blinked at him. “My sword? What?”

“Lord of the Rings.”

“Oh, right. Uh, no, but you can ... have my axe? Fuck me, I don’t know, you stupid nerd. Yes, I’ll keep my mouth shut, and keep an eye open.”

He grinned at her and pat her on the shoulder. Much as Jessy was a loudmouth, shit had grown too big for him to keep her out of the loop, especially now that Damien was out of commission for a while.

“Speaking of Black Blood,” Sándor said, “what is Beatrice up to?”

Groaning, Jack shook his head. “Fuck, I don’t know. She’s doing something with Jacob, and it’s probably not good. I know Jacob has Elen somewhere, and considering what Elen could do, and what Jacob can do with Crúac, it scares the shit out of me what he might be up to.”

“You don’t think that has anything to do with the threat Azamel warned you about?”

“No, or not originally. Azamel warned me about these new tears showing up in Dolareido, in the spirit realm and elsewhere, before all the shit went down with Jeremiah.”

“What about the older tears?”

“Spirits called them verges,” Jack said. “The werewolves didn’t seem to be too concerned about them, far as I could tell. And they’ve been around for a damn while, from what the crow spirit I met said. So that’s definitely got nothing to do with whatever Triss is up to.”

Sándor sighed, which earned a shared, raised brow between Jessy and Jack. For Sándor to make any sort of expressive noise that wasn't words was strange.

"You want revenge on Elen?" Jessy asked.

"Elen is ... a tool, a literal one. I don't desire revenge against her. I can't help but feel frustrated when I think of her, but revenge? No."

Jack smiled at the man as they resumed their walking pace. It was almost shocking just how much the gargoyle had managed to open up over the past few months. Azamel was such an influencing factor on the lives of the Begotten in Dolareido, it was mind boggling. She could be a total bitch toward vampires, but to the monsters, she was like ... what, a nice grandmother? Maybe one of those super nice grandmas that could unite a whole, dysfunctional family, and have them sitting together at the table, getting along and getting fat on lasagna?

Hard to imagine that towering behemoth elephant monster being a loving grandma sorta character, but the fuck did he know?

"So," Jack said, "it's not Elen you're worried about, it's Triss?"

"I suppose. It's a matter of ... concern, that a member of the Circle of the Crone has access to a woman with Elen's abilities. Like you said, Crúac rituals are a problem."

"Dealt with them before?"

"I have. In my younger years, I occasionally befriended a vampire who needed protection during the day. I'm good at ... guarding." Well, he was a gargoyle. Standing around, guarding shit, fit him perfectly. "With Elen at her disposal, and after ... your sire's death, I think she'll—"

Jack put up a hand. "Yeah, I know. But I trust her. If she's going to do some dark, witchy stuff, then I say let her. It's a horrible path to go down, and I know it's not going to go anywhere good; if resurrection was possible, I'm sure someone somewhere would have heard of someone having succeeded." And that was a strong statement, considering the person he was closest with was basically a five hundred-year-old scientist. If there'd been a single successful example, Antoinette would have it written down somewhere, in some form or another. "Maybe she'll ... fuck, I dunno, not do what I'm worried about. Maybe she'll create a shrunken head she can use to speak to the beyond, instead?"

"That," Jessy said, "actually sounds kinda cool."

Jack facepalmed, but couldn't help but laugh. To Jessy it probably all sounded neat and interesting. To Jack, dealing with the dead was becoming a recurring nightmare in his second life. He had to visit Mary again, and see if she was willing to move on yet. Not a conversation he was looking forward to.

"Julias is dead," Jack said eventually, "and yeah, it really sucks. I miss him, and I can't even fucking imagine how much it hurt Beatrice losing him. But he's gone, and if she's trying to do something with Elen so she can talk to him again, or worse, that ... isn't good."

Sándor nodded. "Agreed."

Jessy stepped in beside the gargoyle, opposite of Jack. "Really? I mean, yeah, I get that it's all pretty dark, nasty stuff, but damn Sándor, you lost your whole family, something I doubt any of us could appreciate. If Triss and Jacob are trying to maybe break the rules a bit, I figured you'd want them to?"

If it hadn't been Sándor, Jack would have shut Jessy up before she could have finished the sentence. But Sándor was old as dirt, and had seen more than Jack and Jessy combined, probably by five fold. Jack was less concerned about her hurting the dude's feelings, than he was Sándor uttering a single sentence of unknowable truth that'd shatter her mind or something. Or he'd just punch her super hard.

Sándor kept walking, and Jack could practically see the man becoming his stoic, gargoyle self, walling off emotions. But after a few more seconds, his expression softened to something vaguely resembling a bit of emotion, and he shook his head.

"I miss my family. Every day, I miss them. But they're gone, and only a madman would think it'd be a good idea to ... break a law as old as time." He shook his head again, and managed a small glance for Jessy before he looked back to the tracks ahead of them. "The dead are gone, and the living are not, for now. It's what makes life worth living."

"Arg, yeah, I know. I get it, I do," she said. "But fuck, it must be so tempting, right? I mean, we deal with crazy shit all the time. Vampires are half dead already. You're a nightmare monster, and far as I know, you guys have hopped around realms and shit. And what about that weird ghost realm? I—"

"That's not where souls go," Sándor said. "They go somewhere we can't reach. There are realms we can visit in this fallen world, and something beyond we can't. It's blocked from us by some great abyss that..." Sighing, he shrugged, and dismissed the notion with a tiny wave of his hand. "I have visited many places in my time, and have found strange dimensions with strange beings, but life and death is something that things with souls must contend with. No one has managed to violate that, not without great consequence."

Whole shit load of things there Jack wanted to ask about. Fallen world? Great abyss?

"Vampires can do some nifty things," Jessy said. "But—"

Sándor shook his head. "A vampire's ability to occasionally raise someone as a vampire, even after they've fully died, is not the same thing. A soul doesn't run from the world within seconds of death, and..." He shrugged again. "I've seen things, but I don't really know anything."

Jack forced down a chuckle. The man knew a lot.

"Well," Jack said, "if you want to talk to Beatrice, go ahead."

"I'm ... not sure I should."

Jessy laughed, and hooked an arm over Sándor's shoulders. For a second, Jack thought the man would throw her off, but he didn't. He did turn his head enough to look at her with a quiet glare that could cut through steel; Jessy's impulsiveness was stronger than steel.

"Cause Jen was trying to get into your pants?"

"Among ... other things."

"Ha! Come on dude, let the witches show you a good time. If you want to check up on Triss and Elen, and interfere, you'd be in a pretty good spot to do it from that close. They'd treat you right." And with a wicked smile, Jessy looked at Jack, and he froze. "Way I hear it, Samantha's getting pretty cozy with a lot of those witches."

Jack frowned. "Oh you bitch."

"She's got your genes, Jack. I bet she's—"

"I get it, I get it." Before the conversation could run off course into typical Jessy territory, Jack put up his hands in surrender. "Sándor, do you know how ... how much longer Azamel has left?"

"No. Weeks, I imagine."

"And could ... could Elen do something for her?"

Sándor shook his head. “It’s a wound to her Horror, and to her, down deep where the two meet. She’ll be gone soon. I just hope I can ... be the rock she’s been, for the others.”

Jessy blinked at the Begotten, and let go of him as she backed off. Yeah, depressing. Jack probably shouldn’t have asked.

“You’ll do fine,” Jack said, and he touched the Sándor on his shoulder lightly. “If you need anything, anything at all, ask.”

“I owe you, Jack, not the other way around.”

“Yeah, well, I don’t care. I’m serious. If something happens, come get me, alright?”

“ ... alright.”

~~Natasha~~

Two weeks after the incident.

“Just ... just try and k-keep your head down. Please?”

Vivi shook her head. “Sire ... Tash, Garry’s attacked the Mirrden district. Michael isn’t going to just let me sit around doing nothing, just because you used to be a Right Hand.”

Natasha groaned and sighed, and looked up to the candles organized into a cross. Within the cathedral, young Invictus were safe from Garry’s aggression, mostly. Maria was below, but still gravely wounded. Her elite ghouls patrolled the outside of the cathedral, but they wouldn’t be able to do much if an ancilla decided to attack. Thankfully ancilla weren’t exactly common in Dolareido, and Garry wouldn’t risk his strongest Kindred on attacking the cathedral now, not with Maria out of the way for a while.

Damien, sat on the other side from Vivienne in the pew, managed a slow nod. “McDonald has already given orders for Kindred to take up defensive positions around the district. Skirmishes have been minor so far, but I expect damages in the future.”

Natasha shook her head. “The P-Prince won’t like damages.”

“At this point Tash, I’m not sure Garry or Michael would let the Prince’s disagreement stop this inevitable war.”

That was true. It was beyond stupid, but it was true.

“She’ll stop them,” Tash said, “if she was to.”

Vivienne frowned and looked down, twiddling with her fingers. She was a small woman, like Tash, though not as small. A quiet, thin girl with pale skin and black hair to her shoulders. Natasha sired her almost a decade ago, and immediately after, their relationship crumbled. She wasn’t prepared for a childe, and not like a parent might not be prepared for a literal child. This was different. This was Natasha’s greatest failure, her sheer ignorance over what it would be like to bring a human into the Danse Macabre and Masquerade, and how it changed Vivi’s personality enough that the two of them clashed.

Since then, she’d come to understand and appreciate her own sire a lot more. Sire childe relationships were never easy.

Vivi had become her own person now, an Invictus with a growing future, and an interest in the Lancea et Sanctum, an interest that nearly got her killed during Lucas’s return. Since then, Natasha and her talked on occasion, but not as childe and sire, especially now that Natasha was no longer in the Invictus. Damien kept an eye on Vivi for her these nights, and she appreciated it, but it was also great to have talks like this every so often.

Damien shook his head. “The Prince and the sheriff are two, against over a hundred, Tash. And since Antoinette reopened siring, we have reports the Carthians have embraced thirty new Kindred in the past couple years.”

“Fledglings. B-Barely neonates,” Tash said. “And the Invictus have done the same.”

“You d-don’t need to be as old or as powerful as you two,” Vivi said, “to use a gun. And as strong as the Prince and the sheriff are, one lucky molotov is all it’d take to kill them. This ... this isn’t the medieval ages. We don’t need to wait decades for Kindred to become strong, before we can do crazy things. It’s making Garry and Michael confident. Too confident.”

Impressive for Vivi to speak up like that, considering she was as timid as Tash used to be. And Damien was an imposing guy to be around, even with a leg missing. But then, the two had connected before, through their religion. Maybe her beliefs were becoming a foundation she could use to become more confident?

“She’s right,” Damien said. “Garry is going to push harder on the Mirrden district, and he knows that numbers give him power. Michael’s in the same boat. They’ll fight it out, and if the city starts to get damaged, the Prince will be put in an awkward spot. She’s not stupid. She’s controlled the city through politics and the fact she rarely interferes with covenants. But if she does...”

Natasha sighed, and mirrored Vivi, fiddling with her hands and fingers. They were right, of course. In most cities, whichever covenant ruled the city did so with might, often through numbers, hardware, financial assets, and an elder or three at the head. When the Lancea et Sanctum stepped over the line, the Prince enacted the purge, and used many thralls armed with modern weapons, along with Garry’s Carthians, to defeat Lucas. But this time, the Carthians weren’t her allies. And as strong as the Prince and Daniel were, along with several dozen trained thralls at their disposal, they couldn't go to war against the Carthians without exposing themselves to the Invictus, or vice versa.

The Danse Macabre was all too similar to countries going to war in the modern world. Lies, deception, exploiting loopholes in treaties, and forcing retaliations so one party could claim to be the victim and justify their aggression. And, like modern warfare, the tools of battle between covenants had changed to espionage instead of raids, and assault rifles, flamethrowers, and grenades, instead of swords. Even elders as strong as Antoinette and Daniel would have a hard time managing that chaos.

Sighing to match theirs, Damien grabbed his crutch, and hopped out from between the pews. "Ladies, if you'll excuse me."

Vivi and Tash nodded, and Tash fingerwaved at her friend as he hobbled past the pulpit and to the hidden stairway down to Maria's den.

"He looked happy," Vivi said.

"Mmm?" He certainly wasn't happy about the topic.

Her childe smiled and looked back down at her hands. "I remember when I first met him, when Lucas was alive, down in Tony's old underground base. He ... he liked talking about God, and Longinus, and you could tell he was passionate about his beliefs. But when Lucas started asking for the congregation to get ready for war, you could ... see his heart sink."

"He d-didn't realize how far his sire had fallen."

"Neither did we. I'm glad I backed out at the last minute, me and the others. But when I saw Damien after that, he looked even worse. Even after he replaced you, and started working for Maria, he was always depressed. Me and the few other Invictus who didn't go with Lucas that last night, we talk to him sometimes, about God, and tried to make him happy. It didn't work." Slowly, Vivi looked at her, smiling. "But ever since he met that Fiona girl, he's gotten happier. And lately, he's been really happy."

"I guess him and Fiona have g-gotten really close."

"Must be. And ... and you? I um, I heard you were getting really close to those werewolf boys. But then something happened?"

Natasha grumbled and looked down. Heat boiled up through her, and not the good kind. The scalding kind, the kind that made it impossible to think about anything other than pain, and maybe burning down a building.

"They staked me, t-to keep me out of the way, because Avery had the pack attack Maria." No point in keeping it a secret. Everyone knew about what Avery did. Natasha getting staked though, that was a secret.

"Oh. That's ... horrible! Did it hurt?"

She nodded. "Yes. B-But I've been hurt a lot worse. That's n-not the issue." The boys didn't stake her to be violent. Calling it violence almost seemed wrong. She was a vampire. Staking her was less about violence, and more about taking away choice. It was like, what if she'd come up behind the boys and dosed them with chloroform? Chloroform didn't work like they showed in the movies, but the idea stood. What if she'd come up and just drugged them, and then tied them up, until she could come back and release them after she'd done what she needed done? Sure, the violence was bad, but taking away their choice to get involved in the whole affair was a hundred times worse.

It was infuriating. It was beyond infuriating. And no matter how angry she got, she only got angrier, because she couldn't entirely blame them. If push came to shove, if Antoinette told her the city was in danger if she didn't do something, and she knew she'd have to lock Matt and Art up in a basement to do it, she might. No, she would do it. She'd do it because she trusted Antoinette and Daniel with her life; especially her sire, after what he did, when Lucas held her hostage. She'd do it because saving the lives of Dolareido, its kine and Kindred, was more important than her relationship.

Vivi touched her shoulder, and Tash snapped her head up, forcing the girl to pull her hand back.

"S-Sorry, Vivi. Just ... I get angry thinking about it."

"I don't blame you. They didn't trust you, and did something so horrible because of it."

Sighing, Tash leaned forward and set her head against the pew in front of her. "Yeah, b-but ... I don't blame them, not completely. And that makes me angrier. I d-don't ... I don't want to be able to do what they did, you know? That's not ... that's not..." Love.

"Tash, you look miserable. And I bet they're miserable, too. You have to talk to them."

"I had the Prince lock them up, hanging from chains, for th-th-three days! And now the pack and the Ordo are on bad terms. Jack's gonna try and s-sort things out, b-b-but he ... might not be able to."

"If they're as miserable as you are, I think they'll risk pissing off their boss to talk to you."

She shook her head. "No! No, not yet. Not ... n-not until the Ordo Dracul aren't the reason that we might get into an argument." She couldn't take an argument with Matt and Arturo, not now. It'd shatter her, and she knew it. And that made her angry, too. Antoinette could handle an argument, even a brutal one. If she and Jack suddenly found themselves in an argument over their future, Antoinette would steel herself, and be brutal with the man. Because she knew her relationship with Jack was solid, and would survive it.

And after what happened, Tash didn't know what to think about hers.

~~Antoinette~~

One month after the incident.

Natasha and her friends began calling the confrontation between Maria and Avery the 'incident', not long after it occurred. That night, her city changed, and the new point of reference was an adequate one. The Right Hands of the Invictus were busy almost every night now, as Garry Tones took advantage of Maria's helplessness.

Garry took back the Mirrden District, as predicted. No Kindred died, but there was damage. Antoinette knew to mention it at the next Primogen meeting, but she knew neither the Carthians nor the Invictus would back down. Naturally, she would be forced threaten them, to keep their disagreements from damaging her city. It was a dance they had all danced before, the slow increase of hostilities that would eventually lead to deaths.

"No one's died yet," Garry barked, "so don't freak out."

"How dare you." Michael clenched his right fist where it sat on Antoinette's glass table, and he glared daggers into his fellow Gangrel. "Several thralls and ghouls were injured."

Garry shrugged. "We were careful."

"You destroyed several vehicles! The fires drew the eye of the city, the media, the police."

"Yeah well, had to be done. You wouldn't back off. Fire works pretty well." The man grinned, leaned in, and grin evolved into smirk. “Mirrden’s mine. I got a whole team set up there already. Now, how about you fuck off, Michael?”

Michael snarled. Maria, wearing a rather fluffy white gown that covered her shoulders and growing potential arms nicely, snarled as well. Jacob, opposite of Antoinette, grinned, but said nothing.

“You can’t honestly expect we’ll let you keep it,” Michael said.

“You took it from me. I was just taking it back.”

“Idiot boy. The area did not always belong to you!”

“Not like you had a fair claim on it, asshole.” Garry swept his arm through the air, dismissing Michael’s words.

“You risked the Masquerade,” Maria said. The woman did not need arms to make sweeping gestures, with how expressive her corpse eyes were. “We did no such thing, when we forced you out from the district.”

“Risked, but not violated in any way.” Garry shrugged, leaned back in his chair, and gestured to Antoinette. “Prince? Did I overstep? Is there anyone in the whole damn fucking world that thinks this dispute’s been anything more than a turf war? Hell, most agencies think it’s some third party hired to do some property damage or scare some assholes into paying back their debts.” Information Garry had likely secured through Terra Den’s power.

“Garry Tones is correct,” Antoinette said after a time. “The Masquerade remains intact, and relatively undamaged.”

Without missing a beat, Garry, Maria, and Michael fell back into squabbles. From across the table, Jacob smiled, and more often than not, his eyes fell to Antoinette; the bandage over them did, at least. No need for words, his grin said it all.

Jacob and Garry had worked together before. Garry likely manipulated Avery into attacking Maria, or rather, nudged her in that direction. Jacob likely nudged Garry, without the Gangrel realizing, into nudging Avery. The Nosferatu wanted Avery dead, though he would not risk his neck to do it, or his influence over his pawn Garry, who liked Avery.

And now with Viktor, Tony, and Lucas gone, Garry was free to be aggressive, stirring trouble in a way Jacob desired. But to what end? To kill Avery indirectly, as Antoinette did Tony and Viktor? Or did he simply wish for Garry to remove Maria and Michael from power? Whatever the man's goals, he had succeeded in creating chaos.

Perhaps that was his goal. To create chaos for chaos's sake? No. Jacob, despite his beliefs and attitude, was not some force of chaos incarnate. He had goals.

Sighing, Antoinette raised a hand, and the squabbling slowly ceased.

“The confrontations between the Invictus and the Carthians must not draw the suspicion of the kine. If, at any point, someone violates the Masquerade in relation to these skirmishes the two covenants insist upon, I hereby decree that I will send Daniel to execute said violator. A zero-tolerance policy, in regards to these skirmishes. Do I make myself clear?”

The three elders looked at her, glaring, but silent. They knew it was coming, the bloody fools.

“Harsh,” Jacob said, smiling unwavering.

“Oui, it is. But we have peace in this city, and we will continue to have peace in this city, even if only on the surface. If the Invictus and Carthians wish to poke and prod each other, very well. Dolareido is my concern, not your meaningless disputes. You are guests in my city. Do not forget that.”

Michael glared at her, and for the first time in many years, she found obvious aggression on his face. For the man to conspire against her, that was expected, but to openly show hostility? That was a level of confidence and bravado she had not seen in some time.

“Do you take issue with my command, Mister McDonald?”

“In a manner of speaking, Prince.”

Antoinette met the man’s eyes, and she responded to the growing fire there with cold ice. “Then speak.”

“If you’re so concerned with the Masquerade, why do you let the Carthians openly attack and damage my property?”

She leaned forward in her grand chair, over the glass table of her highest office in her Elysium tower, and offered Michael a single second of visible rage. A fleeting moment, her mask removed, and furor exposed. It was enough to have the man draw his head back a touch, enough for him to realize she was the stronger of the two of them, and that it would do him well to remember that.

“As Garry said, he has only acted in a way that could not possibly lead to investigative reports from curious kine with eyes for the paranormal. Your ridiculous ‘turf war’ is of little concern to me, as long as my city continues to operate, and the Masquerade is upheld.”

“It might seem like just a turf war to you, Prince,” Garry said, “but to some of us, it’s a fight for the god damn land we grew up on. I have vamps who call these places home, who grew up in these places, who know the people and consider it their fucking responsibility to keep those kine safe. These Invictus assholes think it’s just territory, a place to expand so they can fuel their fucking money machine. Yeah, fuck that, and fuck them. Times are different now. I got plenty of new Kindred with their own names, their own pasts, and they got as much right to be a part of this city as these money-loving sacks of shit.”

Ah, yes, the new Kindred. There was of course, the unfortunate truth that she was a dragon, a member of the Ordo Dracul, a secretive organization that ultimately recruited few members. Numbers were a powerful advantage. In the past, her age and strength would have been enough to handle a hundred young Kindred, but with today’s technology, such feats were risky. While her thralls were well trained in weaponry and modern technology, it was difficult to forever check for possible threats such as hidden explosive devices. And no elder, not even her, could survive being doused in napalm and lit aflame.

She had to be careful. To rule over her city with an iron fist was simply not an option anymore. The only thing that kept the Invictus, or the Carthians for that matter, from launching a full scale assault on her for control of Dolareido, was the nature of Kindred. Vampires were not werewolves, and did not cooperate instinctively. They fought for themselves, no matter how altruistic they perceived themselves to be.

Garry could not ask his Carthians to jump into a meat grinder for him, nor could Michael and his Invictus. As long as Antoinette remained a just and appreciable ruler, most Kindred would respect her position.

The issue, however, was that no matter how hard she tried, forever events continued to spiral out of her control. True conflict was inevitable between the Invictus and Carthians, they all realized it, and this whole meeting was nothing but pointless pretense.

She sat back, and shook her head. “You have been warned. Overstep, and I will interfere. Am I understood?”

Garry and Michael nodded, though they looked at each other like dogs, ready to strike.

“And Maria, we spoke of this before, but it bears repeating here for the others. I do not condone what Avery has done. Whatever misguidedness led to her blatant attack, rest assured she is being dealt with.”

“You worry about the wolves,” Micheal asked, “but not the Carthians?”

“Dolareido is a Kindred city. The Uratha do not have permission to affect the lives of Kindred.”

The man snarled. “Simon—”

“Was removed from the city the moment he overstepped himself. Avery is more reasonable than Simon, to some extent at least, and I would be a fool to ignore her value. She did catch and eliminate the threat of those azlu spider monsters in my city’s underbelly, after all.” She looked to Jacob for his expected retort, but he said nothing. The ever present smile faded, but his gaze remained on Antoinette, bandage-covered eyes aimed at her. “But she will be dealt with. She owes the Ordo as well, for assaulting Natasha. There shall be ... compensation.”

After some time to ponder, Maria sighed and nodded. “Very well, they do have their uses. I will leave it in your hands, Prince. But the next time Avery intrudes upon my estate without permission, I will kill her.”

Antoinette smiled, and nodded. How nice of Maria to dispense with bravado, and state her intent plainly.

“Dismissed,” Antoinette said. As everyone stood, she raised a hand. “Jacob, I would like to speak to you of private matters.” Once the others left, Jacob offered one of his usual, quiet chuckles, and sat down in a chair much closer to her. “Daniel, would you be so kind?”

Her sheriff nodded, and left, leaving Antoinette with her old friend Jacob the warlock, and forever thorn in her side.

“What’s this about, oh Prince of mine?”

“Samantha.”

He laughed. “Straight to the point? Not very dragon-y of you.”

“Yes, well, this is not a matter of the Ordo Dracul, or my role as Prince. This is about my role as sire, and my childe, who has spent an increasingly large amount of time in that den of yours.”

Laughing harder, Jacob leaned in and grinned at her. Not a sinister grin; she had seen many of those. No, this grin was playful, and dare she think it, cheerful.

“Worried I’m mistreating her?”

“Non. She is quite ... enamored with you. Though she is wise enough to temper her expectations, she nevertheless finds herself excited to visit you, and your witches.” While she subtly encouraged her childe to pursue relations with Jacob, she had long made sure Samantha knew to be careful with her heart and the Nosferatu before her.

His grin grew into an almost wondrous smile, and he leaned back in his chair as he looked up. “I wonder if it’s in their blood.”

“You mean her and Jack?”

“Yeap. Something about her just...” He shrugged and shook his head. “It’s personal stuff, but you probably know what I’m thinking. You’re dating her son.”

She returned his smile. She knew of what he meant, of the boy’s inexplicable ability to make her forget she was ancient, and instead, bring out the playful, younger side of her she had long suppressed.

“I wanted to ask about your...” She frowned as she looked down, and tapped a finger against her chin. “I do not presume to know your intentions, or wish to impose upon your designs, old friend. But I cannot help but worry about her. Her son has become the focus of many events and dilemmas, and her daughter’s ghost haunts her home, and potentially Samantha herself as well. The mother of her daughter’s killer is close friends with my sheriff, and —”

Jacob held up his hands. “Yeah, I get it. Shit’s pretty crazy, and she’s gone through hell. I should be careful, use kid gloves.” His grin softened, and he relaxed into the chair. “You’ve done a good job, helping her get over that shit.”

“Have I? She spends much of her time with you these nights, not I.”

“Ha. Yeah, but she’s been ... been helping me, as much as the other way around.” And as quickly as it had softened, his grin spread wide once again. “And I didn’t have to push her very hard, to get her to open up, with the whole Circle.”

“Oh Jacob you fiend, you did not.”

“Ha! I did. Fucked her in front of everyone. She loved it. Embarrassed as all hell, but she loved it.”

Antoinette rolled her eyes, leaned back, and laughed, mirroring the Nosferatu. A topic unbelievably crass, when it came from Jacob, but in Antoinette’s ideal world, such sexual joys would be commonplace.

“It has taken Jack years to be comfortable with only a fraction of such exhibitionism.”

“Yeah well, he’s younger, and he’s a guy. Lot more girls in the porn industry than dudes.”

“And yet, Othello—”

“Othello is porn incarnate. The porn gods came to Earth, found a new baby, and imbued him with all the porn powers, creating the ultimate avatar of porn. He’s the exception that proves the rule.” He tapped his chin, mocking Antoinette and mirroring her in return. “Your childe has a huge crush on him.”

“Does she? The man is a mountain of meat, and last I heard, refuses to have any form of sex other than anal.”

“Yeap. But Samantha seems to embrace kinks of all types. One little push and I could have her—”

“Please do not trade my childe around like a sex toy, Jacob.”

“Nah, nothing like that. I’ll be there. But, I’d be lying if I said she wouldn’t like being passed around like a toy.”

Again, Antoinette rolled her eyes. Not because Jacob was incorrect; he was not. But, his word choice was so boorish, it did not do justice the sexual delights and pleasures he was describing. Antoinette desired a world where such pleasures were accepted without taboo. Jacob, on the other hand, used the very fact such acts were taboo to increase the bliss they provided; likely to great effect, with a woman like Samantha.

“To imagine sweet Samantha engaging in such salaciousness. Please be a little more artful with my childe, Jacob? She is in a delicate stage in her second life.”

He waved a dismissive hand. “I like her, Ann. I’m not just fucking her for kicks. And the Circle likes her.”

“The Circle. That reminds me. I wished to ask of Beatrice. I...”
How to phrase the question, without inviting Jacob’s elderly instincts? “I worry about her, Jacob, and the path she may be going down.”

“Well, don’t. At least, don’t worry enough to stick your nose in. Let Triss do the shit she needs to do, to learn hard lessons the hard way.”

“Jacob, come now. I let you keep the Elen woman because—”

“Ann, you’re not letting me keep her. I’m holding her. You really want to push me on this?” Her old friend smiled, but the playfulness was gone, replaced with challenge. “You can play your games with the others, but you and I both know this city is ours, not just yours. Run your experiments, I’ll run mine.”

Frowning at the man, she slowly reached out, and touched his closer hand. “Jacob. I am not your enemy.”

Jacob pulled away, stood up, and donned his usual smile. Jack called it the Joker smile. Antoinette knew it as the man’s favorite mask.

“Stay out of my way, leave me to mine, and we won’t have any problems, Prince.”

She almost said something, almost pointed out how Jacob’s interference caused many of her current troubles. But he would doubtless retort with how he helped her plant the evidence that led Viktor and Tony on their goose chase; merely the latest in the ways her old friend had helped her.

“But,” he continued, “I won’t let Samantha get involved in any of that shit. You got my word on that.”

Antoinette sighed relief. “Thank you.”

Jacob's manic smile softened as he nodded to her. And before Antoinette could catch a glimpse of the man's true self emerging, he pulled up the hood of his robe, and left.

Antoinette sat in her office, alone, and leaned back in her chair as she combed her hair over her shoulder. She trusted Jacob with Samantha. She mostly trusted Jacob with Dolareido. She did not trust Jacob with Black Blood, and the dark rituals they might pursue. Would the man let Beatrice walk a deadly road, only to learn a painful lesson? Surely he cared for his student more than that. Witches taught with brutal methods, but there was a limit.

The dead were gone, and if Beatrice came face to face with that reality in the most gruesome method the universe could possibly provide, it might break her.

Antoinette groaned, a classic sign that it was time to set aside her troubles, and rest. And she knew how she wanted to relax with the remaining hours of the night.

---

She shivered, and let out a quiet, soft moan, as her love sucked her nipple into his mouth, and bathed it in warm kisses.

Sat upon a large white couch, deep underneath her Elysium tower, she leaned forward a touch to help Jack have easier access to her body. She wore a simple black robe, and she had opened the chest to reveal her breasts. Jack lay upon the couch beside her right, his head and shoulders on her lap and folded legs, and the boy gently devoured her breast over her higher thigh. The boy was still in his suit shirt and pants, jacket over the back of the couch, and she had already opened his pants' fly to slip his hard length out from the hole of his boxers.

She set her left hand upon her lover's head, and lightly stroked his buzzed hair, while her right hand lightly stroked his girth. A gentle touch, far too teasing and soft to lead him to orgasm. Tonight was about relaxing, and relax they would.

“You and Elaine have been ... different, my love.”

He raised a brow as he opened his eyes and peeked up at her from underneath her breast. Laughing, she leaned back, lifting most of the heavy weight from his face.

“Different?”

“Indeed, different. You used to be nervous around her, and she treated you with a degree of ... dominance, dare I say it. But, not long after Avery’s attack, that changed.”

Jack sighed and nodded. “We had a talk. Talked about some ... personal stuff, really, about the curse.”

“Ah.”

“I’m surprised you picked up on it, to like ... the exact day.”

Chuckling, she squeezed the base of his length, and gently worked her hand up and down a single inch in a firm massage. The boy groaned, and she chuckled as she used her left hand to lift her left breast, and set it upon the boy’s face again. He opened his mouth, and again took her swollen areola between his lips. Sparks danced through her, spreading from her breast into her chest, and outward, gentle sparks she knew to trust and let build.

“If it is personal, I will respect that. Though I do hope you will share with me some degree of detail in the future?”

The boy nodded underneath her. She nodded in return, and again stroked his hair, lulling her lover until his eyes drifted closed again. She trusted him, and despite the dangerous games she knew Elaine played, she trusted her as well.

A quiver ran through her body, and again she moaned, a precise little sound, meant entirely to stir pleasure from the man feasting on her. And naturally, it succeeded, and Jack groaned into her breast hard enough she felt the vibration. A drop of his precum rose to the tip of his glans, and while most of her hand remained wrapped around his length, she used her index finger to gently spread the warm fluid around and around the swollen head of his shaft.

“Veronica. Has she served you well?” she asked. He nodded. “And, has she tried to seduce you, without me present?” He chuckled into her bosom and shook his head. “Ah. I am convinced she would like to. Perhaps I scared her into submission?” He nodded, and it was Antoinette’s turn to chuckle. “Good. Also, I have learned of another woman I think would make a wonderful thrall, for a Kindred like yourself.”

Jack opened his eyes, and stopped suckling, pulling his head back. “You don’t have to—”

“Nonsense.” Her left hand pressed against the boy’s head, and nudged him back into her breast, covering his mouth so he could not speak. “You have done very well with Veronica. I believe you have exposed her to too many elements of the Masquerade too quickly, but I am impressed nonetheless. She manages her new role well.” She leaned forward a little, squashing her breast into her love’s face so only his eyes were visible under her supple skin. “And it arouses me to no end, when you fuck her until she is nothing more than a quivering little creature, cumming over, and over, on your length.”

Jack groaned into her breast again, and she smiled all the more for him. Her hand slid off his girth, and danced up his stomach and chest, deftly undoing buttons. With a wicked grin, she spread his shirt, exposing his delicious, tight little body of muscle, and slid her fingers down his abs before again gripping his cock.

“It has gone so well that I would suggest you acquire, perhaps, three new thralls?” she said. His eyes opened wide again, but she stopped him from moving, hand on his head keeping him firmly trapped underneath her breast. “An expedited schedule, oui. But warranted and earned. Your territory must be kept at high presentation, and your daily sleep well protected.” She worked his length in more earnest, occasionally switching to a harder, massaging grip at the base, before raising it to work the whole length with a softer grip. “And I want to see more women succumb to your Kiss, and climax upon you.”

Butterflies swirled in her chest as the boy groaned around her nipple again, and his cock flexed in her hand. A gush of his cum squirted high and landed against his abs, and she made sure to aim the following squirts to land in the same place. She caught some of the hot, thick liquid against her fingers, and spread it around his girth, allowing her hand to more freely slide over his skin so she could milk him, and earn another, and another splash of white cum over his hard stomach.

She leaned back against the couch, exposing more of Jack’s face, but her breast was heavy and large enough he had no trouble keeping her nipple in his mouth. And as the tingling began to grow in her chest, sparking down toward her pelvis, she let go of his cock, cupped her other breast with her cum-soaked hand, and raised it to her mouth. She met his eyes and watched him, as she lifted her right breast to her lips, and suckled on her engorged, aching nipple.

She watched him watch her, as the two of them built the pleasure in her chest, until the pleasure sparks grew hard enough to make her muscles clench. The electric pleasure flowed outward from her sensitive areola into her chest and core, and down into her pelvis and legs, causing her muscles to lightly spasm in gentle orgasm. He recognized the signs, and they both eased the force of their suckling, settling instead into a tender rhythm of kisses and caressing licks, that teased the final sparks of bliss from her.

She let go of her breast, released a pleased sigh, and slid her fingers down through the cum that pooled in the indentations of his abs. Again, she took his cock into her hand, and now with wet fingers, gingerly stroked the whole of his length, while her other hand caressed his buzzed hair in the way she knew would lull him into heavenly relaxation.

“Natasha,” she said, turning her head to look to the entrance of the breakroom. “You wish to speak to me?”

“S-Sorry! Sorry.” The spying little creature squeaked, and stepped out from behind the archway. Jack turned his head enough to look at her, but Antoinette turned it back, burying most of his face under her breast again.

“Come now, Vola. You have both seen each other in the throes of passion. You have no reason to be shy with each other. Now, what did you wish to speak of?”

Gulping, the little Mekhet came over, and stood in front of the couch facing toward Antoinette, perhaps ten feet away. She did not sit down, choosing instead to squirm and wriggle on her feet.

“P-Prince. I wanted to ask about your ... your um...” The tiny woman’s eyes ran down Antoinette’s body, her exposed breasts, and to Jack’s face, or what little she could see of it.

As usual, Jack’s face was mostly hidden when he lay in this position. The weight of her breast and supple skin on his visage both soothed him and aroused him, she knew, so she ensured it buried his lips, his nose, one eye, and all of his chin. And from underneath the heavy softness, her little Ventrue set a kiss upon her, despite Natasha being so close. Finally, the man was beginning to accept her way of thinking.

Perhaps obtaining his first thrall was the first step to the man’s sexual awakening? The young vampire likely already thought himself awakened, considering the pleasures Antoinette bathed him with. How adorable. He would understand eventually, when a dozen thralls and ghouls, all at his command, washed him with their naked bodies.

“Yes, Natasha?”

“I w-wanted to ask about, if someone was going t-to talk to Avery, about ... relations.”

Antoinette sighed, gentle and sad. It was a delicate situation, and she had to handle it gracefully.

“Jack, my love, this is your area of influence.” Or delegate it, like a true manager.

Sighing, Jack turned his head enough so his features were no longer covered by her breast. But she did not pull back either, content to let its weight sit on the side of his head and face. The situation was oddly amusing, and she found herself enjoying teasing the two of them.

“I sent Avery a text not long after the incident. Told her I’d pay a visit once everyone was feeling healed up.”

Natasha looked down, frowning. “I know. I was wondering if ... I could come?”

Antoinette could not see Jack’s face very well, except for the tip of his nose, but she knew he would be smiling.

“Yeah, sure, I—” The boy’s voice cut short, and a shudder worked through him, as Antoinette resumed stroking his length with her right hand. Wet as it was, she settled her grip along its center, high enough so her index finger could massage the base of his glans. “Uh, yeah, sure. But neither of us are on good terms with them. You really want to go?”

“I do. I want ... t-to see how bad those terms are.”

Antoinette watched Vola as the tiny Mekhet struggled with her internal torment. Now that her relationship with Arturo and Matthew was damaged, she did not know what to do about it. Antoinette had given her advice, but ultimately Natasha already knew what to do, intellectually. Emotionally was another matter, and only time would give her perspective.

“Then yeah, sure, come along, but it won’t be for a few weeks.”

She sighed and nodded. “I can w-wait. It’ll be good ... to...” Her eyes roamed back down Jack’s body, to his cum-soaked abs, and to his shaft as Antoinette stroked it faster. The Prince knew how to make her love cum in minutes, and now, with his friend watching, it was a prime moment. A tight, massaging grip that worked most of the length, while using the top of the hand to work his own cum into his skin and glans, had the boy quivering in moments.

Antoinette released a pleased sigh, and Natasha stared, wide eyed, as Jack turned his face back into the Prince’s breast, and came yet again. Thick waves of white fluid gushed onto his hard stomach, and both women watched with delight at how his abs, flexing in spurts as the boy quivered with orgasm, were soon covered in a second layer of cum. Enough fluid that it pooled into the indentations of his muscles, and rose and fell with each flex and fake breath.

“I must apologize,” Antoinette said to Natasha. “Poor Jack is forever forced to entertain my ... kinks.” With an evil smile, Antoinette slowly milked more cum out of the shuddering man in her lap, and Jack exploited his Blush of Life to prolong his pleasure. Only once his abs were drenched in white did his climax relent, and Antoinette softened her grip.

“It’s ok, r-r-really. I mean, after ... all the making and trading tapes and stuff. It’s ... nice.” She smiled, shivered a little, and fingerwaved at Jack. “A few weeks then. B-Bye.”

Antoinette nodded to her student, Natasha returned it, and Jack managed a weak wave with his dangling left arm. Natasha laughed softly, and took a few extra seconds to admire Jack, and Antoinette as well, before finally turning.

As Natasha stepped away, Jack resumed his suckling, harder, and Antoinette closed her eyes as she melted into the touch. With her free right hand, she cupped and caressed her free breast while her lover insisted on devouring her left breast with increasing vigor. Her swollen nipple, bathed by the boy's loving tongue, sent sparks through her chest again, and she shivered as she let them build. Let soon evolved into encouraged, and she melted into the boy's kisses all the more.

Natasha, now completely hidden behind the archway leading out of the room once more, poked her head in yet again, enough to get a peek. Antoinette smiled at her, winked, and lifted her right breast up to her lips again. With Jack massaging and licking her other swollen areola, Antoinette had but to set a couple kisses on her other breast, for the orgasm to spark. The small jolts of bliss spread out from her nipples into her chest, and she melted back into the couch as she indulged the pleasant sensation.

To climax from her nipples lacked the sharp power of her clitoris, or the rolling depth and waves of having her insides pleased, but it was pleasing nonetheless, tiny, electric shivers that spread out from her chest into her limbs. Jack knew to ease his kisses, her nipples growing painfully sensitive as the pleasure spread, and she purred bliss as the boy set only soft kisses on her breast underneath her nipple instead.

Antoinette smiled down at her lover as she leaned back, and set her right hand on his naked stomach. He continued to nuzzle his face into her breast, but instead of suckling and licking her nipple, he set the gentlest kisses on her pale skin, and smiled into the softness. With a small turn of his head, he managed to smile up at her from underneath her breast with his eyes, and she returned it as she caressed his scalp.

“Relaxed?” he asked.

“Mmm oui, quite. And you, my love?”

He laughed, and nuzzled his nose into her breast. “Yeap. Just want to stay here forever.”

With his eyes blocked again, Antoinette risked a peek to Natasha, and offered her a knowing smile. The look on her face said it all. That Antoinette could orgasm from simply having her nipples kissed and caressed surprised her, but also, that their way of relaxing struck ache into her. She missed her boyfriends.

Antoinette offered her student a small nod, and slid her right hand up to Jack’s chest, where she began to tease the indentations of his pectorals, as her left hand continued to stroke his buzzed hair.

“Jack my dear, have you spoke with Matthew or Arturo?”

“Nope. I’ve been avoiding the Uratha as a whole, really.”

“I think, perhaps, you should speak with them, before you speak with the rest of the pack.”

“This about Tash?” He sat up, considered thoughtfully, laid upon her lap once again, and re-hid his face under her breast. A far better place to be. “It’ll be an awkward conversation.” His voice, muffled by her body, earned a chuckle from her.

“Undoubtedly. But, I believe you have the delightful ability to disarm people, my little Ventrue, and help them see situations in a new light. Matthew and Arturo are trapped under the rule of their leader, but, perhaps you can help them ... bypass such a limitation?”

“Uh, you’re asking a lot.”

“Am I?” She gave his chest a gentle, playful slap. “You know I would violate my role in the Ordo, if it meant saving our relationship. I know you would do the same against the Invictus.”

“But you wouldn’t sacrifice the city to save it, would you? Throw away millions of lives for us? And hundreds of paranormals?”

Ah, a painful truth. “I would be tempted, by love. But no, I would not.”

“I think this is more about Matt and Art trusting Avery so much, they figured she had to be right about saving lives, that there was no way she could be wrong.”

Sighing, Antoinette nodded. “Oui. But then, they let the situation escalate until they had no choice but to detain Natasha, my love. They handled the situation poorly.”

“Yeah, they did.”

“And,” she said with a deep, huskier voice, and she leaned forward, purposefully squashing Jack’s face under her bust, “we would never betray each other’s trust. If my city were in such terrible danger, we would be discussing it, at length, long before such measures were necessary.”

He grinned from under her bosom; she could feel the muscles flex. “I know, but that’s also cause we trust each other enough to get into arguments about stuff. Rock solid relationship, right? We love each other.” All muffled, of course. “They—”

“They love Natasha, I am sure of it. But even though their goals are not so dissimilar, they went against Vola in favor of Avery, because they are wolves, and follow their leader. You, my love, could help show them the folly of their ways, the folly of such blind trust.”

“Sure, I can try. But, don’t you still have a punishment to hit those two with?”

“Oh yes, and one will be given. And I believe my student has one in mind.”

Chapter 137

~~Beatrice~~

One month after the incident.

“She still hasn't retrieved the book,” Jennifer said.

“Yeah, well, she might, might not. Doesn't mean I'm gonna stop.”

Sighing, Jennifer nodded, and stepped up to her side. The two of them stood in the cave on the outskirts of Dolareido, where Elen dangled over Jacob's ritual bowl, helpless. It was almost frustrating how the old woman didn't seem to mind or care, frustrating and scary. Vampire immortality could be a pain in the ass, what with the Beast being a constant concern, the crazy torpor dreams, the ever growing blood lust, being made of tinder, and the worst, never being able to experience the sun again. Triss would happily accept all that, and even her shitty Nos deformities, if it meant she didn't have to experience whatever Elen's cursed immortality was.

If being a vampire was considered a curse, the fuck had happened to this witch? Christ, shit was fucking terrifying. Beatrice fiddled with dark magics and shit regularly now. How long before she stumbled onto a ritual that fucked her over like Elen? Maybe like, a vampire that was immune to fire and sunlight, but couldn't feed anymore? She'd just get hungrier and hungrier, until all that remained was the Beast, raging inside her, demanding blood that it just couldn't get. And Triss would be trapped in that hell, never able to quench her thirst, and never able to take control of her body from the Beast to at least kill herself.

Yeap, she had to be careful. Jacob told her a few horror stories already about some witches that attempted to make themselves stronger with some nasty dark deals. Crúac wasn't like a vampire Disciplines, which called on the vampire's vitae. Crúac was using vitae to reach out and touch something, something out there in the endlessness that surrounded them, and then that something responded to the intentions and desires of the witch that started the ritual. A third party. She had to respect that third party, whatever it was, because it didn't always play nice.

Triss gave the old woman a small push on the leg, and she swung gently, not saying a word.

“If there's anyone this could work for,” Jen said, “it's Samantha. Her daughter...”

Nodding, Triss stepped deeper into the cave, and squatted in front of one of their failures. “Assuming it's her daughter. Could be a shadow of her.”

“I suppose.”

“It's not as if I know how ghosts work. But, even if it's a shadow of her, if we put her in a working body, does it matter?”

A glance back showed Jen shaking her head.

“I can't imagine it'd go very well. Have you not read Pet Sematary?”

Triss shivered, and covered the failure with a blanket. She had read Pet Sematary. Not a night went by she didn't think about Julias coming back wrong, and cutting off her head or something.

“I’m not some grief-stricken dad, Jen. I’m a witch. You’re a witch. Jacob’s a witch. Hell, she’s a witch.” She gestured to the old woman dangling. “We’re not doing this blind.”

“No, but we are trusting this woman to do what we want.”

“Trusting? Black Blood’s been forcing her.” Sighing, Triss squatted down by another failure, the most recent one. A step in the right direction, but if the public saw it, they’d be outside with pitchforks, calling her Doctor Frankenstein.

“And you trust Black Blood?”

Triss laughed. No way she couldn’t with a question like that. “You know I don’t. But I trust Jacob.”

Jen raised a brow. “No you don’t.”

“No, I don’t, not completely, but I trust him enough. Hell, even if he’s fucking with me, he’s not gonna work against me, Jen. This could help him, too.”

“Minerva’s been dead for decades, Triss. He’s moved on. He’s got a girlfriend.”

Triss pulled the blanket over the latest failure, and rejoined her friend near Elen. Elen’s crazy magic prevented the corpses from rotting somehow, so they didn’t have to worry about flies or the smell. Even better, they got to reuse the parts, which was pretty much the nastiest thing Triss figured she’d ever do, ever, in her second life. But she did it.

“Yeah, I know. And that girlfriend of his really wants her daughter back.”

“So Jacob will help us, to help Samantha.” Jen sighed and nodded. “It would be nice. Every time I look at her, she seems happy, but you can see the horrible sadness underneath it.”

Silence hit them, and they let it sit for a bit. No need to say it. Triss and Sam had that sadness in common.

But fuck that depression shit. She was getting closer. Every night, she and Black Blood and the brain dead bitch got closer.

“You’re right,” Triss said, “but she’s been recovering, too. And hell, you saw her last night.”

Jen and Triss both sighed dreamily. Yeah, Jacob had fucked Samantha in the middle of the cave where everyone could see. Othello had been in the entrance of his alcove, fucking Madison’s ass like usual, and Samantha had apparently spent a couple seconds too long gawking. So Jacob grabbed her, stripped her, handcuffed her hands behind her, and fucked her standing. Which of course led to fucking her on her knees, when she couldn’t stand anymore. It was so good, even Aaron stopped reading to take a peek.

Jennifer laughed, and cradled her cheek with a palm. “Her crush on Othello only grows.”

“Don’t think I don’t know you had something to do with that.”

Jen daintily pressed one of her hands against her chest, and she gasped. “Whatever do you mean?”

“Ha! She told me you told her stories about the things you and Othello used to do, sharing ghouls and stuff.”

Her friend chuckled and shrugged. “I was merely explaining to her that, despite his obvious anal fetish, Othello is a talented lover who pleases his ghouls immensely, especially Madison.”

Triss snorted on a laugh. Far as she knew, Jen had never slept with Othello, but they’d done basically everything else with a ghoul or three between them, back in the day before Jen and Triss were a thing.

“If Jacob were any other dude, you know he’d be super jealous of Othello, with the way Samantha looks at him.”

“But not Jacob. The man is...”

Triss grinned and dragged a claw along some of her teeth. “So confident and secure in himself, it’s fucking hot.”

Yeap, Jacob was hot. Triss had never thought of him like that before, but after seeing him with Samantha, she couldn’t not think of him like that. The fledgling Daeva had completely changed Triss’s mind about the man’s appeal. The salt and pepper hair, the ripped, lean body, the sheer ridiculous confidence, it was too damn good.

She’d never fuck him. No way she could picture herself doing that, not after everything they’d been through, but that didn’t mean she couldn’t appreciate his hotness, and enjoy it by proxy with Samantha.

Jen laughed. “I was going to say talented and open-minded. Samantha is certainly satisfied, sexually speaking, and considering how relaxed and playful Jacob is—”

Jen’s grin only grew. “Sexually speaking, I imagine Samantha will be seeing more of Othello, from much closer.”

Yeap, that was definitely a possibility. Othello had been in the circle for forever, and him and Jacob had an easygoing friendship. If Samantha had a problem with Othello, Jacob wouldn’t push her, but it was obvious the girl had a thing for the big guy. And for Madison. And for Triss and Jen, for that matter.

“Alright, pinky swear time,” Triss said, and she held out a hand to Jen.

“Over?”

“Over Samantha. If, for whatever reason, we find ourselves naked and with Samantha on us, or you know, vice versa, I pinky swear to ... to um ... Fuck, I don’t know. You set the limits.”

“Oh, I understand.” Jen stepped in closer, and put her hands on Triss’s hips. So much for pinky swearing. “She’ll never be what you are to me, Triss, but if you’re comfortable with it, I wouldn’t mind getting to touch the Daeva a bit.”

“Touching. Ok, sure, touching is acceptable. But no kissing.”

“Assuredly not! Jacob won’t let Othello kiss her, or us, and I would never. Kissing is...” She leaned in, and kissed Triss, nice and slow. Which was pretty strange, considering they were in a cave with corpses and an old witch for a prisoner, but they’d been at this for months now. “Kissing is intimate.”

“Very intimate,” Triss said, nodding, and returned the kiss. “Well, kissing on the mouth. Kissing other body parts should be fine, right?”

They laughed. This was silly, and dumb, and kind of exciting. Samantha’s attitude was just so damn contagious. She really got into things, and rode whatever wavelength the room had going. Definitely not Jack, and yet, had a bit of Jack in her, something that got everyone relaxed, disarmed, and feeling more open and stuff.

No wonder Jacob was into her. Elders were ancient, and all Kindred pretty much universally agreed elders were kinda fucked in the head, too. Being super old could do that, but it was also cause elders took long torpors when their blood lust got out of control. Decades of sleeping, crazy torpor dreams, yeah, that shit did strange things to their minds. So if the crazy elders found some Kindred that managed to spark something in them, made them feel happy, those Kindred were special. Jack was special, and apparently so was his mom.

She was also gorgeous, and very fuckable. The lean but soft body, the handful breasts, the cougar hips and ass, the wavy brown hair to her ears and shoulders, the green eyes. No wonder Jacob couldn't keep his hands off her. The squeals and mewls, the 'oh please don't oh pretty please' doe eyes she gave, despite obviously boiling with horniness, it'd drive any Kindred to the brink.

Jen was obviously thinking the same thoughts, and they grinned at each other before kissing again.

And then reality came snapping back, and Triss stepped away as she looked around. Room full of corpses. Right, not the time to be thinking about sex.

“We—”

Feet on stone shut her up, and both vampires turned to the entrance of the cave as people approached. People? Jacob coming made sense, if he was gonna pay a visit, but Othello and Aaron didn't visit; preferred to leave her to it and not interfere. Then who the fuck?

A pale man stuck his head in first.

“Aaron?” she said. “Um, the fuck?”

Aaron stepped into the cave, wearing a small frown. The Gangrel sighed, shaking his head, and gestured to the man walking in behind him. Triss figured it'd be Othello, but her Beast said otherwise. Othello was a hundred-year-old Daeva, and her Beast would instantly recognize the older vampire's aura. This aura wasn't his, but whoever the fuck it was, it was big.

"Sándor!" Jennifer said, and she let out a little purr as she dragged a single finger along her collar. "What a wonderful surprise."

The man met Jen's gaze, cold and neutral, and he stepped deeper into the cave.

"Sorry Triss," Aaron said. "Sándor here ran into me, and insisted."

"Insisted?" Triss asked. "You mean forced you to show him the location of this cave?"

Her friend sighed and nodded. "Yes."

"That seems hardly necessary," Jen said, getting a little closer to the Begotten. "You could have just asked."

Sándor shook his head. "If I'd done that, you would have brought me elsewhere. Or covered up this." He waved a hand to Elen, still dangling from the hook Jacob had hooked her onto all those months ago, and to the several corpses in the back of the cave covered by blankets.

Beatrice blinked at him, then at Jen, then back at him. "Aaron, you can go."

"You sure? If you need—"

"We'll be fine."

Aaron glanced between her and Jen a few times, double checking, but after Sándor stepped aside, the Gangrel nodded, and left. Which left the two vampires alone with the crazy strong Begotten, in a room that might as well have been a set for a horror movie.

“Kinda getting some judgmental vibes, Sándor,” Triss said. “Gonna be honest with you up front, so maybe we can skip some bullshit. I don’t really care what you have to say about any of this.”

As usual, the man’s face showed nothing. The stoic thing could be really sexy sometimes, especially on a dude like Sándor who’d obviously earned it, but right now, it was very much not. Right now it made her want to punch him.

Sándor stepped forward, and walked around Elen, slow steps with hands on his jean pockets. “She’s catatonic?”

“She gets like that sometimes,” Triss said, shrugging. “I got ways of making her talk.” Or rather, Black Blood did, but not like she was gonna tell him that.

The man stopped by the corpses, and like he’d been practicing his poker face his whole life, his expression stayed neutral. He knew they were bodies, cause Triss didn’t bother trying to hide their shapes, just cover them up so they didn’t creep her out so much. No one liked seeing half-mangled faces crossed with the faces of other people.

“This woman ... has caused me a lot of pain.” He looked at the dangling flesh witch, and a crack of a frown broke his stone face.

“Yeah, and I get that you—”

He shook his head. “She was a tool. The wielder is dead. Still, looking at her, I...” Sighing, he grabbed one of his shoulders and rotated it a few times. Nervous twitch? “The curse she used on me was powerful, and intricate. I’m worried about someone else using her to do it again, or similar binding rituals on other paranormals.”

“Well, don’t worry, I’m not using her to cast any curses.”

“And Jacob?”

“Jacob’s dumped her on my lap. He’s...” Groaning, she stepped up to Sándor and gave him a gentle shove on the chest, enough to force him to take a step back from the prisoner. “He’s not involved. This is all on me.”

He raised a brow, and looked past her at Jen.

The Ventrue smiled and shrugged. “I’m moral support.”

Triss smiled at her. Yeah, moral support. Sounded dumb, until anyone thought about it for more than two seconds. Damn right she needed some fucking moral support.

Sándor didn’t laugh, or smirk, not even a chuckle; he understood. He nodded, and looked back at the old woman.

“I’m not sure how useful she’ll be to you without her tools.”

“Well, Prince has all the tools, so we’re making do.” For now.

He looked at the bodies, again without a frown or anything. “Any progress?”

She tilted her head as she eyed him. The ole stink eye, to see if he’d react. But Sándor’s poker face was perfect, and he looked between her and the corpses as he waited for her answer.

“A little. That’s why we’re reusing some bodies. We only kill kine who deserve it, but even with how big Dolareido is, it’s not like we can just burn through hundreds of assholes.”

“A struggle all Begotten understand. The more we hunt, the more nightmares we spread, the greater chance a ... hero, like Jeremiah, finds us.” He stared up at the dangling old woman for a while, before another frown managed to pierce his poker face. “I could help.”

Ok, talk about a one-eighty.

“Uh, you didn’t sound like you wanted to help a second ago.”

“You’re committed. I’ll tell you about Elen, what I’ve seen her do, and what she did to me. If you want.”

She eyed him some more, squinting one eye and scanning. Lying? Not lying? He had a great poker face, or maybe that was just his resting gargoyle face. Either way, unless Samantha pulled through and got her hands on that book, Triss was forced to crawl, when a little more info, a little help, could turn that into a walk or run.

“That sounds like a painful discussion,” Jennifer said. “Are you sure?”

“I am, and it will be painful. But, there is an ancient tradition men and women use to defeat painful memories,” he said. The two vampires looked at each other, eyebrow raised, before blinking at him. And, holy shit, the man managed a small smile. “Alcohol.”

---

Jennifer suggested Bloodlust. Beatrice suggested her old catacombs. Sándor went with the catacombs.

“South Hill Cemetery,” Triss said, and she sighed a classic, nostalgic sorta sigh as she gestured around. “For two fucking decades, I used this catacomb as my hangout spot. Nearby kine thought it was haunted.”

“Twenty years,” he said, vodka in one hand, candle in the other. “Long time.”

“If I’d known,” Jen said, “that she just needed someone to come along and be nice to her, I would have have.”

“Yeah well, I was a bitch, and didn’t want anyone’s help.” She took them down a level where it was dark, and she sat down in her usual corner. Fuck, been months since she'd sat in this corner, back when she learned Julias died. "Don't ... don't suppose there's anyway I can get drunk?"

"If only." Jennifer sighed, and sat down next to her, close enough to touch knees. With the two of them in jeans and t-shirts, it wasn't a problem to sit in dirt and dust, and they got cozy with their backs against the shelves of coffins. A few skulls sat around, exposed and sitting pretty on the shelves next to the big corpse boxes, and Sándor blinked at them several times.

"Why are there exposed bones?"

"The elders of Dolareido," Jennifer said, "have classic tastes, if perhaps a little colored by fantasy. This"—she gestured around them—"is what happens when vampires many centuries old remember the past with fondness."

"I like it," Triss said. "They think it's like, Gothic or whatever, but to me it's metal as fuck."

Sándor nodded, and sat down across from them. Much as catacombs looked huge in movies, they were actually pretty damn small usually. Dug caves that didn't go very deep didn't have the luxury of being huge. So him sitting across from them nearly put him in touching distance, and he crossed his legs at the ankle, same as Triss, as he set the bottle down on the cold stone in front of him.

"I have seen catacombs like this, centuries ago." Nodding, he popped open the bottle, and took a sip. Not like he could share or anything, so no glasses. To his credit, the man gulped down a mouthful, and didn't so much as twitch. It'd been a long fucking time since Triss had had a drink, but fuck, you didn't go around swigging vodka like it was beer.

"You remember those years?" Jennifer asked. "Vampires have to sleep, after the blood lust gets too strong. Years, usually a decade or two or three, until the blood lust settles. And in torpor, the dreams —”

Sándor lifted a hand, gently interrupting as he nodded. “I once served as a vampire’s guard while she slept. Thirty years. I know how much torpor can change you, and ... blur the memories.”

“Thirty years of guarding someone?” Triss said. “Holy fuck. How much did they pay you?”

After a small smile she almost didn’t catch, the man took another swig. If it burned, he didn’t show it. “I owed them my life. Thirty years of living, sleeping, and working in their home, above where they slept, seemed like a good trade. And I’m good at sitting around.”

“But ... if you know what torpor can do to vampires, I’m guessing this story doesn’t end well?”

He shook his head, and took another drink. If he was human, she’d tell him to slow down before he puked all over her old catacombs. Or hurt himself.

“She woke up ... paranoid. Very. I had to leave. This was centuries ago.”

“And you remember the details?”

“Better than a vampire would. But, not really, no. Blurs, buried, lost.” He frowned at the bottle in his hands, and set it on the stone. “It’s better to forget a lot of things.”

The two women nodded. No getting around it, some memories were better lost. She never wanted to forget Julias, not ever, but she wasn’t stupid enough to think she was in the right headspace right now. Maybe in a hundred years, the best thing for her would be to forget him?

Or revive him, have him back, and spend century after century with the man she loved.

“Elen,” Sándor continued, “cut off the skin of my back, my human back, and carved a curse into it. She placed it on a stone in my lair, and gained control of me and my Horror.”

Triss winced and sucked in a breath. “I saw that, yeah. She use her book to do that?”

“A book, with a lot of rituals in it. And a knife. I don’t know where she got the book, but the knife was something she created.”

The two vampires exchanged looks again. They didn’t want to ask, but they had to.

So Triss took the plunge. “How did she make it?”

“Sacrificed a child.”

Triss threw up her hands. “My fucking god! Every step, every mother fucking step, is just one giant road of nasty shit, isn’t it? Why the fuck is this so hard? Why the fuck is everything about this always just ‘oh look you want to resurrect someone? Better be willing to literally kill babies to do it’ sorta shit!?”

Sándor watched her, a hint of a smile on his face, before he held up the bottle as if clinking her own, and took another drink.

“The Prince took the knife, didn’t she?” he said.

“She ... did, yeah, with the book.”

“Then, if you can get the book, perhaps you can also get the knife?” He took another drink, a sip this time, and met her eyes. “Or you could kill an innocent.”

Triss glared at him. “Julias loved the kine. Fucking loved them. First date I ever went with him on, it was obvious just how much he envied them, cause they lived in the moment, and vampires like him couldn’t help but plan plan plan. Danse Macabre shit, you know? When he got the mansion, he got thralls using Dominate so he wouldn’t have to use the Vinculum except for just a few special circumstances. He was one of the few vampires in the damn city that thought kine were more than blood bags. Last thing I’m going to do, is sacrifice a fucking child, so I can see him again. Do I look like someone willing to walk right into some shitty Greek tragedy to you?”

Sándor didn’t look away, the whole rant. And when she was done, he laughed; dude was definitely getting drunk for him to actually laugh.

“He sounds like he was a great man,” he said, and he drank again. “Not a night goes by I don’t hate myself for what I did, helping kill him.”

Ah shit, the vodka was making him say the stuff he probably shouldn’t. She dumped a fucking rant on him, about how awesome Julias was. Fucker was the reason Julias was dead! Except, not really, and they both knew it, but fuck, he probably felt guilty as all fucking hell, all the fucking time, and fucking fuck she fucking just fucking went the fuck on...

She crawled over to him, sat beside him, and Blushed Life. Before he could say anything, she grabbed the bottle, and took a swig.

“Holy fuck this burns. Oh my fucking god, I forgot what alcohol tastes like. Why the fuck would anyone drink this?” Whatever. She took another drink.

He blinked at her, and the bottle in her hands. “You’re going to puke that up later.”

“Yeah, well, I hear Daeva do this sometimes. Blush, eat and drink human food, and puke it up later. Thought maybe I might be able to get a little drunk off it while faking life.”

Jennifer smiled at her, but didn't join her. “Count me out. I'll be the designated driver ... And, I do believe the Blush won't allow you to absorb the food, Triss. You won't get drunk.”

“Shit.” What a fucking waste. She handed the bottle back. “Well, if you get really drunk, can I have a drink of you, Sándor? I saw what Fiona's blood did to Damien. Dude looked really...”

“Horny,” Jennifer said, nodding.

“Well, yeah, that, but kinda tipsy, I guess? It was weird.”

Sándor chuckled again. It was a nice sound, coming from the usually closed off guy.

“I've never had a vampire feed on me, I don't believe. Maybe hundreds of years ago, but I've been avoiding people, in general, for some time since crossing the ocean. Before then, vampires and monsters had a ... difficult relationship. Superstition and whatnot.”

“You were nightmare monsters,” Jennifer said. “I can imagine there were issues.”

“Yes. But here in Dolareido, there's a strange peace. And it's ... good. I was scared of it at first, but Azamel's shown me what Dolareido can be like. Fiona as well. She's in deep for that Damien fellow.” He raised his bottle high before taking another drink. “I owe him, too. And you.” He nodded to Triss.

“Ah, that what this is about?” she said, gesturing to the bottle. “Paying us back? Cause I don't think anyone really feels that way. We wanted Jeremiah and Angela dead. Freeing you ended up being easier than killing you.”

“Regardless.” He took another drink. “Azamel’s helped me calm down, and ... yes, if you wanted a drink of me, I wouldn’t say no.”

Jennifer rubbed her hands together, and slid over a bit so she sat on Sándor’s other side, opposite of Triss. In the past, Sándor would have ignored her, or moved, but now he gave the girl a small smile, and took a sip of his drink. It was hard to tell how depressed he was. Sad, yes, but how sad, how drunk, how stoic, Triss couldn’t figure out. It was all blending together in his calm, solid face, the sort of face a ship captain might use if he was staring out to sea in self reflection, or some shit.

“Might take you up on that,” Triss said.

He nodded. “Fiona says it does intoxicate Damien, in a fashion, but also gives him some ... hunger.”

“Hunger?” Jennifer asked.

“The vampire says it’s hard to define, according to Fiona. But he ... loses control, and ravages the girl. Thoroughly.”

Triss and Jen shared a few confused blinks. Hunger equals ravaging?

Jen was the first to laugh. “That explains why Damien fucked her in public.”

“K, well, maybe not, then,” Triss said. Of course Jen gave her an evil glare, so Triss just shrugged at her, a ‘maybe’ shrug. Now was not the time to try and get into Sándor’s pants.

He nodded, took another drink, and leaned back against the coffin behind him as he looked up at nothing.

“Elen can take objects,” he said, “and imbue them with ... power. I don’t know this power. It’s not something us creatures of the dream understand. Vampires might understand it better. There's power, in flesh, and life, something visceral, and it's only found in the physical world."

Triss shrugged. "I've noticed, but I don't have any fucking clue if vampires can do that shit. We drink blood, and when it's fresh, it's ... definitely more powerful. There's something in it that has power, and we convert it into shit vamps can use."

They all nodded, like it was a shared school lesson they were trying to learn. It was a part of their life, but it's not like any of them truly understood it. Vampires, drinking blood, fancy magical powers? Sure, an everynight thing, but none of them knew how or why it worked, not even Jacob.

"The world's a crazy place," Triss said eventually.

Everyone nodded again. Yeap, they'd been thinking the same thing.

"Sándor," Jennifer said, "do you ... want to talk, about what happened to you?"

Before the poor guy could say anything, Triss waved a harsh hand at her friend.

"Leave the dude alone. We're talking about the now, and the shit we're trying to do. No need to bring up that ... that shit." Or Julias, for that matter.

Sándor managed another small smile for her, but set the bottle down and shrugged. "I don't normally drink. Even before Margaret, I didn't drink. It's not a good idea for Begotten with hungers like mine."

So Margaret was his wife's name. Very old school.

Jen gestured to the bottle. “But you’re drinking now?”

“Azamel’s helped me find ways to sate my hunger, so it’s under control. Mostly. And...” He shrugged, grip still on the bottle’s neck, and he tipped it side to side, gently sloshing the contents around. “You know what I’ve gone through, in a sense. But at the same time, you’re willing to do something I’m not. I wanted to know why.”

“Ha! Why? Cause I’m a fucking idiot, that’s why.” She took the bottle from him and gulped down some more. Burned the whole way down, and she coughed a few dozen times. “Cause I can’t let anything go. Cause I can’t let him go.”

She handed him the bottle, and he took another drink. Poor guy was going to wake up wishing he was dead, at this rate.

“You must have loved him, dearly.”

“Fucking right I did. He really helped me out of a dark spot, and I did the same for him. We had a great relationship. We loved each other! I...” She groaned and flopped onto her side on the dirty stone floor. Not in a ‘oh god I’m gonna cry’ kinda way. More like a ‘ugh fuck Mondays’ sorta way. “The fuck is the point in being a witch, if I can’t use it to bring back the man I loved, you know?”

Silence again, until Sándor sighed, and tapped her hip with the bottle.

“Aaron told me you were becoming quite happy in the Circle? Jennifer seems to think so, according to him.”

“I ... I am,” Triss said. “I really am, no joke.”

Jennifer laughed, reached across Sándor’s lap, and poked Triss in the ass. So of course Triss had to sit back up and slap her hand away.

“I like to think she is,” the damn slut said.

“I’m not lying. I am happy with you guys. Ok? But with Julias, it was ... it was more, you know? Christ, I felt...”

“Peace,” Sándor said, eyes downcast, voice heavy. Yeap, the vodka was doing a number on the man, cause there was some genuine sadness on his face.

“Yeah.” Sighing, she slid in a little closer to Sándor, until she was arm to arm with him, and she gestured out to the emptiness around them. “What was Margaret like? And your kid?” Yeap, they were going there.

He laughed, a weak little thing, and took another drink. A long, long drink, and Jennifer eventually took the bottle away from him.

“You may be Begotten, but you’re not immortal.” She set the bottle aside, out of arm’s reach, and frowned at him.

He laughed again, just as weak, but nodded as he leaned back. “Margaret was a royal pain in my ass.”

Both women jaw dropped. That was not what they expected the man to say about his late wife, killed by the people who’d fucking enslaved him.

“It’s true,” he continued. “She was stubborn, and she pestered me constantly. If took any longer than five minutes to do something, she’d prod me until I did it.” He lazily reached across Jen for the bottle, but she gently pushed his arm down, and he chuckled as he fell back against the shelf behind him again. “And Theo, he was a troublemaker. He was five, but he was a smartass, and loved to find holes in any order you gave him. Tell him go to bed, and he’d wait until you said ‘now’, cause otherwise, he’d pretend the order was for later.”

The girls laughed. Ha, that was a smartass kid, for five. Oh god, five.

Sándor laughed and shrugged, and almost fell over onto Triss. Considering he was sitting down, nearly falling over put him in drunk territory. Least he wasn't slurring and drooling everywhere.

"But that's important, you know?" he continued. "It's important to remember things as they were. You can't look at the past with rose-tinted glasses, if you want to make smart choices." He gestured to Triss. "Tell me something you didn't like about him."

Ah shit, what she didn't like about Julias? Fuck, she'd spent months just idolizing the memory of him, thinking about the way he liked to hold her, about his smile, his great body and ridiculous sex skills, his—

Rose-tinted glasses. Julias had told her he'd hit his fiance, not long after he'd been embraced. A good, hard hit. He'd taken her to the hospital, and it was the last he ever saw of her.

Sándor was right. Julias wasn't ... hadn't been perfect. It was important she remember that. He wouldn't want her to remember him as something he wasn't.

"The sobbyness," she said. The gargoyle raised a brow, and she laughed. "Like I said, Julias loved kine, and envied them. But ugh, he could get really emo about it sometimes. Really emo art, emo music tastes, emo ... everything. Like, god, I know Daeva that are less up their own ass than you, Julias."

Jen and Sándor laughed, and she did too.

"Margaret, she ... she knew what I was, before we were married. And that stubbornness is how she managed to ... get to know me."

That made sense. Sándor reeked of closed-off brooding asshole, when Triss met him. It'd take a woman with a hard, stone-breaker attitude to punch through some shit like that.

“And Theo?” she asked.

“Theo. I played games with that kid every weekend, and he shocked me every time; too damn smart. But, it wasn't how smart he was that really caught my attention. It was his honor.”

“Honor, in a five-year-old?”

“Yeah. If we caught him doing something bad, or if he tried to wriggle out of a punishment, but we called him on it, he'd accept defeat. ‘You got me, daddy’, he'd say.” More laughter. “It was so strange, listening to a kid that age, willing to use tricky tactics, but also have this weird sense of honor about it.”

There was no stopping everyone from smiling, and from silence hitting them again as they absorbed the reality. His wife was dead, and kid, too. Triss had gone through hell when Julias died, but how fucking bad had it been on this poor fucker, losing his wife and his fucking child? And then being forced to work as a slave for the killers for years?

But the bastards who'd killed them and Julias were dead. Revenge had. Woo.

Jennifer sighed, and handed Sándor back the vodka. “Don't hurt yourself.”

The gargoyle smiled at the bottle, but set it aside, no drink.

“It's easy ... to get lost in the memories,” he said, closing his eyes, head tilted up. “I can still remember the smell of her favorite shampoo. I can still remember the way she scrunched up her nose when she was angry with me. I can still remember how she'd try and take charge, when we had sex, but it never lasted. She'd start trembling and..." After a few surprised blinks, he coughed. Probably surprised by his own words.

"Queen in the streets, freak in the sheets?" Jennifer said.

Triss choked. Sándor laughed.

"That's as good a description as any," he said. "Sorry, for mentioning it. Maybe a little too much information."

The two vampires laughed, loudly. God, that was cute, thinking he could embarrass them. Sure, he was a fuck load older, but he wasn't a vampire. His hunger didn't pull him into sexual situations like the Kiss often did. Any vampire with a few decades under their belt, except for maybe the more unlucky Nosferatu or the super shy types like Tash, was basically a sex expert. If Sándor literally waited around for decades, guarding shit, and hunting things like a fucking hawk hunted and killed prey, dude probably wasn't the most sexually exposed.

"Nonsense," Jen said. "Sex may be a private matter to most, but to Kindred, it's as common and practiced as feeding itself. And only a fool thinks sex isn't an important aspect to understanding a person." Nodding, she pat the man on the shoulder. "If she liked to take charge, but then became submissive during, it sounds to me like she really enjoyed herself."

"Definitely," Triss said.

Sándor looked at each of them quizzically, before taking another drink. The dude could certainly hold his liquor. Begotten thing, or, gargoyle specific thing? He coughed on the drink, didn't spill any though, and looked to Jen.

"I've known plenty of vampires, and yes, they're usually quite sexually ... comfortable. But I admit, when you two helped show me to the rest of the Kindred at the ball, I was a little ... surprised, with how sexual everyone is." Ha, there it was. "You two were half naked, and I was sure you'd be the only ones. The night did not go as I imagined." Damn, a bottle of vodka really helped this guy loosen up.

"Did you like what you saw?" Jen asked, grinning at him. Of course the grin vanished when Triss reached across Sándor's lap and slapped her friend on the leg; easiest body part to hit from where she was.

"Jen, everyone liked what they saw. But you don't show up at the party with your tits hanging out. Everyone has to loosen up first, and then you let the tits come out." And people had definitely loosened up, at that party.

"After what Avery did," Sándor said, "I imagine there won't be anymore balls for some time."

Triss shrugged. "Eh, maybe. Antoinette or the suits might host one just for Invictus, the dragons, and maybe witches and Begotten can come to those. Course, the Carthians have parties all the time, shitty little things, twenty people in a room, jumping around to bad music."

Sándor shuddered. "Punk music."

Oh god. Triss snorted on a laugh and punched the man in the shoulder; softly, of course.

"More like EDM and stuff these days. But, ugh, fuck punk music. I'm a metal fan."

Apparently she'd said the magic word, cause the obviously half drunk, slowly-becoming-more-drunk man's eyes sparkled.

"What sort?"

“Oh, I like classics,” she said, “and some of the newer stuff. So I flop between shit like Iron Maiden, or sometimes I’ll listen to the bands that grew up listening to Iron Maiden, you know? I can get into power metal too, maybe progressive or symphonic stuff, or metalcore and shit if I’m in the mood for something heavy. Not too big a fan of the really heavy stuff, death metal or speed metal, but I can groove on it sometimes. And—” Jen slapped her in the leg. Revenge, for the earlier slap, the bitch. “Hey! I know a metal fan when I see one, Jen. We are all connected, by the great metal web consciousness.”

The gargoyle nodded. “She’s right. It’s a thread that binds us, and is stronger than steel.”

Jennifer sat back and rolled her eyes. “Oh no.”

~~Eric~~

Six weeks since the incident.

Eric sighed, and pat his ear. This music was going to kill him. Thudding bass, like a heartbeat, big and strong and loud as all fuck. Hard on his new ears, but at least it wouldn’t lead to any hearing loss, now that he could recover from damage like that. His knee was testament to the new regenerative powers he had. No, the music was going to kill him cause it barely qualified as music, and every moment he could hear it, all he could think about was how much it sounded like life, sex, and everything in between. Probably on purpose.

He sighed some more, and tapped a few fingers on his bicep, arms folded across his chest. On the dance floor, two vampires were the center of attention of fifty people, and everyone pressed their bodies in tight as they danced. Bodies grinding, sweating, everyone horny and looking to let off some of that energy.

The two vampires would be going home with at least half a dozen humans in tow, and he doubted they had to use any Discipline to do it. Dolareido was just that kinda place. Well, once they were off the property, they weren't his concern anymore. All he had to do, was make sure everyone in Bloodlust got along.

Several people, some at the bar, some in booths, some on the dance floor, turned to look behind them toward the door, to stare at the new girl walking in. They knew her; she was a regular. Most of them had probably seen her naked at some point, having sex in the club, or just dancing and not giving a shit if her clothes slid off. She was completely, utterly shameless. And he smiled as she noticed him, and walked his way.

Jessy wore a ridiculously short black skirt tonight, basically a tube top that'd fallen around her hips somehow. It was so damn small, it exposed the hips of her black thong, and a bit of its underside, too. She also wore a fishnet tank top, though the wiring was so thin and sparse, it was barely a top at all. And, so she remained 'decent', she had some black nipple pasties on, X shapes that just barely covered her nipples.

"I know that look!" she shouted over the music.

"Look?"

Laughing, she came over to him by the wall on the first floor, and she made sure to put a bounce in each step. Lean as she was, Jessy had fairly large breasts, a genetic gift she was super happy to have, and a huge ass she was super proud of earning. Jiggling them for admiring eyes was a regular part of her nightly routine. Utterly shameless.

He laughed, matching hers. He couldn't help it. Something about her brazen attitude and 'fuck the world I'm gonna be happy anyway' personality was so damn perfect. It was one of the things that made Fiona so appealing, too, but she didn't have the edge Jessy had. Eric couldn't joke about life shit with Fiona.

"Yeah, the look! You want to take me to church and make me ask for forgiveness, for my obvious sins." Nodding, she kissed him, and made sure to make a show of it. Full on body pressing, hands on his shoulders, the works. Either she was showing off, or she was staking her claim; probably both. "Garry been giving you any trouble?"

"Nah. Haven't seen any Carthians in here." And he was damn happy for that. Now that the two covenants were in some sort of unofficial turf war, the Invictus didn't want Carthians in their club. If he had to kick a vampire out, it could get nasty.

"Good." Nodding, she stood beside him, and leaned up to his ear. "We should talk."

He raised a brow as he looked at her. "When a woman says that to a man, she—"

"Not that kind of talk." With a wink, she kissed him again. "This is about ... other sorta real shit."

"Oh." The only other 'real' shit, if not about their relationship, would be about Dolareido and the insanity hitting it these days. "Now?"

"Nah. I got tonight off. I wanna dance. And then dance." The second dance might as well have been said by an evil snake. "Just figured I'd tell ya, in case something comes up."

"Sort of like, scheduling a meeting?"

"Exactly. I am Invictus, ya know."

He laughed. He thought of the Invictus more as the mafia, not business types scheduling meetings and sending e-mails. Guess he was wrong.

“Sure you want to dance? Couple of vamps already on the floor.”

She rolled her eyes. “Fucking Daeva sluts.”

He slipped an arm over her shoulders, and pulled her in. “You’re prettier than them.”

“Fuck yeah I am.” She nodded, as if it were the most obvious thing in the world.

“I saw Marge and Dennis out there.” He nodded toward the floor.

“The hunters?”

“Yeap.”

She rubbed her hands together. “I bet those two have been the focus of a lot of vamps, since Isabella stopped putting such a tight leash on them, the bitch.”

If only she knew. Jessy came to Bloodlust all the time, but Eric worked here, and vampires came through often. Uratha used to too, before the incident. Lately it’d only been vampires, but despite the obvious problems raining down on them from Garry, the Invictus continued to come for a good meal. And that meal occasionally included Dennis and Marge.

It was hard to wrap his mind around. Garry was literally fighting them for territory, but the vampires just kept on Kissing and fucking. And most of them weren’t old enough to be so jaded they’d consider a turf war to be something to scoff at. So, why were they all so relaxed, or at least, not marching like soldiers on the Carthian half of South Side?

Vampires. They were vampires. Each and every one of them had an instinct to guard what was theirs, but at the same time, to prioritize keeping themselves alive. They didn't have any natural urge to work with each other, and hell, they considered each other rivals for their food. Garry and Michael had their work cut out for them, getting over a hundred vamps, each, to actually fight together as a team.

So the fact Jessy had made it pretty damn clear she'd fight anyone who threatened Eric, was quite awesome. He pulled her tighter, and set a kiss on her temple.

"Marge is pretty hot," she said, "don't you think?"

Saw this coming.

"Yeah, she is."

"Tiny, for a hunter."

"Yeap."

"And she's got that light dark skin, you know? So hot."

He raised a brow. "Am I in love with a racist?"

She elbowed him in the side. "Dude." But she laughed a moment later, took his hand, and guided him onto the dance floor. "I'm gonna see if I can get a bite."

"Need me for that?"

"Mhmm. We're gonna rescue Marge from those Daeva bitches, I'm gonna get a taste, and we're gonna get to know her a little better."

He rolled his eyes, but followed.

---

The mission to get a bite had been successful. But, to his surprise, it'd stopped there. Something else had crossed her mind, and the moment his shift was done, she took him out of the club.

She curled up against his arm, and rubbed her cheek into his shoulder. In her apartment on her couch, they put on a movie, and enjoyed watching some god awful sports flick. He suggested something a little ... less shit, but she demanded cheesy, happy ending sports movie. Honestly, after Jessy had ground her ass on Marge and Dennis enough, and then got a bite of Marge to boot, he'd figured she'd want sex the moment they got out of the club. Or, while still in the club. But, nope, shitty movie.

He smiled down at her as she watched the credits. "I love you."

Still holding his arm, she grinned up at him. "Figured it out?"

"Bad movie? Curling up on couch? You were definitely fishing for something. Couldn't be sex. So I put my man brain to work. Must have wanted an 'I love you'."

"Bad movie? The fuck?" She sat upright, and glared at him like she was ready for war. "Field of Dreams is a fucking classic."

"Ghosts? Playing baseball? I mean, maybe if it was basketball."

"Ok, now who's racist?" she said, grinning. Before he could retort, she snuggled into his arm again. "Love you, too."

"Kinda surprised you didn't jump me when we got here. Figured a Kiss with a hunter would have really got you going."

"Yeah, it did. But I talked to the two vamps there too, and they mentioned some shit that went down with Garry a couple nights ago. Before I knew it, I was in work mode, and ... ugh, fuck that. Killed my mood. But I'll be damned if I let Garry ruin my night off."

He laughed, earning a quizzical look from her.

“You’re still wearing the, uh, stripper outfit.”

“Dude, when you’ve been wearing crazy, uncomfortable shit like this for as many years as I have, you barely notice.” Shrugging, she climbed onto his lap facing him, and hid her face in his neck. “Plus I was kinda hoping the mood would come back.”

“Field of Dreams is not the sort of movie to watch if you’re trying to get in the mood.”

“Ha, it wasn’t about that. It was about ... I dunno, reminding myself I got something here, something I won’t let Garry fuck up, you know.” She slid her arms under his and hugged him tight. “Hanging out with my boyfriend, my ‘I love you’ boyfriend, and watching some cheesy old movie together? Dude, I’ve never done that.”

“Never?”

“Never ever.”

He slipped his arms up her back and teased his fingertips up and down her naked spine. “Guess there’s a lot of firsts for you, in this whole relationship department, isn’t there?”

“Yeap. I want to do all the cheesy romantic shit, you know? Like ... I’m sitting at the table, drinking coffee, and giving you a handjob. Except, you know, cup of blood instead of a cup of joe.”

He chuckled, and slipped a hand up to trace her shoulder blades through the fishnet. No point in telling her her idea was very much outside the ‘vanilla cheesy romance’ field for most people.

“Sounds lovely.”

“Or, I’m on my bed, lying on my stomach, working away on my laptop, while you’re fucking me from behind.”

“Didn’t we already do that?”

She laughed into his neck and kissed his jaw. “It was awesome. Tash loved it.” After another kiss, she grabbed his shoulders and leaned back. “Or I’m trying to take a shower, and you’re just relentlessly eating my ass while I’m trying to wash my hair. That one sounds fun.”

“I’m noticing a pattern here.”

She shook her head. “No pattern.”

“Sounded like you were trying to do something very non-sexual in those three examples, while your horny boyfriend pestered you for sex.” Which hadn’t happened a single time, in their relationship. Not cause he wasn’t ready and willing, but the girl’s sex drive was absurd, and by the time he was ready for sex, she was already asking for it.

She tapped a chin thoughtfully. “That’s how relationships work, right? We get comfy with each other, so then naturally I stop wanting to fuck you, and you pester me for sex constantly. Which leads to me being all ‘bleh whatever loser, cum faster’ and I sorta halfheartedly satisfy you while I go about my day.”

“Um ... that’s a pretty dysfunctional, toxic relationship.”

“Ha! I know! No idea how anyone could, like, not want to fuck their SO, you know? Put a dick in my hand and I’m fucking boiling.” Nodding, she slipped off the couch, reached down, and yanked on his pants. “Damn, all those sexy fantasies got me back in the mood. Get nekkid.” With a big happy grin, she Blushed Life, bringing color and thickness to her skin, and she tugged on his pants some more.

He chuckled, rolled his eyes, and undid the fly of his pants. She yanked them off, and did the same for his boxers as he undid the buttons of his shirt. Ten seconds later, he was naked, sitting back on her couch.

“Keeping the stripper outfit on?” he said, gesturing to the hilariously tiny skirt, and the fishnet top.

She grinned down at him as she kicked off her skirt, and slipped a hand under her thong down to her slit. She didn’t take it off though, content to gently masturbate underneath the fabric as she stared at him. So naturally, he slid his hand around his shaft, and did the same, watching her as he worked the bottom of his length in his grip.

“I do look fucking hot in this, don’t I?” She snapped the hip of her black thong, and jiggled her tits around in the fishnet top with a few bounces. “It’s the nipple pasties. They really complete the ensemble.”

“Undoubtedly.” Nodding, he stroked a little faster, and melted into the couch a little more. Him being watched by her and vice versa sparked a memory. “Still sad about not getting what you wanted?”

“Eh?”

“In Jack’s sex tape.”

“Oh, dude!” Laughing, she grabbed her phone out of her purse, and got on her knees between his legs. The phone he expected, but not the position. She slid in close, squashed her breasts against his thighs and testicles, and set her elbows on the couch around him as she put the phone over his stomach. With the screen facing her, she slid her fingers around and around, looking for something, eyes fixated and lips stuck in an evil grin.

“He ... sent you another tape, didn't he?”

“Yeah! I haven't given it a proper watch, but look at this part!” She started the video and turned the phone to face him, holding it up on his stomach for him. The steady camera meant tripod, and it was aimed at Jack's waist from a front angle. He was sitting on Antoinette's stomach, getting treated like a king on some sort of giant bed. The kid eased his hips and forth, cock disappearing into the Prince's utterly massive tits, and Julee and Ashley were snuggled into her sides, keeping her breast together on her chest, and sucking on her nipples. And from the expression on the white-haired woman's face, and the subtle noises she made, she really, really liked having her nipples suckled.

The Prince's breasts were already coated in cum.

“Damn.”

“I know, right! Must be like, fucking a cloud.” With a manic grin, she flipped the phone back, jumped to another scene, and pointed it back at him.

Now Jack lay back, lying on Antoinette's body, head between her — now clean — tits, Ashley and Julee cuddling into her sides still, while Elaine and Veronica both lay on the bed around him. The two women, one very, very much taller than the other, had their huge breasts squashed together on the boy's pelvis, fighting for space around his dick.

“Damn damn.”

“Yeah, such a lucky fucker. And...” She flipped the phone back, and jumped around a few times. “Yeap, this whole video is, from beginning to end, an hour of tit fucking. Jesus, they got like, five positions they try. Oh! Oh shit, got one here where Jack's sitting on Elaine's stomach, fucking her tits, but Antoinette's between her legs, eating her out. Fucking hell, imagine, Prince of the whole damn city, your girl, eating out this other chick you're in the middle of tit fucking."

"Definitely lucky." There wasn't any point in trying to make Jessy jealous. She was so confident in her sex appeal, him even trying to suggest he might be more attracted to someone else was always met with laughter. If he suggested he was attracted to another woman in general, it was met with Jessy's attempt to convince him to invite said girl into their bed.

It was a wonderful problem to have.

Jessy grinned at him, put the phone down beside them on the couch, leaned down, and set a warm kiss on the base of his shaft's swollen head.

"I got big tits too, ya know."

He smirked. "Not that big."

"Oh you fucking asshole." Frowning, she knelt higher, batted his hands away, grabbed his dick, pointed it up, and slid it up between her breasts against her sternum. She still had the fishnet top on, keeping her breasts snug together, and trapping his cock between them. But, large as her breasts were, they weren't 'bury the dick in softness' large, and a lot of his length stuck up from between them through a hole in the fishnet.

He stared, and gulped. "Ok, yeah, that's pretty hot. No wonder the kid's got a thing for it."

"Yeah. And—oh, Eric. Transform!"

"What, now?"

“Yeah now! I wanna try something. You always go full primal on me when you transform, and I want to see if you can relax instead and let me lead.”

“You sure? I don’t know if—”

“It’ll be fine.”

He rolled his eyes, but couldn’t help but smile and shrug. “Alright. Don’t blame me if it doesn’t go your way.”

“Awesome.” Nodding, she grabbed her phone and texted something. “Inviting Tash.”

“Be ... cause you want her to see what it’s like when a werewolf has sex. Um, isn’t she in a rough spot with her boyfriends right now?”

“Yeap, but this ain’t about that ... exactly. Now come on, transform, and fuck my tits.”

He rolled his eyes, again. If Jessy had her way, there’d be a giant orgy every night, with werewolves and vampires and kine and everything. Healing the world and uniting everyone through sex, including Tash and her damaged relationship. Well, she and the Prince did connect on that, in a strange way.

He took a deep breath, and let out the wolf spirit inside. Luna told him to breathe, and he did, slow and steady, pulling in each wave of oxygen and focusing his mind on the pull of his diaphragm. The beat of it, the relaxing pulse of air, he held onto it as the hungry, aggressive animal inside came to the surface.

“Oh fuck ... oh fuck...” The small woman between his legs gulped as she watched his girth grow, and grow, the dark skin turning into flesh red from top to bottom. “Gonna need to, um ... yeah.” She scooped up the sides of the net fabric on her body, pulled it off and tossed it, before she pushed her body in closer to his thighs and pelvis as more of the wolf in him emerged. His thighs grew as thick as her whole body. His cock jutted up from between her breasts, spreading them, length reaching past her collar, and eventually her chin before stopping at her lips.

“Fuck yes,” she said, eyes wide and looking him up and down as the transformation finished. Her breath was a mess, panting, tiny gasps of arousal coursing through her. He was tempted to do the same, but no. If he wanted to remain in control, he had to breathe deep, with each wave of life from the air a cooling breeze on the boiling hunger of the wolf inside.

He rumbled under his breath, a deep purr, and his mate shivered between his legs. In his human body, his shaft was plenty large, and she liked to use both hands and her mouth on him at the same time. Now, she gulped as she looked down at the huge, red shaft between her breasts. Her two hands left most of his cock uncovered, and her grip was not wide enough to circle it.

“Right. Ok. You just stay there mister big bad wolf. I’m in charge.” Nodding, she tightened her grip around the top half of his shaft, and leaned in with enough weight to surround the knot of his cock with her breasts. The softness of her breasts around the sensitive skin stirred growls from him, the milking grip of her fingers stirred more, and when she opened her mouth wide to try and fit the glans of his length, he outright growled with desire.

Breathe. The voice in his dreams told him to breathe. He wasn’t like those other Uratha. He was in control. He was something different, a new breed, a werewolf of the city. He could control himself. Breathe.

Jessy stared at the sight of his abs and chest rising and falling with each, deep breath, and she quivered as she slowly eased her lips along the tip of his length. She couldn’t open her mouth wide enough to fit much, managing only a couple inches before he grew too thick, and she groaned onto his cock as she suckled on what she could. More saliva dripped down over his length onto her hands, and she worked her fingers in a massaging grip over where his cock filled the valley between her breasts.

“God damn, you smell like ... a fucking beast,” she said.

He rumbled his reply, another purr full of bass he knew his mate enjoyed. She said she could feel them ‘right down to her cunt’, and the look of joy on her face confirmed. He rumbled again, as the first sparks of pleasure flowed down his sensitive skin, reaching between his legs as flexing muscles leaked precum into his lover’s mouth. It came back down over his length, spread around and around by Jessy’s roaming tongue and massaging lips.

“I never really get to fuck around with this cock like this, you know? You always kinda just ram it into me when you’re transformed. Not that I don’t fucking love that, but this is...” She shivered again as she hugged her breasts together, squashing them around the thick base of his length, while her two hands continued to squeeze and work up and down.

Again, he took a deep breath as he felt the first dancing tingles of pleasure. His mate wanted to take control tonight, but she was so small compared to him. He wanted to grab her, ram his length into her, and make her squeal as he claimed her.

No. Respect your mate’s wishes.

He slowly reached out, and set one hand around her left shoulder, his other around the back of her head, until he covered the whole of her upper body in his palms and claws. But he didn’t push her toward him, or thrust his hips into her. He held her, and rumbled his pleasure as his mate quivered.

She opened her mouth as wide as she could, and buried the first couple inches of his length in tighter kisses, as her hands tightened as well once they were wet with saliva and precum. With the knot of his length snug between her breasts, spreading them with its girth, most of his shaft stuck up from between them, giving her plenty of room to slide her hands up and down his length as she suckled.

He rumbled harder, harsher, almost a growl, and his cock flexed in her grip as he felt the heat build. Soon, each stroke of her hands earned a jolt of pleasure down his length until it reached between his legs, and his inner muscles squeezed, building more liquid heat. She moaned around his cock, and stroked him faster.

The first wave of cum poured through his length, sending pleasure sparks down through his swollen cock and out through his core. It was enough to overflow his mate's mouth instantly, and she blinked at him, eyes wide, as her cheeks puffed, and a flood of thick, white fluid flowed out from between her lips.

She pulled her head back and let his cum fall out of her mouth, onto his length, and her hands. "Holy fuck." Trembling now, panting faster, she stroked him slower, drenched grip tight and massaging, and milking, earning another gush of cum. Without her mouth to block it, it shot six inches into the air, splashing over her forehead, nose, and cheeks. She aimed his girth toward her with her hands, and the next gush splashed over her neck and shoulder, and then the next shoulder as she stroked him.

The last few waves came out slowly, heavy waves that flowed down his length on their own, and joined the rivers of white that coated her breasts. The X black covers she'd put on her nipples were lost underneath them.

"God damn. Never been covered in so much cum. And I had four ghouls, ya know." Laughing again, she stood up, slipped free of his hands, ran a finger through the white that coated her chest, and smiled down at him. “Think you can hold still a little longer?”

He slowly nodded. Even with him sitting on the weak fabric thing of her den, its softness bending under his weight, she was only tall enough to be eye level with him when she stood. And the sight of his cum trickling down her body sent a surge through him that demanded he grab her, and slam her down on his cock. But he didn't. Control. Breathe. His mate wanted to try something because she trusted him, and he loved his mate.

She climbed onto his lap, such a little thing compared to him, and set her left hand against his chest. Her right hand reached down, grabbed his soaked length, and aimed it up toward her slit. But the tiny black thing there blocked it, and she laughed as she set her feet on the seat around them, squatting, so she could use both hands, one to guide his length up to her soaked hole, the other to pull the fabric aside.

Word. What was the word. Remember, words. Thong.

Once she'd managed to take the tip of his cock, already enough to spread her wide, she let go of the thong, hooking it around her swollen pussy, and took his shoulder again. Groaning, the vampire forced herself down lower, and her mouth dropped open as she looked down and stared at the growing bulge along her abs reaching higher.

“Fucking christ, every time. I've taken fat dragon dildos smaller than you, you know?” She shivered as she lowered herself down again, taking another inch, and her clenching, drenched insides squeezed on his cock enough to compress it, just slightly, just enough for flesh to slide along dripping flesh. “I mean, look at this.” As she finally took the last of his length above the knot of his cock, her knees found the seat outside his hips, and she whimpered as she leaned back. Her left hand pressed on his knee for balance, and her right hand reached down, and pressed on the bulge pushing out against her stomach. It reached a little past her navel, and she still had a few inches if she wanted to take all of him.

That would come later.

“Bet you can feel this,” she said, and she pressed her hand against her lower abs and mons. Eric often did that, because he knew it pushed her sensitive insides down against whatever was penetrating her. And she obviously enjoyed it now. But he could also feel it, with how his red, engorged flesh filled her, stretching her wide and deep, so every trembling motion she made was delicious friction on his sensitive skin. And feeling her hand press her flesh against his cock felt amazing.

He set his enormous hands on her legs, and watched as his mate set both her hands on his shoulders, and ground herself around and around. Her slit’s lips rubbed against his knot repeatedly, drenching him, and her breath broke into heavy groans as she increased her rhythm. Watching her dance on his cock earned a deep, hungry rumble from him, and his cum-drenched mate quaked as she stared up at him.

She looked down again, and stared at herself as she came. Clenching muscles leaked more juices, demanding he grab her and fuck her, but he didn’t. Not yet. He rumbled again, and watched as his mate squeezed on his cock as she forced herself to push her hips back and forth, despite her climax. Muscle spasms inside her milked on his cock, sending jolts down through his length.

“Big bad wolf, being all noble and gentle with me.” She shivered as she lifted her ass, and bounced on him, taking him deep enough to stretch her cunt deep, but only ever rubbing her swollen lips against the top of his knot, soaking it. “Knowing you could ... snap ... anytime, and go ballistic on me? Fuuuuck, gets me so damn ... wet...” She bounced faster, cum-soaked breasts jiggling against her chest, and insides clamping down as more spasms worked through her. Soon, her juices trickled down his testicles.

The feel of her heat, sizzling on his skin, drenching the last few inches of his cock in her cum, was too much. He growled at her, earning wide eyes of mild panic from his mate, and he tightened his grip on her hips.

He stood up.

“Eric! Holy shit, w-wait a second, Tash is—” She tried to grab his shoulders, but the moment he had his weight on the balls of his talons, he tightened his grip on her hips and waist, and worked her back and forth. His mate erupted into moans, and grabbed his wrists instead, small hands not able to circle half their girth. Soon she was horizontal, upper half leaning back and rocking back and and forth as he worked her on his length.

The door opened.

Eric snapped his gaze to the door. He’d been so preoccupied, so focused on his mate, he’d forgotten where they were, and—oh, it was Natasha, the small vampire. Right, his mate had asked her to come. Why? Because his mate liked it when others saw, especially this little one.

That was fine. He didn’t mind.

“J-J-Jessy,” she said, whole body trembling, eyes wide.

Eric bounced his mate on his cock once more, a gentle thrust of his hips and pull of his hands enough to have her body trembling. Each thrust sank her on his length until her taut slit rubbed against the top of his knot, and he pulled back, only to thrust into her again, each time drenching more of his length in her juices.

Natasha stared, frozen, eyes wide and hands shaking. Eric rumbled, a heavy rolling purr, and he looked at his mate's friend as he continued to thrust into Jessy's body. Mating left anyone vulnerable, but she was a friend of his mate's. Her presence meant they were safer to continue, not that they should stop.

He looked down at his mate, and rumbled louder as the first tingling sparks of impending climax hit him. The pleasure tremors buried him in desire, and he pulled his mate down onto his cock harder as his body demanded he satisfy it. Jessy squeaked, and trembled as her insides clenched harder on him, as if trying to stop him from fully burying himself inside. His mate was cute, and helpless.

He pulled her toward him, hard, and growled as he forced the knot of his cock against her squeezing muscles. His mate groaned, but continued to clench as hard as she could. Either she couldn't stop herself, or she wanted to fight him and make it difficult for him. He did love wrestling with his mate. He growled playfully, and pulled on her hips harder while forcing his own hips toward her in a slow, relentless push, until her trembling pussy spread more and more. With a wet slap, three more inches of his girth sank into her already stretched insides, earning a much higher pitched squeak from her as the knot of his cock forced its way into her slit.

Natasha let out a similar squeak, and stared at Jessy's dangling body. The Gangrel tried to hold onto his wrists, but soon her arms went limp and hung down underneath her like her legs, still spread wide by his own. That was fine. His mate was light, and he loved the way she fit in his palms. Like this, he could bounce her on his length, keep most of his cock inside her, and admire how his girth made her abs bulge well past her navel.

He stayed inside her, balls deep, bouncing her a couple inches fast enough to have her limbs swinging underneath her, and her cum-soaked breasts sliding back and forth over her chest. With each bounce, the thickest part of his cock pulled out a little of her pink insides for him to see, before he slammed her back against him. Every stroke stretched her deep, forcing groans out of her, and she clenched on him as she came again. In the past, she'd told him she loved how much pressure the fatter part of his cock put on her g-spot. And he couldn't stop himself regardless. He had to get inside her, every inch, until his mate's insides were taut, and squeezing him so hard every bounce sent overpowering waves of pleasure into his body.

The first gush of cum filled her immediately, overflowing and oozing out of her, down her thighs and ass, and down his testicles. The second squirted out of her, splashing against his abs and pelvis as he bounced her again, and again. By the third, his cum flowed down his mate's thighs, and dripped from her toes. His mate trembled with each bounce, legs and arms swaying underneath her, and she managed to turn her head toward her friend.

“Sorry, Tash. I ... I tried to stay in control, you know? Figured it might be easier for ... for you, if you wanted a peek. Kinda ... kinda backfired.”

Natasha gulped, stared, and said nothing. Eric looked at her, earning a squeak of surprise, but he rumbled his contentment, and looked back to his mate, still bent backward with hips and lower back in his hands. His orgasm faded, flexing muscles no longer forced cum into her, and the pleasure waves died away.

But he wanted more.

With another blissful rumble, he turned his mate over, keeping her pinned on his length. She mewled openly, enough energy coming back to her to squeeze on his fingers at her sides.

“Eric? Slow ... slow down.”

“Jess! Is he—”

“I’m fine,” she said between groans, “just ... want him to slow down a bit, so you can get a better look.”

Eric chuckled, a deep, heavy sound, and Natasha stared at him all the harder. He didn’t understand his mate sometimes. But, if she wanted her friend to watch, it didn’t bother him. It was his mate he wanted, her, only her, all of her.

He set a leg down on the soft sitting spot beside him. The ... couch. He made sure to keep his claws off it, his shin and the back of his foot on the ... cushions. The words, the right words, crept in through the cracks of his mind, through the forests and shadows. And after another deep breath, they solidified. Couch. Cushions. Apartment. Living room. He nodded to himself, and lowered until Jessy’s own knees managed to find the cushions, and her hands found the arm of the couch.

With one hand wrapped around her waist, his other reached out, and held the arm of the couch as well, letting him lean forward so he could dwarf his mate underneath him. Content, he rumbled again, earning a mewl from his mate, as he worked her back and forth. Now that he was fully inside her, he had no intention of leaving, and he kept the whole of his length in her as he fucked her from behind. Each pull toward him, met with a small thrust of his own, bounced her large, firm ass against the solid wall of his pelvis, before he pulled back enough so her trembling slit started to spread as his knot fought to escape her vise grip. But before it did, he thrust into her again.

The smaller vampire came closer. Only one of his arm’s length away, she stood beside him and her friend, eyes wide and looking his mate from head to ass.

“He’s ... all inside you.”

“Fucking yes he is!” Jessy squeezed on the arm of the couch, and grunted between his thrusts.

“I c-can ... see how deep he’s pushing.”

“Fuuuuuuuuck.”

“I can ... see b-bits of your ... insides ... when he pulls back.”

“God damn it, Tash, you’re turning me—” His mate melted in his grip, body threatening to collapse as it quivered uncontrollably. His grip on her waist kept her where she was, ass up, snug to his body. Even as she squirmed, trying to slow him down, he didn’t. He was too close, and the heat of her juices soaking his cock was too much to ignore.

But then he looked down at the little vampire beside them. She’d come closer, eyes locked onto Jessy at first, but now, on him. Slowly, her gaze reached up to his face, and she meeped as he looked at her with one eye, his snout still pointed down at his mate. But she didn’t back away. Instead, she came a little closer, until she was only a few feet from Jessy’s side, and her eyes slid up and down Eric’s body.

She liked the way he looked, but, she was shaken, startled, and scared.

Eric rumbled, and slowed down, letting the building heat underneath his cock settle. And with a slow movement, so his mate’s little friend didn’t get spooked, he turned, and sat on the couch, careful of his tail. The big seat, barely able to manage his weight, creaked as he rested back against it, and hooked his hands underneath his mate’s thighs and ass, grip large enough to encompass them and her lower back.

With her thighs up, legs spread in his grip, and back resting against his stomach, he worked his mate up and down on his length slowly, and her little friend stared at them. She was mesmerized.

“You’re covered in cum,” the little one whispered.

Jessy chuckled between her groans. “I gave him a tit job before you got here.”

“Tr-Transformed?”

“Yeap. Totally hot. Got in the mood cause I saw Jack’s latest tape. Seen it?”

“No. B-But, I mean ... I’ve seen that kinda stuff, in person.” The little vampire’s eyes drifted up and down Jessy’s body, and then up to Eric’s head, where it naturally came forward from his shoulders, and hovered over his mate. “He’s really in control, isn’t he?”

“He is. He—” Jessy squealed openly as Eric lifted her up off the knot of his cock, and she pressed her arms down against her raised knees, forcing her back into his sternum as she quivered. “Fuck! Oh god, fuck that’s—nng!” She let out a heavy, deep groan, when he forced it back into her, and her body quaked again.

This time, he stayed inside her, every inch, and bounced her fast, making her moan between pants as he worked himself up to another orgasm.

When it came, he spread her legs more, making sure the little one could see everything, as he slowly worked his mate up and down a single inch. He normally thrust and thrust hard when cumming, but after the treat his mate had given him at the start of tonight, a part of him wanted to try that too. Slowly working her, milking his length, it was easier to focus on the pleasure as her trembling, soaked insides squeezed cum out of him.

It gushed out of his mate almost instantly, and the little vampire squeaked as she watched it pour down over his testicles. Heavy, thick seed that sent waves of bliss through him, demanding he fuck his mate until she squealed. But he didn’t. No, control, breathe. He went slow, using her body to milk his pleasure, and let her settle from her own. And, let her friend watch, unafraid, or at least less afraid.

“Oh my god. You’re g ... g-gonna have a lot to clean up.” The little vampire hugged herself as she looked down at the mess on the floor, and then up to Jessy’s body. “He looks like he m-might ... puncture your diaphragm.”

“Ha! I’m fine. Fine...” His mate ran her hands up and down her body, caressing her skin and massaging his cum into it, before she reached down, and cupped his testicles. As his cum flowed out of her, it splashed over her wrists and palms, and she groaned as she lifted her hands again to rub her newly soaked fingers against her distended abs.

The little vampire looked up at him. “Eric, you um ... you’re ... wow.”

“Natasha,” he said, voice that choppy bark sound. “Mate likes ... when you watch.”

His mate’s friend smiled. “I’m j-just ... wow, you’re really in control. And, um...” She looked Jessy up and down a few times, but it was him her eyes lingered on. “You’re ... really hot.”

He rumbled a purr, earning a tiny squeak from the tiny vampire, and a deep groan from his mate. He let go of her legs, allowing them to settle down between his own, and grabbed his lover’s hips and waist. And slowly, he started to bounce her on his cock again.

“Again? Fuuuuu ... uuu ... uuuuck.” Jessy collapsed back against him, spread her legs, let her arms go limp, and lay against his chest as he masturbated with her body. And her little vampire friend watched.

Chapter 138

~~Natasha~~

Finally, they were done. Took them forever, and the worst part about it, was Tash couldn't stop watching! She watched, and watched, and by the time Eric was done with Jessy, she was an utter wreck, a trembling, mewling, worn out mess of limbs. Tash thought her sessions with the boys could get silly long and messy, but this was a whole new level of fantasy.

Eric looked down at the — mostly — naked woman on his lap, before looking at Tash again. So scary, with the huge teeth, the predator eyes, and the utterly massive muscles that his short fur did nothing to hide. He had abs. Abs! Why would a furry creature have abs? Tash stared at them, and him, and then his stomach some more, as the enormous beast lifted the exhausted girl off his length, and set her on the couch beside him.

Werewolf penis. Huge, werewolf penis, covered in—

She shook her head, hard enough to bounce her brain around in her skull, and turned her backs to them.

“Eric! You should ch-change back! And Jessy, g-g-get cleaned up! And dressed.”

Jessy laughed, voice wavering. “He's just a big, sexy puppy, isn't he?”

Tash rolled her eyes, but looked back over her shoulder. He was so huge, and his shaft was absolutely massive, and ... werewolfy. She shook her head again and looked away.

“Sorry,” Eric said, voice changing mid word. The couch creaked and squeaked, announcing the man’s change back into human form. Once the squeaking stopped, Tash heard some shuffling. “I’ll just throw us in the shower real quick.”

Tash nodded, and moved into the kitchen. Jessy’s apartment wasn’t too dissimilar to Tash’s, just a little dirtier, but still had the usual Dolareido feel. Streamlined, blacks and silvers, everything sleek and expensive. The stools weren’t comfortable, but they were pretty; Dolareido’s motto for pretty much everything. It was better than being in the living room, where those two had made such a mess, Jessy would have to hire an Invictus cleaning crew to deal with it. They cleaned up blood, they could clean up werewolf semen. Or maybe it changed back into more reasonable amounts, when Eric changed back? Her dragon curiosity demanded she ask, and she promptly shut it up.

She glanced over her shoulder, and smiled as she got a peek of Eric’s naked body from behind, as he carried Jessy in his arms. The Gangrel was still shaking all over, but smiling like a giddy school child, and she grinned at Natasha passed Eric’s arm as the man took her into the bathroom.

They didn’t keep her waiting long. Five minutes, enough to get all the white stuff off them, and get Jessy into something a little more comfortable and decent than a thong and nipple pasties. Jessy came back in baggy, pink pajamas, because yes, she had big pink pajamas, as if it was her personal goal to not be stereotyped. Eric came back wearing some jeans, and nothing but jeans, and Natasha peeked at his body more than a few times as they came into the large kitchen with her. He wasn’t as big as Matt or Art, but that didn’t mean he wasn’t utterly gorgeous.

And, she couldn’t help but picture the werewolf now, the huge beast, with huge ... everything.

“So, Tash,” Jessy said, “apparently you’ve been keeping secrets from me?”

Uh oh.

“Um, I—”

“Jack brought me to see Azamel a month ago. He spilled the beans there, about this whole ‘dark presence’ or whatever.” She finger quoted dark presence, too. “Apparently, a bunch of you guys knew about this thing, and what it may or may not be doing, and have been investigating it without me. Like, Jack thinks that tear Eric and me went through to save him from that scary ghost place was this thing’s doing? Etcetera, etcetera.”

“Oh ... Oh.” She squirmed as she looked down at the countertop. “I—”

“Don’t worry about it.” Jessy hopped onto the stool beside her, and in typical Jessy fashion, rubbed Tash’s shoulders like nothing was wrong. “I mean yeah, I was angry at first. We’re best friends, and you didn’t tell me this big thing? Like, fucking hell, my feelings.” She touched her chest with her free hand, feigning deep offense.

Tash didn’t say anything. But she did sigh and lower her head, hiding her face behind waves of her black hair. Guilt was a shitty feeling.

“But Jack, the asshole, put it in perspective. Big nasty secret like this? Made sense to keep it secret, even from me. I can be a loud person, I know that. Must have been tough on ya.”

“So Jack—”

“Needed me to cover his six until Damien was healed up. And Eric”—she gestured to her boyfriend, who stood in the kitchen—“is slowly learning more about it, too. Cause, ya know, werewolf. Spirits and shit. There's a connection somewhere there, between Black Blood, who Jack is convinced isn't a normal spirit, and the Shadow Realm and all that stuff."

"Y-Yeah." Apparently, Jack had let Jessy in on everything. Everything everything, if he told her about his concern with Black Blood. That meant Jessy had to be careful around Jacob, and not let him know that they suspected him and his so-called spirit friend.

"This what we were gonna talk about tomorrow?" Eric asked.

Jessy laughed and shrugged. "Kinda, yeah, but with Tash here, figured we should probably talk about it now."

"I'm sorry I d-d-didn't tell you, I—"

"Tash. Seriously, come on." Jessy leaned over her and hugged her. "Important shit is important. You didn't tell me cause the less people that knew, the better. Much as our friendship is important, the city at large is a little more important, right? Not like I'd be happy if our friendship got everyone killed."

She groaned. Of course Jessy had to say that, cause now all she could think about was Matt and Art.

Jessy chuckled. "I know that groan."

"N-No you don't."

"Yes I do. Tash, come on, you gotta talk to them."

"I will! With Jack. Later. W-When things are better." When Avery and the pack calmed down, healed, and hopefully wouldn't be looking for any excuse for a fight. And when Tash didn't get furious just thinking about Art staking her through the heart.

“K, well, my two cents? Jack’s definitely put a more logical spin on this, and I gotta give the kid credit, he thinks with his head on straight. The boys did you wrong, but they had good reason. Give them a chance to make up for it.” Jessy had said those words before, just last week actually, but now that Tash knew she’d known about the secret, and had been keeping that a secret from Tash, the words meant more. Jessy had her own, personal context now. Tash keeping a secret from her wasn’t nearly as bad as what Art and Matt did to Tash, but it was still in the same ballpark.

“The P-Prince, she wants me to ... to um ... ask them to do something.” Something she knew Avery would say no to, but would ultimately be the boys’ choice, not Avery’s.

It hadn’t been Antoinette’s idea. It’d been Natasha’s. But she hadn’t been serious!

Sighing, she looked at Eric again, and the man raised a brow as Natasha managed to meet his gaze. His werewolf form, the big deadly Gauru form, had been terrifying. But he’d been in control, really good control, enough that he’d managed to calm down and do exactly what Jessy wanted: show off how good they looked having sex. He really wasn’t the same as the others.

“If the b-boys agree to the Prince’s demand, it’ll get ... dangerous, for me.”

Jessy hugged her again. “Then it’s a good thing you know a girl with a sexy city wolf to help you out.”

---

“B-Boys have too much influence on our second lives!” She thudded her fist against the table, squeaked, snapped a hand out, and steadied one of the stranger occult objects before it fell over.

The Prince and Elaine blinked at her, looked at each other, before Elaine shrugged and returned to her typing. Antoinette chuckled, and pulled some of hair over her shoulder to comb it with her fingers, while she continued typing on her laptop with her other hand. The four women sat in the Prince's primary experiments chamber, the one with the crazy chandelier, and they had a bunch of artifacts on the table in front of them, including Elen's, and the strange necklace Antoinette had received so long ago that'd summoned a spirit, who'd warned them about Maria.

Samantha was there too, and she laughed as she held one of the strange objects, a shrunken head, and took pictures of it at different angles. Not to squeamish anymore.

“They do?”

“Yes! W-We make too many decisions, based on what the men in our lives are d-doing.” She frowned down at her laptop, closed it, and folded her arms across her chest. “I don't like that. I'm sick of it.”

The two elders grinned, knowing grins, but Samantha laughed harder, a hearty, warm sound. Samantha was fun. She didn't have the experience or wisdom of the elders, and she was nice enough to roll with whatever someone said. Natasha could say stupid things, complain about stupid things, and while Antoinette or Elaine would listen, and then offer some very valuable advice, Samantha would just listen. That was preferable, sometimes.

“Guilty,” the young Daeva said, “I mean, about making decisions with men in mind. I dunno. I just ... can't help but think about romance, when I make life choices. Maybe it's cause I was still human, not long ago, but the idea of dying alone was pretty terrifying, you know?”

“But you are immortal now,” Antoinette said. “Age is of no concern.”

Samantha nodded. “I know. But the reflex is still there. I keep thinking: oh, what sort of apartment should I move into? Will it be big enough for a man to live there, too?”

The two elders and Tash laughed. Ok, Tash might not have been able to go a night without thinking about her boyfriends, it’d been weeks since she last spoke to them, but she didn’t frame things like that anymore. Where to live? Would she have enough money? Or the classic, what school would their kids go to? Those thoughts had long died.

“It is indeed, all relative,” Antoinette said. “We are Kindred now, and most of those instincts will slowly fade away. But the instincts were there for a reason. It is not the man who must carry a child for nine months, nor deal with nearly as much oxytocin for the child, post birth. The desire for a provider, in human women, is nothing to be ashamed of.”

Elaine nodded. “Evolution is a cruel bitch.”

The Prince grinned at her friend before looking back to Tash. “But, evolution arguments aside, do you not enjoy considering romance, in your life choices?”

Tash sighed and sat back in her seat. It was true. Much as she sometimes told herself otherwise, she liked thinking about romance, a lot. She was one of those girls who liked stupid stuff like romcoms. Watching them could be painful, cause the characters were always beyond idiotic, but still, she liked them.

“Natasha,” the Prince continued, eyeing her, “I can see where your mind wanders. Do not think less of yourself, for indulging your feminine side.”

“And consider,” Elaine said, “that masculine and feminine mentalities are not absolutes, limited to biological sex, or even opposites on a spectrum. There is overlap, and there is nuance.”

“Indeed. Both sexes are capable of both ways of thinking. Though gender proclivities do exist.” Antoinette tapped her chin, thinking. “I digress. My point is, you should feel no shame over thinking about romance more often than a man might, the same as a man should feel no shame over finding explosions so enthralling.”

Tash snorted on a giggling laugh. “I suppose.”

“When you get to our age,” Elaine said, “those old holdovers from your first life will fade into nothing. Mostly.” The two elders shared a grin. “But you will miss it. Sometimes I wonder what it would be like to make any choice in my second life based on a man — or woman — I might have feelings for. I have not made such a decision in centuries.”

Antoinette nodded. “And as much as I love your son, Samantha, my goal with Dolareido is not something I would alter, simply to placate him. The city is a labor of love, mine, and I would ask Jack to consider that, in decisions we might make.”

The young Daeva nodded. “Of course. He understands that. That’s my boy for you.”

They all nodded. That was Jack. As long as what you were doing made logical sense, he’d accept it. Weird as his relationship with the Prince was, the pair really did make a strange sort of sense.

“Quite right,” Antoinette said. “And, when you reach our age, you may very well wish a man was the reason you made certain decisions.”

“Or, you know, men,” Samantha said, gesturing to Tash with a warm smile.

Tash squirmed in her seat. “You’re the one d-dating a whole covenant!”

“What? I’m not...” Samantha buried her face in her hands. “Oh god, who told you?”

Natasha laughed, reached out, and touched the woman’s elbow. “S-Sorry. But, yeah, Kindred know. Antoinette didn’t tell me either. Someone p-probably said something pretty innocent, and then someone asked more, and ... yeah, information spreads.”

Samantha squirmed more, but managed to lower her hand and smile at Tash. “I’m being really dumb, aren’t I? Still being shy about stuff.”

Natasha shook her head. “It was a lot longer for me b-before I was able to, um, be a little more open about stuff. You’re ahead of me.” If it was really a race. Unlike the Prince, Natasha didn’t think sexual openness was necessarily a good thing. Not everyone had to embrace orgies.

Jessy seemed to actually be happier, now that she was having sex with one person, instead of four. Course, that one person could transform into a giant beast, and fill the girl up to the point Natasha had been thoroughly concerned something would rupture inside her. But the Gangrel liked it, and it was obvious she also really liked how blatantly dominant Eric was, when they fucked with him transformed. Girl probably liked switching it up, being in charge when Eric was in human form, and then giving in when he transformed and got those large ... large ... very large hands on her.

It reminded Tash of her boys. Her boys? She had no idea if they were still her boys. She hadn’t spoken to them in six weeks, and it was killing her.

“I should stop being ashamed,” Samantha said, smiling to herself as she took more pictures of her artifact. “It’s been ... a breath of fresh air. The freedom is exhilarating.” She fiddled with her necklace, and after a few seconds, clutched it tight. “Mary is happy for me. She’s, um, a little hard to talk to, being, you know, a ghost ...

And because it's so naughty! Hard to tell my daughter anything about it. But she's happy I'm enjoying myself, with Jacob and, uh, the witches." Before she could continue, she caught herself, shaking her head and frowning. "Sorry. I make it sound like the stuff I had to deal with before I was a vampire was hard. It's nothing compared to what you ladies deal with all the time."

Natasha was going to interject, and defend Samantha. She lost her daughter, of course she should have trouble with that. But Antoinette raised a hand, just slightly, enough to get everyone's attention.

"It is all relative, my childe. We adapt to our environments. The trials you faced, losing a husband, and raising two children? A massive hurdle, considering your world. Then to lose your son, and push on? Come now, Samantha. Impactful novels have been written about women who have struggled through such pain. And then, after what Angela did? You have more than earned the right to indulge yourself. Heal your soul."

"Heal the soul." Samantha smiled as she held her necklace. "Jacob and the witches are, uh, certainly helping me relax."

"How's Triss?" Tash asked. "I haven't t-talked to her in a while."

Samantha squirmed, and a hundred emotions ran across her face so fast, Tash couldn't identify them.

"She's good. She's a lot happier now, thanks to Jennifer. I, uh, didn't expect her to ... um..."

"Beatrice," Antoinette said, "was once a simple Carthian, a rebel with little in the way of a cause. Now, she is a witch, and every witch I have ever dealt with has had a certain confidence when it came to ... sexual exploration. Julias's death has scarred her, surely, but witches will embrace sexuality for reasons others would not consider. Healing the soul, as I said, or to make a fellow Kindred feel welcome. Like a hug.” The white-haired woman grinned at Samantha. “I suggest you do not mention Julias to her, if you should ever find yourself in a sexual situation with her. She is healing, in a way that witches heal. Do not feel guilty if you indulge of her as well.”

Tash raised a brow as she looked at her boss, but wiped her eye to hide it. Antoinette was being awfully forthcoming, with her childe and getting close to the witches. Really close.

Not that what she said didn’t make sense. Witches, and all Kindred really, didn’t treat sex like humans did, and it probably paid to remind her very, very young childe that. But Jacob was a scary man. Getting so involved with the witches, no matter the reason, even sexy reasons, was dangerous.

After a few minutes of thinking, Samantha spoke up.

“But you’re right,” she said, gesturing to Natasha. “We’re vampires, not human women anymore. Focusing on romance all the time is dumb.” She didn’t sound too convinced.

“Perhaps,” Elaine said. “But I have been single for a very, very long time. I would be remiss to suggest that romance is not worth the effort.” Nodding, the elder leaned forward over her laptop and looked at Natasha. “Have you thought of a punishment for your two delicious lovers, yet?”

Ugh, not that. She held Elaine’s eyes for a moment, before she outright whined, and let her head land hard on the table. “I ... d-did. I didn’t think it was a good idea, but the Prince says it is. I haven’t t-talked to them in six weeks, though. I d-don’t even know if—”

Elaine shook her head. “Nonsense. Those boys will jump through hoops to win your heart back.” The most evil smile Natasha had ever seen snuck onto the woman’s face. “You are a woman. Dare I say, it is in a woman's nature, to make men dance through hoops. And it is a woman's nature to, perhaps, enjoy it a little?"

Tash frowned at the ancient woman, but all that did was make Elaine chuckle, and return to her work. Yeah, a lot of women loved to make men do absurd stuff to win them over. Manipulation. A relationship built on manipulation was a horrible idea! And she wouldn't do it.

She could, she knew that. Some doe eyes, a trembling lip, and the boys would probably break and do whatever she wanted, assuming they were still interested in her. But the very idea of doing that made her want to puke, and then hurt any woman who did that to her man. Or men, in her case.

"Natasha's suggestion was a perfectly reasonable one," Antoinette said. "But she is hesitant."

"It could cause p ... p-problems, if they say no..."

"Problems have already been created. Avery knew she overstepped herself, attacking Maria, but in that circumstance, it is on the Second Estate to defend their position. The pressure I can put on the werewolf for that blunder is, ultimately, not as strong as what I can place on her for daring to attack one of the dragons of this city. For that, she must pay. And if you do not collect, Natasha, then I will collect myself, and Daniel and I will be considerably less delicate."

She gulped, and nodded. "Yes, Prince."

---

Elaine and Antoinette left. Business, according to them. What sort of business they were up to, Natasha had no idea, and she wasn't sure she wanted to know. She was still struggling with knowing that some sort of dark, mysterious force was working in Dolareido, and in all likelihood, up to no good. Jack had updated her and Damien about his suspicions it was Black Blood, and that made Jacob all the scarier.

“So,” Samantha said, stuttering and squirming a little. “Jessy. Um, she really ... has sex with Eric, when transformed?”

Oh god not another one.

“You c-could ask her yourself, any time. She’s completely, t-totally shameless.”

“I could, I could. But she’s, um, a little intimidating.”

Tash giggled. “Jessy’s just very upfront ab-bout what she likes.” Shrugging, Tash pushed Elen’s strange book aside. “Another one for storage.”

Samantha nodded, grabbed the book, and set it beside the pile of other weird artifacts. Her eyes lingered on the book for a second, before she fiddled with her necklace a couple times, and looked back to Tash.

“A lot of vampires seem to be very upfront about the things they like.”

Tash laughed and shook her head. “N-Not all of us.”

Samantha smiled at her. “True. You’re a lot more reserved. Every vampire I’ve seen half your age is, um, willing to do ... well, anything, anywhere.”

“Mekhet d-don’t like to get involved as quickly as other Kindred.” Much as she tried, she couldn’t help but grin a little at the new dragon. “Daeva ... are sort of the opposite.”

Samantha squirmed, but smiled too. “I thought maybe Antoinette, and Elaine, were maybe peer pressuring me a little. Not to sound mean! Just, they're both very ... sexually aggressive."

"They are, b-but it's not because they're asshole teenagers who want to make you conform. Antoinette in particular, she knows w-what she's doing. If she asks you t-to do something, there's a very good chance it'll be good for you. It might make you happy, or b-better yourself for the future." Antoinette played the long game better than any of them.

"That's true. They're so old, and wise. But sometimes I do think they're, um, a little disconnected, from the reality for a fledgling like me, you know? Every night, I feel like I'm a little girl, overwhelmed with every new experience."

"Is Jacob helping? Or ... t-taking advantage?" Gently now. If she made Jacob sound like the villain she was sure he was, Samantha might get defensive.

Samantha sat back and thought about it. She might have been only a fledgling, but she was still a full grown woman in nine years, with plenty of experience under her belt. If Jacob was taking advantage of her, she'd know. Or, maybe not. There were lots of stories of older women being taken advantage of by scheming men, and vice versa.

"He's helping. He had my permission, the first time things got sexual. And the ... following time. After that, he um, stopped asking, but not because he wanted to take advantage of me. He learned what I liked."

Natasha returned the woman's shy smile. It'd been like that with Art and Matt, too. The first few times, she had to give them permission to do things to her. After that, once they were doing sexual things, the boys felt comfortable enough to surprise her, sometimes with some very kinky or rough play. And—

And stop thinking about the boys. You're a vampire, newly in your ancilla years. You're powerful. You're ex-Right Hand, and now you're a dragon of the Ordo Dracul. Antoinette wants you to investigate extremely dangerous ... things, about the nightlife of Dolareido, because she trusts you. Stop acting like an idiot little girl.

"That's good," Tash said. "Jacob has been ... d-difficult to understand, since Minerva died."

"Ah, right, Minerva." The young Daeva frowned, and leaned forward toward Tash, elbows on the table. "Jacob talks about her, sometimes."

"He ... d-does?" Tash blinked at her, several times. "He doesn't talk about Minerva with ... anyone."

Samantha sighed, nodding. "I can see why. It hurts him, when he does. And he doesn't talk about her much."

"It's a little strange, f-for your boyfriend to talk about their ... dead girlfriend, isn't it?"

The Daeva shrugged. "A little. But it's obvious he hasn't talked about her with anyone. And, he's so old, so ancient, that talking with him isn't like talking with a normal man. I can tell him anything, and he understands. I don't need to navigate any male ego."

"That must be nice."

"Ha. Come on, Art and Matt didn't sound like they had any ego problems."

"They are nice ... boys. Dumb, s-stupid boys."

Samantha nodded apologetically. "With Jacob, there's none of that. And it's not like we talk about anything sexual, when we talk about our past. But, I tell him about James sometimes, about how we met, and how we fell in love. He talks about Minerva, and I can tell he's moved on, same as me. But, there is something there, something lingering around, and ... I don't know. James dying was horrible, and it scarred me, badly. Then what happened with Jack, and then Mary, so much worse. But he knows exactly what to say to me about it. But with Minerva, it's like, her death left ... something else, something more than just grief." She shrugged and sat back. "I don't know. It's a very weird relationship. I'm happy to be in it, but yeah, very weird."

Natasha absorbed, and did her best to not let Samantha realize she was saying very important information. No one knew much about Jacob. Even Antoinette said the man was a mystery, and she knew him better than anyone. Which might have meant that Antoinette let the man date her child, because she saw it as a way to learn more about the mystery man. Was that the main reason she let the relationship happen, or maybe even nudged Samantha toward Jacob? To learn more about him? Or was it all just a happy accident?

"I d-don't envy you. I mean, it must be amazing, dating such a wise man, and, um, being so close with his circle, and—"

Samantha giggled, reached out, and pat Natasha's hand. "You may think it's dumb to talk about boys, but I haven't been able to talk about boys in years!"

"Years?"

"After James died, I didn't date again. That was over ten years ago."

"That's ... a long time."

Samantha smiled, pat Tash's hand again, and sat back. A sensitive topic, surely, but the look on her face said she'd been through this conversation before.

“I’d been with him for a long time, when he died. We married young, and had Mary young.”

Right, Samantha was in her forties when she was embraced. Late forties, even. She looked beautiful.

“You d-don’t look like you’re in your forties, you know.”

The Daeva beamed. “Well, Mary really helped me get my life together. A couple years of taking care of myself did a lot to turn me around. But, as much as Mary was insistent, I ... never really talked to her about, you know, guy stuff.”

“She—”

“Oh, she told me about her boyfriends, but she was only in a couple relationships. And she didn’t talk to me about sexual stuff. I’m her mother. And, I didn’t talk to her about sexual stuff, cause I’d pretty much just be talking about James, her father, and...”

“Those would be some ... awkward c-conversations.”

“Exactly. And sure, I tell Mary about stuff sometimes now, but ... but talking to her now is hard. And sometimes I tell Antoinette about stuff, but she always has that, um, teacher aura, right? It can be annoying sometimes, talking to someone who knows everything, and has done everything.”

Natasha smiled. “Are you saying I d-don’t know anything?”

“What? No! No, that’s not—”

Tash laughed. “No no, I get it. I ... d-definitely didn’t do much socializing, for a long time. After Daniel sired me, everything was so ... scary. I didn’t handle it well. I ran, and the closest thing I could understand was the Invictus. I met Jessy, and ... Julias.” Natasha couldn’t help but laugh some more, silly memories dancing through her head. “Jessy, she ... has d-definitely been an aggressive person, for a long time.”

“Maybe I’ll talk to her more, in the future. She’s intimating, but nice. She did lend me her ghouls.” Samantha grinned and drew a few lines in the table with her fingers. “Jacob says I should have slept with them when I had the chance.”

“They’re ... they’re very talented.”

Samantha blinked at her, before erupting into giggles. “Jessy?”

“Jessy. She ... she was there, and she s-sorta ... convinced me ... to join her.”

A perfect opportunity for Samantha to start teasing her. But, she didn’t. She smiled like a shy, guilty little girl, and nodded.

“I’ll tell you a little, if you tell me a little?”

Tash laughed. “D-Deal.”

~~Damien~~

Damien smiled at the little redhead beside him. She’d crawled into bed with him again. She had the key to his apartment, but none of the barriers he had up against his bedroom door were moved, boxes of clothes and whatnot. They served no purpose other than to let him know if someone had come into his room while he slept through the day. But he knew Fiona could get into his room without moving the door if she wanted. And she had. Scary.

He rolled under the covers, faced her, and laughed. She was facing away from him, and wearing one of her nighties, green, loose, and partly see-through. Judging from the sound of her breathing, she’d fallen asleep. And judging from the nightie, she’d planned to surprise him for some wake-up sex, but had apparently been impervious to the draw of sleep. Probably fell asleep maybe twenty minutes ago.

So naturally, he did what any man would do when presented with this situation. A human man would likely use the bathroom upon waking and return, but not a vampire. He was free to press his naked body against his lover's back, slip an arm up her stomach under the nightie, and lean over her to set a kiss on her neck as his hand found her breasts.

“Nnnn.”

“Good evening,” he said, and he kissed her neck as he gently cupped the underside of her higher breast in his fingers and palm, and squeezed. Softly of course, enough so the huge breast's supple skin and great weight molded to the shape of his hand.

“Mmng.” Fiona squirmed a little, but settled again, and didn't move. “Mmm.”

This was, according to various sources — Jack and Jessy — a special right men were given once ‘I loves yous’ were exchanged. If the woman was still in bed while the man was waking, and the woman was also supposed to wake but hadn't, he was allowed to play with her breasts. Considering how deep a sleeper Fiona was, and how long it took her to wake up, the first time he'd tried it she hadn't resisted him at all.

“I like the nightie.”

“Mm.”

“Did you plan to entice me with it, when I woke up?”

“Mmhmm.”

“Nmmm.”

He chuckled, a sound he was growing more and more used to every night, and kissed her neck some more. As he did, he caressed her breast, sliding his fingers around and teasing her skin, and soon her large nipple. Every so often he squeezed a little harder, and shivered as his fingers sank into her enormous bust.

And then his phone rang. He lifted his head and glared at the nightstand, Fiona between it and him. But without so much as opening her eyes, Fiona reached for the stand, feeling around like she was fumbling blind, grabbed the phone, and tossed it over her shoulder at him, all very unwieldy. He had to snap his hand out from under her nightie to grab it.

She knew the deal. If he was getting a call, it wasn't some silly, social thing. It was business, and important business at that.

He answered. “Yeah Jack?”

“Damien, hey. How's the leg?”

Damien looked down at the sheets, and tried to move his regrown leg. It didn't listen.

“Returned, but unresponsive.” He could feel it, but it refused to obey commands, vitae unable to force muscle and tendon to function. It would likely work again in the next week or so, with the help of his girlfriend's potent blood helping him, but an injury from werewolf teeth was ten times worse than he could have imagined. It could take longer.

“I was afraid of that.”

“Sorry, Jack. Werewolf teeth—”

“It’s no problem. It’s not that sorta trip anyway. I was ... gonna see Matthew and Arturo, and talk to them, about ... things, I guess.”

Damien frowned. “Be careful. Bring Jessy if you need to.”

“I’ll think about it. Thanks.”

Damien ended the call, set the phone behind him, and looked back to Fiona. By the Lord, she’d fallen asleep again. Rolling his eyes, he returned to snuggling her back, and again snuck his hand up under her nightie to find her breasts.

“Mmmgmgmg.” The cute little shadow monster stirred up from her slumber, but only managed to open her eyes for a moment, look up at him, smile, before closing her eyes and melting to the pillow again. Looking down over her, he could see a wet drool spot on the pillow cover.

“Jack’s visiting Art and Matt today. I don’t know if he’ll be able to do much.”

“Tash loves them,” she whispered, “and they love her. It’ll be ... fine ... mmmm.”

Quite half asleep. He chuckled, kissed her neck some more, and hugged her against his chest. And once she was snug there, he took full advantage of the special rule, and resumed fondling her underneath her nightie. It wasn’t long before her nipples began to swell, barely, but they did, and he could smell the growing arousal on his girlfriend.

“I love you,” he whispered into her ear.

“Nnnmmmm.”

“Should I let you sleep?”

“N ... no ... Wake me up.” Her words didn’t match her request. She snuggled into the pillow, and returned to drooling.

Wake her up, she said. He smiled, kissed her neck again, and fondled her breasts some more. Heavy, soft, addictive to touch. He could easily roll her over, and do all sorts of things to those breasts. And she’d love indulging him.

But, much as Fiona enjoyed having her breasts played with, and had indulged him many times in the past, it wasn’t what she really loved. So, he sat up, slowly pulled the blankets down so she wouldn’t notice, before he yanked her up onto his lap.

“Mmmmwha? What’s—eep!” She meeped as he set her pelvis over his lap, ass in the air.

And with a grin, he gave it a nice, wake up slap. Her meep turned into a squeak, and her elbows planted on the bed.

“Do me a favor?” he asked.

“What? What, I’m awake! I’m—nnng!” She squeaked again as he spanked her, before resting his hand on her ass, and softly kneaded the meat of it. Lovely, soft, pale skin. No freckles either. A large butt that felt absolutely wonderful in his palm. He teased it, massaged it, slid his fingers up and down it, from tailbone to thigh, before he gave it another, playful slap.

The result was immediate. Fiona didn’t always need a roleplay scenario to enjoy a spank, he’d learned over the past few weeks. She didn’t need to always be put into an extreme, submissive situation. She didn’t need to be Kissed, and rendered helpless. Often, she was plenty happy when he simply pulled her over his lap, and spent time admiring her lovely, amazing ass, and giving it a slap or three, or twelve.

With her doting on him the past six weeks, he'd gotten used to her being around a lot, and he continued to be surprised with how much he enjoyed it. Anyone else, even Jack, and he'd tell them to give him some space. But Fiona? He wanted her around. A lot. He wanted to hear her laugh, giggle, and talk about silly things he normally wouldn't care about, like movies or celebrity gossip.

And he really liked the squeaks she made, when he spanked her.

"Can you keep an eye on Jack for me tonight?"

"But, I thought ye said he was seeing Matt and Art tonight?"

"He is, but I don't trust the Uratha."

She looked over her shoulder at him, something of a frown and smile on her lips. "Aye, me neither. Except for Eric! He's yum."

Damien rolled his eyes, and spanked her again.

~~Jack~~

Jack didn't get five feet out the door before his phone rang. He had a mission tonight, for a friend, but he couldn't ignore this message. He kinda wished he had.

He got a ride to the Xnomina HQ, and stepped in through the front door.

"Mister Terry. Mister McDonald is waiting for you upstairs."
Gloria Jennings sat at her desk, beautiful, in the reserved way most Mekhet preferred. She wasn't actually a receptionist, but she spent a lot of her days playing the role for Xnomina. He'd met her, on the first night he'd been embraced, when Julias took him to this building to see the council.

There was no more council, just Michael McDonald, an asshole with a chip on his shoulder.

“Madam Jennings, how’s your childe? Miss Pol and I haven’t talked in some time.” He could still remember talking with Amanda on several nights, when they had to worry about hunters. Hell, she’d helped him spy on his mom and sis. A fucking lifetime ago.

Gloria met his eyes, winced, and looked back down at the screen of her computer. “Yes, Mister Terry. She’s fine. Been in a few brawls with the Carthians though. She lost an eye.”

His turn to wince. “She’ll regrow it, I’m sure.”

“Mekhet don’t regenerate as well as others. She’s young, and ... it’ll take some time.”

He stepped in closer. Apparently a mistake, because she slid her chair back a few inches when he did.

He stopped, sighed, and looked away. “Know who hurt her? Which Carthian?”

“No. It was a brawl. Some random shot from a pistol.” Which meant more than just losing an eye. That was a damn heavy wound for a young Mekhet to suffer.

Nodding, he walked past her, and didn’t look back. Easier to imagine she wasn’t carefully avoiding getting too close to him, even though he knew she was.

She was scared of him.

He looked to other Kindred as they stepped off the elevator. Isabella Leauvion nodded to him, but walked past him with a bit more hurry than usual. Her new childe Danny, following her sire close, gave him a wide berth. Bruce, an old friend of Julias’s and a Ventruue, met his eyes for only a moment before stepping around him, far around him. Vicky and Parker, the pair that loved running schemes in Devil's Corner, literally turned around when they saw him, and took the elevator down a floor. Probably to take one of the hidden exits, just so they wouldn't have to get close to him. Those two were assholes, but at least they were honest about it.

They were happy he'd kicked the hunters' asses, and that they could go about their second lives as usual again, barring the fight with the Carthians. They were happy, but scared of him. After hearing about what he did to Avery, scared elevated to terrified.

It's not like Jack had fought them all in a vacuum. They'd been injured already by Damien, and Maria had put on some damage on Avery too.

He sighed and shook his head. True as that was, they'd still been in good shape, and most of the pack had been unharmed. He'd defeated twelve werewolves, on his own, and everyone in the whole city knew it. The only vampires not avoiding him, were his friends, and his boss.

He clutched the necklace Elaine gave him, and took the elevator up.

Elaine. He still had trouble figuring her out. Whatever scheme she had, whatever her plans, they involved the curse. Except, meeting him had put a stop to those plans. Maybe? If he had to take a stab in the dark, he figured Elaine came to take the curse from him, now that it'd been freed. She definitely missed the power it used to give her, even when locked up, and probably regretted her decision to get her curse removed. Hopefully his talk with her helped her understand how bad an idea that was.

He trusted her. He didn't trust her. It was weird. It was how vampires did things, a mix of trust and mistrust, and he really fucking hated it. For someone as old as Elaine or Antoinette, it was natural. To him, it was very, very much not. He wanted to be honest, about everything, all the time, and every single time he took a step into the real world, it quickly became apparent that he shouldn't be, couldn't be. He needed to play the game, the Danse Macabre, and get used to doing it in his sleep.

So, as he stepped into Michael's office, he put Danse Macabre on repeat in his skull. Play the game.

"Mister Terry. Welcome. Come, sit." The big guy gestured to the office table.

Jack bowed his head slightly. "Mister McDonald." He took a seat, putting only four feet between him and his boss.

Michael was a big man, bodybuilder build, white, with a shaved head and several tattoos. He even had several piercings on his face, though on him, they made him look like some sort of underworld boss, instead of a Carthian. Which was basically accurate. He was an underworld boss, and had the history to back up his tough guy routine.

"How goes your latest task?" Michael asked.

"The Carthians aren't going to let go of the Mirrden district without a fight, sir. I wasn't able to approach."

Michael sighed and leaned back in his office chair. "I suppose it was too much to hope that the rumors spreading about you would be enough to scare them off."

Jack shook his head. "I had three laser sights on my chest the moment I got out of the car."

"Which you could have easily survived."

Well, technically any vampire could survive a few bullet wounds. A gun pointed at a vampire was a mild threat, but still a threat, and he'd have been stupid to take it lightly.

“Did you want me to get violent at the time, sir?”

“No. Not yet. But with Mister Burksen and Madam Turio not yet fully healed, I do find myself ... wondering if you should be using that curse of yours more aggressively, Mister Terry.”

It took a mountain of effort to keep a frown from forcing its way onto Jack's face.

“The curse isn't reliable, Mister McDonald.” Jack tapped the necklace on his chest. “It's going to backfire, and when it does, it'll be worse than anything my grandsire ever did.”

Michael let out a long, heavy sigh, and met Jack's eyes. Well, at least he was willing to do that. No one else in the Invictus was, except Jessy.

“Strong words, Mister Terry. Viktor Honors was a terror, more than you know.”

“I know quite a bit, sir. My sire shared some stories with me, and I've seen the dungeons in my mansion.”

“Right, the mansion. I trust it is being well kept?”

Jack smiled. “Been keeping an eye on me, sir?”

“Of course. You have become a valuable asset. And the mansion is valuable property.”

“My new thrall keeps good care of it, and she takes to her training well.” She wasn't as scared of guns as he thought she might have been. “And soon she'll have help. Plus, I have many animals guarding the building, more than just my two friends. But ... you didn't call me in here to talk about the mansion."

"No. I called you here because Garry is going after the Tanvar building next."

"The Tanvar building? That's one of our factories in North Side."

"A re-purposed factory. An office building now, and it handles a lot of the transactions Xnomina deals in."

You didn't need a building to handle transactions anymore, unless the transactions were physical in nature. Office building? No, that was Xnomina talk for a building with dealers on site.

Xnomina dealt with a lot of illegal drugs, but they were pretty good about keeping it out of the hands of anyone under eighteen, and making sure proxy dealers did the same. They dealt in illegal weapons, but were pretty good at keeping it out of the hands of random thugs, preferring to support other companies that went up against ... well, other companies, doing equally dark shit. Jack didn't exactly like how dirty a company Xnomina was, but at the same time, they didn't cross any major lines.

He could ask what sort of shit Tanvar got their fingers into, or leave it a mystery. In the past, he'd have been more comfortable not knowing, and too afraid to ask someone as important and strong as Michael.

"What sort of black goods does Tanvar deal in?"

Michael managed a small grin. "Cigarettes and cigars."

"Really? That's it?"

"You'd be surprised how many places in the world consider them illegal; in particular, buying from third parties."

It was easy to forget sometimes that Xnomina didn't just have its hand in national businesses. It was international, like any large company, and happy to get its hands dirty in the shadow economy. Like any large company.

"I—oh, right, Terra Den."

"Exactly. Mister Tones's new friend has his eyes on many fields of business, and Terra Den is no stranger to the black market. I have some intelligence that shows Garry's men investigating the building."

"That's a little surprising. With Madam Turio and Mister Burksen still out of commission for a while, I thought he'd have pushed in on the government district." Where the Cathedral was, and where the Second Estate liked to sink their claws.

"He can't move in on Turio and Burksen directly. That area has too many clean eyes. And he knows that, while Turio is no longer a council member for the Invictus, she is still my partner. She'll help me. I'll help her."

"No one helped her when Avery attacked. I got no back up, no—"

Michael leaned forward, and held Jack's gaze. "We were there ten minutes after you were, Jack. If Avery had actually killed Maria that night, don't think I wouldn't have done something about it, either." The man had a damn hard gaze, like steel. He might not have been as old as the Prince or Jacob, but that didn't change that he was centuries old.

Jack sat back and nodded. First names. He used to think they'd make him calmer, but they didn't. Titles were a nice barrier between him, other Invictus, and the nasty realities they had to deal with.

"So you want me to keep an eye on the Tanvar building."

“Yes. I think Garry will get violent over this one, as well. Be prepared to defend yourself.”

Defend himself. He meant use the curse. Well fuck that.

“Yes sir.”

“And Jack. Maria told me what you did.”

Jack frowned at the man, but kept both hands on the arms of the hilariously expensive office chair. A quick snap of the hand to remove the necklace, and he could go all out and kick this man’s ass. Probably. Hopefully. And as long as nothing bad happened, the Ripper wouldn’t get to have a say.

“I see.”

The big man shrugged and shook his head. “I had no love for Lucas, Jack. The man was an even larger pain in my ass than Viktor.”

Some tension melted from Jack’s body.

“I thought the First and Second Estate always backed each other?”

“Hardly. The Invictus and the Lancea et Sanctum often cooperate, yes, but there are many cities where they do not. And this city was quickly becoming one. We remained their ally almost entirely due to Maria’s influence. When the Prince enacted the purge, the Invictus did not participate, as you know.”

“I assumed you didn’t want to go up against the Prince?”

“Jack, please. The council was a triumvirate, we had well over a hundred Kindred at the time, and it wouldn’t have taken much to convince Tony to join us against his sire. No, we didn’t go against the Ordo Dracul, because it didn’t serve us to. We knew the way the wind was blowing, saw what was happening to Lucas, even Maria did.” Sighing again, Michael leaned in, elbows on the table, and met his eyes again. No steel this time, just a man looking to talk. “I don’t have to tell you that you should avoid Maria.”

“Ha, yeah.” He squirmed in his chair a little as he met his boss’s gaze again. “I hope she’ll come around.”

“She will, in time.”

“Has she ... told anyone else?”

“Not to my knowledge, but don’t be surprised if more people find out. There are a lot of eyes watching you, Jack. Jacob and Elaine, the most obvious, but others as well. Don’t think Isabella will hesitate to get her fingers into your brain if she can.”

Jack squirmed again. “I don’t like her.”

His boss laughed. Not something he usually did. “She’s the best type of enemy to have, one that can be your ally in the right circumstance.”

“And Elaine?”

“Elaine. Those few times she visited, she did well, hiding her relation to your grandsire. Her motives are difficult to discern at best, but I’ve got a few ideas.” Which meant he had a couple of well-thought-out possible plans, if he had to kill her. “She is a genuine dragon though, devoted, and everything I know suggests she is indeed an old friend of the Prince’s. You can trust her to some extent.”

Some extent. Ugh. He already trusted her to some extent. It was trusting her completely that he couldn’t bring himself to do, and probably something Antoinette didn’t either. For the Prince, that was perfectly normal, but it grated him. He liked his great grandsire, even more after their conversation about how ... damaged, she was. A genuine, real, honest conversation, that didn't manage to fully answer the question: what exactly did she originally plan to do to him?

“I'll start hanging out in the Tanvar building then. Rules of engagement?”

“We're the defenders in this idiocy. You're in the clear to kill any ghouls or thralls that get violent.” Same as before then. “And if any of the Kindred get violent, I expect you to not only deal with them, and defend the facility, but I expect any Carthians that are willing to get directly aggressive to die.”

Jack winced and looked down. “You know that will trigger a war.”

“Yes, but if we don't stop the Carthians, they'll continue to march on us until we have nothing left.”

“That'd take them decades at this rate.”

“No. This is the pebble that starts the avalanche. If we let them have Tanvar, they'll be swarming our other projects in a matter of months. We stop them here and now, and if it gets to the point of actual war, then at least it will be on an even front.”

Sighing, Jack nodded and stood up. “Then, later tonight I will get familiar with the building.”

“Jack.” Michael didn't stand up, but he leaned back and looked at him, eyes hard again. “No one else knows that you have my permission to kill. And if the first death of this war is to happen, it makes sense it should be your kill.”

“Why?”

“Because, as much as Dolareido has become quite terrified of your curse, they also respect your mind, and your position. Your mind, because you tend to err on the side of logic. Your position, because you are lovers with the Prince, one of the founding members of Dolareido, and she is the persistent voice of cooperation, now matter how foolhardy such an ideology may be.”

A hint of a frown crossed the man’s face. Him referring to Jack without the title, fine, but Jack referring to him without one, not so fine. Well, fuck him.

“Deal with Carthians at the Tanvar building, Mister Terry. If you kill no one, but keep the building secure, then all is well. But I expect you to keep that building secure, no matter what Garry tries. Understood?”

“Understood.”

---

“Sometimes, I really hate this fucking city.” He slipped his hand back into his jacket pocket, and Mulder and Scully, now with fully bellies, took off and found high perches to watch him from.

“Aw, dinnae say that! Ye love Dolareido.”

He groaned at Fiona and shook his head. “Not tonight I don’t. I fucking hate this place, and the vampires in it.”

Giggling, Fiona hooked his arm and half hugged it as they walked. Not many people around outside this time of night, this close to the Carthian district, so he felt comfortable saying words like ‘vampire’ and ‘fuck it all to fucking shit hell fuck’ loudly.

He wore his usual Invictus business suit. Fiona wore blue jeans and a brown leather jacket. She fit in well in the area, but Jack didn't feel like fitting in, not now. He was kinda hoping someone would come close, start yelling, and give him a reason to get violent.

"I love it. I met Damien, and Jessy and Eric. And Azamel, and..."
Uh oh, she said the A word. Her giggles vanished, replaced with snuffles, and she hugged his arm tight to her side as she snuggled into him. The Begotten were more a family than he had ever expected, a close family.

"You really like her, don't you?"

"Aye. She's been ... been great to us."

"You think Sándor will make a good replacement?"

She shook her head. "I mean, he'll be good, right? He'll protect us, and guide us, but Azamel was the grandma who knew how to be soft and hard."

"She's definitely wise, I'll give her that."

Fiona nodded, and loosened her grip a bit so they could start walking a little faster. "I'd have ne'er met her back home."

"Dolareido is pretty welcoming to paranormals by contrast to a lot of places, I guess. I ... want it to be better, but stupid shit keeps happening. Damien tell you what Garry's been up to?"

"Aye."

"But you know to stay out of it, right? I don't care what Garry or Michael or Maria do, let Kindred deal with that shit, ok?"

She groaned but nodded. "Aye. But tonight's not about that, right? Ye're gonna speak with the lads."

"If they'll listen. Not sure it's going to go the way Antoinette wants it to. Avery's not exactly the sort of type to let things go. She'll go after Maria again, somehow, and she might take a swing at me too. Matt and Art, they're in her pack, her family. They might—"

"Nae true, lad! Love will prevail!" She wiped her nose free of sniffles, let go of him, and hopped around as she got ahead of him. This was a level of happiness he hadn't expected.

"You got laid this evening, didn't you?"

"Aye, I did, ye nosy fucker."

"Don't think I don't know you're dying to talk about your relationship."

She exploded into giggles and hopped over to him. "Maybe, but not with ye! I talk to Jessy and Natasha."

That was probably for the best. Jack doubted he could handle a conversation like that for five minutes.

"Well, for what it's worth, Damien's happy. I first met the guy when he was out to kill the Prince, and a bit after that, when that failed. Dude was royally messed up depressed. Took a while before I thought he wouldn't just ... wait for a sunrise to get him."

Fiona sighed and nodded as she filed in beside him again. "Aye. He needed ye. I'm glad yer his friend."

He smiled. "I'm glad you came along. He really needed someone like ... well, you." It wasn't exactly a secret that Damien had that 'emo vampire' vibe going on, and would have fit perfectly in a really shitty movie where he was basically a stalker for a typical Mary Sue idiot. Someone like Fiona, on the other hand, fit him much better.

"I am a pretty lass. The prettiest."

Uh oh. That was Jessy talking.

“You hang out with the Gangrel too much. Didn’t you used to date Eric? Isn’t that a bit awkward?”

“Nae. I mean, we did for a wee bit, but it didnae last. He’s too...”

“Old?”

She giggled and smacked his chest. “I guess that works.”

“Damien’s a lot older.”

“Aye but not in the same way, ye ken?”

Yeah, that was true. Damien had a lot of hate and depression built up, but it wasn’t over the same sort of shit Eric did. Jessy fit him better. She understood things like divorce, or shitty wages, on a level neither Fiona or Damien had ever really dealt with.

“So, Fiona, you’re a shadow monster, right?”

“Aye.”

“You probably sneak around a lot and keep up to date on things in the city?”

She grinned up at him. “A wee bit. It’s dangerous to be going around, sneaking in the dark.”

“Been watching the Uratha lately?”

“Aye.”

“Seen what Clara’s been up to?”

She grinned some more. “Aye.”

“And ... gonna tell me?”

“I dinnae think I should.”

Jack squirmed as he walked. “Come on. It’s not like that. I hurt her in that fight, really bad. I just want to know how she’s recovering.”

“Her arm’s grown back. Uratha are strong.”

“Crazy strong. Takes Kindred decades to get the strength they get in weeks.” Nodding, they turned a corner, and Jack took a few seconds to look around. The Carthian district, the edge of it, where Avery’s apartment was. “I’m glad she’s feeling better.”

“And I hear she’s been getting to know that hunter, Harcourt?”

He grit his teeth, but shook his head, shaking it off. That shouldn’t bother him. If anything, it was good she was hanging out with a hunter. It’s what Antoinette wanted, for the hunters here to realize the paranormals weren’t enemies. And Clara and Jack weren’t an item, couldn’t be an item, and it was better for her to move on.

The Beast in him didn’t agree. The Beast told him he should own everything he felt he wanted, control and dominate it. Clara was very attractive, and a werewolf. The Beast wanted him to sink his fangs into her, and more besides. It wanted to bind her with the Vinculum, turn her into his pet, and feast on her every night, even as it trained her to be his guard dog.

He sighed and clutched the necklace around his neck. Even with it, the Beast grew louder all the time. Nasty side effect of the necklace? Maybe.

“Good for her.”

Fiona giggled some more, but didn’t push the issue. She did start keeping a closer eye on the environment. Carthians were probably watching from windows, and no doubt some of them had the hardware to snipe them from a distance. Jack would survive it, and then there'd be hell to pay. Fiona wouldn't, but the Begotten weren't their enemies.

Jack opened the door to Avery's apartment building. Brianna stood inside, leaning back against a wall, and glaring at him.

"The fuck? Thought you said—"

Jack held up hand. "Not here for that meeting. I'm here to talk to Matthew and Arturo."

Brianna folded her arms across her chest and glared some more. A somewhat tall woman, dark skin, with short black hair, she growled and considered. Jack was just thankful the woman wasn't attacking, with the look she had on her face.

"Brianna, come on," he said. "I'm not here to fight anyone. We can deal with that shit later. This is a personal visit." She continued to glare. "Fucking hell, come on. You want to see Derick and Santos again, right? This is just step one of my ninety-nine step plan to get everyone in this city singing kumbaya."

"We ain't fighting with anyone."

"Bullshit. After what happened, the werewolves are being treated like Garry's buddies, and you know it. When's the last time you even visited Bloodlust?"

She tried to glare at him some more, but her eyes fell after a time. "Not since the incident."

Christ, even she was calling it that.

"I'm just gonna get Matt and Art, we're gonna go for a walk, and talk."

“What’s to stop you from Dominating them?”

“Two Uratha at once? I’m good, Brianna, but not that good. Besides, the necklace is on, and it’ll stay on.”

She scrunched up her nose and considered some more. Jack almost started yelling. This was the problem. No one trusted anyone, and some trust was needed if he was going to fix any of these problems that were fucking exploding all over the damn city. If he had to—“Fine. Wait here. Avery doesn’t want you in the building.” She pulled out her phone and sent a text. Finally, progress.

It took a bit, but Matthew and Arturo stepped down the old stairs eventually, dressed in jeans and t-shirts. No limp. They were healed. Next week, Jack would have to visit the whole pack, Avery included, with Tash, and try and fix the whole situation. This would be a good way to test the waters, and if possible, repair something.

He was good at fixing things. That’s what he did. Supposedly.

“Matthew. Arturo.” Jack said.

“Hey lads,” Fiona said.

“Fiona, Jack,” Art said, eyeing them with some obvious suspicion. “Why’re you here?”

Jack nodded toward the door. “Come with me.”

The boys looked at each other, then to Brianna. She shrugged and gestured to Jack with a half swipe, before she sat on a chair. Guard dog duty.

They followed him, though the two men kept a close eye on Jack as he left the building. In retrospect, Jack was damn glad Fiona was with him. He was confident Garry's goons posed no threat, not in this situation, not if they didn't want to overstep themselves and piss off the Prince and the Invictus even more. But the werewolves? He wished he had Damien with him, but Fiona would have to do. And it wasn't like she couldn't help him out, maybe even more than his friend.

"Couldn't send a text?" Matt said. "We got phones in the city because you guys told us to."

Jack laughed, and not a happy one. "Yeah, cause I'm sure Garry didn't also suggest it."

Art snorted. "Did you come here to threaten us?"

"No. Came to have a chat, so follow me. I like to walk and talk." He didn't mean to sound so forceful. A few years ago, he would have struggled to say something so directly. Not because he didn't have the personality for it, he very much did, but because he wouldn't have felt comfortable holding power over others. How the times had changed.

Fiona bounced around a few times before she fell in beside Jack again, and the boys fell in behind him. He didn't actually plan to just walk around randomly. He was going somewhere, but it didn't matter for now.

"I didn't come get you to talk about the problems on our laps, about Maria and shit," he said. "I came to talk about Uratha getting along with Kindred, in general. Brianna, and you two, for example." He looked back at the two men. They both had their eyes downcast, frowning, and grumbling a little. "Brianna's situation sucks because of the Carthian Invictus stupid little war. Mason's isn't so bad, but I'm sure he'd prefer if his girlfriend didn't find herself at the other end of an Invictus shotgun. And then there's you two, the idiots that staked a dragon."

“We didn’t have a choice,” Art said.

Jack shook his head, “Let me put it in perspective, guys. If I was in Avery’s pack instead of working for the Invictus, and Avery told me I had to do something where I knew Antoinette would either try and stop me, or intervene in some way, risking her life, you know what I’d do?”

Matt lifted a hand. “You—”

“The situation wouldn’t have happened, guys. Cause even though, if I was you, I’d have trusted Avery, I wouldn’t have let things get ... like that.” They rounded a corner, Jack shaking his head the whole time. Trying to explain the situation was so damn hard, because it wasn’t like they were exactly wrong for what they did. “This way to the diner.”

The boys looked at each other, brows raised, before looking back at him. “Diner?”

He laughed. Tash was right. They really did say things at the same time, a lot.

---

“I’ll have this fancy chicken thinger, lass, and this! Oh, this sounds nice.” Fiona held up the menu for the waitress, and pointed at several things. No point in trying to say them, and not because she had a Scottish accent. It was a bunch of words Jack didn’t know either, French stuff. But he was pretty sure Fiona had basically ordered some sort of chicken with melted cheese, and a side order of oysters.

Jack glared at her. “Fiona, that is a messed up meal. How can—you’re just picking the most expensive things on the menu, aren’t you?”

She beamed at him before grinning up at the waitress. “And I’ll definitely be wanting dessert!”

Jack rolled his eyes. The guys got some blue rare steaks, predictably. Jack ordered nothing.

It was a quiet little restaurant, Invictus owned of course, but not a place for Kindred to get a drink. It was empty tonight, and the staff were all thralls. It was a good place to talk. The restaurant was also a front. They dealt in illegal goods using the restaurant, heavy drugs, shit Jack wasn’t happy to be supporting, but while Xnomina kept it out of the hands of kids, he wasn’t going to stop them.

Maybe in the future, when he had more of his fingers in the Dolareido pie, but not yet.

“Trying to buy us with expensive steaks?” Art asked. “Cause, I mean, that could work.” The man smiled, but Jack could see he was nervous. Still, it was a funny comment, and Jack laughed quietly. He could see why Tash liked these guys.

“No I’m not trying to buy you off. Just ... I know I can be an asshole when I argue. I’ve always been like that, since well before I was vampire, you know? Just wanted you guys to know I’m not an asshole, if I get uppity.”

“Uppity?” Art asked. “Not angry?”

“Yeah, uppity. Like this.” He leaned forward, elbows on the table. “You’re gonna listen to me while I explain the situation, got it?” They both frowned, but nodded, quickly getting what he meant by uppity. “Good. Avery did what she thought was necessary, I get that. I don’t have all the details of the how and why, so I’m not gonna make a judgment call on that action. She should be damn happy you guys have been of use, dealing with that azlu and whatnot, or the Prince would be more proactive about dealing with you idiots.

“But, yeah, she did something super risky because she really thought she was helping the city. I can understand you backing her, and so does Natasha.” He tapped the table with a finger. “That’s not the issue. So understand I’m here as Tash’s friend, not as the guy who’s hired to keep everyone getting along.” Sighing, he sat back, and food was served. The boys glanced at their meat, but it was clear their appetites were damaged. Fiona, naturally, devoured her chicken with gusto. Large appetite on the small girl.

“The issue,” he continued, “is that you violated her trust. And I get that you did it because it was the only way to do what Avery needed, but that’s the breaking point. You could have talked to her, explained the situation, asked her, and put some faith in the relationship. But you didn’t. You basically threw the relationship into the garbage, cause you thought for sure there’d be no way to save it, while also doing what Avery wanted. And sure, you probably also did it cause you thought Tash might get in harm’s way, and you didn’t want that. But, again, that’s violating her trust in you, and any faith in the relationship.”

He ground his teeth. “What should have happened, is you guys tell her — before shit hit the fan — that you might attack Maria at some point. You come to some sort of understanding, and accept that yes, you might find yourselves in a situation where you attack Maria, and have to do so without telling her. You trust the relationship to be able to survive that! You trust Tash to not fuck you guys over, either. Not stake her, set her aside, and basically abandon the relationship because you think being on opposite sides of a problem automatically means it can’t work out.”

They both opened their mouths. Jack swiped his hand through the air.

“Eat your meals. I’m not done.” They both grumbled, but did as ordered. Fiona smiled at him, big smile, mouth full of chicken. Kinda ruining the vibe, but whatever. “So, maybe the issue is that your relationship wasn't strong enough? Which sounds like bullshit to me, cause everything Jessy's told me — which is a fucking lot — tells me Natasha is head over heels in love with you two idiots.”

That got them squirming. They looked at each other a bit more, and froze, as if finally coming to a realization. Then they looked at Fiona when she made some loud munching noises, before they slowly took another bite of their meal.

“I guess you guys hadn't gotten to that point in the relationship yet, or hadn't realized it anyway,” he said. “Well, Jessy says she definitely does. And judging from the looks on your faces, you feel the same way. I don't know why you didn't say it, or she didn't say it. Could be the two guys one girl thing. Not exactly a common arrangement.” He shrugged and put up his hands. “I'm not judging, and couldn't care less. I got a woman five hundred years older than me trying to get me to recruit my own harem. Dolareido, and anyone in its night life, aren't ever going to have normal relationships.”

Sighing, he leaned back. God damn, he loved to rant. A little too cathartic, really.

“So,” he continued, “she loves you two, you two love her, and there's a barrier between you: what the pack and covenants want. The issue isn't actually the barrier, much as it seems like it at first glance. The issue is your lack of trust in the relationship to be able to survive that. And, of course, that you literally stabbed her in the chest with a piece of wood. Stealth wood, from what Jessy tells me. So not only did you not trust Tash, you were prepared to violate her trust, ahead of time! No fucking wonder she's livid.”

They both winced, looking down, before they slowly took another bite of their meal.

“What do we do?” Matt asked.

“Tash is going to ask you to do something, something her and the Prince — probably mostly the Prince — have cooked up. It’ll be repayment for the assault. Do it. Even if it pisses Avery off, do it. Do it because you trust Tash to not do you wrong, okay? Even if means pissing off the Ordo, Tash wouldn’t do you wrong. Get it?” He stabbed a finger at the edge of the table, and relaxed. “A step in the right direction.”

The boys looked at each other again, sharing a few more winces before sighing and nodding.

“How’s a kid like you understand shit like this?” Art asked.

Jack shrugged. “It’s easy to see the flaws in shit when you’re looking at things from the outside. I’ve been a student of the human condition for a long time. I watch people, watch them squabble, watch them say stupid shit to each other, read about it all the time, and...” And it wasn’t something he’d ever be able to wrap his mind around. Typical person-on-person interaction was a chaotic mess of stupid. But, just like Julias and the kine he envied, Jack couldn’t help but envy those stupid people. They played the social game, found love, lost love, got laid, had fun, and all the things he’d been too afraid to do. “I’m damn lucky I found the relationship I did, cause I’m pretty sure I’d be single for eternity otherwise.”

Art smirked. “Certainly enough of an asshole for it.”

“Yeah well, shit needed to be said, and I don’t have the fucking patience for romcom bullshit. It’s funny when it’s a tv show. It’s ludicrous when it’s real life.” The waitress returned, taking their plates, and handed Fiona a small menu with a drawn picture of a champagne glass with something solid in it, and a spoon sticking out. Ice cream. Fiona grinned maniacally. Jack rolled his eyes. “So, get me? It’s a messy situation. Tash understands why you guys followed Avery that night, but that doesn’t excuse you violating her trust in you, and you shitting all over the relationship. That's the problem."

Matt shook his head. "It's not that easy, Jack. We're Uratha. We follow the pack, and it wasn't like we disagreed with Avery. We still don't. Something's up with Maria, and—"

"You will leave Maria alone, or I'll put every last one of you in the hospital."

"Jack," Art said, "something—"

"Something is up. And you idiots are falling for it. But that's not what this little meeting is about. We can talk more about Maria next week. We're here because Tash is a good friend of mine, and she, and you two, deserve a chance. But unlike she, or you two, or most people, I'm apparently the only damn person in this city willing to just say things straight so shit can actually. Get. Fixed."

The waitress returned with two very fancy looking bowls filled with some sort of soft serve ice cream topped with cherries and bananas.

The two werewolves shook their heads. "Uh, we didn't—"

Fiona pulled both bowls in close, and got to work.

---

Jack lifted a hand, made a small wave, and Mulder and Scully rejoined him, perching on his shoulders. With Fiona and the two wolves gone, he wanted his friends close.

The Tanvar building, final stop of the night.

Like the restaurant, the Tanvar building was a front. It had offices, with computers, and he was sure during the day they'd be running, a bunch of people working at them. Probably not on the illegal shit though. Didn't take an office building full of office workers to help move black market goods. They probably just did typical Xnomina stuff, trading stocks, while criminals under their feet rolled up illegal cigars and whatnot.

Right now, the building had a few thralls and ghouls standing around, some of them armed with rifles, some with shotguns, and most with pistols. A lot of suits. If the cops showed up, they'd know something illegal was going on just by the look of all the kine, standing around like secret agents, but the Invictus owned the cops so that wasn't going to happen.

“Jack.”

Jack smiled, and nodded to Hella. The Gangrel was dressed in a suit as well, a slightly tall woman with tan skin and short dark hair. Unlike her girlfriend Isabella, who wouldn't be caught dead in pants, Hella wore a normal suit.

“Hella Vendram. How's Danny?”

She raised a brow. “The fuck do you care about Danny?” Apparently, she hadn't expected him to remember Isabella's new childe's name.

“Just making conversation. You know we're on the same team, right?”

“Didn't give me that impression, last time you came for a visit.”

Sighing, Jack stepped past Hella, and down into the basement. Classically, a single bulb dangled from a cord, an old school bulb that would probably flicker and die on them any moment. But once he was past that, the stairs stopped at a door, he opened it, and a large concrete room welcomed him. It smelled of various chemicals, boxes were piled high, and a couple kine walked around with clipboard, checking things off.

Jack laughed. A paper trail was better than a digital trail. You could burn paper, when you were done with it. Digital information, if it left the machine it was created on, was borderline permanent.

“These boxes,” Jack said. “Just filled with cigarettes and shit?”

Hella nodded. “And other things along those lines.”

“But it’s not what the Carthians are after.”

“Not exactly. Terra Den wants to put a hole in what we’re doing here. Hurt Xnomina’s bottom line. We have a lot of shit set up so we can move all this crap through this building, and it’ll take time to get the same shit set up elsewhere. And we always keep a vamp or two here, and a squad of suits, to keep this area secure, you know? If the Carthians take it, that’s a vantage point we lose.”

“It’s only a vantage point if it’s helping protect an important area. The area is only important, because we’re fighting over it.”

She shrugged. “You can argue with McDonald over that. I got my orders, and like you made so abundantly clear on your visit, I have duties.”

He almost asked where Isabella was. Better to not poke the bear.

“Any Carthians actually attack the building yet?” he asked, reaching up and offering his pets some oats. They cawed, pecked at the food, and looked around, drawing the eyes of the thralls with the clipboard. Jack grinned at them, and fed his friends some more oats.

“Nah. But they’ve scouted the area, so they’ll probably show up any night now, before Turio or Burksen can be a thorn in their sides.” Hella leaned against a stack of boxes, and grimaced as she looked at the clipboard, once the two kine handed it to her. “Used to be that Garry didn’t know a damn thing about this building and what we were doing here. But that fucking Jeremy Long asshole and Terra Den really know what they're doing. If they can, they'll take over our distribution, and that shit hole Montoya will have a new job."

"Montoya." Jack frowned as he wandered around, examining the boxes. "Right, that guy. I met him once, when I confronted Jeremy for the first time." When Jessy overstepped and punched Garry. Lucky she was still alive, after that. "Fucker still handing out loans to people he knows can't pay him back?"

"Yeap. Everyone knows about what happened, with Eric and Montoya's shark, some dude named Pitt, but it hasn't stopped Montoya."

And why would it. Now that his boss was a vampire, Long had access to all the information he needed to help Montoya pilot the paranormal world. Ultimately, Montoya didn't matter, now that Eric didn't owe him anything, but still, it was just another pain in the ass Jack had to keep track of.

"So," Hella said, "if you're here, I'm guessing McDonald thinks shit is gonna get really bad?"

"What makes you say that?" Almost a rhetorical question, but, he did kinda want to hear her answer.

"Everyone knows you send Jack the Ripper when shit is about to get real."

He snapped his gaze at her, and she took a quick step back.

"I'm not Jack the Ripper." Christ, did someone share what the curse wanted to be called? Did Jack say it to someone by accident? Or did people just extrapolate from his name? God damn it.

"Fine, Jesus. All the rest of us know, is when shit gets bad, McDonald sends Jack and his curse to fuck it up."

McDonald sends? Of course Michael would spin it so Invictus would think Jack did those things on Michael's orders. Not a bad plan. Michael would gain influence, and he knew Jack didn't want so much focus pointed at himself.

"I'm not here to fuck things up, Miss Vendram." Back to titles. Make this shit official. "I'm here to stop things from going to shit." A lie. Michael was hoping Jack would be forced to kill someone, so he could have his war. Problem was, Garry was determined, and quite possibly willing to sacrifice someone to make that war happen.

How to fix this situation? The more Jack looked at it, the more it looked like he couldn't.

Chapter 139

~~Beatrice~~

Seven weeks.

“Here.”

Triss stared down at the book and knife, at Samantha, the book a little more, and then Samantha.

“How’d you—”

“Antoinette stores artifacts for years, even centuries. She was going to lock these up, until she felt ready to go back for them. And...” She squirmed as she put the objects back into a small, flat box, and handed it to Triss. “I’ll have to take them back, at some point. But ... but even if she finds out what I did, that’s a risk I’m willing to take, if it means Mary gets to live again.”

Beatrice winced as she slowly took the open box out of Sam’s hands. “Yeah, I get it. And thanks, a fucking lot, but you know I can’t guarantee anything.”

But she’d try, holy fuck she’d try. Finally, she had all the pieces. The flesh witch, the tools, and Black Blood. God damn finally, progress! Now Elen could make a proper body, living and breathing, and it’d be Julias. Proper, real, Julias. From there, she’d have to find a way to get his soul. The bigger hurdle.

But Jacob had given her a hint, that he’d managed to get a glimpse of the other side, but he had to kill a lot of kine to do it. Triss would look for another way, at first, but if she had to bide her time for the next ten years, slowly collecting asshats she didn’t mind killing, she would. If she had to leave Dolareido and find some place where she could gather the worse humanity had to offer, and sacrifice them in some sort of gigantic ritual, she would.

Maybe somewhere with wildlands and poachers? No one likes poachers.

“I know, no guarantees.” Sam grabbed her necklace as she stared down at the box, too. “But it’s worth the risk.”

Damn, that was a heavy weight on the shoulders. Nodding, Triss closed the thin box, and set it aside. They were in the Circle’s cave, and it was just the girls. Jacob was out, so was Othello and Aaron, leaving only Triss and Jen with Samantha.

“I find it difficult to imagine,” Jennifer said, sitting down against the wall of blankets in Triss’s alcove, “that it would be that easy. To steal the book and knife from the Prince, I mean.”

Samantha frowned as she sat down beside her. “You think she knows?”

“Antoinette is really fucking smart,” Triss said, setting the box aside and sitting beside Sam so the Daeva was between them. “So maybe she does?”

“My sire is, um, distracted with things lately. This whole Carthian Invictus turf war bothers her. It’s almost like she takes it personally?”

Triss nodded. “Yeah I can see that. Antoinette’s built the city from the ground up to be a paranormal’s utopia, right? But shit keeps happening to fuck that up. She probably does take it personally.”

“And,” Samantha said, “she’s distracted with other things, too. I’m not exactly sure what. Might have something to do with my son, and the curse.”

Triss shivered. And, shit, Samantha noticed.

“That curse,” Triss said, “it’s definitely something no one saw coming. Jack seems to be doing a good job handling it, though? I mean, he used it to beat the hunters. And yeah, it was pretty scary, but he still managed it.”

Manage was a strong word. The kid wrecked everyone, a god damn slaughter, and he’d loved every second of it. There weren’t any words for how fucking sick and twisted it was. No point in telling Sam that.

“I suppose he ... did beat the werewolves with it, and is still fine. No one died, either.”

“Exactly. Don’t worry about your son. Kid’s smart, too damn smart.”

Sighing, Samantha nodded again, fiddling with her fingers. “It’s hard for any mom to not worry about her son.”

“True,” Jennifer said, “but circumstances are different. He’s no longer just your son. He’s your son and Julias’s child.”

Samantha gulped and stared at Jennifer. “Does ... that mean I’ll stop caring for him?”

Jennifer smiled and pat the woman on the shoulder. “In a hundred years, you may stop thinking of him as your son, yes. But that doesn’t mean you’ll stop caring for him. Simply that your relationship will change. Given time, you’ll no longer think of Antoinette as your sire, or even your superior. She’ll be another vampire.”

Frowning, Samantha looked down and rubbed her knees a little. “Not sure I like that.”

After a small laugh, Triss pat the woman on her other shoulder. “You’re welcome to fight against the Beast as much as you want. But —”

“I would like to also mention, Samantha,” Jennifer said, leaning in a little closer, “Triss and I talked about your ... increasing involvement in the Circle.”

Now? Really? Triss raised a brow at Jen, but the damn slut winked at her. Ah whatever, roll with it.

“You did?”

“Mhmm.” Jennifer nodded, and set a hand on Sam’s leg. “We just wanted you to know, if you ever did, oh I don’t know, find yourself thrown at us like Jacob did to you not long ago, we wouldn’t mind. In fact, I encourage it.”

Ok, Jennifer was laying it on pretty thick, but damn the way Samantha froze and stared at the blankets underneath her, was too fucking cute.

“What the damn slut means to say is, is that Jacob’s happier than we’ve seen him, ever, since you came along, Sam. And the two of you really seem to enjoy getting freaky with it where everyone can join in. So, yeah, we’re cool with you, you know, doing what you did last time.”

“And more,” Jen whispered, full husky voice mode.

So naturally, Triss gave Jen a good slap on the leg.

“It was supposed to be a sort of blanket, uh, statement, not a direct invite, Sam. Don’t feel pressured or anything.”

Jennifer shrugged, smile going full slut mode. Really should have been a Daeva. “That’s what it was.”

“Not it wasn’t! You might as well have invited her to fuck.”

“I did no such thing. I merely suggested that you and I have no issues with the rather open, and expressive way Jacob and Samantha enjoy their sexuality. And, perhaps, partaking of that sexuality a little with Samantha.”

Triss rolled her eyes. “Well, that went further than I planned. Not like Jen and I are gonna try and seduce you or anything, Sam, okay? Calm down.” Poor woman looked like she was going to burst into flames right in front of them. “Though, from the looks you’ve been giving Othello, I imagine he’s the one you’re excited about.”

“Oh god.”

Yeap, that made it even worse. Now she looked like she was going to violently explode in pure shame.

Jennifer giggled, flirty and sultry, and shook her head. “Othello feels the same way we do, I am sure, Samantha. And knowing Jacob, he wouldn’t mind at all, as long as he was there. Or, better yet, with both inside you?”

It wasn’t like they hadn’t told her these things already, but damn, it was so fucking cute how she boiled, even without the Blush of Life. Was it like this for the Prince and her boy toy? Did she love embarrassing the kid with new kink after new kink after new kink? If he reacted anything like his mother did, probably.

Ok, back to the heavier shit.

“We’re gonna test these out,” Triss said, patting the box, “tonight.”

“I ... probably shouldn’t come, should I?”

“No, probably not. It’s not a fun time, and Jacob wouldn’t want Jen and me sharing Circle secrets. Plus, it’s ... easy ... to get fucked in the head about this kinda stuff. Emotional. Better to stay back, ok? Stay back, and don't get your hopes up. This probably won't work, but the book and knife bring us a step closer."

Sighing, Samantha nodded, closed her eyes, and took a deep breath. "I trust you, Beatrice. Even if my sire finds out what I did, and punishes me. Even if I can't have Mary back. It was worth the risk."

Christ, Triss fucking hoped so.

---

"Should we invite Sándor?" Jennifer asked. The two of them walked the desert outside Dolareido, on the way to the secret chamber where they kept Elen. Not really secret, if the Begotten knew where it was, but maybe Sándor didn't tell the others? Triss had to ask him.

"To this?" She motioned to the flat box in her arms.

"Yes. He seems open to the idea."

"I dunno. I think he's mostly interested in watching it all fall apart, so he can ... save our asses when it does, I guess."

Jen raised a brow. "That's a bad thing?"

"No, but I'd prefer to keep someone around who thought I had a chance of succeeding."

Chuckling, Jen stepped in closer and hooked an arm over her shoulders. "You like him."

"I mean, yeah, I guess. Or maybe I just like drunk Sándor?"

"Hmm. I don't know. Sober Sándor"—Jen chuckled at the name—"is so very ... stern. I like a hard man." She chuckled some more.

“Well, no, but he could be when he wanted to be. Sándor is similar, in that sense. He just always wants to be hard, and stoic, for obvious reasons.”

“Eh I dunno. I think the gargoyle dude’s really in tune with his gargoyle Horror. You heard what he said, about guarding a vampire for decades. I can see it now, dude literally perched on a rooftop or stone column or something, squatting for days on end.”

“That’s what you think of, when you remember the huge gargoyle?”

“Um, yeah? He’s a gargoyle.”

Jen leaned in, and set a kiss on her neck. “I was thinking, if he has two sets of arms, and two sets of wings, what else does he have two of?”

Triss choked on a laugh, almost dropping the box. Thank god no one else was out here to hear them, cause this was some stupid sex talk.

“You want to fuck the big gargoyle?”

“I admit, the size and strength of him in that form is terribly appealing. Come on, Triss. You don’t fantasize about being picked up by a huge, handsome monster, and being fucked like a toy? I bet that’s what Jessy enjoys most about fucking a werewolf.”

Triss would have laughed, but she didn’t. Jen wasn’t wrong. There was definitely an appeal to that fantasy. Really spoke to the teenage her, when she was first getting into metal, and thought shit like skulls and witchcraft were ‘bitchin’. Big scary monster scooping her up, holding her with one hand, and fucking her like, like Jen said, a toy? Yeap, the young Beatrice, who'd watched Beauty and the Beast over and over, loved that idea.

"It's pretty hot, yeah. But I don't need some giant beast to get me off." She also really liked the prince the Beast had turned into in the movie. Snuggling up to a ten like that? In a rich castle? Yes please.

"With the arrival of the Uratha and Begotten," Jen said, "I can't help but wonder about it."

Triss shook her head. "Yeah, well, you can go ahead and keep trying to seduce Sándor. He's going to keep pushing you away."

"Yes, I've noticed that." Which Jen loved, no doubt. The harder a man was to get, the more appealing he was. Triss didn't really need that to find a man appealing, but bitches like Jen loved the chase.

"Think drunk Sándor shed any light on that?"

Jen nodded. "He is obviously a terribly broken man. What happened to his family is horrible, but then spending several years a slave to their killers? He hasn't had a chance to heal."

"And ... you think he needs some sexual healing."

Jen kissed her neck again. "It works. Samantha's been enjoying it quite a bit."

Triss expected her to add 'and you too', but she didn't. Nice of her. But it was true, much as Triss used to be against the idea. Yeah, sex was awesome, and she was damn thankful every night she had Jen. The guilty feelings had faded, and now she felt comfortable leaning back and just enjoying Jen's touch on her. And, hey, if she got a peep show of Othello and Madison, or Sam and Jacob, she enjoyed that too.

If she didn't have Jen, that wouldn't have happened. She'd probably still be in her catacomb, miserable, hating everyone and everything. Of course, it wasn't just the sex that helped her. Jen, the others, even Jacob, talking to them helped. But she'd be lying if she didn't say sex from someone she loved went a long way.

But she wasn't going to sleep with some random dude, and Sándor was still kinda in that random dude territory. Still, seeing him get drunk and talk about his dead family? Maybe she shouldn't think of him as 'some guy' anymore. Dude was smoking hot. Dreamy blue eyes in a steel gaze, dark gruff, the buzzed dark hair? No wonder Jen was all over him. And if she wanted to extend some of her sexual healing to him, undoubtedly dragging Triss along for the ride, was that so bad?

And Julias? Arg, knowing him, he wouldn't mind. He'd say something like 'come on Triss, we're vampires. Sex is part of the package. But I know your heart was always mine' or something super cheesy like that.

He'd say? Fuck, one night with the book and knife, and she was already thinking like he was back, or just around the corner.

"How about," Triss said, "you keep trying to seduce Sándor, but I'm pretty sure it'll take a long time. He's onto your tricks."

"Seduction is not a trick. It's an art."

"Yeah ok Miss Daeva. In the mean time, I'm going to keep working on this"—she shook the box—"and try and get my man back."

Jen grinned, but nodded and let go of Triss's shoulders. "If you succeed, I'll happily go back to the way things were."

"Well you were always allowed to sleep with other people, Jen, we told you that. Only thing off the table was sleeping with Julias or me when the other wasn't there."

Her friend frowned. "Yes, but that was then. I ... don't see myself sleeping with anyone unless you're there, Triss."

Triss laughed, and kissed her idiot friend on the cheek. "You know that sounds an awful lot like a romantic relationship?"

Jen gasped. "How dare you."

---

Elen's eyes opened, and she grinned down at Beatrice from her dangling spot over the large, stained bowl. "My book. How wonderful. Be a dear, cut me down, and I'll be on my way." There was one thing Triss could count on when dealing with Elen: woman was too damn gone to plan an escape.

"I'm not letting you go, Elen. When we've resurrected Julias, we can talk about it." She managed to say the R word without wincing this time. "And I'm not letting you down to do whatever you want. For all I know, you could really fuck me up when you got these."

Elen nodded slightly. "Ok deary."

Sighing, Triss held up her hands, and concentrated. Jennifer walked around the cave, lighting the candles, and soon they had their mood lighting.

"Black Blood, I summon you."

They'd done this song and dance plenty by now. Even still, the approaching presence of Black Blood was not something she was ever going to get used to. The unnatural cold, the smothering weight, the creepy blackness, it all seeped and oozed into the cave, and under her skin. Might as well be fucking a graveyard; that sounded metal as hell, but in practice, it was really fucking disturbing.

Slowly, the ooze filled the room, dripping from the ceiling and flowing over their feet, there but not there, like mist. Cold death on the air, with a mind of its own and a form all its own.

“Success I see,” the voice said, bassy rasp filling the cave.

“Success.” Triss flipped through a few pages of the book. A language she couldn’t understand filled the pages, but the pictures gave her a better idea of what was going on. There was a picture of an animal skull, and a ritual circle beside it. Another animal skull, and the same circle beside it, with a few dots on its lines. “I can’t read a damn thing in here.”

“I reckon Malachi can,” Black Blood said.

“You can, I reckon,” Triss said with her thickest Texan accent as she frowned around at the dripping black liquid.

The damn monster chuckled. “Maybe.”

“Maybe?”

“A spirit’s got to have their secrets.”

“But...”

“But if Elen can read it, it’ll be fine. I read what she reads.” The black ooze snuck its way up the sacrifice bowl onto the woman’s feet, then up, under, and over her skirt. The old woman’s veins bulged as the monster forced its way into her body. Her eyes rolled upward as he seeped in through her tear ducts. She shuddered as bits of the black forced its way under her fingernails and up her fingers. When Black Blood finally flowed into her through her mouth, it seemed tame by comparison.

“Can’t you find a better way to do that?” Triss asked.

“Maybe,” Black Blood said, accent gone, replaced with Elen’s sweet, deary grandma sorta accent. Still a big, booming voice though, layered with alien rasps that better belonged on a ghost or something, not an old woman. “But she’s our slave. I don’t like to waste my time.”

What a load of shit. Black Blood loved to waste his time. The fucker might as well have been the god of lounging about, indulging himself his weird hungers. Whatever. Triss unhooked the witch, and sat her in a nearby wooden chair.

“You in control?”

“I am.”

“May I have my book now?” Elen said, the actual Elen. “I haven’t had my book in months. I miss it.”

Triss looked back to Jen. Her friend shrugged, wincing, but gestured back to Elen. Yeah, it was fucking dangerous giving this bitch her tools back, but Black Blood was in control. That wasn’t necessarily any better. Giving the strange spirit the ability to manipulate flesh with all the power of Elen, a witch who’d enslaved a ridiculously powerful Begotten, had performed haruspex on humans, and even created some sort of flesh chamber thing, was a really fucking dangerous idea.

Triss handed the book to Elen, but the old woman’s shaky hands couldn’t handle the weight of it. Groaning, Triss held it for her.

“You need a fucking oxygen tank, too?”

“She would,” Black Blood said, “if she was moving under her own power. Mmm, this is interesting.”

“You can read it?”

“Like I said, she can. And her mind is telling me this is some language not recorded in history. A secret language, used by these flesh witches.”

“Oh god, there’s more than one?”

Elen nodded. “I can’t dig up her memories, not easily. Her brain is a pile of moosh. But some things remain.”

Jennifer stepped in closer. “Like how it is easy to remember a song for years, or decades?”

Elen nodded again, and held out her hand to the pages of the book. “I doubt you’ll learn anything about her coven, but, she can read this book.” A shaky hand slowly turned the page, and Elen hummed appreciatively as she scanned the pages. “Oh my.”

“Do be careful with my book, deary,” regular Elen said. “It took many years to write this.”

If things went well, Triss would have Julias back, and then she’d promptly throw this bitch into a crematorium, along with her book and knife. No need to tell her that, though.

“What’s it say?”

“I see rituals about manipulating flesh,” Black Blood said, “and they are ... almost cliché. There’s talk here about the life energy that binds all things, about the circle of life, and about how it manifests in the world in different forms of life.”

Jennifer groaned. “Any talk of bacteria, viruses, or fungi?”

Triss raised a brow. “Uh, what?”

“This drivel, talk of the web of life that connects all things, rarely ever speaks of where the overwhelming amount of life is.” Jennifer shrugged. “A human’s pathetic attempt to understand a world they’re too stupid to imagine.”

Oh, now she got it. Lots of old literature or ideas about the power of life were utterly oblivious to things like bacteria and viruses. Stupid old people trying to explain their world as best they could.

“Perhaps,” Black Blood said, “but misguided as this witch’s beliefs may be, they still function.”

“Power of belief?” Triss asked.

Black Blood didn’t answer. Maybe he didn’t like the idea of talking about belief, like maybe it was relevant to him. There was an old idea in the Circle of the Crone that gods did actually exist, and that maybe they existed because people believed in them. Very American Gods. But Black Blood was a spirit. Different rules. Right?

Elen turned to the next page. “More, about animals, about the different powers they bring.”

“Tiger testicles for virility?” Jennifer asked, scowling.

“Things of that nature, yes. Bull, horse, rabbit, raven, frog.”

Triss tried to not laugh, but couldn’t help it. “Holy shit. Any mention of a cauldron?”

The two vampires shared a chuckle. Ok yeah, the shit Elen had managed to perform, the crazy rituals and witchcraft she did, it was super impressive. But the book was apparently something ripped straight out of a fairytale, with witches sitting around a cauldron, stirring in frog legs and newt eyes.

Maybe that’s what Elen did, in the old days? Maybe she had a bunch of witches, hiding out in a swamp? A village nearby, with people the witches got to royally fuck over, abduct their children or something, and do their crazy flesh magic on? Silly as the fairytale shit sounded, the original fairytales were fucking nasty stories, full of nasty deaths, and a witch that could use flesh like a painter used paints, fit right in there.

“No cauldron, so far.”

“Well, figure out what she needs to get an actual living, breathing body working. We can probably get her anything she needs, or close. But we ain’t Frankenstein. I don’t have a basement full of crazy technology.”

“I doubt anything in here will require more than the flesh and blood of animals,” Black Blood said as he slowly turned to another page. Animals. That included kine, no doubt.

“This must be an interesting read for you, you old fucker,” Triss said. “You, some weird ass spirit obsessed with the flesh of the dead, corpses, death, and all that shit, and now you’re reading a book that’s completely about life.”

Elen smiled at her. Couldn’t tell if it was BB’s smile, or Elen’s, but again, no response. He, or she, turned the page, and kept on reading.

---

~~Natasha~~

Eight weeks after the incident.

“Are we sure this is ... s-safe?”

Jack shrugged as he reached for the door to Avery’s apartment building. “Probably not.”

“B-But we’re gonna go in anyway?”

Jack nodded, wearing a half smile, and gestured to the air. Natasha almost squeaked as fluttering noises fell on them, but she recovered quickly. It was a normal sight at this point, to see Jack with two crows on his shoulders. Mulder and Scully, his pets, and according to him, his friends. They had helped him in some dire situations. They'd even helped him during the attack on the hunters. At this point, they weren't just pets, and she had to remember that. They were his allies and informants.

Other Ventrue and Gangrels had done similar things, and all Kindred knew to be wary when crows, or rats, or coyotes were nearby. It just wasn't normally done in Dolareido, not in a city that never slept, and was steeped in technology. Cameras were everywhere, from store corners to patrolling drones. Using crows or rats was seen as old school, and ineffective, unless you were a very powerful Kindred and capable of using those elements easily. Viktor did that. Julias did that. Now, Jack did that.

“Jessy's nearby with a few Kindred and thralls for back up. And you know how much shit they'd be in if they attacked me when I'm acting as ambassador.”

Not really an ambassador. Peace keeper and negotiator. But she didn't correct him.

“I know. B-But, I hear about how angry Avery was, for what you did.”

Jack winced. “Well hopefully they've calmed down. I know they've healed up.”

“We have healed,” Brianna said, glaring at them as they came through the doorway. “I don't know how calm we are.”

Jack smiled at her, and nodded, almost like a bow. “Brianna. See Derick or Santos lately?”

She grimaced, and the expression slowly morphed into a frown. “No.”

“Well hopefully I can change that, get everyone cooperating again.”

“Pfft, good luck. And why’s she here?”

“She’s here as my back up, in case someone tries to attack me.” He reached up and stroked the head feathers of one of the crows. “She’ll peck your eyes out, you know.”

Tash giggled, but quickly shut up, doing her best to suppress her smile. That wasn’t the sort of quit witted joke Jack would make. That was the kinda comment Julias would have made. It still hurt, knowing Julias was dead, but it did make her feel good, seeing him in his childe.

“Don’t be a jackass,” Brianna said, also trying to suppress a smile. “I meant Natasha.”

“Natasha’s here for the same reason, but also, the Prince has business with Avery, for what Matthew and Arturo did to Tash.”

“Then she could have come herself.”

Jack shook his head. “You know that isn’t how this works.”

Sighing, Brianna gestured to the stairs. “Yeah, cause your elders are a bunch of pussy bitches. Only one of you with any balls is Garry.”

That was smart of Jack, to not defend Antoinette. The werewolves respected Avery for being the first into the fray, dumb as it was for the general to run in first, but Jack didn’t need to make more enemies here. He was peace keeping, not antagonizing, even if it meant someone insulting his girlfriend. How had the boy matured so much? Antoinette said he was an old soul, but usually that was just how adults insulted someone without actually insulting them. Old soul was synonymous with bitter asshole.

Jack definitely had a cynical side to him people his age usually didn't have, but there was more to it than that. A little Julius in him, to soften how scathing his personality could be, maybe.

Tash and Jack walked up the stairs of the crummy old building, and Tash looked around with each step. Such a beat-up old building. But the werewolves were comfortable here; Art and Matt had told her repeatedly. They weren't comfortable in the city. Even Clara and Carter, who'd taken up the Invictus offer on living in expensive apartments until the incident, had told Matt and Art that they didn't like it. None of them were comfortable in the middle of the city, except Eric.

Maybe that was why Eric could handle himself when transformed, in a circumstance the others thought too dangerous? City werewolf?

Jack knocked on Avery's door.

"Get in here already," a voice called from the other side.

Jack sighed, and looked at Tash; so did the crows. Tash nodded, resolute. She could do this.

They went in, Brianna behind them, and the werewolf closed the door once they were in the apartment.

"Hello," Jack said, nodding to the group as Brianna passed them to join her pack.

"Yeah, hello," Avery said between clenched teeth, leaning back against the furthest wall, worn couch between them. "Why the birds?"

Clara stood beside her, arms folded, and she managed to look at Jack for a half second before looking elsewhere. Tash did the same thing, when her eyes met Matt and Art's.

"Scully and Mulder are my friends, and they notice things I don't sometimes." Jack stepped further into the room, and used a subtle little finger gesture to invite Tash to follow him. Being the center of attention of twelve werewolves was not something she wanted to do, but this was important. And if she didn't deliver the order, Antoinette would do it herself, and it would not surprise Tash if that ended up with someone dying.

"Well," Avery said, "spit it out. How much are we fucked, for trying to save everyone's asses?"

"You're not fucked, Avery. This isn't Tijuana. The Kindred here aren't your enemy. And whatever you think Maria's up to, you're wrong about it, for a bunch of reasons. Go near her again and it won't go well for you. But," he put up his hands before any of them could say anything, "I'm not here to threaten you guys. I'm here because Antoinette isn't kicking you out."

Avery snorted. If they were outside, she'd likely have spit on the floor.

"Why? I'm sure Maria and Michael want us gone."

"Much as my boss would like otherwise, the Invictus don't own the city. Antoinette does. You guys did good work, dealing with that first azlu, and she knows it. She also recognizes that there's something up in Dolareido, something going on. It's not Maria, despite what you may think, but there is something going on."

Natasha nodded. "I've been t-tasked with ... finding out what I can. I'm sure it's not Maria."

"How are you sure?" Clara said.

“Because I’ve t-talked to her. I ... I know her, well enough to know she wouldn’t do this.” Before anyone else could argue, she put up a hand. “B-But, something is going on, and I’m going to find out what. And to ... to do that, the P-Prince has ordered that Matthew and Arturo help.”

Every wolf in the room looked at the two men. They both squirmed, looked at each other, at Jack, avoided looking at Tash, and looked to Avery.

“And if I say no?” Avery asked.

Jack held out a hand and started counting on his fingers. “Without the permission of the Prince, you attacked one of the Primogen. You’re not too stupid to realize that Garry is now pushing on the Invictus because of the damage you caused giving him an opening.”

“That wasn’t—”

“But worse than that, Matthew and Arturo staked one of the Prince’s students, and fellow dragon.” Wow, he really did sound like Viktor when he got bossy. “So, the two responsible, will be doing the dragons a favor. Reparations. It’ll probably be dangerous, but too bad. Until Natasha says otherwise, Matthew and Arturo will be taking her in and out of the Hisil as she wishes, and front lining any efforts she makes where bodies are needed. Barring apocalyptic circumstances, they’ll be hers to use as she sees fit for the foreseeable future, until this hidden presence issue is resolved.”

The two boys blinked at Jack, before finally looking at Tash. She did her best professional face, nodding slightly, and hopefully conveying that she wouldn’t abuse this. She could, if she wanted. The dragons would love to get their hands on a willing Uratha to do experiments on, or maybe monitor how they managed to jump between worlds, so they could someday emulate it. If they agreed, she could force them to do stuff like that. But she wouldn't. They had to know that already. They trusted her. Didn't they?

Avery shook her head. "Fuck that. You think I'd trust the Ordo for a second? This city ain't that far off from Tijuana, Jack. I'm not trusting any vamp with the lives of my—"

"I'll do it," Matt and Art said, at the same time.

Natasha tried to suppress her smile. She failed.

Avery didn't suppress her scowl, though. She stepped between the boys and Jack, and jabbed a finger into their chests. "I don't care how guilty you two feel about this. You know what happens when the Gauntlet fails? We didn't do anything wrong. We followed the trail, followed the evidence, and I made a call."

"I get that, boss," Art said. "And we all went in on your side. But you found a new tear since Maria's been sleeping in a box for the past near two months."

Natasha raised her eyes to the woman and glared at the back of her head. She found something, new evidence, to suggest Maria wasn't the problem, and she hadn't told them? A glance Jack's way showed he was thinking the same thing. What a bitch.

"That doesn't prove anything. And even if it does, I'm not losing two more of my pack to vampires. Not again."

Again. Jack and Tash looked at each other in the corners of their eyes. One minute, it was super easy to hate Avery for being an impulsive bitch. The next, it was easy to empathize with her. So many things had gone wrong for her in the past because of vampires. Getting her to trust them would take forever.

Matt shook his head. "I trust Natasha, Avery. And not just because we're ... were dating. I trust her, completely."

Art nodded. “We should do this.”

“I don’t want you to do this.” Avery folded her arms across her chest, and tapped her foot on the floor. “I told you what happened after Simon. And you fucking know what happened in Tijuana, you were there. You can’t just ... blindly trust a vampire cause you fucked her.”

The boys looked at each other, before they looked down at Avery, frowned, and stepped around her. Natasha’s dead heart would have skipped a beat if she was Blushing Life. Matthew took her right, Arturo took her left, and they both looked down at her with smiles. Then they looked back to their boss, frowning.

“We’re trusting her,” Art said, “because she’s smart as fuck, smarter than me, and smarter than you. We shouldn’t have done what we did to her.”

Avery turned and growled. “I gave her a chance to prove Maria’s innocence.”

“We didn’t even tell her when we were going in!” Growling right back, Art shook his head. “We ran in, guns blazing, when we should have worked with her to make sure what we were doing was the right thing!”

Oh god, it was happening. They were defending her against their boss, their pack’s leader. They were—wait. Matt looked down at Jack while Art talked, and the two traded quick smiles. They’d ... talked to each other, at some point. When? Why?

Avery threw her hands up. “We needed to surprise her! If Maria knew we were coming, she could have covered up everything, hid her tracks!”

Matt shook his head this time. “It doesn’t matter. If this is what the Prince wants, we should do it. I trust Tash to do right by us, by all of us.”

Tash beamed up at the two men, but when Avery looked straight at her, she shrunk in place. The woman walked up to her, and short as Avery was, she was a good deal taller than Natasha, and she glowered down at her like she wanted to kill her. She probably did. But Jack was right beside her, and the woman glanced at him between her murderous glares.

“If you hurt my boys,” Avery said, venom in her voice palpable, “I’ll kill you. Get me?”

Her boys? Natasha frowned at her, but bit her tongue. She wanted to say something argumentative, like they were Tash’s boys, not Avery’s. But the room was already a pressure cooker.

“I w-won’t hurt them. But they will be taking me into the Hisil when I n-need to go.” She stood her ground as best she could against the pack leader, but there was no denying Avery was a powerful individual. Strong physically, but really strong in charisma, personality, confidence, and all the things that made a good leader. And easy as it was to think Avery was stupid, she wasn’t. No wonder it was hard for Matt and Art to go against her. A look around showed the pack all listened to Avery, and the more the woman spoke, the more they looked at Natasha like she was the enemy.

Jack shook his head. “She’s the nicest vampire in the whole damn city, Avery. Let it go.” He stepped past her, and looked to the other werewolves. “Again, understand that you crossed a line when you attacked Maria, and it’s only because of specific circumstances that the Prince doesn’t intervene. Attacking Natasha, on the other hand, was inexcusable. Matthew and Arturo will be repaying that debt.

“That’s not the only reason I’m here though. Garry’s on the warpath, and you wolves are partly to blame for that. Did he ask you to attack Maria?” He looked back over his shoulder at Avery, who stood between him and Natasha.

Avery sighed, shook her head, and rejoined Clara at the back wall. “I’m not squealing on Garry, Jack. Maybe he asked, maybe he didn’t.”

“Did he help you attack Maria? Give you information?”

Avery raised a brow. “Didn’t you hear me? I’m not saying shit about Garry. Only friend I have in the whole damn city.”

Jack frowned. Judging by the muscles Tash could see in his neck, he almost growled.

“I’m trying to be your friend.”

“You almost killed me. You almost killed Clara.”

“That wasn’t me! That was...” Jack clenched his jaw until Tash heard his teeth grind. “I’m sorry about what happened. I’m doing everything I can to get rid of this curse. I don’t want it. And I...” Jack looked at Clara. She met his gaze, and didn’t look away. But, she looked ... crestfallen, and she rubbed one of her arms as the two looked at each other.

Avery snorted. “Never heard of a vampire being sorry.”

“Come on, guys. This is me. Remember when that first azlu attacked? I could have left you to die to the second one. I jumped back in.” Jack turned around and looked at the werewolves standing in the kitchen. “Remember when you guys tried to kill Fiona, thinking she was an azlu? I smoothed that out with Azamel.”

“How about,” Clara said, “when you asked me to help you deal with the hunters, and I did?” Jack froze, and stared at her. Everyone stared at her. Clara sighed and shook her head. “Sorry, I didn’t mean ... I just meant that we’ve been through hell together, but you’re damn quick to say we’re the problem.”

Sighing, Jack took a step back, toward Natasha. “That’s not what I’m trying to ... Look, you guys aren’t a problem, ok? But this is a vampire city, and you’re guests. Work with me, alright?” He stood up straight and clenched his jaw again. “I came here for two reasons. Did the first,” he gestured to Art and Matt, “and the second, is simple. Stay out of the fight, okay? The Invictus and the Carthians have to work this out, and it’s going to get worse before it gets better. Keep your heads low, don’t get involved, and we have no problem.”

Avery snarled, but nodded. “Fine. We’ll stay out of the way, if you keep the fight out of our path.”

“Path?”

“We’re not done this hunt. Like the boys said, we found a new tear, and there’s a chance Maria didn’t create this one. Don’t get in my way, and we won’t have any problems. Got it?”

Even now, despite obviously being in the weaker negotiating position, Avery spoke like she was in control. Woman was so damn stubborn. But, the more Tash saw of her, the more it was becoming apparent how Avery worked. She was stubborn, because she had to be.

Jack managed a half frown, half smile. “Deal.”

She smiled up at Matt and Art. The three of them stood on a roof top, one of the massive apartment buildings in the entertainment district. Even up here, the night sky was washed out from all the lights. No stars. She didn’t mind. She was happy.

“Blows my mind sometimes,” Art said, looking up. “Eric lives here, has lived here his whole life, and to him, not being able to see the stars is normal.”

Matt nodded. “He’s a new breed.” The two of them were leaned against the door they exited to get up here, and Tash stood in front of them, smiling.

“You two stood up t-to Avery.”

Art sighed, nodding, and scratched the back of his neck. “It wasn’t really about standing up to her.”

Matt nodded again. “It was more about, that ... that we...”

“We were morons. We shouldn’t have jumped the gun like that. We shouldn’t have stopped you from coming. We shouldn’t have—”

“We shouldn’t have done this without talking to you. We knew you thought Maria was innocent, and you might get in the way, and —”

“We didn’t want you to get hurt. But we shouldn’t have made that decision for you, and we shouldn’t have—

“We shouldn’t have thought that we couldn’t stay in the relationship, and do what Avery wanted us to do. We should have talked to you, explained things, and—”

“We shouldn’t have given up on us, and betray you like that. Betrayed us, like that.”

Us. She folded her arms across her chest, and did her best to look like she was an angry teacher, tapping her foot on the rooftop. It took a mountain of willpower to keep from smiling. “And you shouldn’t have st-staked me. That hurt.”

“We know!” They both said, throwing up their hands.

“That was horrible,” Art said, “and it’s my mistake. Matt argued, but I convinced him after the fact, and—”

“I let it happen, and then we just set you on the bed and left, and we thought for sure that—”

“The relationship was over, cause we knew we crossed a line. We shouldn’t have. We didn’t think. We’re—”

“Morons. Absolute morons. We didn’t want you to get hurt, and —”

She put up a hand, and sighed as she smiled. She couldn’t help it anymore. “You know I’m not going to b-be ... lenient, right? You agreed t-to do this, which means when I tell you to do something — about my goals — that you have to do them? If I want to go into the Hisil, you have t-to take me.” The boys winced, but they nodded. “And you have to trust that I know what I’m doing, w-when we’re there. You’re not allowed to stop me.”

“We do,” Art said. “We do. I ... staked you, because I knew you’d get involved, and—”

“And didn’t w-want to see me hurt.” She glared up at him. Getting staked hurt, but ultimately, it was an effective way of keeping her out of harm’s way. It only took a single night to recover from it, and they knew that. Still...

Matt nodded. “Avery can get pretty scary when she’s transformed. And Maria ... We knew things were gonna get bad.”

Art winced even more, looking away. “And it’s more than that. It’s because you’re too much of a threat, Tash, and Avery knows that.”

She raised a brow. “I’m n-not that strong.”

Art shook his head. “Bullshit. You’re damn fast, as fast as that Damien guy, and he fucked us up pretty good. If it’d been one-on-one, Damien would have had us with his silver. And you could have done the same. Avery couldn’t have that.”

Sighing, she came close, and pet them both on their chests. “And now, you know you ... you sh-should have talked to me, right?”

They both nodded. She almost made a quip about how they looked like two dogs, nodding in sync for their master. Probably a bad time to say that. And it made her feel a little bad. She didn’t want them to think of her like some sort of master giving orders. Though, that was basically what she’d be, until the weird stuff happening in Dolareido was dealt with.

And now, it was time for the big word, the word she was terrified to say, the word she knew she had to say. Especially after seeing them go up against their leader, for her. God, it scared her, scared her so fucking much, but she had to say it, had to get it out before it tore her up anymore.

“And you know ... know that I love you t-two, right? And ... that’s why it hurt so much?”

She couldn’t have hurt them more if she’d tagged them both in the crotch with a silver crowbar. She didn’t mean to! Just, it was the truth, and it had to be said.

There went her dreamy fantasies of a proper love confession after an epic battle, or lengthy session of lovemaking.

After a few moments, both boys squatted down; couldn’t squat very well in jeans, but they managed, weight on the balls of their toes instead.

“I love you, too,” Art said, and he took her right hand in his.

“I love you, too,” Matt said, and he took her left hand in his.

She sniffled. Not like she needed to sniffle, not Blushing Life, but she did anyway, and her hands shook a little too.

“R-Really?”

“Really,” they said together.

She gulped, and came in closer. Before she knew it, they had their arms around her, and she let them. Pain, gone. Terror, vanished. Oh god, it was really happening.

“Jack,” Art continued. “He visited, a week ago. Kinda dropped some truth bombs on us. Kid can be a real asshole, but, he’s good at cutting through the bullshit and getting to the truth of things.”

Was that all it took? For someone blunt to talk to them? No. They didn’t give Jack the credit he was due. If the man told them something harsh and scathing, it’s because he knew it was the only way to make things work. He was a lot better at the job the Prince had given him than he realized. Julias had taught him well.

“I’m glad he d-d-did.”

Glad, so very very glad. Part of her knew she should be angrier, that she shouldn’t give in so easily, but she just didn’t have it in her. Maybe that was sad. Maybe it was pathetic, and Antoinette would scold her for not being more stern. She didn’t care. Being in their arms again, feeling their chests against her, feeling their warmth around her, it filled her with butterflies.

Cozy. Safe. Warm. With these two idiots she loved.

Love. Jessy called it the L word, like it was something naughty, despite how much she was in love with Eric. When Jessy had told her she and Eric had said the ‘L word’ to each other, it took Tash a second to figure out what she meant, but the unending joy pouring out of her gave it away. And it hadn’t stopped. Now Tash could understand why.

With both guys squatting down on their toes, she was taller than them, making it easy to kiss one, and then the other.

“He also kinda spoiled things for us,” Matt said.

“Spoiled?”

Art nodded, kissing her on the cheek. “He told us you loved us. And basically figured out that we love you, too.”

She laughed. “That ... d-does kinda spoil the surprise. Well, thank you, for letting me s-say it without knowing.”

“Thanks,” Matt said, “for giving us a second chance.”

Art shook his head. “But, you have to know, we’re not against what Avery did either, about Maria I mean. Avery’s never steered us wrong, and she’s been hunting for longer than any of us. We did what she wanted because we believe in her, and ... and we still do, you know? What we did to you was stupid and wrong and horrible, but ... but it’s gonna take some serious work to convince us she’s wrong. We owe Avery that much.”

Sighing, she leaned into Art and rested her forehead down against his. “I was angry at m-myself too, you know? I couldn’t blame you completely. If the situation had been ... r-reversed...” She might have done the same thing. Maybe not stake them; they weren’t vampires. If she had to take them out of the equation, she’d find another way, involving either distraction, or maybe tricking them into Antoinette’s cell meant to hold monsters. She liked to tell herself she’d have talked to them instead, but maybe she wouldn’t have.

Speaking of cells.

“And I’m sorry, for leaving you locked up in the P-Prince’s cell, for a few days.”

Matt shrugged. “Doesn’t even ... It doesn’t matter. Really.” He kissed her cheek again. And then her neck.

Every inch of her wanted to melt into their arms. Not even Blushing Life, and she could feel tingles working through her. Every breath, she could smell them, scents she’d long started to associate with comfort and joy and bliss. The powerful beats of their hearts, the hardness of their muscles, even Matt’s damn whiskers. She melted into a sea of memories.

Sighing, she put a hand on Matt’s forehead, and gently pushed him back.

“Not ... n-not right now. We have stuff to do.” Self control! Success.

“You want to get to work tonight?”

She nodded. “Yes. Important things are happening, but everyone’s so focused on the C-Carthians and the Invictus, n-no one sees it.” Sighing again, she leaned forward, gave each of them a long, proper kiss, and stepped out of their warm embrace. Her insides screamed at her to get back in there, hug them, maybe Kiss them, maybe more, but no. She had a job to do.

Art frowned. “Into the Hisil?”

She met his frown, and nodded. “Into the Hisil. Is there a p-problem with that?” The boys blinked, and shook their heads. “Good. This deal isn’t just to p-placate the Ordo. I have a job to do, and you two are going to help me d-do it. Understand? If I say jump, you say how high.”

They both groaned, obviously disliking the idea of her going into danger, but they nodded eventually.

“Yes mistress,” Art said.

“Yes mistress,” Matt said.

She tried to keep a stern face, but she couldn't. Giggling, she hugged them again, and kissed them both again. Mistress? She kinda liked the sound of that.

Antoinette probably loved it, too, being called by her Prince title, or maybe even other things, like mistress, or queen? She could ask later, and she knew the Prince would tell her, in vivid detail.

Not now, focus.

---

~~Jack~~

“Mary, you there?” Nothing. The darkness said nothing.

Jack sighed, and walked through his old home, admiring the couches and the memories they sparked. If torpor ever wiped his mind of those memories, he'd feel sad. Hell, sad wasn't a strong enough word. Destroyed? Wrecked, ruined? Or would he just, not care? Antoinette had no memories left from her time as kine, but she didn't let it stop her.

But, after a few hundred intimate conversations with the woman of his dreams, it'd become apparent that the Antoinette from five hundred years ago, was dead. Whoever Antoinette was now, wise, intelligent, and self aware to the point of surrealism, she hadn't been that person back then. Whatever gave her her unusual body, probably experiments she performed on herself using the Coils according to her, that was just the tip of the iceberg for how different a person she was now. How much would Jack change as the years went by, and he had to go into deep torpors?

He ran a finger along a wall, and moved upstairs. Downstairs, the place had been repaired by some Invictus cleaners during the day when Mary wouldn't bother them. But he wasn't here to watch TV. Upstairs, the hallway pressed down on him, dark, and cold.

The cold only grew when he opened his sister's bedroom door.

"Mary. It's Jack. I wanted to talk." Again, silence. But the cold, the shadows that fell on him like a lead blanket, the mist that coated the floor, he knew she was here.

He stood at her vanity desk, admiring the jewelry, none of it particularly expensive. Mary didn't care about expensive, she just liked colorful things. She'd sooner wear bright green socks with cartoon frogs drawn on them, than pantyhose or whatever. And pink earrings with little words on them, like 'love'. But she had some other things too, more subtle stuff like silver and gold bracelets and necklaces, thin and quiet. His mom's new necklace was from this desk.

"You always loved to touch my stuff," the darkness said.

Jack smiled, and turned around. He'd felt her coming, like a deathly cold breeze that bit the skin. It was hard to see in the shadows, but movement came from above, swirling mists that betrayed the shape of a woman's face. She was mostly in the ceiling, but her head came through, and she looked at him with empty eyes.

"I was a kid. Just thought my older sister's stuff was shiny."

"You ate one of my earrings, once."

"I did? Wait, you didn't get your ears pierced when you were young enough for me to do that."

His sister lowered herself a little more, exposing her shoulders from the white ceiling.

“It was a clip-on.”

“Ah, right. I can’t remember.”

“You were three.”

“Well I don’t think anyone should be held accountable for what they do when they’re three.”

Mary smiled. Not a creepy, scary smile. A normal girl’s smile. Her eyes didn’t look nearly as large either; he couldn’t see into her skull. She floated down out of the ceiling, but stayed up high as she hovered around, like a fish near the surface of the water.

“You don’t visit often,” she said.

Jack sighed, and sat on her bed. “Mom visits you a lot.”

“She does. I like it. It’s like ... like nothing’s changed.”

He raised a brow. “Um, what?”

“When you disappeared, Mom and I got close. We talked often. You weren’t around. It’s like that.”

Muscles clenched in his jaw, and he took a deep, useless breath. She was very lucid; probably cause of his mom, talking to her all the time. A lucid ghost was easier to talk to, but it also meant she could think reasonably, come to conclusions she couldn’t otherwise, and might freak out over something not obvious. It’d almost be easier to deal with her if she was insane.

“I’m sorry.”

“Don’t be. It’s ok. I’m dead. You shouldn’t spend all your time with dead people.”

“Technically I’m undead. Vampire. So, you know, it’s kind of a gray area.”

She laughed, a weird, raspy sound. “You shouldn’t worry about me, Jack. I’ll be fine.”

He was, and wasn’t worried about her. She was dead, and she made a good point that he shouldn’t be spending his time with dead people. But she wasn’t gone yet.

“I’m worried about Mom, more than you.”

She nodded. “Me too.”

“She been telling you much?”

Mary nodded, and slowly lowered herself down to sit beside him. It took a lot of effort to not shift away from her. This close, he could feel the unnatural coldness, and the unnatural death. Like, as if someone had given a cemetery the ability to speak.

“She’s told me a lot. Apparently she’s dating a vampire named Jacob?”

“Ugh, don’t remind me.”

The ghost giggled. More of that raspy noise. “She told me you don’t like Jacob.”

“Jacob is dangerous. He’s old as dirt, and—”

“Isn’t your girlfriend the same age?”

“Yeah, but that’s different!” He threw up his hands. “Antoinette isn’t a creep.”

Mary laughed harder. Now, the laugh was definitely inhuman, both raspy, and strangely paced, exaggerated and weird. Eerie.

“I’m ... happy, that Mom and you are getting to have so much fun.”

“I know, I know. Mom’s told me about all the bad things that have happened. But, it’s still a lot of good things. Even all the sexy things.”

Jack groaned and rubbed his face with his palms. “Please tell me Mom isn’t sharing all the details of our sex lives with you.”

“Not the details. She’s my mom,” she said. He scrunched up his eyes nose as he eyed her suspiciously. She laughed. “She did tell me you’re a pretty lucky guy.”

“Lucky? Cause—”

“Of all the women.”

He rolled his eyes. “I mean, I guess.”

“You guess? Two tall, busty super models, two ballerinas, and now you’re making your own harem.”

“D-Did Mom tell you it’s a harem? It’s not a harem! They’re going to take care of my property, and they’ll be trained in weapons and ... stuff...”

Mary giggled some more. Yeah, it was a strange sound, but it probably wouldn’t sound so bad if he got used to it. With his mom visiting all the time, she was probably very used to it.

“I remember when you used to be so awkward around people.”

He shrugged. “Still am.”

“Not what Mom says. She says you’ve gotten very good at talking to people.”

“Talking to people is a skill. I’ve always been good at it, but it’s draining as fuck. Nothing natural or fun about it for me. Just ... these days, I don’t have a choice, so I guess yeah, I look less awkward to her.”

“Can’t be too draining, if you seduced four women.”

He threw up his hands, again. “That is not what happened!”

Giggling some more, she floated off the bed, and drifted around the room over to her closet. With a swipe of her hand, like she was pushing back against a tidal wave, the closet door opened with a loud thunk, hard enough to make Jack almost jump.

“Sorry. Hard to ... to do things gently. Hmm, all these clothes, and I can’t wear any of them.” She moved into the closet, and floated through the clothes. They didn’t move.

“Mary, I wanted to talk about ... about that thing, that you told Antoinette.”

The ghost snapped her head, glaring at him, before her body disappeared in the closet. Shadows fell on it, like a waterfall of darkness contained within, with only her head sticking out from its falling black.

“The thing that comes from the dark?”

The ghost nodded. Her motions weren’t smooth anymore, snapping like breaking branches.

He went on. “And you think this thing is what’s tearing up ... the world, here in Dolareido?”

She nodded again, eyes going wide, inhumanely wide. Panic mode.

“It is! It’s there. It’s tearing at things, at the seams. I can see other worlds, bleeding in, and this world, bleeding out! It’s ... it’s like staring into a crack from a barely open door, and getting a peek at things beyond.”

He managed a weak smile. The Shadow Realm, the dream realms, the Great Below or whatever it was, so many places out there that the physical world was sealed off from, and sealed off for a reason. Might as well call it an apocalypse, if the worlds started opening those cracked doors wide for each other.

“I’m here to talk about it.”

“I don’t want to talk about it! It’s out there. It might be listening.”

Jack leaned forward, and whispered. “You’re right. I’ve been hunting this thing for a while now, Mary. I don’t have proof, but I have a sneaking suspicion I know who’s causing these tears.”

“Who? Who who who? It can’t be a who! Has to be an it! It.”

Well, she was right about that. “I don’t disagree. But it, he, goes by the name Black Blood, and he likes to pretend he’s a he. Been using a Southern accent lately, but it’s not something he ... it, just has. He picked it.”

“I’ve never talked to it!” Her voice was piercing, but quiet. No one outside would hear them, but Jack could feel the shrieking sound cut through his brain. “It’s ... it’s darkness. It sneaks through the streets, and I can’t ... see it.”

“Can’t see it?”

“I can, but I can’t.” She lowered herself to the floor, body disappearing into the mist and shadow, so all he could see was wisps of flowing movement. “It’s sneaky. It drips around ... everything, like shadow.”

That sounded a lot like Black Blood, or at least the form he used when moving around. Jack had seen the giant skeleton that seemed to be his true form, and so had others, but that didn’t seem to be what he usually used.

“I’ve been trying to figure out what he’s up to, Mary. But I don’t even know if it is Black Blood.” Though at this point, it’d be stupid to not consider the spirit monster to be the most likely culprit. “Is there anything else you can tell me?”

She shook her head frantically.

He put up his hands. “That’s ok. It’s still a great help, knowing that you can sorta see this thing, and that you think it’s responsible for the tears.”

Her eyes shrank back to a more normal size, and the jittery motions settled. “Be careful Jack. Whatever it is, it’s ... it’s cold. Colder than me.”

He winced. Even without eyes, the fear on her face was blatant. A terrified ghost was a freaky image.

“Jack,” she said after a time, “do you know a Sabrina?”

Oh shit.

“Sabrina? You’ve met a Sabrina? When?”

“Last night.”

Oh shit oh shit.

“You mean, a woman came into the house?”

“No. She ... she came up from the ground, from the floor, from below. She said she was drawn here, following a trail. She asked if I knew you.”

He groaned hard enough his voice tore up. “Did you tell her anything?”

“No! She scared me. She pushed into my home, without my permission, so I pushed her out. It’s my home. Mine!”

“Good, good. Don’t let her in.”

“Who is she?”

He opened his mouth, and closed it. Tell his sister? It could be a mistake. She wasn’t stable, by any means, and if he told her something there was always the chance she’d repeat it to someone else in a fit of madness.

“It’s complicated. But she’s very dangerous, even for ghosts. Especially for ghosts. Don’t let her in. I met her in a ... strange place, somewhere beneath us, but not really. She ... helped me.”

“If she helped you, then—”

“Don’t, ok? Don’t let her in, and don’t talk to her. I saw her do things to ghosts, Mary, other ghosts, and it was horrific. Don’t let her in.” He rubbed his arms as he looked around. If Mary could defend her home from other ghosts, that was great. But Sabrina not being stuck in the Great Below was bad, bad for him, bad for everyone. She thought he was her friend, because he was Viktor’s grandchilde. If she ever found out what he did, the psycho would probably creep through every wall, through the Prince's defenses, and cut his head off while he slept.

Could ghosts move around in the day? Could they enter any house uninvited? Could a ghost just, wander around? No, no way. There had to be limitations.

And he wasn't going to use his sister to learn more about those limitations. Much as he loved Antoinette, and he knew she'd love an opportunity to perform experiments on a ghost, he wouldn't let it happen. Not to Mary. Even if Antoinette said it might keep her around longer, to persuade his mom, he wouldn't let it happen. This had to stop.

"Mary. Do you ever think about leaving? About crossing over."

Slowly, she hovered out of the mist, and sat beside him again. He'd expected her to freak out, maybe throw him around, but she didn't. She sat there, half sitting, half hovering, head aimed down, and shivered.

"I can't leave yet, not until Mom is safe."

"She's never going to be safe, Mary. She wasn't safe when she was alive. Now she's a vampire, and it's not a safe second life. But she's got a great sire, the best vampire in the whole city, to take care of her."

"And you?"

"I'll be taking care of her, too."

The ghostly image of his sister smiled, but she turned her head and her hair hid her face. "It's not the same. This thing out there, it's not the same! It's dangerous. It's dangerous. It's dangerous."

“Ok, ok.” He put up a hand, and tried to touch her shoulder. Nothing but unnatural cold greeted him. “But what about after? You can’t be happy here, stuck inside this empty house.”

“I—” She stopped herself, and shook her head. “It’s fine. It’s ok. It’s ok. I can handle it.”

“For how long, Mary?” He leaned forward, elbows on his knees, and tried to see past her hair to her face. “I mean, christ, I said my goodbyes, to your corpse.” It hurt, saying the word. Cut his tongue like barbed wire. He said it anyway. “This isn’t good for anyone. You died, and it’s horrible, but it’s tearing Mom apart seeing you.”

“I’m going to protect her!”

“For how long, Mary? It could be years, decades, hell even centuries before we find out about this thing. I don’t know much about ghosts, but I bet being ... what you are, will start doing things to you, Mary. You’re going to hurt someone.” Barbed wire, meet serrated blade.

She snapped her head at him, an instant motion, and he jumped back as her eyes, empty and massive, glared into him.

“As long as it takes!”

The room exploded in mist and wind, and Jack had to raise a hand to stop trinkets, trapped in the sudden tornado, from smashing into his face. But before he could say anything, try and calm his sister down, she vanished.

Groaning, he got up, and got to work cleaning the mess.

---

He stood on top of the Tanvar building, binoculars in hand, and he scanned the rooftops. Mulder and Scully were out there, and out here in North Side, it was dark enough they were more or less invisible against the night sky.

“See anything?” Ryan asked.

“Nope.” He handed the binoculars back.

Ryan Templeman. Ancilla, Mekhet, and accomplished Invictus. Indian, far as Jack could tell, with dark hair a few inches long, and a trim beard. No accent. He was older than Damien, but by this point, everyone knew Damien was the faster fighter, especially considering he'd been training with the sheriff. Still, Ryan was a powerful Kindred, and more than capable of taking on some Carthians if it came to it. He was also great at keeping people hidden in the Cloak of Night, hence, Jack's request to have him here.

He poked up his head up from behind the concrete, raised edge of the rooftop, and scanned as well. “I see crows, but that's it.”

Jack nodded, knelt behind the edge. “Mulder and Scully are smart enough to know if any of their friends are behaving oddly. And the other crows like them.”

Jessy chuckled, lying on her back on a blanket and looking up at the sky. “All hail the Crow Lord.”

“I'm not the Crow Lord, or whatever.”

She laughed and shook her head. “Yeah you are. I was connecting with a crow just yesterday, dude, and they told me about the Crow Lord.”

“Told you?”

“Well, you know, communicated.” Crows didn't communicate with words, even when using Animalism. Shared scents, images, noises, but no actual sentences. “Kept giving me impressions of some dude with two crows on his shoulders, with an army of crows and rodents around him. And you had this huge ... presence, ya know? Pretty sure every crow and rat in the city knows about you in some way.”

He groaned and hit his forehead against the concrete. “I’ve gotten thousands of them killed.”

“Yeah well, you’re a vampire. You’re so far up the food chain, they look at you like you’re a god or something.”

“Other Kindred can use Animalism, too.”

Jessy laughed again, and started texting on her phone. “Not like you, they can’t.”

“It’s true,” Ryan said. “We’ve all seen the videos of what happened at the hospital. And there’s lots of rumors about what you did to the hunters, and then the werewolves. Did you ... really use rats as a living shield?”

Jack slowly turned his head and glared at Ryan. Ryan was smart enough to keep his eyes in the binoculars and scouting the horizon, but the silence probably tipped him off that Jack was staring at him. He inched away.

Tempting, to tell Ryan it wasn’t Jack doing that shit, it was the curse. But the reputation was a valuable tool. If people thought Jack and the Ripper were basically a team, it made it easier for him to get people to listen to him. It’s what Antoinette would do, much as it grated on Jack to be dishonest. A lie of omission, one of the worst kinds.

“Jessy,” Jack said eventually, “I don’t suppose you can just ... bark loudly, and make Garry throw his troops at us directly?”

“The fuck? I ain’t no dog.”

“Gangrel. Close enough.”

She rolled over, punched him in the leg, then rolled onto her back again and resumed texting. “Don’t make me kick your ass.”

Jack smiled. It was the reaction he wanted, and enough to make Ryan smile. Good. The more Jack could convince the other Invictus that, yeah sure he was crazy strong, but also not a Viktor 2.0, the better. He didn’t want people working for him cause they feared him. That sorta shit backfired, if history was any indicator. No, he wanted Kindred willing to do what he said cause they were on his side.

“Besides,” Jessy continued, “you’re the horny dog fucking five chicks every night. I mean, look at this.” She pointed the phone at him, showing a video of Jack doing exactly what she said.

The sound of groans and moans forced Ryan to lower his binoculars and look at Jessy, and the phone. He raised a brow, looked at Jack, and then back at the phone.

“Alright, I get it I get it. Sorry,” Jack said, kicking Jessy in the foot.

She snickered as she turned the phone back and returned to whatever she was texting.

“I’ve ... never seen the Prince naked,” Ryan said. “Wearing very little at the balls, sure, but never nude. Or, you know, doing that. Wow.”

“I know, right?” Jessy said. “The fuck did she do to get that body? Super tall, hips of a goddess, tits the size of mountains, and there’s the reddish eyes and white hair. Like, how?”

Ryan looked between Jack and Jessy, feeling for the atmosphere. After a few seconds, he laughed, and scanned the horizon some more. “She is a dragon, and one of the oldest in the world probably.

I can't even begin to imagine the sorts of experiments she's done with those Coils."

"You know much about the Ordo?" Jack asked.

"A bit. A lover of mine was a dragon, in a different city. But it didn't work out. She's still there, I'm not." He shrugged.

"What happened?" Jessy asked, with all the subtlety of a wrecking ball.

"Dragons are a secretive bunch. More secretive than the Invictus, as Mister Terry probably knows all too well."

"Yep." He gave up on trying to learn anything meaningful about the Ordo Dracul from Antoinette long ago.

"Well, some of the experiments she'd been performing were a little ... reckless. I didn't agree with using Kindred as subjects."

Jack and Jessy shivered. Doing nasty experiments on kine was horrible, but Kindred were much more resilient. That was good and bad, cause it meant you could literally cut open a Kindred's body and start removing parts, and they'd live. No end to the torment. A particularly cruel dragon could capture a Kindred they hated, lock them up, force feed them, and do all sorts of wicked things.

"But the Prince," Ryan continued, "doesn't seem the sort. Then again, what do I know."

Wincing, Jack nodded. "Dolareido is pretty tame compared to other Kindred cities. Hell, Xnomina's hands aren't nearly as bloody as they could be. I—"

Screeching tires broke the relative silence of North Side. And not long after that, gunfire.

“A drive by?” Jessy said, jumping to her feet. “Seriously?”

“Probably just testing our defenses,” Jack said. “Ryan, suppressing fire. Jessy, get down there and get physical. Scare them off. I’ll play my hand if I have to, but only if I have to.” He pulled his radio off his hip. “How many?”

Hella’s voice screamed back through the hand radio over gunfire. “Three cars, at least a dozen thralls.”

“No vamps?”

“Two, in the cars. They’re not getting out.”

“Don’t stick your heads out. I don’t want them knowing how many of us there are!” And no point losing any of their own thralls or ghouls in a stupid gunfight. “Stay low, play defense. Jessy is”—he snapped his head up as Jessy ran past him, and jumped off the building—” ... on her way.” Groaning, he got up and headed for the roof exit. He was not going to do a superhero landing. It’d have been comical, one hundred and forty pounds of small Invictus landing like a fucking feather. Also, he couldn’t do the crazy transforming shit a Gangrel could do.

He looked behind him as Ryan pulled out his rifle and started shooting. Silenced, medium caliber, nothing extreme. He knew Jack didn’t want him killing anyone, so the man should have been shooting at the cars and their tires, not the passengers. Hopefully.

Jack ran down the stairs, four floors worth, and ran into the small lobby. Halfway across, he fell into a slide, foot first, and slipped in beside Hella, four thralls, and two ghouls. A small force, meant to lure Garry into a stupid move, hopefully exposing his force so the Invictus could properly kick their asses with Jack as the surprise. But Garry wasn’t dumb. Even with Ryan escorting Jack to and from the building Cloaked, chances are Garry knew he was here.

“Any wounded?” he yelled.

Hella poked her head up over the window ledge and unleashed a few shells. “Not yet! Fuck! Fucking bulletproof cars.”

“Bulletproof?” Fuck. Terra Den.

He peeked over the windowsill just long enough to get a glimpse, and have a hail of bullets shattered the wood around him. Jessy, suit torn up, with some huge spikes coming out of her head, back, shoulders and elbows, and with some monstrous claws on, stood on one of the cars. And she was going to town. Slash slash slash. She'd have gotten through a normal car in seconds, but bulletproof? He had no fucking clue.

If the cars drove off, their hit and run would have served the purpose of figuring out some of Jack's defenses, particularly that there was an angry Gangrel around. It'd have been an effective drive by. But apparently these fuckers wanted more. They stuck around, shooting out from cracked open windows, and peppering the building with what sounded like shotguns and fully automatic pistols.

“Can a Gangrel cut through that with their claws?” he asked.

Hella shrugged, popped back over the sill, and fired a few more times. “Never tried.”

He looked beside him. The kine had bulletproof vests on underneath their suits, making them looking blocky as hell, and they only poked their heads up long enough to get in a few shots.

“Joe!?” Jessy yelled.

Joe? Gangrel, up-and-comer, but not for his mind. Dude was a fucking dumbass, and the definition of a stereotypical goon. Problem was, a Gangrel didn't really need to be smart, when they could trust their fighting instincts, and transform body parts on the fly.

Jack peeked again. Joe tackled Jessy off the car, and the two fell down between the cars, out of sight. Shit shit, if Jessy died, it'd trigger a full out war.

If Jessy died, he'd never forgive himself.

He pulled out his radio and pressed the button. "Team C, engage. Get physical, and tell my idiot partner to ease up with the Protean shit before we make the news."

It didn't take long. Two seconds later, the gunfire ceased, only to start up again, aimed in a new direction: across the street. Jack poked his head out long enough to confirm. Team C, Derick, Bruce, and Kyle came out from the other building, Kyle and Derick at the lead, and they swarmed over the cars. Bruce was a Ventrue, not exactly equipped for physical combat, but he went in close anyway, shotgun blasting, giving the gunners no opportunity to shoot back. And Kyle and Derick were Nos and Daeva. They'd have no problems flipping the cars over.

Predictably, the cars took off. Bulletproof or not, they couldn't deal with Jack's older vampires in melee. That left Joe, apparently in a fist fight with Jessy. Or, sorta fists, because while they'd ditched the claws, they instead wore some scaly armor on their hands.

"Team C, pursue the vehicles until they're out of range. I don't want them doing anymore drive-bys. Ryan, get—" Clanks of heavy metal echoed through the mostly empty street. As Team C started down the road, four bodies burst up from one of the manholes. "Team C, stay on course! Ryan, cover Jessy." Jack put the radio down and looked at the kine around him. "Light em up!" Ok, that was a little cheesy, but without missing a beat, every kine there knelt up and unloaded their weapons at the newcomers.

Who was it? He recognized Kathy and Tilly, neonates. Oh shit, Tilly. Fuck fuck, if Tilly died, he'd have a super pissed werewolf on his hands. The other two, Bella and Steve, were ancilla, and a much, much bigger problem than Kathy, Tilly, or the vamps and kine in the drive-by. The three cars had been a distraction, and a bullet sponge.

Steve charged forward, holding the manhole like a fucking shield. Bullets shattered against it, filling the night with the sounds of crashing metal, and the light of ricochet sparks. The others sped up toward Jack's defense position, dashing left and right, and only getting clipped by bullets, instead of torn up like they should have been.

Tilly and Kathy dove through the window, straight over Jack's head, and threw themselves at the kine. Shit, shit shit. They might not know Jack had told everyone to try and avoid killing. Bullets? Aim for limbs, or the vehicles they might be using. But for all he knew, Tilly and Kathy were going to tear his thrall and ghoul support into literal pieces.

"Hella, get out there, support Jessy!" He pulled out his radio. "Ryan, I want those two assholes on the street riddled with holes. Engage in melee when you're dry. No killing!" Snarling, Jack threw himself into the chaos.

The six kine couldn't do much against Kathy and Tilly. Kathy was a Nos. She liked to wear a gas mask all the time to cover up whatever her deformity was, but she had no trouble getting in close proximity to use her Nos strength. And Tilly was Daeva. Fast and strong, and drop dead gorgeous. She wore nothing more than some tight jeans and an even tighter tank top, likely hoping jigglng tits would prove a distraction.

Hella jumped through her broken window, while Jack threw himself at the two women now inside the building. He'd been doing his best to suppress his aura, to keep his Beast quiet and calm, and the necklace helped with that. If the enemy had taken more time to scout and recon, they'd probably have done things better, maybe accounted for him, but it didn't look like they did. Unless it was a trap?

Didn't matter. Take out Tilly and Kathy, before anyone was killed.

As the two ladies broke fingers and wrists of the kine, Jack ran up to them. They turned to face him as they clunked the heads of two thralls together, taking out his six kine in a matter of seconds. The two vampires' eyes went wide as they realized it was him.

He didn't give them a chance to turn realization into action. He drew back a fist, and slammed it into Kathy's sternum, vitae fueling his limbs. Fuck the Beast. Fuck the Ripper. As long as he maintained awareness, actively controlled his vitae, he could do without them. Besides, he was a Ventrue, and they didn't expect a Ventrue to go in with fists.

All vampires were strong. Daeva and Nosferatu were naturals at it, just like how Ventrue and Gangrels were naturals at Animalism and Resilience. But that didn't mean a Ventrue couldn't punch a hole through a concrete wall, they just had to put more mental effort into it, more vitae, more will. And the curse gave him that in spades.

Kathy went down with a crunch, ribcage shattered. She rolled and twisted around, clutching at her chest, and she glared up at Jack from behind her gas mask as she struggled to push past the pain.

Before she did, Jack snapped his gaze at Tilly. "Stop."

Tilly, fist drawn back and ready to punch him, eyes wide with panic, met his gaze. He kicked the gates of her consciousness down hard, and grabbed hold of her mind like he was grabbing a small, wild animal. Too soft a grip and she'd break free, wriggling and scratching. Too hard a grip and he'd break her completely, killing her, or worse.

She lowered her first.

“Good. Hold still.” Again, he drove the command into her mind, smashing past her barriers, and crushing her snarling, little Beast. She relented.

With the necklace on, it took a hundred times more effort and control to summon up his vitae, and push it outward from his body using Dominate. The Beast in his guts could do little to help him, while the necklace remained. It was like going from riding a horse, to running beside the horse. He wouldn't be able to keep this up for long.

“Now, you!” He reached down, grabbed Kathy by the neck, and slammed her back down on the office floor. The vinyl cracked, and Kathy groaned into her mask. “I'm trying to save your idiot lives, so hold! Still!” He glared at her through the mask, and—

And snapped his head up as another body came up from the open manhole.

Garry.

Chapter 140

~~Damien~~

His leg worked again. Barely, but it did. Tomorrow night, he'd go back to work, helping the Invictus secure their borders and priority locations against Carthian fingers.

But for the moment, he'd enjoy what was left of his free time with his lover.

He eased his hips back, and gently pushed them forward, until every inch of his girth sank into his girlfriend's trembling body. Once he was snug inside her, he spent a few seconds lightly caressing her ass, before he lifted his hand, and spanked it, earning a weak whimper from Fiona, and a hard clench of her exhausted muscles. They'd been making love for a long time now, and with a belly full of Fiona's blood, he intended to go for a while yet.

He smiled down at her. Drained of blood, she was barely awake, head turned and resting on her pillow, ass in the air. If not for him holding her hips, she would have fallen over.

They were in her apartment. Her cozy, small, cheap apartment. Thin walls meant the neighbors likely heard the mewls Fiona made; Damien could definitely hear the neighbors, at least. But there was something comely about being with his love in this environment. Cushy, according to Fiona. Quaint, according to Maria. They usually had sex in his apartment, or in her nightmare realm, but they had fun here sometimes as well.

He looked around in the darkness of her apartment; she liked the lights off, which made sense, considering she was a shadow monster. He grinned at the bed, at the bright pink cover, and the various stuffed animals. Most of them had fallen off the bed, but Fiona clutched one now, snuggling into a big brown bear with a trembling arm. He almost felt dirty, fucking her from behind, spanking her, Kissing her, when the apartment made her seem so innocent. She was anything but innocent.

He smiled at the nearby laptop and the cute cat and frog stickers on it. He smiled at the vanity desk and the cute toys she'd arranged on it to look like a family of anthropomorphized animals having a meal around her makeup kit. He smiled at the posters on the walls, some of pop bands, some of cutesy cartoon animals, and one a rather detailed painting of a blue whale and unicorn swimming through the cosmos.

Fiona had the decor sense of an eclectic thirteen-year-old girl.

Chuckling to himself, he gently eased his length out of her squeezing, drenched insides, until only the head of his cock remained inside her, before he slowly pushed back into her yet again. No need to rush things. He'd cum once already, she'd cum half a dozen times, and their inhuman bodies would let them go for as long as they wished. He felt like giving her body a break, and letting her recover before he'd build her up to another onslaught.

He spent a few moments caressing her large ass cheeks, fingertips teasing along her pinked skin from earlier spanks, before he gave her ass another slap. Instant pleasure. The exhausted woman mewled, clutched her teddy bear tight, and clenched on his shaft hard. She cracked open her eyes, her left cheek pressed to her pillow, and she managed to peek at him before it closed again as she

---

“Damien.”

Damien froze and whipped his head to the side. Every muscle, every fiber, every ounce of vitae and Beastly instinct he had kicked into high gear. Sword? Where? By the door. Leg? Working well enough he could move, and jam vitae through it if he had to. Fiona?

Out of commission. She was awake, but only barely, deep in a post-Kiss bliss coma. He ... he knew that voice.

“Athalia?”

“Indeed.”

Slowly, he released the building tension in his body. Fiona turned her head to look toward her closet where the voice was coming from, but otherwise she made no movement. Hell, her eyes were barely open as it was.

“What’re you doing here?”

“Watching you have sex with Fiona, evidently.”

At least it was Athalia’s human voice, and not the raspy voice of her alien, skeletal form. How did she get in Fiona’s closet? She hadn’t been there before. Ah, right, the lair. The Begotten had connected their lairs, and could move swiftly between locations that were attached to those lairs. Fiona had a door to her lair in her closet; they’d used it before. Athalia had come through it, silent as a ... shadow monster.

He frowned and tried to back away from his lover. Of course, doing that stirred Fiona from her coma, and she pushed her ass toward him, even as she reached behind her and grabbed his hand, her other arm still wrapped around her teddy bear. Her grip was weak, but the point was clear: keep going.

“Did you invite Athalia, Fiona?”

“M ... Maybe.”

He rolled his eyes, and spanked her again. Mistake. Fiona whimpered, and pushed her ass toward him as she clenched. By the Lord, this woman.

Another whisper from the darkness. “Finish up, we can talk after. I’ll wait.”

“I’d prefer—”

“Don’t worry, I won’t spy.”

It wasn’t like Damien wanted to stop, not with a belly full of blood, and with Fiona whimpering for him to keep going. And not just regular blood either, Fiona’s blood. Thinking straight was borderline impossible. The desire, the hunger, it tingled along his skin and buried his mind in fog.

It took only seconds to forget about Athalia, and start fucking his lover again, and this time much harder. For another twenty minutes.

---

He slipped on his boxers, and threw open the closet door. Athalia stood there, arms folded across her chest, and a strange smile on her face. He knew that smile. That was a mischievous smile. Fiona often used the same one. Seeing it on Athalia was strange though. He figured a stone better capable of the expression, but apparently not.

“You ... spied.”

She chuckled. An even stranger phenomena than her smiling.

“Yes, I did. She seemed to be enjoying herself quite a bit, and you seemed enthralled.”

“Yes yes I know, she’s told me all about it.” Nodding, the tall, dark-skinned woman sat on the side of the bed, reached out, and pat Fiona’s shoulder. She lay under the covers, still snuggling her teddy bear, and had fallen asleep the moment Damien had finished. “She really has absurdly huge tits for a little thing, doesn’t she?”

“Huge tits?”

He blinked at her. “Knowing you can show up here and get this close, without me being able to sense you coming.”

She smirked. “Be happy I’m an ally, then.”

He raised a brow, watching her as he put his suit pants on. And she watched him, her cold expression less cold, even appreciative. She liked what she saw.

“What?” she said after a time. “You’re attractive. I can see what Fiona sees in you.”

“I like to think she sees more than just an attractive vampire.”

“Of course. She probably also sees an emo vampire fantasy, too.”

He frowned. She rolled her eyes, and laughed. Who was this woman? This was not the Athalia he remembered, the Athalia that betrayed them during the assault on the hunters all those months ago.

“We love each other.”

“Yes, I know. I’m only kidding.”

“Forgive me if I’m not used to hearing you make jokes.”

Sighing, Athalia shook her head, and gently pat Fiona on the shoulder a few times. “I’ve had time to think about what’s happened. Azamel’s helped me put things in perspective, and ... and things are better. Fiona hasn’t told you?”

“No. She wants to, but she avoids gossiping.”

“That’s good.” She smiled down at her fellow monster, and stroked her shoulder a few times before looking back to him. “Azamel’s taught her well.”

“How ... much longer does she have?”

Athalia frowned, and moved down the bed to sit at the foot of it, by him. “Not long. Her human half is giving up, and so is her Horror. A wound we can’t see, but it’s there, draining her a little bit more every day.”

“I’m surprised she’s lasted this long, then.”

“Yeah. We’re lucky. She’s taught us as much as she can in that time, about how to feed without drawing attention, about how to avoid killing prey, how to balance our hungers. She’s...” She sighed again and shook her head. “Sándor may be powerful, but he’s no teacher or parent.”

Damien sat down beside her. It made him nervous, sitting close to her like this, but it seemed like the thing to do. Athalia was opening up, and that was pretty much a miracle, especially because Damien was part of the reason her daughter was dead.

“I’m surprised,” Athalia continued, “that you’re so rough with Fiona. The spanking? The hard thrusts? Thought the bed was going to break.”

He squirmed. “She insisted. And, I wasn’t lying about her blood. It does something to me, something kine blood doesn’t. But, yes, she um ... really enjoys it rough.” Why switch the topic from Azamel to sex? Well, Athalia was with Azamel a lot. Maybe she was emotionally exhausted, watching her friend and guardian slowly die, and wanted to talk about something more fun. Why talk to him, though? Damien had little to offer in the social skills department.

He was dating a Begotten though. Maybe that was why she wanted to talk to him?

“I can tell you’re wondering why I’m here.”

“I thought you wanted to talk to Fiona,” he lied.

“Partly true. But, I also wanted to talk to you ... about Daniel.”

“The sheriff?”

She nodded, looking down at her legs and rubbing her hands against her jeans. “We ... we...”

“Oh.” He smiled. That was not a development he expected. Sure, people knew Athalia and Daniel were interested in each other, but Athalia was a ‘tough nut to crack’ according to Jessy. Nothing short of divine intervention would help that woman relax, or so Damien had thought.

“I wanted to ask you, about being Mekhet.”

“Being Mekhet? I’m not sure there’s much to tell.”

“Anything’s better than nothing, and that’s all Daniel tells me. Nothing.”

He laughed and brushed his hair along the unshaved side of his head. “It’s hard to answer that question, honestly. I’ve been Mekhet far longer than I’ve been human. That makes it hard to draw comparisons to who I was before. But, I suppose there’s one very ... distinct aspect about Mekhet.”

“Oh?”

“We have trouble coming out of our shell.” He pointed at his temple. “We live in here, and it’s a struggle to turn thoughts and feelings outward, and get them into the body, to be expressed.”

“That applies to any introvert.”

“It’s no mistake that almost all Mekhet are introverts. My sire was an exception, not the rule.” He shrugged. “For Mekhet, it’s stronger. It’s a Beastly instinct, to keep thoughts hidden. It’s ... also a Beastly instinct, to hunt secrets, and information. It’s like candy to any Mekhet.”

“Maybe that’s why that damn man is always trying to learn more about me, even if he doesn’t make it obvious.” She grinned. “I suppose that explains why you fuckers are always spying on people.”

“Not ... always.”

Grin turned to laugh, and she gave him a weak backhand against the shoulder. “Anything else?”

“I suppose if you’re trying to get Daniel to come out of his shell, feed him your blood. Though that’ll lead to a pretty ... extreme result.”

She shivered and looked down again. “That’s not easy to just, do, for some of us.”

“Understandable.” Athalia had a rough history with other paranormals.

“Fiona has ... gone on at length though, about how much she enjoys it, and what comes after.” Athalia gestured to the bed and the sleeping redhead within.

“Of course she has.” That girl. She and Jessy were alike in so many ways.

“And I got to see it for myself.”

“And you accuse Mekhet of spying.”

“Well, after hearing Fiona rave about how good a lover you are, I had to get a peek.” She grinned again. “Nice to see she wasn’t exaggerating.”

“So you dropped by, hoping for said peek?” He managed to keep a straight face, despite the compliment. Barely.

She scrunched up her nose a little and smiled. Whoever this woman was, she wasn’t the Athalia of old. Whatever Daniel and her had been up to, it’d done wonders for her.

“Daniel is most definitely not willing to get that aggressive, though. I think he’s ... afraid.”

“Afraid?”

“Of hurting me. Not physically, emotionally. Probably thinks getting rough will ... trigger me, I guess.”

He nodded. “You’ve had a rough life.”

“I know. But I’m not looking for gentle, lovey-dovey sex all the time, okay?. Sometimes, sure, but all the time? I’m a grown woman, damn it.” Frowning, she kicked her legs back and forth a little. “I want what Fiona and you have. I want the dumbass to ... to make me feel small in his arms. Small, and helpless, but protected and safe, you know? As he pounds me into a coma.”

“You’re ... being awfully forward with me, about all this.”

“Well, you’re a church boy, right? Think of this as a confession. You’re not allowed to share this with anyone.”

He groaned. That, was smart. She wasn’t exactly confessing her sins, but she was still confiding in him in a similar manner.

“Alright.”

She nodded again. “My daughter ... is gone. It had to happen. Azamel’s helped me accept that, and Daniel’s the first man who’s made me happy in a long time. For the first time in my life, things are looking up. So this whole complaint is stupid, and juvenile, but god damn it, I want the man to be a man, and stop treating me like I’m made of porcelain.”

“Don’t take the Lord’s name in vain.”

“Oh shut up.” She rolled her eyes and shrugged. “I want the man to hold me down, choke me a little, pull on my hair, spank me, maybe even tie me up. Is that so much to ask?”

Oh good Lord. Hearing it from her made it sound absolutely filthy, but in truth, it was all things he’d already done with Fiona. Frequently, at that. Filthy was the wrong word. Some women — a lot of women, evidently — liked feeling helpless and meek during sex. Athalia was anything but helpless and meek, same for Fiona, but he knew from experience that, if he took Fiona’s wrists and held her down, she immediately grew aroused.

Never in his wildest dreams did he think he’d enjoy doing that to a woman, until Fiona asked him to. Well, Vrall did, technically.

“I don’t know how to get Daniel to come out of his shell. Your blood would probably work, like I said.”

“I’ll work on that.”

“Other than that, it’s hard to say. It’s not like there’s a one-size-fits-all solution to getting people to come out of their shell. Fiona’s is ... is a unique case. She’s so happy, and radiates joy so powerfully, it’s overwhelming. But truthfully, it was her Horror that told me what Fiona wanted, sexually speaking. Vrall is a little...”

“Wiser?”

He grinned. “I wasn’t going to say it. But Vrall definitely understands things, about people, about Fiona, about me, things I suppose I will too, if you give me a few more centuries learning about them.”

“Vrall won’t be of much help to me. Not like she’ll ever talk to Daniel.”

“Then, all I can do is suggest being honest with the man. He’ll respond best to bluntness.”

“Yeah, but, I’m afraid of ... scaring him off, I guess.”

“Daniel? The man’s been close friends with a succubus for hundreds of years. I’m sure he’s seen debauchery of truly epic scale.”

“Ha! That’s true, isn’t it?”

“I’m certainly no expert on this topic. I think you’d get a far better answer asking the Prince herself.”

“I’d ... rather not deal with the Prince.”

He smiled. “Me neither. Maybe Natasha? She—”

His phone rang. Maria’s ring. He got up and retrieved the phone where he left it on Fiona’s desk. A text message.

~Xnomina is under attack.~

---

He left Athalia with Fiona. She could explain why Damien left for him, and he trusted her with his girlfriend. Considering who she was, he trusted Athalia with Fiona more than most. They were a family. A very weird family, but a family, and they’d protect each other with their lives.

Maria's arms had regrown, but she couldn't use them yet. Avery hadn't simply torn them off, though that'd been what it looked like. If the werewolf could call upon weird magical fire into her claws, maybe she could do other things to cause other actions to inflict more damage? Whatever she'd done, Maria was taking a long time to heal. She wouldn't be helping him tonight.

He landed on the roof of the building across from Xnomina. The HQ was on fire, at least, as much as a building of concrete with marble tiling could burn. The contents were the issue. The desks, the tables, the paintings on the walls, the decorative curtains, the chairs, they all burned, visible through shattered windows.

He crouched low and scanned the streets. Kine gathered to watch from a distance, but no cops or firefighters had arrived yet. They'd likely been delayed by the Invictus, and on purpose.

What was the point in this? The Carthians attacking the Invictus headquarters in the middle of the night made no sense. A distraction? He knew Jack was at the Tanvar building, along with Jessy and a few others. If the Carthians wanted Invictus eyes on the Xnomina building instead of the Tanvar building, this would work. The problem was the Masquerade. Vampires could not be caught fighting out in the open, and Xnomina was near the entertainment district. Kine were everywhere.

Damien pulled out his binoculars, and engaged his Auspex. He peeled back the curtain of chaos, and scanned for the Beasts of nearby Kindred, perhaps in the crowd. A sweep over the people below showed several Kindred, young Invictus neonates, staring at the building in horror. Understandable. Most of them had remained relatively peaceful with the Carthians; fist fights and the like in secluded areas hardly qualified as true violence to vampires. Fire, on the other hand, was a very clear statement: we want you dead. No vampire who touched it would survive, barring a miracle.

He used his free hand to dial Gloria Jennings. Thank the Lord, she answered.

“H-Hello!?”

“Miss Jennings, report.”

“Mister Burksen! Thank god, where are you?”

“On the Mardok building.”

“I’m in the bunker! I’ve got a dozen neonates with me.”

The bunker, below Xnomina. She’d be safe there from anything save for a particularly strong, particularly foolhardy elder Kindred, but Damien didn’t sense Garry anywhere. Elder he may be, Damien was confident he’d be able to pierce the man’s Obfuscate with Auspex if he was around. He was no Nos or Mekhet.

“The building won’t burn down. You’re safe in there.”

“I may be, but other Kindred aren’t! Amanda’s up there! But the bunker is locked down and won’t open cause of the fire!”

Shit.

“The fire can’t spread. Not enough things to burn. It’ll pass in an hour. I don’t even know how the upper floors managed to—”

“The Carthians. Gunshots hit the windows from the outside, and then fire rained in. And then some kine and a few Kindred stormed the building, and ... and I ran. We all ran, for the stairs and got to the bunker.”

So, the Carthians had broke the windows, threw fire into the building, and then sent a contingent to rush inside. Dangerous for them, even if they had ghouls doing it. One mistake and one, or all of the Kindred would be dead in flames. Hell, if he was lucky, they'd all be dead.

No, much as he wished otherwise, if Carthians died during this stupid raid, it'd elevate the situation. Even if it was their own stupid fault, it'd intensify the squabbles, the turf war, and Kindred would start outright trying to kill each other. Jack didn't want that, and now that Damien was trying to rebuild the church in Dolareido, he didn't want it either. And he didn't want his friends to get hurt, friends like Jack, and even that damn idiot Jessy.

"Where's Mister McDonald?" he asked.

"I don't know!"

"How the fuck did the Carthians rush through the building? Don't we have defensive measures?"

"I don't know, I don't know!"

"Either way, stay where you are. I'll deal with this." Sighing, Damien turned and—fucking jumped out of his own skin. "Sándor! How did you—"

The man leaned over the roof edge and peered out into the fire. "Athalia dropped me off."

The damn shadow monster was beyond sneaky, her and Fiona both. They made Mekhet look like stumbling children.

"Leave. Jack told the Begotten to stay out of this."

"Is that what this is? Problems with the Carthians?"

"You could say that. Now if you'll excuse me." Damien blanketed himself in the Cloak of Night, backed up, and made a running leap off the roof. The street wasn't wide, and reaching the building next to the Xnomina HQ easy enough, even with one leg refusing to work well.

A glance back showed Sándor followed him, jumping across to the next building without issue. Half jump, half fly. This high up, no one would see them, especially not with a nearby fire to watch and film.

And that was the problem. A fire meant kine, with smart phones and whatnot to film the mayhem. The Kindred inside had to be careful. A Masquerade violation meant death for whoever was stupid enough to get caught, especially if that meant getting caught on film. Maybe that's what the Carthians were hoping for? Put the Invictus in a position where someone might use their Disciplines to escape the flames, get caught on camera, and earn a swift — or not so swift — death at the sheriff's hands.

“Don't follow me, Sándor. If Garry finds out you're here, he—”

“I'm just watching.”

Damien frowned back at the man, but shrugged. As long as he didn't get involved, he couldn't make things any worse.

“I need to get into that building.”

“The building's contents are on fire, Damien.”

“Then it's a good thing I'm wearing a fire retardant trench coat.”

The man didn't smile, or make a sound. Eerie, how calm and stoic he was, considering a large building was on fire not far away, and outright war was just around the corner.

“If you die, Fiona is going to—”

“I’m not going to die. But I am going to do something, before everything goes to Hell.” Before an Invictus or Carthian made a mistake and broke the Masquerade, if he could help it.

~~Jack~~

He snapped his gaze back down at Kathy. “Hold still. Stay there.” He punched through her consciousness and crushed her Beast beneath his will. It was dangerous to hit her mind so hard, but he didn’t have time for shit anymore.

Jack turned, and glared out the broken window, surrounded by the groaning bodies of thralls, and two paralyzed vampires. On the street, Jessy had switched off, and was doing her best to take on Steve.

“Jessy, get to the shadows!” Christ, if she did anymore crazy transformations, and some random kine got a picture of it, that was it. The Prince would side with the Carthians, and the Invictus would be finished.

Would that be so bad? If something happened to Jack, Antoinette said she’d declare him effectively dead, and keep him in her tower. And—no, he couldn’t just let that happen. The idea of the love of his life killing the people he worked with, and maybe even his friend Jessy, in a great purge, was gut wrenching.

Jessy nodded, still grappling with the other vampire, and threw the two of them into an alley. Better than nothing. But Steve was ancilla, and Daeva. If Jack couldn’t keep tabs on them, there was always a chance Jessy would lose that fight. He had to deal with this shit and deal with it now.

Hella and Joe rolled up toward the Tanvar building, and then into it, glass cutting into them as they tossed and turned. Jack couldn’t watch, eyes still locked on Garry, but at least those two were off the street.

“Garry, the fuck is this?”

The man grinned as he walked forward. The idiot wore no weapons, no armor, just jeans and a black t-shirt, and he licked a fang as he approached the building.

“Knew you were here.”

“Spotted me?”

“Nah. I’ve shared this damn city with your asshole boss since I was just a young vamp. Him, that fucker Viktor, and that bitch Maria. I know how he thinks.”

Jack looked up outside the window. Hard to see black on black, but some subtle motions told him Scully and Mulder were around, and more crows besides. But this part of North Side didn’t have the same crow and rat population of other places like South Side, where they grew fat on the leftovers left by the night life and tourists. If he wanted to summon a legion, their numbers would take time to swell. And he didn’t want another hospital incident anyway.

“So, what, you came here to fight me? I’m trying to keep everyone alive.”

Garry snorted. “You know what, kid? I believe you.” He came closer.

“You ... do?”

“Yeap, I do. Julias was a good man, and now he’s dead. And the white-haired queen, sitting pretty on her fucking throne, would just love it if everyone took it up the ass for her.”

So much for cooperation.

“So, what, you’re here to kill me?”

“Maybe. I’m here to kick your ass. We’ll see if killing is necessary.” He came closer, and Jack took a small step back. Not retreating, just making room for the asshole to hop into the lobby of the building with him. The glass crunched under his combat boots, and his fists clenched and unclenched at his sides.

Jack glanced to Hella. As much as Team A, Hella and the kine, were supposed to be guarding the building, and his six, the kine were out of the fight, and Hella was dealing with a Gangrel just as old as her. Joe was supposedly only thirty years embraced, but the bastard was strong. A dumbass, but strong. A big man, bigger than Garry, with a shaved head just like his boss. He had no trouble thrashing Hella around.

Past Garry, Jessy and Steve had vanished, but Jack could hear their yells and grunts of fighting. Behind the elder, Bella had vanished as well. Damn Mekhet. But Ryan’s gun wasn’t firing anymore either. The two were probably engaged, and Mekhet fighting Mekhet was a game of assassins. Whoever spotted the other first usually won. Better for Jack to not draw attention to Ryan’s existence, if the man wasn’t shooting anymore.

Team C were still out of the picture, and if those three cars came back, the fight would quickly swing in the Carthians’ favor. And if Jack reached for his radio right now, there was a good chance Garry would jump him.

Garry. The youngest elder in Dolareido, barely old enough to be an elder. The files on him told a different story. He’d grown up in Dolareido, and even from a young age, gave the Carthians some direction; usually to fight against the First and Second Estate. The issue was, the files on him made one thing abundantly clear: the man was really, really good at fighting. Not smart, but stupid either.

Not a good leader, but not a bad leader either. In typical Carthian fashion, his Kindred followed him, listened to him, because he was 'real', because he didn't bother with the Danse Macabre bullshit.

Or he didn't used to. After the Terra Den maneuver, maybe his covenant thought of him differently? Maybe coming at Jack directly was a chance for Garry to show his covenant that he wasn't afraid to get his hands dirty if they went to war, unlike the other elders? Or maybe his ego demanded it?

"Where're the others?" Jack asked.

"Others?"

"The other Carthians. Intel told me if you idiots really came for the Tanvar building, there'd be a lot more of you."

The man smirked, and wiped the corner of his mouth with his knuckles, like a boxer might after a fight. He had the scars of a street fighter, including a nasty one on his lip, probably from a fist busting it open badly enough to require stitches. Those were things he'd gotten when he'd been kine. Hell, Jessy got into a lot of fist fights when she'd been kine, and she didn't have a quarter of the scars Garry did.

This dude had been baptized in fire before he'd ever been cursed with his own Beast.

Garry shrugged, and came closer. "Hitting the Xnomina HQ."

Jack froze.

"You sent Kindred up against Michael? They'll die."

The bastard grinned. "If they were trying to take him down, sure. I ain't Lucas though. Kamikaze? No thanks."

“Then—”

“Go ask em, if you survive.” And the man came at him.

Without hesitation, Jack reached into his jacket, pulled out two pistols, and unloaded bullets at Garry. A little vampire strength allowed better control of recoil, and he held the trigger down on both pistols. Fully automatic.

Maybe Garry didn't expect him to be willing to shoot him. Maybe he thought Jack would want a fist fight or something. The man's eyes widened, and he staggered as a dozen bullets slammed into his chest. Predictably, he wasn't wearing a vest, vampires never did, and he stumbled back as the metal tore through his shirt and flesh.

But, he was a Gangrel, and an elder. Predictably, he adapted. Before Jack had managed to get through half the magazine, the bullets no longer sank into Garry's skin. They slammed against his t-shirt, ripping the fabric, but flattening against his hardened body before falling to the floor. Protean.

Jack had never dealt with a Gangrel using their Protean ability. Sure, he'd seen Jessy use it, transforming into animals, or evolving strange, monstrous limbs. It could do other things, too. He'd heard stories about the strange and insane things Michael had done, when putting a stop to a brawl between the Carthians, Jessy, and Eric. But Michael was twice as old as Garry. The younger elder wouldn't be able to transform into a towering creature straight out of Resident Evil. Would he?

“That hurt.” Snarling, Garry dashed for him again, a dozen holes in his chest barely fazing him.

Jack stepped back, eyes wide as the man came in close, full on punching distance. Not just punching distance, boxing punching distance. No hay makers or stupid shit like that. He closed the distance quick until only two feet were between them, and the man brought up both hands before putting out a swift jab.

Jack poured vitae into his body, preparing the blood barrier he'd relied on so many times now. But with the Beast tied down, leashed by the necklace, it was like trying to get a car out of mud. Garry's punch collided with his chest, and Jack flew back, spine crashing against the lobby desk. He slumped down, ass on the floor, back against the front wall of the desk.

There were several small holes in Jack's chest. Jack blinked down at his suit shirt, then at Garry's knuckles. He had a spike on each knuckle.

Gangrel didn't usually do small transformations. Subtle wasn't in their toolbox. Transforming into large predators, or monstery shit like Michael could do, or even just some super long claws, sure. But subtle? Never.

Jack grabbed his radio. Mistake. Garry pounced at him, a literal pounce, legs turning into enormous wolf legs that launched him at Jack. A moment before Jack's finger hit the button, Garry slammed into him, and the desk exploded. It was one of those big desks with a solid wood wall on the front and sides. And directly behind it was the door downstairs, that managed to stop Jack's body with a welcoming thunk of his skull.

Garry got up from the mess of torn wood and splattered computer parts. A handheld radio was in his hand, and grinning, he crushed it in his grip. Not like Jack couldn't contact his friends with his smart phone, but it was in his jacket pocket, and that'd take more than a few seconds to get out and use, unlike the radio.

“No hard feelings, kid. I always liked your sire. Julias was a cool guy. His sire, not so much.” With a very animal growl, Garry stalked toward him, legs bulging against the inside of his jeans with increased muscle mass. Weirdly shaped legs. How the fuck did what was probably very wolfy feet work in those boots? No, Garry was probably just controlling the transforming perfectly to conform to the boots.

Everyone thought the Carthians were brutish morons, shortsighted idealists, and all-around fools. Garry certainly acted like one sometimes, too. But he didn't fight like one.

Jack forced himself to his feet, glaring at the man. "Garry, I'm trying to keep everyone from killing each other."

"You're an Invictus, drunk on power and control. You might have good intentions now, but we know where those lead. You're gonna be the next Viktor at this rate. Thanks, but no thanks."

"Garry, you—"

The man charged him again, and again, the Gangrel transformed. Jack expected more spiked knuckles, but instead, the man grew a tail, something long, thick, and covered in spikes along the spine. He leaned forward as he charged him, and this time the man full on tackled him, driving his weight — more than he should have had — straight into Jack's chest.

The door at Jack's back exploded, wood splintering as it shot outward and around them. But when downward stairs greeted them instead of a flat floor, the world started to spin. Wack, wack, wack, each bounce on the hard surface punched him in the back, sides, legs, but he was light enough it didn't hurt too bad. Garry had let go of him after the first bounce, and had continued to tumble, turning their bodies into rolling balls. He was much heavier. Hopefully he'd break a bone or two on the way down.

They landed at the bottom, against the next closed door, this one made of metal. Garry was up in an instant. Just as Jack rolled onto his back to face the man, so Garry didn't start pummeling him in the back, Garry sprouted a giant claw, and sliced open the lock down the door seam.

Clawing through metal that thick, that easily, that precisely, took skill, and power. Jack gulped.

Garry kicked the metal door open, reached down, and grabbed Jack's foot. Before Jack could kick him off, Garry dragged him into the room, and threw him, hard. The first few wooden crates to block Jack's path broke apart, while others scattered over the floor.

"Michael and I know each other pretty well," Garry said, following Jack in, boots crunching over the smaller boxes the crates had held. Cigars rolled away from his boots. "If you were wondering why you were put here to guard this building with only a small force, even though there was a risk I would show up, it's cause Michael's hoping I might kill you."

Forcing himself to his feet, hand on a nearby stack of crates, Jack glared at the asshole.

"Michael doesn't want me dead. He wants me to use my curse."

"He wants you to use the curse, sure. He wants you to trigger the war." Garry pointed at both his temples. "Think, Jack! ... is that the right meme? Mike can't shut up about memes. Kid spends way too much time online."

Jack stared at Garry, blinking several times. "Um ... yeah, it is."

"Ah, good."

"What the fuck is—"

Garry charged him again. The tail was gone, and this time, enormous claws broke through the man's boots, tearing at the concrete basement floor as he sprinted at Jack. So much for subtle transformations. Every time the man came at him, he did it differently, a different tactic, a different body part. The best Jack could do was bring up vitae through his limbs to defend against the Gangrel.

Fast, so damn fast, almost as fast as a Daeva or Mekhet his age would be. The man got in close, ducked left, but twisted right, and slammed a fist up against Jack's face. He'd tried to block the left, falling for the feint, and it cost him, his ass on the floor and the world spinning.

“But,” Garry said, “Michael's a smart fucker. He wants you to use the curse to start the war, but he also wants you gone, before you turn into another Viktor. So he's doing what all elders do. Making sure that both possible outcomes are good for him. Play chess?”

The fucker was taunting him, knowing damn well getting Jack pissed or frustrated would make it easier to kick his ass. It wasn't just that people didn't realize how smart Garry was, but rather, Garry didn't let people realize it. He'd been playing dumb, all these years, letting people like Jack think he wasn't smart enough to play the Danse. Fuck!

“You—”

Again, Garry came at him, but Jack saw it coming; fucker kept coming at him whenever Jack responded, but the trick would only work so many times. He rolled back, over the table, and Garry sliced down where Jack had been. The man had summoned four giant claws, and they slammed down into the table, skewering it. Apparently less for slicing, more for stabbing.

With a second to react, Jack pulled the necklace off and stuck it in his pocket. Remain in control, remain in control. There weren't any pianos in the basement for someone to smash into his head, just a big room filled with wooden crates and metal tables. As long as Garry didn't somehow nail Jack in the head with one of those tables so hard it put him in torpor for a second, the Ripper would stay out of this.

Garry grinned at him, yanking his hand free, and slowly walked around the table. "The fuck are you even doing, working for the Invictus? You're just a nobody, some random kid Julias liked. Carthians? We've been fighting since long before our embrace. We've had homes taken away, friends lost, streets corrupted and turned into nothing more than shitty coffee shops and mini banks, half of them fronts for black markets and loan sharks. Carthians have been fighting for the people who fucking live in this city, like I've been, almost two centuries."

Jack kept the big table between them, strafing around it, peering at the man around the few crates that remained on it. "Half of the shit the Invictus does in Dolareido only works cause the kine embrace it. This is a city of sin, Garry. We don't force anything on the kine. Be happy we keep shit under control like we do. Far better than most do."

"Just because—"

"Don't give me that shit. You're no champion of the people, Garry. You got an agenda, like everyone else."

Snarling, Garry snapped his foot out, claws still pushing through the boots. He slammed his heel against the table, driving it at Jack, but Jack was ready. He jumped up, letting the table slide underneath him. The bastard had kicked it hard enough, it crashed into a third table, filling the room with the thunder of metal slamming into metal, and more crumbling crates.

Garry dove at him again, leaning forward, with a tail sprouting out from behind him again. He expected Jack to do anything he could to avoid the charge.

Jack came in, getting low. Garry wasn't a tall guy, but he was taller than Jack, and getting under him was easy. And with the necklace off, the Beast in Jack's guts poured through him, flooded him with instinct, drive, and power. The curse and the Beast were entangled, and as the Beast let out its rage, the curse's power came with it.

Jack drove his fist up into Garry's chest, and the man flew into the air, hard. He collided with the wooden beams of the basement ceiling, cracking them before he bounced back down to the floor. And before the man could recover, Jack dashed forward and kicked the man in his side, sending him flying through the air again. He didn't go high, but he did go far, crashing through more crates and sending them tumbling as he flew.

Growling, Jack stomped after the man, but he'd disappeared in the mess of crates and tables. It was a huge basement; had to be, to move all the merchandise.

"Holy shit," Garry said, standing up a good fifty feet away, grin on his face. "A Ventrue, throwing a punch. Now I've seen everything."

"Julias taught me how to punch."

"Funny. Viktor would never punch."

"I'm not Viktor!"

Garry grinned some more, and walked toward him, stepping onto and over crates with casual grace. He kept the tail, and the huge talons poking through his boots. He walked like a fucking dinosaur.

“You know Jack, you could just walk away. Give me the building, and no one has to get hurt.”

“You said you were attacking Xnomina right now! People are getting hurt.” He had to deal with this and deal with it now. If people were dying back at the HQ, he had to get there and help. Michael could deal with it, but what if something happened? Jessy was here, Jack was here, and Damien was still out of commission. Isabella was at the HQ, but he trusted her to defend the building as much as he trusted her to prioritize the Invictus over her plays.

The elder snorted. “People that deserve it.”

Snarling, Jack came at him, and Garry grinned the whole time. He was enjoying this.

Jack threw a crate at him, but Garry slapped it aside. It was good enough for Jack to close the distance completely though, and take a swing at Garry’s face. The Gangrel brought up his arms and blocked, and Jack had to take a second to mentally register that. A block? Vampires almost always dodged, once they realized the vamp they were fighting had some serious Vigor to put into their punches. They simply had too much power to risk blocking. But when Jack’s fist hit the man’s forearm, it felt like punching a steel wall, and—Garry’s fist collided with Jack’s face, and Jack went flying. The world spiraled, until collision pain quickly reminded Jack he was in a room full of painful corners. But Jack recovered quickly, Beast instincts grabbing hold and forcing him up from the mess of destroyed crates. There were sharp points on Garry’s knuckles, and sharp pain in Jack’s cheek. He ignored it.

“You think you’re so righteous,” Jack said. “You’re doing the exact same shit with Terra Den. Hell, you sired Jeremy Long.”

“I ain’t happy about any of it, Jack, but it has to be done. The Invictus are a problem, and they need to be gone.”

“Then why aren’t you attacking Xnomina yourself?”

“Too big a risk. The battle could get pretty hectic, you know? Way too many humans in the area. Gotta protect the Masquerade.” The grin on his face said it all. He was lying, and making no attempt to hide that fact.

“Bullshit. You’re here cause I’m here. You’re here cause the Carthians are afraid of me, and don’t want to get into this war unless they know I can be beaten.”

Garry paused, and his grin grew. “I’ve been building up to this war for decades, kid. And it needs to happen. You fucking Invictus are scum, bad for the city, bad for everyone, and someone needs to get rid of you. When Viktor died, I started getting ready.”

“Started? You ... You wanted Michael to take the Mirrden district.”

More grins. “But then you pulled this curse thing out of your ass. Now Michael knows what I’m doing, and he’s hoping you’ll put the dent in the Carthians that allows him to win this war.”

“We don’t need to have a war!”

“Yes, we do.”

There wasn’t any arguing with this man. Garry didn’t hate Jack, but he hated the Invictus. He hated Michael and Viktor and Maria, Xnomina, and everything the First Estate represented. He hated them down to his bones, and there wasn’t any way Jack would get through to this man with a simple conversation.

Jack bit into his wrist, and splattered his blood on the floor.

Grinning, Garry bit into his wrist, and did the same thing.

The swarm didn't take as long to arrive as Jack thought. Scully and Mulder came in first, and took to high perches in the room, up in the wooden beams overhead. Other birds came in as well, but in North Side, the rats were the larger population. Hundreds of dark brown bodies poured down the stairs and toward the two vampires, massively outnumbering the few birds that navigated through the three doors it'd take to get into the basement.

And then they started killing each other.

Jack stared down at the carpet of bodies, at the hundreds of furry creatures that'd served as his legion many times before. Normally they were summoned by his blood, the dark liquid infused with vitae and sending a pulse into the world that vermin could not ignore. They'd come to it, and upon reaching the source, understand who was their master. From there, Jack could use Animalism to direct and guide them, like a general plugged into the minds of his soldiers. With the Beast guiding his actions and reflexes, it was a smooth poetry of control.

But now, the rats arrived, and found two masters. Maybe if Ripper had cast the Discipline, there'd be no question about who was master, but Jack couldn't use the curse with nearly the same level of skill.

You're right. You can't. Let me out. Let me deal with this cocky fucker.

Jack snarled, shaking his head, drawing a raised brow from Garry.

"You really just decided to show up with a few cars for a distraction, and five vamps to take this place?" Jack asked. "Sounds very ... not-tactical. Sounds random."

"Yeah well, sometimes you gotta go with instinct."

“Bullshit. You don’t win wars with instinct. You’re just an idiot doing shit on the fly.” If he could antagonize Garry enough, get him angry, he might make a mistake.

“And the Invictus are paranoid fools, desperate to protect their house of cards. Cause that’s what it is, a house of cards. All your rules, all your money, your ranks and protocols, it’s all there to keep your stupid bullshit from falling apart.” Garry came at him, grinning the whole time, but stopped short. Instead, he spun, and swiped at Jack with his tail.

Jack raised an arm to block. He’d fought a long-ass battle against a giant gargoyle with four arms and a tail. Paying attention to shit like extra limbs felt natural, at this point. And if he could stop the tail and catch it, he could get the upper hand.

Except, when the tail came within inches of Jack’s arm, it erupted in spikes, suddenly covered in them, like a medieval mace. They punctured through his suit, his skin, and sank an inch into his flesh and flowing vitae, earning a yell from Jack. Garry ripped the tail back and out, shredding skin on the way, and as Jack stumbled to the side, Garry closed in, opposite of his tail, and sank his right fist into Jack’s face.

The world turned around again as Jack went flying, landing on a pile of rats. They softened the landing, but the creatures were mad with confusion, and they bit at each other as they scampered over and around him. Rat claws tore up his suit, and dozens of rats bit into him in the chaos of swarming bodies.

Jack jumped to his feet and scanned the ceiling. The crows weren’t fighting, but they cawed at each other incessantly. Mulder and Scully were in there, he could hear them, feel them, and they were trying to convince the other crows what to do. They weren’t listening. Hundreds of chittering rats bit into each other, dozens of cawing crows sat overhead, and crates lay everywhere, scattered and broken, with cigars and cigarettes carpeting the floor. The room was mayhem.

“Your problem,” Garry said, “is your attachment to routine, schedules, structure. You can’t evolve, can’t adapt, can’t roll with the punches.” The man threw aside a nearby table, sending rats bowling over, like a wave of water. “All I have to do is do something a little unexpected, and your plans crumble. I make friends with a suit, and you fuckers don’t have a clue. I show up here, willing to get my hands dirty, and you idiots don’t have the first fucking idea how to deal with it.”

Jack took slow steps back, giving himself a few extra seconds. Vampire blood coursed through him, filling in the holes the bastard was putting in him, but failing to prevent them. Garry was fucking deadly, punching straight through Jack’s defenses like Avery’s claws had. If he wasn’t careful, the Gangrel was going to cut him in half.

“Guilty. I do love routine.”

Smiling, Garry came at him again.

Jack met his eyes, and reached out.

The difference was immediately apparent. No small creature guarded the inside of Garry’s skull. A roaring, massive Beast waited behind the gate of his mind, a huge creature, swirling mist of black pouring around what could only be a really big ... cat? A tiger? Lion? No, it had black fur, and it was way too big to be any Earth cat.

The colossal creature prowled left and right behind the gate, a gate everyone had. You couldn’t simply walk into someone’s mind, you had to get past the barrier. And when dealing with paranormals, you had to deal with the creature inside. Garry’s gate looked like a chain link fence, topped with barbed wire, guarding a prison. A second gate, then? And the prison had a guard dog. Cat. Thing.

Garry stood beside his Beast, hand on its shoulder. He couldn't reach its back, with how big it was. And he was petting it.

Snarling, Jack kicked open the front gate to the prison, and marched forward, his own Beast following behind him. Before the curse had awoken inside Jack, freed by his stupidity, he'd never been able to really see these mind-to-mind engagements before. He could feel a person's mind when he attempted to Dominate them, same as any Ventrue could, but to actually see the inner battle that took place was something that'd only started happening after his first conversation with his Beast, and the curse bound within. A side effect of the curse or something.

He kind of wished he couldn't see this. He didn't want to know what sort of man Garry was on the inside, see that the man's mind was a prison fortress, but also something scarred, something that carried weight with it. Shame? Guilt? He couldn't tell, but the place reeked of an early twentieth century prison, and there were bloodstains on the path that led to the inner building.

"Get out," Garry said, grinning, as he scratched the back of his Beast's arm.

Jack looked up at the dark, cloudy sky. It cracked with lightning, and rain fell, sound drowned by thunder.

"Submit," Jack said

Garry snorted a laugh. "No."

Jack hadn't come alone. His own Beast followed behind him, obviously eager for a fight. It rose up, dwarfing Garry's, a tornado of black mist, and it snarled with alien tones Jack's brain struggled to recognize.

"Submit!" the curse said.

Garry just grinned. “No.”

Before Jack could say anything else, Garry hopped up onto the back of his own Beast. The metaphor slapped Jack in the face hard, and he ground his teeth. Gangrel’s didn’t fight against their Beasts, not like the other blood clans did. Gangrels found a way to keep their Beasts up on the surface of their skin, right on the edge, ready to empower them. That’s what he was looking at now.

Garry’s Beast roared. Garry roared. Somewhere, somehow, the two entities blurred, and the combined force of their roar smashed into Jack hard enough it sent him backward. Him and the curse both.

Back, in the real world. Back in a room filled with fighting rats, tables and destroyed crates, with smaller boxes everywhere crushed under Jack and Garry’s fight. Back, where Jack was losing the fight.

“Get out of my head!” Garry’s voice. He’d stumbled back, after ejecting Jack from his mind. Well, at least it took him effort, cause right now, Jack felt a little humbled. That was the first time anyone had ever managed to do that to him, since the curse had been freed.

These ignorant fools, oblivious to what goes on inside the mind. Be happy I let you see.

If you didn’t have to, I’m sure you wouldn’t let me.

Pfft. I’ve awoken true awareness in you. These weaklings, completely unaware of the Beast within. Even this idiot Garry, a Gangrel, so in tune with his Beast, doesn’t get to see what you do.

Jack snarled and shook his head again.

Garry came closer, slower this time, eyeing Jack with a suspicious smirk. “I’d heard this weird curse thing wasn’t the big gift some people say it is. There's rumors going around, saying it's a problem for you. That maybe it's driving you insane."

Insane. Christ, am I insane?

You're not insane. You're stupid! Let me out! This asshole is stronger than you. Stronger than your stupid boss.

How the fuck is Garry stronger than Michael? He's been losing against the Invictus for decades, and is young as hell compared to him.

Your boss has been sitting in a chair for centuries, ruling a covenant through a council. Garry here has been putting his neck on the line, fighting, and fighting, and fighting. He's risen to his position because he's earned it, not because he just happened to live long enough.

You heard about what Michael did to Eric.

And you saw, felt, what just happened when we tried to Dominate this fucker. You saw what happened when you tried to summon the legion. You really think this fist fight he's aiming for is just his way of beating you? He's toying with you! Let. Me. Kick. His. Ass!

Jack shook his head again. "I'm not insane."

"You look insane. Your eyes were flickering around just now, like you were having a conversation in your head."

Fuck.

"I'm not insane." And the last thing he needed was Garry knowing about the curse having its own persona.

“Then I have to say I’m pretty disappointed, Jack. This all you got? This is the prodigal childe, the young Kindred that escaped the hunters, defeated an ancient Begotten, got his revenge on his sire’s killers, and took down Avery’s pack? She told me about that fight, told me about how strong you were. What a letdown.”

“Is that what this is? You just looking for a good fight? People are going to die, Garry! Kine and Kindred.”

“Like you care about kine.”

Jack clenched his fists hard, and glared daggers into the asshole.

“You—”

“You know what I think, Jack? I think you’ve convinced yourself of some real bullshit. You got good intentions, but that’s all. In reality, you’re just this cynical little punk kid who got his hands on his daddy’s gun, and now you’re tempted to use it on everyone and everything. I think you’re on the fast track to becoming another Viktor. I think, given time, I’ll have another maniac asshole, convinced he’s better than everyone else, willing to crush the whole city under his thumb to get his way, willing to torture kine and Kindred alike for whatever reason he can think up at the time.”

Ice ran down Jack’s back. Much as Garry was jumping on some serious assumptions, the words weren’t alien. Jack had thought them before, especially when the curse had been sealed and secret, but seeped into his thoughts, corrupting him. He’d been terrified he was becoming another Viktor.

“I’m ... not Viktor, Garry. I won’t let it happen to me.”

“Yeah well, you’ll have to forgive me if I don’t trust you.”

So that’s what this was, then. It wasn’t just Garry wanting to prove to his Carthians that Jack wasn’t the threat the rumors made him about to me. He wanted to make sure Jack wasn't becoming another Viktor. He was determined to make sure Jack didn't. And nothing Jack could say would make him think differently.

“Tell your people to back off, Garry. Tanvar building is ours, but no one has to die over this stupid turf war. Work with me, and the Invictus and Carthians can get along. I have bigger fish to fry than this.”

“Bigger fish?”

Shit. Tell him, don't tell him? He was sure Black Blood was the problem, and Black Blood worked with Jacob. And Jacob occasionally worked with Garry.

“Back off Tanvar and I'll tell you.”

Garry snorted on a laugh, and charged.

Jack grounded himself and poured vitae through his limbs as the man dashed forward. More, and more, he infused his will into the dark, thick blood coursing through his undead body. If there were kine or weaker Kindred around, Jack could easily Dominate them and turn them into his slaves for this fight; assuming they weren't already under his command. That was how Ventrue won fights, with an army.

He had to get his army back.

Jack held out his hands around him, and focused. Rats. His legion. They were confused, torn between the two pulls, the elder Gangrel, and Jack. Even now, in the mayhem of chitters and squeaks, he knew the rats knew him, just as they knew Garry. The Gangrel was known as the Fighter to the rats, someone who fought against other creatures at the top of the food chain. And Jessy was right, they knew him as the Crow Lord.

The Fighter versus the Crow Lord, and the rats were getting pulled in both directions.

Fuck that. They were his army. How many times now had he summoned his legion? Even if the curse had been the one to do it, he'd done it with Jack's body, Jack's blood, Jack's vitae. The curse was just an amplifier. Jack could do this without the fucking Ripper.

He poured his will into his blood, and prepared. Garry came at him, fingers elongating into massive claws, and he struck at Jack's head, fully intending to behead him. But Jack raised his arm and blocked, summoning a wave of vitae into the limb. If he hadn't, Garry's blade fingers would have cut straight through the arm and his neck. But Jack managed to harden his body enough to block it, even if the blade managed to pierce his skin.

Hell, he'd been counting on it.

The pain was immense. He recognized it, too. It was pain like when the werewolves sliced him with their claws, a pain that went well beyond what a simple blade should have been capable of. With the werewolves, he was pretty sure they had some sort of magical empowerment. With Garry's claws, it was vitae. He didn't know how or why, and neither did Jessy, but their claws could do ridiculous damage, more than enough to cut through Jack's hardened skin, and muscle, until his claws slammed into Jack's bone and came to a dead stop.

With a bit of will, Jack's blood flowed out of the wound, down his arm and elbow, soaking through his suit jacket, and coating the floor. And with every drop of the thick liquid, he poured his command.

Immediately, the rats stopped fighting among themselves. The crows overhead ceased their squabbling. Every dark eye in the basement turned, and looked at Garry.

Jack could feel it, how his will smashed against the Gangrel's. Their Beasts silently snarled and growled at each other, but now Jack had recast the Discipline, and fueled it with a dozen times more effort and vitae. Every bit of training, every fucking drop of effort and will he had, every shred of concentration he could spare went into those drops of his blood, all with the one goal of roaring louder than Garry's Beast could.

The rats, ripping through boxes of cigars as much as they poured over them, flowed onto Garry's legs, and obeyed, taking advantage of how he exposed himself attacking Jack. He leapt back, but a dozen of them had already latched on, and they bit and tore at his jeans in seconds. The man landed back on one of the tables, growling like a tiger more than a man, and tore the rats from his legs. A few precious seconds spent dealing with rats was a few more seconds of rats closing in on him, surrounding him, flowing over the crates and overturned tables like a living brown carpet.

Jack bit into each of his wrists, and splattered more of his blood over the floor. Much of it landed on the rats, but they didn't care. Spreading his vitae onto his territory was how he created the connection with the horde, how they recognized him as the ruler of the land, and their master. Controlling hundreds of rats was difficult. Controlling thousands was extremely difficult, and exhausting. Doing it and overpowering Garry's own attempts to control the swarm, was overwhelming.

But he did it.

Snarling, Garry jumped to another table, glaring at Jack as he spun, kicking off the rats that managed to reach it. With crates everywhere, including still on most of the tables, move from table to table was difficult, and Garry kicked and killed rats by the dozens as they worked together to get him.

“I might not be much of a fist fighter, Garry. Not much of a gun fighter, either. But I am good at one thing.” Jack pointed a palm at Garry, and focused.

Not many crows had come, but enough did, and fifty birds descended toward Garry like bombers. They made diving passes upon the man, clawing at him before moving past and retreating to the rafters of the basement. He ducked and weaved with the reflexes of a boxer, deftly dodging each crow, but the bombardment left him vulnerable to the rats, and a few managed to latch onto his legs again.

They ripped into his shins and calves, biting and tearing with their little rat claws, and Garry snarled as pain ran across his face.

Maybe taunting him was a bad idea. Much as Jack had the upper hand now, the basement was just one room, and one covered in a mess of debris. Moving around in it wasn't easy, and Garry knew that. If he could get his footing, he could come back at Jack again, and then Jack would have a hell of a time keeping Garry from ripping his head off. He could sprout claws, or—or grow fucking wings.

Garry's shirt ripped apart as two wings erupted from his back. Bat wings. Massive bat wings, complete with unusual, long claws on the thumb and fingers. Not bat wings then, but demon wings. Air pushed outward from the sudden explosion of mass, and birds collided with both the wings and the rafters and crates as they struggled to compensate. Garry's tail grew as well, getting longer, growing as thick as a leg, with spikes at its tip growing longer. The man's boots tore apart as his feet expanded in size, and Jack took a step back, eyes wide, as what might as well have been the feet of a raptor straight out of Jurassic Park crushed the edge of the metal table like squeezing a beer can.

Grinning, the bastard jumped off the table, and leapt at him. Half fly, half pounce. Garry closed the distance faster than Jack predicted, and he took a dozen steps back as he tried to compensate, rats barely avoiding his feet. Only vampire reflexes kept Jack from stumbling over the crates and fragile boxes of tobacco.

Garry slammed into him, hands crashing into his shoulders. So heavy. Whatever Garry did, his mass had increased drastically, and Jack stared up at the man as he fell to his back, pinned, with a couple wood crates breaking apart underneath him. Garry had grown taller, his arms and legs thicker, and his fangs had grown longer. All his teeth had grown bigger, and sharper. This wasn't like fighting a vampire anymore. He was fighting something as heavy and big as a werewolf.

The playful look in Garry's eyes was gone. Hell, the human look in his eyes was gone. His pupils were dilated, and they had a slit shape to them, like a cat's. His mouth and nose stuck out a little more, almost like a snout. Oh good god he really was transforming into some sort of bat demon man thing. And comical as that was in theory, it was terrifying from up close.

The grip on Jack's shoulders quickly hit crushing levels, and Jack screamed as something in his arms went snap.

"If you just got out of my way, Jack, I wouldn't have to—aaargh!"

Garry let out a scream of his own, albeit far more inhuman, as Jack kicked the man in his crotch. The impact was hard enough to push him away slightly, and Jack brought both feet underneath him, and kicked again. With both feet planted against the man's chest, Jack drove him straight up into the rafters hard enough for wood to splinter and break against his back, skull, and wings. He came down six feet away, and rats poured over him the moment he did.

There weren't enough rats in the area to provide Jack a true swarm, but there were enough to give Garry a hell of a time getting back up. He roared his frustration as his wings snapped out, sending a hundred of the furry creatures about, and stopping more crows as they tried to harass him. Judging from the angry look on his face, he didn't like that Jack had taken control of the swarm, despite his attempts to block him. Well, fuck him.

Jack screamed again as vitae forced his bones back into position. He screamed some more, as he rolled onto his side, then onto his hands, and forced himself up. Pain was an old friend at this point. The Prince told him getting used to pain was a part of any vampire's second life, but she also admitted Jack had found himself in extremely painful situations far too often. Broken shoulders sucked, a lot, but when compared to getting his hands cut off, or getting his entire chest cavity cut open by magical werewolf claws, this was nothing.

With vitae forcing his bones together well enough to function, he ignored the pain and stood up.

You're slow. You waste vitae and you make stupid decisions. You can't control the power the Strix gave us. Let me deal with Garry!

Shut up shut up!

Snarling louder, Jack grabbed one of the nearby tables. They were long things, big enough for twenty people to sit, and covered in crates. The metal bent slightly in his grip, and he dug his feet into the floor as best he could as he lifted the table up on an angle, raising the further end higher, until its legs were higher than the other tables. With its weight pressing down toward him, he had the friction to anchor himself to the floor, and he spun, swinging the table toward Garry.

Crates went everywhere, and rats squeaked as they disappeared in the debris. Impact, hard enough to partly bend the table's edge around the elder vampire, announced success, but so did the dying squeaks of the rats. If the curse had been in control, he could have guided the rats like they'd been an extension of his body, and simply moved them out of the way. If the Ripper had swung the table, he'd have smashed the table into Garry's body so hard, the man would have folded in half.

Jack wasn't the Ripper, but that didn't mean he couldn't kick this man's ass.

Garry, on his butt with a battered table beside him, hissed and groaned as he got up. He clutched his side for a moment, but only a moment, before standing up straight again; as straight as a beast with a tail and wings would, anyway.

“Been a while since I've had a good fight. Thanks for that, kid.”

“Fuck you, Garry. This isn't a game. People are dying.”

The Gangrel laughed. “You think? Christ, if only you knew.”

“Knew what?” Probably a dumb question to ask. Letting Garry know that Jack didn't know what he meant was a classic blunder in the Danse Macabre, but at this point, he didn't care.

“Invictus and Carthians have been killing each other, in this damn fucking city, for centuries. None lately, but before you were embraced, every so often, a vampire would just disappear.” The winged creature took a step toward Jack, before casually using his other foot to knock away a dozen rats. Less rats took their place, and less, and less. There should have been more.

Jack may have taken control of the rats in the immediate area, but Garry had stopped more from coming. Shit.

“The Prince—”

“Has been doing her best to keep us cooperative, and she's succeeded. That don't mean we don't kill each other, Jack, we just make sure it stays out of the limelight. You know how many friends I've lost to the Invictus, in just the past twenty years? Five. Five vampires that, as far as the other covenants care, simply left the city. They know what really happened, though. The Invictus are good at covering their tracks, but they know. And as long as her precious Masquerade is upheld, and her city continues to function, that fucking bitch Prince won't do a damn thing. Lazy, useless whore."

Jack took a step back as another slew of his rats died to Garry's tail. They'd bit into him a hundred times, but the damage was superficial, just like it'd been with the werewolves. And unlike with the werewolves, Jack didn't have thousands upon thousands of rats this time, and they weren't replenishing either.

"You—"

"Viktor was responsible for their deaths."

"Then what the fuck!?! He's dead! Move on!"

"Michael and Maria will follow in his steps. They're Invictus. They'll do everything they can to gain control, until eventually they can oust the Prince, maybe kill her, and rule the city. But you," he pointed at Jack with a long claw, "are convinced you Invictus can play nice, and it's pissing me off. You're all assholes who'll run anyone over for a dime."

"You talk like you didn't kill any Invictus either."

He snarled, and took a step closer. "Yeah. Revenge. Justice served."

Jesus. Jack knew the Invictus and Carthians squabbled, but he had no idea it was this bad. Killing each other, and then covering it up so the Prince couldn't act it on? Holy fuck.

“Garry, we—”

The Gangrel charged him, a burst of speed that sent the corpses of rats, and dozens of crates flying. There was no arguing with this man, no getting through to him. He hated the Invictus, hated them with a passion, and had been playing shadow games with them for decades. Centuries.

The only way Jack was going to talk some sense into Garry, is if he knocked some into him first.

Garry came in close, and swiped, raking claws straight down, starting at Jack’s head. Jack stepped back, avoiding the swipe, but only by an inch. There was an opening, one Garry left on purpose, fully expecting a Ventrue to back off. So Jack stepped in, and drove his fist into the man’s sternum. Might as well have been punching metal. But it was enough to force the Gangrel a step back.

Jack was good at recovering quickly when he got hit, but Garry was better. The fucker might as well have been a boxer. A punch to the chest hard enough to break bricks wasn’t enough to stop him for long, and he came in again. And, he got bigger.

Seconds later, Garry was an eight-foot gargoyle-like creature. Well, damn, déjà vu. He wasn’t nearly as big as Sándor, but he also moved a shit load faster, vitae fueling his movements. Charging forward, Garry’s footsteps shook the boxes and rat corpses with the vibrations of his weight, and his charge sent them outward like a runaway train breaking through wooden walls, smashing them to bits. Jack could only keep backing away, until his back hit the wall.

In the back of Jack’s mind, a nasty thought ran in circles. Jessy had told Jack about Michael’s fight with Eric, and the crazy shit Michael did. Sure, Michael had zero tact, and if Jack had to guess, the man focused on his Protean transformations more than Garry did. But so far, Garry hadn’t done anything Jack couldn’t handle. Sure the transformations were scary, but they weren’t all that much crazier than what Jessy could do. Sure, the man's fighting skills were far better than Jack's, but they weren't anything Jack hadn't dealt with from fighting the werewolves.

Garry, the youngest elder in the city, was feared by Maria and Michael. Hell, he'd been feared by Viktor, considering the man had invited Garry to his balls to try and placate him. Much as Jack's grandsire was willing to be a shitty asshole and have a shadow war with Garry, he didn't want to take the man head on.

There was only one explanation for the elder's behavior in this fight. The curse had been right. Garry wasn't trying. Jack almost laughed; the gamer in him found that very insulting. Why wasn't he trying? Did he not want to kill Jack, or was he testing Jack, thinking he might be holding back as well, and waiting for an opportunity to strike?

Garry got close to Jack, stopped, and spun. A giant tail with large spikes on the tip came swinging for him, and he had to drop to the floor to keep from getting hit. The tail came down, and Jack rolled to the side, putting another table between him and the elder. With a heavy roar, Garry kicked the table, knocking it over and sending it at Jack.

He caught it, but the damn thing was heavy, and Jack was not. It drove him through a dozen crates before slamming him into the wall. Garry followed the path of destruction, snarling with every heavy step.

Jack reached down, and picked up the table by its edge, forcing it onto its side. It was big enough for Jack to use it as a shield, and Garry's oncoming tail smashed into it. The spikes on his tail skewered the table, and when Garry yanked back on his tail, the table came with it. His tail was stuck.

Why was Garry playing with him? What was he trying to do? If he was trying to spare Jack's life, the asshole could have just talked to him. Christ, he had to know Jack was more willing to talk than Michael would be. Didn't he? Or did he really believe Jack was another Viktor, just waiting to be let out?

Garry stumbled back, the weight of the attachment throwing off his balance, and Jack took advantage. He pounced at the man, driving both hands and feet into the floor and launching himself at Garry's torso. His foot collided with Garry's face, and the huge beast fell backward, balance ruined. The wings flapped wildly, smashing crates and creating a mountain of chaos, sending Jack back as one of them crashed into him before he got the chance to drive his boot up the man's nostrils.

Jack landed on his back, and groaned as crates broke his fall again. Wood crates were going to haunt his torpor nightmares for years, after this.

You suck at fighting.

Yeah, I get that.

You are right, though, as was I. Garry could be coming at you harder than he is now. He may be young for an elder, but he's had to kick some serious ass to get where he is. And he kicked us out of his mind. Me! He removed me! He's dangerous.

Little late warning me now.

"Garry, stop! This is stupid!" Snarling louder and louder, Jack forced himself to his feet. "You think I don't realize you're just fucking with me? The fuck are you trying to do? Hope I'll trigger the war?"

Garry ripped his tail free of the table as he got up, and stomped his feet as he came at Jack again. "The war never ended! This was just a break, a breather."

“You’re wrong!” Jack jumped back, ran, and slid. It was a big room, and despite all the destruction and chaos, the broken tables, dozens, probably hundreds of smashed crates, and dead rats everywhere, there was still a lot of room to move around. Once Jack had some space between him and Garry, he slid under a table, and hopped up. Now, a whole bunch of shit blocked Garry’s view to Jack.

“Get back here!”

“We had a truce, and you and Michael are ruining it!”

“How the fuck is it a truce if both the people in charge are trying to break it?” Crates smashed, and Jack put another stack of them between him and the Gangrel, as bits of cigars and shards of wood flew overhead.

“Don’t give me that shit. You don’t want to see Kindred dying anymore than I do.”

“Says you. I’ll dance on the ashes of every Invictus.”

Garry’s voice was full of anger and rage, but something else, too. Something was on Garry’s mind, but the more Jack thought about it, the more he realized it couldn’t be the usual, like the Danse Macabre and shit. That just wasn’t Garry. Garry was a Carthian, and had dedicated his life protecting his people. Sure, the man had gotten out of his comfort zone lately, going to Viktor’s balls, and working with Terra Den. Not exactly the sort of shit Carthians would normally do, but Garry was willing to get his hands dirty, and blacken his soul, if it meant helping his covenant.

Garry probably hated himself, for playing the Danse. He probably hated himself for the Carthians that died, and felt the only way he could stop it from happening, was playing the game, and killing all the Invictus. Deep seeded rage Jack would never be able to appreciate. Even when the curse had ransacked Jack’s mind, all that rage had been on the surface, and explosive. Garry hated the Invictus in the same way roommates could hate each other. Hate from intimacy and familiarity; they had to share a city, after all.

“That’s not true. You don’t hate the Invictus. You hate what the Invictus have done, to you and your friends. But you know damn fucking well that Maria and Michael aren’t that bad. That was all Viktor!”

“That’s funny, coming from his grandchilde.”

“I am not Viktor!” Christ, this was like arguing with a crazy person. A mad man. Garry was certainly mad with rage, to the point he couldn’t think clearly.

Crates flew overhead, dozens of them, and the room echoed with metal hitting metal. Jack threw himself to the side as the closest table smashed forward. It collided with the table behind where Jack had been, and more crates flew around. Maybe putting barriers between him and the Gangrel hadn’t been the best idea.

Crows above panicked and flew away, but Mulder and Scully didn’t. They flew overhead, cawing, announcing Garry’s approach.

A couple of crates flew up and smashed into the rafters above, each thrown by the elder, directly at the crows. And both Mulder and Scully fell.

Jack froze, staring up at the rafters above, at his two friends as they disappeared behind the walls of crates that surrounded him. For a quiet, freezing moment, Jack watched a few black feathers slowly spin and fall.

No. No no no.

“Jack!” Garry jumped over one of the knocked sideways tables, and landed on the concrete beside him. “If you don’t want anyone to die, just—”

Jack turned, vitae pouring through him, over him, around him, coursing through his skin and the nicks and cuts this stupid fight had given him. The blood broke through his suit, his jacket and shirt, and coiled onto him as it slithered around, and around his joints.

He drove his fist into Garry's face, and the man flew back, spinning through the air like he weighed nothing, before he collided with the floor, his own claws tearing up the concrete. His jaw half hung off his face, broken, and his animal eyes were wide with pain.

Jack stomped after him, glaring, hands clenched, and hell burning through his veins.

“I'm going to fucking kill you.”

Chapter 141

~~Natasha~~

“Transform.”

“Um, what?” they said together.

She sighed, and shook her head as she gestured around them with her flashlight. They were deep in the tunnels, the old ones. Spooky, scary, utterly terrifying, and dark. But she had her sith sight, and would be able to navigate extreme darkness that even the werewolves wouldn't be able to see in. That was partly to keep her safe, but mostly to make sure the boys could calm down before they got to the surface, if things went badly.

Long, big, empty tunnels with nothing more than a few big metal crates on wheels on old tracks. Jessy said these old tunnels were like the ones she found in that scary ghost place, and that alone had Natasha's spine crawling. Big terrifying werewolves on a berserk rampage, she could handle. Ghosts creeping up on her and slithering around in the black? No thanks.

“Tr-Transform.”

Art shook his head. “You mean the Gauru form? Jesus, that why you brought us down here? No way.”

She frowned at him and folded her arms across her chest. “Why?”

“It's dangerous,” Matt said.

“I know that.”

Sighing, Art squatted down and ran a finger along the tracks. Matt walked past him and gave the cargo crate a shove, but it didn't move. Everything down here was decrepit and abandoned. A perfect place to make some mistakes.

"Damn, this place is old," he said.

"D-Don't change the subject. I told you to transform."

Art shook his head some more. "Tash, come on, you can't ask us to just transform at will. Gauru is dangerous, and primal. We're not Eric. We have trouble controlling ourselves."

"I know, b-but I need to know I can trust you if I n-need you to transform. And it could happen."

"Why would it happen?"

"B-Because I'm going to find out what's going on in this city. I don't trust Avery to do it. Jack is busy. I'll d-do it. But I need to know what tools I have at my disposal." The boys winced. Much as the situation had seemed romantic at first, the reality was they were her tools until her mission was accomplished. "You have to do what I say, remember? If I decide we confront Red Tide or Street-Tail King, then we will. And I n-need to know I can trust you to ... t-to do what I say." And to not go berserk and maybe attack her.

Growling, Art stood up and looked to Matt, but spoke to her. "This ... isn't a good idea, Tash. You heard about what Eric did the first time he transformed."

"You've transformed hundreds of times, haven't you?"

"Yeah, but the wolf is ... it's always there. You vamps know what it's like, with your Beast. But when we use the Gauru form, it'd be like ... like letting your Beast out, and asking it to cooperate."

That was a scary idea. The Beast was nothing more than a bundle of instinct and desire. It wanted blood, territory, safety from the sun and fire, and occasionally, to spread the curse of vampirism. When vampires lost the ability to think and feel, when they lost their humanity, they became draugr, mindless slaves to the Beast. It almost never happened in Dolareido, but, sometimes, it did.

“I remember,” she said, “when we were trapped in the t-tunnels, after the azlu surprised us. Remember? You were both in Gauru form, and ... and it was scary. But you calmed down.” She nodded toward Art. “You were under control, and you helped M-Matt get control quickly. I trust you.” And she was fast, damn fast, fast enough to avoid them if she had to. Training with Daniel wasn’t wasted time.

Sighing in unison, the two men stood in front of her, and backed up. Art motioned for her to do the same, and once forty feet separated them, Art and Matt shared glances.

She knew what she was asking was mean, but they also knew what they’d done to her had been a hundred times worse, and they owed her. As far as she could tell from her time with the pack and her boys, they treated the Gauru form like how vampires thought of the Beast. Powerful, useful, dangerous, and existential. A vampire was not a vampire without it, and for the Uratha, their Gauru form was the ultimate expression of the wolf spirit half of them. She was asking them to give her command of it.

But that was the deal. They’d crossed the line tricking and attacking a dragon, and they had to pay up. She tried to frame it that way in her mind, knowing if she made it personal, it could get venomous. Yes, they’d hurt her, physically too, but more so emotionally. No, they didn’t do it for personal reasons, they did it because Avery demanded it. Yes, she was in a position to hurt them back. No, she would not. This was only about doing her job to hunt down the threat.

She loved them.

The two men began the transformation. Clothes disappeared into growing layers of fur, and muscles grew enormous. Limbs grew longer, their frames grew wider, and talons and claws erupted from toes and fingers. She gulped as the two beasts continued to grow, and she found herself taking a small step back. Sometimes, it was easy to forget that Art and Matt were both huge. Before, she used to be around them so often, that she got used to how big they were, Art being quite tall and Matt being absolutely massive.

But seeing them transform, it was a powerful reminder that their transformed states were even bigger, bigger than Eric's transformed state. Matt was the frontliner for the whole pack, and Art was their sideliner. Matt went in first, the pack followed, and Art attacked the prey from the back or side to prevent it from escaping, until the rest of the pack joined in. Both were partly solo roles. Both were werewolves that had to be big and strong enough to take care of themselves in a fight, or maybe take on their prey alone if things went badly.

So, she felt perfectly justified in being quite scared, as she looked the two beasts up and down.

Of course, looking at the two werewolves immediately hit her with memories of Eric and Jessy. She'd imagined, sure, but she had no idea just how primal it'd be, the enormous wolf monster using Jessy like a toy. Her hard abs distended with his shaft's thickness, showing just how insanely deep he—

She shook her head hard. Maybe if she didn't have Jessy for a best friend and Antoinette for a boss, she wouldn't think about sex all the time? But, she did have a horndog for a best friend, and an exhibitionist and sexologist for a boss. Not a night went by in that tower that something sexual didn't happen. The only reprieve she had from it was when she hung out with her sire.

Tash, mental note: ask your sire how his time with Athalia is going.

“Are you both ... under control?”

They both nodded, slowly, like it was difficult for them to manage. Not a good sign.

“Good.” She came closer, slow steps, like approaching a wild animal. That probably wasn’t smart. She needed to calm down, and not walk like she was approaching a vibration-sensitive bomb. “Can you talk?” She knew they could, but she needed to be sure.

“Yes,” Art said, voice a guttural, quiet bark.

“Yes,” Matt said. Good, she was more worried about her gentle giant than Arturo.

Her gentle giant. She was already thinking about them like that again. God, she was pathetic. No no, that wasn’t fair to her. She just didn’t have it in her to hold a grudge. Maybe she should? No! She was better than that.

She could ask Antoinette about it later. For now, she had to stop thinking about stupid romance crap. This was about work.

With both of them transformed, Arturo must have been almost nine feet tall, and Matthew was taller. Considering she was a little under five feet, it was beyond imposing how huge they were. She had to look up just to see their abs; of course they had abs, because for some reason all werewolves had to look ridiculously sex and fit, even when transformed.

“Squat down for me, p-please.”

They squatted down, all the way down. Flexible.

Nodding, she stood in front and between them, and looked between them. Wolf eyes, dark and aware, on huge wolf faces. Wolf face wasn't an accurate description though, because their teeth were longer, and snouts a little shorter relatively speaking. They had ridiculous massive shoulders, juggernaut muscles that connected up into titanically thick necks that bulged where their heads leaned forward naturally.

“Can I ... touch?” She might have to touch them after all, if they got into a fight and she had to use them for cover, or maybe climb them, or something.

Matthew looked at Arturo, and Arturo nodded. Matt generally looked to Art when it came to decisions, and it made sense, cause Arturo was a smart, quick-witted guy. But seeing the giant beast still look to his friend to make decisions made her smile. They were still them, even in their war forms.

Tash reached up, and with a shaking hand, touched Arturo's face, now that it was level with hers. Her fingers found the side of his snout, and she lightly stroked the short fur. Those, were some absolutely massive teeth.

Arturo managed a quiet chuckle, a deep rumbling sound that made her squeak and lift her hand off him.

“We're in control,” he said. “Won't hurt you.”

She gulped, nodded, and touched his snout again, and Matt's as well with her other hand. They were wide behemoths of muscle, and unlike vampires, were very much alive. Each breath they made was deep, their exhales heavy enough she felt the air drift around her. Heat poured off their bodies, warming the cool underground. And this close to her, she could literally hear their heartbeats. Babum. Babum. Drums in their enormous chests.

She touched their arms. Yeap, pure steel, and very warm, under a thin layer of fur. She touched their enormous shoulders, and behind them, where their backs curved forward to connect to their forward-leaning wolf heads. The fur there was longer, fluffier, like a mane. Ears, shorter than wolf ears, but wider. Again, good for fighting, less likely to get caught. She slipped a hand into Matt's, and gulped as she stared at the enormous thing utterly dwarfing hers. Eric's hand was big enough to circle most of Jessy's waist, when he transformed. This hand probably could circle all of Natasha's, mostly cause she was so much smaller than Jessy, but still.

"Natasha," Matt said, voice a deep rumble.

"Still in control?" she asked, leaning in closer to the giant's snout.

"Yes. No hunt. Easy to ... breathe."

Breathe. That was something she'd heard Jessy say Eric talked about. For some reason the man thought it was important, that he breathe. Meditation, maybe? Whatever it was, both werewolves did it, and she watched their chests and stomachs slowly expanding with each, slow, deep breath.

"Ok, that's enough for now. Y-You can transform again."

Matt looked to Art. Art nodded, and transformed. Into a wolf.

She shook her head. "What? No, I meant—"

Matt transformed into a wolf as well. Two wolves stood in front of her, and perfectly in sync, sat down. Like doggies!

"Nooo, you know I can't resist d-d-dogs!"

Art panted, tongue hanging out, and strode up to her. He nudged his big wolf head into her side, and rubbed his thick furry mane against her hands. Soft! Oh god, so soft. Matt did the same, grinning a big, dopey grin as he rubbed his bigger body against hers, almost knocking her over.

She sighed, but couldn't wipe the smile off her face. Before she knew it, she knelt down and hugged them, and buried her face in their big warm furry necks.

“You know I'm still m-mad, right? You ... you really hurt me. You tricked me. It ... it w-won't be easy to forget.”

They both whined, doggy whines, and she felt her heart break. That, was cheating.

“But, it's ok. I understand why you did it.” Funny. It was easier to be direct and honest about things when they were big dogs. Maybe they transformed for that reason? Art was too damn smart.

She sighed again, smiled, and pet their backs and chests as she hid her face in their necks some more.

~~Damien~~

This close to the building, his phone stopped working. No signal. But, he'd been talking to Gloria just minutes ago. He knew the Carthians had some anarchist hacker types, but blocking out communications in an area? Terra Den, had to be, probably trying to cause problems for him and any other Kindred attempting to salvage this mess.

No use in waiting anymore. He jumped through a window.

The Xnomina building didn't have bulletproof glass except on the top floor, where the big meetings were often held. He jumped in through the third floor, after noticing someone had already put some bullets through it. The glass shattered easily enough, and he landed on foot and knee as he looked around the office room.

Fire greeted him.

No amount of training could ever prepare a vampire for dealing with fire. It radiated heat, unleashed sparks, crackled like a malevolent beast, and licked the air randomly. The heat didn't exactly bother him; he was undead, and temperature meant little. The issue was the combustion that came with it. One misstep and a wave of flame might hit him and set him ablaze like paper in a fire pit.

Sure, Kindred often got fire retardant clothing, as Damien did, but that didn't mean anything against a blaze.

"Amanda!" No answer. The roar of the flame wasn't too large; the building wasn't on fire, just the furniture and whatnot. But it wasn't nothing, and he strained his hearing against the noise of the burning furniture and the sprinklers trying to put it out. "Amanda!" Still nothing.

He hugged his coat tight over his head and ran into the hallway. The sprinkler kept the hallway wet, and there wasn't much in there to burn. Walking through it soaked him; probably a good thing. He growled as he slowly lowered his coat as he walked the hall, hands ready to draw if he needed to. If there were any Carthian kine in the building, he'd deal with them. Jack told him to avoid killing, even the thralls and ghouls, and he would try, but fire limited his options. If he had to cut through a dozen bodies to get to Amanda, he would.

Nothing. He stalked forward through the hall, checking and opening doors for each office. Not all were on fire, but most were. The Carthians must have attacked the building from multiple sides, and thrown in molotovs or incendiary explosives. He found the traces of what could only have been small explosions in many of the rooms.

Molotovs were perfectly reasonable for Carthian thralls and ghouls, but the latter? Some kind of military tech probably. Terra Den's work. Invictus used to have the technological advantage in any confrontation with the Carthians, but that advantage was slipping away.

This didn't make any sense. Garry and Michael were trying to bait each other into overstepping themselves, so one covenant would clearly be considered the villain of the war. That'd make it easier to get the Prince on their side, and to rally the Kindred of their own covenant. This attack was like two countries who held an uneasy truce, suddenly having one of their leaders declaring war for no obvious reason. There'd be hidden, and non-obvious reasons, sure, but no obvious one. War was complicated, and the average person was either too stupid to understand or too unwilling to care about details. They needed a big 'here's the enemy and here's why, kill them!' sign.

With the Mirrden district and the Tanvar building, the Carthians had a reason to get aggressive. It was territory they used to own, and territory that directly affected their half of South Side. If any Carthians died attacking those, the Carthians would rally together, and the Invictus would too. The Invictus would certainly get violent if one of their own died. Both covenants would rally and go to war.

For the Carthians to attack Xnomina obviously painted the Carthians as the aggressors, attacking a building they'd never owned or wanted to own. The Invictus would rally, but maybe half the Carthians would probably think Garry was crazy for attacking it, and probably war hungry.

That was the Danse Macabre, having to trick your own covenant into doing what you wanted it to do. Michael and Garry wanted the war, preferably with the other overstepping, but both were probably willing to start the war on even ground. Attacking the Xnomina HQ was not how to do that.

Unless this was all a distraction? A pretty damn risky distraction, using fire. But effective. Damien was here, and—and so was Isabella.

“Madam Leauvion.” Damien ran across the hall as he saw the woman step into the fire escape stairway. She held the door open for him.

“Mister Burksen. I take it you came here when you learned the building was under attack?” She held a contemptuous smile, dressed in a trench coat of her own, something to protect against the flames.

“Madam Turio sent me.” He looked up and down the stairway. Metal, surrounded by walls of concrete. The air was hot and filled with the smell of burning chemicals and smoke, but none of that bothered a vampire.

“Have you seen Miss Vendram?”

Right, of course she’d be worried about her lover.

“No. I know she wasn’t here, though. Rest assured. Miss Jennings is in the basement bunker, and says the neonates here are down there with her. But, she thinks Miss Pol is still up here.”

“Amanda?” Isabella groaned as she leaned over the metal railing and looked down the spiraling stairs. “She’s in here? Damn. I hope she’s not dead.”

Damien nodded and looked past Isabella up the stairs. But instead of running up them to the next floor where any vampire running from an invading force might go if cut off, he stayed still, and kept Isabella in the corner of his eye.

“How did you know to come?” he asked.

“What?”

“You’re always down in your underground lair with your troupe, mastering your art. How’d you know to come here?”

“Because Mister McDonald contacted me, you damn fool. I still have internet down there.”

“Right.” The phones had been working earlier. “You left your troupe?”

“Yes.”

“Because you thought Miss Vendram might be here.”

“Yes. Why am I justifying myself to you?”

Because every word she said made her seem more suspicious, but he couldn’t put a finger on it.

“Alright. Cover my six. Do you have a weapon?”

“I’m Daeva, Burksen.” She raised a hand and curled a few of her fingers. “Don’t be ridiculous.”

Of course. It wasn’t only Ventrue who relished hubris.

“I think we should check each floor for survivors before checking the top floor, and see what Mister McDonald has to say. Assuming he’s still here.”

“Of course. Lead the way, Right Hand.”

He frowned at her and her thinly veiled contempt, but stepped past her and started up the stairs.

And stopped. He turned, and eyed Isabella, earning a raised brow from her.

There was no way she didn’t know Hella was with Jack tonight.

“You knew Hella wasn’t here.”

“Excuse me?”

She blinked at him, confusion and surprise on her face. But whether they were legitimate, he couldn’t tell. She was a professional actress, and old, older than him, perfectly capable of telling the most convincing lies.

“I’ve been Invictus for a long time, Burksen. We know the drill. Hella was told to keep that information to herself, I’m sure.”

“While you, what?”

“While I spied on Carthian activity. We’ve played this game many times, and know how to keep our work lives out of our personal lives. And besides, McDonald has explained that we share information on a need-to-know basis.” Snarling, she turned and looked down over the railing. “You were there for that meeting.”

“I was. But I also don’t believe for a second that you and Hella wouldn’t have talked to each other regardless. You don’t care for Michael or the Invictus and their rules.” He spread his legs and leaned his weight forward onto the balls of his feet, all slight and hopefully not noticeable. “Which means you knew she wasn’t here. Which means you just lied to me.”

Slowly, her annoyed face shifted into a playful grin, the sort a cat might make before finishing off a terrified mouse.

“You’re right, of course. Silly me, I should have thought of another lie, but I didn’t expect to run into you. Aren’t you still recovering?”

He ground his teeth and glared at her. "I'm healed. That's why I'm here."

"I see." She tapped her fingers on the railing, long nails sending echoes through the stairway of metal. "Your girlfriend's blood must be quite potent."

He didn't answer. He didn't move. He wasn't fully healed, and if Isabella lunged for him, getting out of the way wouldn't be easy. It'd been stupid of him to not draw the sword preemptively, and now it sat between his shoulder blades, useless when Isabella, someone perhaps just as fast as him, was six feet away.

"Explain yourself."

"Why should I?"

"Because I'm a Right Hand and I demand answers."

"You're a church boy. You work for Maria, and she isn't Invictus anymore."

"The First and Second Estate remain allies." The Second Estate basically didn't exist, and it'd take years for Maria and Damien to get any traction. But they wouldn't let that stop them. "Regardless, I remain a Right Hand."

"So you say." She smiled at him, her typical deadly, sharp smile, and took a step away from him. Back to a wall of concrete, she leaned against it, folded her arms across her chest, and tapped her fingers on her arm. "I am here because a war is about to erupt, and I have no intention of throwing my life away because of the ambitions of a stupid old man."

Stupid old man, not men? If she'd said men, she'd have meant Garry and Michael, but she didn't.

“You don’t agree with Michael’s plans for war.”

“Of course not. Do you?”

He winced.

She laughed. “There, you see? We are not so blind as to ignore stupidity when it knocks on our door. It must be dealt with. And right now, that stupidity is the one remaining councilman of the Invictus. Even Viktor, tyrant that he was, attempted to make peace with Garry.”

“Because it served as a better grounds to manipulate, not because he wanted peace.”

“Nonetheless, fake peace is still peace.”

“Then you’re here to kill Michael? I find it highly unlikely you could kill him.”

“In a straight fight, of course not.”

“But ... but if fire is at hand...”

“Then a surprise attack from one of his oldest Kindred, using flame, will lead to a swift death.”

Damien almost reached for his sword, but stopped himself. The step back to the wall she’d made wasn’t her lowering her guard, it was her inviting him to make the first move, leaving himself open.

“You’re telling me quite a bit,” he said.

“Perhaps I don’t think you’ll live to tell anyone.”

“No, I don’t think that’s it.”

“Oh?”

“You’re telling me because, like you said, I’m not so blind that I can ignore stupidity. You’re hoping I’ll help you, because you realize you’ve been put in a dangerous situation. You can’t risk fighting me, and taking a swing at Michael, so you’re trying to make the best of a bad situation.”

Her smile grew. “And? It’s not like Maria holds Michael in particularly high regard.”

“Maybe not, but she wouldn’t throw away her only ally with power either.”

“True. But if Michael died, and we let the Carthians take a more dominant position, there doesn’t need to be a war.” Her smile grew until it turned sinister. “I am more than capable of running this covenant, well enough to keep it out of harm’s way. Enough to serve my purposes, at the very least.”

A growl crept its way up his throat. “Isabella, did you talk with Garry and organize this attack on Xnomina?”

Her smile did not falter. “Of course. I needed the opening, after all.”

That, did not make sense. He raised a brow as he watched her, trying to figure out what her intent was, because her words did not match the reality. If she wanted to work with Garry to help kill Michael, this was a pitiful attempt. The attack on Xnomina accomplished nothing but to be a grain of sand in Michael’s shoe. The building was not that important, and even if it were, it wouldn’t burn down. The government would want to investigate, but the Invictus controlled them, and everything would easily get swept under the rug.

If his regrown leg had been operating at one hundred percent, he’d have jumped away, and gone for his sword or pistol. He was at a physical disadvantage, and skilled as he was, Isabella was about twenty years older than him in Kindred years. Fighting her, and maybe beating the answers out of her wouldn't be easy. But, there was another way.

He reached into his core, summoned his vitae, and used Auspex. With plenty of his lover's blood filling him, vitae was in ample supply, and he had no trouble fueling the Mekhet Discipline to its fullest. And with its power coursing through his senses, he asked himself a question.

Did Isabella conspire with Garry?

The Beast whispered in the only language it understood, sensations and images. Isabella stood there, and for a brief moment, Garry stood beside her. Isabella looked away from him, and Garry from her, and the Beast changed Isabella's expression to match Garry's: disdain. They had not spoken to each other, or at least, did not seem to have cooperated for this particular attack.

So, Isabella was lying about working with Garry. Why? Was she trying to trick Damien? Or did she suspect he might actually be the one responsible for the attack on Xnomina? Damn Kindred and their infuriating, ever present paranoia.

The drain on his vitae was immediate. His Beast did not like doing this, reaching out and grabbing secrets from the air, reading into a thousand subconscious ticks from his victim, or communicating with otherworldly forces for the answers he sought. He didn't know how Auspex truly worked, neither did Lucas or Daniel, but all Mekhet relied on its strange ability to see beyond what could be seen.

Sometimes Auspex provided answers. Usually, it just made things more confusing. But nonetheless, he asked his Beast another. Why was Isabella here?

Again, images and sensations. A quiet hum, like a night street in the rain. Isabella on a rooftop, daggers in hand, with Hella behind her, beaten and broken. Michael, and Garry, in an alley with fire behind each of them. And ... Elaine, on the rooftops, beside Isabella?

He frowned as he struggled to parse the images. Isabella was an opportunist, that much was obvious, but the images made it seem like she was doing it to defend Hella. Maybe she was? Maybe she really did love Hella to the point she'd risk her life and run into a burning building, to see if there was an opportunity, any at all, to end this conflict before it began. To kill Michael.

Or he was reading the Beast's message wrong, and Isabella really was just an opportunistic bitch looking to take down either Michael or Garry, whichever one netted her the bigger gain. Maybe something orchestrated by Elaine?

"You're lying," he said.

"Am I?"

"Yes, you are. You didn't speak with Garry. You're here because you sense an opportunity. And ... you said you worked with Garry, because you wanted to see what I would do."

She rolled her eyes. "Damn Mekhet." Unlikely she understood how Auspex worked or the extent of its abilities, but Mekhet were notorious for learning things they shouldn't have been able to.

"You think I'll help you kill Michael?"

"I just wanted to test you."

"Don't give me that. If I said yes, let's kill Michael, you'd do it." He relaxed, a little, and gestured to her. "How arrogant are you, to ask me to betray the Invictus, here in Xnomina?" Not to mention the building was currently on fire.

“Oh calm down, bishop. We’re just talking.” She licked a fang. “And it’s not like you haven’t rushed a building with aim to kill an elder before, either.”

“You’re a snake.”

“Ha! Am I?”

“Yes. You will twist and worm your way through any scenario, all with the goal to pursue your vain interests.” He slowly reached for his sword, watching her intently, vitae pouring into his legs in case he needed to move. “You will accompany me as we check the rest of these floors.”

Her smile turned absolutely serpentine, obviously meant to mock him. “You trust me at your back?”

He did his best to mirror the smile. He knew he couldn’t. Devious grins and slithering smiles were not tools in his repertoire, and all it did was make her laugh.

“No. You’re going first.”

She stopped laughing. “I don’t think so.”

“I could easily tell Michael that you’re conspiring against him.”

“Oh please, he already knows. Were you embraced yesterday?”

Of course. Damien had been taught to serve God, and that the Lancea et Sanctum were extensions of God’s will. The other covenants, particularly the Invictus, were taught to pursue power and money to the point it was expected for the young to eventually conspire against their elders. Jack had told him once that the Invictus were essentially ‘Sith’, or dark Jedi or something. The Star Wars analogy proved more and more correct with each passing moment.

“You can continue your games against Michael if you want,” he said, and he raised his sword to point it at the Daeva, “but tonight, I’m here. We will check the floors for any trapped Kindred, and we will check them together. If you so much as look to the exit, Hella Vendram will be directing those plays without you.”

Her smile broke, and she glared daggers into him as she pushed from the wall, and started up the stairs.

What did Jack always say? Why didn’t things ever go smooth? Jack often laughed when he said it. Probably making a movie reference Damien didn’t know.

The saying was terribly true, regardless. Things never went smooth. In stories, things always had crystal clear purposes, obvious villains, and blatant choices to make, usually juvenile, simple moral choices. The obvious choices weren’t always obvious to the characters, but the choices, the deceptions, the moral imperatives, they were made obvious to the reader. This situation was anything but simple. He was in a burning building with a potential villain, potential ally, and they were attempting damage assessment, perhaps rescue any trapped Kindred, while also trying to figure out why the Carthians had attacked it. A feint? A ploy? They didn’t know, and that made each step through the building unnerving.

He hated not knowing. All Mekhet hated not knowing.

Using fire on the building was a surefire way to annoy the Prince; she wanted her city to run smooth. Each time one of the covenants drew her eye by disrupting her city, they risked her wrath, and this attack certainly risked angering her to the point she might make an example of Garry’s overzealousness. She made the rules. If she wanted, she could change them. Maybe she’d decide to enforce a ‘no Kindred deaths’ rule, and any individual caught murdering another Kindred would die to the sheriff. But that could backfire, considering there were only three dragons in Dolareido. Strong as Natasha, Antoinette, and Daniel were, they couldn't bully the whole city.

He sighed and shook his head. Consider the Danse Macabre later. For now, worry about the Masquerade, the fire, and any Kindred lives to save.

The hallway was mostly fine. Sprinklers were on, and the hallway was nothing but marble. But the heat was great, and he winced as he opened one door, and then another. The fires in most rooms were out or dying, the sprinklers finally winning the battle. Or rather, the sprinklers stopped the flames from devouring the last remnants of couches, desks, tables, and electronics, battle already won. No Kindred or kine.

He kept his eyes on Isabella as she did the same, and she grinned at him over her shoulder every so often. Surprisingly, she didn't use her Majesty to try and seduce him. Perhaps she thought he'd realize what she was doing before she managed to get her hooks into his mind. Perhaps she felt her opportunity to betray Michael tonight was a lost cause. Or maybe she just wanted to genuinely help him find anyone who might be hurt.

They did find some Kindred, trapped behind flames. A couple of neonates, terrified, backs to the wall, and eyes wide with Beastly panic. The Beast knew to avoid fire, but it could also be a stupid creature, and when it took hold it often caused Kindred to pursue instinct to the point of fault. But with a little ingenuity, and a long sword, Damien moved the burning material and helped them out from risky situations.

Damien and Isabella reached the top floor, where there were no flames. There were a few rooms up on the top floor of the Xnomina HQ, but most of the floor was dedicated to the council room, where the triumvirate used to host their private meetings. It was also where they frequently gave orders to the Right Hands.

A deadly presence loomed within, one he'd grown familiar with. Damien knocked.

"Yes, come in."

He pushed open the door, walked in, and with a glance over his shoulder, silently ordered Isabella to do the same. She rolled her eyes, but did.

"Mister McDonald," he said.

"Mister Burksen. Madam Leuvion." McDonald stood at the other side of the large room, hands behind his back, eyes cast out the large window, and he scanned the streets below. The calm stance reeked of foreboding.

"Sir, most of the Kindred who were in the building are downstairs in the bunker, and we saved a few others we found trapped by flame."

"Yes, as I expected."

"But, Madam Leuvion and I haven't been able to find Miss Pol. Her sire says she was in the building, but—"

Micheal shook his head, and slowly looked over his shoulder to Damien. "Amanda Pol ... is dead."

~~Jack~~

Garry recovered quickly. He ignored his ruined jaw as he forced himself back to his feet, and a single, hard flap of his wings launched him away from Jack. The wind gush sent crates everywhere, and dozens of them smashed into Jack's body hard. He didn't care. The corners of wooden crates were sharp things, and they cut into his suit, but failed to pierce the coursing rivers of blood that flowed over him. Nothing more than bug bites.

Feels good, doesn't it? Just give in. Easy to let the power out when the rage takes hold.

Jack ignored the voice, and stomped after Garry.

“You hurt my friends.”

The demon Gangrel stumbled over crates as he stepped back, and with a sickening crunch, realigned his jaw. He moved it around a few times, like a snake adjusting its jaw bones after yawning.

“They were scouting for you. I—”

“They’re my friends!” They were still alive. He still had his connection to them, Animalism and his spread blood telling him his two friends weren’t dead. But they were injured. They were dying. “You have any idea how easily birds die, Garry? You have any idea how brittle bird bones are? You have any idea how little blood a bird has, and how easy it is for a bird to bleed to death?”

He had to give Garry credit, the elder didn’t let Jack’s sudden aggression surprise him. Garry ran at him, full on monster style, talons tearing up the concrete floor as his tail whipped around behind him. And despite his massive size, Garry was fast, faster than Jessy’s story about Michael suggested the older Gangrel could ever be. Maybe that was the secret to Garry’s success, a balance of powers instead of dedication to Protean transformations. Either way, the man charged at Jack like a bullet.

Jack let him tackle him. Jack didn’t have the speed or mass, but once he had an anchor or leverage, the curse gave him the strength to do serious harm. Grappling was a great anchor.

Garry’s enormous claws sank into Jack’s delts and back as the man grabbed his shoulders again. His shoulders didn’t break this time though, even as the elder’s crazy claws pierced his blood shield. The agony was white noise at this point, lost to the scalding inferno surging up and down Jack's spine. Garry tried to move his claws, to cut through Jack, to shred him and rip him into pieces. But he couldn't. His claws were stuck, trapped by the blood.

Jack didn't have much room to move, with the huge gargoyle-like Garry squeezing on his shoulders, but he had enough. He got his hands around the man's thickened wrists, squeezed, and twisted. For all Garry's strength, he rolled his head back and shrieked like some sort of night monster, as Jack's fingers began to break bone, same as Garry had done to his shoulders earlier.

Trapped on the floor underneath Garry, Jack twisted his body, and got both hands onto one of the bastard's wrists. Garry stood up, but his claws, still stuck in Jack's body, took him up with him. Clenching his teeth and growling, voice unrecognizable to even him, Jack twisted hard, and harder, until bones broke and flesh ripped.

Garry forced himself away with another hard flap of his wings, the two of them blasting Jack with insane amounts of wind, enough for Garry to rip one set of claws free of Jack's body. But the other remain lodged where it was as Jack destroyed the man's wrist, like twisting a piece of celery in half.

The flesh tore, and Garry screamed again as he got away, leaving one of his hands behind.

Jack let go of the limp, useless hand, and stared at Garry as the elder's appendage and claws erupted into tiny cinders. The tiny puff of flame was too small and weak to set flesh on fire, and the cinders turned to ash a second later, falling to the floor over Jack's shoes.

"You hurt my friends." Jack shook out his shoulders, his blood forcing bones back into place, and filling the holes the fucking Gangrel managed to create. The elder was strong, very strong, to be able to penetrate straight through Jack's defenses, but not so strong that he could free himself when he committed to a grapple.

And not so strong he could resist Jack's strength. "You hurt my friends!"

Garry snapped his wings again, putting fifty feet between him and Jack as he leapt away with the gush of air, landing on the opposite side of the room. One of his arms dangled, wrist a mangled mess, and drops of dark vampire blood fell to the floor before turning to ash. Anger filled his beastly eyes, and his tail slowly slithered behind him as he glared at Jack.

"So this is you, eh? Once I push you to the wall and threaten your pets, you freak out." Garry pointed his one remaining hand at Jack. "Look at you. I've seen rage like that before, you know. Guess where?"

Viktor. The bastard meant Viktor.

This guy just won't shut up. Kill him! He attacked your friends, your pets. Kill him. There's no Carthian in this city who's a threat once this guy's gone.

Garry was definitely a threat, that was true. Even as the Gangrel pointed at Jack, his hand began to regrow. Ventrue and Gangrel were more resilient than the other blood clans, and didn't take as long to heal, but to regrow a limb in moments? Jack had only ever seen Viktor perform such a feat. And yet, there Garry stood, doing exactly that, regrowing his demon hand complete with claws.

It hurt him, drained him, to do it. Jack could see the pain and effort it took Garry to replace his lost appendage. But there was no doubt the Gangrel was strong, stronger than he let on, to be able to replace a limb that quickly.

Just let the anger out. You can kill him easily.

Don't think I don't realize that anger is a part of you. You're trying to corrupt me.

So? Feels good, doesn't it? We haven't really mixed with each other since you broke my chains.

Jack snapped his head to the side.

I hated every moment of you mingling yourself with my emotions! We're not doing that again!

Then let me out and I'll deal with things myself.

I'm not—

He killed your birds, Jack. He deserves to be punished.

Jack forced himself to look back to where he knew Mulder and Scully had fallen, but he couldn't see them with all the tables and crates in the way. Animalism couldn't find them anymore. He couldn't hear them. The room had grown quiet as the swarm died away, but Mulder and Scully had continued to caw despite their dying numbers. Had. They were silent now, and probably dead.

Dead. His friends. Dead.

Garry does deserve to be punished, doesn't he?

Fuck yes he does. Kill him, and kill every Carthian who tries to avenge him. You think any of them can stop me? Us?

That was a pleasing thought. He didn't have to play ambassador, peace keeper, or any of that shit. He could just force the issue. Kill Garry, dismantle the Carthians, and bring peace that way.

Just get angry. Remember how good it felt to get angry? Remember when Angela first kidnapped you, and you let the anger out, so you could escape? Remember how mother fucking good that felt, all that power?

Settle down there, Palpatine.

I'm just being honest. You should try it sometime. You want to let the rage out, and to rip this fucker into bits. Him and his whole damn covenant.

You're lying.

Lie, me? Never. The truth is far too much fun.

Jack slowly grinned at Garry, glaring. Of course the Gangrel didn't hear the joke. He wouldn't hear anything in a moment.

"You killed my friends. I can't hear them anymore." He came closer, gently kicking aside some crates as he did. No need to rush this. "You killed ... my friends."

Garry stood his ground, eyes locked on Jack as his hand regrew, skin shifting and tearing as it spread over new muscle and bone. His massive claws returned, and the Gangrel flexed his fingers to test them, like breaking in a new pair of shoes.

"Consider it a down payment for the things the Invictus have done to me."

"I haven't done anything to you!"

"You're Invictus, kid. You think I would have gone easy on your sire, just cause I liked him? Viktor was a fucking menace, and his two buddies aren't exactly innocent, but your sire kept working with them."

"Julias tried to change things."

"Your sire was as useful as a pacifist in a war."

"We're not at war!"

Garry let out a slow, deep growl from his demon mutt face. "Yes, we fucking are."

Jack lunged for the man, but Garry flapped both his wings hard, hitting Jack with a blast of air and a mess of debris. The moment his feet came in contact with the floor again, Garry charged, talons ripping up the floor as he smashed through the chaos. Jack braced for impact, but Garry ducked low at the last minute, body bending with flexibility Jack hadn't expected. And instead of going for a slice or stab, Garry's claws shortened at the last second, and he got his grip around Jack's wrists. Probably wanted to return the favor.

Jack twisted in the Gangrel's grip as the monster's huge weight fell on him, but Garry had grown stronger. No, not stronger, the fucker had just been pulling his punches before.

He was taunting you.

No, he wasn't. He was trying to figure out what to do.

Like that's any better. So he's just being smart about the fight, making sure he didn't show his hand and make a mistake.

I don't think that's it, either. He was...

He killed your friends!

Jack glared up at the vampire, and tried to get his feet under him so he could kick him off. But, even transformed into some sort of big gargoyle demon thing, Garry was a fighter through and through. He got between Jack's legs and held his hands down, doing some proper grappling.

Jack grit his teeth, and pushed his wrists up, slowly lifting them off the floor against Garry's efforts. Blood slipped in and out of the holes in Jack's body, flowing and coursing over his skin as he channeled his frustration. Garry's eyes widened, and the following thrill that coursed through Jack's body was euphoric. Garry was afraid.

The Gangrel roared, and his sides split open. Holy shit. Two more arms erupted from the man's sides, forming in a mess of blood and breaking bones like something out of The Thing. Jack's eyes went wide, and soon a shredding cry cut through his throat as Garry sank ten claws into Jack's sides.

"Get off me!" Jack forced his hands higher and higher, Garry's grip on his wrists unable to stop him. His hands grew closer to the man's throat, and no matter how hard Garry pushed against him or squeezed his wrists, he couldn't stop him. Jack's vitae refused to let his bones break, just as its coursing veins filled him with strength.

If he got his hands around the man's throat, he was going to rip his head off.

Garry let go of his wrists and jumped up, claws from his extra pair of hands ripping free of Jack's guts on the way out. But before Jack could get back up, the man snapped at him with his tail. Snapped, with teeth, cause the damn thing turned into some sort of snake head as it closed in on him.

Its giant fangs sank into Jack's body, but the pain was nothing at this point. If Jack could—no, Garry had other plans. He whipped his tail to the side hard, and Jack went flying, the huge, eyeless snake head letting him go. The world, once again, turned into a big, spinning mess, and Jack tucked into a ball as the inevitable pain of wooden crates catching him became intimately familiar.

When things stopped spinning, Jack got his hands on the floor and pushed up. But Garry's talons found his back, and squashed him into the floor as the huge monster pinned him.

"I said get off me!"

Garry's huge talons sank into Jack's back, but they didn't matter. Vampire blood rushed through the wounds, forcing his body to keep working, no matter how much Garry cut into him. And try as the brute might to pin Jack to the floor, physics were still a thing. Unless Garry had an anchor, all he had to work with was his own body weight, and at this point, Jack was confident he could throw a truck.

Sharp wood cut at Jack's skin, and he blinked down at the crate that'd been crushed under his chest. With a grin, he slammed his palm down against the wood, and sure enough, a long splint of it broke from the rest of the crate, trapped under his hand.

He forced himself back up onto his palms and knees, even as Garry tore at his back. But for all the Gangrel's insane might, he couldn't cause any real damage. His talons slowed as they cut through muscle, only for Jack to heal the muscle around them. The claws couldn't damage his bones at all.

Garry's weight shifted, and Jack twisted. Slicing air told Jack he'd just barely avoided getting Garry's claws to the side of his neck; fucker wasn't holding back anymore. Garry stepped to the side, unable to keep his balance as Jack rolled, and he had to step off his back or fall over. But he didn't go far, staying close and slicing at Jack with two of his four arms.

Jack let them hit him, pouring his vitae through his limbs. Hate, rage, burning heat that blocked out everything, it hardened his body as he fueled the Discipline. Garry's claws stuck in Jack's left arm, and right side, serrated claws tearing his suit and flesh alike. But his right arm was still free.

Snarling, a completely inhuman sound, Jack slammed his right hand upward. The splint of wood, shy of a foot long, had a nasty edge to it that ran from tip to side, and it cut up Jack's palm and underside of his fingers with impact. But it was worth it.

Garry tried to step back, but his claws were stuck in Jack again. He shrieked like a demon banshee as he twisted and turned his head, but Jack held onto the stick, making sure it remained lodged in the underside of the man's jaw, up through the soft flesh, up through his tongue, and into the top of his mouth. He could tell from how deep the makeshift stake went that it wasn't hard enough to punch through the bone of the roof of the Gangrel's mouth, not one as strong as Garry anyway, and its tip didn't penetrate into the man's skull. But the screams of pain from the creature as he tried to pull his head back from the wood skewering his jaw, tried and failed, were exquisite.

If Jack had tried to stab the man in the heart, Garry's body, hardened skin, ribs or muscle, would have broken the stake on contact. Hell, Garry would have probably somehow managed to twist or dodge, likely recognizing the stabbing motion. But an upward stab for the jaw? He hadn't seen that coming, the fucker.

Garry still had two more arms though, and as Jack twisted the piece of wood inside the man's flesh, the Gangrel shoved him away hard. Jack held on. Wood broke apart from the shift in angle and momentum, Jack's hand snapping up and away as Garry threw him back. Six inches of the jagged wood remained lodged in the Gangrel's jaw and tongue, and he shrieked all the more as he clawed at his throat with the smaller set of claws, trying to grab it.

Jack stood up from the floor again, grinning as the huge demon struggled with his wound. That had to hurt. But not enough. It didn't hurt him enough. Garry had to suffer, had to scream, had to—

Slowly, Jack turned his head, and looked down at his two birds. He recognized them instantly, surrounded by the corpses of rats and a few other birds. The shape of their feathers, their beaks, he knew them on sight, and he gulped on a dry throat as he stared at them.

The fuck are you doing? Get him! Look at him clawing at his throat like a bitch. Totally open! Sucker punch him, and rip out his guts!

Mulder ... Scully...

They're dead! Come on, focus!

I ... I can do something. I was too late for Mary, but they're ... still alive!

He shook his head hard enough his brain smashed against his skull, and he fell to his knees beside his pets. They were still alive, but in shock. Only when he got onto his hands beside them, and nudged his fingertips against their heads did they respond.

Scully first. She flapped one of her wings, but it didn't bend right, and she shuddered. A tiny clicking sound in her throat told him she was in pain, a lot more than a broken wing would cause. Another click told him he should get away from the other two-leg who gave her pain. Mulder tried to touch Jack with his beak, but his neck was twisted too far, and he couldn't straighten it out. He managed a quiet caw, but it was cut with some weird coughing sounds. Jack had never heard a bird cough before. It sounded horrible.

The searing heat in his veins, gone. The boiling rage clouding his thoughts, gone. He almost scooped up his friends, but they struggled more the moment he touched them, both clicking and coughing some more noises. Too much pain.

"Jack," Garry said, stomping toward him, "I'm not fucking done with you." The wood was out of his throat, and the hole was healed over, blood splattered over his chest.

Garry was a deadly vampire, and the insane healing he showed off now was proof. The transformations, yeah they were impressive, something Jessy couldn't do, but the healing was what was extreme. Killing him wouldn't be easy, if Jack even could. And by the time he'd be done, it might be too late.

"Garry, stop. I have to save them."

“You fucking kidding me?” Snorting, Garry came at him faster, leaning forward, weird snake tail whipping around behind him. “You expect me to—”

“I killed Lucas! Ok!” Jack snapped his gaze to the man, and met his fucked up gargoyle eyes. “I killed Lucas, when he attacked the Prince. Not only him, I fucking killed Viktor and Tony, too. I started that fire. I killed them!” Oh fuck what was he doing? If this didn’t work, if Garry didn’t give him five minutes of peace for this info, this could be a problem. Would Michael or Garry care? Did Tony have any Kindred that still loved him, or maybe kine who did? How many Kindred would want Jack dead over this? How many wouldn’t? He had no idea. It was why he and Antoinette decided to keep it a secret, because the repercussions were so unknowable.

Well, fuck it, another cross to bear. He was fine with that, if it meant he could help Mulder and Scully.

Garry froze, weight driving him forward in a skid, and he had to open his wings to keep from falling over. Eventually he came to a stop five feet from Jack, and he stared down at him, mouth hanging open.

“You’re lying.”

“Do I look like a fucking liar to you?” He ground his teeth as he stared at the man. But he was desperate. He needed to get Garry to back off now. “Viktor and me, we were in that old building, hunting Tony, and he said he wanted to kill the Prince. I ... disagreed with that. I shouldn’t have said it. He cut me open. I had to set the building on fire to survive, and to make sure he ... would never hurt Antoinette. And Lucas, his suicide squad had nearly killed her, but I jumped out and surprised them.”

“You expect me to believe you killed that squad?”

“The Prince had killed a lot of them already. The others, I ... I killed by using Damien. I Dominated him, and killed them. And then I killed Lucas, with Damien.”

“You—”

“Garry, just ... just back off for a minute and let me help them, ok? I ... fuck, I don’t know what to do.”

Idiot! You’re letting your guard down! He’s going to get you. Stab you in the back when you’re not looking. Something! Get up and fucking defend yourself!

After a second, Garry sighed, and squatted, just like a gargoyle perching. Well, at least he wasn’t charging at him, like he should have been.

“If you were so attached to them, you shouldn’t have let them come to a fight, you fucking idiot kid.”

“They wanted to help! They...” He shook his head again. “You’re right, you’re right. I ... shouldn’t have brought them.”

“Christ, you really are just a fucking kid. You expect me to—”

He snapped his gaze at Garry hard enough the man leaned back.

“Look, I told you all that, because I know how much you wanted Viktor and Lucas dead. I did you massive favor. The least you can fucking do, is let me save my friends!”

Garry blinked several times, eyes shifting between Jack and the two dying birds. Deliberation written on his demon face, the Gangrel frowned as he looked down, tail slowly slithering on the floor behind him.

The whole situation was pathetic, Jack begging the man like he was, but during the whole fight, Jack had noticed Garry had been holding back. The Ripper was convinced Garry was just being smart and using tactics, and every Kindred instinct told Jack similar. No way Garry was holding back because he didn't want to fight Jack, maybe didn't want to hurt him. Everyone was convinced Garry was an asshole, an anarchist who just wanted to watch structures and organizations burn. Repercussions, those meant nothing to a Carthian.

But Jack knew better. The Ripper had been wrong about Maria. Hell, everyone had. And if she could surprise Jack with her leniency, maybe Garry could too.

“You know this fight isn't over,” Garry said. “You know I'm still going to keep fighting until the Invictus are done.”

“Yeah, I know.”

Garry groaned, stood up, and gestured down at the birds with one of his arms. “You can embrace them, same as a vampire. You can't turn an animal into a Kindred, but you can turn them into undead pets.”

“I know, but I don't know—”

“Just drink them until they're drained, and then feed them your blood with your will and vitae infused in it.” He took a few more steps back, and folded his four arms across his chest. “You're lucky I believe you, kid.”

Jack managed a weak smile for his enemy, before he reached down, and scooped up Scully. Immediately she twitched and squawked in pain. Things inside her were ruptured, and touching her anywhere ignited her body in agony.

“I know, I know, but ... but it’ll pass, ok? You’ll be fine. You’ll be fine.” He brought her up to his lips, and sank his fangs into her body.

Birds were so incredibly light, and so much of their body was air, feather fluff, and delicateness. So fragile. Christ he’d been an idiot. After how much they’d helped against the hunters and then against the werewolves, he thought they’d be safe and out of the way. Stupid. Stupid stupid stupid.

Scully was empty of blood in only a few seconds, and dead. Trembling, Jack sliced his wrist and forced a drop of his blood into her tiny beak. Crows weren’t small, but they weren’t large birds either, and he had to focus to get his blood to land in her little, still mouth.

Mulder. He looked to his other friend, and froze. Mulder wasn’t moving anymore, or breathing. Jack gently set Scully down, and snapped Mulder up into his grip. His head was still twisted way too far, and Jack shuddered as he looked his friend over. As delicate as he could manage, every muscle tense, he slowly turned Mulder’s head back to face where it should have been. Tiny things went crunch inside his neck.

“Oh fuck.” He lifted the crow to his lips, and sank his fangs past the feathers. Crow blood tasted horrible, but he didn’t care. The moment he felt Mulder’s corpse run dry of blood, he set the bird on his lap and performed the same procedure, opening his little beak, and dropping blood into it.

This wasn’t like with Veronica, where all she needed was vampire blood in its natural state to fuel the Vinculum. This was properly infused blood, dark crimson he used his will to pour his vitae into, his energy, his essence, his everything. It was how Julias revived him from death, and how Antoinette saved his mom. A drop of blood, infused with a vampire's desire for the chosen one to live again.

Live? No, that wasn't right. To be infected with the curse of being Kindred. But animals couldn't become true vampires, so Julias had said. God, if the Ripper got his claws into them ... No. No, this wasn't the same as embracing a vampire. The birds would be safe from the curse. They had to be. Had to be.

He set both birds down on a nearby table. Scully's right wing was bent and broken, with a tiny bone sticking out of it halfway, but only barely. Slowly, he slid the wing back to her side where it should have been. It stayed there, mostly, but it remained crooked. Mulder's head remained facing straight, but the neck was bent strangely at the middle, and Jack knew if he picked the bird up, his head would lull to the side.

"Please ... please work ... please work..." He leaned over the table and set his weight against his palms on it. "Please work, please work."

"Jack, we're not done."

Slowly, Jack turned to face the man. He wanted to be angry at him for attacking his birds, but he couldn't be. The fucker had just done what any smart vampire would have done, especially a master of Animalism like him who knew how useful animal friends could be.

"Don't fuck with me, Garry. You haven't been taking this fight seriously at all."

"And you? You haven't really let that curse thing out completely, except for the past two minutes, and even then. Avery told me what it's like when you do, told me every detail."

"I don't want to let him out!" He spun and stared at Garry as he kicked a crate aside. "I don't want it!"

“And yet here we are.” Still transformed into his huge demon form, the Gangrel took another step toward him, and his snake-head tail raised until it hovered over his shoulder, ready to strike. “You use that curse thing when it suits you. You use it against the Carthians.”

“Would you leave if I could somehow remove the curse, right now? Would you stop trying to trigger this stupid war?”

Garry snorted. “No. But like I said, the war never ended, kid.”

Clenching his fists until his fingers threatened to snap, Jack stepped away from the table with his two friends, moving closer to the center of the room. When they started swinging again, he had to keep them out of the way.

“I don’t want this war, Garry. Give me time and I can fix this.”

“Like you fixed Viktor, Tony, and Lucas?”

“I didn’t want to kill them, Garry! I had to.”

“And what, you don’t think you have to kill me?”

“I don’t!” He took a step forward and stomped his foot. It didn’t make much impact, light as he was, but still. “Those fuckers deserved to die. You don’t, okay? I don’t want to kill you. I want us to get along. I want us to—”

Garry roared, a straight up demon roar, and swung his body. The weird snake head on his tail morphed, spikes emerging from it again, and Jack ducked underneath it. It slammed into the table beside him, and Jack rolled away to put some distance between him and the Gangrel.

“You might not want to, but I want to kill Michael, and he wants to kill me!”

“So the rest of the city has to burn because you two hate each other?”

Garry leapt at him, landing on one of the tables before pouncing at him. But Jack was ready for it, and he ran at Garry before rolling to the floor and underneath him. Garry tried to hit him with his tail, but Jack made sure to get another metal table between him and the asshole, and again Garry lodged his spiked mace into a heavy metal object.

Garry spun, taking the table with him and getting on the defensive, expecting Jack to lunge with the opening. But now Jack had a new plan. He wouldn't let the Ripper have his way. The Ripper had to be strong enough to kill Garry, probably, and if Avery told Garry everything, Garry either knew that too and had a plan to escape, or overestimated himself.

But Jack wouldn't kill him. He'd fix this problem before the city burned down around them. If that meant he had to lock Garry, Michael, and Maria up in a fucking room and make them shake hands, then he'd do it. The Ripper could kiss his fucking ass.

“Maria and Michael will gladly see me dead, stupid kid. This war is old, and—”

“For the love of god, Garry! Let me fucking fix this! I have more important shit to worry about than this stupid war, and—”

“More important? The fuck is going on that you think is more important than this war?”

Jack froze, and stared at the man. “You don't know?” If he was good friends with Avery, then surely she'd told him about it? Or, did she really distrusts vampires so much, she wouldn't even tell him?

“The fuck are you going on about? I—”

“Jack!”

Both vamps snapped their heads to the doorway as someone else ran down to join them.

Jessy, oh thank god she was alive. Though, her clothes were torn to shreds, holes everywhere, and some nasty holes were clearly visible in her flesh, too. She didn't let it stop her, and she raised the barrel of her shotgun as she limped toward Garry.

He had to give Jessy credit, she was brave as hell. Elder Gangrel transformed into a demon gargoyle thing? Didn't matter to her at all. She shot shell after shell at Garry, and limped closer with every shot. Garry shrieked as pellets tore at his skin, most bouncing off the hardened leathery surface, but plenty managing to pierce and shred.

He took a step back, stumbling back against crates, but not falling. Jessy shot him again, and again, each forcing him back a step until his weight began pushing one of the tables out of the way.

“Break my fucking jaw and think you can get away with it!” she yelled after sinking another shell into him. “Fuck you! Fuck you!” Another shell, and another, until bits of Garry's skin came off and burned away as tiny cinders in the air. More, until bits of his wings ripped apart, creating holes that tore as Garry tried to flap them.

Click click announced Jessy was out of shells, and Jack winced as he waited for her inevitable charge. But the moment the gunfire stopped, she reached into a small bag on her hip, and loaded more shells into the gun. Seamless and smooth, no hesitation, no fumbling. Holy shit.

But both she and Jack jumped back, falling over, as Garry exploded. As crates caught Jack's ass, holding his weight, he stared at where Garry had been, and where a giant black cloud of smoke now hovered. Easily thirty feet across, the black smoke swirled on itself, so thick Jack couldn't see halfway through it.

There were eyes in the smoke. Two glowing yellow eyes.

Jessy got back up and shot shells into the black smoke, but they did nothing. With a hissing snarl, the smoke flowed up to the ceiling of the basement, and seeped through the cracks in the rafters.

"Shit, he's getting away!" Jessy motioned to Jack. "Come on, get up and get over here!" Without waiting, she loaded a few more shells, and half limped half ran back up the stairs.

Jack hopped up, and got halfway across the room before looking to the table at his side, pressed up against the wall near the stairs. Mulder and Scully lay there, still unmoving, still dead. Snarling, he forced down his rage, and ran after her.

"Ah shit, he's gone."

Back in the lobby, Jack looked around for where Garry could have come out, but all he found was more smoke slipping out through cracks in the walls.

"Jesus, I didn't know he could do that."

"He's an elder Gangrel, Jack. Course he can do that." Sighing, Jessy walked over to the kine Kathy and Tilly had taken down. "You fuckers alright?" They managed some weak groans. "Good enough."

Jack leaned against a wall leading to the front door, and sighed as he looked down at the kine. Kathy and Tilly were gone.

"What happened?" he asked.

"I got the upper hand on Steve, but then Bella got me from behind. Then Ryan stabbed her in the back, and then Joe got him, and—yeah, big fucking orgy.”

“They alright?”

“Yeah. Derick came back, and Steve and Bella ran, but that Bella bitch came in here, and I thought she was gonna go for you so I chased her, but she got Kathy and Tilly out instead. Then I heard fighting, and I came down, and yeah, you know the rest.”

“Hella?”

“Hella and Ryan are in the building over there.” She pointed across the street. “Recovering. And—”

“Boss.” Derick walked in with Bruce and Kyle, and the trio of vampires nodded to Jack. They were unharmed. “We good?”

“We’re ... good. Garry won’t come at us again tonight, and we need to get back in contact with the HQ.”

“We have been,” Bruce said. “We were on the phone with some people in the Xnomina bunker, until we lost the signal. Must be jamming us somehow. Building’s on fire, but most people seem to be safe. Amanda though, her sire thinks she’s still in the building. Last thing she said before we lost contact.”

Ah shit. He’d been hoping Garry had been lying to throw Jack off.

“We need to—”

Bruce waved a dismissing hand. “Mister Burksen’s there.”

“Mister Burksen’ leg barely works,” Jack said, grumbling. “Fuck. Fuck fuck. Derick, Kyle, Bruce, get back to Xnomina and make sure everything’s fine. The rest of us are pretty fucked up, and I ... can’t go yet.”

“Yes sir.” Nodding, Derick and the others left. Still afraid of him, but less so. Good.

“Jack?” Jessy asked. “You uh, seem pretty distracted. Figured you’d be happy. We kicked Garry’s ass. Still got this dumb building, too.”

Wincing, Jack walked back down the stairs to the storage room. The merchandise was a mess, but most of it was salvageable; didn’t really matter anyway, it was the locale that was important. A heavy, dry gulp forced its way down his throat, and he trembled as he stepped into the big room, and then stood beside the table with his two crows.

Jessy followed, poking her head in through the door. “Fuck, lot of dead rats and birds in here. And ... oh.”

“I ... I fed them my blood.”

“You did? What, how? You were in a fight, with fucking Garry.”

“It’s ... it’s a long story.” He put his necklace back on, leaned forward, and set his palms on the table around his two friends. He was still shaking. “They’ll ... get back up, right? I drained them, and fed them my blood. Put as much vitae as I could into it, you know? I’ve never done anything like this, and...”

“Oh shit. I don’t know, dude. I’ve never tried the whole undead pets thing, you know? I ... I don’t think anyone in the city has.”

“Garry has. He ... he told me what to do, and from the look on his face, I could tell it was ... personal, for him.”

“You’re shitting me. What the fuck happened down here?”

He shook his head. “Later. I...” Sighing, he let his head dangle between his shoulders.

They were just crows. Hundreds of crows and thousands of rats had died serving him, since he'd become a vampire. Why not get worked up over them?

Because he was selfish, and he'd grown attached to these two. Pet wasn't a good enough word for them. They were his friends, his partners, and—

Mulder's wing twitched.

"Mulder! You ok buddy?" He reached out with Animalism, and clucked his tongue several times.

Slowly, the crow moved more. A tail feather twitch, a small opening of the beak before closing it again. His eyes opened.

"Mulder. Christ, I didn't want you to stick your neck out like that. You could have stayed up in the rafters, kept a barrier between you and Garry. You..." Jack sighed, lowered his weight onto his elbows, and smiled down at his friend. "You ok?"

Mulder managed a couple quiet, gravely coos, and hopped back up on his feet. Jack winced. Yeah, like he'd suspected, Mulder's neck had been broken, and now his head didn't sit straight. Mostly straight, but not quite, like he had a crick in his neck, and not a small one, but a 'oh god how are you still alive' sorta crick, with a super tiny bulge against some feathers showing that a bone likely pressed against the side of his neck.

But Mulder showed no signs of pain. He looked up at Jack, cawed, and hopped closer, getting under his head. So close, Jack smiled down at him, and clucked his tongue several times. The busted neck looked disturbing, but from so close, Jack could also see Mulder's breathing didn't look right. Breathing, yes, but it didn't match his movements, and lacked the usual natural shifts along with the typical bird twitches and quick head turns. He didn't look quite alive.

A few more caws, and Jack gulped. In the past, Animalism turned their connection into sounds, images, and sensations in his mind that he could interpret, and occasionally some very simple words. But the caws Mulder made now were not so simple. They sounded a lot like ‘I am glad you are ok, master’.

Mulder hopped over to Scully, and pecked at her broken wing a few times, before he cawed over her. Jack gulped again. His pet crow had just asked his other pet crow ‘are you ok, Scully?’ complete with name.

“Mulder, I ... I don’t know if—” Scully twitched, and Jack sighed relief. “Oh thank god. Scully, you ok?”

Scully went through the same process, twitching a few times more before she finally hopped up to her feet. It was the same thing, a crow but not a crow, the same unusual, solid breathing, the lack of normal bird twitches, the obviously broken wing that didn’t fit snugly to her side like the other. But she was in no pain, and Jack smiled as the tension melted out of him.

He touched her broken wing. Still no pain from her. She cooed a few times, clicked some more, and hopped over to him to take shelter under his head and between his arms. Animalism interpreted for him what she wanted to communicate, the sensations and emotions, but like with Mulder, the attached words and meaning were far, far more complex than they would normally have been.

~Are you ok, Jack? Did that vampire hurt you, Master?~

Holy shit.

“I’m fine, guys, I’m fine.”

~What happened?~ Scully stretched out her wings, including the broken one. Jack almost told her to stop, that she might hurt herself, but the wing stretched out completely, broken bones pushing out the wing with only a little trouble. ~What is happening?~

This, he had not expected. Sure, he'd known vampires could revive animals, Julius had told him, but he'd said nothing about this, about a pair of crows suddenly able to use actual sentences.

“Jack.”

Jack lifted his head back. Jessy hadn't said that. Scully had.

“Jack,” Mulder said, like a talking parrot.

“Jack,” Scully said.

“Jack.”

“Jack Jack.”

Mulder and Scully looked at each other, cooed a few times, before they both nestled against the inside of Jack's arms, one bird each.

“Jack.”

“Jack.”

“Jack.”

“Jack.”

“Jack,” Jessy said, laughing. “Guess they're taking well to being revived.”

He rolled his eyes, but laughed all the same. “Crows can learn to talk in captivity.”

“Jack. Master. Oats?” Scully asked. Asked, not just said, but asked, complete with inflection.

“They uh ... can’t really do that, though,” he said. Parroting words was one thing. Crafting sentences was something else entirely. “Sorry buddy, I don’t have any oats on me right now. And ... and I don’t think you’ll want them, when you get them.” He chuckled again, lowered his head down between his arms and shoulders, and both birds nudged their heads into his chin.

“No oats?” Mulder asked.

“You’ll ... you’ll see.” Because they weren’t alive anymore, not really. Just like vampires, they were undead creatures with flesh bodies. They needed vitae to survive now, but unlike vampires, they couldn’t produce their own.

He wouldn’t be feeding them oats anymore. He’d be feeding them his blood, infused with vitae. Or they’d die.

“They look pretty beat up,” Jessy said, and she clucked her tongue a few times. They clicked back. “Seem ok though.”

“I ... I owe Garry, for this.”

“Fuck.” Jessy grumbled as she joined him at his side. “I was afraid you might say that. Dude, he injured them, right?”

“It was a fight. I can’t blame him for that. But I...” Might as well tell her, she already knew. “I told him, about Viktor and Tony, and Lucas.”

“Ah fuck. Fuckity fuck. Why?”

“I couldn’t help Mulder and Scully with him on my ass. I needed to give him something, so he’d let me help them.”

“So you dropped the biggest truth bomb you could on him?” She didn’t sound too happy about it.

“They were his enemies too, Viktor and Lucas at least. Figured he ... he’d cut me a little slack so I could save my friends, since I helped him so much. And he did.” Because the fucker wasn’t as bad as they thought he was.

“Indirectly. It’s not like you killed them as a favor to him.”

“I know. But ... but it was better than nothing. Better than fighting, hoping to win, making Mulder and Scully wait, and risking their lives.” He nodded down at the two crows still between his arms on the table. “Mulder was dead by the time I...”

Sighing, Jessy pat him on the shoulder. “Hope it was worth it.”

“It was.” Nodding, he stood back up and held out his arm. Mulder hopped up and walked up to his shoulder, but Scully, broken wing and all, flew up to his other shoulder. Thank god, if she couldn’t fly anymore, he didn’t know what he’d do.

“You know it’s going to bite you in the ass though, right? He’s gonna tell, and soon the whole city will know you’ve killed three elders.”

Sighing, he reached up, stroked the back of Scully’s head, then hesitantly did the same for Mulder. Again, his friend didn’t complain about any pain, and showed no signs of it, but Jack had to force down a wince as he felt the broken neck through Mulder’s feathers.

“I’ll deal with it if ... when it comes up.”

“Right. Well, I got your back.” Nodding, she looked around the mess of a room, and whistled. “You two really went fucking nuts. Curse help out much?”

“The curse is the only reason I’m a tenth as strong as I am, Jess. But if you mean did the Ripper help much, no he didn’t. I kept him suppressed ... mostly.”

“That’s good, yeah?”

“Mostly.”

She chuckled as she squatted down and picked up a pack of cigarettes. “Sure we shouldn’t head back to Xnomina?”

“Yeah, I’ve been meaning to talk to you about that.” Jessy jumped up and sat on one of the tables, and leaned on a stack of crates. “Like, I get that Garry and Michael are trying to bait each other into triggering the war, because whoever can claim to be the victim has an easier time of it. But ... I don’t know.”

“You don’t?”

“I mean yeah, with the Invictus it makes sense. If Garry kills one of ours, then we all happily work together to kick his ass. But, well ... the Carthians aren’t like that.”

“They’re anarchists.”

“They’re a community, Jack. We’re playing this poke game with them, trying to make the other overstep, get caught, go too far, but the Carthians don’t need someone on their side to die for them to pull together. They don’t have anyone like that Isabella bitch, who just wants to do her plays. They don’t have anyone like Jacob or the Prince, happy to do their creepy shit or experiments behind closed doors, away from the rest of the world. The Carthians, every last one of them, is personally invested and attached to this city.”

“You don’t think Isabella is invested? You just said—”

“I’m saying, if Michael told us all to go on the offensive with no cause, some of us are gonna drag our feet. Isabella, definitely. Bruce has his own shit. Vicky and Parker are running their whore houses, and would love nothing more than to be left alone so they could continue bathing in blood, money, and tits and dicks. Shit like that, you know? But with the Carthians, they’re...”

He sighed as he slumped back against a table, leaning his ass against it. “Yeah, I get you. The Carthians are united, more united than us anyway. The Invictus are too self centered.”

“Or they were. Garry getting Terra Den under his thumb is pretty, uh, anti-Carthian. And—”

Jack’s phone rang. Damien’s phone. He answered it. “Damien, thought you guys were being jammed or something?”

“We were, but whatever was causing it was short lived.”

Jack smiled. It was good to hear his friend’s voice. “Damien, did —”

He stopped short as someone else walked down the stairs to join them. Ryan, with a big grin on his face, and Tilly the Carthian held hostage in his arms.

“Jack,” Damien said over the phone. “We ... we think Amanda’s dead.”

Interlude 3

~~Author's Note~

This chapter is 100% sex, just for funsies. Also contains some very minor swinging elements.

~~Samantha~~

Othello was so handsome. Ugh, the thought made her feel so guilty. Jacob was super handsome too! But Othello was the sort of handsome you found on a book cover, standing on a porch of a mansion by a tropical beach, hair blowing in the wind, wine glass in hand, half naked beauty beside him. Even Jacob admitted the man was pretty, too damn pretty. The big muscles, the abs, the long dark dreadlocks, tan skin, and those happy, almost dopey brown eyes. It was all very dreamy and exotic.

Plus, he was a Daeva like her, and every time they met eyes, she knew he knew exactly what went through her Daeva mind.

So, when she'd shown up at the Circle's cave to see Jacob tonight, she'd come a bit early. She wanted to watch Othello do what he always did whenever she was around: have sex with his beautiful ghoul Madison, and sometimes a couple other ladies too. Did he sit around waiting for Samantha to show up, so he could tempt her? Or maybe he enjoyed Madison's body twice a night, every night, since even before Samantha was embraced? She didn't think Othello knew her schedule, so, probably the latter.

She walked up to his alcove, smiled as she found the fur curtain pulled open, and smiled wider as she found Madison and Othello, kissing and fondling, already naked. Othello was just the sort of man who'd only bother with clothes if he had to leave the cave or something, and the sort of man to keep his woman naked whenever he was naked. And Madison happily obeyed.

“Hi Othello. Hi Madison,” she said, and she stopped in the entrance of his alcove.

“Samantha,” Othello said with a small nod.

“Sam! How are you, girl?” Madison’s smile was pleasing and warm, and it relaxed Sam instantly, despite the fact the woman was currently sitting between Othello’s open legs, facing away from him and leaning back into his chest, while the strong man groped and massaged her breasts. Madison had amazing breasts, huge, and they matched her curvy figure really well.

“I’m good! Just came to see Jacob. We were going to stay in, relax, you know.” It took a lot of effort to keep her voice steady, because Othello was looking at her, at her suit, and as he stared with hungry eyes, his hands continued to massage Madison’s body. He was good. Madison was panting lightly, and her nipples were completely swollen. And, after Othello whispered something into her ear, Madison giggled, slid a hand down to her pelvis, spread her legs inside Othello’s, and gently caressed her swollen clitoris.

Was he trying to tempt Sam, on purpose? Jacob warned her he would. But then, he also said to tease Othello in return if he did.

“Jacob’s not here yet,” Othello said. “Want to wait here for him?”

Madison nodded. “Oh yes please. I’d love that.”

Samantha tried to hide her relieved smile, but she knew she failed. There was always a chance Othello or Madison would say they wanted some privacy when Samantha visited like this, but it never happened. Privacy didn’t seem to matter much to anyone in the Circle, except Aaron.

“Thanks. I was going to show Jacob something, and—”

“Oooh, lingerie?” Madison said.

Samantha jaw dropped. “H ... How’d you guess?”

With a heavenly, womanly sigh, Samantha leaned back against Othello’s big, wide chest, and groaned openly as she continued to slowly masturbate. “You have that look in your eyes, like you’re excited to show something off. And you just came in and aren’t carrying anything.”

Evidently, Madison was smarter than she let on. Othello was, as Jacob put it, dumb as a brick, and Sam would be lying if she said she didn’t think that reflected onto Madison. But the ghoul grinned at her, pleased with her guess, and Sam squirmed.

“Just a new bra and panties.”

Madison and Othello shared knowing grins, before Madison clapped her hands together.

“Wanna show em off? We can let you know if they’re good.”

“Um...” She did. She really did. She remembered that time when she let everyone see her breasts, all so Othello could get a look while Madison gave him a blowjob. It’d been intensely erotic.

When she told Jacob about her random and unexpected bit of exhibitionism later, he’d said it was okay. Encouraged, even. Which of course made her gasp, cause she hadn’t expected she’d ever do something like be naked with other people, but Jacob had only grinned at her. He was super smart, and wise, and knew what she liked better than she did. He’d told her, encouraged her, to get naked around the others, and if they wanted to masturbate or have sex while looking at her, all the better.

He was so secure with himself, like Antoinette was. Must have been an age thing. No wonder Jack was into Antoinette so much.

After a deep, useless breath, Samantha nodded, and Madison grinned and clapped a couple times. She leaned back into Othello, and the man behind her grinned a gentle smile, eyes on Samantha, hands on Madison's breasts. The ghoul also slowed her masturbating, way down to that 'gonna make this last' pace, which sent a shiver through Sam's whole body.

"Ok, uh ... d-don't judge too harshly!" She undid the buttons of her blouse, and eyed Madison and Othello with her best motherly glare. "I mean it."

Both put up their hands in surrender.

"Swear to God," they said, in unison. Must have been a thing they shared.

She frowned, but it melted away as the shivers of excitement and nervousnesses worked through her. The blouse slipped off her shoulders, and she set it on the big pile of blankets and pillows in Othello's alcove. For a moment, she covered her bra and breasts with her forearms, but that was silly. They'd seen her breasts before. They'd seen her naked, being fucked by Jacob in the middle of the cave before. That had not been part of the plan that night, but damn Jacob knew her kinks better than she did, and she'd cum so many times with the other witches watching.

She lowered her arms, and Madison and Othello whistled.

"White! Ah, it's like, half sexy, half cute!" Madison, giggling, leaned forward and set both hands on Othello's knees. She ground her ass into the man, eyes on Sam, waiting for more.

Normally, Jacob would be around, and he'd be the one pushing her to do things like strip for his witches. But now, the only person pushing her, was her, and she shivered as she undid the fly of her jeans, and slid them off.

“Oh, girl, a white thong? That is beautiful, and sexy. You’re like, a bride on her wedding night, the sort who knows how to have a good time.” Madison scrunched up her nose, grinning. “And I saw the way you stuck that booty out. Been taking dance lessons?”

“Oh my god, how did you know?” With her jeans still around her ankles, Samantha stood up straight and stared down at the ghoul. “Antoinette, she—”

“Knows her way around a man, teaching you to work your ass like that!” Madison chuckled some more, enjoying herself way more than Samantha expected. The woman had a loud, fun attitude, and Samantha found it both overwhelming, and endearing.

“I didn’t ... mean to, it just...”

Othello shrugged. “You’re a Daeva. It’s natural. Embrace it.”

A Daeva, right, like Othello. Expression, sensuality, Daeva loved to embrace those things.

Nodding as she steeled herself, she kicked her jeans off, along with her shoes, leaving her in nothing but her bra, thong, and socks; no necklace tonight, not with what she had planned for Jacob.

Madison laughed. “Girl, you are gorgeous, but you can’t wear socks with lingerie. At least, not that kind.”

Samantha laughed and nodded, nervousness melting away, replaced by giddiness. “You’re right, yeah.” Getting some sexy socks would have to wait. For now, she slid out of those too.

“Dance for us?” Madison said. Smiling up at Sam, the dark-skinned, gorgeous ghoul got onto her elbows and knees, and wiggled her naked ass in the air in front of Othello.

“I ... I don’t know. I’m not very good.”

“We’re not strangers in an audience!” Giggling again, Madison wiggled her ass some more, causing her large butt to jiggle lightly in front of her master. “Please?”

Othello’s eyes drifted between Sam and Madison, before he eventually reached beside him, grabbed some lube, and drizzled some on his ghoul’s ass. As Othello slipped two fingers into her ass, Madison’s eyes rolled up in bliss, before she managed to right them on Samantha again.

Samantha was instantly hypnotized. She stared, awestruck by how Madison’s ass spread around Othello’s hand as he worked the lube into his ghoul’s butt. Without realizing she was doing it, her body began to move, hips slowly dipping left and right, and back and forth.

According to her sire, the key to an enthralling dance, was to look like you were making love to the air itself. Every motion, every sway, should draw motions – and watching eyes – to the hips and ass, the center of the body. And every motion should sway as if the air itself was lucky to exist between her thighs. Put in a more modern and delicate way: all in the hips. And maybe it was her Daeva blood, or maybe she’d always had a dancer hidden inside her, but she found she was actually pretty good at moving her hips through the air in swaying, interesting patterns.

“Oh, you’re really good!” Madison said, voice wavering a little as Othello fingered her. “Strip tease? Please? You’re so hot, it’s really making me...” The overly honest ghoul groaned openly, only to whimper in frustration as Othello withdrew his fingers from her.

But her whimper turned into a mewl of joy as the man took her hips, and aimed her ass down toward his very long, very thick shaft.

Strip tease? She hadn't planned on stripping! But, then again, maybe she had? It was hard to know. Every time she was with the witches, she felt like a teenager again, too stupid to think more than five minutes ahead.

Nodding and squirming, she reached behind her, undid the clasp of her bra, and earned some hungry smiles from her audience as she let the bra drop just enough to expose her breasts. She wasn't blushing yet, and that was the only reason her nipples weren't hard, and heat wasn't building between her thighs. She continued to sway her body as she played with the bra, using it to cup her breasts and earn more sighs of bliss from her audience. Antoinette was right, this was fun.

Being Daeva was, in a way the other blood clans would never truly appreciate according to her sire, absolutely, deliciously, guiltily fun. Without thinking, she Blushed Life, and both Othello and his ghouls groaned with excitement as they stared at her.

She let the bra slide off her forearms onto the cave floor, and blushed red from head to toe as she exposed her body to Othello and Madison. The way Othello looked at her breasts like he wanted to pounce her and devour her, was instantly arousing. And the look on Madison's face as the man took that moment to grab her hips, and pull her down onto his cock, was enough to have Samantha boiling. Ugh, Jacob needed to come back, and soon, so she could throw herself at him! He—

“Whoa, what is this?”

Samantha squeaked and covered her breasts and thong with her hands as she spun around. “B-Beatrice! Um ... hi...”

The Nosferatu blinked at her, then past her at Othello and Madison, grinned, and slowly brought her gaze back to Samantha. “Strip tease show?”

“I ... um...”

Beatrice laughed and shrugged, before she slid into the alcove and sat down beside Othello, with only a few inches between them. Super casual, as if nothing was out of the ordinary. “That is a gorgeous thong.”

Oh no, she was going to watch too. Well, that wasn’t—

“Oh my, now that is a beautiful woman, wearing some beautiful underwear.” Jennifer, sexy and ridiculously gorgeous Jennifer, looked her up and down with the same look of Othello, though the Ventrue’s eyes were considerably sharper. Othello was a gentle soul. Jennifer was not. She kind of scared Samantha, but she was also incredibly beautiful, and Samantha blushed a hundred times more as the vixen complimented her.

“Thanks. You really think it’s pretty?”

“Samantha, you are so delicious, it’s killing me.” Jennifer smiled at her, smiled down at Triss, and then at Othello and Madison. Othello had put his legs together so Madison, still on her hands and knees, had something to kneel around while she fucked him, and to make some room for Beatrice. Slow, gentle sex. And despite the fact there were five people in the small alcove, no one was watching the two people having sex. Everyone was looking at Samantha instead.

Jennifer’s grin grew into something almost evil, and she slipped past Samantha into the small alcove too. As she did, she undressed. It took her only seconds to remove the suit and strip down to only her underwear, before she tossed all of it onto the pile of growing clothes, leaving herself completely naked.

She sat down on Othello’s other side from Triss, and smiled up at Sam as she Blushed Life. Gaze locked on Samantha, the Ventrue’s body lit up with arousal; Kindred eyes could see it easily, from the increased heart rate, to the swelling nipples. Jennifer had gotten horny in just seconds, looking at her.

Jen gave Madison's leg a gentle, affirming slap, gave Othello's arm the same, and spread her legs as she leaned back, getting cozy in the pile of furs next to Othello close enough to touch shoulders. She set one hand on one of her large breasts, the other on her pussy, and masturbated, just like Madison had before.

"You are such a horndog," Triss said, looking past Othello to her lover, but even as she said it, she Blushed Life and pulled off her tank top. "Ah whatever. While in Rome." Her crocodile teeth were scary, but Triss's body was so beautiful, a work of art with all the tattoos and piercings, and she was so lean! She looked like an Olympic athlete.

She leaned back, and set her eyes on Samantha too. She didn't masturbate, but she did watch her with hungry snake eyes, and stroked one of her hardening, pierced nipples with the blunt side of one of her claws.

Samantha gulped, took a deep, useless breath, and started the dance again. She hooked her thumbs in the waistband of the thong, and eased it around in a circular motion around her hips, as she ground her hips side to side, in and out, as she rotated on the spot. It was wet.

"Oh my god," Jennifer said. "Where does a woman like you learn to dance like that?"

"From her sire I'm guessing," Beatrice said. "Remember, she lives with the queen of sex."

"True, true."

Othello, eyes still on Samantha, let out a soft moan, and he set both hands on Madison's hips again. Everyone turned and watched as the man bounced Madison on his cock, and the curvaceous ghoul mewled and whimpered with the increased speed. With her leaning forward, her hands on his knees, and her knees spread apart around Othello's legs, Samantha couldn't help but stare at the black woman as her huge breasts rippled underneath her. But, more than Madison, it was Othello she couldn't stop staring at, as the man smiled at Samantha as he came inside his ghoul's ass.

Samantha knew he was cumming. She'd seen those dopey, dreamy eyes of his cum many times already. And seeing them now had her thong soaked.

"Oh, it's g-going to be ... one of those nights?" Madison said between pants.

"Those nights?" Samantha asked.

"Yeah. Sometimes Othello cums first if he's really horny. And second, and third, and fourth, before I get to!" She leaned back, set her back against the man's abs and chest, and Samantha couldn't help but let out a small groan as she saw a few trickles of white leak out of the woman's ass and down onto her man's testicles. "But he's a vampire. He'll stay hard for me, and cum again ... and again ... until it's eventually my turn." The way she said 'turn' was enough to make Samantha's legs weak.

"Typical man," Triss said, and she gave the man a slap on the shoulder. "Dude, always treat the girl first."

Othello rolled his eyes, but even that had a softness to it. The man just wasn't capable of being mean. Instead, he looked back at Samantha, let go of his ghoul's hips, and he smiled up at Sam as Madison gently ground her ass against him once again. His eyes lingered on her thong, and her thighs, and only now did Sam realize her thong was more than wet, it was dripping. He could see how wet she was. They all could.

“Triss, come help me?” Jen, one hand still caressing her clitoris, motioned for her lover to come to her.

“Fine fine, you damn slut.” Laughing, Triss got up and stepped over Othello’s legs, still in her jeans. As she did, Jennifer turned where she sat, and set her back against Othello’s side, legs out along the wall of the alcove so Samantha was looking at her profile. She spread her legs, and Triss got down on her knees between them.

The Nosferatu opened her mouth wide, and let out her inhumanly long tongue. She looked at Samantha through the corner of her eye, winked, and lowered her mouth down onto Jen’s wet pussy. As she did, she forced in the long, long long long appendage into Jennifer’s clenching body. Madison turned, looked down at Jennifer beside her, and moaned. Samantha moaned too. So did Jennifer. Everyone stared at how a growing distension moved along Jennifer’s flat stomach, a bulge that flowed back and forth from her mons to nearly her navel.

Triss’s tongue had filled the woman to bursting, and was rolling like waves inside her. Big, powerful, thick waves.

“Don’t stop,” Jen said.

“Ah won wop.”

“Not you. Samantha.” Even as the beautiful seductress obviously writhed in extreme pleasure, and the bulge on her belly grew as Triss forced her tongue in harder and harder, Jennifer looked at Samantha, her cheek and ear resting against Othello’s shoulder. “Keep dancing.”

With another gulp, Samantha started the dance again. Around and around she went, slow rotating circles, with her ever teasing to remove the thong, but never actually removing it. Each time she turned, she whipped her head around quick, desperate to not miss a moment of the four lovers enjoying each other. She’d been around them during their lovemaking before, but never like this, not all together, and not all so focused on her. And not while she Blushed Life so they could tell how deliriously aroused she was.

As Jennifer started to cum, her eyes half closed, and she smiled up at Samantha as she trembled. One hand reached down and ran fingers through Triss's hair, while her other caressed one of her breasts. Her body shivered in such a beautiful way, large breasts rippling with her occasional tremors, Samantha had to stop dancing for a few seconds to stare.

And then Othello came again! Madison laughed, leaned back against his chest, and pointed down at her pussy for Samantha to look. She was dripping wet, but she hadn't cum yet, obviously on edge but not able to cross over, while her lover pumped more cum into her. Leaning back like that, Samantha could see the man's cock flex between spurts, and see some more of his fluid leak out of his ghoul. And through all that, he stared at Samantha over his ghoul's shoulder, eyes lingering on her breasts and hard nipples, her waist, her thong, and her thighs where a few beads of wetness trickled.

Something touched Sam's shoulders. She let out a loud squeal, and everyone froze as Samantha turned around.

"J-Jacob! Don't ... don't scare me like that."

The man grinned at her, but his grin softened as he looked around at what was happening. "Took my advice, I see."

"Um, I uh ... yeah."

"Well, looks like you've got everyone mad horny, each and every one of them looking at you. Bunch of horny, punk ass kids on my lawn."

She gulped, and squirmed slightly, guilty. They were still staring at her, staring, and cumming.

“I guess ... I guess they are.”

Jacob stepped in closer, set his hands on her hips, and put his lips to her ear. “Get on your knees.”

She shivered, and her knees shook. That voice, the whisper, the dark tone, it was all so perfect! The man jumped out of one of her novels, and spoke to her in the same tone she'd always thought those dark, scary, handsome, dangerous men had. Without telling herself to do it, she'd already gotten down on her knees, and was looking up at Jacob with her hands on her knees. Her body was acting on its own.

The man smiled down at her, and stripped. He'd been wearing one of his scary robes, very witchy sorta clothing, and it hid his physique super well. But she knew what he looked like underneath, and so did everyone else. The man may not have been as wide and muscular as Othello, but his lean body, defined muscles and abs, and salt and pepper hair, were all intoxicating and perfect. The bandage over his eyes made him look mysterious, and she stared up at him with heat boiling through her as the man tossed the robe and underwear out of the alcove.

He blushed life, and immediately, his large cock rose to life. It earned a mewl from Madison, and she bounced on Othello faster as she stared at Jacob's naked body. Even Jen and Triss wanted a peek, Triss taking a break and lifting her head so she could get a proper look. Everyone wanted to see what Sam would do.

Samantha, hands shaking, reached up, set one hand on the front of his leg, the other on his hip, and knelt higher. The smell of arousal on him was obvious, and she breathed it in as it mixed with the arousal everyone was emitting. Jacob's gaze was pointed at her, no one else. She couldn't see his eyes, since he didn't have any, but it seemed pretty obvious he was looking at her through the bandage, and it was her that had him hard in seconds, before she'd even touched him.

God, she was soaked. She could feel more of her juices trickling through her thong and down her thighs. If this kept up, she was going to start masturbating like a horny kid.

She set her lips on Jacob's cock, slipped it into her mouth, and worked her head back and forth in a slow, massaging rhythm, her lips tight around his glans. No hands. He liked it when she only used her mouth. She kept her grip on his leg and hip, and tilted her head around and around as she suckled on his cock, her tongue occasionally slipping out to lick and tease around it. The satisfied smile on Jacob's face had her heart fluttering.

Another moan drew her eyes, and she turned her head enough so she could look at the audience. Oh god, they were all staring even harder, especially Othello. The man smiled at her over Madison's shoulder, grabbed his ghoul, and again bounced the beautiful woman on his cock. Poor Madison still hadn't cum either, and drops of her juices trickled from her slit as she bucked on the man.

Jennifer, on the other hand, was well on her way to another orgasm as Beatrice got onto her stomach between Jen's legs, and forced her huge tongue back inside her. The beautiful Ventrue moaned openly, and held Beatrice's head to her pussy with one hand, while the other pressed to the fur beside Madison's leg. With her face still turned to look at Samantha, back snug against Othello's side, she licked her lips as their eyes met, and shudders running through her told Sam she was cumming again already. Cumming, and staring at Sam as she gave the elder vampire a blowjob.

Samantha couldn't help but moan around Jacob's cock as she pulled her head back and forth a little faster, lips massaging the base edge of its bulbous tip. She had to keep her mouth open wide to fit him, and old her would have trouble keeping this up. The new her, the vampire, had little trouble, and ran her tongue around and around, caressing him and earning a drop of precum on her tongue, and another, and another. And as he trickled juices into her mouth, Samantha couldn't help but peek at the other vampires frequently, each of them with eyes locked on her, and what she was doing to their leader.

Jacob let out a small, happy sigh, and pulled back. He set his hand around the base of his cock, and masturbated, while aiming his cock down at her body. He was going to cum on her, in front of all these people.

A splash of warm liquid landed on her lips and neck. Another landed on her sternum and shoulder. Another landed on one breast, and then another for the other. And more. She knew Kindred could exploit the Blush of Life with practice, and do truly crazy things sexually speaking; Jacob had shown her before. But even with all the times she'd had sex with Jacob, he'd never done anything this lewd! Warm, thick strands of white cum splashed over her again and again, and she gasped as the coating grew thick enough it dripped off her breasts.

Finally he stepped back, and Samantha managed to turn her eyes from him to the rest of the group. They all stared at her, looking her up and down, smiling, grinning, and hungry. She must have looked like a painting, or like six men had just taken turns cumming on her.

The look in everyone's eyes set her body to boil. The moment Jacob decided to touch her, or fuck her, she was going to cum and cum hard, she knew it. And everyone was going to see.

“Go, and get Madison to clean you up.”

“W-What?”

“Sit in front of Madison.” He squatted down and gave her ass a slap, and she squeaked before crawling over to Othello’s legs. Not close enough. Jacob pushed her shoulders gently, and with her whole body shaking, she slid in closer, kneeling beside Othello’s feet, on the same side as Jennifer. Still not close enough. Jacob gave her another small push, and she whimpered as she slid even closer, her knees now beside Othello’s. Still not close enough. She slid in closer again, her knees now nudging against Jennifer’s side and Othello’s thigh.

With a shivering little whimper, Samantha knelt up high, and leaned forward. She had to put her hands on something to keep from falling over and onto Jennifer and Madison. Her left hand found Madison’s right shoulder, and her right hand found Othello’s left shoulder, above Jennifer’s head. A hard, big shoulder, owned by a man who was looking at her with obvious ‘I want to fuck you’ eyes.

Madison took Sam’s hand, the one on Madison’s shoulder, and pulled it past her so it could rest on Othello’s other shoulder. Sam, holding both Othello’s shoulders, looked at the ghoul between her arms, and then at the man, her whole body shaking. It only got worse when Madison leaned in, and set her lips onto Samantha’s wet, hard nipples.

“Nn!” Samantha squirmed, and her fingers dug into Othello’s muscles as his ghoul began to clean her. Kisses and licks, each hungry and powerful, were placed all over her breasts, each cleaning a section free of cum. Not only that, but the ghoul spent time massaging her skin, rubbing and spreading Jacob’s cum into her body, under her breasts, into her stomach and chest, and up to her neck. And when Madison had spent some time cleaning the upper, lower, inner, and outer edges of her body with her tongue, she set her lips back onto Sam's nipples. Cleaning those tiny things shouldn't have taken very long, but Madison slid her hands onto Sam's body, held her hips, and kept her close while she began to lovingly suckle.

It felt good. It felt great. Powerful jolts of electric pleasure coursed into Samantha's body through the sensitive, swollen nubs, and she whimpered as her eyes again found Othello's. He was loving this.

Jennifer reached up, took Sam's hand, the one on the shoulder Jen was leaning against, and guided it down onto her body. Down to her lips, chin, neck, against one of her huge, supple breasts, and then down to her stomach. She grinned up at Sam, and helped pressed Sam's hand down on her abdomen, against the bulge Triss's writhing tongue was creating inside her.

"Press down."

Samantha gulped, nodded, and pressed down. She whimpered again as she felt Triss's tongue fight against the pressure, and she looked down at the Nosferatu to see what how she felt about this. Beatrice rolled her snake eyes, but didn't stop. If anything, she worked her tongue against Jen's insides even harder, and deeper, and Samantha moaned openly as she watched the bulge along Jen's abdomen reach her navel. That, was deep.

As the tingling bliss in her breasts continued to grow, Madison's kissing only ending long enough so she could switch breasts, Jennifer came again. Even as her body trembled with orgasm shocks, she kept her eyes on Sam, and what Madison was doing to her breasts. And, without being asked, Samantha pressed her hand down against where she knew Jen's g-spot would be, squashing it against Triss's tongue. She could feel the tongue through Jen's body, feel it wriggling and fucking her, and making her whole body tremble.

Triss pulled away, exposing Jen's soaked, dripping slit, sat up, and let out a frustrated groan. "Alright, fuck this."

"I'm sorry!" Samantha squeaked. "I—"

Beatrice threw her a confused glance, before she leaned back, and kicked off her pants and thong. "What? No, I'm horny, damn it! I can't stand it anymore. Jen, get to work."

Chuckling, Jennifer sat up. Despite her confident expression, Jen's whole body trembled with the effort, and a small moan escaped her as she crawled out of the spot from Othello's side. Beatrice replaced her, though she didn't lean back against Othello's shoulder.

At least until Jen, chuckling, pushed Triss so she fell into Othello's side.

"Hey!"

"Relax," Jennifer whispered, kneeling between Beatrice's spread legs, and winked at her as she coated her right hand in lube.

Triss rolled her eyes, but she wriggled into a comfortable position against Othello's arm. Othello lifted his arm so Triss was instead snuggling her back into his torso, her shoulder nudging into Madison, and the man set his arm across the woman's chest in a loose hug.

"Hey, you fucker." Triss squirmed again, this time in an attempt to escape Othello's hug, but it ended the moment she let out a moan. A glance down between her legs showed Jennifer had already managed to sink a finger into the woman's ass, and was pushing in more. And more. And more.

Jen winked at her lover, and sank her fist in to the wrist, earning a loud, trembling groan from the squirming Nosferatu. If Beatrice really wanted to get out of Othello's hug, Sam knew they'd let her. And Triss wouldn't care if she offended them anyway, and would forcefully escape if she wanted. The Circle knew Triss well though, and the super lean Nosferatu slowly relaxed back against Othello's side as Jen gently eased her fist back and forth inside her lover's ass, while her other hand teased and played with her clitoris and clit-hood piercing.

Before Sam could say something, like maybe they were being a little too forceful with Triss, she gasped. Two hands took her hips, and before she could look behind her to see what was happening, Jacob slid her thong aside, drove his hips into her ass, and sank every inch of his thick length into her dripping slit. He sank his cock into her hard, the angle driving it forward down into her g-spot, and she collapsed forward as the pleasure exploded outward from her insides. Her left hand pressed hard against Othello's shoulder, and her right hand pressed high against the cave wall behind Othello and Triss. So far forward, Madison wasn't able to keep sucking on her breasts. In fact, Sam had fallen so far forward, her left breast was against Madison's, and her right breast now sat directly over Triss's head.

So close! Everyone was so close. She was pressed against Madison, and her face was inches from Othello's. Her knee nudged against Triss's side and ass, too. She tried to back up so people could have a little more room, but Jacob slid in even closer, and Sam had to press her left hand harder against Othello's shoulder to keep from squashing Madison even more.

Othello glanced past Sam to Jacob, silently asking something, but before Sam could tell what happened, Othello's arm currently hugging Triss slid forward toward Sam a little, and touched her stomach. Then down lower, and lower, and Samantha's body erupted into panting whimpers as she realized what the man was about to do.

As Othello's hand found her aching, swollen, dripping clitoris, Madison also took Sam's left hand, the one pressed hard against Othello's shoulder, and pulled it down. Samantha outright squeaked as her chest planted against Madison's, now only her right hand against the cave wall keeping her from falling into everyone. The ghoul set a kiss on Samantha's neck, and another, and another, and Sam's whole body melted into butter as the ghoul's warm, life-filled flesh gently rubbed against her. Melting quickly turned to boiling as two of Othello's fingers pressed against her clitoris, and rubbed it in gentle, circular massaging motions, while Jacob continued to fuck her from behind hard enough to make her tremble.

She managed to look down, and meet eyes with Beatrice only foot a below her, as Sam's first orgasm ripped through her. She let out ungodly noises that were beyond embarrassing, groans and mewls, and her whole body shook worse than an earthquake as the pleasure exploded. With her chest rubbing into Madison's, Othello caressing her clit, and Jacob slamming into her hard enough he had everyone shaking in rhythm, she couldn't help it. The electric explosions of pleasure rushed out into her chest, and down into her toes until they curled.

New wetness coated her inner thighs, and she knew it was hers. So wet, she felt a few beads of it nearly reach her knees.

"Ok, I admit," the Nosferatu said between panting groans, "that is very ... very hot."

"Extremely," Jennifer said, her eyes mostly on Samantha. She sank her arm deeper into Triss, and deeper, until her gentle fucking rhythm inside her friend's ass showing up on Triss's defined abs, and the bulge pushed past her navel. God, that was so deep! And Triss was loving it.

Samantha managed to pull her head back a bit, fighting against the trembles in her legs and arms, and stared at Madison with wide eyes as the ghoul slid Sam's left hand down her body, down to her empty, soaked slit, and down further, to Othello's heavy, warm, soaked testicles. The ghoul grinned at her, and helped guide her hand in a massaging motion on Othello's balls, gentle circular motions, just like Othello had done to Sam's now aching, sensitive clit.

Sam's eyes eventually looked from Madison to Othello, and her whole body set alight as the gorgeous man smiled at her. He liked it. He liked it so much, Sam felt the muscles squeeze as the man pumped cum into his ghoul's ass, for the fourth time. He came, and came, and came, body pouring buckets of cum into his ghoul, just like Jacob had earlier when covering Samantha. And as he filled his ghoul's body with his cum, he kept his warm, heavenly gaze on Sam, and refused to look away even as a small groan escaped him. She felt every flex in her hand. So much cum, Sam felt it trickle out of Madison's body, and soak his testicles, and Sam's hand. So warm. So wonderful. The feel of its thickness coating Sam's fingers had her mewling, and she pressed more of her weight into Madison's chest as she continued to massage the fellow Daeva's heavy testicles. Now, she was massaging his cum, and Madison's juices into his skin, and the hungry look in his eyes said he never wanted her to stop.

Everyone looked to Triss as the woman let out a feminine whimper, a sound Sam rarely heard from her, and the woman started to tremble. Her hands reached up, and clutched Othello's hugging arm like she was on a roller coaster. Her eyes closed, and her body shook as the pleasure worked through her, making her toes curl and her thighs tremble around Jennifer. And a moment later, a hard squirt of clear fluid shot out from her empty pussy, and hit Jennifer in her heavy, rippling breasts.

"Wow," Samantha whispered. "W ... Wow."

“Beatrice is as much an anal addict as Othello,” Jennifer said, chuckling.

“Not a fucking addict,” the shivering Nosferatu barely managed to say.

Jennifer rolled her eyes, and pumped her fist inside the fit woman’s ass again, not bothering with her clitoris anymore. Everyone watched, hypnotized by the way the distension moved back and forth along Triss’s abs, and the way her body writhed in obvious pleasure. The first orgasm had tipped Triss over, and now, every following orgasm would be easy to reach. Sam knew the feeling.

Jacob thrust into Samantha again, hard, and she collapsed forward completely, hands falling, and all of her weight pressing into Madison again. Her left, cum-soaked hand pressed to the girl’s thigh for balance, and her right hand slid from the wall to Othello’s shoulder belonging to the hand playing with her clitoris. The man stopped caressing her clit, but he kept his fingers on it, happy to keep touching her as she came on Jacob’s cock in seconds. Triss looked up at her, struggling to keep her eyes open as she came too, but apparently she really, really wanted to watch Samantha cum. They all did.

And when Jennifer reached out, took Sam’s right hand, and set it on Triss’s stomach, Triss made no effort to stop her. If anything, she looked excited, openly groaning when Sam accidentally pushed down on the woman’s lower abdomen, just above the pubic bone, over her g-spot. Didn’t mean to! But Jen put her hand right there. God, she could feel Jen’s arm working Triss’s insides. And she could feel it as Triss’s muscles clenched hard, another orgasm hitting her, and a hard squirt of fluid again splashed against Jen’s chest and dangling, shaking breasts. The splash hit Sam’s arm, and she groaned as the warmth coated her hand.

Madison hugged Sam close with her left arm, but her right reached down, took Sam's left hand, and guided it back down. She thought maybe Madison wanted her to keep massaging Othello's testicles, but instead, the ghoul guided her hand to Madison's slit. As the ghoul forced two of Samantha's fingers into her clenching pussy, she moaned into Sam's ear, and whispered, "drink me."

Sam returned the groan, and sank her teeth into Madison's neck. Her Beast took over, and gave her no chance to say no. The ghoul moaned, and her body shook with spasms as she immediately came on Samantha's fingers, hard. Clenching, hot muscles leaked juices onto Samantha's hand, and the woman pushed her hips toward her, desperate for more. And Sam obliged, lost in a haze of heat, desire, and the Kiss. She pumped her hand back and forth hard enough to make the ghoul's body shake, and she clamped her teeth down on her prey to make sure she didn't escape.

And to make it all a delirious concoction of carnal pleasure, Othello's hands took his ghoul's hips, and he fucked her, bouncing her a couple inches at a rapid pace, as Sam fingered her and drank her.

Her own muscles clamped down on Jacob's cock, and she groaned into Madison's neck, their voices mixing. She lost track of the pleasure. Madison's blood flooded her, filled her with passion, life, heat, desire, and bliss. It also blinded her to anything else. Dimly, she was aware she was still pumping her hand back and forth in Madison's pussy, and that the ghoul was cumming so hard she was drenching Sam's hand. She was also aware she was cumming too. Was Jacob? She felt him pump her faster, and then slam into her with fewer, harder thrusts. She felt Othello do the same, his grip on Madison matching Sam's fingering, until he slowed, and slowed, and stopped.

Sam pulled back, and gasped, looking the sleeping, panting, sweating ghoul up and down. "Oh ... oh god."

Othello grinned at her, and licked his lips. “That, was hot.”

Jacob nodded, and kissed Sam on the neck. “Sizzling like Tom Selleck in the eighties.” Chuckling, he slipped back, pulling his cock free of Sam’s quivering insides. New heat dripped out of her, vanishing into the growing mess of fluids. He had cum inside her, enough that she could feel it trickling down her thighs until it reached the furs beneath them.

Sam went weak at the knees, quivering, and she stared on in awe as the unconscious, trembling ghoul collapsed back onto Othello’s body. With a playful laugh, Othello lifted Madison up and up, until his huge cock fell out of her ass. A fountain of white cum poured out of the woman, and Sam squeaked as it drenched the man’s abs like a flood, before Othello lifted her toward Jacob. He took her, and set Madison out of the way on the other side of the alcove.

“That was ... amazing,” she said. Hard to get her voice steady, with tingles still flowing up and down her body. Her thighs wouldn’t stop shaking.

Jacob laughed. “Was?”

“W-What?”

“You just ate. I know you’re not done yet.” Grinning like some mad genius, Jacob picked her up from her waist like she weighed absolutely nothing.

“Jacob! I—” She gasped sharply as the man lowered her down, onto Othello’s lap, facing him, her knees outside his waist. So close! Close enough her knee was under Triss’s side, and the woman adjusted to sit back against it and Othello’s side before grinning back up at her.

Sam froze and stared down at the huge man, and his huge cock currently lying on his abs, coated in a mountain of his cum, cum that'd literally flowed out of his ghoul's ass seconds ago from what must have been half a dozen orgasms. Smiling his usual dopey, fun smile, the huge Daeva set his hands onto her hips, and pulled her up and forward a little, until her ass hovered a foot over his pelvis, and her dripping pussy was directly over his shaft.

If he cared that her thighs were covered in Jacob's cum, and it was still dripping out of her pussy, he didn't show it. And considering his abs, his utterly amazing abs, were absolutely buried in his own cum, it was hard to tell whose mess was whose. Vampire sex could get so insanely messy.

"I ... I don't know if ... um ... uh ... are you sure?" Oh god it was happening. It was happening! This stupid, silly schoolgirl sexual fantasy she'd been having was happening. Oh god oh god oh god.

Jacob leaned back in, and gave her another kiss on the neck. "I'm not done with you yet, but I think you want a turn with Othello, right? Get passed around the Circle like a lovely little sex toy."

She turned red from head to toe, and peeked at Othello's warm eyes before looking down. As she did, Othello reached down, took his cock, and raised it to point it at her ass. He let go, and the huge shaft had enough firmness to stay upright as it pulled forward, and its fat glans rested against the crack of her ass.

She stared back at Jacob, but the man smiled at her, winked — all in the face muscles — and gave her a tiny shove toward the Daeva. And Othello, with slow and casual hands, lowered her down onto his cock. There was no doubt the man would want to fuck her ass; it was his fetish, apparently, and the only way he would fuck Madison. Jacob knew Sam had a thing for Othello, and had introduced her to anal sex largely because he knew she'd been fantasizing about it, after seeing how much Madison enjoyed sex with Othello. But this? She hadn't expected this!

Her whole body buzzed with a fresh meal and renewed need. Her nipples ached, and her labia were beyond swollen. Everything was soaked, and dripping. God, she was even hornier than before, and she knew it. She knew she was going to love this, and everyone was going to see how much she loved it.

She stared at Othello, grabbed his shoulders for balance, bit her lip, and the big guy let out a small, deep moan, as he set the dripping wet head of his thick cock against her sphincter. Jacob had helped her get used to this, and she knew to relax her muscles, but it was hard! So hard when she was so nervous, with her hands holding Othello's shoulders, and the feel of his huge muscles filling her palms.

Slowly, Othello eased her down onto his thick girth, and she squeaked as the warm, drenched head of the Daeva's cock pushed passed her clenching ring of muscle, and into her.

"Oh ... no..." She whimpered like a scared puppy, and the two men chuckled as Othello sank her down, and down, and down. Jacob was a very well endowed man, and had fucked her ass on several occasions. She liked having sex with Jacob, a lot, and did, a lot. But Othello was even bigger, and she found herself gasping as the man's thick girth filled her up.

The whole situation was quickly regressing her into some tiny girl with stupid sex fantasies about being penetrated by the men on romance novel covers. Except, not a fantasy anymore. She let out a whimpering whine as her ass molded snug to Othello's thighs and pelvis, and she pressed her hands against his huge chest, trying to lift herself up off the huge thing filling her. Othello didn't let her. He pushed her down until her pussy pressed to his cum-soaked pelvis, and she whimpered, defeated, aching for more.

Jacob chuckled, and a glance back showed his evil grin. He said wasn't done with her yet, but Jacob had so much patience. If he wanted, he'd happily wait, or hook her up to toy and leave her like that for the whole night, before indulging himself. She didn't think he'd wait that long this time, but he did sit back, and watch. He had that grin too, his thinking grin, the one he used when he was planning a new thing to do to her. It sent chills through her, and she whimpered again as she looked back to the big, dumb, handsome man between her legs.

She managed another quick peek over her shoulder to see Jacob scoop up the near unconscious Madison. For a moment, she thought he might start fucking her; considering Sam was fucking Othello, she wouldn't blame him. But he didn't. He sank his teeth into the ghoul, indulging in the pleasure of the Kiss, but his eyes landed on Sam, and he grinned at her, even as he gestured for her to continue and enjoy herself. He was going to have a drink, before he came back for her.

She shivered in anticipation.

With a weary groan, Triss forced herself to sit up straight, still snuggled under Othello's arm, and looked at Sam.

"Sorry, about all this anal. Othello really likes it, and I like it, so—"

"It's fine! It's ... fine," she said. Jacob had long proved to her she was a lot more naughty than she thought she was, and that she liked all kinds of kinks. All kinds.

She let out a slow, wavering moan as Othello tilted her hips back, forcing her to lean back slightly, and he flexed his cock inside her, drawing it toward her belly. Instant sparks of pleasure as the fat girth stretching her depths pushed toward her slit, and she gripped the man's huge wrists tight as she stared at him.

He was good. He was so, damn, good. And huge. She felt like she might burst.

With a less weary, happier groan, Jennifer sat down beside Othello opposite of Triss, snuggled into his side, and watched Sam, same as Triss.

“Look at her. She’s obviously enjoying herself.” With a sly grin, Jen reached out, and traced a line down Sam’s body, from collar to sternum to stomach, all the way down to her mons, leaving a tingling trail wherever her finger touched. “I bet she’s been dreaming of this moment for a while.”

“I ... I um...” Sam’s eyes found Othello’s, and she blushed horribly. Not that she hadn’t been blushing horribly this whole time, but now she felt her fake heartbeat right up in her cheeks.

With a warm, dopey, happy smile, Othello met her eyes, and moved her again. His big hands held her easily, and he pulled her a bit forward as he also moved her up and down. He knew exactly where to put her, and exactly how to move her, to make sure the head of his cock pressed toward her pussy with each slow, deep, circular bounce of her body. And each time she felt his hard, huge cock press toward her belly through her ass, tingling sparks of pleasure erupted outward from her swollen depths. The haze of sexual bliss, combined with a stomach full of a fresh meal, had every inch of her quivering with desire and bliss, to the point it didn’t take much at all to have her nearing orgasm.

She outright squeaked, when Jacob took her wrists, pulled them behind her, and clicked something around them. Handcuffs! Their handcuffs, the fuzzy ones that Jacob had made, the comfortable ones. The super strong ones!

“Jacob! I ... I...” Oh no. No no. She stared at Othello, at Beatrice and Jennifer, as her whole body lit up. She squirmed and wriggled, and tried to push up off Othello with her knees, but he held her down, and smiled his warm smile. He saw it, he must have, how much her body responded on its own to what Jacob did. Oh no no.

She squirmed harder, pushed her knees down harder against the fur to try and sit up and get away, but Othello held on. Embarrassment coursed through her, and she kept struggling, but all that did was make her muscles clench tighter, earning some groans from the beautiful man fucking her ass.

Wriggling on him too much soon had her whimpering, and Othello forced her down on his cock harder and faster, making her body shake and forcing outright squeaks from her. Oh no.

Triss and Jen both stared at her, eyes wide and hungry, as Sam came. She twisted and turned, trying to hide herself, but it was pointless. All she could do was tremble like a leaf as Othello's fat cock reached her deepest places again, and again, making her insides spasm and clench. And soon, more of her juices leaked from her, dripping down onto the mess on Othello's abs.

"Wow, you really love the handcuffs, don't you?" Triss said. "I mean yeah, I saw it before, but damn."

She tried to say something, but electric jolts coursed outward from her core where Othello's cock pressed toward her belly, robbing her of any breath. She managed to keep her eyes open, despite her trembling thighs and curling toes, but her mouth hung open too as she panted and mewled. With how everyone stared at her, she probably looked like some sort of horny slut, gasping with pleasure and cumming from anal sex; Othello hadn't even touched her pussy. It was beyond embarrassing.

It was beyond arousing.

"Look at this," Jennifer said, voice softening, like she was discovering a dark secret. She reached out again, slid her closer hand between Sam's thighs, and this time didn't stop at her mons. Expert fingers traced along her aching clitoris, and Samantha shivered as the woman moved her hand down further, and then into her.

“Jen!” Samantha sat up straight, eyes wide. Oh god, she hadn’t expected that!

But Jennifer just grinned at her, and pulled her fingers out of her and away half a foot. A couple dangling lines of thick juices connected her fingers to Sam’s pussy, Sam’s juices, and Jacob’s. Oh god oh god. Sam quickly looked to Triss, hopeful the woman would stop her girlfriend from what she was doing. But Triss just sat there, smiling, eyes looking Samantha up and down, and after a few moments, set one of her hands on Samantha’s leg, while the other reached between Triss’s own thighs to gently caress her own clit.

Vampires could have sex all night if they wanted. Normally Jacob would stop after an hour or two, so they didn’t lose the whole night to it. Tonight, there didn’t seem to be any sign of stopping.

“You,” Othello said, voice deep, a whisper that tickled up her spine and made her body buzz, “are gorgeous. And very, very tight.”

She couldn’t blush anymore. Her whole body was red, lost to embarrassment and arousal. Climaxing from just anal sex was embarrassing enough, but when Jen sank her fingers back inside her, and then another, palm up, and started curling them toward Othello, toward Sam’s g-spot, she couldn’t take it anymore. She tried to get away again, pushing with her legs, but Othello’s grip on her hips was solid, and the handcuffs made sure she couldn’t use her arms, either to push away, or to hide herself. Everyone got to watch as waves of bliss rolled out from her insides, up into her chest, down her legs, and into her toes. Trembling and whimpering, her head rolled forward and her jaw hung, as she stared down at the beautiful man she straddled, and the juices she leaked onto Jen’s fingers. A lot of juices.

And then Othello started to cum; the man was a machine. Sam froze, and stared at the handsome Daeva as his muscles flexed, and his eyes closed for a second, before opening again to drink her up.

He'd been looking forward to this, she could see it in his eyes, and Sam stared at him as the man filled her ass with his cum. Waves of it filled her, gushes, each accompanied by a hard flex of his huge cock that pulled toward her pussy. Each joined by a whimper and shiver from her.

"You are easily one of the most sexual vampires I have ever met," Jen said. "Daeva indeed." For a second, Sam thought she was talking to Othello; he'd cum, what, six, seven times tonight already? But no, Jen was talking to her, and Sam shook her head desperately.

"I'm not!"

"Oh?" Chuckling, Jen slipped her hand out of Sam's insides, and ran them up onto Othello's huge abs and chest. Wetness, strands of arousal, connected Jen's fingers to Sam's leaking body, and she traced the wetness along Othello's muscles. And Sam watched her fingers, hypnotized.

"That ... that's cause, I fed, and ... and..."

"A stomach full of blood definitely makes it easy to get the body going, and it rejuvenates you too, but it doesn't make you hornier than you normally would be." With a pleased sigh, Jen slid her hand back down between Sam's thighs, and slipped two fingers inside her once again, palm up. "You'll just have to accept that you are, eternally, a horny vampire." And before Sam could say anything, Jen started to finger her, hard, hard enough to make the Ventrue's body ripple with the fast, firm motion she put into her arm. Her large breasts jiggled, rubbing against Othello's side, but the man didn't even notice. He kept his eyes on Sam, gazing her up and down, and licking his lips as he watched her mewl and squirm on his cock.

"Jen! Slow ... slow down..." It was no good. Sam came in seconds, pleasure pouring outward from her swollen, aching insides, but Jen didn't stop. Sam looked to Triss for help, but the Nos grinned up at her, got comfortable against Othello's side, and masturbated faster as she watched her.

Jen wasn't done. Her other hand reached behind Sam, grabbed her ass, and used the grip for stability so she could pump her other hand faster, slapping her fingers against Sam's insides. Rough! Oh god, so rough, Sam's whole body trembled like a jackhammer, as did Jen's, her arm shoving back and forth like a piston, each forward draw making a wet slapping sound. Sam's insides clenched hard, but Jen didn't stop, and before long, Sam felt her insides begin to pulse with waves of pleasure that forced every inch of her to tense and squeeze in rhythm.

Juices flowed out of her, and she stared down at the holy mess she created all over her thighs, Jen's hand, and Othello's abs. Little splashes soaked Jen's palm and everything else, encouraging Jen to pump harder, until Sam couldn't even moan anymore. If she'd been human, she'd have started seeing stars from not being able to breathe. As a vampire that wouldn't happen, and all she could do was wriggle in Othello's solid grip, as Jen made her cum on his cock again, and again.

Finally Jen stopped, and she chuckled as she slipped her hand out of Sam, and again painted her juices over Othello's muscles. She had plenty to work with.

“Glorious.”

“Othello,” Jacob said, “get over here.”

Samantha, slowly coming up from her climax high, managed to look back over her shoulder to Jacob, knowing she must have looked guilty as hell. What was he doing?

Nodding, Othello pushed himself down away from the wall, until he was lying down on his back, torso only slightly propped up by the blankets underneath him.

Sam squeaked as Jacob's hands, hands she knew well, took her thighs, lifted, and turned her around. He didn't lift her up much, keeping Othello inside her, and setting her legs outside his. With a big devil grin, he took his large cock in his hand, and winked at her. Oh no.

Jacob knelt down in front of her, and she wriggled and squirmed again. They'd never done this! Sure, they'd used toys, but never two men at once! Never. And both men were big. And she was not.

Her lover pressed his cock's head against her drenched lips, and pushed into her, slowly. She clenched and squeezed, panicking, but Jacob kept going, forcing past her tightening insides. She mewled like a cat as he penetrated her, taking his sweet time filling her up, until she couldn't help but push her hips toward him.

With Othello lying on his back, Jacob had his knees around the man's legs, so he could sit up on his knees as he pushed into her. He grinned down at her as he sank himself to the base, filling her, stretching her, and he stayed there, not moving. She squirmed some more, not sure if she wanted him to stop before she died of embarrassment, or pound her until she was a mewling, whimpering mess.

Jennifer chuckled and slid over to them. With an evil grin, she slid in beside her, naked body pressed to Sam's side, and she slid her free arm down Sam's naked chest. First, over her breasts, both of them, taking the time to caress her swollen areola, and sending sparks through Sam's chest. Then lower, down her body, her stomach, and down her smooth mons. Then lower, to where her aching clitoris sat just above Jacob's cock.

"Jen, you ... you shouldn't, I—nnnng." Sam shivered, and her legs shook around Jacob, as Jen caressed her clitoris. Not hard thank god; it was super sensitive by this point. But the woman knew exactly how hard to push her sensitive body, and she used two of her soaked fingers to massage the tiny, engorged bud.

Sam outright gasped when Triss joined them. She knelt down beside Sam, opposite of Jen, and reached out across her chest. Chuckling, she did the same thing as Jen, caressing each of her breasts and cupping them playfully with one hand. On her knees, she had both hands free, so her other hand slipped down Sam's stomach, and down to where Jen's hands were. Her fingers stopped a couple inches higher, and with her evil smile only growing, she pressed down.

Sam's squeals and whimpers turned into heavy groans, as Triss squashed her g-spot down onto Jacob's cock.

Then the boys started to thrust. Like in-sync machine pistons, they found a rhythm that worked together almost instantly. Jacob pulled out, then Othello as they lifted her up a bit. Then Jacob thrust into her, hard enough to make her breasts ripple, before Othello pulled her down, and thrust up into her, both men fully sinking into her. Around and around and around it went, and they were not gentle, turning her into a squeak toy in seconds.

Through it all, Jennifer continued to tease her clitoris, approaching but never crossing that point of painful. After a few seconds of the boys becoming aggressive animals, Jennifer leaned up and over Othello's shoulder, then Sam's. She set a kiss on her shoulder, her neck, and then lower, finding her free breast and enveloping it in her mouth. Jennifer's breasts were huge, and she pressed them into Sam's side as she kissed and suckled Sam's nipple, finding a rhythm that matched the boys. And Beatrice, she kept her one hand on Sam's other breast, massaging, while her other hand pressed harder down against her mons, crushing her g-spot onto Jacob's cock.

Sam was only barely aware of any of this. Thirty seconds into the madness, she closed her eyes and went limp, body refusing to listen anymore as orgasm hit her. Vaguely, she knew a big muscly guy was under her and in her ass, that two women were caressing and playing with her, and that her lover was fucking her pussy hard enough to bruise her, if she'd been human. But the new Samantha came and came hard, until splashes soaked her thighs.

No one listened. She opened her eyes enough to see Jacob, and the evil smile he loved to use when fucking her. Even without eyes, the man's expressions were powerful, and she melted as his face silently spoke a thousand words: you're mine, now cum for me.

She didn't need much encouragement. Her eyes closed as she came again, muscles clamping down despite how her spread, limp legs only managed to quiver on the blankets. Someone's hand wrapped her throat. She didn't know whose. All she could feel was two people massaging and kissing her body, while two more fucked her with an almost desperate rhythm. And then they filled her with cum again.

At some point, the others stopped, and Jacob had her all to himself. He rolled her onto her chest and knees, lifted her ass up, knelt behind her, and fucked her hard.

And everyone watched. She was a trembling mess at that point, but her Kindred body rejuvenated her fast enough that she could keep on going, and going, and she melted into the floor as she came on him. And everyone watched, big smiles on their faces as their boss ravaged her. He thrust into her again, and again, until she felt his cum oozing out of her pussy, trickling down her mons and stomach, and down her thighs, joining the mess already there.

No wonder Antoinette warned her about how vampires could get addicted to sex. She couldn't wait to do this again.

---

“Oh my god oh my god oh my god.” She covered herself with her arms as best she could, and shook her head until her hair was smacking her in the eyes. “Oh my god.”

“Chill girl, chill.” Triss laughed, shrugging.

Everyone lay in Othello’s alcove, spread out around the blankets. Jacob, then Sam, then Othello, then Jen, then Triss. The only reason the room didn’t stink of sex and flesh was because they were vampires, and all that stuff faded away after a while. Except for Madison, she lay on the other side of the room, asleep, and snuggled up to some pillows, smiling.

“I didn’t mean to ... to touch you like that, Triss,” she said.

“Sam, you barely touched me. Besides, if I’d had a problem with any of this, I’d have walked off.” She laughed, shrugging again. “Not like I give a shit about peer pressure from these fuckers.”

That was true. No one had done something they didn’t want to do. Everyone here was comfortable enough to tell each other to stop if they didn’t like where things were going. Even Triss, who’d been a bit annoyed with Othello when he got his arm around her, didn’t actually try to get out of it. She’d enjoyed herself.

Jacob chuckled, leaned in to her, and kissed her. A good, proper kiss. A romantic kiss. She sighed into it, but pulled away when she heard a couple swoons. The girls were grinning at her.

Before she could say anything, someone else walked up to the alcove. Aaron!

The Gangrel blinked at them, each one of them, rolled his eyes, and walked off.

Chapter 142

~~Antoinette~~

“It burns?”

“Burns is too strong a word,” Daniel’s voice said over the phone. “But the contents burn. I witnessed some incendiary explosives as well.”

“Terra Den’s work.”

“Undoubtedly.”

She groaned as she rubbed her forehead. Seated in her beautiful chair, in her beautiful office, at the top of her beautiful tower, all she felt was rage. How dare Garry, how dare he flirt with the edges of her commands.

“Response from the city?” she asked.

“No police or firefighters yet. And I haven’t heard any gunfire.”

“And the Kindred?”

“I’ve seen nothing to suggest a Masquerade violation.”

If someone violated the Masquerade, the situation would have been far easier to resolve. Execute the infidels, and silence those who complained. But the more Garry and Michael dodged her rules, the more her power slipped away. How much longer before the Carthians or Invictus proclaimed her an unworthy Prince?

Would that be so bad? Dolareido was her city, despite Jacob’s claim of co-ownership. It was her experiment, her time and effort that had produced its balance. And for all its troubles, it was one of the more peaceful cities when it came to the covenants. She was proud of her work.

But the more things slipped through her fingers, the more she wondered if her efforts were in vain. Would it not be better to simply leave, establish a more secure power base in a smaller area with no other Kindred presence, and enjoy blissful centuries with Jack?

As much as the idea pleased her, she knew it would not be enough. Despite what absurd and juvenile romantic fairy tales suggested, one could not find contentment in romance alone. One needed to find their own reason to exist, something that drove them and gave them purpose. And while her research into realms of ephemera were of great interest to her, it was her quest to prepare for the future that drove her. Dolareido was the fruit of that preparation, and she would not abandon it on a flight of wistful whimsy, or disparaging anger.

If she had to kill Michael and Garry, and whomever believed in their cause, so be it.

“What do you think, old friend?” she said to the phone on her desk.

“I think Garry has been careful. Anyone who sees this will think the building’s been attacked, but nothing here suggests paranormal activity.” Doubtlessly, the man was giving one of his stone glares at the building as he spoke. “Conspiracy theorists and journalists alike will have fun theorizing about underworld crime, but nothing more.”

“Daniel ... do you consider Garry’s attack to be a breach of my rules?”

“Much as I hate to say it, no.”

“Do you think I should change my decree?” Kindred were staunchly advised to avoid killing each other in Dolareido. She had said as much in Primogen meetings and public gatherings alike. But there had been no official declaration. As long as they upheld the Masquerade, and did not interfere with her city on any meaningful scale, Kindred were allowed to kill each other. And indeed, sometimes they did, despite the assurance from the Carthians and Invictus that no murders had been performed. Pretty lies.

Cooperation, that was what she strived for in Dolareido. Cooperation. It was one of the reasons she kept as much distance from the covenants as she did. History and psychology alike taught the folly of a heavy hand. If she changed her ways and adopted the role of totalitarian, she knew it would end in disaster. Perhaps now, perhaps in another hundred years, it would eventually end in catastrophe.

“I think if you get between these two angry, fighting dogs, you’re likely to get bit, Ann. Michael can probably pull ten, maybe twenty of his strongest to fight us, and Garry could likely convince most of his covenant that we should be disposed. And nothing unites people quite like a common enemy.”

She groaned again as she cradled her forehead, and combed her hair over her shoulder with her other hand. “Agreed.”

“I did see Sándor nearby.”

“Understandable. If he is to replace Azamel, then I am sure he wishes to be aware of what the covenants do.”

“Should I ... ask him, about the tears?”

“No. Jack and his companions will handle the hunt from that angle. Natasha will approach it with the aid of the werewolves.” Forced aid, but aid nonetheless. “We will continue our own pursuits as we have.” Dangerous games and deadly uses of Daniel’s Auspex.

“Understood.” Daniel hung up, and Antoinette turned to her laptop.

Camera feeds showed the contents of several of her cells. Humans, kine she had abducted years ago, and rendered catatonic with drugs. Kine who deserved it. Would she sacrifice another, and summon Black Blood once more? The spirit refused to cooperate, but she was not without the power to force a discussion. The dark creature was not omnipotent.

Sighing once more, she shook her head and closed the laptop. A knock at her door announced Elaine’s arrival, and Antoinette smiled.

“Come in, my dear.”

“Ann,” Elaine said as she entered. “Trouble?”

“As always.”

“Garry being a pain in the ass, mm?”

“Naturally.”

“I could seduce him, perhaps?”

“He is homosexual, Elaine. Quite immune to your charms, I suspect.”

She rolled her eyes as she sat down at her desk across from her. “This is why you should abandon this city. It is slippery, and refuses to bow to your ideals. The Ordo would much prefer you focus on your studies.”

“I am sure they would. But the Ordo remain blind to the future.” Before Elaine could retort, Antoinette waved a dismissing hand. “How goes your attempt to steal Jack’s curse for yourself?”

Elaine half grimaced, half smiled. “Come now, you know it is not that simple.”

“Is it not?”

“No, it is not. Do not presume to know my intentions, or that I am so shallow as to be motivated by greed and nothing else.” Her smile did not falter. “And besides, if you truly felt that way, you would not have let me as close to the boy as you have.”

Antoinette grinned at her. “Do you think I ever let my guard down around you, old friend?”

“Why, yes, I believe you do.” Elaine returned the grin as she leaned forward over the desk. “At least a little.”

They laughed. It was good to laugh. The games they played, as insidious or manipulative as they may be, would not break their friendship. Others could not understand, but none of them had friendships as old as Antoinette and Elaine had theirs. What games Elaine played would come to light eventually, and until then, Antoinette would keep an eye on her. But she also trusted her, and had much more pressing concerns.

“Jack,” Elaine asked, “is he not at Xnomina, and the fire?”

“No, he is elsewhere.”

“If he were, would you interfere?”

“I have instructed Daniel that, if Jack is found in a situation where his death is inevitable, he is to save the boy. And from there, Jack will be prohibited from operating with the other covenants. Effectively dead.”

“All to maintain your glorious neutrality and indifference.”

Antoinette squinted her eyes at the woman. “I see you have come to make a point about something.”

“Of course. I see this growing war between the suits and the anarchists, and I believe it is foolishness.”

“Naturally.”

“I meant your refusal to take sides.”

Ah yes, this again.

“In the last city you laid claim to territory, what balance did the Kindred strike?” Antoinette was referring to Berlin, a city her old friend had taken up residence in for several decades during the 1900s. She also knew how this conversation would go, they had had it before, but such was the guilty pleasure of elders and elder kine alike, repeating conversations.

“The First estate ruled, and the Second Estate was their close ally, similar to Dolareido. But the Carthians outnumbered them, like a growing swarm of vermin. It is far easier for a lout to recruit a fellow lout, than for the others to grow their numbers.”

“Did they fight?”

“Frequently. There was no active war, as per usual, but the Prince was always one transgression away from demanding it.”

“And you saw no possibility for peace?”

“No.”

“Then, which side would you have picked?”

Elaine leaned back in her chair as she looked down. “I am not sure. They left me to my pursuits, and I never interfered.”

“Did you consider any of their views more worthy than the others?”

“No.”

“Then—”

“I was not Prince of that city, Ann. You are Prince of this one. I did not care if Berlin’s Kindred killed each other, nor if the city suffered for it. I only cared for my experiments. But Dolareido is your experiment, and you are the Prince of it.”

“You ask me to play favorites, when that itself would damage my experiment.”

“Better that than war.”

“You said yourself that in Berlin, it did not come to war.” True outright war was terribly rare among Kindred. Elders ruled, and elders were far too paranoid to risk their second lives in a struggle that, to them, was ultimately a fleeting moment in a lifespan measured in centuries. The purge Antoinette had herself enacted was an exception, not the norm.

Naturally, Elaine had been thinking of the purge as well.

“Ann, you fought Lucas and killed his bishops, and you did so because the man was a stone’s throw away from assaulting you with over a hundred Kindred. If peace and cooperation was possible, then —”

“Cooperation is possible. It is simply a matter of time and effort to find the balance.” And that time was running out. The fact her fellow Kindred could not appreciate the impact the exponential growth of technology would have on their futures, was forever infuriating.

“And if it is not?”

“Then we are all doomed, Elaine.”

Elaine sighed and waved a dismissing hand of her own. “Do not be so negative. You have done well here, and the other dragons acknowledge that. But ... we have both seen this behavior before, in other cities. Now that the Invictus are considerably weaker, with the Lancea et Sanctum essentially dead, Michael and Garry will fight, and many of the Kindred you are attempting to ... herd, will die. Better you take a stand now, and bring one covenant to its knees.”

“So that I may rule with fear, and begin the cycle of tyranny that has killed so many other cities?” And elders alike. She was not so foolish as to ignore the tinge of fear that crept up her spine at the idea of her city’s Kindred rebelling and uniting against her. Such rebellions did happen, rarely, but they did. Kine were not unique in that regard, nor for their fondness of chopping the heads off their rulers.

Elaine frowned, but managed a slow nod, acknowledging the point. “There is a reason dragons rarely rule, Ann.”

Antoinette leaned back as well, sighing as she combed her hair over her chest. “This squabble between the covenants is but a wound earned from tearing free of old traps around our legs. With time, the covenants will cooperate.”

“And the Lancea et Sanctum?”

“I spoke with Maria. She is far more reasonable than her lover was. So is the boy.”

“Lucas’s childe?”

“Oui. He is ... a pleasant surprise. As much as it pains me to admit, Damien is a perfect example of what I strive for, Elaine. He still holds to his beliefs, idiotic as they are, but he is also willing to cooperate with me, and understand the value in an open mind.”

“Even if you somehow made these puppets dance to your tune, what of Jacob?”

“Jacob.” Sighing, Antoinette looked down at her hair as she gently slid her fingers through it. “What do you think?”

“Of Jacob?” Elaine chuckled and licked a fang. “I am sure Samantha is enjoying herself.”

“You know Jacob is likely connected to the strange ongoing in my city, to these dark veins pulsing within it.”

“Yes, of course. But how dangerous do you truly consider them to be if you are willing to let Samantha ... ah, of course. Not willing. Encouraging.”

Antoinette closed her eyes for several moments before she offered her friend a questing gaze. “Do you trust Jacob with her?”

“You saw him with Minerva. His relationship with Samantha is not the same, but perhaps that is a good thing. If you are asking whether the man will drag her down into whatever dark games he plays with darker gods, then I would say no.”

“And Samantha herself? I let her take those two artifacts.”

“Why are you asking me? You know Beatrice’s plan will fail.”

“I am asking, because I doubt myself.”

Elaine shook her head. “You are the Prince. You cannot let anyone know you doubt yourself.”

“Then I hope you appreciate that I am willing to share this secret with you.”

Her old friend smiled, and tapped her desk with a fingertip several times. “Allowing me to share a bed with your lover, hardly a challenge. But letting me see your weak side in regards to your precious city and its denizens, that required centuries of effort.”

“Must you taunt me so?”

Elaine laughed, stood up, slipped around the desk, and leaned her butt against it by Antoinette as she smiled down at her. “I can provide my thoughts on this war between the Carthians and Invictus, but as for Jacob, Beatrice, and the dark arts they pursue? I am afraid I am as in the dark as you. You play dangerous games, Ann.”

“I do. But there is a glimmer of hope.”

“For Dolareido?”

“Do not be absurd. Dolareido has far more than a glimmer, and will be fine. If I have to personally bind and bury Black Blood to make it so, I will find a way. I meant ... for Jacob.” And, loath as she was to think it, God have mercy on her damned soul if Samantha paid the price for her plans.

Would Jack ever speak to her again, if something happened to her because of Antoinette?

---

~~Jack~~

Jessy threw up her hands. “Ryan, the fuck are you doing?”

“What? She stuck around to spy on us. No one saw me grab her.”

“So? We spy on each other all the time!”

“Yeah, but she tried to kill us. She tried to kill Mister Terry.”

“They weren’t trying to kill him! They were—”

Jessy and Ryan argued back and forth about the implications. Jack, on the other hand, paced in place and juggled information, while Mulder and Scully watched the chaos.

Crap. Crap Crap. Amanda, dead? Oh fuck. Oh fucking fuck. If that was true, then shit was officially going to hit the fan. People knew Amanda, Jack had worked with her. She was just a young Mekhet, Gloria’s childe, and a damn nice woman. Pretty much the perfect person to kill if you ... wanted ... a war...

Jack squeezed his phone, but stopped himself short before he shattered it.

“Damien,” he said, “tell me exactly what Michael said.”

“He said little more, Jack. Just that Amanda had died in the fire.”

“No more details?”

“No.”

“And you didn’t ask?” He couldn’t keep the bite out of his voice.

But his anger rolled off Damien without a problem. Thank god for friends.

“Michael wasn’t in the mood for talking. Understandable, I believe.”

“Yeah, understandable.” And a great way to avoid being questioned. “Is everyone else safe?”

“Yes. The fires are out. The attackers were quite thorough and managed to set many offices on fire, but ultimately the damage is just to decor. And ... Amanda...”

“Damien, I need you to go full Mekhet mode. What else did you see? Spare no detail.”

Damien didn't hesitate. He instantly went into painstaking detail, about his approach, about how Sándor had watched from afar, and how Isabella had been there, possibly to take advantage of the chaos and flames, and kill Michael. He talked about the fire, about the strange incendiary devices probably from Terra Den, about Gloria in the bunker, about finding some Kindred trapped by the fire that he saved, and finally about reaching Michael's office where the boss had dropped the horrible truth. Amanda was dead.

Jack didn't believe it for a fucking second. She may or may not have been dead, but he doubted she died to Garry's feint. No way in hell Garry told the fucks he sent to harass Xnomina with bullets and molotovs — or whatever crazy shit they used from Terra Den that seemed to burn so damn well — to be so aggressive they actually killed Kindred. The ones Damien saved would have probably been saved by the sprinklers. No, Garry's feint was just to make sure eyes were turned toward it while he came for an old fashioned brawl with Jack.

If Amanda was dead, Michael probably killed her, taking full advantage of the chaos so people would have to blame Garry. And if that was true, Jack was going to rip the man's head off.

“Thanks Damien.” He put away his phone, and joined Ryan and Jessy. “Shit has officially hit the fan. Garry hit Xnomina, poking the bear to draw attention. But ... Michael says Amanda's dead, died to fire.”

Everyone stared at him, Tilly included. And slowly, the Daeva's eyes went wide as she realized what had just happened to her chances of living through this night.

Ryan let out a low whistle. “Amanda dead is pretty bad. Jesus. Think we should get revenge?” He gestured down to Tilly, and her eyes went even wider.

“Just start with how and why.” He gestured to Tilly as he looked at Ryan and Jessy.

Jessy threw up her hands again. “Ryan got it in his head that after that the scuffle, gloves were off. So—”

“So, I was following Bella as she got Kathy and Tilly out of here. But Tilly stayed behind, probably to get a peek and see what we were up to, when Garry booked it. So I thought, might as well grab her and learn what she knows.” Ryan nodded toward Jack. “You can do that, right?”

Jack shrugged. “You’re the Mekhet. Isn’t digging up secrets your deal?”

“Eh, sorta. Isn’t Damien your buddy? Auspex doesn’t let me just learn things at will. I have to point it in a direction, and it isn’t exactly forthcoming with simple, direct answers.”

That made sense. Mekhet and their ability to discover secrets were well known, but it wasn’t like they could learn anything and everything. The Danse Macabre would be borderline pointless, otherwise.

Sighing, Jack squatted down in front of Tilly, and she shivered as she looked between him, and his two undead crows perched upon his shoulders.

“Tilly,” he said.

“... Jack,” she said. Her voice trembled.

A part of him loved that, the fear in her eyes, the obvious terror that she was so close to him, Jack, the Crow Lord, the Ripper, and a bunch of other nicknames he didn’t particularly care for. But, a larger part of him hated it. Christ, couldn't they all just get along? Why the fuck did they have to fight this old mans' war?

"Tell me, when Garry sent his goons to attack Xnomina, did he give them instructions to avoid killing?"

"Y-Yes! Yes, he did. He gave us all a debrief. I mean, much as Garry really debriefs, you know? He said he wanted a piece of either this building, or you, and the others were to piss off Michael and Xnomina. No killing."

Every word came out stammering, and Jack struggled to keep his wince hidden. He loathed this.

"She lying, Ryan?"

Ryan eyed Tilly for a moment, concentrating, before he sighed and shrugged. "I don't think so."

"Don't think so?"

"Like I said, Auspex doesn't just hand me the answers on a silver platter, man."

Sighing, Jack eyed the woman as she squirmed. A beautiful Daeva, average height and ballerina build, short red hair, and a few freckles. The type who was perfectly comfortable using that body to make herself seem weak and meek. Of course, she was a vampire, just as strong as any male her age, and the look and squirming and lip trembling, it was all an act.

Except the fear. The fear behind it all was very real.

"D-Don't, Jack. Don't, I'm not lying, I'm not—"

"I'm not going to hurt you, calm down." He reached out, and grabbed her mind, same as he had not long ago. With the necklace on, the Ripper had no say, and the Beast wasn't a raging tide of insane strength. Breaking into her mind without shattering it was easier, and he didn't hesitate to punch through her mental barrier again, and grab hold of the little vampire hiding within.

The sound of her begging hurt. Fucking Christ it hurt. God he hated this. Julias would have hated this, too.

"Tilly," he said, staring into her eyes. His two crows cawed, like an echoing choir. "Tell me, what was Garry's plan tonight?"

"He ... wanted to take the building, or fight you, or maybe both. The other team was supposed to make sure no one interrupted us here."

"And your rules of engagement?"

"N ... no killing."

Sighing, he let go of the girl's mind, stood up, and paced the floor they'd cleared of boxes and rat corpses.

"Damn," Ryan said, "you really are good at that."

Jack managed a small smile for the man, before setting his chin in his fingers as he thought. To Dominate another vampire to the point he could ask them important information like that, should have been difficult. But Tilly was only a neonate, plus the curse made it easy, and honestly, Jack knew he could probably Dominate her without the curse. He was really, really good at it.

Tilly stared at him, half terrified, half angry, now that he'd violated her mind like that. Of course she was angry. He'd be angry too if someone took a trip into his mind against his will, the only sanctum anyone truly had. It made him sick, but holy fuck, he was really good at it.

He avoided looking at her as he paced. How to fix this, how to fix this?

Sighing, he looked at Ryan, and Ryan met his eyes. Yeah, this was also going to suck, but he had to do it.

The man didn't even see it coming. Jack grabbed his mind, and crushed his Beast under his heel.

Ryan nodded, and left.

“Holy shit!” Jessy backhanded him across the shoulder, earning a few annoyed squawks from Mulder. “Dude, what the fuck?”

“Jessy, do me a favor and go upstairs. If Hella or any of them show up, tell them to go wait on the roof.”

She eyed him, half frowning half squinting. But after a few seconds, she sighed, nodded, and left.

Leaving him alone, with Tilly.

“If ... if you hurt me, Mason will—”

Jack squatted down in front of her again, and she froze up. Scully clicked at her a few times, and Jack smiled at his friend before scratching the back of her head. All vampires knew Animalism, but it was the Gangrels and Ventrue who were naturals at it. A young Daeva like Tilly probably didn't have a clue how to communicate with animals, and seeing the two undead crows on his shoulders obviously scared her.

“Tilly. You know what I did to the werewolves when they stepped out of line. Mason was there. I beat them, broke them, tore off limbs, and—” He stopped as the painful memory cut through his guts. Playing the bad cop was surprisingly hard, sometimes.

“That ... that wasn’t you, that was the curse. Jack the Ripper.”

Sighing, he nodded. “You’re right.”

“I am?”

“You are, mostly. This curse makes me damn powerful, Tilly, but the Ripper is a whole different beast.”

“And—”

“And you’re right, I didn’t beat up Avery and her wolves. The Ripper did.” He leaned in closer, and she winced and pulled her head back. “That doesn’t mean I couldn’t.”

She gulped.

“But I wouldn’t. I wouldn’t because, apparently, I’m the only person in this whole damn city who thinks we don’t have to settle everything with violence.”

“Um, is that a joke? You’re no pacifist!”

“Never said I was a pacifist. Hell, I’m completely against pacifism. You think something’s worth having, you better be willing to fight for it.” Groaning, he sat down on the floor, a few crates against his back, and the area cleared of rat corpses. “And what I think is worth having, is what my love thinks is worth having.”

“The Prince?”

“Mhmm. She wants everyone to get along. She genuinely thinks we could all cooperate, stop fighting, and embrace the future together. And you know what? I think it’s doable.”

Tilly eyed him, like he was a tiger behaving far too much like a friendly house cat, liable to snap and kill her the moment she let her guard down. Typical Kindred.

“Uh huh.” She didn’t believe him.

“Problem is, most of the Kindred are convinced it’s not possible, and a few of them are such monumental assholes, they’re willing to cause strife so they can take advantage.”

“Garry isn’t—”

“I didn’t say Garry. If anything, Garry’s holding back, and trying to figure something out that doesn’t involve killing everyone. Oh, he wants to kill Michael, and destroy the Invictus, but he doesn’t want to do it over the ashes of dozens of Kindred who don’t deserve it.”

She snorted and looked the other way. “You expect me to believe you like what Garry’s doing?”

“I think Garry’s not half the asshole the Invictus think he is, but he’s doing what he thinks he needs to do. With Viktor gone and Lucas gone, he’s taking full advantage, cause he’s genuinely worried for you guys. Getting Terra Den under his thumb, nudging Avery toward Maria, he did that shit because he’s a good guy trying to help his people.” He shrugged. “Sure, he’s a dumbass, and is dipping his toes into nasty shit, walking down hypocrisy lane, but his heart’s in the right place.”

“I can’t believe I’m hearing this.”

“That hard to believe someone out there actually thinks we can all get along?”

“Yeah, it is. And why are you telling me?”

“Because something just happened that’s going to start this fire, and if I don’t break a few rules, a lot more people are going to die.” He held up a hand, and Scully jumped onto his finger. He pet her head with the other, and she nestled into the shape of his palm and fingers, taking shelter, as he looked to Tilly. Yeap, this was a dangerous game, but if he didn’t do something, shit would get a lot worse than tonight. “You heard what I said about Amanda. Amanda Pol.”

Tilly froze, and gulped again. If she’d been Blushing Life, she’d have gone as pale as a vampire.

“Pol? Uh, black chick, kinda short and tiny? Long black hair?”

“That’s the one. A good friend of mine, actually. She helped me with personal shit on a few occasions.” Like helping him spy on his mom and sis before everything went to Hell. Slowly, he slid his fingers down the back of Scully’s head, before scratching some of her feathers, his eyes locked on Tilly. “So understand how much faith I’m putting in my lover’s hopes for this city, when I tell you I’m going to let you go.”

“Let me go? But ... but if we killed Amanda...”

“Then you’ve officially gone too far. Invictus will claim you crossed a line, and they’ll engage in war. The Prince will be put in a difficult position, because she wants to stay hands off, but she can’t just let the covenants go to war, not in the streets.”

“We never wanted the Prince to—”

“You were naive to think you could fight the Invictus, and she wouldn’t get involved eventually, Tilly. Christ, I’ve talked to her a thousand times about this. If you idiots only knew by how thin a thread you were hanging. You know in other cities, the Prince would throw up a bloodhunt against vamps for shit like this?”

Tilly glared at him and squirmed in place. “There aren’t any dragon Princes in other cities.”

“Probably not, true.” Far as he knew, other cities were almost always run by the First or Second Estate, and occasionally by Carthians; anarchist cities. For a city to be run by a witch or a dragon was almost unheard of. And it kind of made sense. The Invictus or Lancea et Sanctum would rule with the peace of the gun, and kill anyone who stepped out of line immediately. The Carthians would try ruling without a structure, and it’d fail. But dragons and witches? Dolareido was a weird city.

“So you’re ... really going to let me go?”

“Yeap.”

“Because of Avery and Mason.”

“Nope.”

“Then why? Don’t give me this peace shit.”

“Because I owe Garry.” He gave Scully a kiss on the beak. “But more so, because I want him to realize someone in this city is actually not an asshole. Because I’m trying to create peace, whether you believe me or not, and if I have to be the first one out of the trenches singing Christmas carols, so be it.”

“Trenches?”

“World War I, the Christmas Truce ... you know?”

She raised a brow. He buried his in a palm. Carthians.

“Um, then ... thanks, I guess.”

“And Tilly.”

“Y-Yes?”

He reached out, and smashed into her mind once again. “You can’t tell anyone about this, except Garry.”

Slowly, she nodded, like a zombie. The suggestion, buried in her subconscious, would overpower her consciousness. She wouldn’t be able to tell anyone except Garry, and would have trouble even thinking about why she couldn’t. Eventually she’d piece together why, but the suggestion would remain nonetheless. Jack couldn’t let this secret get out and backfire on him.

It was a game, wordless, no one allowed to outright say what they were doing. a trading of intent with Garry and only Garry. Christ, he fucking despised every moment of this. The Danse Macabre could go to Hell.

---

“I can’t say I’m too happy with how the situation resolved,” Michael said.

Jack held the man’s gaze. It was the next night, and Jack had had the opportunity to heal and put on some clothes that weren’t ripped to shreds. On his shoulders sat Mulder and Scully, and they both looked around the office room curiously. This was the first time they’d ever been allowed in the building, but considering they weren’t actually crows anymore, it’d be fine. And if it wasn’t fine, well, fuck whoever told him otherwise.

“The Tanvar building remains under our control.”

Michael, sitting at the table while Jack stood at the tail of it, shook his head. “A lot of merchandise was damaged.”

“Not all that much. And considering we stopped Garry’s attempt to take the building, it was well worth the damage.”

Michael raised a brow. It wasn't smart, talking back to Michael, but Jack was out of patience with the man. Every time they met eyes, Jack held them, despite knowing damn well doing so would only make his boss angrier. Hell, he might eventually realize Jack suspected him of killing Amanda. Calm down, and tell your Ventrue half to back off.

Jack looked down.

"Ideally," Michael said, placated, "you would have killed the man."

"Garry was very powerful. He healed rapidly, and his transformations were difficult to predict. It felt like I was fighting Sándor for a while there. Only reason I survived is Jessy."

"I'd heard you had resoundingly defeated the gargoyle when you fought in his dream."

"That was the Ripper, sir." And defeat was a strong word.

Michael glared at him. "So you didn't unleash it upon Garry."

"For the most part, no."

"Even though your life was in danger."

Yeah, danger you were hoping would either lead to Ripper killing Garry, or Garry killing Jack.

Mulder and Scully cawed, and Jack clicked his tongue at each of them. Shhh.

"I understand you want me to use the curse as a tool, Mister McDonald, but that's playing with fire. I'll use it as a last resort and nothing else."

The absolute statement was enough to earn Michael's glare, but eventually the man stood up, walked over the window, and stared down at the crowd below. People still stood around and looked at the damaged building, gathering outside the police tape that circled it.

“You’re trying my patience, Mister Terry.”

Not trying it hard enough if he was still willing to use titles.

“Sir, I understand what you’re asking for, and I understand why, but this is a personal matter. I cannot just ... use the curse like a weapon.” He’d already told his boss about all the shit he had to go through to keep it under control. He carefully avoided mentioning that the Ripper was an actual voice in his head, but he made damn sure Michael knew Jack went through Hell to keep it contained. Michael had even given him time off, and a lot of it, to get it under control, but now he wanted Jack to use it like it was a Discipline he could summon with vitae.

“And now that Miss Pol is dead?”

Now that Miss Pol is dead, I want to rip your fucking head off, take over the Invictus, and use that position to get some peace with Garry.

But, no. Much as that idea sounded appealing, Jack knew he couldn’t defeat Michael, not unless he went full psycho Ripper on his ass. One of these days, he wouldn’t be able to wrestle control of his body back from the Ripper, and that wasn’t a risk he was willing to take. Besides, even if he did unleash the Ripper, there was a chance Michael would still win. He had to do this the vampire way, the Danse Macabre way, by being a sneaky, scheming dick.

“We can force the issue a different way,” Jack said. “If we — you — call out Mister Tones for this transgression in a Primogen meeting, perhaps he’ll acknowledge he’s overstepped?”

“Perhaps. But I expect he’ll only admit to the harassment of Xnomina. A foolhardy Kindred not prepared and getting trapped in the crossfire? He won’t take credit for that.”

Of course he won’t. He knows it wouldn’t happen. No, the only reason Amanda was dead was cause Michael killed her.

“What’s the next step then, sir?”

“Our recon teams need a couple weeks to secure details, but I expect us to make a decisive strike against Terra Den. In the mean time, keep up defensive measures near the Tanvar building.”

That made sense. If Terra Den was giving the Carthians a new suite of tools to fight with, removing that advantage would make a prolonged battle harder for the anarchists. He almost expected Michael to say they were going to launch an attack on the Carthian half of South Side, and the buildings they knew many Carthians considered home. But that would likely only catch young Kindred sleeping; older Kindred slept in hideouts.

But it would come to that eventually. Now that Amanda was supposedly dead, the Invictus had no reason to hold back. In a month, Jack knew Kindred would be killing each other every chance they got.

Not if he could help it.

~~Eric~~

The night Jessy had come back from her tussle with the Carthians, she’d been cut up and exhausted, with some literal holes in her body. He gave her some of his blood, but apparently she’d already fed; needed a lot of blood to heal from her wounds, she said. She also went to sleep under his bed. These days, she’d sleep in his bed, trusting him — and his extra layers of blackout curtains — to keep her protected from the sun. But from what she'd told him, the Carthians couldn't be trusted to 'play fair' anymore.

Thralls and ghouls were outside on nearby rooftops during the day, watching the building in case other thralls and ghouls decided to attack. That'd be crazy. Vampire servants attacking during the day? He had trouble imagining it.

So, while Jessy slept under his bed like a corpse, he gave Avery a call.

“Eric? The fuck you want?”

He rolled his eyes. “God, you're a bitch.”

“Yeah so I've heard. What do you want?”

“Just want to know what's going on.”

“You're dating a big time vamp, ask her.”

He raised a brow, and looked out the living room window into the sunlight. “It's—”

“I meant ask her after dusk, asshole. Or better yet, why didn't you ask her last night?”

“She doesn't like telling me everything.” She told him far more than she probably should, normally. “Probably something to do with being a Right Hand.”

Avery snorted. Just a phone call, no vid, but he could clearly imagine her annoyed expression. “Not sure what you want me to tell you.”

“A little heads up? If the Carthians and Invictus—”

“We're staying out of this, Eric.”

“Gonna be kind of hard. Isn’t Mason dating a Carthian? Isn’t Brianna dating some Invictus?”

“We’re staying out of it. Let the fucking vamps kill each other.”

He sighed. “Do you have to be such a bitch all the time? You need to get laid, Avery.”

“Hey, fuck you! I have a boyfriend.”

He almost laughed. That was a surprisingly juvenile retort, and from an older woman like her, it was hilarious, and cute.

“Uh huh.” He was tempted to dump some dating advice on her, something along the lines of ‘sex good, go have it, you cold bitch’ but decided against it. He was dumb, but not that dumb. “Any progress finding out who’s causing those tears?”

“Still got spirits wandering around, talking about Maria, if that’s what you’re wondering.”

“You really still think it’s her?”

“I think she’s involved, but, maybe not directly, or even ... I don’t know, ok? A new tear has been created since Maria’s been on the mend.”

“Which proves—”

“It doesn’t prove anything, jackass. Just means there’s a chance she’s not the one making them.” More groans. “Besides, that little vamp is gonna check it out with my boys.”

“Right. Heard about that.” Tempted, so very tempted to tease her about Natasha drafting her two ‘boys’. “I’m not allowed to participate in this Carthian Invictus stuff either. Jessy says as long as you don't help Garry, I shouldn't help the Invictus." But he had a sneaking suspicion Michael would override Jessy's order eventually.

"Makes sense, I guess."

"But I am invested in this city."

"Meaning?"

He rolled his eyes. "Meaning, if ... if shit goes sideways, I'll help, ok? I like this city. I like the people in this city. I'd like to keep them alive."

Silence, but eventually Avery let out a long, annoyed sigh.
"Thanks."

"Holy shit, I think that's the nicest thing you—"

She hung up.

---

A week later, Tash showed up at his door.

"Hey Tash. Guys," Eric said, nodding to the vampire and her two werewolves.

"Eric," Tash said, meeting his eyes with a smile. It didn't last long. He could see it in her eyes when her composure broke, and she started squirming. Awkward.

Well, they had seen each other naked. They'd all seen each other naked and having sex, but to him, it didn't feel like a big deal. He'd seen orgies before ever meeting Jessy. That was Dolareido for you, a city of sex, Slut City, and the sooner you didn't let it bother you, the sooner you got to enjoy the good side. According to Jessy, anyway.

And sure, he could tell Jessy wanted more intimacy than her old life ever gave, more personal romance. But at the same time, he'd be lying if he said he didn't like showing off with her, being the center of attention, and being admired. He'd been a professional fighter after all. Fucking Jessy on camera for Tash, or doing it person? He was surprised at how perfectly comfortable he was embracing his girlfriend's shamelessness.

So, Tash might have felt a bit awkward, but he didn't. Hell, even if he would have in the past, Jessy had rubbed off on him enough that an orgy with neighbors wouldn't make him blink.

He stepped back and motioned for them to come in. They did, and the boys threw themselves onto his living room couch without a word. If they felt awkward about stuff, they didn't show it. But then, they were a pair that'd — according to Jessy — been double teaming women since before Natasha. Being seen naked and fucking probably didn't mean much to them.

“Jessy ain't here,” he said.

“I know. B-But, you know I'm not here to talk to her anyway.”

“Yeah, I guess.” She wouldn't have brought the boys, otherwise.

“Jessy's busy with the Carthians,” the little woman said as she followed him into the kitchen. “But, I know the werewolves and monsters have been t-told to stay out of this fight.”

“Yeah.”

“I am kinda surprised you, um, d-didn't really commit to the Invictus by now.”

He put up hands and shook his head. “The devil pays my salary, but that don't mean I'm just gonna throw 'em my soul. If they want that, I'll need more than money.”

She smiled. “The Invictus have a lot of money.”

“S’long as I can pay my bills, I’m good. Don’t need a fancy house or a yacht.”

“Didn’t you used to be a p-p-professional fighter? And, um, kinda a big deal?”

“Yeah, but it wasn’t about the money.” He shrugged as he sat on a stool, and left it at that.

Natasha nodded as she sat beside him. “I need your help.”

“Need my help?”

“Er, well, want.”

“Not sure I understand.”

“I’ve been going into the Hisil lately. You ... know about what happened with M-Matt and Art?”

He nodded. “Jessy filled me in.” He threw the two men a glance, and they looked back at him. Yeap, that was shame in their eyes. Guy shame, subtle, hidden in a cold, sad gaze. So Eric put up his hands again. “And I don’t plan on taking sides on anything, including whatever Avery’s pack is up to.” Neutrality may have been a boring hill to die on, but he already had a grave plot there and everything.

The boys managed some small smiles, but again, in typical manly fashion, the sadness was hidden in the eyes. Not sad about him, sad about Avery.

“This isn’t about that. It’s about tracking d-down whoever, whatever, is leaving these scars in the city. And I know you can help us.”

“Me? Cause I’m Uratha?”

Art raised a hand. “Well, that, and because we know you’ve been sneaking into the Hisil and being a dumbass, tracking down and killing spirits.”

Eric winced. Those spirits were a menace, spreading influence for things like hate and greed. He’d been slipping into the Hisil at some loci in the city. Finding them wasn’t that hard, once you knew what to look for, people behaving strangely and odd behavior cropping up almost unprovoked. Devil’s Corner had more than a few small ones.

“I’ve been in Dolareido my whole life,” he said, eyeing the other two wolves, “and apparently, some mystical moon bitch decided I’m gonna be a werewolf and deal with the crazy shit out there. Spirits, crazy spider hybrid monsters, whatever.” The more he talked, the less he sounded like his usual reserved self, and the more he sounded like Jessy. “So if I want to take a trip into the Shadow Realm, and do a little spring cleaning, in my town, I will.” Everyone in the room looked at him, faces hunting for more. Eventually he shrugged. “Not like I’ve been hunting big game. Not yet, anyway.”

“Eric,” Matt said. “It’s not Avery you need to be worried about, if you step over the line and fuck something up. It’s not even the Prince. It’s Black Blood.”

Eric gulped down the rising lump in his throat. For months now, he’d been avoiding Avery and going on these hunts, learning what it meant to be a werewolf in a spirit world, how to hunt and even eat spirits, and he’d killed a few spirits old enough to have names. The name ‘Black Blood’ came up frequently. So did the others, Red Tide and Street-Tail King, but Black Blood was the spirit that had the city feeling like a monarchy.

“I’m keeping my head down enough to avoid Black Blood. It’s not going to care if I deal with a few spirits that got uppity.”

Eric hadn’t run into it Black Blood yet, or any of the three warring assholes in Dolareido’s Hisil half. He planned to keep it that way.

Just like how he wasn't getting involved with the Invictus or Carthians. If the Invictus wanted his help dealing with werewolf-y things, then he'd help. But the war? No chance, not unless they put a gun to his head.

Natasha wasn't Invictus, though. If she wanted him to get involved in shit, he had every right to say no.

"You know the city, right?" Natasha asked.

"So do you."

"Yeah, b-but not like a werewolf would."

He sighed. "You want me to help you track down these tears."

The question hit her hard, and she looked down as her little hands fidgeted on the counter for a few seconds.

"Sorta. Matt and Art already know where a new one is. We scouted nearby, but it's ... it's dangerous. They w-want to inspect it, but there are red wraiths nearby, and ... and..."

"I've seen a tear before."

"Y-Yes."

"So's Jessy."

"And I'd take her! B-But, she's busy, like I said."

Which sucked. He didn't get to see her as much as he used to, and when he did, she was angry. Angry about Amanda, angry about Garry, angry about Michael, even angry about Jack and the kid's refusal to go on a killing spree on some 'punk ass Carthians'.

"Talk with the Begotten yet?"

She shook her head. “No. That’s another reason why I came to you. You, um, you know them b-better than we do.”

“Ha, do I? Azamel offered me a job. I said no.”

“Better than us,” Art said. “We tried to kill one of her pack.”

Her pack? Uratha did think of pack as family; they essentially were. And Fiona was a part of Azamel’s strange, messed up little family. Eric had trouble thinking of anyone in that context though, except maybe Jessy.

“I don’t know how much help I’ll be with Azamel.”

“And you helped rescue Sándor! From that g-g-ghost place. And you w-went through a tear to do it.”

That was true, much as he hated to admit it.

“Guess I am kinda involved. I hate that.”

Matthew laughed, and everyone raised a brow as they looked at him. “I mean, come on. You’re dating Jessy. You really think you coulda said no to her best friend? She’ll kill you. Jessy, I mean.”

That, apparently, hadn’t crossed Tash’s mind, cause she looked back to Eric with a big beaming, mischievous smile. He’d seen that smile before. That was Jessy’s smile. Damn woman rubbed off on everyone.

---

Another trip into the tunnels. Dust, dirt, concave walls of concrete, flickering old lights, ancient railroad tracks, a bygone era of technology abandoned for taxis. Fuck taxis.

He wasn’t exactly sure why Dolareido stopped using the subway; it was before his time. Maybe the way it was built just didn’t match up with the way the city evolved. Maybe the vamps wanted to keep the tunnels empty for new vamps to live in. Probably a mix of both.

He sighed, taking a sniff. Both Art and Matt did too.

“Smell something strange,” Art said. “That blood? Smells like ... you?”

“Yeah. Athalia and I got into a tussle down here. She helped me snap out of my...”

“Kuruth.” Art said.

Eric nodded. Somehow, the gray matter in his brain understood the word, and it sent a chill down his spine. He’d never shared the word with Jessy, but it was the reason he hesitated when she wanted him to transform for sex.

“You know the B-Begotten more than I thought,” Tash said.

“I guess.”

“Kuruth,” Matt said. “It ... it’s strange.”

“How’s that?” Eric asked.

The man crouched over the tracks where Eric had fought Athalia so long ago. “You’ve felt the berserk rage in you ... once.”

“Twice. I fought Caleb and—”

Matt shook his head. “Caleb told us what happened. That wasn’t Kuruth. That was ... Kuruth-lite.”

Art choked on a laugh. “What he means, is when you’re in Gauru form, you can’t not attack something. You have to fight. Not attacking while in Gauru is like holding your breath. You can’t do it forever.” Most definitely not Eric’s experience. “And if you completely lose control, you kill something. Doesn't matter what, doesn't matter who, something has to die. That's Kuruth. The urge to hunt consumes you. All you can smell is blood. All you can see is blood. It grabs hold of you, and ... well, you know what you did to Pitt."

Yeah, he knew. That's what it'd been like the first night he transformed. When he got into a fight with Caleb and then Michael, he'd lost control again, but it hadn't been anywhere near as bad as that first night. He'd still been in a little control, and had felt other feelings than just blood lust.

"I get those feelings," he said, "when in Gauru, but never ... never that bad, never something I can't control. I mean, yeah there's an animal drive when I'm with Jessy, but I've never wanted to attack her, when transformed."

The two men nodded.

"Last week," Art added, "Tash had us test our control. It went well. It went too well."

"Too well?"

"Yeah. It felt strange, you know? Normally if we go Gauru, we get consumed with a need for violence. What I expected to happen, was Matt and I would basically have to hold our breath, suppress the urge to fight until we couldn't anymore, and go to a different form so we wouldn't. But it didn't happen."

Matt stood up, nodding. "Something ... something in Dolareido, maybe? Something told me to stop trying to suppress the urge, and instead, just ... breathe through it."

"Not like we haven't breathed when in Gauru form before," Art said, "but here, in this city, each breath was ... unusually calming, I guess?” He shrugged and gestured to Eric. “I’m guessing this has something to do with you.”

“Uh, not with me. But I know what you mean, yeah. Avery said I have Cahalith dreams, and ... I mean, I know my dreams have been visited by Sándor. Fucker got into them and really screwed me up.”

Art nodded. “But...”

“But, before him, something else has been in my dreams. Something ... grand, I guess. Something that really wanted to give me the impression she was the moon.” And of course, his brain auto used ‘she’, cause something in him insisted ‘it’ very much thought of itself as ‘she’. “I dunno. Just, every so often, she gets into my dreams. Not much lately, and not to say anything important when she does. But back then, she ... she thought it was imperative, I guess, that I learn to breathe through the rage. Like ... like she wanted me to get to somewhere on the other side of a river I had to swim through, or something.”

The two boys looked at each other, before smiling back at him.

“Cahalith,” they said. In unison.

“Yeah, I know, I just said that’s what I am.”

“And Clara and Avery,” Art said. “But they haven’t said anything about any sort of presence visiting them.”

“But...”

“But,” Matt said, “sometimes they do have strange dreams. Visions and stuff.”

“Ugh. I’d prefer to just be left alone. Let me do my thing. I wanna hunt some nasty spirits? Let me hunt some nasty spirits. I don’t want some moon presence visiting my head.” He didn’t feel comfortable talking about himself this much, not with these people anyway. With Jessy, sure. But Jessy trusted Tash, and Tash trusted Matt and Art. “Can’t a guy just be left alone?”

All three of them shook their heads, and he sighed.

“Come on, we’re almost there,” Tash said, and she offered him a sympathetic smile.

She wasn’t wrong. Another twenty minutes of casual walking, and they came to the large room Azamel called hers. A concrete stage covered in furniture, with plenty of open space around it, including a railway that cut through the room along the stage; probably for carts, not actual trains.

But no Azamel. Her chair was there, and the smell of cigarette ashes was powerful, but no old woman. Mark was there, and Athalia. Sadly, no Fiona. The redhead was fun, and a hundred times easier to talk to than anyone else in her family.

“H-Hi,” Natasha said. “Um, we came to talk. B-But, where’s Azamel, or Sándor?”

Athalia, sitting in a chair on the stage with a book in her hand, shook her head, but didn’t look up from its pages. “Azamel’s in her lair, resting. And before you ask, no, she doesn’t have much time left. She’s surprised she’s lasted this long.”

“Old people can be stubborn,” Eric said. “I should know.”

Natasha looked at him, confused, but everyone else knew what he meant. Even Athalia, who’d probably had the most fucked up life of any of them, smiled. She didn’t like the vampires, or Avery’s pack, but she didn’t seem to mind him. Maybe even liked him, if the woman was capable of it.

“You’re still welcome to join us,” Athalia said. “We can’t pay you, but your old man is feeling better, isn’t he? I bet you have plenty of money saved up for him.”

“Yeah.”

“Then you can ditch the vamps and sleep in our lairs. You won’t need your gilded cage anymore.”

That was a tempting offer, a lot more than it had been, with the vamps pushing on each other hard enough to break something. Now that he had money and his dad wasn’t sitting in a hospital costing him an arm and a leg, Eric could be free of the Invictus chain around his neck, and just do his own thing.

Except, he knew that was ignoring the future. It’d only be a matter of time before the vampires got him involved in the war, one way or another.

But, he trusted Jessy. And hell, he trusted Jack to do something about the war before it ruined everything. Maybe he wouldn’t have to get his hands bloody with vampire ashes?

“I’ll pass.”

Athalia smirked. “Knew you would. Sucking at vamp tits really that good?”

It was tempting to make a crass comment about Jessy’s tits, but he just shrugged and shook his head. “They haven’t done wrong by me yet.”

“Yeah, well, just wait until Michael shows up at your door and demands your help.”

“That’ll be hard if your dad ends up in the hospital again, under mysterious circumstances.”

“Jessy wouldn’t let that happen, and neither would Avery.”

“Last I checked, you’re not in Avery’s pack. She won’t go to bat for you. She—”

“P-Please,” Tash said, stepping forward and putting up her hands. “Jack will do something about the war. This isn’t about that. This is about the ... mysterious threat.” She air quoted the last bit. “It was the B-Begotten who first told us about it. We’re here because we want your help.”

“Want?” Athalia said. “Sounds to me like you need our help.”

That earned a growl from Arturo. He took a step forward, and Eric didn’t have to look to know the man had shifted his weight onto the balls of his boots.

“Uh, no, want. You’re not the only things around that can jump between realms. Matt and I can handle whatever we—”

Natasha looked back at the man, and Art shut up immediately. Damn. If Jessy were here, she’d probably make a comment about the man being whipped. Well, not comment, she’d just make the whip crack sound.

“I d-don’t like to do things unprepared. After seeing blood wraiths scouting the tear, it’s obvious that something strange is going on. I’m n-not going to risk making a mistake when we don’t have to.” Nodding, she managed a small smile. “Or at least mitigate.”

“So, what, you want our help investigating the tear?”

“Yes please.”

Eric almost laughed. Natasha had grown bolder since he'd known her, but she was still a cute, tiny, soft, and quiet thing, and hearing her soft voice make some very heavy requests was funny. She wasn't asking for help moving a couch. She was asking for a Begotten to risk their lives.

Athalia groaned and shook her head. "I—"

"I'll go."

Everyone looked to the opposite tunnel as the sound of footsteps rang. A few seconds later, Sándor joined them, face its typical neutral. Eric didn't know the man very well, but the fact the guy was reserved, quiet, and stereotypically stoic told Eric enough. Sándor was not the sort of man you wanted to fuck with. What was that line? Beware the fury of a patient man?

"Sándor," Athalia said as she got up and hopped down off the stage. "You don't have to. Azamel dumped this problem on their laps for a reason."

"Azamel will be dead soon."

"And—"

"And I am not Azamel." The man slowly shook his head as he stepped up beside Athalia, touched her on the shoulder once, and smiled. A tiny smile, like it was something he struggled to do. She frowned, looking away, and Sándor's smile faded, before he walked past her. He spared a glance for Mark too, but Mark — the damn man smelled like rot and death — shrugged, indifferent.

"You'll help us?" Tash asked.

"Yes."

"Um, n-not to look a gift horse in the mouth, but ... why?"

“Because there’s something here worth defending.”

“Here?”

“Dolareido.” He nodded toward Eric. “The Uratha must have felt it by now. There’s ... something going on, in this city, something more than just these tears. Something ... good.”

Maybe he was talking about Luna. Maybe it was something else. Whatever it was, the man wasn’t wrong, but it was a damn hard thing to notice when vampires were triggering wars around them, and everyone was convinced the tears popping up around the city were sinister in nature.

The three werewolves nodded, earning a confused glance from Natasha.

“I d-don’t know about that,” she said. “But ... b-but if there is something happening, I suppose vampires probably wouldn’t notice, would they?”

The werewolves shrugged, but Sándor managed a small nod.

“Probably not. Except, maybe, the Circle.”

Natasha looked down and squirmed. Talk of the Circle always made vamps nervous, even more than talking about the Ordo Dracul. Much as vampires thought the dragons were creepy in a Frankenstein kinda way, weird scientists doing crazy shit, it was the Circle of the Crone that seemed to really make vamps anxious. Witches, warlocks, blood magic, insane stuff any normal vamp avoided.

Maybe Eric should take a trip to visit them? Talk to Triss or something, and see if they knew anything about the weird entity that sometimes talked to Eric in his dreams.

“W-When would you be ready, to um, come help?”

“Now.”

---

~~Natasha~~

She knew Sándor could take them into his lair, and then take them into the Shadow Realm through one of his tunnels, but they decided to let the werewolves take them. Matt and Art insisted. The Shadow Realm was their territory, and they didn't have any delusions about the boldness of that claim.

As much as the werewolves were unique for their strange ability to hop between the physical and spirit realm, the nightmare monsters could go anywhere. Absolutely anywhere! She shivered as cold memories ran through her mind, of the strange things she had seen whenever the Begotten or Black Blood were involved. Sure, she'd seen some strange things when she dealt with the Uratha, but it was whenever the monsters or that crazy spirit were involved that things got bizarre, and terrifying. Cosmically terrifying.

Sometimes, she wished she could go back to when she thought the only things out there were vampires, and maybe some other paranormal creatures like werewolves. Even spirits and ghosts weren't all that weird, compared to Black Blood — Jack insisted it wasn't a true spirit — and the other things she'd seen in the ... the ... cracks of the universe, or however one could think of it. No more of that, please k thanks bye.

They walked Devil's Corner. No need for Cloak of Night to keep them hidden, they weren't doing anything any vampires would care about. And they wouldn't be bothered by people on the street, not with four fit guys walking with Tash. Of course, sometimes she kinda liked it when kine tried to push her around, so she could push them back; a guilty pleasure for any vampire.

“Natasha.”

Natasha almost jumped. Sándor’s voice. He’d come closer to her as they walked, and had started walking beside her without her noticing. Sure, she’d been lost in thought, like usual, but the man could be damn sneaky when he wanted to be, evidently.

“Y-Yes?” She scanned around, doing a quick check for the boys. Matt and Art followed behind, eyes on Sándor, and Eric led ahead.

“I wanted to talk about Beatrice.”

“Oh. Um ... I’m n-not sure what I can tell you. Triss and I don’t talk a lot.”

“No, but you knew Julias well.”

“Oh ... oh.” She rubbed an arm as she looked down. This was going to be a painful conversation, for the both of them. “Sure you d ... d-don’t want to ask her about him?”

“I did.”

Of course he did. The man’s attitude could break down a concrete wall if he put some force behind it.

“Then I’m not sure w-what I could say.”

“I’m worried about Beatrice.”

“We ... we all are. We know she’s d-doing something, something witchy, and ... yeah.” No one talked about it, but they all knew she was probably trying to resurrect Julias. Everyone conveniently pretended to not know that.

“I know what she’s doing.”

“You d-do?”

“Yes, but it’s private. That’s not what I want to talk about.”

Ok, apparently Sándor knew more about this than she did.

“Then I’m not sure w-what I can tell you.”

“You knew Julias well.”

“I did.”

“Better than Beatrice.”

“I ... d-don’t know about that. I never dated Julias.”

“But you were friends for decades. You worked together.”

She nodded. “Yeah.”

“Tell me about him, if you can.” Sándor looked down to her, and met her eyes for a few seconds. Such a solid, heavy gaze. He knew he was asking her to talk about a dead friend, someone she’d known for many years. Someone he’d killed.

She took a deep, useless breath, and began.

“Julias was ... an enigma. He w-wasn’t anything like Viktor.” Though now that she thought about it, Jack wasn’t anything like Julias either. And Viktor wasn’t anything like Elaine.

“Triss told me he was ... emo.”

Natasha choked on a laugh, and smiled up at the man. “Kinda, y-yeah. Did she tell you a lot about him?”

“Not a lot, but some. But I ... felt I should get a different perspective, if I’m going to make a decision.”

“D-Decision?”

He shook his head. “It’s personal. I hope that isn’t a problem.”

“No, I guess n-not.” At this point, she trusted Sándor, at least a little. And if the man was getting involved with Triss, it was probably to help her. She knew he’d lost his family to the hunters, so if anyone could understand Triss’s pain, it was Sándor. “Julias was smooth. Suave. He could have the whole room kinda ... w-watching him, like he was a celebrity. I knew he d-didn’t really like that. Or rather, he didn’t like that he liked it.”

A pause indicated she was offering Sándor a spot to jump in with comment. He didn’t. Listening did seem to be his superpower.

“He ... was sad, about becoming a vampire. He was sad he t-took to it so well, too. As he got older, he started t-to envy kine, just as his hate for vampires grew.” She expected Sándor to chime in with that, but he didn’t. He did glance at her, though, eyebrow raised. “He d ... d-didn’t want to be part of the Danse Macabre, but he was really good at it. So he kept getting deeper into it, and ... eventually replaced his sire on the council. He didn’t want to, but he knew he could do the best good for D-Dolareido there.

“As for him and Beatrice, she was uh ... sorta his opposite. Nosferatu either get super sad, or super angry, b-because of their deformities. She got super angry. She and Julias, when they finally spoke to each other, they kinda ... got along, you know? In a way m-most people don’t. He really helped her learn how to ... to think about things. How to not be angry all the time. And she helped bring a sp-p-park back into his life.” That sounded horribly cheesy, and stupidly poetic. Beatrice would hate it. Julias would li ... would have liked it. “He was the sad, lonely billionaire. She was the firecracker p-punk that taught him to smile again.”

Sándor laughed. Good, cause she was going for a joke. It was a short laugh though, two seconds at most, but his hard face kept a subtle smile for a few seconds more.

“And then Angela killed him,” he said. The smile stayed, but it was a sad smile, the sort someone wore when they were empathizing with someone, with a pain they knew all too well. But at least he didn’t say ‘and then I killed him’. That would have been very ... well, a very Julias thing to say. And from what little she knew of Sándor, it was something he would have said, months ago.

Time changed everyone, she supposed. So did Dolareido, evidently.

“He ... t-t-taught her that she didn’t have to hate everyone, or herself. But now he’s gone.” Tash glanced back at her boys, shivered, and looked back to Sándor. “If it wasn’t for Jennifer, she’d p-probably be right back to hating everyone and everything. And if it wasn’t for J-J-Jacob, she’d...”

“Not be pursuing the dark arts.”

The dark arts. To everyone else, it was magic, or blood magic, or witchy witch stuff. Sándor really was very, very old.

“I’m really n-not the best to talk to about this. Julias t-talked to me and Jessy about his relationship, but not a lot. He p-probably talked to Jack more.”

“Jack.” Sándor sighed softly, noise lost to the quiet, menacing nightlife of Devil’s Corner. “The two people I should talk to about this, are the last two people I want to talk to.”

“Are you worried about Triss? I mean, on a ... p-personal level?”

“ ... yes.”

Why the hesitation? His face went back to its usual stone cold visage, but for a second, there’d been something close to concern.

“D-Don’t you have enough on your plate, with your new Begotten friends?”

“I suppose.”

“But, if it’s Triss you’re worried about, and the sort of stuff she’s up to, b-because of Jacob, then you might want to talk to the Prince, or even Elaine. They know Jacob better than any of us.”

“That is a good idea. Thank you.”

They walked in silence for a little while after that. Sándor obviously had something in mind, something that involved Triss. For a second, she thought maybe he wanted to sleep with her, considering Jennifer had dragged him around with them during the last ball, and both women had been dressed to kill that night. But if that were true, he wouldn’t need to do anything other than let her drag him back to her den. Not true, then. Maybe Sándor wanted to be Triss’s friend?

That would be difficult. It was obvious that Sándor preferred to perch on the sidelines, like a quiet gargoyle, and not get directly involved. But he was getting involved anyway. Compelled by circumstance, maybe? Either way, he’d have more trouble making friends than even Natasha did, let alone with someone as damaged as Beatrice. But, then again, stories had been circulating about how comfy the Circle were with each other. Maybe Beatrice had become easier to talk with.

Her mind shifted back onto task. Natasha looked around at the people smoking on the sidewalks and street corners, at the convenience stores with bars on the windows, at the cars with peeled paint and dented bumpers, and at the prostitutes with crows feet making zero attempt to disguise what they were up to. This was the place Eric wanted to fix, and she couldn’t blame him.

She smiled at the man's back as he scanned the streets, same as her. To Kindred, kine should be left to their own devices, and Kindred would blend in, wolves among sheep. The Invictus got a little more involved, and tried to rule with money. The Lancea et Sanctum got a little more involved, and tried to rule with religion dogma. The Carthians got a little more involved, and tried to sew anarchy, and other 'fight the machine' philosophies they were devoted to, no matter how shortsighted. None of them were like Eric, a man who had no views, no agenda, nothing. He just wanted to give a little back to the world he grew up in.

That was how Natasha knew he'd help. The vampires were all selfish, paranoid things. The nightmare monsters had their own world, and the werewolf pack had a creed they followed. Eric, on the other hand, was a Dolareido man through and through, and he really just wanted to help. That talk about Jessy being her friend, and Eric having to help her because of it, was just pretense. He'd have helped regardless.

It was almost, as Antoinette would say, drôle. With anyone else, she'd have to find a way to manipulate them, make a deal, convince them, all that nonsense she knew she was just as reliant on. If someone showed up at her door and told her people might die if she didn't help, she knew it wouldn't be her first reaction to leap to her feet and lend a hand. The Beast in her told her to be more cautious, to worry about herself first. The werewolves weren't like that, especially Eric.

She stepped up beside him. "How're you d-doing?"

"We're about to take a trip into a dangerous world, to investigate something we've all been stumbling around blind about for how many months now? Years? I'm pretty nervous."

She raised a brow. He didn't look nervous.

“You’ve b-been ... sneaking into the Hisil for a while now, haven’t you?”

“You could say that.”

“Killed Needle Swords yet?”

He looked down at her, frowning. She’d hit a nerve.

“No.”

“Oh. Um, m-maybe we can ... can help?”

“Avery’s made it clear that—” He stopped as he noticed her smiling.

“Matt and Art are ... m-my uh, slaves? Um, no, that’s too harsh. Indentured assistants, until the tears issue is resolved.” She tapped her fingertips together, very evil like. “If you help me, I’m n-not against helping you.”

“That,” he said, “is pretty damn manipulative of you.”

“True.” It was a very vampire way of doing things. A very Antoinette way of doing things. In truth, she couldn’t force the boys to do something that didn’t strictly deal with the tears. But they already wanted to kill Needle Swords, and this would be an excuse for Matt and Art to do it. Using them as ‘slaves’ to deal with Needle Swords was pretense. Pretense pretense always with the pretense.

“I was gonna help you anyway, though.”

“I know, b-but ... but I’d prefer we trade. Call it a Kindred reflex,” she said. He laughed, and it was her turn to raise a brow. “W-What’s so funny?”

“Oh?”

“Spirits only deal in trades, too.”

~~Jack~~

Mulder and Scully sat on a curtain rod, cawed a few times, and fell silent as Jack sat with his girlfriend.

For the first time, ever, Jack told Antoinette about what the Invictus were up to. He left out key details, like Michael’s plan to eventually attack Terra Den, but he told her about the Tanvar building, Michael’s goals for the curse, everything Garry said, Xnomina, and Amanda’s death.

“You think McDonald has killed Amanda?” Antoinette said, gesturing at the air in front of them. They both sat on a couch deep in his mansion in one of the random rooms, a room of red curtains and red furniture. Luxurious, and pointless.

“Yeah. Or, I dunno, staked her and locked her up somewhere.” He groaned and shook his head. “Fat chance. I’m sure Michael would kill one of his own if it meant getting to have his war. And it’s working. Gloria’s majorly fucked up, and a lot of Kindred are already getting ready for a proper war. People liked Amanda.” Like him.

“There is always the chance he is not lying.”

“Yeah, maybe, but I saw the look in his eyes, you know? He was ... cold.” The memory sent lava through his veins. “Wanted to fucking kill him right there.”

“My dear, when is the last time you fed?”

“I don’t know. I’ve been—”

“Summon Veronica, would you? Feed, and then speak.” If he didn’t know any better, he’d think she was suggesting he eat a banana cause his blood sugar was low.

Sighing, he pulled out his phone and sent a summons Veronica’s way. A ‘summons’, not a text or call, cause apparently there was an app for that. A knock came at the door a minute later.

“Come in, dear,” Antoinette said.

Veronica stepped in, and bowed to Antoinette and Jack. “My Prince. Master.”

“Sit.” Antoinette slid aside, and motioned for her to sit between them.

Oh poor Veronica. Jack almost laughed as he watched the girl squirm as she approached. Jack was in a suit, as was Antoinette, while Veronica wore a simple maid’s uniform, a button shirt and skirt with the black and white patterns of the Victorian maid outfits. A gift from Antoinette. The button shirt had a lot more cleavage than strictly necessary, and Jack knew it was a combination of the shirt’s design, but also Veronica actively putting her cleavage on display. She wanted Jack to notice.

Of course, the fact Antoinette was there, made Veronica nervous enough to rub her hands together and avoid eye contact with her. Veronica loved to try and grab his eye, and Antoinette knew it, and she knew Antoinette knew it, and so on. Naturally, Veronica was terrified of the five hundred-year-old vampire, but Antoinette thought the girl and her futile attempts to seduce him were charming and delightful. The woman didn’t have a jealous bone in her body, not when it came to sex.

Jack opened his mouth to ask Veronica if it was ok to take a drink. He stopped himself. That wasn’t very master like. It also wasn’t what pleased his thrall. She was happier if he took from her, imposed upon her, held her down and gave her no other option. She was happier when he got possessive, and treated her like she belonged to him.

And he kinda liked doing that.

Once Veronica was comfy between them, he turned on the hilariously fancy couch, leaned in, and set his fangs to her throat. He couldn't see much, face turned toward the couch and buried in her neck, but Veronica's noises announced she was overjoyed at the sudden Kiss.

"My dear," Antoinette said. "May I suggest pulling on the thrall's hair?"

He raised a brow, but did as suggested. Between quiet sucking sounds, his closer arm reached up, netted fingers into Veronica's blue hair, grabbed a large handful, and gently tilted her head back to expose more of her neck. The reaction was immediate, and Veronica moaned openly as she quivered.

Whenever he got rough with Veronica, she loved it. He could smell the arousal on her. At first it made him a little uncomfortable, but every time he did something like grab her hair, choke her, spank her, the results were immediate and impressive. Yeah, he could get used to this.

But, now was not the time for sex. He finished taking of her, and he took deep. Veronica mewled and whimpered all the way down into a post-Kiss coma.

"Feel better, my love?"

He broke away from Veronica, and she slumped against his shoulder, out like a light. Her blood pulsed through him, and he smiled down at her before looking up to Antoinette.

“It’s easy to forget I have a thrall now. That I can just ... order her to come, and I can drink. No hunting involved, no borrowing from you. Nothing.”

“The joys of being a powerful vampire.”

“The curse’s power.” He winced, stood up, set the unconscious Veronica down on a couch chair, and held out a hand to Antoinette. She took it.

“Perhaps. If ... when the curse’s power is gone, you will rise to natural power quite quickly, Jack, be rest assured.” Standing, she leaned down, kissed him, and the two set out for the lobby.

Would he? How much of his power was because of Julias’s blood, versus the curse itself, versus his own natural talent? He managed a slow nod, and Mulder and Scully flew down to his shoulders as they stepped out into the lobby, with its grand door and grander stairway.

“Your birds,” she said, “you are content with them?”

“What do you mean?”

“While done rarely in Dolareido, raising pets as undead is often a process not unlike grooming a potential childe. But your two crows are visibly damaged, and forever will be.”

He shrugged and shook his head. “Doesn’t matter. They’re my friends, and I wasn’t going to let them die.” She smiled down at him, and kissed him again. A proper, long kiss, and he blinked at her semi-closed eyes as she indulged. “Uh...”

“Many older Kindred would abandon these two, and find crows undamaged to become their undead familiars.” Ah, she was happy he was showing compassion.

“I guess.”

Familiars. The word made him smile. If Julias were still alive, he'd probably make a joke, like 'yer a wizard, Harry' or something.

"These two may draw attention from kine."

"I thought about that. But, they don't look too bad, right?" He nudged his head toward Mulder. "His neck looks a little crooked, that's all. No one'll be able to tell there's something wrong unless they touch him." He nudged Scully next. "And Scully's wing looks broken, but lots of birds have broken wings and stuff." He'd already taken a stab at fixing it so it looked more natural, and it did, with no more point sticking straight out of it. But it was still definitely broken, like Mulder's neck. Anyone who touched them, or watched them for a minute, would quickly figure that out.

"I do not disagree, but be wary. If they violate the Masquerade, it will be on your head, my love."

He gulped. That wasn't a warning from his girlfriend, that was a threat from the Prince.

"Understood."

"And while I am glad you have told me what you have, it may be ... prudent, that you do not tell me more. Our relationship puts a strain on your position with the Invictus as is. If McDonald discovers you shared delicate information with me, the consequences would again, be on your head."

"I haven't told you anything you can't figure out on your own."

"That is a dangerous game to play."

"I know."

"But, you are also correct. I have eyes and ears everywhere. I know, for example, that Tilly escaped the Tanvar building, only to be re-acquired? I suspect whoever caught her the second time disguised the act with Obfuscate, but she left the building a second time, and that, the eyes and ears I have within my city, did witness.”

God damn. She really did have eyes and ears everywhere.

“I ... let her go. I got a phone call from Damien, telling me about Amanda, but then Ryan brought in Tilly, and I let her go.”

“Why?”

“Because if there’s going to be any peace in this damn city, someone has to make an act of good faith, right?” Even if it backfired and got people killed, it was better than just letting everything build in the pressure cooker until it exploded.

“Master.” Mulder said. “Master. Nice.”

“Smart.” Scully said, nodding.

Jack smiled at his two friends. “I uh, didn’t expect Mulder and Scully to get smarter, when I brought them back.”

“A gift from your blood. They may now serve you as proper agents, instead of animals drawn by instinct and only the barest wisps of intellect.”

“As long as I keep feeding them my blood.”

“Indeed. It has been ages since I have owned undead familiars.”

“You had your own?”

“Oui. Cats.”

A vampire lady with immortal cats. Too funny. He laughed, and she smiled.

“Though it may interest you to know Elaine has a great experience with familiars. When I first met her, ages past, wolves followed her.”

“She mentioned that. I figured she meant living wolves.”

“She did. But several were undead, risen by her hand, and they served her faithfully.”

“Did ... something happen to them?”

Antoinette sighed, and opened the front door. “The details are lost to me. The details will likely be lost to her as well, but it would do you well to talk to her of them nonetheless. If only so she may teach you what it is like to own familiars.”

He joined her at the door, and they shared another kiss, before she slipped into the car waiting for her. Leaving him alone in his mansion, with a real shitty to-do list to burn through.

His phone rang, and he answered it. “Damien.”

“Jack, I wanted to talk with you.”

“For the love of god, please tell me nothing else has happened.”

“No. I wanted to speak with you about Elaine.”

“You mean what Auspex showed you? Dude, I have no doubt Elaine paid Isabella a visit, and put the idea in her head to kill Michael if the opportunity presented itself.”

“And you still trust her?”

“Kinda, yeah?” It was hard to gauge Elaine, with everything that’d happened. “I was just going to talk with her now, actually, about familiars.”

“I don’t trust her.”

“Good. If we all trusted her, that’d probably be a bad thing.” It also meant the one-on-one conversation he was about to have with her would, as always, be that strange balance of ‘trust her don’t trust her’ that drove him up the fucking wall.

Why couldn’t people just get along?

Chapter 143

~~Jack~~

“So you let Tilly go?” Elaine asked, chuckling as she stepped in past the door.

They were in his mansion, and Mulder and Scully sat on his shoulders, eying the much, much older vampire. Idly, Jack noticed that neither of the birds crapped anymore. They’d always been smart enough to not do that in the mansion, but apparently it wouldn’t have mattered anyway.

“How do you know that?”

“Do you think I came to this city alone? I have eyes and ears everywhere.”

He eyed her. She laughed. There was some truth in her statement, sure, but a lot of lie, too. Maybe Antoinette told her. Maybe not. Elders be doing elder things.

“You’re probably wondering why I called you.”

She shrugged as she stepped past him, and slowly started up the stairs. “It’s been a week since your fight with Garry. I assume you want to talk about that fight, and the curse.”

He followed her up the stairs, eying her as she picked a seemingly random direction. This was the first time she’d been in his mansion without Antoinette, since the Prince was usually with her, especially when Jack was involved. But ever since the Avery incident over two months ago, Antoinette had been willing to take her eyes off him, even if Elaine was around. Kinda weird, considering how badly that incident had gone, but then again, no one had died. Plus, with Elaine's necklace, his Beast was quiet and the curse easily suppressed.

And, for some damn reason, Antoinette trusted Elaine, a lot, more than she should. And Jack trusted Antoinette.

"Yes and no. I also wanted to talk about Mulder and Scully."

"The crows?" She paused, glancing back at him, before she swung open a double door, and walked in.

"Yes, the cro—could you stop walking around randomly opening doors? This is my home, you know."

"This was my childe's home," she said, and he had to follow her into the room to hear her properly. "Your successes are his, and his are mine."

"Isn't that the exact opposite of how a parent child relationship is supposed to work? Kids inherit from their parents, not the other way around."

"Indeed, but it is how sire and childe relationships work. Or did you think Kindred embraced kine in some biological need to reproduce? Of course not. Kindred spread the disease of vampirism for many reasons, but above all, subconscious or not, they do it because childer are terribly useful tools."

He frowned, but it faded as Elaine walked around the large room. This one had a big window overlooking the backyard, its huge lawn and its statues. It was a long room, with several long tables side to side, running its length, and several unlit candles on the table in fancy candle holders. Equally fancy, ridiculous lighting fixtures lined the walls, decorated by gorgeous red curtains. The chairs and their red cushions looked uncomfortable, but beautiful nonetheless, complete with gold trim.

No way would Viktor have used this room for actual dining. Dude was a vampire. No, but he probably had kine in here, tied to the table, to be shared with other Kindred in a feast. So, dining, sorta. And considering the dude's tastes, those kine probably didn't always live.

Christ, it was easy to forget sometimes that a lot of people had probably died in this mansion, not just in the dungeon beneath it. Which sent a new kind of chill up Jack's spine. Sabrina, Viktor's ghoul, might pay him a visit some time, and if she was going to come at him from anywhere, here seemed a likely place.

"Which first then?" she asked. "Your pets or your engagement with the Gangrel?" Without so much as a glance his way, she sat down at the head of the table, and folded one leg over the other as she set her hands on her lap. If he didn't know better, he'd think he was looking at Antoinette, with the half playful half serious expression on her face.

"Mulder and Scully. And ... isn't their a better word than pets? I never really thought of them as pets." He sat down at the table corner next to her. For a second he was tempted to sit at the other end of the table, like that scene out of Tim Burton's Batman. But he was no Michael Keaton.

"Attendants or agents then. Or, as some vampires with a love for the classics prefer, familiars." She smiled, expression softening. Apparently she'd liked what he said about the word pets. "What would you like to know?"

"I know I have to feed them my vitae now, and their wounds at death are permanent." He vaguely gestured to his stomach, where the sealed stab wounds Rebecca had left him would forever remain. "That right?"

"Indeed."

“And they seem to sleep all day now, and are up all night. From dusk to dawn, to the dot, just like a vampire. That normal?”

“Mhmm.”

Mulder hopped down onto the table, flapped his wings a few times, and tilted his head to look up at Elaine, making his broken neck bend in a disturbing way. Scully hopped down beside him, but stayed by Jack’s hand, looking up at him instead.

“Jack.”

“Jack.”

“Mother?” Mulder said, and he gestured to Elaine with a forward head tilt, and a quiet wing flutter.

“She’s my great grandsire,” he said. He’d already told them this, but now that some intelligence had awoken inside his familiars, maybe it was time to reiterate some important facts. “Samantha is my mother. You remember Samantha, right?”

Both birds nodded. It was infinitely easier to communicate with them now, to share complex ideas, and even get their feedback on things. They were still birds, though. They thought like birds, and framed things like birds, but there was no question they were scary smart now. Familiars, yeah.

“Anything else I should know about them?”

“They are quite resilient, now that they are undead creatures. They are half vampires, in a way.”

“Sunlight—”

“Is of no danger to them. They are undead, and they are given fake life by the power of your vitae, but they are not vampires themselves. It is only the damned who must flee fire and sun.”

Oh what fun it was, having banes now. Fire and sunlight, two of the most damn common things on the planet, only beat by water and air.

“You ... had wolf familiars?” Time to take a trip down memory lane, hers, and hope he could dig up something useful.

Her eyes grew sharp, but she kept her hands on her lap as she juggled the question in her mind. “I did.”

“Wanna tell me about them?”

“No.”

“Because...?”

“Because losing them was painful. My life back then is a blur, but I can remember the touch of their fur, the strength of their bodies, the undying friendship. I can ... I can remember enough, to still feel pain when I think of them.”

That was a better response than he could have hoped for. He smiled at her, earning a raised brow from the elder, but her expression softened as he scratched the back of each of his familiars’ heads.

“That’s good.”

“Good?”

“Yeah. Means you got some humanity left in you.” And considering the warning Black Blood had given him about Elaine, he’d been worried she didn’t. The fuck did she do to get rid of her curse, if her sire had had to commit diablerie to get it? Bathe in the blood of a thousand innocents? Or maybe repeat the ritual, drain a vampire dry, supposedly devouring their very soul, and offer their ashes as a sign of ... what?

Doing the ritual a second time didn't seem likely, but that didn't mean she didn't have to do something equally as fucked up, to get rid of the curse.

“Did you believe I was a draugr?”

“No, but Viktor wasn't a draugr, and I bet my grandsire didn't have enough humanity to fill a thimble.”

“But your sire had plenty, enough that it slowed his—”

Jack put up a hand. No way was he going to let Elaine talk bad about Julias.

“I get it. Some traits are passed on from sire to childe, but a lot aren't.”

“Precisely. I know Viktor did not care for familiars, for example, or animals at all. Did my grandchilde?”

“Julias didn't do pets, or familiars.” Sure, he summoned rats every so often, and possessed them with Dominate, too, but he didn't really care for animals much. Jack, on the other hand, had always wanted a dog. His parents wouldn't let him, for the usual reasons.

“They will serve you well,” she said. “Better than you know. You may communicate with them from vast distances as well.”

“Wait, really?”

“Mhmm. Your connection to them no longer requires them to be near.”

“Holy shit.”

“I am surprised that you are surprised. Did my grandchilde not explain?”

“Julias didn’t exactly have decades to train me. And ... my second life got pretty damn busy pretty much the same night I was sired.”

“Ah yes, that is true. A kill on your very first night.”

He winced. “I try to not think about her.” Pavala.

“You are soft.”

“You think? Cause I look at a cold bitch like you, and sure, you’re hard, but I’m not impressed. Soft things can bend and get back up, unlike you. But if I hit you in the right spot, and you’d shatter.” For some reason, he just blurted out his thoughts, and his thoughts wanted to come out swinging.

If he offended her, she didn’t show it. Her smile grew, and she licked a fang.

“The Ventrue in you grows.”

“Yeah, I guess it does.”

“But you are soft, regardless. You remind me of Ann, convinced you can find peaceful solutions others have used force to solve for thousands of years.”

“If you think Antoinette is soft, too, then I’m happy to be soft.”

“I knew you would be. But if you did as I would do, Garry would be dead, and so would any Carthians that challenged you. You could have ended this war swiftly and minimized damage. The Invictus could expand without issue, and power would pour into your hands.”

Of course the conversation drifted in this direction. It surprised him, but it shouldn't have. She was his great grandsire, and had a right to give him a bit of that 'disappointed mother' attitude. No wonder Mulder and Scully said what they did.

"Dooming everything to a shitty cycle that people have been doing since they were smart enough to form hierarchies? No thanks. The Carthians would eventually reform, and a bunch of Invictus would probably defect to join them, if I turned into a tyrant and just forced my will on them."

She laughed, loudly at that, and both birds hopped away from the sudden burst of sound.

"You and Ann, my word. Romanticists."

"Thanks, I guess."

"How did your battle with Garry go, then? Is he as romantic as you?"

"He ... isn't. But he's not the soulless asshole Viktor or Tony or Lucas were. I don't want to kill him."

"Bold of you to assume you can."

Jack winced and looked down. Ventrue hubris was a pain in the ass.

"The battle got pretty fucking bad, but I barely used the Ripper at all, just for a minute. Didn't even let him out."

"Oh?"

"Yeah. For a second there, when Garry hurt my friends," he gestured down at his two familiars, "I lost it. Only one thing on my mind for that split second: make Garry suffer. That ... that overwhelming hate, you know? Like, not natural hate.”

“How do you know it was not natural?”

Of course she'd ask that, because she, like most elders, probably thought everyone was capable of extreme hate, down to the bones. And sure, Jack didn't necessarily disagree with her, but it wasn't nearly as common as she probably thought. If Maria and Athalia didn't hate Jack as much as everyone thought they should, then crazy, insane, inhuman hate and rage weren't the, as Antoinette would probably say, pervasive 'raison d'être', that Elaine thought they were.

“Because I was practically foaming at the mouth for a moment there. And for that moment, I had the power of the curse, the full power, the shit that ... thing, brings to the table. I mean, seeing Mulder and Scully get hurt like that”—he made sure to scratch the back of their heads lovingly—”brought anger out of me, and that was me, all me. But something else came with it, hate and excited rage that ... that was the curse, I know it. And the power that came with it, was his.”

Elaine raised a hand and tapped a finger to her chin in the same way Antoinette sometimes did. “Memories dance along the edges of my mind, my childe. I am sorry I cannot remember the details, but ... but I do remember the rage and hate, and the power that came with them. I remember how much it infected me, as well.”

“It was like that for me, when the curse was bound. When I freed it, all that fucked up shit manifested as its own personality.” He fiddled with his necklace. “I'm guessing there's an emotional connection. Hate and rage, that obscene fury and almost perverse ... joy, summoning that feeling from the curse was the same as summoning its power. Which is how the Ripper manages to use the power so freely, I guess.”

“Emotion. Yes, I suppose that makes sense. The Strix are fueled by such reckless, all-consuming hate.”

“That help with your research? I still want this curse gone.”

“It does help, yes. There are old ideas, fictions about vampires being possessed with pure rage.”

“But, not fiction?”

She nodded. “Perhaps not. There were rituals performed, superstitious things, absurdly archaic and unscientific, but something for me to start with.”

“Thanks.”

Her next smile was borderline sinister. “Is that the only reason you summoned me here?”

As expected, the damn woman saw through his words easily.

“No. I wanted to talk about Isabella.”

Elaine rolled her eyes and leaned back in the chair. It was a dining chair, couldn't lean back very far, but she managed.

“Must we?”

“Yeah, we must. I'm talking to you now as a Right Hand of the Invictus, not your great grandchilde, and this Right Hand isn't happy that you've been sowing dissent in our ranks.”

“Sewing dissent. Quite the word choice.”

“Yeah well, I'm in official mode.”

“What fun.”

“Spill it, Elaine. Why’re you fucking with the Invictus?”

Slowly, she unfolded her legs, leaned forward, and set her hands and elbows on the table as she smiled at him. “If all it takes is a gentle nudge to topple your empire, does it deserve to exist?”

“Oh god, is this some existential crap?” He sat back away from her, and Mulder and Scully hopped up onto his shoulders immediately. “You here to fuck with Doleirido because you’re an agent of chaos?”

“Hardly. I am not Jacob.”

Jack winced. Knowing Elaine thought of Jacob basically the same way Jack did was not a good thing.

“Seriously, why did you talk to Isabella?”

“Oh, many reasons. I dislike Michael. I like Isabella. The Gangrel is a barking mongrel liable to burn this city down with his obsessions. Isabella wants quiet. Isabella wants nothing more than to pursue her passion, and she knows the Invictus and Carthians are only barriers to that goal.” The elder shrugged. “I was planting a seed. It is how elders operate, after all, young Kindred. Plant seeds, sometimes tiny things, and wait for them to grow. And we can wait a long time, my childe.”

“You make it really hard to trust you, you know that?”

“Is that something you desired? To trust me?”

“Yes! Of course I want to trust you.”

“Learn to guard your back, Terry. You—”

“It’s not about that!” He almost slapped the table, but stopped himself at the last moment. Neither Scully nor Mulder so much as reacted to the sudden movement though, a nasty reminder they weren't really crows anymore. Half bird, half something else.

Elaine blinked at him, confused. "Is it not?"

"No, it's not. You and Antoinette might be comfortable half-suspecting even your good friends, but I'm not. Maybe it's cause I'm only a few years embraced, but fuck me, the idea of living centuries not being able to fully trust even my best friend? Damien and me, we trust each other with our lives. More than that, we trust each other with secrets, the personal kind. We trust each other with everything. The idea of ... of not being able to do that in a century? Just because life wears us down, breaks us, makes us paranoid? Fuck that."

During the rant, Elaine's eyes remained on his, still confused. It was like he was speaking another language.

"I admit, I struggle to think in those terms."

"Yeah, I get that. You're like, five centuries old? I can only imagine the amount of people who've tried to backstab you. Some you probably knew for a long fucking time. But it doesn't have to be that way. Antoinette doesn't think so, and I don't think so."

"You two. At a glance, you do not fit at all. But the more I hear you talk, the more I believe your relationship will survive for a long, long time."

"Thanks."

"But not for eternity."

He rolled his eyes. It was true, of course. If him and Antoinette were still alive in a hundred thousand years, would they still be together? Probably not. But he'd cherish every moment they were.

“And when we’re not together? Will you stab me in the back then?”

She tapped her chin, thinking about it. She thought hard, too. It wasn’t a hard question, Jack thought. She’d either say no because she liked him, or she’d say no because she’d lie in hopes of him lowering his guard for the potential opportunity to betray him. But her sitting there, thinking about it, was strange, like she wanted him to know that he couldn’t trust her. If that was true, why would she want him to know, unless he really could trust her?

This statement is false. The liar paradox. But that was the way of people, kine or Kindred or whatever, walking talking jumbles of double speak, capable of thinking one way but feeling another.

“I do not know, my childe. But I suggest you learn to balance trust with distrust, if you wish to survive the years. There is only one way you could ever truly trust someone wholly and completely.”

“And that would be?”

“The Vinculum. Though, even that and the obsession it brings can backfire.”

He shuddered. “Julias once told me about vampires who drink each other’s blood, creating a Vinculum pairing.”

“Do you think ill of the Vinculum? It binds your two crows to you, now that they are your familiars.”

That was true, he supposed. Mulder and Scully no longer flew out to the city, to explore and socialize with other crows; he didn’t know if they even could anymore, considering how much they’d changed mentally. They were his slaves now, undead slaves. At least with Veronica, there was the possibility — and his intended plan — that she become a ghoul, and then someday her own vampire. Dying during the embrace would free of her of the Vinculum, and from then on she'd be his childe, not his slave. He had no intention of siring her any time soon, but it was the plan. With the crows, they—

Mulder and Scully, on his shoulders, nuzzled into the side of his head and crooned.

“Jack. Nice. Protects,” Mulder said.

“Jack. Master. Good master,” Scully said.

Elaine smiled at him, and made a subtle gesture toward the two birds. “Ah, the tragedy of our second lives comes in many forms.”

“I suppose it does.” He scratched their heads again before looking at his great grandsire. “You're never gonna be straight with me, are you? About your intentions I mean. You're gonna leave me with half truths, and I'm gonna spend the rest of eternity not quite able to trust you.”

“Of course. I would have it no other way.” She tapped her chin again. “But, I think it is safe to say that the dilemma you have, the curse, this Ripper character, is not what I had envisioned when I decided to come to Dolareido. When I recall what I can centuries ago, I remember power, and hate, and rage. I remember unleashing it upon kine who did not deserve it. I remember ... rivers of blood.”

“I told you, it—”

She waved a hand again. “I remember guilt. I remember the power that rushed me with the hate, rage, and strange elation of indulging such reckless abandon. But I also remember guilt, and how it ate at me, as surely as the curse ate at me, biting and clawing and destroying who I was, dragging me down ever closer to becoming draugr. And perhaps, if it had ever succeeded, I too would have manifested a personality, the same as you. Perhaps it would have eaten who I am, devoured me, leaving only the personality that you are forced to share your body with.”

That was a fucking terrifying thought. The curse, eating him up, driving him to the point of becoming a draugr, and then the curse taking over with its own manifested personality. Jack becoming Jack the Ripper permanently. Eesh.

“And you have absolutely no idea how you got rid of it.”

Her grin could have cut glass. “No. Only that it was difficult.”

Yeah he didn't believe that for a second. And she knew he didn't believe her. Hell, she seemed happy that he didn't believe her. If she was trying to be his teacher, to help build him up into a proper vampire capable of taking care of themselves by hardening him, exposing him to the nasty side of vampires in a way only someone close to him could, she was succeeding. He didn't like that.

He almost told her, about what Black Blood said. He almost told her because it ached at him so fucking bad that he couldn't trust her completely, and the naive part of him was willing to risk it, just to get the secret out of his throat. That naive, hopeful part of him was dying. The only thing keeping it alive, was Antoinette.

“Slept with her yet?” he asked.

Elaine blinked. “Mmm?”

“Isabella.”

After a few seconds of stunned silence, Elaine laughed, hard enough her long, wavy blond hair gently bounced on her suit's shoulders.

“Come now Jack. Must you be so crass? Besides, when I am not spending my nights wrapped around you,” she grinned at him all the more, “I am quite busy with my own affairs.”

“Those affairs include Isabella.”

“That does not mean I slept with her. Though when you reach my age, little Ventrue, you will come to realize how little that means.”

He had a hard time imagining a future where he didn't think of sex as a big deal. But, then again, considering Antoinette and her kinks, it probably wouldn't be long before he thought of sex as nothing more than a stress relief tool ... or a tool of manipulation. He wasn't sure if he liked that, either.

“Are we done here?” she asked. “If I had known you invited me here to interrogate me, I am not sure I would have come.”

“If I'd known you'd be messing in Dolareido's affairs, I—”

“Messing in its affairs? Do not be so cruel! Dolareido is my friend's personal project, and I dare not dream of making life for her more difficult than it has to be.” Her words dripped of sarcasm. Apparently, messing with other dragons' projects was something dragons did? Or maybe, it was just that Elaine and Antoinette had that sort of relationship where they felt comfortable challenging each other, and screwing with each other.

He'd known friends like that, usually dudes, who were just as likely to help each other as sabotage each other's efforts, usually as a playful joke. Camaraderie, but not the kind he'd ever pictured for himself. When he was human, he hadn't had a real good friend since he was super young, but even then, their friendship had been different from the other boys, because they didn't tease each other when they played games and whatnot. Jack just didn't like that sort of friendship, at least not then. Now, he could imagine teasing Damien about a few things, sure, but actually giving the man trouble as a sort of game?

Maybe he'd feel different in five hundred years. He doubted it.

“You dragons are unpredictable as all hell, you know that?”

“But of course.” With a wink, she stood up, and stepped around the table’s corner to stand in front of him. Before he could say anything, she took the shoulder of his chair and pulled it aside, pulling him out from under the table, and pointing him toward her. As much as Mulder and Scully were his devoted familiars, they both hopped off and onto the table, out of the way of the five-hundred-year-old vampire that was their master’s ancestor, as she sat sideways on his lap.

“Elaine, what’re you—”

“You may not understand me, Jack, but I have helped you, have I not?” She traced a finger along his neck. Sparks sizzled through him, and he turned his head to look away. Not good not good. “This necklace is a gift from me, to help you control the curse.” She plucked at it a couple times, until he swatted her hand away.

“It also suppresses my Beast. Weakens me.”

“True, but I wore it, long ago, so my journals tell me. It is safe.” She teased her finger along his jugular before she plucked at the top button of his suit shirt. “I have not forgotten our conversation, about how terrible this entity inside your mind is. I have listened.”

“But...”

“But? There is no but. I listened. I learned.” She licked a fang as she leaned in closer. “I am not some monolith, devoid of reason, only capable of mindlessly pursuing my goals. While I do not expect, nor want you trust me completely, little Ventrue, I do expect you to respect me. I am intelligent. I am wise.” Her lips touched his forehead, and he gulped.

“I believe it.”

“Good. Now, tomorrow night I have time to spend with you and Ann and the girls. What should I wear? I was thinking, perhaps, a corset, with long gloves and thigh high stockings? And a thong, of course. You seem to love those.”

He gulped again. God damn.

“Who doesn’t?”

“Indeed. A woman’s ass is the ultimate incarnation of beauty and allure.” With another wink, she shifted on his lap, softly hooked the back of his neck with one arm, and rested her hand on top of her huge cleavage with the other. Of course she had the first few buttons of her suit shirt already undone, and from this close, there was no ignoring the black bra underneath, and how it was designed to show off her enormous breasts.

“Uh...” Push her off? Nah, there was no way she’d cross that line and try and start something with him, not without Antoinette here. If his girlfriend was here, sure, Elaine would do everything in her power to seduce him right in front of her. And Jack might even let her do it, just to see if he could make his girlfriend jealous, cause so far she was immune to the emotion.

But she wasn’t here. Nothing Elaine could do would break him.

“Though you seem utterly infatuated with breasts.”

“Yeah, I can’t deny that.”

“Undoubtedly your next thrall will be a busty woman.”

“Should I really be picking thralls based on their cup size?”

“Of course not. But a city this large has many possibilities for thralls, ghouls, and future Kindred. Antoinette is simply taking your kinks into account.”

He frowned and looked away. This was embarrassing.

“It’s not like I only care about breasts.” Ashley and Julee had small breasts, and he’d ravaged them on multiple occasions.

Elaine laughed, heartily at that, and with her free hand, cupped the underside of her breasts under her shirt, and bounced them. And for the fucking life of him, he couldn’t help but stare at the soft flesh as it jiggled in her bra.

“Accept and enjoy your kinks. You will find life much more enjoyable.”

“I guess...”

“You could find thralls yourself, but your lover is Prince. Perhaps in thirty or forty years you will develop an eye for them, but in the mean time, let the Prince help you. And let your girlfriend indulge her kink, which as you know, is to indulge your kinks.”

That was definitely true. Antoinette was at her happiest and most sexually fulfilled when she was drowning him in sexual delights. Even the times he’d brought her to half a dozen orgasms and had her drenching the sheets, she didn’t have quite the same twinkle in her eye as when she found some new way to pleasure him.

“And besides,” she said, “I would enjoy recreating the nights Antoinette and I shared, oh so long ago. Dozens of legs intertwined, blood filling our bellies.”

“I uh, not really sure—”

“There would be no other men there, of course, you selfish boy. Only women and yourself. Women, with mouths upon each other, fingers inside each other, a sea of breasts for you to drown in. You could have that, you know. With time and Ann to guide your choices, you could have half a dozen thralls to take care of your mansion and your desires alike in a year, maybe two. And more thralls and ghouls beyond that as the years go by. Most Ventrue do oh so love to grow a following, after all.

“Those stories Ann and I have shared with you would no longer be stories. Imagine it, Jack. Imagine the glory of a dozen, or two dozen. Thralls and ghouls, all hopelessly addicted to you, all eager to please you.” Her smile had grown absolutely evil at this point, like a cartoon villain. “Antoinette and myself would be seated between them, caressing each other’s bodies, while twenty women dripped blood into our mouths and suckled between our legs. You would wade through the women as they desperately tried to veer you off course, but you would press on until you found us. First, you take Antoinette. She gets on her hands and knees, and women bury her body in massaging hands and loving kisses, while two ghouls slide under her so they can suckle her breasts, as you penetrate her from behind. She climaxes immediately, drenching you. She’s been waiting.

“And then I shove you! I mount you as you stumble back, and guide your cock into my ass. I grin down at you, my childe, and groan hungrily as I work myself to bliss. Your servants press their naked breasts against my back as they slip their hands around me to finger my empty sex. More join, suckling on my breasts. More and more come close, fingering each other as they struggle to find places around you. Until, perhaps a little angry with me, my old friend rejoins us. She turns me around and pushes me down, pressing my back to your chest. She climbs on top of me, and presses her naked body down onto me, grinding and—”

Jack pushed her off.

Elaine was ready for it, sliding off his lap seamlessly. She chuckled, a husky sound, and she dusted her shoulders off as she grinned down at him.

“You have a kink for being a trouble maker, don’t you?” he said. “I mean, that and the usual Ventrue domination stuff.”

“It is true. I cannot help myself.”

“Well, mission succeeded, ok? All I can think of now is owning a harem and sharing it with Antoinette.” Cause it was a damn sexy fantasy, and if his body was permanently that of a man in his early twenties, he doubted it was one he’d ever grow out of.

Chuckling again, Elaine stepped out of the room, and Jack rolled his eyes as he followed after her. Mulder and Scully flew to his shoulders and reclaimed their perches.

“I enjoyed this conversation, Jack. It lets me know you are far wiser and sharper than most men your age.”

“I wonder about that.”

“It is true.” She winked at him, and opened the front door. “And, though you may not believe me, and it would serve me right if you did not after all I have said, I am ... pleased, that you wish to trust me.” Licking her lips, she walked down the front door stairs and down the street, and into the awaiting car, purposefully shaking her ass in her skirt the whole damn way.

If there was one way he was going to die, it’d be from trusting a femme fatale.

~~Beatrice~~

Things had gotten very ... shitty.

Triss, Jen, Aaron, and Othello, all stood on a rooftop in South Side, close to where the Carthians and Invictus shared a border. The Cloak of Night was generally good enough to keep vampires hidden in big open areas like this, but now that every vampire in the whole damn city was on high alert, maybe not. Skilled as she was at Obfuscate, Beatrice had to dial it up just so vampires blocks away didn't see them.

In the distance, Carthians patrolled their streets. In the opposite direction closer to the entertainment district, Invictus patrolled their streets. They were hidden, many using Cloak of Night, others hiding in cars or in the crowd, but with a pair of binoculars and four sets of eyes working together, Triss and her friends managed to spot a few of them.

“They're going to kill each other,” Aaron said. “The moment one of these roving bands runs into the other, there's going to be a fight.”

“In the street?” Jen asked. “Far too many kine around.”

Othello shrugged. “A gunfight won't break the Masquerade.”

Triss shook her head. “Yeah it will, cause there's no way the Invictus could suppress the police response enough to avoid having them intervene. Imagine, a gun fight in the streets, kine around, maybe getting hurt, and no cops show up? On top of that, the fuck would happen if one of any of the, you know, billion smart phones got a picture of a vamp getting a bullet in the neck, and then getting back up?”

“I guess you're right. I thought maybe the Beast would hide us from the cameras.”

“A blurry face on a phone screen can only go so far. Christ, sometimes I think the Prince really has a point, you know? The crazier technology gets, the harder it's getting for us to stay hidden.”

“Agreed,” Jennifer said. “But I suppose there's two schools of thought on that. The Prince's, using cooperation to manage and mitigate. Or Jacob's...”

Triss snorted. “You mean bringing everyone back to the stone age?”

“I don’t think he’d aim for the stone age. But ... maybe before the internet.”

Aaron raised a finger. “I’d be ok with that, I think.”

“You?” Triss asked, looking right at the Gangrel. “Figured you’d be all ‘oh it’s the dawn of a new age!’ and other poetic crap.”

“The internet has become a cesspool of stupidity. Normally, stupid information dies off as newer, better information replaces it. Civilization grew smarter, and smarter, because information that proved more effective survived longer than the poor information. But that’s not the case anymore. Now, we have a world where just zero-point-one percent of the population contributes in any meaningful way, and almost always as technological growth, while the rest of the population, barely smart enough to use a keyboard or smart phone, uses that technology to spread their idiocy.”

“I—”

“God fucking forbid we let experts be the leading voice on topics. God fucking forbid we use our amassed historical knowledge as a guide on what mistakes to avoid. God fucking forbid we actually use the internet as an open forum for scientific pursuits across the world, instead of a megaphone for the loudest, most ignorant shitheads. God forbid—”

Triss set a hand on the man’s shoulder. “Dude, dude, we get it. Holy shit.”

Aaron, who’d been staring down at the streets below, had been slowly getting angrier and angrier, with full-on posture changes. For a second, he’d looked like an angry dog. Well, he was a Gangrel, but the man never showed it. He had far more in common with a Mekhet than any Gangrel. At least, he did, until now. Totally new side of him.

“He, uh, does make a good point,” Jennifer said after putting a couple more inches between her and Aaron. “The technology boom, particularly the internet, has come with many negatives. Would it be so bad if the world went back to a place where exchanging information across distances became difficult? It’d be better for vampires, surely.”

“Eh I dunno,” Triss said. “It’s hard to really analyze a problem that big, you know? Like, fuck, we’re just minnows trying to understand the ocean. I say be and let be, and ride the waves as they come.”

They all looked at her for a while before eventually nodding, and looking back to the streets below. It was a powerful statement, Triss thought, and a viewpoint she’d come to appreciate more and more as the months went on. A very Jacob way of looking at things. It was impossible to know everything, so do what you can, learn what you can, and ride the waves as they come. Don’t let ignorance paralyze you, but keep an open mind to any and all information.

It was how witches did things, and it especially applied to crúac rituals. It was also probably how some witches stumbled into truly nasty shit and accidentally summoned Cthulhu or something. Ah well, no guts no glory.

“So, Aaron,” Jen said. “We’ve yet to see your girlfriend.”

“Will you bring her to us at some point?”

“Nope.”

“Oh come on, Aaron. What do you think I’ll do to her?”

The man gave Jen a look so deadpan, Triss snort-laughed hard.

“The same thing you did to Samantha.”

“I did nothing to her! Well, other than a few sexual things, but those were harmless!”

Triss shook her head. “I uh, think we did a little more than that to her. We corrupted her.” More like, the Circle corrupted everyone eventually, except for Aaron. “He probably wants to keep his girlfriend safe from evil lesbianism.”

Jen shook her head. “I am no lesbian. I’m bisexual. So are you.” She blew a playful breath at Triss, hard enough to make Triss’s hair bounce against her cheeks.

“Same thing to a God-fearin’ gun-totin’ good man like Aaron.” Othello winked at them before giving the Gangrel a loving pat on the back. “Give it up, Jen. I’ve been offering to share girls with Aaron since before either of you came around. He’s not interested.”

“Not everyone has to wear their sexuality on their sleeve,” Aaron said, face still unfazed as he looked down below. “Or indulge in every kink known. I like my relationships quiet and private.”

Aaron might like to keep his sex life vanilla, but he wasn’t even remotely fazed by the stuff he saw in the Circle. Maybe it wasn’t about his taste, and more about him not trusting the Circle to respect his relationship? It wasn’t like Triss ever brought Julias back to fuck in the cave where everyone could watch, or maybe even participate. The idea of Othello or Aaron, especially Jacob, watching her make love with Julias, grossed her out.

Julias. Triss’s laugh faded, and she looked down at the street below as old memories teased through her. With Jen’s help, she’d done a good job moving on, letting the bite of those memories fade. But every night, Elen got closer and closer to creating a vessel for him, and to see Julias's face emerge in her creations tugged those memories right back up from the muck.

Talk with Black Blood, Elen, and Jacob had convinced Triss that if she wanted her man back, the vessel had to be good. Great. Damn well near perfect. If she didn't get the body right, his soul might reject it, like a kine body rejecting an organ transplant. Course, she had no idea if that'd happen, and the others didn't either, but Jacob had some nasty stories in his books, talking about weird shit like souls in the wrong body basically rotting the body apart, and other oddness. Elen didn't seem to know much about souls, but she talked about dumb shit like 'life energy' and how it knew where to go, and where not to go.

It was part of the reason Jacob had given up on resurrecting Minerva. He had no way to get her a body. Black Blood and him said they were going to put her in a jar, or maybe a mannequin or something, and had even worked toward making her an undead body, but neither of them figured it'd be able to hold her. It wouldn't match, wouldn't fit. But with Elen's help, they could make it fit. Once Julias's soul was in the body, the flesh witch could work her magic, and make it work.

It was a good plan. It was a great fucking plan, except for one giant glaring issue she couldn't figure out. How to rip a soul out of the god damn afterlife. If Jacob and Black Blood were right, she'd have to do it with some giant sacrifice that killed thousands, maybe hundreds of thousands of people. And even then she'd need the help of someone that could ... understand souls? Someone that could do more than just grab at things with fingers and a thumb. She needed someone like Black Blood.

It really did seem fucking pointless to try. If she was onto something, if it could really work, Jacob wouldn't just be answering her questions, he'd be throwing himself at the project. The man had known and loved Minerva longer than Triss had Julias, so wouldn't he go crazy psycho excited and do anything in hopes of seeing her again? No, he'd given up on the idea, and was damn convinced Beatrice would fail.

So Triss came at the project with low expectations. Julias was gone, she kept telling herself over and over. Julias was gone, Julias is gone, and she'd never see him again. This project of hers was just her ... trial by fire, to becoming a proper witch. It'd fail, it'd scar her for eternity, and she would forever be a better witch for it. And her vow to be Black Blood's student would begin, following in Jacob's footsteps. Not that Jacob had ever been Black Blood's student, those two were partners, but close enough.

Christ, what if it did work? What if she had Julias back, and—

She killed the thought, killed it dead, instantly. She would not get her hopes up. She would not.

“Triss,” Jen said, “you’re doing it again.”

“Eh?”

“Staring off, and—”

“Right, I know. I’m just thinking.”

Jen slid in beside her, before setting an arm on Triss's opposite hip, arm hooked behind her. “Whatever happens, I’ll be there.”

Triss smiled and nudged her head into Jen's. Yeap, totally cheesy, and she didn't care.

“Let’s go see Jack.”

---

They knew Jack was home; Triss texted him. Othello whistled as they approached the mansion, and he spent more than a few seconds admiring some of the statues. For just a split second, Triss thought he might have had an eye for art. But, no, he was just admiring the statues that showed some boob.

He whistled again when they stopped at the enormous double doors, and Triss knocked. Big boom with the door knocker and everything, straight out of a movie.

Someone very much not Jack opened the door.

“Uh, hello?” Triss said, eying the maid up and down.

The maid was fucking hot. A short woman, curvy, with blue hair, and a button shirt that was pretty much completely unbuttoned, showing a very nice bra holding a pair of very large tits. The color scheme screamed maid, but the clothes were modern, suit shirt and tight skirt and whatnot.

The kine gasped, but after staring at Triss for a few seconds, let out a sigh of relief. “Oh, Beatrice. I’m sorry, this is the first time I’ve seen you face to face. I didn’t ... I apologize.”

“Apologize? Oh, right.” Triss touched her extra teeth, and dragged a claw along them, earning some quiet rapid clicks. “Um, don’t worry about it. Who are you?”

“I’m Veronica. The master’s servant.”

Oh, a thrall. Maybe a ghoul, but Triss didn’t get that sense.

“Aren’t you a pretty thing.” Jennifer stepped forward, and Veronica stepped back, eyes going wide again. Yeap, she was new, and Jen’s aggression scared her.

“Jen, don’t wear out your welcome,” Triss said. “Veronica, can you —”

“The master says you’re welcome to come in; you have an open invitation. He’s a little busy at the moment, but I’m sure he’ll be with you soon.” Too damn cute, the way she kept looking at them, then at the ground, then remembered her obvious instructions, tried to maintain eye contact, and kept failing. “In the mean time, I can take you to—”

“I’ve seen the inside of this mansion a million times, Veronica.”

“Oh ... right. I’m sorry.”

Ah shit, now Triss felt bad. Sure, having another women tell her where she could and couldn’t go in her dead boyfriend’s mansion struck a nerve, but Veronica didn’t know better. And it was Triss’s problem anyway.

“Forget about it,” Triss said. “Can you take us to the ... fuck, I don’t know what it’s called. The room with red couches? Over there.” She gestured down the hall.

Veronica nodded, and after taking a quick peek at Othello, twice, she guided them through the halls. Aaron and Othello both looked around with wide, curious eyes, and Triss had to fight to keep from laughing or teasing them. For dudes like them, money like this just didn’t make sense. Why build a fancy place like this that’d only attract attention? Witches hid, because it made sense to. Not like most people could appreciate or understand crúac rituals and the other shenanigans she knew Jacob got up to. Invictus, on the other hand, fucking loved to posture, pose, fluff up, and show their tail feathers.

Veronica opened the door, and let them go in first. God damn, she really was doing the whole servant shtick. Did Jack like that? Probably not; he had that in common with Julias. But then again, Julias rarely acquired thralls, and had no ghouls, while Jack was only a few years embraced and had a thrall already. Maybe the kid had a desire to be in charge Julias didn’t?

“Do you ... need anything?” Veronica asked, smiling at each of them in turn.

“Uh, yeah,” Triss said, sitting on the couch with Jen. “How’d you know who I was? Jack describe me?”

The boys took a different couch, a wall of old wood behind them, smoothed and carved and decorated with red curtains. Of course they admired it, the guest room’s walls, the candle holders on the walls and the fake candles in them; Julias had replaced Viktor’s real candles with fake ones. The room and everything in it just reeked of wasted money, but the boys were hypnotized by it anyway. Sluts.

“Picture? I—oh my god.” She laughed and buried half her face in her hand. “That brings back ... memories.”

Veronica squirmed a little. Yeap, she’d just tripped over a shitty situation without realizing it, until now.

“I’m sorry! I shouldn’t have—”

“Jesus girl, relax.” Triss shook her head and waved a hand. “It’s ok. It was a long ... it was a time ago.” Not that long, Triss.

“Still, I ... um...” Poor girl was going to shatter. She’d tried to be all proper and shit at the door, like a good servant, but apparently being around four vamps was a bit much for her.

“We’re not going to bite,” Othello said, and he smiled at the girl as he leaned back on the couch beside Aaron. “Unless of course your master lets us.”

Triss promptly kicked the table between them, a small wooden thing with a red cloth over it, right at the asshole’s shins. A good thunk and a surprised grunt from Othello announced success.

“Dude. Keep it in your pants. And trust me, you don’t want to get on Jack’s bad side.”

“It’s ok,” Veronica said, squirming a little more and blushing a lot more. “The master has ... warned me, about certain vampires.” Despite herself, the thrall managed a sheepish smile for Othello, before she nodded her head to the rest of them.

Jennifer laughed. “Considering it’s Jack, I imagine Veronica has been thoroughly seduced and ravaged by two very powerful Kindred besides Jack, no? And routinely, I imagine.”

Oh god. Triss hid half her face in her hand again, but watched as the tasty thrall squirmed and blushed even harder.

“The master has a ... pretty amazing sex life, I admit.”

Antoinette, Elaine, the Prince’s two ghouls, and now Veronica. Dude was getting five pussies on the reg. As amazing as that sounded, Triss knew some vamps who pushed it a lot further.

“If I know Jack,” Jennifer said, evil gleam in her eyes, “and I think I do, at least a little, I suspect you’ll have more legs in your bed with time. I imagine the boy will build a harem, something to be a symbol of his power, a source of food, but also, something to protect and cherish.”

“I can see it,” Triss said. Jack and Julias had a lot in common, but not everything. Veronica was proof.

Jennifer grinned. “And his mother will, too. I see the desire in her eyes.”

Triss and Othello, even Aaron laughed at that. Veronica stared at them like they’d spoken mysterious, powerful words, which had them all laughing again. If only the thrall knew how big Samantha’s sexual appetite was.

“I haven’t spoken with Samantha yet,” Veronica said. “She’s very pretty.” From the way she said it, Triss could see she was stepping out of her comfort zone, and probably into territory she considered dangerous, talking about her master’s mom.

Jennifer’s grin erupted into something Triss had seen far too often.

“Pretty, yes, and absolutely sala—”

Triss put a hand over her friend’s dumb mouth and shook her head, hers and Jen’s. “We’re not gonna talk about Samantha, not like that, not in her kid’s mansion.” And honestly, a part of her didn’t like the idea of pissing Jack off. Sure, the kid’s personality basically rendered him harmless for stupid shit like social gossip, but the thing inside him, Triss wasn’t so sure. If the Ripper flipped out and decided to rip off some heads cause someone insulted his mom, it wouldn’t surprise her.

Jen sighed and nodded, and Triss let her go.

Veronica put a hand up to her mouth, glanced at the door, and closed it, while staying inside the room. Then, with wide, hungry eyes, she stepped closer to Triss.

“Is it true the Circle does, like, witchy stuff? Sacrifices, orgies under the fool moon, that kinda stuff?”

Oh good god, it was too fucking precious. The thrall was hungry for tidbits, and looking at the four of them like they were special, like they were gods or something. No wonder vampires often got themselves a thrall or three. What an ego stroke.

“Who told you that?”

“Jack and the Prince kinda mentioned it. Ashley and Julee said more, but I don’t think they know as much.”

“There are certainly orgies,” Othello said. Veronica blushed horribly when she looked back at him, but her eyes came back to Triss with more curiosity.

Triss rolled her eyes. “Yes, there are orgies, or at least the Circle does that sorta stuff. We don’t, not really, but we could, sure. Jacob probably did, hundreds of years ago, orgies under the full moon, complete with a fresh goat’s skull, covered in blood, hung around his neck.”

“Whoa.”

Whoa, yeah. That shit was fascinating, and terrifying. But it sent giddy jolts through Triss, to see a young woman, a kine no less, think that shit was neat. Lots of women and teenage girls went through a witch phase, and delved into occult stuff. But lots of women were also obsessed with murder documentaries and stalker podcasts. That didn’t mean they all wanted to be detectives.

“I do suggest,” Aaron said, “that you tread carefully, Veronica. The four of us are pretty friendly, but Jacob guards his secrets and guards them well. He’d have no problem killing you if he thought you were being too nosy.”

Veronica straightened with a gulp. “B-But ... isn’t the master’s mom dating Jacob?”

“She is. But she’s not involved in anything related to the Circle beyond that, and Samantha’s smart enough to be careful with her questions.”

“I see. I ... I’ll be careful.”

Probably a good idea to scare the thrall some now, before it bit her in the ass later. Sure, Jacob wasn’t as scary as people thought he was, but in some ways he was scarier.

The door opened, and in walked Jack. Everyone sat up straighter, and as much as none of them would say it, they all felt their Beasts recoil in the presence of the kid. Triss knew about the necklace he wore, and that it kept his Beast quiet and subdued, but that didn't mean they couldn't sense it, sense how massive it'd become. It was like someone had taken a tiger, already a damn strong Beast, and given it a bunch of steroids, too many, so it was bursting at the seams with strength to the point it was unnatural, and grotesque.

The kid looked good. He wore a damn nice suit, gray, something Julias would have worn, and he wore it well, good proud posture putting his chest and shoulders on display, and Triss bet he didn't even realize he was doing it anymore. Confidence came off him smoothly, naturally, so much like Julias it almost hurt. God damn, the difference three years and a mountain of bullshit falling on your lap can make. Anyone else probably would have broke, but not this damn kid.

And then there were the two crows. Mulder and Scully had been with Jack a long time, and everyone was used to seeing two black birds whenever Jack was around. Except this was different. This time, the two crows sat on his shoulders, and stayed there, instead of immediately finding perches overhead. And they didn't look right. They stood there, heads turning with almost mechanical precision, and every member of the Circle blinked as they noticed the birds were damaged. One of them had a broken neck and crooked head, the other a broken wing. Neither bird seemed to care, or even notice.

The two crows completed the image of one scary fucking Ventrue.

“Beatrice,” he said, and he smiled. Not so scary to his friends. “Jennifer. Oh, Othello, Aaron, hey.” He nodded to the boys, a half apology for not expecting them. “Thanks Veronica, you may go.”

Veronica smiled, half bowed to him, and left, closing the door behind her.

“You have a type,” Jennifer said, gesturing to the door, then down to her own bust and the suit shirt she wore. Like Veronica, she had plenty of her buttons undone. Unlike Veronica, she didn’t bother with the bra.

“Ugh, don’t start. It’s Antoinette, she—”

“Delights in delighting you.” The fellow Ventrue giggled and swooned. “Soon these walls will be bustling with a delightful harem of bare breasts, bouncing boobily along.”

Past Jack would have squirmed at being called out. This Jack sighed, but smiled, and leaned back against the door, hands at his sides.

“I mean, yeah, once I accepted being a vampire, I did kinda envision growing up to have a harem I guess. Dracula’s brides, right? Monica Bellucci.” Everyone groaned with desire, in unison. “Then I met Antoinette, and didn’t think it’d happen, and I didn’t care. I love her, and she’s already wearing me out with all the things she likes to try. But now she’s also pushing me to get a harem, and ... I should stop calling it a harem.”

Jennifer shrugged. “It is what it is. Of everyone in this room, only Aaron and Beatrice do not have thralls and ghouls with the express purpose of being fed on and fucked.”

“Cause Aaron and me are good people. The rest of you are going to Hell.”

Jack laughed. “Yeah, I guess. And in this modern world, it’s even worse, everyone trading sex tapes or putting on shows for each other with webcams.”

Triss raised a brow, and looked at Jen. Jen looked at Aaron. Aaron looked at Othello. Othello grinned.

“You made a sex tape,” the Daeva said.

“I ... well, yeah. Hasn't everyone in this damn city?” Jack asked. Every witch and warlock shook their heads, and Jack threw up his hands. “What the fuck?”

“Witches are a little more hands on,” Triss said, shrugging.

Jennifer's eyes positively gleamed. “I must have this tape.”

Jack just rolled his eyes. “I can only take so much embarrassment. And from what I hear, you witches are all pretty cozy with each other, and my mom visits Jacob frequently. The last thing I want her to see, is me with five women, on tape.”

Jennifer held out a single hand, palm up, and curled her fingers. Very evil sorceress vibes. “Give it to me.”

Jack laughed and shook his head. “So anyway, why are you all here? Just visiting?”

“Kinda yeah,” Triss said. “I was worried about you. Things are heating up pretty bad out there.”

“You're telling me. Those two fucking assholes are going to get everyone killed.”

“Two?”

“Garry and Michael.” After a heavy sigh, Jack walked across the room and sat in an empty sofa chair. It was surprising the chair didn't break under the weight on his shoulders. The two birds cawed once each, and nudged their heads into his neck, earning some neck scratches from him in return. “Now that Amanda's dead, things aren't just heating up anymore. They're catching fire. Gloria is devastated. Four skirmishes in the week since her child's supposed death, and a dozen Kindred have lost limbs."

"Supposedly?" Triss asked.

"I don't wanna talk about it until I know for sure." Poor kid. He leaned back in the sofa, and rubbed both temples with one hand as he looked up. "Those two idiots are gonna push the two covenants together harder and harder until there's a big fight. People are going to die. And I'm gonna be in the middle of it, trying to stop it."

"You could always just let them kill each other," Aaron said.

"I'm Invictus. I'm a part of this, even if I don't want to be."

Othello raised a hand. "I get the impression the Prince would prefer you stay out of it. Leave the Invictus, request sanctuary, and stay with her?"

Again, the kid shook his head, just like Triss knew he would.

"I'm not going to let people die cause these two assholes hate each other."

"A very un-vampire thing to say," Jennifer said.

Jack laughed. "Yeah, I know. But it is a Julias thing to say. Shit doesn't need to be like in other cities. And so help me god, if I have to break Garry and Michael in half to make it happen, I will."

"Or kill them," Aaron said.

"I ... yeah, that. I don't want to do that. Garry doesn't deserve that, much as I can't stand his guts. And Michael ... is quickly approaching the point I think he should die, but he's my boss."

"Would you kill him if you could?"

Jack eyed Aaron, suspicious. “Hard to answer that question. Sorry.”

Aaron put up his hands. “No offense taken.”

“Othello,” Jack asked. “You know much about Garry and Michael? You’re older than any of us.”

“Sorry Jack. I keep my head down and stay out of everyone’s affairs.”

“Useless,” Triss said, smiling at the dumb oaf. He returned it with a wink.

Though in retrospect, she should probably be careful teasing Othello, considering how much Samantha was into him. He could get at Jack through Samantha. But, nah, Othello wouldn’t do that. Half because he was just too much of a lazy nice guy, but also cause he was just as afraid of Jack as everyone else. He’d been there, when Jack got revenge, after all.

“Ask your beloved,” Jen said.

“Antoinette and I are pretty careful about what we tell each other. If Michael suspects Antoinette’s been playing favorites and telling me shit she shouldn’t, and vice versa, it’ll cause problems. He’s already annoyed that she and I are basically joined at the hip. I’m sleeping with the enemy.”

Triss nodded. “Yeah. If the Prince was a Carthian, it wouldn’t fly.”

“Exactly.”

“But, dude, I’ve seen that Ripper curse in full swing. I bet you could kill Michael.”

“I don’t want to kill Michael!” Jack sat up straight and slammed both palms on the arms of his chair. Everyone flinched, except the birds. The birds might as well have been statues on his shoulders. “He’s not some colossal asshole like Viktor was, or Lucas. If Amanda isn’t actually dead, if this is some big trick, then he’s only a normal asshole, that doesn’t necessarily deserve to die. And, he’s an asshole with connections. Killing him could be a pain in my ass for decades after.”

“Only if you get caught,” Jennifer said, smile growing sly.

“At this point, I think everyone would turn their eyes to me if Michael vanished, with this curse rumor hounding me.”

“True.”

“I just ... I know Garry and Michael hate each other, and I get that they’ve been fighting each other for a long time, but they really, really hate each other.”

Aaron lifted a finger. “You grow to hate what you fight. History and psychology has taught us that quite well. Put two forces against each other long enough, and they’ll eventually hate each other. They’ll look for reasons to justify their conflict.”

“Yeah, I guess. It still feels worse than that.”

“Ask Maria?” Aaron said. “She might know more.”

Triss winced. Aaron and Othello didn’t know Jack avoided Maria because of what happened to Lucas, and she planned to keep it that way. To Jack’s credit, he didn’t flinch or anything.

“Maria and I aren’t on the best of terms.”

“So? If Kindred are going to die, it seems like something worth risking. Besides, you saved her from Avery, so she owes you, right?”

Jack looked down in thought. “Yeah, you’re right. I should talk to her.”

“Careful, Jack,” Triss said. The others looked at her, eyebrows raised, but Triss ignored them. “She’s a cold bitch.”

“I will. Damien will be there. I might just ask him to ask her.” Jack lifted his head, and his old smile came back. “The four of you really came over here just to help me out with Invictus Carthian problems?” They all nodded. “Uh huh. I’m naive, but not dumb, guys.”

Triss laughed again. “I brought them. It was just me. I wanted to talk, you know?”

Pain hit the kid’s face, and Triss knew it hit hers, too. But they looked at each other and held each other’s gazes, and everyone else went deadly quiet as they watched.

“Thanks,” he said after a few seconds, long enough for the two of them to share a silent conversation. Julias was dead, Beatrice was feeling better, so was Jack, but every so often they’d remember him, and it still hurt.

“We’re keeping an eye on shit,” she continued, “but Jacob’s given us orders to stay hands off.”

“I half expected him to say you should back Garry if he ever has his back to a wall.”

“Well, he might have said that, but I couldn’t tell you if he did, right?”

“Nope, I suppose you couldn’t. How’s Mom?”

It took every bit of control she had to not look at Othello. “Jacob and her hang out a lot. Relationship seems to be working. What, you don't talk to your mom?"

"I do, occasionally. But with everything that's happened ... She's the Prince's childe, you know? Antoinette doesn't want her getting involved in this war."

"Well, don't talk to her about the war, man." Triss laughed and shook her head. "Talk to her about normal shit."

"When is the last time any of us have talked about normal shit, and didn't feel like it was dumb juvenile crap?" Jack shrugged, sat back, and looked to the group of them.

They all looked at each other, each wincing with understanding. Kid had a point. If the conversation included anything like weather, who's dating who, or financial struggles, Kindred got bored. All that shit was from their first lives, and even then it was dumb. Now, each and every night was a night spent chasing their agendas, and even the most pathetic agenda from the most fresh fledgling included shit like building a hideout to survive deadly daylight; epic, relative to their first lives. They'd all completely lost the ability to give a fuck about any of the old life crap.

Well, they may have, but Samantha hadn't, not yet.

"Don't talk to her then, listen to her. Your mom's got a lot to say, you know? I mean, we talk to her, and I'm sure her sire talks to her, but I can tell she's got things she wants to share she can't really share with them, only you. And her daughter." Who they were all convinced Samantha still talked to, regularly.

A tinge of pain ran across the kid's face. "Yeah, good point. And thanks again, for visiting. With so many Kindred out there scared of me, it's nice to know you're not—"

"Terrified," Othello said with a smile and a nod. "Still terrified. But Triss says you're still you. Seems she's right."

“I hope so,” the kid said, twiddling with his necklace. “I hope so.” Nodding, he got up and went for the door. “So did you—”

“Dude,” Triss said, grinning, “give the boys a tour.”

Jack rolled his eyes, but it was obvious the kid was glad for some normal company. And she was happy to give it, before the Carthians and Invictus really went to town on each other. Cause holy fuck, if Jack died in this war, it wouldn't just eat Triss up, it'd eat Samantha up. And the Prince? Jesus fucking christ, what would she do?

Better to help the kid out now, and honestly, do a check up and see how he was doing.

God, imagine the look on the kid's face if Julias walked back into his life?

Imagine the look on his face if he found some sort of freak Frankenstein creation that looked like Julias, with a thousand pounds of wrongness in him. Like, some sort of freak nightmare, some failed creation begging to be put out of its misery.

It was easy to think ‘no guts no glory’, when it was her own life on the line. Someone else's? Her love's? His childe's?

~~Eric~~

Avery wasn't around. Clara, Caleb, and Noah weren't around. Most importantly, Flowing Sanctuary wasn't around.

Eric had gotten pretty good in the past few months at avoiding them. Avery would give him a lecture, and the spirit Flow would shut him down. But he knew where they often hunted now, and avoided those places when he could smell them. And now that he was familiar with their scents, he felt a lot more comfortable exploring the city, as long as he was careful.

Better yet, he had backup this time. Natasha and Sándor stayed back and watched; the monster was stuck in his human body in the Hisil, so it was better he stay with the vampire. But the three werewolves, Eric, Matthew, and Arturo, were free to run down their prey.

Needle Swords. A humanoid spirit, tall, covered in a gray cloak. The gangly white creature wore a plague doctor mask, with two large, black eyes. It was the fingers that gave it up though. Each finger was a long needle, the sort you used to shoot up, the sort Eric had seen thousands of in two different phases of his life: the back alleys, and the bathrooms of the rich.

Eric and Matthew sprinted for the spirit, both in their monstrous wolf forms, the bigger form Urshul. It didn't have the power of the Gauru form, or the stealth of the normal wolf form Urhan, but it was big, strong, and fast. If any spirit got in their way, they could break through, and Eric had every intention of running this spirit down hard tonight. No sneaking, no stalking, no scouting the area or looking for a weakness. Just run the fucker down, and kill it.

When Needle Swords noticed them, it ran. Gross, lanky legs, long and thin, broke into a sprint, and the creature vanished down a dark alley. But Eric knew this city and knew it well. He'd lived here his whole life, and spent years driving a cab. And strange as the Hisil was, with its curved buildings, alien sky, and corkscrewing lampposts, it was still Dolareido. It was different, but the same. A shadow of the real, or more like the other half of the same coin. And he'd learned the city's shadow half well in the past few months.

Matt slowed down, letting Eric take lead. Much as Avery's pack had probably spent most nights of the past couple years exploring Dolareido's shadow half, they would never know it with the intimacy Eric did. Moving through the alley, rushing past the tiny black, living orbs that skirted the walls, with strange colorful eels flying overhead on their way to flashy entertainment buildings, was perfectly instinctual to Eric. His giant paws didn't hesitate to drive him forward, and he pushed hard.

These alleys existed all over Dolareido, and by design. The vampires loved dark alleys for all the typical vampire shenanigans it let them pursue, but also, for all the stupid shit it encouraged humans to do. The vampires wanted humans to get into bad habits like abusing drugs. And humans being dumb as fuck, flocked to those vices like they were on sale and supplies were low. But in Dolareido, the supplies were endless.

And hey, Eric got it, he understood the desire, the reasons. The amount of poor people he'd met growing up who turned to shit to escape how fucking horrible life was, was endless. The amount of stupid rich people he'd met who'd gotten hooked without ever knowing just how addicting it was, was endless. But some things went too far, and this spirit helped push people over the edge.

The dark alleys between walls of white and gray concrete looked black this deep in the alleys where the street lights didn't reach. They were a ways off from the entertainment district; the few light spirits that wandered into Devil's Corner inevitably went back from where they came from. Worse, the alleys here were deeper, and longer than in the physical world. A lot longer. Space-defying longer. Eric had circled these buildings from the outside before, but had only ever gone through them once, here in the Hisil, and it was not an experience he wanted to suffer again.

But here he was, chasing Needle Swords through the long, dark alley, where shadows swarmed them and blocked out the sky, because he was an idiot. Because for some stupid fucking reason, his dad had rubbed off on him, all his stupid talk about caring for the people in your community and caring about where you came from. For some idiot reason, Eric wanted to do what his dad told him he should do, when Eric first started making money. Help people.

Of course he was only telling himself half the truth, and conveniently avoiding the other half. Family drama shaping his personality and sealing certain behaviors into his subconscious? Everyone had to deal with that shit. But the howl of the wolf, the thrill of it, the rush, the blood lust, the hunger and instinct? That was the shit he'd been ignoring, until now.

Rushing down his prey as it ran through the alley, clicking and squeaking inside its mask, felt good. Felt great. Felt fucking incredible. Eric exposed his fangs as he panted, four feet catching the asphalt and sending him forward with increasing speed as he let the rush drive him. Catch the prey. Hunt it down. Bite it. Tear it open. Defend the territory. Devour the life of the weak.

The human part of him expected Needle Swords to beg for its life as Eric closed the distance. The wolf in him knew the spirit didn't understand the concept. Or it did, it just wouldn't do it. Wasn't part of its nature. And all spirits, more than any biological thing, were slaves to their natures.

Eric closed the distance, Matt close on his heels. The spirit was fast. Those long legs did work, and the spirit ran like an Olympic sprinter, gray, patchy cloak flapping in the air behind it. Its feet were long, but mostly human, and nothing standing upright would match the speed of something running on four legs.

Of course, the spirit wasn't stupid. It'd been around for decades, maybe longer, and had built up a name. Other spirits served it, and sure enough, spirits crept out of the darkness to try and stop Matt and Eric. None of them came at them directly, which made sense considering the sort of spirit they served. But they still got in the way nonetheless.

Plague masks. Tiny plague masks came out of the dark of the stupidly long alleyway, and soon, the bodies they wore. If Eric didn't know better, he'd think a bunch of children wearing costumes had jumped out of the sewers from manholes, black blankets over their bodies, and each wearing a plague mask.

They weren't kids, they were spirits. They didn't fly, but they did hover, and the black cloak dangling from them didn't do a good job hiding that their legs weren't exactly normal. Misshapen, grotesque, and small, their limbs did little except hang underneath them. Their arms were longer though, and their hands stuck out from the black cloth, exposing sharp, long thin claws. Needle-like claws. Not like Needle Swords, whose fingers looked like whole, actual needles, but sharp claw versions.

It only took the third one of the little spirits to land a blow to let Eric know how sharp. He roared and looked over his shoulder, and barked approval as Matt collided with the spirit. Wolves were huge. Urshul wolves were gigantic. The small spirit's head didn't even reach the top of Matt's shoulder, and hundreds of pounds of solid muscle slammed it into the wall behind it.

Spirits weren't soft, floaty things you could move your hand through unless they were hiding in Twilight, and they couldn't do that in the Hisil. Here, they were solid. Here, they could bleed; didn't have organs, but they often bled, as a representation of damage. The spirits that embodied things like trees wouldn't bleed, but they'd break or burn. The ones that embodied aspects of the streets like asphalt wouldn't bleed, but they'd crumble. But the ones that liked to take the shapes of animals, humans included, bled just fine. They often bled strange colors, but they bled, and it tasted great.

The child-like spirit died, and blood gushed out of its plague mask beak. White blood. An incarnation of its ephemeral body. It, and the spirit itself, were made of it, and fueled by essence. And it was the essence that was fueling and delicious.

Would this fucking bastard Needle Swords taste good, when they caught up to it?

Matt recovered quickly and chased after Eric's tail, and Eric ignored the gash in his side. It'd heal in a few minutes. It'd heal in a few seconds in Gauru form, but here, and in a hunt, Gauru form had one purpose: combat. It wasn't good at anything else, just fighting. And in a hunt, he wouldn't be able to control the desire for combat like he could back in the physical Dolareido, with Jessy. Better to stay in Urshul, and run the prey down.

More of the child-like fucked up spirits came out of the dark and swiped at them with their claws, only to disappear into small holes Matt and Eric were too big for. They wouldn't have chased them anyway, but it was infuriating to have an obstacle course to navigate to catch up to Needle Swords. Focus, Eric. These little bastards are part of a choir, but Needle Swords is in charge. Take it down, and the others won't have as much of an effect. And it was important to always remember the ecosystem. Wipe out one species and you create a vacuum that can cause unknown knock-on effects; true in the Gurihal, and true in the Hisil.

Eric ducked to the side of one spirit, and then to the other. And finally, light announced they were quickly approaching the end of the alley.

A shadow put a stop to that, and Eric slammed all four paws down hard. He skidded to a halt, and stared up at the enormous spirit that now blocked his path. A golem? Something made of asphalt, humanoid, with a big glowing eye in a big featureless skull of concrete. And it'd already raised one of its enormous hands in a big fist, intent on crushing Eric into pulp.

Before Eric could so much as yelp, Matthew flew over him, and in Gauru form. Might as well have been Goliath himself with how ridiculously huge Matthew was. The massive werewolf slammed into the street golem, and raked his claws down the creature's body. The two crashed down onto the street, and a thousand small black rat-like observers scattered as the giant creatures collided with a lamppost.

Eric watched them for only a few seconds. A few seconds was long enough to see that the titanic werewolf had cut gashes down through the golem's body several times already, each rake of his claws sending piles of debris from the mouthless spirit's form. It tried to hit Matthew, and managed to land a single punch. A considering how big its fists were, and what material its body was emulating, the punch hit hard enough to send Matthew onto his side.

But he got up a second later, and again threw himself at the golem, ripping and tearing. Biting. The sound was surreal, werewolf claws and teeth breaking through asphalt like a pick axe destroying rocks, but by the dozens. The golem thrashed, but it was slow and heavy, and Matthew took bites out of its hard body as he wrestled it back to the street.

“Go! Follow prey!”

Eric gulped, nodded, and chased after Needle Swords as it ran down the street.

But it didn't get far. Twenty seconds later, the tall spirit suddenly spun out of control and fell over hard, rolled and skid, and eventually came to a halt in a mess of agony. Something else had pounced it.

Another wolf arrived, appearing almost out of thin air where Needle Swords had fallen. Arturo planted his paws on the sprawled and struggling spirit, pinning it under his huge Urshul weight. Nodding, he looked to Eric, and waited.

Eric did the only reasonable thing, when a fellow wolf offers you captured and defeated prey. Hunt finished, prey secured, Eric dove onto the spirit, and sank his fangs into its neck. With Needle Swords on its stomach, it couldn't do anything but writhe in panic as Eric bit hard, and killed it.

Finally. Now, time for the new, mysterious tear.

Chapter 144

~~Natasha~~

“Is it d-dead?” she asked.

Eric nodded as he dragged the spirit’s body back into the alley. Still in the big wolf body, he wouldn’t be able to talk, but body language was fine.

She didn’t expect him to take a bite out of the tall, gangly thing. But he did. Natasha gulped as Eric ripped and tore at the humanoid in the plague mask, and gulped down a chunk of its flesh. She gulped again when Arturo did the same. She outright squeaked when Matthew, back into his huge wolf form, slipped past her, and tore at the body as well.

“Um ... uh ... is that edible?” She didn’t understand. It made sense for a wolf spirit to eat prey spirits, but this thing was a weird spirit of human inclination and physical manifestations. Drugs, and drug abuse. A wolf wouldn’t eat that, right?

Well, they weren’t wolves. They were werewolves. Maybe they had stronger stomachs? They were hunters, and that role extended to hunting anything they deemed dangerous to the physical world.

Or maybe they were eating it the same way someone might eat paper with a secrete message written on it, just to destroy it. Ask later, focus now.

After a few bites each, the wolves backed off, and returned to their human forms. Eric wiped his mouth, even though there was nothing there. Art and Matt did no such thing, and laughed when they saw Eric do it.

“That was disgusting,” Art said.

Eric nodded, shrugging. “Yeah, it was. I don’t eat city spirits often. But after my first successful group hunt, kinda seemed like the right thing to do.”

Matt nodded, smiling, but his face scrunched up a second later, obviously unhappy with the taste. “There are other ways to get essence. Eating spirits is ... well, some Uratha like David do it a lot.”

David, the strange fellow of the pack. The boys called him an Ithaeur, someone who talked to spirits all the time, whether they wanted to or not.

“Yeah I know. But the best way to learn is by doing, right?” Shrugging, Eric motioned ahead, and the group of them stepped back onto the curving sidewalk of the Hisil’s Devil’s Corner.

“Or b-by asking someone who knows more,” Natasha said. “Avery knows more.”

Eric rolled his eyes and slipped his hands into his blue jeans pockets. A t-shirt and jeans for him and Art and Matthew; the fashion was timeless and immortal. At least Sándor wore a dark button shirt, and dark jeans. Only Natasha wore an ensemble that cost more than a hundred dollars: a proper suit, black. Invictus habits died hard.

“Surprised to hear you say that,” Art said, looking down at her.

“W-What? Why?”

The man squirmed and looked around, but no one else said anything, and he sighed.

“After everything that’s happened, I figured you’d be against Avery in most things.”

Natasha frowned up at Arturo with an urge to yell at him. She didn't used to get that urge, not over stuff like this.

“Just b-because ... she ... Just because she t-told you two to ... Just ... b-b-because she...” Natasha grit her teeth, looked down, and took a deep, useless breath. It was so damn hard to find the words, when every time she remembered what Arturo and Matthew did to her, she got upset. She hated not being able to steel herself like Antoinette told her to, to set emotions aside and be logical about things. But, remembering the sudden understanding that a stake stuck out from her chest, and that Arturo had staked her — and Matthew by accessory, since he left it there — filled her with rage.

It was so much easier in the stories. The boys had apologized to her already, and they'd meant it, and she'd accepted their apologizes. And they were now, gladly, trying to fix things. So why couldn't she let it go?

Because this wasn't a story. Real life wasn't nearly so neat and tidy. They'd hurt her. Even if what they did made sense, a little, and might have even been something she'd have done if the situation had been reversed, they'd still hurt her. It'd take time for that to heal.

“Just because,” she said at last, “Avery jumped the gun d-dealing with Maria, doesn't mean she isn't smart, and wise. It d-doesn't mean she doesn't have a lot of experience, or hasn't learned a lot of things.”

“Yeah.” Matthew smiled down at her, a fleeting bit of eye contact announcing he recognized her thoughts. And they hurt him. “But, let's be real. Avery's a bitch.”

Natasha smiled. Smile turned into a giggle when she noticed the pun, and she rolled her eyes. So did Eric. The boys laughed though, cause they were the type to think puns were hilarious. Horrible people.

Sándor looked like he was about to say something. But, predictably, he didn't, and the group kept walking.

Natasha looked around, and got her brain's cogs turning as she took in the sights of the Shadow Realm. Now that the boys had successfully helped Eric, it was Eric's turn to help them. First thing on the list: check out the new tear Avery's pack found some weeks ago.

"I've been out here," Eric said. "I didn't see anything weird."

"It's a ways out," Matt said. "Edge of the city."

Art nodded, but he didn't look happy about it. "Spirits hang out where they can find the most activity on the other side. If we left the city and went into the desert, we'd find few spirits if we jumped into the Hisil, and few loci to allow us to jump at all. It's humans, and us, mingling with each other and the environment that creates disturbances. Spirits are drawn to those, you know? So it's strange this tear is on the outskirts."

"There are other tears," Sándor said. "Some are on the edges of the city, and some are closer to the center. And some defy easy placement." Like the nightmare chambers.

The werewolves nodded. Sándor nodded.

Natasha nearly tore her hair out. "And n-none of you have t-t-t-talked to each other about them!?" The men all looked at each other, each with one or both eyebrows raised, as if what she was asking didn't make sense. Ugh, men. "W-Why not share what you know with each other? First things first, plotting all known tear locations on a map."

It took them a second, but eventually the four men got it.

"Makes sense," Art said. "We've marked them on a map already."

“As have I,” Sándor said. “Mapping the nightmare realm is tricky, but there is an art to it.”

“I suppose if we share what we know, we might see something we didn’t see before.”

Natasha nodded, and pulled out her phone. But of course it didn’t work, or at least, not well, screen flickering and whatnot, and the GPS was useless. She put it away, grumbling.

It wasn’t like she didn’t understand them. And as much as she wanted to blame it on men being typical men, refusing to cooperate and turning everything into a competition even if it killed them, she knew that wasn’t fair. Trusting someone else was almost always a bad idea when dealing with things like vampires, werewolves, nightmare monsters, and what have you. Still, it was easy to see why Antoinette got so frustrated.

They continued walking for a while. Spirits avoided them, especially now that they’d made a kill. They whispered to each other, alien creatures Natasha could only barely comprehend visually, and couldn’t understand verbally. The First Tongue, according to the boys. Arrogant to think it was the first language ever spoken, but it wasn’t like she could challenge it.

As they walked, Matthew and Arturo changed into wolves. Not the big, scary wolves she could have sworn came out of the Neverending Story, but normal wolves. Wolves were still utterly huge beasts, and she didn’t have to crouch to pet their backs as they walked. Petting them, their fur, their warmth, she did it automatically without thinking about it. That was good, right? It felt nice, to forget about what they did, the arguments she and Art were getting into lately, and just touch them again.

She smiled down at Matthew, and scratched behind his ears. Big, deep scratches, complete with some fingernails. He struggled to keep walking, wanting to stop and enjoy it, but he compromised by leaning his side into her. She did the same for Arturo, and the huge wolf let his tongue dangle as he panted joy.

They walked like this for a while. It felt good, to be near them again. It felt nice.

Eric and Sándor glanced back at her, said nothing, and continued on. She thought maybe they might judge her, for being nice to Matt and Art, considering what they did, but Eric and Sándor didn't seem to have that in them. Those two would probably get along well, if it weren't for how they first met. Maybe—

Everyone stopped, and looked across the street. Natasha squinted into the darkness of another alley, and sucked in a breath as a slithering motion along the asphalt pulled into the shadow.

“Let's ignore it,” Eric said. “We don't need its help.”

“It?” she asked.

“Street-Tail King.”

Oh. She gulped as she stared at the dark alley, and found her hand drifting to her sword hidden under her suit jacket. Darkness radiated from the alley, to the point it not only failed to conform to where the few lights hit the walls of the buildings around it, but also dripped out onto the sidewalk like oil.

Matt and Art changed back to human form again, and they both stared across the street, ready for a fight.

“We haven't talked to it,” Art said, “since it talked to us last time. You were there, Natasha, Eric.”

She was there, and she'd been thoroughly disturbed by it. She wasn't a werewolf, or a spirit animal or anything like that, but she could still feel how disturbing a creature Street-Tail King was. Not as powerful as Red Tide and Black Blood, but conniving and scheming. Manipulative, and smart. It'd have made a good Kindred.

“Maybe ... m-maybe we should.”

The four men looked at her.

“You—” Matt opened his mouth, but silenced himself. Wincing, he looked down before looking to Art for help. Of course, Art could only do the same, wince and squirm. They were bound, and had to do whatever she said.

But she wasn't so stupid she'd ignore their advice.

“I'll do it,” Eric said.

Art shook his head. “It'll offer the same deal as last time.”

“That's fine.”

Natasha shook her head this time. “J-Jessy won't like you ... getting involved like that.”

“I'm already involved. And Jessy will understand.”

No she wouldn't. Jessy was perfectly happy to get herself in deep water, but if Eric did, she would be pissed. Very, very pissed, and Eric knew it. The fact he was willing to face Jessy's rage to, potentially, gain information to help the city, was oddly heroic. And dumb.

“Eric,” Matt said, “Street-Tail isn't some minor spirit. It's a count. If you agree to a deal, it'll enforce it.”

“The azlu are fucking with Dolareido. Killing people. I want them gone. And if these tears really become the problem Azamel warned us they might ... yeah.”

“We can—”

“You’ve been here for two years and we’re still finding traces of azlu.” Eric walked up to Matt and looked at him, face steady. “You may want to hunt azlu cause of the Gauntlet or some bullshit, I want to hunt azlu because every person who dies in my city is—”

That apparently crossed a line. Matt stood there and took it, but Art put a hand against Eric’s chest and shoved him back.

“We care, Eric, ok? We have to have this conversation again? We care, and Avery cares. But we’ve done this longer than you, and we’ve seen what happens when we get in deep with spirits.”

“Eric,” Matt said, “spirits are tricky. It’s not going to play fair, if it can.”

The offered deal from Street-Tail King was that, if it told them why the azlu were here in Dolareido, and why so many were showing up, then they’d have to deal with the mystery, no matter what. If Street-Tail told them some ancient curse was summoning the azlu, and the only way to stop it was a suicidal sacrifice, then Street-Tail would enforce the deal.

So, the way to deal with the situation, was to talk without committing to anything. A vampire would straight up lie, but Tash didn’t think that was a good idea with spirits.

“Let’s t-talk to it,” Tash said, nodding to Eric. “Don’t say you’ll do anything, but we should talk to it. And I w-want to talk to it t-too.”

Sándor watched, half interested, but the boys looked terrified. They chewed on their lips and looked around, as if they could find something lying about that might change Natasha’s mind. It made Natasha’s heart ache, seeing how scared they were over just the possibility Natasha might get hurt.

“Alright,” Eric said, before looking at the boys. “Don’t worry guys, whatever deal I’m making, it’s just between me and Street-Tail.”

The boys didn’t look consoled, but they eventually sighed and nodded, and followed after Natasha and Eric. Sándor followed behind, eyes scanning the sky. The man was a gargoyle. It made sense he’d keep his eyes up and looking at the perches and stuff, if he lived up there, constantly looking around for prey and whatnot. How much exposure did he have to the Hisil? Begotten could get around anywhere as long as they found tunnels, or created their own to places they’d been before. Plus, he was super old. He probably knew more about spirits than he let on, probably even more than the boys, but would rather not say anything.

But he did come with full intent to help them. Maybe he’d say something, eventually.

The approach to Street-Tail King felt considerably scarier without Avery and the whole pack. It was really, really tall, as tall as Matthew when he was in his werewolf form. She tried to pierce the darkness around the spirit with her special Auspex, but it didn’t work. Whatever it was that radiated around the tall spirit, it wasn’t normal darkness, but as they got closer, she could see its silhouette, and its great height.

“No Avery?” it hissed, and it chattered its teeth a few times, sending a disgusting shiver up Natasha’s spine. Rats could be quite cute. Street-Tail King was not.

“No Avery,” Eric said.

“Or Flowing Sanctuary, I see.” The huge rat creature took a step forward, and Natasha froze. Light from the streetlights cut across its body, and she looked it up and down, taking in the strange form. Wererat, but not really. It could have been a wererat, a ten-foot-tall monster, but there was asphalt in its fur growing out of its body, along with bits of metal, some rebar sticking out of its huge shoulders and hunched back, and of course, a long tail that looked like a big strip of road, broken and crumbling.

Worse, were the rats. Bloody brown and black things that didn't look fully formed, some of them even hovered slightly, and dozens of them scurried up and down Street-Tail King's body. Like, a mother spider carrying her children on her back, except a giant rat walking on two legs. Nightmare fuel.

"You killed Needle Swords," the spirit said.

"I did."

"Who gave you the right?"

Eric growled, a very wolfish growl despite his human form. "I'm Uratha, that's my right. Needle Swords was yours?"

"It was."

"Wanna tell me what the fuck you were doing letting that freak affect my side of the Gauntlet so much?" Eric took a step closer to the huge rat, and glared up at him. He took affronts to Dolareido personally, which would forever make Natasha smile. He'd only been alive a bit over thirty years? He acted like he was Antoinette, thinking the city was hers. It was cute.

"We go where there is essence, Uratha. It's not our fault if the humans make it worse." The enormous rat shrugged, and licked one of its fangs with a long tongue. "Maybe if you didn't deny us the physical world, we—"

Art shook his head. "Not happening. You know your place, spirit. Don't push it."

The rat smiled, a strange thing to see on a rat face, and tapped a claw against the large front teeth of a rodent.

“That will change soon enough.”

Tash raised a brow, and looked back to the boys. But they also looked confused, and glanced between each other, and even Sándor, before looking back at the spirit. They wanted to ask questions, but they also knew better than to do so, not when every question got them in deeper with the spirit.

“Street-T-T-Tail King,” Natasha said, gulping once as she looked up at the spirit. Beady black eyes caught the streetlights, but there was none of the curiosity she might find in normal rat eyes. This thing was insidious. “We w-w-wanted to ... t-talk about the deal you offered Avery.” A shared glance between her and Eric confirmed, he wanted to do this.

The rat cackled. “I knew you would. One of you damn dogs would, eventually. Just can’t help yourselves. Gotta settle affairs, right? Gotta deal with the shartha.”

“Shartha?”

“Hosts,” Matt said. “Azlu, and some others.”

“Right, right,” the rat creature said. “There’s no beshilu here, or razilu or srizaku, but there are azlu. And more come.”

All three werewolves growled. Apparently the spirit said trigger words.

“B-Before we make any deals, we need some assurances.”

“That’s not how deals work, little Kindred. Buyer beware!”

She glared up at the monster. “You’re not a human s-selling stuff! I want to know more about the deal.”

The rat laughed, but didn't retort this time. Blobby rat spirits crawled down its back and disappeared into the darkness of the alley, but more emerged, hidden in the thick fur of their master.

"I don't have to answer anything."

"You will," Eric said, "if you want anyone to take the deal."

Natasha nodded. "Yeah, so tell us! Tell us if ... if it's p-possible. If you tell us why the azlu are here, why more are coming, and how to stop—"

"I did not say I knew how to stop them ... though I suppose I do, in a way."

"And it's p-possible?"

"Yes, it is. At the end of this mystery, you'll be able to do something." The rat laughed again. "I know what you ask and why, and I'll be generous and tell you! Because I want them gone, too. The mystery can be solved. The azlu can be dealt with. And if you are powerful, skilled, and careful, no one need die. But time grows short."

Eric looked to the others, but all they could do was shrug. It sounded like a good deal then, on the surface. It wouldn't be of course, but if they could make it work, then some information was worth the risk. Eric knew that, and was willing to get in deep with a 'count' to get in.

Jessy was going to be livid.

"Alright Street-Tail King, I'll play," Eric said. "You tell me why the azlu are coming to Dolareido and killing people, and I'll follow that mystery to the end, no matter what."

With a hissing chuckle, Street-Tail King held out a hand. A rat hand, complete with long claws, and a deadly aura even Natasha could sense.

---

~~Eric~~

He should have known it wouldn't just be a trade of words. Much as Eric had been spending the past few months getting intimately familiar with the Hisil, he wasn't too familiar with how spirits functioned outside of what they ate. Spirits did deals and trades, to the point it was existential for them. How spirits managed to seal deals between them, he didn't know, but it was probably just as existential for them to satisfy any deal they'd agreed to as much as it was to make them in the first place. Spirits going back on deals probably wasn't a thing, or was damn rare.

An Uratha going back on a deal though, was probably possible, and would have nasty repercussions. But a smart, scheming spirit like Street-Tail King would have a way to make it a safe deal, for it.

Eric reached out for the hand, knowing damn well it'd be a binding contract, like signing a deal with the devil, but before he could touch the strange spirit, Sándor pushed his hand down.

“Hey!” the rat hissed. “Do not interfere, Begotten beast!”

Eric blinked at Sándor a few times, but the man's solid, hard expression stopped him cold.

“The spirit is just desperate to get its claws into you. It knows we're already on the path to dealing with the azlu, and it wants to gain something from it first.”

“I know that, but—”

Sándor shook his head. “Don’t play into its games, Eric. Avery was right.”

That was most definitely not something Eric wanted to hear, but something about the way the man said it didn’t stir a reflexive need to fight him on it. With Avery, sure, first word out of her mouth and Eric wanted to tell her to fuck off. But with Sándor, the man dripped of plain, almost boring honesty. It’d be like getting mad at a tutor for correcting his algebra; not that he’d ever had one.

“You really think we’ll find out why the azlu keep coming here?”

“Yes, I think we will. Maybe not from this,” the Begotten gestured to the rat, “but we will. And ... I’d prefer to keep Dolareido healthy and alive in the mean time. That includes you.”

Eric blinked at the man, several times. But slowly as they looked at each other, things clicked into place. Something had happened to Sándor, something that attached him to Dolareido in a way Eric hadn’t expected from the relative newcomer. Maybe it was Azamel, maybe not, but the man wasn’t the closed off statue he was back at the ball.

Sándor wanted to keep Dolareido safe, and he considered people like Eric to be Dolareido. And Eric could understand that. Maybe he should think about the nightmare monster the same way? Hard to do, when Eric’s first encounter with the man had been beyond violent. Plus, Sándor had literally entered his mind against his will, his dreams. Hard to ignore that. But he should.

“If you d-don’t think it’s a good idea,” Natasha said, looking up at Sándor, “then ... then I think we should listen to him, Eric. He’s older than any of us.”

Older didn’t mean wiser. But, it often did.

“Alright,” Eric said, taking a step back from the spirit. “Alright, let’s do this on our own.”

Sándor nodded. “In the future, don’t be so quick to risk your own life.”

“Yeah I know. I just...”

“Finally found something you wanna fight for?” Art said, smirking. “It’s like a coming of age story ... for a dude in his thirties.”

Eric bit back a sudden desire to spit venom at the asshole. But it wasn’t like he was wrong. He was the odd man out in this world, relatively new to all this paranormal shit, and just trying to figure out how, and what, and why.

“Besides,” Art continued, “I think Street-Tail King is going to point us in the right direction anyway.” The fellow Uratha grew a serpentine grin, and a glance Natasha’s way showed she was looking up at her boyfriend with a similar grin. Apparently Art had come to some sort of sneaky conclusion.

Street-Tail hissed. “Ha! Why would I do that? Stupid Uratha.”

Shaking his head, Art came closer to the spirit. “Because we’re not Avery, and we’re not Flow. We know you have beef with her.”

The rat hissed and took a step back. Not to get away from Arturo; seemed like the rat might be able to take him a straight fight. But instead to get away from the words he was speaking.

“Not with Flow. I know not the river guardian. But Avery, she...” The rat hissed and slammed its tail in the darkness behind it. It was loud, and heavy. “You’re Avery’s pack. I won’t help you. Interloper. Trade, yes. Help? No.”

Street-Tail King had a problem with Avery; probably from when she'd been with Simon. And it probably thought Eric was with Avery, considering how much Eric had already interacted with him and her pack.

"I don't care about Avery," Eric said. "I'm not part of her pack. Neither is Natasha." Might as well include her, since the rat saw her with Avery that one time. "Avery is a pain in our asses, too."

Street-Tail King snorted, only its beady black eyes visible as they caught the light.

"You bring two of hers I know belong in her choir."

Natasha raised a quick hand. "They're w-w-working for me. Bound, by ... a debt to me."

Eric suppressed his grin as he looked down at the little vampire. Smart woman, speaking a language the spirit would understand: economics.

"Does the Kindred speak truly?"

Matt and Art both sighed, and nodded.

"See?" Natasha said with a tiny smile. "I've lived in this city my whole life too, j-just like Eric. Avery isn't our friend. W-We're not here to do ... Uratha things. We're here because Dolareido is in danger. And ... and you care about Dolareido, don't you? I bet you grew up here, or ... or whatever it is spirits d-do, and ... and you're a part of this city."

Silence. But after a few moments, the rat's tail shifted over the asphalt of the alley.

"I do not like Avery."

“Me neither,” Eric said.

“Me neither,” Natasha said.

They looked to Sándor, but the man managed only a tiny shrug before stepping back. They looked to Art and Matt, and both boys groaned and looked away. They might have thought Avery was mean, but they still liked her. And considering they were her pack and had worked with her and under her for a bunch of years, that was understandable. The rest of them, though? Yeah, Avery was a bitch.

“Very well,” the rat said, and it gnashed its teeth a few times. “You do not lie?”

Tash put up her hands. “No lie.”

“Tssh. The word of a Kindred means little. You.” The rat pointed its eyes at Eric. “I can smell the city on you, in your flesh and bones. You’re a part of Dolareido. You swear you are helping Dolareido, and not just serving Avery?”

“I swear. Not that that means much.”

“It means more than it would coming from Avery’s pups.” The rat nodded from the darkness, smile returning and exposing pointed teeth. “I suspect you all know Black Blood is behind the tears.”

Matt, Art, and Natasha winced. Eric and Sándor frowned at each other. None of them wanted Black Blood as an enemy, but if these tears were a problem, then it certainly seemed like it was going in that direction.

“The tears wouldn’t explain the azlu,” Art said. “Not like this, not this ... cooperation, and multiple azlu showing up. Powerful spirits tearing holes through the Gauntlet isn’t unusual either, and sure that sometimes attracts azlu attention since they want to strengthen the Gauntlet, but—”

“The azlu,” the rat said, “can sense what’s happening. They’re here, desperate to strengthen the Gauntlet, driven by their stupid instinct with overpowering need, because they can sense what’s coming.”

They all looked between each other again. That sounded ominous. That sounded stupidly over dramatic, and ominous, and the longer Eric spent as an Uratha, the more the stupid, crazy-sounding shit came true. If it sounded insane and ominous, it was probably very real.

“And ... that is?” Eric asked.

“Minerva’s legacy.”

---

“No wonder Jacob despises her,” Sándor said.

They all nodded, wincing with every step. The situation had just gone from bad to shitty, and Eric and Sándor didn’t really know the details. Natasha filled in what she could.

“It was t-ten years before my time,” she said. “Before my embrace. But, everyone knows about it, about Simon the werewolf. So everyone ... d-dances around the subject, about Avery and Jacob.”

“She hasn’t told us everything either,” Art said. “Her pack got wiped out, after Simon left Dolareido. Only she survived. She met Flow when the spirit was just a tiny thing, barely awakened. Flow saved her life.” Sighing, Art sat down on a bench. It was almost comical, seeing the big guy sit on a bench in such a strange place, especially considering the bench was warped and uneven. “We only know a little about Minerva, and even that Avery doesn’t like us talking about much. We normally feign ignorance about it.”

Sándor shook his head. “I think we’re passed that now, don’t you think?” He didn’t sit down, but he took a stand beside the bench, and looked out to the street as they talked. Keeping watch. “If we can trust the spirit...”

“Spirits can lie,” Matt said, sitting with Art, voice hushed. “It’s rare. They prefer to do trades, you know? Everything has to be a trade, and if you’re caught lying, your credibility is shot.”

That made sense. Spirits weren’t humans. They didn’t have internal struggles of consciousness, and were much, much better at understanding other spirits upfront. It’d be like asking wild animals to lie to each other. Sure, animals tricked each other with their natures, but outright lying? Conscious deception with words? No, spirits could usually be trusted, even the manipulative, deceptive ones like Street-Tail King, who’d twist their words into half truths by their nature.

But they could lie, and that was important.

Sighing, Art leaned forward and set his elbows on his knees, heavy. “Natasha, cloak us please.” Heavy words, with zero of his usual flirtatious charm used on her.

Natasha did so, and as she did, an aura radiated from Arturo. It wasn’t the Cloak, something a vampire could do to make people effectively invisible. But it was something, like a prowling animal using brush to be unseen, despite them being in full view. It didn’t extend past himself, but if Arturo wanted to talk about sensitive stuff, it made sense to double down on stealth.

“I’ll tell you what I know,” Arturo said. “But I don’t know much. Avery doesn’t tell us much about what Minerva was doing, because it’s dangerous. She’s told Clara a little more, but...” Shaking his head, he put a finger to his lips. “Don’t repeat anything I say about Minerva specifically. I’m saying these words, no one else does, and keep it that way until we’re out of the Hisil, understood?” Everyone nodded, though Eric noticed Sándor's lack of expression. Arturo's words didn't mean much to him, even if he wasn't the sort to stir the pot.

Arturo nodded. "Simon and his pack killed Minerva because she was looking for a way to tear down the Gauntlet."

Everyone winced. It was quickly becoming a habit.

"Tear it down?" Natasha said. "I ... I know she—"

"Minerva wanted to punch a hole in the Gauntlet, so she could communicate with spirits regularly; everyone familiar with Minerva already knew that. The damage she was going to inflict, on the other hand ... We doubt anyone understood just how much she was going to fuck shit up.

"The Ordo Dracul and the Circle of the Crone get into that shit all the time with their experiments and rituals. Minerva worked with both of them. She was friends ... lovers, with Jacob, and got her hands dirty in that business. She was good friends with the Prince too, and was a part of Antoinette's experiments with ephemera."

"Antoinette experiments with ephemera?" Eric asked.

"Yeah. It was a big contention point between her and Simon. We don't like vampires experimenting with ephemera because they're playing with fire. Things like the azlu show up and start killing people. Worse, they sew up the Gauntlet, strengthening it in their mindless pursuit of instinct, to the point they'd kill an area. If the Hisil and Gurihal are completely blocked from each other, the area becomes a wasteland of nothing, devoid of life. There's a balance to strike, and that's what Uratha do."

Matt raised a finger. "Other hosts do different things. Beshilu, rat hosts, gnaw at the Gauntlet and destroy it. Kinda like the tears we've been finding. But we've found no beshilu."

“Azlu though, more have come. We’re finding traces of the fucking spiders, and ... and we’re not sure why.” Sighing again, Art sank his fingers into his knees as he looked down. “Minerva wanted to reach across the Gauntlet, and eventually tear it down. She thought the separation between the physical and shadow was ... bad.” Natasha opened her mouth, but Art put up his hands. “It’s not debatable, Tash. It’d be bad. People would die or suffer, by the billions.”

“B-But ... did she want to tear down the Gauntlet everywhere?”

“We don’t know. Probably not. Maybe she only wanted to do it in a small area. But it wasn’t a risk Simon and Avery were willing to make. And ... and when Avery found out she wasn’t just researching how to do this, but had figured it out, they stopped her.”

Natasha’s jaw dropped. “She found a way t-to open a portal?”

“No. Portals exists. Doorways. Verges. They open and close, and sure, we hate that they exist, but they’re manageable. They can be stable or unstable, but unstable ones usually just collapse and fade. What Minerva was doing was more like ... tearing things apart at the seams. If she succeeded, she’d have created a permanent hole, and it would have damaged the Gauntlet around it. Simon was convinced the seams would keep tearing, and ... and it’d spread, like a hole in old clothes, you know?”

Natasha and Sándor might not have felt the horribleness that statement implied, but Matt, Art, and Eric all shivered. Ice ran up Eric’s back, and his breath caught in his throat. It wasn’t a human fear, like a fear of death or pain, of hunger or anything like that. The spirit wolf in him was fucking terrified of the idea of the Gauntlet disappearing, in a way he couldn’t express with words. It was ingrained into him, like instinct. The Gauntlet was existential for Uratha, and as alien an idea as it was, he couldn’t deny it. The fear grabbed him and continued to jolt up and down his spine until it sickened him.

If the Gauntlet disappeared, billions would die, but it'd be worse than that. Spirit and flesh, everywhere. Things like hosts, azlu turning human bodies into giant spider monsters, would be common. Possessed people, possessed objects, spirits would have free reign to indulge physical pleasures until they were satisfied. Existence itself would become chaos.

“... that's heavy,” Eric said eventually.

Matt and Art smiled at him. They knew how much he'd dumbed down his thoughts to say that.

“I ... I can understand Avery n-now, I guess,” Tash said. “D-D ... Does Jacob know this?”

“He knows Avery killed Minerva because she was fucking with the Gauntlet. He doesn't know about the damage Minerva might have caused. He doesn't know Minerva was on track to screw over everyone and everything. He doesn't know his lover ... had found a way. He doesn't know, because if he knew it was possible, he might just try and do it.”

Eric gulped. Good god. “You're sure she figured out a way to do it?”

“Avery thinks so. Simon thought so. Avery won't tell me about it, but I can only assume it was some ritual.”

Sándor managed a small frown, but it was gone a second later. “So instead of pursuing more information about Jacob, and his accomplice Black Blood, you harassed Maria?” Ok, the man's face still didn't frown, but his voice certainly did, and it shocked everyone. Strange to hear anger coming from him.

“We didn’t know these new tears attracting the azlu had anything to do with Minerva,” Art said. “We thought maybe it was just Black Blood or Red Tide, or even Street-Tail overstepping themselves. What we do know, is there are spirits here talking about Maria, and about crossing the barrier. These spirits also hang around some of the tears we’ve found. We also know some of these tears rip more than just a hole from the Hisil to the Gurihal and back. Some go to other realms too, which was never Minerva’s plan, far as we know.”

“Right,” Matt said. “You went through one that went to somewhere else, didn’t you?” The big guy gestured to Eric and Sándor.

The Begotten nodded. “We did. A land of ghosts. I’ve seen it before in my travels, but I avoid it. All living creatures do.”

“And,” Art said, “the one we’re checking out tonight goes somewhere else.” They all opened their mouths, but Art put up his hands. “We don’t know where it goes. We couldn’t get a close look. There were blood wraiths everywhere. We want to get closer, but we’ll need a distraction.”

“You couldn’t do that before?” Sándor asked. “There’s less of us now than there’d be if your entire pack found this before.”

“We were injured. Jack kicked in our teeth. Avery planned to investigate it once we were all healed up, but even then, it’s tricky. The red wraiths are connected to Black Blood, and they might be part of its choir. If we piss them off, we might piss Black Blood off, and we still don’t know what its banes and bans are. Still don’t know how much control of the city Black Blood has.”

“Avery wants us to be careful,” Matt said. “She ... she really wants to avoid the same situation Simon created with the vampires.”

“Then explain M-Maria.” Folding her arms across her chest, Natasha glared at both of Avery’s pack members, eyes turning into little daggers. Damn, cold. Ice cold.

The two boys sighed as they looked down.

“Black Blood deals in death,” Art said eventually. “And the dead. Maria lost her lover Lucas. These blood wraiths we know are connected to Black Blood have been caught saying Maria’s name. You heard them yourself, Tash.”

“I—”

“And when we went to investigate Maria’s den, we didn’t go in swinging. We demanded to see what she was up to, and she refused. If she’d just let us—”

“You would have violated her privacy! And—”

“If we didn’t act, and it turned out she was behind all this, the Gauntlet could be gone, Tash! Things would have—”

“B-But you didn’t know, and you made things worse! You c-could have—”

Sándor stepped between them, face solid and unmoved. “Later. For now, we’re here to get a peek at this tear. And from what I’m hearing, we have two options. Distract any nearby red wraiths, or dispose of them.”

“I’ve seen these wraiths,” Eric said. “Hovering freaks with giant claws? Obsessed with flesh?” That was weird, even by spirit standards. The only way spirits could awaken with a hunger for that, was if there was a lot of that in the physical world. And sure, Dolareido had its share of blood and flesh, but statistically, it was less violent than other big cities.

Unless Black Blood was involved, and had created the essence gatherings that formed the wraiths. Maybe they were part of its choir.

“We need information,” Eric said. “Recap. According to you, Art, everyone who knew Minerva closely also knew she was trying to punch a hole in the Gauntlet. Like you said, there are portals and verges and gateways through the Gauntlet already, in Dolareido and in other cities I’m sure. But you’re telling us that what Minerva didn’t tell anyone, was that what she was doing was quite literally capable of damaging the Gauntlet in a real way, like, so it might ... all come crumbling down?”

Arturo nodded. “Avery told us that she told Minerva about what would happen, toward the end, but Minerva didn’t listen. She either already knew, didn’t believe her, or didn’t care.”

“And Jacob doesn’t know this.”

The boys shook their heads.

“Well, shit.” That’d make any interaction with the deadly-as-fuck elder a pain in the ass. “And you’re also saying only Avery herself knows exactly what Minerva was doing to threaten the Gauntlet, what ritual she was doing.”

“Yeah,” Art said. “But whatever she was doing, it didn’t involve tears, far as we know. Avery would have said something by now.”

Natasha raised a hand. “Or Minerva hadn’t gotten to that p-point yet where she’d need them.”

Eric nodded to the little vampire. “So the only reason we have to think these tears have anything to do with Minerva, is what Street-Tail King, a scheming, dirty, underhanded spirit told us. The spirits we’ve found around these tears are, instead, talking about Maria, and...”

“And finishing a ritual,” Matt said.

“A ritual.” Eric groaned and looked down the road and where it led to the edge of the city. “I can understand why you thought it was Maria.”

Natasha sighed, but slowly nodded. “M-Maybe, back then. But we know more now. A new tear was created while Maria was healing. And Jack has t-told me that he knows for sure Black Blood is connected to these tears. It’s connected to Jacob, but I don’t think it’s connected t-t-to Maria.”

“Which means,” Sándor said, “we have to consider that Black Blood is chasing Minerva’s legacy. Which, I think is safe to say, a bad thing. And it also means anything we do to put a stop to it, is going up against Black Blood.”

“And maybe Jacob,” Art said, “if the vampire is helping it. I ... christ, if Jacob’s trying to do what Minerva was doing...”

Black Blood, a spirit so strong it was basically a god, was a deadly threat, but an obvious one. Jacob was sneaky, and the worst enemy they could have asked for.

Natasha hugged herself as she looked down. “If Jacob...” Earlier frustration wiped away, she sat between her two boyfriends on the bench, and leaned into Art’s side. “No w-w-wonder Street-Tail King wanted to make a deal, to force anyone who knows the truth t-to ... make sure it gets dealt with, no matter what. Oh, oh god! What about Samantha, and J-Jack! What about—”

Sándor shook his head. “We don’t know anything for sure yet. The word of a spirit is usually good, but Street-Tail King seems to embody a lot of Dolareido’s dirty aspects. Lying could be included. For now, let’s focus on the goal, checking out this new tear.”

He didn’t sound convinced.

---

The closer they got to the tear, the fewer spirits they ran into. Most spirits hung out in the more densely populated areas, wherever there was the most human activity on the other side of the Gauntlet. That meant the entertainment district with its high rise apartment buildings and hotels, jammed to the gills with residents and tourists alike. Out here toward the edge of Devil's Corner, there wasn't much activity.

Considering the edge of the city led out to a rocky desert, it was a perfect place for someone to do something they didn't want others to interfere with.

Natasha sighed, eyes still down on the sidewalk as they walked. She was a thinker. Eric was too, he supposed, but not like her, a forward thinker trying to solve problems. It was a good thing she was in charge of this adventure.

"If Jacob is helping Black Blood, I can't imagine he wants to d-destroy everything," she said. "He can't know!"

"That makes things worse," Art said. "If he knows, then our goal is clear: kill Jacob. And the Prince would help with that. If he doesn't know, then it gets more complicated. We'll have to convince him, and he hates our guts."

Natasha sighed louder and hugged herself as they walked. "Poor Samantha."

"If the man is intelligent," Sándor said, "he can be reasoned with."

Eric said nothing. He knew even a smart man can do stupid things, but they all knew that too. No point in saying it. And he was happier keeping his mouth shut.

"What if Jacob's not involved at all?" Matt said. "Black Blood could be doing this on its own. And even then, Black Blood might not know the damage it's going to cause."

Art shuddered. “If this is Black Blood’s goal, then ... then I don’t know what to do. I doubt we could beat it in a fight. Best we could hope is to find its bane, or somehow prevent it from being able to do the ritual, permanently.”

“Worthy goals,” Sándor said. “But for now, let’s focus on making sure this ritual, or whatever it is, doesn’t happen. Easier to do that, than fight Black Blood straight on.”

Everyone nodded. All this planning and speculating was pointless if they couldn’t deal with the immediate issue.

“M-Maybe Street-Tail King knows more?” Natasha asked. “It seems p ... p-pretty convinced that these tears are being made to try and do whatever Minerva was doing. How did it find out?”

Arturo shrugged. “It’s a sneaky bastard. If it didn’t want to be found, we wouldn’t be able to find it. You saw Red Tide, and you’ve seen Black Blood. Street-Tail wouldn’t be able to take any of them in a straight fight, but it still manages to fight for power in Dolareido. And it does it by being a really sneaky fucker.”

Eric had seen Red Tide from a distance once. Fighting that would be like fighting a ship-destroying kraken. No thanks.

Natasha looked up at Art. “But?”

“But, sneaky as it is, Red Tide and Black Blood are older, and an order of magnitude stronger. The fact Street-Tail learned what it did is surprising. I’m surprised it knew what little it did.” Art mirrored Natasha, rubbing his arms a few times, like he was cold. “Dolareido is a big place, a huge, dense city, with millions of people. The spirits here are powerful, with massive choirs. I’m sure Street-Tail King has been up to some crazy stuff for decades, so has Red Tide and Black Blood, and a lot of that stuff probably enters the ‘deadly as all fuck’ category. But this ... this is a step up. Street-Tail King put its life on the line, telling us anything.”

He was right, of course. The spirits had their own world in the Hisil, with objectives that had nothing to do with the physical world. They fought each other, made deals, alliances, started wars, and did all they could to spread their influence. That was the key, the driving force behind their actions, spreading influence. And for spirits, that meant spreading their very manifestation. Getting to the physical world was a way for them to do that, and experience pleasures only the physical world provided.

Sometimes Eric thought of them as mindless animals, slaves to their instincts. They weren't.

“We're almost there,” Matt said. “Let's get higher. Tash, keep us cloaked as best you can.”

A minute later, they were on the rooftops. No need to climb, there were fire escapes.

Natasha was an impressive little vampire. It was easy to think she was weak because of her size, but a cursory understanding of the paranormal world made that irrelevant. It was her attitude that made it easy to underestimate her, her meekness. But the truth was, the girl was really good. After dealing with a few vampires, some around Natasha's age, Eric had built an understanding of their capabilities, and Natasha defied them. Her, Jessy, Damien, and of course Jack, all of who were or had been Right Hands. No wonder.

She kept them wrapped in her Cloak, so any spirits that looked their way wouldn't see them. Arturo did his own thing, blending into the night shadows in a way that had all of them struggling to see him, even with him right next to them. Eric doubted either would be able to keep Street-Tail, Red Tide, or Black Blood from being able to see them, at least not when close. But from a distance? They should be good. Should be.

The last building at the edge of the city held a convenience store and some shitty apartments above it. The road kept on and on though, asphalt disappearing behind the low hills of the desert. Maybe a quarter mile down the road, there was a gas station. And around the gas station, was a dozen blood wraiths, drifting around, massive claws dangling from long black arms underneath their smoky, dripping torsos of red and black, colors flowing like wet ink. No legs, just black and red smoke.

Above the gas station building, maybe five feet over its flat roof, was a tear. Straight out of a SciFi or something, it genuinely looked like a tear in reality, as if someone or something had dragged a claw along the air and cut through it to something behind it. As if the air was a curtain hiding something, and someone had taken a knife to it. As if ... a whole bunch of dumb metaphors that couldn't quite get across what they were looking at.

But it was something they'd seen before, all of them. And just like the one in the hospital, it looked frayed at the edges, like it really had damaged the material around it.

The group crouched at the edge of the building. Natasha squinted like a squirrel, either from trying to see the tear from a distance, or from how she had to focus to keep them all wrapped in her Cloak. Thankfully they'd brought some binoculars, and Eric took a peek.

"It's different than the verges," Matt said. "The other portals in the city, old and closed, you know? Jack came through one of them once, with Fiona and Damien. We checked it out. But it was old and stable. These new ones are ... well," he gestured to the tear in the distance, "not stable."

"So those azlu creatures are drawn to them?" Sándor asked. "Because they want to seal the tears?"

"Yeah, but we don't know why so many keep coming. Azlu want to block off the Gauntlet. They would see a hole and go to work on it like beavers. But it's really weird for multiple azlu to show up at the same time. Unless they can sense something we don't."

“How did they develop such an instinct?”

“A question for Father Wolf,” Art said, body a subtle blur of shadow beside them. “But you’ll have to go back in time a ways to talk to him.”

“How far?” The Begotten almost sounded serious.

“No idea. Ten thousand years? A million?”

“Quite the range.”

“Yeah well, none of us know for sure what happened to our ancestor, or if he even existed. But Luna holds us responsible. If you wanna know, ask her.”

Eric handed the binoculars to Sándor, sneaking a glance to Art as he did. If Luna didn’t talk to them, but talked to him, maybe he could ask? Then again, asking a supposed deity about the death of her supposed mate, was probably a great way to get smote.

“We don’t know,” Matt said, “how the hosts learned to do what they do. Might as well ask a normal spider how it learns to spin a web. There’s probably an answer, but best we can guess is instinct.”

“The instinct of a monster,” Sándor said. “A terrifying proposition.” After few moments of silence as they all absorbed what the nightmare monster said, Sándor lowered the binoculars, squinted, and looked again. “I ... don’t know what’s through that tear.”

Matthew shrugged. “We don’t either. We thought the tears always went between the physical and shadow halves, but then you guys found that tear in your nightmare room ... place ... thing, the one that went to that place with all the ghosts.”

“I’ve seen that ghost realm, long ago. I avoided it, but I’ve seen it. I’ve seen other realms connected to ours, as well. Dreams, nightmares, the spirits, the dead, but other things too. Odd creatures, and...” Sándor lowered the binoculars, and handed them to Matthew, without ever moving his eyes off the tear. Whatever he saw stunned him. “I don’t recognize what I see through that tear.”

“Is that ... bad?” Natasha asked.

With a heavy groan, Sándor tore his eyes away from the gas station, and looked each of them in the eyes. “I’ve seen the bright place, where nightmares cannot go. My horror cannot go where the Dark Mother doesn’t allow, but at least it understood what we saw through those woods and into the shining light of the bright place. But I’ve also seen across chasms between realms into ... into things I can’t understand. This tear reminds of that, of staring across a ... colossal emptiness, into things I can’t fathom, or reach.”

Mister stoic was also apparently a poet. And good with ghost stories, because despite his steady tone, everyone stared at him like he was describing their inevitable deaths to some deadly poltergeist.

“Begotten really get to realm hop, don’t they?” Matt said.

The Begotten nodded. “If I’ve been there, I can find a way to tunnel back there from my lair. If I’ve found a doorway, I can open it, no matter who has created it. I’ve opened some strange doors in my long life, made by strange entities. I say this so you know I’ve seen a lot of things, and...” He sighed again and gestured back toward the tear. “I don’t know.”

“How much longer till sunrise?” Eric asked.

“An hour,” Natasha said. “I’d prefer more time. Maybe ... m-maybe we should retreat? There’s m-more of those wraiths here than you’d thought there’d be, right?” She gestured to the boys, and they nodded. “We’ve learned a lot tonight. A lot ... lot lot lot. I...”

“Have to talk to the Prince.” Art nodded, and pat Natasha on the shoulder. “And we have to talk to Avery.”

Eric raised a hand. “Avery’s going to freak out that you told us about Minerva.”

“Yes,” Sándor said, “and so will the Prince, after a fashion.”

The little vampire nodded, looked down, and frowned. “It’s ... it’s such bad t-timing. The Invictus and Carthians are fighting, and it’s only going to get worse, and the P-P-Prince is...”

“Let those vamps do their thing,” Art said, “and we’ll take care of this. We have to take care of this.”

Matthew shook his head. “But if Avery pisses off those wraiths, Black Blood will get involved. We’re still not sure what its bans are. We think it can’t interfere with us if we don’t interfere directly with it, but we don’t know for sure. And we still don’t know what its banes are, either. No idea how to hurt it.”

“Then we’ll have to do this the sneaky way,” Art said, grinning.

Matt returned the grin, nodding. “Sneaky.”

Eric looked between the two men as they nodded to each other, and the glance between them spoke a million words. The two of them were so in sync with each other, it was like looking at one person. In that one glance between them, they shared a million ideas, a million plans and failures, and a million conversations. No wonder they were comfortable in their relationship with Natasha.

“Alright,” Natasha said. “Let’s head back. W-We can make a plan, and get a better look at that tear another night. And see if we can do it without B-B ... Black Blood catching us.”

Catching us, and killing us, Eric thought.

~~Antoinette~~

Within one of the changing rooms of Antoinette's tower, the elder delighted in one of her greatest guilty pleasures: playing dress up with another.

It almost surprised Antoinette, how little effort it required to convince her childe to try on the new dress. She knew better than to call attention to the behavior; the perfect way to make anyone stop a new, desired behavior, was to call attention to it. But still, Antoinette found herself smiling as her childe slipped the fishnet top over her head.

"I feel naked."

"And you look naked. Well, nearly."

Samantha squirmed and wriggled like a worm on a hook, and adjusted the black bikini top underneath the fishnet top. Again. It was a tiny thing, barely enough to cover her nipples, and considering it was latex, it reflected light beautifully. No doubt it would draw wandering eyes, as intended.

"Isn't this Jessy's shirt?"

"Of course not. Though, I have seen the Gangrel wear such clothes before. Brazen and blatant, are they not?"

Samantha frowned as she looked down at herself, at the high hip thong and tiny latex skirt, the fishnet stockings, and the top. "I look like I should be going to a rave, or m-maybe star in an action film where I wear sunglasses all the time. It's like ... if I wanted to use my boobs as a weapon, this is how I'd dress them."

Antoinette chuckled. "Ah yes, to empower your décolletage with the ability to kill. Such is the purpose of these clothes."

“I meant more like, how I literally look like a super villain or something.”

“Perhaps to you. To me, you look like a young woman from the eighties who spends her nights going to public, dangerous gatherings and hunting for thrills.”

Samantha giggled and spun around in front of the tall mirror a few times, trying to catch a glimpse of her reflection. Of course there were more mirrors about, with tri-sections surrounding her to let her see all of herself, and she grinned as she looked herself up and down, front and behind.

“I was never that kinda girl, you know?”

“Oui, but I have a sneaking suspicion you wished you had been. And with Dolareido’s infinite pleasures so close, I am surprised you did not taste them.”

“I met James when I was pretty young. And sure, we did some crazy stuff, but ... not crazy by Dolareido standards.”

“I assume that has been changing, with your growing relationship with Jacob?”

After a mischievous grin, Samantha paused in front of the mirror, and looked herself up and down several more times, confidence building in her expression. She also wore several silver bracelets and a necklace to match the black ensemble, along with heels; not the usual necklace she wore, not tonight. The dress was loud, as was all fashion from the eighties, and perfect for their mission for the night.

“I think you’re right. Jacob’s been, uh ... still helping me find ways to enjoy myself. Him, and the others.”

Antoinette, standing on the other side of the changing room and before her own array of mirrors, held a long dress of black against her naked body as she peeked over her shoulder at her childe.

“You tempt me to ask of Othello.”

“Oh god, Othello, him and Madison are—”

“Non non, do not tell me, childe. I am delighted that you have awakened to sexual bliss, but some things will lose their allure if you share them openly.”

“But, you always wanted to know everything I was up to? Especially the sexy stuff.”

Nodding, Antoinette let the black dress fall over her head. It was barely more than a few strips of fabric, with an open back and a cross over her breasts, loose strips that only decades of practice allowed her to walk in without exposing herself.

“I did, and do. But you must admit some pleasures are pleasurable because of how taboo they are, non? In the future, many years from now, such things will no longer be dark, dirty little secrets, and you may find yourself chasing the indescribable bliss of indulging such carnal sins, bliss you can only experience when knowing full well the acts are taboo. Chasing, but never again quite able to find.”

Antoinette rejoined her childe and stood behind her, looking the reflection up and down and admiring her choice of fashion. Samantha thought she looked like a villainess or femme fatale, and while Antoinette would not have used such descriptors, it fit, in a strange, naive way. Perhaps in the future, Samantha would feel more comfortably actively dressing to look, as Jessy would no doubt put it, a ‘slut in heat’, but for now, she would entertain the silly woman’s delightful flights of fancy.

“Therefore,” she continued, “if you have been indulging, perhaps ... some rather indecent acts with Jacob and the Circle, I would say to keep it secret, for now. If, say, you have experienced a rather joyous time with both Othello and Jacob filling your body with theirs,” she leaned down until her chin was over her childe’s shoulder, so she could look her in the eyes through the mirror’s reflection, “I would advise to keep it to yourself, for now. If you have ever found yourself with both of them inside you, together, while perhaps that infuriating Jennifer and intriguing Beatrice touched you, an act of pure obscene indecency, I would advise you to keep it to yourself ... for now.”

Every word had Samantha squirming and looking away, embarrassed as Antoinette described acts the woman had obviously already indulged in, or was on the precipice of doing so. And now, thanks to Antoinette’s words, sealing the acts as taboo in her childe’s mind, Samantha would enjoy them a thousand times more.

Oh, to feel that rush again, the joys of discovering a new kink, a new way to explore and embrace eroticism, when such things were discouraged. Blurry memories danced through her mind, teasing her with her inability to solidify them, but her memories were not so lost she could not recall sensations, and emotions.

“I do suggest you keep a journal,” Antoinette said. “Avoid mentioning anything that could break the Masquerade if discovered, and I would also suggest using pen and paper. Your memories can be archived safely, and in several hundred years, when deep torpors have rendered these memories hazy mirages, you can read your own words from a time long forgotten. It is a ... powerful experience.”

“I should do that! That makes sense.” Nodding, her childe spun in front of the mirror a couple more times, smile ever growing.

“You like Jacob. You wish to spend time with him. You wish to see him smile.”

Blinking, confused, Samantha looked up at her through the mirror. “Well, yeah. I mean, we’re dating.”

Antoinette could not help but laugh at the silly girl’s obliviousness. She was too charming for her own good.

“What I meant, young childe, is that you actively seek ways to make him happy.”

“Isn’t that what dating is?”

“In a sense. Dating often comes from a place of selfishness; a reasonable act, when you have yet to form a deep bond with the other. Only when two have been in a relationship for a time, and have developed love for the other, do you truly find joy in putting the other before yourself.” She leaned down over Samantha, and gently probed her temple. “Before yourself, not instead of yourself. Remember that.”

“O-Okay.” Samantha looked back into the mirror, nodding. The advice had sunk in, to some degree at least, and that was enough for now. “But, I know lots of people who’ve gone out of their way to put their partner before themselves, even when it’s a young relationship.” Perhaps not.

“Yes, but there is a difference between the wistful joys of a new relationship and all its novelty leading to powerful gestures — often done from a place of selfishness, not selflessness — versus a genuine, deep desire, to see your other thrive. You were married for many years, and happily, oui?”

“Yes. James and I loved each other, and often did things for each other.” No hesitation from her childe to speak of her dead husband. Naive and fragile in some ways Samantha may be, but sturdy and strong in others as well.

“I only bring attention to this topic, because there are some individuals that are inherently self sacrificing. Such individuals can display the behavior of one deeply in love, and yet, they are simply lacking in self confidence and self worth, and cannot imagine doing something for themselves. Such individuals do things for others and only others, and it can, and does, lead to terribly self destructive patterns.”

“You think ... I’m one of those women who don’t know how to consider themselves first?”

“I think you can be. I wanted to draw attention to it, that is all. And I apologize if I you were consciously aware of it as you pursued your relationship with Jacob. I am not there to monitor your interactions with the man, but as I said, you seem to enjoy his company, to the degree that I thought, perhaps, quite powerful.”

“Oh, I get what you’re getting at. I...” Samantha sighed as she looked herself up and down a few more times. “It’s a little early to think I might love him. I know I’m the sort to get, uh, swept off my feet easily, but I’m not a child, sire.” Even as she said it, she grinned at her reflection. Not a child, but she was well aware her emotional attitude when romance was involved, was quite powerful and juvenile, and fun. The sort of woman who genuinely found themselves caught in the drama of soap operas.

“Agreed.”

“But, he is great. And it’s not just all the sex.” She managed to say sex without squirming. Oh how her little childe was growing up. “I’m afraid to push too hard though.”

“Oh?”

“About his past, and about who he is. He talks about some of the things he’s done, interesting stuff you know? Exploring the world, and even some of the witchy stuff he’s delved into. But he doesn’t talk about the personal stuff, like Minerva. At least, he doesn't tell me everything, like where the ... emotional scars are."

"It may take years for him to do so, but if your relationship continues to grow, I am confident he will." For all Jacob's troubled past, the man was not so broken that the touch of a good woman could not soothe his soul, at least a little. "Now, let us be off. I hope to make great progress tonight."

---

All eyes fell on Antoinette the moment they entered Bloodlust. A few seconds later, onlooking eyes fell to Samantha, and soon after, Ashley and Julee. All four women were dressed to kill, inviting the gazes of the men and women in the club. It would make this teaching moment easier.

Soon, the four of them were upstairs. Ashley and Julee stood behind the booth, doting and ready, while Samantha and Antoinette sat within.

"How has your skill with Majesty progressed?"

"B-Badly. It's easy to find a meal with the witches, so I'm getting lazy. Othello's always sharing Madison, and Jacob has thralls and ghouls, and ... yeah."

"As expected." Antoinette rolled her eyes, and put a hand on Samantha's where it rested on the booth table between them. "We will—"

"Where is everyone?" Slowly, Samantha leaned over the edge of the booth seat, before sitting upright with a start. "Sorry, sire! I just ... I see plenty of kine, but aren't there usually at least some Kindred here? And I don't see any of the thralls or ghouls I usually do."

There was no avoiding it. Samantha was a Kindred of Dolareido, and while she was no Invictus or Carthian, the war affected the city and everyone in it. To Antoinette's chagrin.

"This growing war affects many things. It simmers, for the moment, but soon I expect it will boil. All the Invictus and Carthians are preparing for that war."

Sighing, her childe nodded as she scooted back into the booth, and then closer again until she was almost touching Antoinette's side. The poor creature was afraid, perhaps for herself, but a single glance to her eyes screamed who she was truly afraid for.

She would forever be a mother.

"You ... can't stop the war?"

"That is a complicated question, Samantha."

"I know, but you're the Prince. You're super strong, and so's the sheriff."

"I am strong, young Kindred, as is my old friend Daniel. But we are not invincible. Plenty of Kindred my age have been defeated by hubris, and by ignoring the reality around them." After a heavy nod, Antoinette leaned over the table, setting her elbows upon it and netting her fingers together. "Here we sit, in a club, or perhaps a night lounge depending on your perspective, and we are able to do so because I am quite hands-off with the covenants in my city."

"But..." Her childe looked down at her own hands, set them on the table near Antoinette's, and twiddled them. "People might die. You don't want to stop that?"

"In other cities, there are often no-kill rules in place for Kindred. I have strongly discouraged killing, but have not outlawed it, largely because psychology and history have made it painfully clear that laws against behavior do not prevent that behavior, not without great consequence. And in many cases, encourage the behavior. In other cities where the covenants rule with iron fists, the other covenants battle against them, and kill kine in secret. They wage war constantly, but unofficially.”

“But ... but because of how you do things here in Dolareido, it’s relatively peaceful.”

“Relatively. But despite my centuries of efforts, these infernal, infantile covenants cannot ever truly harmonize. With Viktor and Tony gone, it has been better, but the damage between Michael and Garry is severe. They have both killed Kindred, and hidden the evidence well.”

“Killed?” Samantha gasped as she looked up at her.

“Indeed.” Antoinette pat her childe’s hand once again. “If I decided to embrace ruling this city as many other covenants do, you and I would not be sitting here in a club, without worry of assassination. At best, we would be looking over our shoulders every moment, anticipating it. At worst, sections of the city would be under constant guard, with no-trespassing laws in place.”

“But, what if ... I don’t know, you dealt with the Invictus and Carthians yourself? Maybe the city’s Kindred, or at least Michael and Garry, aren’t ... redeemable?”

“There are many who would say the same of Jacob.”

Silence. Samantha stared at her, confused and shocked, but as understanding dawned, her eyes grew heavy and looked to the table and her fingers once more.

“He’s got a dark history, doesn’t he? Things he ... he hasn’t told me, but he’s hinted about them.”

“He does, my childe, but he is my friend for a reason. Be careful with him, but ... but trust that Jacob is not Viktor, or Tony or Lucas.”

A sly grin teased across Antoinette's lips, but she crushed it immediately. "Ask him sometime, about his wishes for the city. I think you will find the old fossil's plans to be both drastically different than my own, and yet, contain his own strange, twisted wisdom."

"I'm afraid to do that."

"You are dating an elder, Samantha. Be prepared to wade through darkness."

Her childe slowly smiled, strength coming to her. "I've waded through a lot of darkness lately. I ... guess I can handle a little more."

Jacob's darkness certainly was not 'little', but Antoinette returned the smile and nodded. Defying all odds, Jack had managed to deal with the nigh infinite troubles and pains that fell upon him. Perhaps Samantha could do the same.

Or Antoinette's hopes for Jacob would be in vain.

"Now, returning to the covenants. I will not stop this war as long as they do not break the Masquerade, because not only would it not be as easy you as believe, but also because there is more to this conflict than meets the eye. For now, understand that you should avoid speaking with either group until this war is over. As long as you do not interfere, they will not touch you. As long as I do not interfere, they will not touch you."

"M-Me? I ... I guess I am your childe. I'm a target."

Antoinette grinned at her childe, and winked. "Not a good one, not if whoever threatens you wishes to live. Unfortunately, Kindred are crafty, and it is better to be cautious than arrogant." Samantha looked up to her, wanting more information. Feeling charitable, Antoinette gave her a little more truth, to sate her hunger. "Garry and Michael are not the men people think they are. There is, perhaps, a little hope that things will turn out better than my colleagues believe.”

“And Jack...”

“Thankfully, Jack is not the focus of this issue. Unfortunately, he is a valuable tool in Michael’s control. But I am confident Jack will discover a way to deal with this war with minimal deaths.”

“Minimal. Ugh.”

“Now, for the matter at hand. You are here to practice your skills, my childe. Once you can seduce men and women in this environment easily, we can move up to more difficult tasks.”

“Like?”

“Such as seducing a room filled with lawyers, for example.”

She cringed. “Lawyers? Bleh! Why not doctors?”

“Come now Samantha, doctors? Medical doctors? Sweet childe, they are walking, talking medical encyclopedias, without a single critical thought in their minds.” Antoinette laughed as she slipped an arm behind Samantha’s shoulders and gave her a gentle hug as she smiled warmly down at her. “Lawyers think. They look for logic patterns and logic holes for a living. They—I digress. Tonight, you shall seduce a couple.”

“Couple?”

“A couple. Go downstairs, catch the eye of two, and enthrall them. You will use Majesty, of course. You will Awe them.”

Samantha immediately began squirming, obviously still terrified with the idea of being front and center of such sexual attention.

Surprising, considering the woman had no doubt become exactly that among her witch friends.

“We uh ... we’re not going to sleep with them, right?”

“If you wanted to, and Jacob did not mind, I would say to indulge as you desired. Jack and I prefer to keep our physical relationship between us, and when we are feeling playful, we ask our close friends, and our thralls and ghouls to join us.” Speaking of Jack in such a manner almost earned a groan from her childe, but Samantha recovered quickly. “And I am under the impression you and Jacob are in a similar arrangement, though instead of close friends and thralls, you have the Circle.”

More squirming. “Kinda.”

“Then do not sleep with your prey tonight. Feed, and send them both into the sleepy bliss of the Kiss.”

“Um, if I get two kine up here, will you feed with me?”

“No. As you know, we Daeva prefer to feed on the same individuals. If you ever find someone to feed on regularly, given time, the thought of feeding on another will disgust you.” Antoinette nodded back toward her two ghouls, who remained attentive behind the booth, and they both smiled at Antoinette in return.

“Right, right.”

“Majesty, young childe, is about power. Other Kindred blood clans may think of it as nothing more than seduction, but seduction too, is a battle of power. It is not as direct as Dominate or Nightmare, but a battle nonetheless. You will not clash with the minds of those you enthrall directly, but indirectly.”

Samantha nodded. “I have to draw their attention, but not make it a straight on fight. So, like ... teasing a cat with a toy on a string. I have to get the cat to chase, even if the cat doesn’t want to.”

“An apt analogy. With Majesty, you can have anyone chasing you, desperate to satisfy you, to please you, and eventually, to serve you. Once you have had centuries to master it, you will have the power to enslave entire rooms. Dozens, perhaps hundreds of people, rendered hopelessly addicted to you.”

“Addicted. It ... it sounds dangerous, like it could backfire, you know? Obsessed fans can do some horrible things.”

“It very well could, my childe. But you are no simple kine musician. You are Kindred, and far stronger than the kine you feed on. You are the predator, and they are the prey. Remember that. Now, off with you. Approach the two kine you wish to enthrall for the night, reach into yourself, summon the vitae within, and call to them. They are cats, and you are their owner who wields the toy.”

Nodding, and taking a deep, useless breath, Samantha slid out of the booth, and walked downstairs. And without so much as a glance back, either. My my, how the young vampire had grown.

Antoinette smiled after her childe, but once she was gone, leaned back into her booth. Tempted, quite tempted, to message Jack and inquire about his current circumstances, but the two of them had decided to not ask about each other’s business. Jack had asked her about the Ordo in the past, but after she had explained that her secrets could not be shared, even with him, those questions ceased. He respected her and her position. And it was not long before they agreed it would lead to misfortune if Jack told her of Invictus business.

But she was the Prince, and had long earned some leeway. She texted him, a simple message.

~Are you alright, my love?~

Two minutes later, a response.

~Yeah. I think I'm gonna have to talk to Maria though. Not looking forward to that.~

How quickly the boy flirted with the rules. Do not discuss matters of the covenants.

~I do advise against that. Maria knows what you did, Jack.~

~It's the only way I'm going to learn about Michael and Garry. If I'm going to put an end to this, I need to learn. And I get the impression if I asked either Michael or Garry directly, it'd end in one of us killing the other.~

Antoinette sighed down at the phone before pressing it to her sternum. What to say, what to say? The boy wanted to learn about Michael and Garry's past, and that she could understand. But even she did not know the full depths of those two, and what had driven them to hate each other so. It was something personal, she understood that, but she had never uncovered their secrets. And even if she had, she would hesitate to share it with Jack.

Perhaps Michael had divulged his secrets to Maria? Or, considering her proximity to the man for so long, she had uncovered his secrets herself. With the woman's intelligence and tenacity, and Michael's stubbornness, Antoinette would bet on the latter.

~Be careful, my love.~

~I will, my love.~

She smiled. Jack never used poetic language. For him to indulge in flowing words was a rare treat.

Before she could slip the phone back into her purse, it buzzed once again. A message from Natasha, but not a normal text message. The little Mekhet used their secure channel in their custom software. Most dragons did not trust technology, and they were right to do so, but Antoinette had spent millions in secure software. It could be trusted. Mostly.

~Prince, I've learned something very important.~

~Oh? If it is of true importance, you may wish to tell me in person.~

Samantha returned, and Antoinette smiled at her young childe as she approached, a man and woman behind her. Two young kine, in their twenties, and both obviously quite drunk. But also, quite enamored with Samantha, nearly drooling as they followed after her, eyes wide with wonder. To them, Samantha had become the center of their world. Except, perhaps not. Another glance at their eyes showed that yes, they were quite enthralled in her Majesty, but not to the level of devoted servant.

Samantha would need decades of practice and growing power to reach such levels of Majesty. But still, considering the woman was not even a year embraced, this was good progress.

“Antoinette,” she said, knowing to not use the Prince’s title in front of kine. “This is Doug and Maggie.”

“Doug, Maggie.” Antoinette offered the two of them a playful nod. Naturally, both kine looked at her, her great height, white hair, and enormous bust, and even a fool could see the arousal spike through them. But it was Samantha that had them on a leash, and soon they turned their gazes back to the young vampire.

Another buzz from Antoinette’s phone.

~Yes, we definitely need to talk in person. But I need to tell you something right now. Jacob ... might be a problem. A big problem.~

A big problem. Natasha wanted to say enemy, but her timid nature, and the risk of the software being monitored, had her avoiding the word.

Antoinette kept her face stone cold, but only by suppressing a powerful urge to wince, as she looked over to childe, who beamed with pride over her successful hunt. Oh no.

Chapter 145

~~Triss~~

Endlessness, everywhere. The infinite cosmos. Space, the final frontier. What the fuck ever.

Triss gulped as she stared up at the night sky. A quick glance around showed no buildings, no trees, no rocks, and no street either. No floor, no nothing. Beneath her was white, but it had no texture. Just, endless white, reaching out before and around her to endless horizons. Endless endlessness.

“Oh hey, I’m naked. Wonderful.” She blinked down at her body, frowning. The tattoos and piercings were there, as they usually were when she dreamed. No clothes though.

She touched her cheeks. Yeap, still gone, replaced with big crocodile teeth. Damn. Sometimes it was nice to dream about being human again.

She stared up again, and smiled. Stars. So many stars, tiny white dots against an endless black. Christ, what sort of infinite fucking universe had her dumb brain decided to invent, for a fucking dream?

She looked down. Below her was her Beast. No need to think about it, no need to convince herself, she recognized its swirling mass of black smoke, and all the strange limbs and claws and teeth and beaks inside it. It was beneath her, in that endless white she’d been in before, when learning crúac rituals. Except now, she was outside of it? Above it?

“Is this ... an out-of-body experience?” Last she remembered was falling asleep in the Circle’s cave. “Cause I’m pretty sure I should be able to look around and see the real world and shit if I was having one, and I don't see no cave.”

“You are half right.”

Triss spun around quick and jumped back. She fully expected vitae to send her back a good distance, but all she got for her effort was a small leap, totally mistimed, and fell on her ass. Ok, so, no vitae. Shit.

An old woman stood in front of her, hunched, short, with a cloak of tattered gray covering her body and the top of her head. Long strands of dirty white hair hung down the sides of her face, and warts covered her visible skin. Not much visible skin with the cloak, but her feet and hands were visible, and so was her wrinkly, old, sagging face.

She had a cane in one hand. No, wait, not a cane, a walking stick. No, wait, not a walking stick, a fucking witch staff, considering the dangling skulls on top of it. It was thickest at the top, a crooked branch with a curve where the old woman had tied rope to hook through the holes in the skulls. They jingled lightly, making hollow bone noises.

Triss grumbled as she reached for her vitae again. Not there. Definitely a dream, except normally you had some measure of control in a dream, especially when it was lucid. She squeezed her eyes shut and imagined riding a giant dinosaur. Nothing. Damn.

“You're naked,” the old woman said. Even her voice sounded old, crackly, and not sweet.

“Sorry. I—wait, I'm not sorry. This is my fucking head, my dream, and I'll be naked if I want.”

The old woman grinned. “If this is your dream, change it. Put on clothes.”

“I’m not feeling very zen, apparently, and it’s not working.”

“Because this isn’t your dream.” After a quiet, disgusting, gargling chuckle, the old woman waved her stick at Triss slightly. Clothes appeared on her, the shit she’d gone to sleep in, a tank top and jeans and her combat boots.

“It isn’t?” Triss gestured down beneath them, at the endless plane of white, and the smoke creature wandering around beneath them, blocked by a floor of glass or something. “Certainly feels like a dream.”

“You were dreaming. But I wanted to talk to you without that nasty Beast of yours getting in the way.”

“So...”

“So I removed you from your dream.” The old woman gestured around with her staff. “You are in between, a place we can talk again.”

“Again? I—” Panic jolted through her limbs, and she took a step back as she looked the old woman up and down a dozen times more. “You! I had to sacrifice a bunch of people for a chance to talk with you!”

“You got my attention.”

Oh god this was happening. Happening happening, it was happening, oh fucking shit. She took another step back, looked around for any sort of exit to the strange dimension she’d found herself in, and sighed. Don’t panic. If the Crone, assuming this was the Crone, actually wanted you dead, she could make it happen, easily. Right?

Or maybe she couldn’t? The Crone was a god or something, and the more Triss dug into the world of dark rituals and shit, the more it seemed like there were divine rules mere plebes didn't know about. Spirits had to follow rules, apparently, so why not gods and stuff? Which made her panic again, cause that meant maybe the Crone couldn't hurt her right now, until Triss said or did something wrong. Fuck fuck, how the fuck do you play a game when you don't know the rules?

“I did? I mean, I did sacrifice—”

“Five hundred years ago, a village, remote, even for that time, sacrificed the first born of their chief to me, a girl of ten years. That sacrifice carried with it enough weight to change the landscape in a way that persists to this day. You, and your paltry sacrifice of the unwanted, barely warranted a glance from me.”

Sweet fucking christ.

“Well sorry I didn't really feel like sacrificing—”

The old bitch tapped her staff on the white not-glass beneath them, making a quiet click click. More than enough to shut Triss right up.

“I said I noticed you, not the sacrifice.”

“Oh, uh ... sorry.”

The Crone managed a weak grin. “You're smarter than you look. I can see the wheels turning in that tiny little brain of yours.”

“Turning pretty slow right now, honestly. Why did you notice me? Who the fuck am I?”

“You're a sad little girl, who's lost her lover. And because you're smarter than most, you're dipping your toe in the water to see how cold it is before you take the plunge.”

“You’re ... talking about Julias, and what I’m doing to ... try and bring him back.”

“I warned you once to let him go, Beatrice.”

Something about hearing a deity use her first name was freaky as all fuck. Slowly, Triss’s gaze fell, and she stared down at her boots like a kid caught with her hand in the cookie jar.

“Yeah.”

“You ignored my warning.”

“Yeah.”

“I knew you would.”

Triss winced and looked away. “Well, yeah. Black Blood and Jacob told me it was possible, and I believe them.”

“I somehow doubt they told you only that.”

Doubt? So the Crone or whatever she was wasn’t omniscient. Good to know creepy weird larger-than-life creature things weren’t watching them through the rooftops with x-ray vision.

“Yeah, it’ll be hard. Yeah, there’s a good chance it’ll never work, they said as much. Yeah, I’m getting deeper into some pretty nasty shit, but ... but I have to try.”

When she finally managed to lift her eyes again, the old woman was smiling at her, the sort of smile a mom gives her kid when they trip and fall. Which of course sent rage surging through Triss, indignant and bitter. Which of course the old bitch saw coming, and her mommy smile faded, replaced with sadness.

“You should let him go, Triss. You have a good second life now, don’t you? He’d be happy for you and this new life you’re building for yourself. And that Sándor creature might even be interested in you, yes? Julias would want you to find love again. So let him go.”

“I don’t want to.”

“Yes, I know.” With a heavy sigh, the old crone gently waved her staff.

The world came to life around them. Dirt flowed out from under Triss’s feet, and she squeaked as she jumped up. She landed on her ass, again, but dirt was a soft enough cushion to land on.

By the time she lifted her eyes up from the dirt, the rest of the world had come to join her. Grass, small rocks. Trees. Bugs! She snarled and swatted away a beetle or something as it crawled across her hand, and she quickly got back up to her feet.

Forests were supposedly romantic, but she’d never been in one. Born and raised in Dolareido, and embraced before she’d ever gotten a chance to visit other places. And it wasn’t like vampires often packed their bags and went places when sunlight equaled death. Now that she was in a forest, she was glad she’d never visited one before.

How the fuck could anyone think of a forest as romantic? Maybe it’d be better in the day, but at night, it wasn’t much better than that jungle nightmare world of Fiona’s. Bugs buzzed around and made high pitched clicking noises. Distant rustling in the darkness she couldn’t see announced wandering animals, raccoons and birds and shit. It was cold and windy; didn’t bother a vampire, but still. A glance up showed the stars were mostly blotted out by trees, mostly pines, and another glance down showed the dirt and grass were mixed with bits of bark and twigs, and wriggling things.

This sucked.

“Oh god, why? I’m a city girl.”

“Yes, of course you are. Witches everywhere cringe.” After a quiet, grandma chuckle, the old crone waved her staff again. A fire emerged between them, and Beatrice shrieked as she jumped back. She hadn’t shrieked like that in literal decades. “Calm down. You have no banes here, vampire. We are between.”

“Uh huh.” Triss eye the Crone suspiciously, but sighed after a while, and looked down at the fire. Circled by stones, it crackled and popped, and Triss found herself drifting closer. “You’re ... sure?”

“Of course I’m sure.”

Nodding, Triss came closer, and held out her hand. Waves of warmth hit her skin, and faint smoke drifted upward.

“It feels real.”

“I’m very good,” the old hag said, smirking. “Sit. We should talk.”

Triss sat. When a god comes to visit you, you fucking do what they want. That might change as the conversation went on, but for now, shut up and do as ordered.

So close to fire, instinct told Triss to back the fuck up before a random spark set her on fire, but a glance to the old woman and a nod from her told Triss it was alright. Well, if this wasn’t real, or wasn’t physical or whatever ‘in between’ was, and the Crone had pulled her out of a dream, then maybe the fire wouldn’t turn her into ashes the moment it touched her. She wasn’t stupid enough to stick her finger in the fire, but she got closer than her vampire instincts wanted.

Fire, was mesmerizing. The way it danced, the waves of heat that matched the flickering flame, the sizzle and pop of the wood, god damn. Fucking beautiful. A pretty sick joke that it was any vampire’s bane.

“The flesh witch,” the old woman said, “Elen.”

“What about her?”

“She is a broken thing. There’s little left of her mind, and she won’t last much longer.”

“Malachi is correct. She’ll live on, even as her body breaks down. But another decade or so and there won’t be much left of her brain. After that, she’ll be nothing more than a pulsing mass of flesh, like cancer.”

“Damn, that’s rough. Do ... do you know who gave her immortality?” A dangerous question to ask a deity. But knowledge was too damn fucking tasty to resist.

“I do.”

“Wanna tell me?”

“No.”

“Uh huh. Was it you?”

“No.”

Triss rolled her eyes. “Alright, so what about Elen?”

“I’m sure you have guessed that she cannot create a replica of Julias to the exact degree you think is required.”

Oh shit oh shit. That was either very good or very bad.

“You saying I don’t need it to be perfect?”

“It needs to be perfect.” Very bad then. “If you summon his soul into a body it doesn’t recognize, the results will be as horrific as you’ve guessed. The stuff of nightmares.”

“God fucking damn it!” She buried her eyes in her palms and rubbed them against her skull, before looking back up at the crone. “I was going to look for a ritual that could maybe ... I don’t know, help somehow. Maybe get a piece of Julias somehow? Maybe ... maybe get a piece of me, a memory, to help?”

“Smart.” The old woman chuckled, a hoarse and horrible sound. Slowly, she walked over to a nearby bolder, and sat against it, as if sitting on the ground would be too much trouble for an old woman like her. “Tell me, do you know why members of my Circle use torture to learn rituals?”

“Because it forces them to find, uh, inner tranquility, I guess? To go zen and shit.”

The Crone laughed again. “Close enough. It lets you speak more directly with your Beast, and your Beast is capable of communicating across...” She gestured around her.

“Sounds like Jac—Malachi was right then.”

“Malachi is too smart for his own good. It’ll lead to his death.”

Triss raised a brow at that, but didn’t question it. She wanted to, but a little voice in her head told her this Crone thing wouldn’t randomly drop a line like that, if she had any intent on explaining herself. Don’t poke the bear.

“So crúac rituals come from you?”

“They don’t come from me, not truly. But I’d be lying if I said I didn’t have a hand in stupid vampires like yourself finding them.”

“And ... what are they, exactly? The rituals?”

“If I answered that, what fun would there be in being a witch?”

There was some truth to that, Triss supposed. Half the fun in all the dark witchy stuff, was the mystery of the forces they connected with. But it was also how witches got themselves killed, according to Jacob, and Lovecraft.

“So, am I being zen then, right now? To be able to talk to you?”

“No. Like I said, you got my attention. Or, maybe it’s better to say, you’re ... relatable.”

“Uh, I’m sorry, can you repeat that? Cause it sounds like you just said I was relatable, me, and you’re, uh, something I’m guessing is the equivalent of a goddess.”

“Close enough.” Chuckling, the old woman reached into her cloak with her free, wrinkly hand, and pulled out a small bag. Old school didn’t do justice what the bag looked like. Must have been a flap of deer skin tied together into a shitty bag by a shitty string made of who the fuck knew what. Which honestly made it pretty awesome. And she tossed it to Triss casually.

Triss caught it. “What’s this?”

“A ritual. A memory. Open it later, and it’ll help with building a vessel for your lover.”

“Oh ... oh fuck, really? I was thinking I’d have to go through some serious torture, zen out while Jacob ran barbed wire up my ass and right out my mouth. And we’d have to do it while bathing in the blood of a newborn baby or something.”

“That might have worked, yes. Your Beast would have called out to the beyond, and someone would have answered. But let’s skip that part, shall we?”

“Holy fuck you are being way too nice. What’s the catch?”

“Time.”

“Time?”

“You’re running out of it.”

“Because of Elen?”

“No.”

Triss stared at the old woman, blinking, a lot. “You uh ... wanna tell m—”

“I can’t tell you more. The rules don’t allow it.”

“Rules? What the fuck are you talking about?” They did have rules then. Bingo.

“You’ve spoken too much, old crone,” a soothing, motherly voice said.

Triss jumped to her feet and her eyes snapped around. Not her voice, or the Crone’s. But before she could open her mouth, the Crone gestured to Triss dismissively. Not an enemy then? Then—

Light cut through the forest canopy. A glance up showed that the moon, which hadn’t even been there before, was now very much there, and shining down on them with its soothing light.

Rustling around the fire forced Triss to jump back. “What the fuck?”

Next to the old woman, was a wolf. A white wolf. It sat on its hind legs beside the Crone, and watched Triss with the classic, cold, analyzing gaze of a wolf.

Ok, information overload. Having an out-of-body experience in some sort of in-between realm where a god had decided to have a chat with her, and help her out, for no reason at all, was already blowing her fucking mind. And now a white wolf with a soothing, feminine voice, was here to chat as well, right after the moon mysteriously appeared and decided to play spotlight.

“You’re ... the moon? Like, the one I heard the werewolves talk about? Luna?”

The wolf slowly nodded. “She catches on quickly. I can see why she interests you, hag.” Spoken without moving its ... her lips.

“Don’t be rude,” the Crone said.

“Funny, coming from you,” the god damn mother fucking moon said.

Beatrice threw up her hands, palms forward, surrendering. “Ok. Pause. Time out. I can’t handle this.” Clenching her eyes shut, Triss slapped herself. Hard. As hard as this weak fake dream-not-dream body could handle; not very hard, but good enough. Except other than a harsh spike of pain, nothing changed. She opened her eyes, looked for anything different, and groaned. Fuck.

“Don’t do as the Crone says,” Luna said, steady gaze on Triss, wolf mouth still unmoving.

“Uh, why? She just gave me a fucking shortcut to finishing making a vessel. I am damn well going to finish it, and then—”

“And then what, vampire? Reach across the endless oblivion, across the Abyss itself, and pluck the threads of your dead lover’s soul? Will you weave them together yourself?”

“I—”

“What gives you the right, vampire? You think you can defy the rules of life? Defy what gives life purpose?”

“I don’t—”

“You don’t have the right!” The wolf growled, baring her fangs. “You don’t get to pluck the essence of Soul from the beyond, because you are sad! Who are you, blood leech, half dead creature, balancing on the edge of life itself, to think you have the right to defy rules not I nor the Crone have ever managed to defy?”

Triss stared at the wolf. If this wasn’t a dream, it stood to reason she could very well die here if one of these fucking gods decided she should. Which wasn’t fair at all.

“Luna, please,” the Crone said, slowly shaking her head. “Let the vampire try. This isn’t about us.”

“Isn’t it? Why else would you pick this girl, if not because of what she is trying to do?”

“There is more to this than this vampire’s aching heart. The acts of Mict—”

“Do not speak his name!” Not so soothing or motherly anymore. Luna’s voice shook the forest, and Triss gulped as she steadied herself.

Sighing, the Crone waved a slow, dismissing hand toward the wolf. “Fine, fine.”

Triss dropped her hands, and fell on her ass by the fire. No point in standing anymore, and she couldn’t even if she tried.

“Can one of you throw me a bone and tell me why you’re both talking to me? Like ... the fuck?”

“I came to help you with resurrecting your dead lover,” the Crone said with a gross, toothy grin. She didn’t even try to hide that she had ulterior motives, and Triss could respect that.

The wolf shook her head. “She knows you’ll fail, vampire. Fail like we all have.”

“Like you ... all have?”

With a heavy snarl, the wolf stood up, and stepped around the fire toward her. Triss didn’t bother getting up. At this point, she might as well accept that her fake dream-not-dream muscles weren’t going to do a damn thing here, not against these two.

“You’re not the only one who’s lost someone close to them, who’s lost a lover. Who are you to defy the laws of life and death, vampire, when I have spent thousands upon thousands of years unable to reach mine? Me. Me!” The moonlight over them brightened, feeling less like the moon, and more like a searchlight.

“Luna, be calm,” the Crone said. “I’m helping her not because I think she’ll succeed. Even she doesn’t believe she’ll succeed. But she’s going to do it anyway, and I’d prefer she try before ... Well, I can’t speak about that either, I suppose. In any case, this witch has potential, and if things don’t go as ... he ... expects, then I would have her learn the futility of her pursuits. Only when her dreams are ash will she be a worthy student.”

“Uh, what? He? Student?”

“We cannot discuss he,” Luna said.

“But,” the Crone said with a small wave of her staff, “if he can flirt with the rules, so can we. And I think you would do well, following in Malachi's footsteps, Beatrice. You have the potential to be a grand and powerful witch."

Ok, so Malachi wasn't 'he' then. Black Blood? She wanted to ask, but they'd made it clear they couldn't talk about whatever was going on. And the Crone said his name was Mict...

"Th ... Thank you, for the gift." She motioned to the bag in her hand. "And ... and I can't even begin to understand why you're both here, talking to stupid, worthless me. But, it's not like I don't understand, you know?" Slowly, she forced herself to make eye contact with the white wolf. She might as well have been staring into two galaxies, each contained within their own glass marble. "About how what I'm trying to do is fucked up. But vampires are already fucked up, right? We're half dead. And ghosts—"

"It's not the same," the Crone said. "A million others have attempted what you're attempting, Beatrice. You don't understand the weave, and how it draws the dead back to it. You don't understand what death does to a soul, and..." Sighing, the Crone shook her staff gently through the air, causing the dangling skulls to jingle and make hollow thuds. "You'll learn, the hard way. That's why I like you."

"Thanks ... I think. But I have to say, it's really fucking unnerving that a ... a ... whatever you are, took notice of me. Like, I'm not special."

"No, you are not special," the Crone said.

Kinda hurt to hear her say that, but Triss recovered quick.

"You two, um ... ever visit Jack? If anyone's special, that kid is—"

"The boy," the wolf said, "is not special. He's poisoned by the echoes of a menace."

Ouch for Jack.

“There are two in this city we could consider special,” the Crone said. “Women, paranormal creatures who have lost more than you could ever understand.”

“Women who ... oh.” Samantha, and Athalia.

“Enough of this,” the wolf said, and she growled quietly for a few seconds to seal in her point. “Beatrice, if you continue with this foolishness, you’ll find only pain. And the dark currents in your city will—”

The Crone shook her staff over the fire toward the white wolf. “Don’t. You want him to have even more freedom? You’ve already caused enough trouble with what you’ve done in this city. Don’t be angry because your little pet project Eric is taking so long.”

Triss felt like a little kid, eavesdropping on her two parents arguing, learning about things kids weren’t supposed to know about, like taxes, and adultery. Don’t move, don’t make a sound, and maybe she wouldn’t get drawn into it. Of course, the stakes were higher here, and getting drawn into it could very well mean a dead and sad Triss.

“Eric?” Shut up shut up shut up before you get yourself killed.

“Nevermind about Eric,” the wolf said, growling again. “I’m warning you now, vampire. If you keep going down this path, you’ll find only pain. Pain for yourself, pain for Jack, and pain for that poor woman Samantha whose hopes you’ve raised. Pain for everyone tied to this sickening cycle.” Damn this moon bitch was angry. Assuming she actually was Luna, a moon spirit goddess thing, and not a wolf, maybe she should have picked an angry, snarling badger or wolverine for this encounter? Would have fit better.

“I ... still have to try.”

“Of course you do,” the Crone said, chuckling, complete with a little old-woman phlegm. “I know you do, sweetheart. Luna knows, too. I tried, as did she, as did he.” He, again. They couldn’t speak his name? Jacob? Black Blood? Who the fuck could Black Blood have ever lost, though? “You’ll try, and you’ll fail, and that failure will leave its mark on you for the rest of eternity. And you will become a great witch because of it, one of the greatest. If you survive the ages.”

“But ... I thought you said I’m not special?”

Waving her staff slowly over the fire, the old woman sighed, and nodded. “You’re not. Yet. Now, open the bag.”

The wolf growled, snorted, and walked back around the fire to sit next to the Crone.

With a heavy gulp, Triss looked at the bag. Just a simple, little animal skin bag, and a pluck at its shitty string was enough to have it open in her palms. She had no idea what to expect, but as the flaps spread around her hand, she stared into the small, floating dot of red, and watched as it hovered up to her necklace. It sank into the small crow skull, and the world exploded.

Triss sat up with a hard jolt. She looked around in a panic, but nothing was out of the ordinary. Just her and Jennifer, cuddled up next to her. Jen was still asleep though, and that was weird. Vampires woke up at the same time, and not gently.

She looked across the cave. No one bothered closing their curtains anymore, not with how close they’d all grown lately. Madison slept beside Othello, where he also slept, the two of them naked and halfway out of his alcove.

Sleepiness hit Triss like a truck, and she collapsed back onto the sheets. The dream had woken her up from torpor. Holy fuck, that was a powerful dream.

But the sun was up, her Beast knew that, and the heaviness of torpor dragged her back down into sleep. She smiled as it did. She had a new ritual to try out.

~~Damien~~

“I don’t think Michael killed her.”

Damien sighed as he sat down in front of Maria’s desk. “I ... didn’t ask that.”

“You were about to. It’s in your eyes.” The elder smiled slightly at him as she typed a few things on her keyboard, before leaning back in her grand chair. Within her den below the cathedral, the elder had regenerated her arms well enough to use them as any kine would. Soon, she’d be as fit as the night Avery had nearly killed her.

He was tempted to ask how she’d use her renewed strength in the war against Garry. But he avoided the topic, for now.

“I ... do think Amanda’s death sounds like the perfect catalyst for this war that Michael wants. Too perfect.”

“It does.”

“And she may have been a neonate, but was no fresh fledgling. She’d been embraced near Jack’s embrace.”

Maria nodded. “It is hardly fair to compare her to Jack. The boy has survived trial by fire far too many times. Half to grit, and half to pure luck, I am sure.”

“Still, she had a few years on her. She was good enough to avoid getting caught by some errant flames. So I can’t see any other reason for her being dead, unless Michael killed her.” He trusted any Mekhet with a few years under their belt to dodge fire easily enough. “Coincidence aside, why do you believe Michael didn’t kill her? The man is—”

Maria shot him a glare, and he shut up fast. She might as well have cut through a glacier with a sword.

“You do not understand Michael. Do not judge him so harshly.”

“I ... You’re right, I don’t understand Michael. But you could tell me.”

Her stare only hardened. “No. I could not. Do not ask again.”

And that ended that conversation.

---

~Sorry Jack. I asked, and she shut me down hard. I think I made your job even harder.~

~Damn. Alright, I’ll be careful. Thanks~

Sighing, Damien put his phone away, and went back to his apartment. With the war bubbling under Dolareido’s surface, he didn’t feel comfortable going to Fiona’s. As much as Damien wasn’t technically Invictus anymore, he still worked for them as a close ally, and functioned as one. It made perfect sense for Garry to want to kill him as much as anyone else, and he didn’t want that shit following Fiona. He’d give Fiona a call, and they could go somewhere secret to spend some time together.

Of course, that was difficult to do, with Fiona apparently in his apartment and not her own.

“Um, Fiona?” he called out. He smelled her the moment he came into the apartment. Damn Begotten could get to so many places they weren’t supposed to, as long as they’d been there once before.

“In here!” In his bedroom. “Help me! Please!”

He knew her panicked tone, and this wasn’t it. This was her ‘I spilled the nail polish!’ tone. Still panicky, but not like she was being attacked. Smiling, he slipped out of his coat and shoes, and still wearing his suit, walked past his streamlined, fancy, borderline useless apartment, and entered his room.

“... what in the Lord’s name happened here?”

“I tried to do, um, tie myself up, ye ken?”

“I can see that.” He stepped up to his large bed, his ‘American Psycho’ bed according to Fiona, and grinned down at his girlfriend.

She was tied up, sort of. Apparently she’d managed to tie her ankles to the corners of his bed, spreading her legs. She’d obviously spent a lot of time focusing on a harness for her torso, and the black rope hooked around her shoulders, neck, breasts, and ribs in a symmetrical, beautiful pattern. And she’d also managed to get the soft-looking rope around her waist and chest, and behind her to bind her hands against her back. At least, that’d been her plan.

She looked like a cat who got tangled up in yarn. She squirmed and wriggled, ass in the air, hands behind her, but her hands weren’t together. Right hand too high up her back, left hand struggling to get it lower but only making it worse, every attempt she made to get her hands free pulling her right hand tighter, while getting her left hand caught closer to her ass. Something had clearly gone wrong in how she’d arranged the pattern.

She turned her head enough to look at him, cheek planted to the sheets, gold eyes frowning in half panic, half annoyance and disappointment.

“This is hard!”

“I bet.” He came over to the bed and sat beside her, looking her up and down. “I didn’t realize you wanted to get tied up this badly. I can’t imagine Vrall would like this. She prefers to do the tying.”

He laughed softly, and took the rope she was tugging on with her left hand into his. He saw the mistake, a loop over the shoulder that should have gone around the wrist. There was a strange beauty to the rope, the symmetry and patterns against her skin. And, naturally, how it accented the shape of her large ass and breasts.

So of course, he took her shoulder, slid the loop down, and secured it around her wrist. How strange their relationship had come that, upon finding his girlfriend attempting to tie herself up and failing, his first instinct was to help her complete her foolish errand. So strange, and wonderful.

“You know we’re in the middle of a war, Fiona.”

“Nu uh! Ye’re nae Invictus.” She squirmed her hands in the knot, and her hands slipped free without much issue. “Yer nae doing it right! Ye need to loop it around in an X first, ye ken?”

“You know knots?”

“I do.”

“Or Vrall does?”

She rolled her eyes, squirmed some more, and tried to hit him with her ass. She succeeded, sort of. On her knees with her chest flat against the bed, ass in the air, she did manage to put some weight into it, but her legs were spread by the rope keeping her feet and knees apart. A gentle push from Damien had her back to the center of the bed, ass up and face down once again.

“Vrall gets too much credit,” she said, grumbling.

“She’s an ancient spider monster who spins web as a way of life. And she’s tied me up plenty of times.”

“Aye, but I am a young lass with internet!”

He choked on a laugh, and did as directed, crossing the rope in an X between her hands before looping the final wrist.

The result was beautiful. Damien took his time, admiring how the rope circled her limbs, her breasts, her neck. And his admiring stirred something in Fiona pretty quick, because a few minutes later she was blushing and squirming again.

“Wait, is that why you did this? I’m in this war, even if I’m not really Invictus, and you wanted to surprise me? Take my mind off it?”

She grinned and nodded, cheek still planted to the sheets.

“Aye. Ye deserve something special.”

Uh huh. He got the impression her gift wasn’t exactly selfless. As much as Vrall loved to tie Damien up, web him up, and keep him helpless, Fiona wanted to be tied up, pinned down, and rendered helpless. They’d tied her up before, used handcuffs and the like, but never a full body thing like this.

“Aye!” She was pleased with her gift, and herself, cause she damn well knew how attractive he found her.

So naturally, the only course of action was to not engage. He lay beside her, facing her, and smiled. The moment she realized he didn't plan to move, her eyes went wide, and she squirmed with renewed enthusiasm, and frustration.

“Tae fuck?”

He choked on a laugh. “What? I came home, intent on talking to my girlfriend about my day.”

“Aye, we can do that. After ye fuck me!”

“Carthians been giving you any trouble? They should be avoiding contact with the Begotten, but—”

She squealed in frustration. “After! Now, do me, ye wanker!”

He grinned at her. Jokes. How often did he make jokes? Never, except maybe one or two with Jack. This silly little woman got something out of him he didn't ever normally do, and it came so damn naturally.

Chuckling, he got behind her, and gave her a good spank, earning a happy squeak from her. Tying herself up, and then having him finish tying her up, had her glistening.

He didn't waste anymore time.

---

He didn't feed on her this time. He was healed now, fully functional, and didn't need her powerful monster blood pumping through his undead veins. Not that he wouldn't ever feed on her again, cause she loved it, and he'd be lying if he said he didn't crave the strange rush her unusual blood gave him. But sometimes, it was nice to be able to have a coherent conversation with his lover after sex.

When they were done, he untied her. They hugged, kissed, and spent the next hour chatting about things. Not serious things. Fun things. Music, movies, hobbies.

He could only hope Jack's night was going as well as his.

"I've been meaning to tell ye. Ye should talk to Athalia."

"Athalia? Why?"

"She was there, when Garry's goons attacked the Invictus building, ye ken? Spying. She might know something."

"I'd ... prefer to not involve the Begotten."

"It's just a question. It cannae hurt, can it?"

It very much could.

~~Jack~~

He took a deep, useless breath, and pushed open the doors of the cathedral.

Empty, as expected, and no candles lit either, as expected; middle of the night on a Wednesday, after all. Not much streetlight got in through the stained glass windows, high up as the beautiful windows were. And with how big the cathedral was, it was a damn spooky place to visit at night.

South Hill Cemetery used to have a problem with vandalism, according to Triss, before she took it as her home and basically haunted it. She didn't hang out there anymore, but kine still avoided it. But the cathedral had never had a vandalism problem, maybe because of how close it was to Three Kings Cemetery and Jacob's ritual room. Kine always avoided it, convinced it was haunted. Maybe Maria had more to do with that than Jacob.

Jack understood how they came to that conclusion, standing in the darkness and center isle of the huge building, with nothing but deadly silence to greet him. Creepy. If some evil priest dude suddenly came out singing Disney's Hellfire, it would have fit perfectly.

He and his familiars weren't alone. At the end of the isle, in the front line of pews, sat a woman. Jesus christ, did she know he was coming? He'd meant to show up as a surprise, throw her off, catch her off guard so she wouldn't have the time to set up arguments. So much for that. Probably a dumb idea to ask Damien to ask her about Michael, and basically announce Jack's intentions.

Mulder looked around, cawed a few times, and took to the air. He found one of the pews near the front, perched, and went quiet. Scully wasn't feeling as brave apparently. With a quiet croon, she shifted along his shoulder closer to his cheek, and nudged her head against his neck and jawline a few times. It was more expression than his crows usually used since becoming undead. She was afraid.

~It's ok~, he said through their connection. ~She won't hurt you. See Mulder? He's fine.~

~She might hurt you, master.~

~She might try. If she does, stay out of it, ok?~

~Ok master. Be careful.~

He kissed Scully's head, and looked back to the front pew. From behind, all he could see was her long black hair. She was a small woman, Maria. Not Natasha small. More like, Avery small, without muscle. But as he inched up the isle, Maria felt anything but small. The aura on her was massive, and cold. Mist dripped off her onto the floor, and the closer he got, the more it looked like he was entering a haunted cathedral. It got so thick he wondered if she had an ice machine hidden somewhere.

“I guess Damien asking you about Michael and Garry tipped you off.”

“Of course.”

“And I suppose you’re going tell me what you told him?”

“Of course.”

Sighing, Jack came closer, each step a quiet clop of business shoe against the beautiful floor. She didn’t respond. Eventually, Jack stepped around the front pew, and looked down at the seated Elder.

“That’s not good enough,” he said.

Maria, eyes on the crucifix behind the pulpit, didn’t even blink as Jack came into her view.

“I do not care.” Pure ice in her voice, and she made sure to keep her eyes on the cross, as if it gave her strength, or was her lifeline to keep her from sinking.

“Then I guess this conversation is going to suck.” He sat down on the pew on her left, five feet between them, and leaned forward to place his elbows on his knees. Mulder was on the other front pew, isle between them, and he watched Maria with one eye. Scully on the other hand, already seated on Jack’s left shoulder, stayed nestled against his neck and thankful it was a barrier between her and the evil corpse lady.

“I have nothing to tell you.”

“You know that’s not true.”

“Michael’s secrets have no value in winning this war.”

“Not winning the war, no, but they could help me stop it.”

She scoffed and slowly shook her head. “This war has been brewing for decades, child. It will happen.”

“You’re really happy letting it happen? With people dying, people who don’t need to?”

“Yes.” An instant reply.

“I don’t believe you believe that.” He sighed and looked down as he netted his fingers between his knees. “I’m thankful, you know.”

“Thankful?”

“That you decided to not make an enemy of me. At least, not officially.”

“And why is that? Fear for your life?”

“Because,” Jack said, “I don’t want to fight. I don’t want to fight you, or anyone.”

“You sound like Mire.”

Damn, he didn’t see that coming. His breath caught in his throat, and he looked at the corpse woman, even as she refused to look his way.

“I wonder why Viktor sired a guy like Julias. They were nothing alike.”

“They had more similarities than you realize. But, yes, they also had vast differences. Viktor didn’t sire him for posterity. He sired him because he knew Julias would grow into a powerful tool.”

Jack couldn’t imagine siring someone with full intent to use them like a tool in a toolbox. But, Elaine had said as much, and Maria was confirming. Would Antoinette use Samantha like a tool for some goal, in some shitty future he didn’t want to even think about?

“And you know Julias would be trying to stop this war.”

“Trying, and failing. He sat on our council, Jack.” Hearing her use his first name was freaky. “He argued with Michael constantly about the Carthians.”

“And what did you do?”

“I let them.”

“Didn’t really expect passivity from you, Maria.”

“I have my own goals. I will not let the Carthians and Invictus ruin my second life.”

“Garry assumed you’d want to get more involved. Hence the whole, you know, him going to war while you were injured.”

“I don’t care how stupid Garry is, or Michael.”

He raised a brow. “How did you even get on the council?”

“I am powerful, wise, and have connections. And I knew I could do much for the Lancea et Sanctum from a position of power, beside Viktor and Michael.”

“True that.” He smiled at her, hoping the casual language might earn some reaction. A frown, a grin, something. She didn’t look away from the cross, and her face did not change.

She was stone-walling him, and he wouldn’t be able to get anything out of her until he broke through that wall. Which meant this conversation had to get painful.

“Maria,” he said, “I need to know why Michael and Garry hate each other so much.”

“Ask them. I will not divulge Michael’s secrets.” At least she didn’t fall back on last names and titles. There was some hope for the conversation.

“I’m tempted, believe me. But I know it’ll end badly.”

“Obviously.”

“So I’m asking you.”

“And I said, no.”

“I’m going to stop this stupid war before it gets people killed, Maria.”

“Gloria’s childe has already died.”

“You don’t believe that.”

She frowned, but it lasted a whole half a second before her face solidified. “Damien tells you too much.”

“He is my best friend.”

“Yes, for some reason.”

For some reason? This woman, this fucking woman, was still thinking about Jack in a bad light. Sure, she was willing to leave him be. Sure, she accepted and knew Lucas had become a horrible person that needed to die. But the woman still couldn’t get past her hatred for him, and that was a problem, a problem he needed to resolve right now.

~Scully, Mulder, this is going to get violent. Get high.~

Both familiars took to the air, and found perches high up on the second floor balcony. It being a cathedral, the second floor was really high up. They should be safe. And with their new undead bodies, they wouldn't die from a random piece of wood hitting them.

Time to poke the bear.

“You want a reason? Because, despite being sired by a fucking psychopath, Damien has a conscience. He knew what he was doing was fucking wrong, and that's how I managed to Dominate him. He was struggling with every single request his sire made of him, and it made him vulnerable. And that was a good thing, because only a fucking lowlife would be comfortable doing the things Lucas wanted to do. Damien couldn't stomach the shit Lucas demanded of him, and it was eating him up inside. And that's why he's my friend.”

Maria went completely still. Still no frown or eye movement, but all normal subtle movements stopped as well, the tiny things even vampires did, shifting weight or tapping fingers and stuff. It all stopped. He was looking at a statue. All that meant was he'd have to hit her harder.

“You get what I'm saying, Maria? You were lovers with a monster, and it made life hell for a lot of people. Damien's had fifty years of hell because of Lucas, and you're not innocent in that.” That earned a small twitch from her, but nothing more. “I don't know how many people Lucas killed who didn't deserve it. A lot, I'm guessing. A lot of good Kindred who didn't know better died attacking the Prince under his orders, too. Just thinking about the vampires that died, the ones Antoinette killed, the ones I killed using Damien, it makes me sick. Know why? Because unlike that shithole you loved — love — so much, I have a soul and a conscience.

“And that brings me to you, a bitter, fucking asshole. And I've been happy to stay hands off about it as long as you stayed out of the way, but it wasn't always like that, was it? You, stupid and out of your god damn mind, actually sold out the only woman to ever put up with your shit, and trust you. Natasha, one of the nicest people in all of Dolareido. You sold her out, knowing full well it might get her killed, because you were so pathetic, so desperate, you'd do anything to help that monster." He leaned in toward her a little, enough so he knew she could see him in the corner of her eye. "You sold her out for thirty pieces of silver. Except not silver, you sold her out for dick. Hope it was worth it."

Slowly, the ghost woman turned to face him, just her head though, like a scene out of a horror movie where a corpse turns its head. And the ice cold fury in her eyes froze him to the bone.

If there was one way he was going to die, it'd be pissing off a woman like Maria.

"The only reason you are not dead, Jack, is because the Prince—"

"I already told the Prince I was paying you a visit, against her wishes." Interrupting an elder like Maria was a perfect way to make her angry. More kindling for the fire he was trying to build. "Whatever happens, happens. The Prince won't take it up with you, no matter what. You wanna take a swing at me? Go ahead, cause I'm not leaving until—"

She didn't move, still staring at him, but the world around them froze solid. Not frozen in cold, but darkness, as if black emptiness could bring things to a perfect standstill.

And that's when her vitae, and her will, slammed into him.

Jack stood up with a jolt, but it was too late. The shadows grew, and grew, and Maria slipped away, a blurry haze that faded into nothing as endless obsidian swallowed him whole. Shit, shit shit. He expected her to take a swing at him, not come at him using Nightmare. Oh shit shit fucking shit, Jack you fucking idiot.

He reached for his necklace. If he was going to take her in a fight like this, he—the necklace was gone. What? Where was the necklace? Why was it gone?

“What?” He spun around in the empty black, looking for the source. After three spins, he jumped back from a tall slab of something moving. No, not moving, a mirror, catching his reflection and showing his movements. A creepy mirror at that, with black vines for a frame, covered in thorns.

The mirror was tall, allowing Jack to see from foot to face, and he stared at his reflection, and the things behind it. Dolareido. His mansion. His old apartment. Bloodlust. Xnomina. The Elysium Tower. His reflection grinned at him, and Jack met the bastard’s eyes as more things slid past him in the mirror. Damien and Fiona, sitting around, chatting, with each other and the reflection still looking at Jack through the mirror. Natasha and the boys sat across from them, in Jack’s mansion, chatting away. Jessy and Eric faded into view, talking with the rest of them. Eventually so did Triss and Jennifer. His mom, Antoinette, even Elaine and Antoinette’s ghouls all faded in.

Finally, after the room was full of people happily chatting away, each often making statements towards the reflection in a language Jack couldn’t understand, Veronica faded in. His first thrall, dressed in her half suit half maid uniform, came up to the reflection, and tugged on his hand in that meek ‘please master do things to me’ way she liked to.

Jack’s reflection grinned at Jack, slowly turned around, gently took Veronica’s head, and broke her neck.

“No!” Jack grabbed the mirror, but the thorns stabbed into his hands and drew blood. Red, regular, normal blood.

His reflection grinned back at him again, and then the others. They didn’t notice what the monster had done, and kept talking with each other. The reflection stepped over Veronica's twitching body, and got to work on the rest of the group. First Damien, his best friend. He pulled Damien's head off just as the man's eyes went wide in realization, only to crumble into ash. Fiona noticed, and erupted into harsh screams, but the reflection turned and slashed her throat open with a knife from within his suit jacket. She stared at him, eyes wider than Jack ever thought possible, and she fell to her knees, blood gushing down over her t-shirt.

He kept going. Art and Matt next, he stabbed each of them in the chest, straight in the heart, and blood squirted from the gaping wounds. Natasha shrieked, and the reflection cut her head off. It bounced once, twice, before crumbling into ash.

And on it went. Jessy and Eric died next, Eric only realizing they were under attack when Jack's reflection killed his lover. Then Jennifer, and Beatrice. Then Antoinette's ghouls. They all shrieked in terror and agony as they died.

The reflection took his time with his mom and Antoinette. He forced them both down on their knees, as if he had the strength of a god, and they were helpless to him.

"Don't!" Jack screamed into the mirror, squeezing it harder and shaking it. The thorns drew more of his blood, but the vines held the mirror solid.

"Please don't! Jack, please!" his mom cried, but the reflection didn't stop. Grinning at Jack, his reflection sawed through her neck, taking his sweet time beheading her and earning more screams, sending dark vampire blood everywhere before it turned into tiny puffs of burning cinder and cooling ash.

Antoinette shed a single tear, and closed her eyes, not saying a word or showing any weakness, as Jack's reflection did the same to her. He grinned at Jack with every slow sawing motion of his hand, blade slicing through his lover's neck like butter.

Surrounded by corpses and piles of soot, Jack's reflection walked up to the mirror again, drenched in blood and crimson-soaked ashes. Behind him, Elaine grinned, and she leaned down to hug his reflection from behind.

"If you had shared with me," Elaine said, not to his reflection, but to him, her brown eyes staring into his through the mirror, "none of this would have happened. If you had given him to me, they wouldn't have had to die."

"You ... you did this!?" Jack let go of the vines and punched the mirror straight on. It vibrated as his wounds splattered the flat surface with blood, but it didn't break, sending agonizing pain through his hands. "Elaine!"

She ran her hands down his reflection's bloodied suit jacket and shirt, and groaned in delight as she kept her gaze locked with Jack's.

"If only you had given me what I wanted. Now, well, I guess I'll be to the Ripper, what Antoinette was to you, Jack. And we'll do more than treat Dolareido like a petri dish. We'll control this city, and everyone in it will be our slaves."

Jack slapped his bleeding hands against the mirror again and again, desperate to get through, eyes blurring with tears. Stop them! Stop them! Do something! But he couldn't do anything, blocked, stopped by this mirror.

This must have been what it was like for the Ripper, locked in Jack's mind, unable to affect the world around him. Somehow, he'd lost the necklace. Somehow, the Ripper had broken free when Jack wasn't being vigilant with the meditations Elaine taught him. Somehow, something had happened, and now everything was over.

It wasn't fair! This was ... this was...

This wasn't real.

Jack pushed the pain in his hands out of his mind, and glared at his reflection and the vampire hugging him as he stood up.

“Maria...”

The people in the mirror didn't respond.

Growling, Jack glared at his reflection and the woman beside him, and he clicked his teeth together as he found the words. The words were there, buried in the obsidian endlessness that pressed in on his brain, filling him with a cold only death could understand, but he found them. He dragged them up from the muck, from a blurry underworld where Maria tried to hide them.

“This isn't real. This isn't fucking real!” Slowly, he pushed a finger against the mirror. His hands no longer bled or ached, and the finger's gentle touch was enough to put a spreading crack through flat surface toward its edges. The reflection's image was cut across in several places, but it still held its ground, glaring at him. “This is a nightmare.”

“Nightmare's can reflect reality.” Maria's raspy, corpse voice. The ghost woman stepped out from behind the mirror, and joined Jack, glowering as she eventually stood beside him and gestured at the mirror. “This curse is going to eat you up, Jack. It's going to ruin you, like it did Viktor. It's going to take over, and kill all the people you love. And Elaine wants its power, you know that. She'll betray you, and take the power for her own. Just as she sired Viktor to be her tool, she will use her great grandchilde as a tool.”

Jack forced himself to look in the mirror, to see his blood-soaked, grinning reflection, and the elder vampire still hugging him from behind. Elaine winked at Jack through the mirror again as she pressed her chest hard enough against his reflection's back, her large breasts pushed her suit jacket apart. The nightmare made sense, and every second he looked at his reflection, it threatened to pull him back into groggy, horrific belief. It could be real, it could be so very real.

But it wasn't.

With a heavy growl, Jack withdrew his finger, tightened it into a fist, and punched the mirror again. And this time, it exploded, shards of the nightmare scattering over the endless black around them.

The threading splinters of breaking mirror extended past the dark, bloodied vines surrounding it. The threads shot outward up and around Jack into the black around them, cutting through the onyx, and filling his ears with the sound of shattering glass. And, as if summoned by his own mind, the darkness did exactly that, shattering and crumbling around him.

He turned to his side, and met Maria's eyes again, watching her as her Nightmare collapsed into nothingness. Piece by piece, the illusion crumbled, leaving the two of them still staring at each other. Back in the cathedral, back with pews and stained glass windows. Back among unlit candles and a crucifix hanging behind the nearby pulpit. The two of them stood by the front pew, facing each other, the way they had been in the Nightmare.

"You broke my Nightmare quickly," she said, glaring at him with intent to kill, fangs bared. No ice anymore. Just fire. "I suppose you have your curse to thank for that."

Surprisingly, he didn't. He clutched his necklace, thanked God it was there this time, and returned Maria's glare.

"Not really. It was just that you made a mistake." Perhaps more than that. Ventrue tenacity, and his fucking stubbornness certainly helped. But she had made a mistake.

"Mistake?"

“You crafted that nightmare yourself, didn’t you? Had some horrible idea you’d been brewing for some time that you wanted to hit me with.”

Her glare was her answer.

“Well, you made a mistake,” he continued. “You showed Elaine being ok with Antoinette’s death.”

Maria’s eyes softened, if only barely. “You honestly think that old snake would care if the Prince died?”

This woman. This woman! Just when Jack thought she wasn’t as bad as the rumors painted her out to be, she turned around and proved otherwise. No, she couldn’t be all bad, not when she was willing to let Jack live despite knowing he killed Lucas. She wasn’t the monster people thought she was, but she was a bitter, broken woman, sad with the world. Damien had said as much, but seeing her like this hurt him down to his guts. As much as Lucas deserved to die, Jack had been the one to kill him, and that meant Maria’s pain was partly his fault.

If he was going to do anything about it, he had to get through to her.

“Elaine is a crafty snake, I agree with you there.” He took a step toward the small woman, four feet now between them. “But she wouldn’t kill Antoinette, or let her die. Hell, if push came to shove, it wouldn’t surprise me to see Elaine risk her life to save Antoinette’s. That’s a friendship that won’t ever die.”

“I don’t—”

Jack took another step closer. “I know you don’t! You’re so convinced everything and everyone in this world is horrible. So convinced everyone’s a shitty person, deep down, so convinced that there’s nothing and no one in this world worth living for.”

Her eyes widened again at that, and she looked down as she took a step back. That'd hurt her, a lot more than he'd meant for it to.

“Damien told you?”

“What? Damien hasn't told me ... oh, oh Maria. Is that what that thing with Avery was about? You were hoping she'd—”

Maria hit him, hit him hard, and he wasn't prepared for it. Seeing her face crumble, her expression destroyed by the turn of the conversation, had completely pulled his feet out from under him, and he let his guard down. So when she put all her power into a punch and drove it into his chest, it sent him up and over, flipping once before sprawling on his back. His eyes snapped open wide, and he stared up at the ceiling as reality came back to him.

She'd broken bones. A lot of bones. So much for her arms not being fully healed.

Snarling, he pulled his necklace off and tossed it behind him. Scully flew down and scooped it up as Jack forced himself to his feet. Maria was already marching toward him; hitting him so hard had launched her back a ways, too. And thankfully she wasn't a Mekhet or Daeva, not enough speed to close the distance instantly.

He rolled to his feet, and summoned his vitae. Ventrue Resilience pumped through his undead veins, forcing his bones back in place and knitting them together well enough he could move without crumbling. Without his necklace to hold his Beast down, the unnatural power of the curse flooded him. It was a pale comparison to what it could summon when the Ripper was running the show, but it'd be enough to fight Maria. Fight her, and hope to god he could get through to her.

“Maria.”

“Silence! How dare you, how dare you! Vile, filthy child.” She dove at him, face locked in a snarl. But he stepped to the side, hands up and pushing aside her punch. “I’ll kill you!”

“No you won’t!” Christ, if she killed him, that’d really suck. This whole gambit would be pretty damn pointless if he died.

“You don’t understand me! You know nothing!” She came at him again, and instead of the cold, deadly woman who’d hit him with one nasty Nightmare, this woman was an inferno. This was good. Crazy rage meant power, sure, but it also meant mistakes, and emotion. It meant he might get through her icy walls and actually reach her.

“I know enough! I know how hurt you are! I know how much Lucas meant to you, and I can’t imagine how much it must have hurt to see him becoming who he was!” He ducked under her punch, and drove his knee up into her chest. He didn’t have the strength of an ancient Nosferatu, not like the Ripper did, but he could still throw a damn good knee, and Maria screamed in pain and anger as his knee folded her in half.

But she recovered quickly, too damn quickly, jumping back to her feet and coming at him again, throwing punches and claws alike. She didn’t have claws, but the ghost woman’s normal nails would have been enough to cut through suit and skin, with how much power she was putting behind those swings.

“Shut up shut up!” Her fist found his forearm, and the blow sent him spinning. Only Resilience kept his arm from breaking in half like a twig.

She’d expected it to break though, and he capitalized, crouching in close and driving his fist up into her jaw. As scary as Maria’s unusual Nosferatu deformation was, with her corpse skin and misty body, she was still a vampire, made of dry meat and bone. A hard punch to her jaw sent her flying back, but she quick-stepped with the motion backward and kept from falling over.

“Maria, you know why I’m here, talking to you now? You know why I rushed over to get to you when Damien sent me that warning? Why I stopped Avery?”

“Don’t disguise your issues with Avery, and your need with information about Michael, with some sort of care for me, Jack.”

“You think I don’t care about you?”

“Of course you don’t care about me!” She threw herself at him, full on banshee, screaming while her white gown flowed in the air around her. But like he expected, she was full on rage mode, and not thinking straight.

He ducked underneath her, and threw a fist up, catching her in the stomach. She should have seen it coming, but she was blind with anger. Taking her down would be easy. She folded over his fist, and momentum kept her going, turning her into a ball that crashed onto the stage beside the pulpit.

“Maria! I came here to talk to you because I need information, yes. And I know that you hate me, hate me for what I did, but I never hated you!”

She recovered quickly, driven by hate he’d only ever known for someone once before. The sort of hate that boils in the blood and burns in the bones. The sort of hate that drives you like a whip on the back. She wasn’t thinking straight, she wasn’t thinking at all, but that’s what he needed if he was going to get through to her. He just needed to make sure she didn’t tear him in half before he did.

“Stupid child! Stupid, worthless child! You stole everything from me!”

“Lucas wasn’t everything! He was scum, Maria, and you know it! And now he’s gone, and I’m sorry it hurt you. I’m sorry I hurt you! But that doesn’t need to be who you are, a wounded animal who snaps and bites at everyone who sticks out a helping hand! Christ, I’m not your enemy!”

“You are my only enemy!”

She came at him again, faster, her Nos strength pumping through her. If she’d been calmer, maybe she’d have come at him smarter, or maybe back off, use Obfuscate, and trick his eyes. If she approached him cold and tactically, he knew he’d struggle to win this fight without Ripper’s help. But she shrieked as she came at him, a howling animal, fully intent on running him down and tearing into him.

He stood his ground, and as she swung her right hand at him, he caught it. The impact was massive, and his body shook down to his heels as her punch threatened to shatter his bones. But the vitae coursing through him managed the impact, and the two of them slid along the floor of the cathedral. She tried to pull her hand back, but he held on. Screaming like she’d gotten stuck in a bear trap, she swung at him with her other fist, and he caught that one as well, getting his fingers around her wrist. Strong as she was, she was still smaller and lighter than him, and now with both her hands trapped, every motion she made to get away took him with her.

“Maria!”

“Die! Die you stupid boy!”

“Maria! You made a mistake!”

“I have never—”

“You made a mistake! You trusted a man, and it turned out he was a villain! And you know it! You know it, and you need to accept it. You need to forgive yourself, and accept that other people are willing to forgive you for it! Natasha, Damien, and me. I nearly fucking died because of you, and so did the love of my life, but good fucking god, we're willing to forgive you!"

"How dare you presume I desire your forgiveness!"

He yanked on her arms, causing them both to spin and stumble, nearly falling. "I'm here trying to get through to you, you stupid fossil, because I'm saying it's ok! It's ok that you made a mistake. We all fucking make them! You don't have to be an angry, closed off, hateful bitch! Natasha cares about you. Damien definitely cares about you. And hell, I care about you. You never did me wrong till that night you helped Lucas."

"Liar!"

Well, her icy walls were definitely down, but now he held a raging hellfire by the horns, and he wasn't making much progress.

So he did the only thing he could think of. Tough love. He yanked her in close, and slammed his head straight down at the bridge of her nose.

Her head snapped back as her nose broke with a satisfying crunch. She brought it up again, glaring at him, rage still burning in her eyes. And before she could do something smart, like use her legs, he yanked her in, and did it again, skull smashing her face in hard enough to make her grunt and collapse back. He let go of her hands, and she fell on her ass with all the grace of a legless dog.

"Listen to me, god damn it! I am not your enemy, and you know it! You're the one that fucked up, trusting a man like Lucas. You betrayed Natasha, and it nearly got a bunch of people killed. But I get it! I fucking get it. If Antoinette turned into some sort of villain, I'm sure I'd be helping her for years before finally breaking free of her. And every night thereafter, I'd be eating myself up, feeling like utter dogshit for the friends I betrayed and the lives I might have ruined. Get what I'm saying? I'd have done the same thing! Made the same mistake!"

He crouched down beside her, ready to jump away if she swung at him, but she'd calmed enough to clutch her face and touch her broken nose as she glared at him. Probably just recovering for round two.

"And you know what I'd do if that happened?" he asked. "I'd apologize to the people I hurt. Because I know they would care about me, even if I fucked up. I don't know if it's because you're a Nosferatu, and got royally screwed in that department, or maybe it's just an elder thing, but it's clear you don't think anyone cares about you. Damien's been chiseling at that wall for over two years now and making progress, but I don't have his patience. People care about you, Maria, you stupid dumbass, but your head is stuck so far up your ass all you can imagine doing is brooding in your den for the rest of your second life, assuming everyone hates you.

"You didn't lose everyone when Lucas died. But you did fuck up, helping him. You made a mistake, and you need to apologize for it. If you swallowed your pride long enough to do that, you'd be surprised how many of us would happily be your friend." He hated playing shrink, but he hated when people didn't have a shred of awareness more. And he hated seeing someone suffer when they didn't need to, even more. "This doesn't need to be some ridiculous cliché of the scary vampire who lives alone, hating everyone and everything for a thousand years because of a tragic incident in her past."

Maria lowered her hand, and stared at him like he'd just ripped out her guts and stepped on them. Agony, and rage. No one had talked to her like this in a long long time, no doubt, and she definitely didn't want to hear it from him, a kid. The kid who killed her lover, at that.

“You insult me in a way no one ever has, and you expect me to believe—”

“Yes! Believe!” He threw up his hands. “Sorry, I’m doing a horrible job explaining this, but you aren’t making it any easier, Maria. What I’m trying to get you to understand, is you made a mistake, but instead of just owning up to it, you started alienating everyone. And you already did that before! So you went from closed off, intimidating Invictus, to terrifying hermit church lady. If you’d just apologized to the people you nearly got killed, to the people you betrayed, you’d be damn surprised. Not everyone is the bitter asshole you think they are. Not everyone is a twisted, hateful person who secretly wants everyone to suffer, or is willing to throw others under the bus for their own gain.

“So here’s what I want you to do. Look me in the eye and tell me you’re sorry about what you did.”

“You berate me in my own home and—”

“I’m sorry. I’m sorry I said that shit, I really am. Christ knows that was rude, and I hit below the belt. If Angela came up to me and told me ... anything, I’d have torn the building down trying to kill her. But Angela was my enemy. I’m not your enemy, ok?” He sat down, one knee up, and gestured to the scary woman sitting two feet from him. “Shit, I suck at this. What I’m asking is ... please, stop being an asshole, and let people in. Damien, Natasha, and me. I can be your friend, even if you hate my guts.” He leaned toward her and met her surprised eyes. “We’re not friends, but I never hated you. First time I met you, you scared the shit out of me, but I never thought badly of you. Hell, I was impressed. A Nos like you had every reason to go full villain mode, with your deformities.” No point in dancing around the elephant in the room, and his gut told him she’d appreciate the bluntness right now. “And after Viktor died, you and Michael invited my sire into the council, Viktor’s polar opposite. That told me a lot about you.”

“Viktor was a menace, and sadism grew deep in him.”

“Agreed.” He sighed, lowering his head as an idea popped up. If he wanted to get through to this woman, he’d have to show his hand, or at least relevant parts of it. “You know how Viktor and Tony died?”

“They fought over intelligence, and a mill was set on fire, killing them both.”

Slowly, Jack held up a hand. “I was there, and I set that fire, on purpose.”

Maria stared at him, unbelieving. But as they looked each other in the eyes for a while, the rage and hate slowly draining out of her expression, she eventually returned his sigh, and nodded.

“You killed Viktor and Tony.”

“Yeap.”

“How? Why?”

“Viktor took Julias and me because he needed back up, but also because he didn’t trust anyone else, I guess. If Julias got that intel, Viktor could trust him to give it to him. Tony and Rebecca were there, and Julias took her on while Viktor went after Tony. I went with Viktor. Him and Tony started arguing, and Viktor said something about taking the city from Antoinette — killing implied — and I said ... don’t do that.”

Maria winced, sucking in a breath, an almost casual expression that was very much not Maria. Progress.

“He attacked you.”

“Yeap, split me down the middle, face to crotch. Not deep enough to kill a fledgling, but damn close. Then Viktor and Tony started fighting for real. So there’s me, bleeding to death, and realizing the only way I could do something for the Prince, was if I took Viktor down. I had a lighter, from when Julias was teaching me about how fire was more deadly for older vampires. And it was a super old textile mill. Setting it on fire was stupid easy. Damn thing practically exploded.”

“You survived.”

“Crawled my way out of there, almost split in half and half burned up. Daniel found me.”

“Of course the sheriff did. The man has an infuriating habit of showing up randomly.” After another heavy sigh, Maria twisted on the floor to sit more on her side, a lady like position for a woman in a big white gown. “Why didn’t you tell Michael and I?”

“That I killed your fellow council member? Didn’t see that going well, even if you were happy Viktor was dead.”

“Prudence was smart.” She wrinkled her broken nose, and with a quiet, but still very gross clicking sound, she pushed it back into place with a palm. From how smoothly she did it, it was something she’d done plenty of times in the past. “You have been the center of many events since your embrace, Jack.”

“Tell me about it.” He pulled out a smile for her, something warm. Seemed fitting. “Sorry, for keeping it secret from you. And I got other secrets too, ones I’ll share with you, when I know it’s safe.”

“You come into my cathedral and demand I apologize for my actions, all with intent to learn my secrets about Michael, and yet you have apologized to me several times already...”

“It took a long time to realize what sort of person you really were, Maria. Antoinette sealed the deal, when she told me she talked to you about what the Ripper told you. Most everyone was convinced you’d come for my head if they found out.”

Her eyes fell, showing weakness, and she knew she was showing it, too.

“I knew the sort of man Lucas had become. And I knew that I could not blame you for what you did. I...” With a wavering voice, she shook her head, her long black hair lightly bouncing against her corpse skin. “I am sorry, Jack, for ... for all the things you rightly accused me of. Truly. I...” Sighing, she looked down at her fist, the one she’d hit him in the chest with. “I suppose all I really needed was to land one good punch, to realize it wasn’t what I wanted.”

His body relaxed, muscles releasing tension he hadn’t realized he’d still been holding onto. “Been there.”

“I have talked with Natasha, about what I did, but I ... did not lay my heart bare as I should have. And Damien, I let him get peeks of my guilt every so often, but even then, I have never truly apologized.”

“It’s understandable, it is. I didn’t come here cause I thought you were being unreasonable. If I was you, and had gone through the shit you had, damn right I’d be putting up walls and keeping people out. But, I also came here because I knew you were a good person, Maria.” He groaned with his own words. “Sorry, ‘knew you were a good person’ sounds like more stupid cliché shit, doesn’t it? Something right out of a story trope.”

“It does, the words of someone who has read far too much fiction written by teenagers.”

He laughed. She smiled. Great progress.

“What I’m trying to say is ... bad shit went down, is still going down, and everyone’s hurt. But we don’t have to be enemies. We can be friends—yes I know that sounds really juvenile, but I’m being serious. None of this secluded ancient vampire crap.”

“Easy for you to say, little Kindred, but I have been living a secluded life for over two hundred and fifty years.”

“Baby steps. Damien says you and him have grown a bond. Was he lying?”

She looked down. “No.”

“I’m no therapist, Maria. Just a kid who thinks most people, even assholes like yourself, aren’t as bad as they make themselves out to be, or as they think themselves to be. And I came here not just because I need information about Michael. I came because I want this animosity between us gone.”

She nodded, and reached behind herself to pull herself up onto the pew. Miraculously, nothing in the cathedral was damaged, and she sat down as she forced herself to look at him. Every time she did, it was obvious he’d pulled the scab off a big wound, making this whole conversation sting for her. But it had to be done if this was going to go anywhere.

“It will take time.”

He got up and sat next to her, a couple feet between them. Closer than before, but not too close.

“I ... I am surprised at how much you remind me of Antoinette.”

“Eh?”

“You are both convinced Kindred can rise above their baser natures. Admittedly, your lover handles this dilemma of Kindred instinct and humanly desires with far more grace and intelligence than you.”

He winced and clucked his tongue once. “Agreed.”

“But, I can admit that, given time, this very conversation could have happened between her and I. Again, with her managing the nuance with far more grace than you.”

He chuckled this time. “Agreed.”

“Still, I ... must thank you, Jack. It has been a long, long time since anyone has argued against me for such things. Most are content to leave Nosferatu as disfigured as I well alone. And those that aren't, I drive away. Damien is the first in many years to share more than five words with me.”

“He's a good guy.”

“He is. And you, as well. Infuriating, stupid, juvenile, but I ... cannot hide behind my rage any longer. You are not someone deserving of my hate.”

“Thank you. And, uh, if it's any consolation, that nightmare you hit me with was ... effective.” If not for his stubborn tenacity — the reason Julias had sired him — and the mistake Maria had made creating the nightmare, he'd probably be a ball on the floor, screaming.

“It is, and isn't. Thank you. But, you must understand about Michael. If I tell you about his past, I am violating his trust.”

“I think at this point, violating his trust is a small price to pay if it means saving him and the rest of the city from his own damn stupidity.”

That did it. She nodded slowly as she looked up, as if looking to God for some sort of guidance.

“Michael had a childe before Jessy. A man, who grew to love Garry.”

Oh fucking shit. “Where’s this dude now?” He already knew the answer.

“Dead.”

Chapter 146

~~Jack~~

“Dead? Did ... Michael kill him?”

Maria shook her head, and to his surprise, took a few seconds to comb her hair with her fingers. It was long and flat, and their fight had messed it up a bit. He forced down his smile. For a moment there, she reminded him of Antoinette.

“Garry was embraced here in Dolareido, not long before Michael and I came here, barely elders in our own right. We joined the Invictus, and Viktor established the council.”

“Surprising, considering he was a power-hungry asshole.”

“He was also wise, and his ... tendencies did not blind him, at least not at the time.” She shook her head. “I digress. Michael sired a childe not long after establishing himself in Dolareido. Back then the Carthians and Invictus fought with each other more openly; no kine technology to make it difficult. Deaths were rare, however. No open war, but the usual machinations of Kindred. Michael’s childe had a ... rough time, after his embrace. It was the turn of the century, after all.”

“Turn of the century? Oh, right, the 1900s.” Not a nice time to be gay.

“Kine often died in horrible circumstances, that long ago. Roland, Michael’s childe, lost his family. He was unstable before Michael embraced him. It only grew worse thereafter.”

“Rough.”

“Indeed. And considering the time period, homosexuality was difficult as well. Garry and Roland found solidarity in each other. And Michael was content to keep his hands out of it.”

“Until?”

“Until the Carthians grew more aggressive, starting brawls in the streets. Brawls that were ... perhaps warranted. The Invictus and Carthians have butted heads over territory since before he or I came to Dolareido, and it is now impossible to know what land originally belonged to who. Regardless, the violence grew, and Michael ordered his childe to never see Garry again.”

Jack slapped his forehead hard enough it echoed through the cathedral. “Has Michael seen a single movie in his whole life? Or read a fucking book?”

“Fiction? Rarely.”

“Figures.”

“Michael’s ignorance for storytelling aside, he knew Roland would defy him. Steps were taken to keep Roland from seeing Garry, and sometimes they were ... less than peaceful. And you know how Gangrels can be.”

“Yeap.” The idea of locking Jessy up in a box to stop her from seeing Eric was hilarious. Plus, being a Gangrel, she had ways to get through things other vampires couldn’t. Only powerful Gangrels could turn into clouds of smoke, but the younger ones still had ways.

“We don’t know what happened or how, but we do know Garry came to us, begging for us to find Roland. Apparently he’d threatened suicide. He was a fledgling, and fledglings are often unstable. And as I said, Roland’s first life had been unstable enough.”

Fledglings were unstable for a good reason. They'd literally just died, so that sucked. They woke up looking all pale and thin. They suddenly had a new set of instincts with a mind of their own fighting to get out. And the only way they could eat now, was drinking other people's blood. The ethical dilemma alone was enough to tip some new Kindred into suicide territory. Far as Jack knew, most managed to find some solace in that they didn't have to murder anyone, and hell, the Kiss was pleasurable. But it was still taking blood from unwitting, and sometimes unwilling victims.

Then there was the whole problem with being yanked out of their previous lives. Sure, lots of Kindred held up a facade so they could still interact with people from their first lives, but not family. Not close friends. You couldn't trick those two, not forever, and any kine that figured out what was going on either ended up bound by the Vinculum, embraced if the Prince allowed it, or dead.

And from what Maria said, Roland had issues in the family and friends department.

"You didn't find him?"

"Michael looked. He ... hesitated to trust Garry, but looked eventually. Perhaps it was that hesitation that led to Roland's demise, we don't know. But he was not found until the next night, a pile of ashes in his apartment, drapes pulled open."

"Damn that's ... that's really rough. Suicide note?"

"Yes, though it provided little resolution, only that Roland was miserable with all circumstances, and the promise of immortality seemed more a curse. He said goodbye to Michael, to Garry, and that was all."

"Fake?"

“Garry insisted Roland was extremely depressed beforehand, and Michael checked the handwriting. Either a rather cunning Carthian plotted against Michael and went after his childe to torture him, and faked the suicide, or the reality was as it appeared.”

Sighing — lot of sighing tonight — Jack leaned back against the pew, and motioned with a finger to his birds. They came down to join him again, and Scully dropped his necklace on his head for him. A small adjustment later and it was around his neck again, and immediately the Beast in his guts quieted. His two familiars got comfortable on his shoulders again, and he made sure to give each of them proper scratches on the back of their heads. The conversation with Maria was making him feel affectionate, and sad.

“So Garry blames Michael.”

“Yes. And Michael blames Garry, for creating the unusual situation for Roland at all, to pick between Carthian and Invictus.”

“And this was over a century ago?”

“Yes.”

“Long time to hold a grudge.”

“Is it?” She raised a brow as she looked at him. “I do not fault you for looking for the good in everyone, young vampire, but do not be so foolish to think that vampires — or any sentient — wouldn’t hold a grudge for hundreds of years. Scars last for a long, long time.”

He winced at that. “Yeah, I guess. Just ... damn, that is some serious drama shit. Personal shit.”

“I kept it secret for a reason.”

“I’m glad you told me, I am. But now I gotta figure out a way to use it to stop this war.”

She shook her head. “Do not be so stupid as to think this war is purely over the personal issues between those two. The Carthians and Invictus fight each other in every city with a vampire presence.”

“Yeah, I get that, and I get why. But I still think I can at least bring us back to a shitty truce if I can get those two to come to some kind of understanding.”

“Unlikely, but not impossible.”

Mulder and Scully cawed a few times, and rubbed their heads into the sides of his head. He took a few seconds to assure each of them he was fine, scratched them behind the neck, and stood up.

“Damien said you think Michael didn’t kill her.”

“Yes.”

“Damien’s also pretty sure Amanda’s good enough to not get caught in some shitty distraction maneuver from the Carthians, and accidentally go up in flames.”

“Damien is perhaps correct in that, I do not know. I know little of the fledgling, but her sire Gloria isn’t exactly a ... methodical sort.”

He laughed, earning a small smile from the woman that never smiled. Gloria Jennings was a bit of an airhead, which was all sorts of weird for a Mekhet. Then again, gossip was information, and Mekhet absolutely loved information.

“Three options then. Amanda screwed up and Garry’s distraction accidentally killed her. Which is what Michael says happened, and is using as his reason to go on the aggressive against the Carthians. Option two, Michael killed her, is lying about how she died, and is using the lie so he can go on the aggressive. Or ... option three, Amanda’s still alive. Michael says she’s dead, so if she’s alive, he might have her stashed somewhere? But, why would he do that and not just kill her?”

“Because my once fellow councilman is not Viktor or Tony or ... or Lucas, young Ventrue. He is both smart enough to want to avoid creating unnecessary enemies, and not so bloodthirsty that murdering a child would not faze him.” She managed another small smile as she looked up at him from the pew. “In this regard, I suppose I am thinking as you, and not assuming everyone is a heartless bastard.”

“Let’s hope being an optimist doesn’t backfire and get me killed. I —” His phone buzzed, and he took a quick peek. “It’s Damien.”

“Go. We are done here.” Nodding, the corpse lady stood up, dusted off her beautiful white gown, and started up the stage, headed toward her den below. “Be careful, Jack. And please do not spread this information about Garry and Michael lightly.”

“I won’t. You got my word on that.”

She nodded again, took a deep, heavy sigh, and disappeared around the curved wall behind the gigantic organ.

~Dangerous, ~ Mulder said.

~She’s sad, ~ Scully said.

~She’s definitely dangerous, and sad. But not as sad as she used to be. Hopefully that tussle gave her a little ... closure, I guess.~

He checked the message from Damien.

~Fiona thinks Athalia might know something about Garry’s attack on Xnomina, ~ the message read.

~Shit. I really want to keep them out of this. If we start getting them involved, Garry might ask Avery for help, and she might even do it, too. We don't exactly get along.~

~Maybe. How did your heart-to-heart go with Maria?~

~Well. Got what I needed.~

~Great. How?~

~Brute force psychology.~ Jack laughed as he texted the message. Brute force psychology that nearly got him killed.

~Interesting. Perhaps the same can be used on Avery?~

Ugh. It had been borderline kamikaze to use against Maria, and very well could be again with Avery. But Avery's bitch attitude wasn't exactly unwarranted, considering the shit she'd put up with in the past, and her goals as an Uratha. Sure, she made everything a thousand times harder than she needed to, but she also wasn't hoping to kill Jack either. Hopefully.

~Natasha is handling things on that front. If Avery gives her trouble, I trust her to deal with it.~

~And any other trouble that comes her way? This Carthian Invictus turf war seems oddly timed, doesn't it?~

Jack groaned and rubbed his face. ~Because it's happening just as we started to figure out more about what the fuck Black Blood is up to? Yeah, I noticed that. But Tash and the Prince are a pretty deadly combo. I trust Tash with this, and we got our hands full anyway.~

They had to get this war dealt with as soon as possible, before something else bit them in the ass while they were too busy dealing with bullshit.

~~Natasha~~

The Prince sighed as she leaned back in her chair. On the top floor of the Elysium Tower, Natasha stood in front of her boss's large desk, squirming. Not because she was scared; she'd gotten used to the Prince, mostly. Scared because how this conversation went could have an enormous effect on the city at large, and she didn't really like having that responsibility. She was a Mekhet, and would always prefer to be on the sidelines.

Case in point, Daniel stood next to the Prince, and Tash knew her sire might say three words in the whole meeting.

"Please, spare no details, Miss Vola."

"R-Right." And she didn't. She told the Prince about the trip into the Hisil with the boys, Eric, and Sándor. She told her about their encounter with Street-Tail King; mentioning its name earned a scowl from her. And she told her about what Sándor said about the tear.

"Minerva's legacy..." Antoinette looked up as she sighed, and combed her hair over her shoulder with her fingers, down over her suit jacket's chest. "My old friend's experiments with ephemera had progressed further than I thought."

"Indeed," Daniel said, and he adjusted his glasses with a single finger. One.

Natasha nodded. "And Jack is convinced B-B ... Black Blood is responsible for the tears. Or at least, is connected to them."

"That creature is insidious," Antoinette said. "I believe Jack is correct. Black Blood is a spirit of grand intent, and if bringing down the Gauntlet is within its power, it will do so. Spirits would love nothing more than the freedom to visit the physical world ad nauseam."

“B-But Street-Tail King doesn’t want it gone.”

“Yes, that is peculiar, is it not? Perhaps it has something to do with what Sándor noticed, that the tear was not cutting to a realm he recognized. And then there is the incident of Jack and the Begotten becoming trapped in that strange realm of ghosts.”

“I’m n-not following.”

“Spirits do not like the Gauntlet. If Street-Tail King has given information that will usurp Black Blood’s plan to destroy the Gauntlet, we can only surmise that something else is at risk.”

“M-Maybe Street-Tail King is happy ruining Black Blood’s plans? They are rivals.”

“Oui, but even I would side with an enemy if we shared a goal of such colossal value.”

“Then...” She tapped her temple as she looked down, frowning, juggling thoughts. “The tears and M-Minerva’s legacy might overlap, but maybe something else would happen too?”

The Prince leaned forward, elbows on the table, fingers netted together in front of her. Classic thinking pose of a mob boss.

“Minerva threatened much, if Avery is correct. But I have no recollection of her experiments ever touching on realms other than the Shadow Realm. If these tears are opening ways to other realms, then I fear there is a connection.”

The way she said ‘other realms’ sent ice down Natasha’s spine.

“Maybe Minerva’s legacy, d-destroying the Gauntlet, could do the same to other barriers between us and other realms? Or maybe...” “Natasha held up her hands and mashed them together, as if squashing different colors of clay. “And instead of only the physical and sp-pirit realms connecting directly, it'd be ... more of them? M ... Maybe all of them?"

Her sire smiled at her for a tenth of a second before nodding at her. "Smart." Two.

"And that does indeed sound like something a scheming spirit like Street-Tail King may be hesitant to allow. Though in truth, I am surprised it gave the information without enforcing a deal."

"It almost did! My ... the b-boys stopped it. They were convinced it wasn't helping earlier without a deal because it hates Avery, no other reason. They were right."

Antoinette laughed softly, shaking her head. "Perhaps. I doubt it was that simple. In all likelihood, it was waiting for an excuse to give the information without losing face."

"I guess that m-makes sense."

"This information is ... problematic. Dealing with Black Blood is never easy."

"And Jacob," Natasha said.

Antoinette shook her head. "I will not blindly assume that Jacob is also responsible or linked to Black Blood's actions. But, I have to accept that it is a strong possibility. Minerva knew Black Blood, but she knew Jacob best of all, and to my chagrin, it would not surprise me if my old friend knew enough about his lover to be able to recreate her experiment."

"B-But ... why?" Natasha raised her hands with a shrug. "Why would he want to do something like that? I mean, it sounds..."

"Apocalyptic," Daniel said. And that was three.

“Indeed. The sort of thing Azamel would warn us about.”

Natasha gasped. “You think she knew all along?”

“No. But Begotten know realms better than anyone, and I am sure she noticed something brewing.”

“I see. I ... um ... I p-planned to work with Avery, so we can get a closer look at this newest tear.”

“Prudent, and dangerous. Avery does not like what we dragons here in Dolareido do. And she especially does not like us after I forced her hand, indenturing those boys to you.”

“Yeah, b-but Arturo and Matthew are convinced she’ll help.”

“I see. Then, carry on, Natasha. Inform me of future progress. And well done.”

Natasha smiled, bowed slightly, and half turned to leave. But before she got any further, she looked back, knowing full well she shouldn’t ask this question.

“Ab-b-bout ... Samantha...”

“Nothing has changed, Miss Vola. Do not tell my childe what you are up to. All business of Black Blood is never to grace her ears.”

“B-But ... Jacob—”

“Is not proven to be our enemy, yet. And even if he is, Samantha is as safe with him as she would be elsewhere.”

Natasha stared at her boss before making a quick glance to Daniel. Safe, with Jacob, really? But all her sire had for her was a slow, sad nod. He agreed with Antoinette. He wasn’t happy about it, but he agreed with her.

“And if he is, um, an enemy,” Natasha said, “then ... Samantha’s in a position to ... d-do something?”

The Prince’s cold eyes confirmed. This was another ploy of the Prince’s, another way for her to control the outcomes of situations. If she had to use her childe, her lover’s mother, as a tool in her games, then she would.

Natasha gulped, nodded, and left. Jack wasn’t going to be happy about this, and if he didn’t hear it from Tash, he’d hear it from Jessy.

---

She sat down at her counter with the boys in her apartment. They each sat beside her, and all of them looked down at the counter in thought. A business meeting.

“I t-told the Prince. She ... wasn’t happy.”

“Understandable,” Art said. “If Jacob’s an enemy, that’s a big enemy to have.” He rubbed his nose, frowning. Right, Jacob had smashed his face in in a fight, effortlessly defeating him and Matt at the same time.

“Yeah. B-But she’s not going to stop Samantha from dating him.”

“Makes sense.”

“It does?” She blinked up at the big guy.

“She’d be tipping her hand if she did, you know?”

Natasha groaned, but nodded. The idea of sweet Samantha getting caught in the middle of all this was horrible. Horrible! She shrank on her stool and leaned forward enough to press her arms and shoulders against the countertop side.

Matt pat her on the shoulder, and rubbed her back, earning a small sigh from her.

“Tomorrow,” Matt said, “we can talk to Avery, and organize something, figure out a way to get to that tear.”

Art nodded. “And hopefully not piss Black Blood off too much doing it. Maybe Red Tide? He was looking for that tear we couldn’t find around the Cathedral.”

“Tear we couldn’t find.” She sat up, tapping her chin. “If Black Blood is making these tears, then m-maybe it created a tear there, in the den b-below the Cathedral, to make Maria look guilty?”

“Black Blood framing Maria?” Art looked ahead, entering thinking mode. They’d all thought these thoughts already, might as well voice them. “I guess that’d explain why we caught the blood wraiths saying her name. Black Blood wanted us on the wrong trail, and it had them spreading misinformation.”

“Exactly!” she said, grinning up at Art again. The grin quickly morphed into a frown before she could stop herself. “If...” Sighing, she looked back down, and shook her head. “N-Never mind.”

“What? Never mind?”

“Y-Yeah. I don’t ... w-want to fight about it anymore.” No more fighting about what happened with Avery and Maria.

“Oh.” Art sighed and looked down, like she’d hung an anchor around his neck.

Matt coughed, and they both looked at him, making him squirm a bit and scratch the back of his head.

“This relationship,” the gentle giant said. “It’s ... it’s important that we treat it like a relationship, right? And I’m no relationship expert, but we should be able to have arguments, right? Not throw fists or anything, but if we have a disagreement, and we start yelling or something, it should be okay, right? We shouldn't worry about leaving each other because ... I don't know."

The gentle giant was smarter than he realized. Or were those Jack's words?

She smiled at Matt, leaned up and over, and gave him a kiss, a good one. "You're right. You're v-very much right. I ... I guess I was worried before, b-because it's an unusual relationship, so I didn't want to disagree over anything. D-Didn't want to stir the water cause it was so perfect. Perfect, and ... and not real." Both men were looking at her now, eyes heavy. She squirmed. It was a heavy topic, one she'd been afraid to have, but if Matt was willing to talk about, she should be too. And no offense to Matt, but she was the better thinker. "But real relationships aren't p-perfect, right? They're messy, and problematic, and ... and there should b-be room for us to get into arguments about stuff, and not w-worry the relationship will die."

Art sighed, nodding. "Yeah, same here. First time Matt and I have ever done the long term relationship thing; you can guess why. Been really careful to not do or say anything that might make anyone upset."

She slid off the stool, and both boys turned to face her.

"Well, it's a real relationship! I love you two. I d ... don't care that there's t-two of you. I d-don't want to think of this relationship like a fairytale. It's r-real, and we should be realistic about it." Before she could say more, Arturo's smile widened until he was laughing. "It's not funny!"

"I know, I know. I'm not laughing about that. I'm laughing cause this dumbass is smarter than me." He gestured to Matt, who nodded confidently, apparently already knowing this.

“Not that we should look for things to argue about,” Matt said. “But, uh, Jack said it best I guess. We didn’t have any confidence in the relationship. We should, right?” It was Jack’s words then. That kid was too smart for his own good. No wonder the Prince loved him.

She smiled, nodding. “Right. And it’s n-not like we’ll argue all the time. Romance should be fun! I like t-talking to you guys about stuff, and hanging out, and learning new things. I like the sexy times too, and...”

Uh oh. She said the S word. Arturo and Matthew both grinned at her, and she stepped back immediately. She knew that grin!

“Hey, w-wait a minute...”

Both of the huge men prowled toward her, and she squeaked as she jumped back and over the couch. But they were fast! Way faster than big guys like them should have been. Matt chased after her directly, rolling over the couch on his side. She squeaked again and dashed for the wall of the hallway that led to the front door. But Art was even faster than Matt, and the man got between her and her only escape.

The hungry grin on his face struck her still, and sent a tingling thrill down through her spine into her toes. And before she could recover, Matt swooped in from behind. She jumped to the side back toward the living room and the couch, but Matt plucked her out the air. Literally. And before she could say anything, he set her over his shoulders, and walked toward the bedroom.

She giggled. She very much tried to not giggle, but she did, a lot. She squirmed and wriggled, trying to get out of Matt’s grip, but trapped between her squeaky giggles and desire to punish her boyfriends for being so forceful was a tough place to be. And she giggled louder when Matt tossed her on the bed.

Both men climbed onto the bed with her before she could escape, and each took one of her hands, pinning it to the bed over her head, while they leaned in and kissed her neck.

“Blush for us,” Art whispered, voice half growling.

“Blush,” Matt said, the same hunger in his voice too.

“N-No!” Despite her best efforts, she couldn’t wipe the grin off her face.

Art nibbled on her earlobe softly, pulling it between his lips and placing kisses on it. “Blush. It’s been killing me not having you like we used to.”

“We’re dying,” Matt said, nodding, a deep purring rumble in his throat. More kisses. “I’m gonna explode.” Out with the sweet romantic talk, in with the carnal sexy talk, apparently. It was silly, and exciting.

“Dreamed about you a lot,” Art said, and he kissed her neck again, opening his mouth wide enough she could feel his teeth.

“R-Romantic dreams?”

“At first. I missed you. But after a while, the dreams got very sexual.” He peeked up over her chin long enough to kiss her, before going back down to her neck. His free hand found her blouse, and undid a button. “I need to get inside you.” A grunt. A growl. Barely words.

She squirmed in their grip, trying to slip free. She knew she couldn’t. She knew she didn’t want to. But she also knew trying to get away from them drove them crazy with lust. And, for some reason, she just found herself doing whatever made them hornier, even if she didn’t tell herself to. It was like a game she couldn’t help but play, even though she knew the boys often got pretty crazy when she teased them.

“Blush,” they said, together this time. Her shirt was fully open now, and both men teased and massaged her small breasts with exploring fingers. Such huge hands.

“I dreamed I had you tied up,” Art said. “Hands up, dangling. I did everything to you.”

“I chased you down,” Matt said. “Caught you inside a big building. Grabbed you, fucked you on the floor.”

She gulped and managed quick peeks at both men. Those were some very aggressive fantasies. What sort of men did she get herself involved with?

Art slipped over her chin, and kissed her again. Then Matt did as well, before the both of them lifted their heads up so they could look down at her. Animal hunger in those eyes, and a lot of it, all aimed directly at her.

If she Blushed Life, she knew they'd be all over her, and she'd never seen so much hunger in their eyes. Exciting. Scary! Having business meetings with Uratha sometimes made her forget, but the moment sex was involved, it quickly became apparent that the boys were wolves, and they had massive appetites. Talking and negotiating with Matt and Art was easy. Talking and negotiating with two hungry enormous wolves intent on devouring her, was not.

Sighing, and trying to hide her smile again, she Blushed Life.

~~♥♥♥~~

Both men groaned, practically growled, and got to work. She squealed as they fell on her, their hands reaching under her clothes and pulling them off. The shirt came off with almost desperate speed, their movements growing faster, almost frantic. The pants next, both men yanking them down and up hard enough she almost slid right off the bed.

In sync like practiced group hunters, they both jumped off the bed, and grabbed her underwear. She squealed again as they yanked them off. They pulled the bra off the same way, up and over her head like they were in a race against time.

They yanked her off the bed, and she squeaked as she landed on her feet between the two men. She thought they got her out of her clothes fast, but both men stripped naked in three seconds. Matt, hilariously massive, with his shoulder-length dirty blonde hair. Arturo, messy black hair down to his jaw, and tan skin. And both of them were so hilariously fit, she gulped as her eyes lowered and looked at their abs. Both of them of them were already aroused and hard.

Matt got on his knees in front of her, grabbed her hips, pulled her forward, and growled.

“W-Wait! I didn’t say you could—” She sucked in a breath hard as Matthew wrapped his lips around her slit, and devoured her. He’d done this to her dozens of times, and he knew her body better than she did at this point. Warm lips and a wet tongue buried her swelling skin in playful pressure, encapsulating all of her slit, making sure every inch of her was wet with his saliva.

She glared down at him and bopped him on the head, several times, but the huge man just grinned up at her, his nose pressed to her mons as he ran his tongue up and down against her clitoris in broad, slow strokes. The sudden electric jolts were almost painful. He made sure to keep every inch of her between his lips, refusing to let any of her sex free of his wide open mouth. It was almost like watching an animal devour a meal, a very handsome animal with long dirty blonde hair, and gentle green eyes.

Her body lit up like kindling in seconds, and her tiny grunts of failed escape attempts turned into little whimpers, as she felt her body begin to boil.

Art grabbed her butt cheeks, spread them, and before she could so much as squeak in surprise, he pressed his tongue into her other hole.

“Hey! Art, you d-d-dumbass!” She tried to whack Art in the head, considerably harder than she did Matt, but Matt grabbed both of her wrists. Chuckling, Matt continued to bury her pussy in big, wet kisses, pushing his nose into her as he devoured her, tongue getting rougher as she tried to pull her hands free.

It wasn't like she was dirty back there, where Art was mirroring Matt. She was a vampire, and every inch of her was always clean. But that didn't mean it wasn't a shock, to have a tongue pushing into her from behind! She wriggled and squirmed, and tried to move her ass out of the way, but Art locked his hands around her thighs and held her in place.

All she could do was stand there, and try to stay standing, as the two men slid their tongues along her sensitive skin.

“I'll ... g-get you for this!” She tried to hit Matt again, but his grip on her wrists was strong. And she didn't try very hard, cause as much as she squirmed and wriggled, she missed this. She missed feeling tiny and trapped between the two hornballs. She missed the way they jumped her and did things to her once she was stupid enough to Blush for them. She missed getting taken by them.

Matthew buried her whole pussy in ravenous licks and kisses, covering it and drenching it, even as it grew wetter on its own. Painful jolts morphed into euphoric waves of bliss as her clitoris swelled. He grinned up at her as he licked faster, and she broke into trembling whimpers as the pleasure sparks began to build between her legs. The only thing keeping her from falling over, was Art's grip on her thighs.

She bit her bottom lip as she looked down at the big idiot eating her out. She squirmed some more, desperate to hold onto something, but Matt didn't let go of her hands. Trapped. Matthew slowed down and let her enjoy some sharp sparks of pleasure that jolted outward from her clit into her core and thighs, before he devoured her again. Arturo did no such thing, refusing to slow down. If anything, he experimented, sticking his tongue deeper into her tiny butt as she mewled.

She got wet so fast, faster than usual, and usual had gotten pretty fast with how often the boys and her used to have sex. And with long it'd been since they had.

Then they stopped. She blinked down at Matt, then looked behind her at Art as he reached into the nightstand cupboard, and pulled out a bottle of lubricant. Of course. She frowned at him, but she couldn't muster her serious, angry frown. All she managed was her chipmunk frown despite her best efforts to do otherwise, and she knew very well the chipmunk frown only made the boys hornier.

Arturo dribbled some lube on his fingers, pressed two of them against her already wet and stretched asshole, and massaged them against her skin. The lubricant worked quickly, and she squeaked as the man eased two fingers in deeper, and deeper, and deeper. With his palm pointed toward Matt, the man curled the two fingers toward her pussy, and she squeaked again as her swelling insides sent more jolts through her. Wider, heavier waves of pleasure, the sort you could only get from feeling something deep inside.

Matthew did the same. He didn't need lubricant though, dripping as she was, and she gasped as the man forced two thick fingers into her tiny body. With her wrists free again, she reached down and grabbed Matt's wrist, but he ignored her, overpowering her as he sank middle and ring finger into her slit. Palm up, the evil giant winked at her, and pumped his hand toward himself.

“Matt! Slow d-d-d-d—” She clutched his shoulders with both hands, and spread her legs to try and keep from falling, as the two men fingered her insides. Arturo pumped faster, hard enough to make her butt ripple against his hand, but Matthew pumped harder, enough to earn some splashing sounds as his fingers slapped against her g-spot.

She tried to hold it back, but it'd been so long. And both of them were coming at her with such hunger in her eyes, her knees grew weaker by the second. She punched Matt's shoulders a few times, but they were weak little strikes, and soon her punches turned into a desperate grip to keep from falling, as her insides began to squeeze. The building heat in her insides exploded outward, rushing up into her chest and down through her legs to her toes, forcing them to curl and for her thighs to tremble.

They didn't let her fall. Each held a hip in their huge hands, while their other hand filled one of her holes. They slowed down a little as she came, giving her muscles enough freedom to spasm and milk pleasure through her, but they didn't slow down for long. The moment she stopped shaking like a leaf, they fingered her again, and harder.

“Please, slow ... d ... d...” She stared down at her tiny slit, spread by the brute's two massive fingers. Such a little thing opened wide by his digits, now drenched in her juices. Her smooth mons almost rippled with the impact of his fingers inside her, and for the second life of her, she couldn't stop staring at how hard the man's fingers worked back and forth.

Staring got ten thousand times harder when another orgasm ripped through her, but she managed, and she blushed from head to toe as she caught a peek of the copious amount of juices leaking from her. Matt's palm was soaked.

As last Matthew stopped, and he smiled up at her again as he slid his fingers out of her. Arturo got the cue and stopped as well, but instead of letting her collapse on the floor, Art took her by the hips, and threw her on the bed. Literally threw, again. She bounced a few times, squeaking, body trembling and refusing to listen. But she managed to glare at Art as he climbed onto the bed beside her. It creaked under his weight.

Arturo grabbed her, turned her, hugged her from behind, kissed her neck, breathed in the smell of her hair, and whispered, "You're not getting away tonight."

"I ... you're ... horny dog!" Predictably, her weak insult rolled off his back. If anything, it turned him on more, earning another hungry, rumbling growl from him that vibrated through her, and sent another tingling thrill down her spine.

She glared at him, but it melted away as the man raised her, and lowered her down onto his cock. So hard, he was bursting, and she mewled as his thickness spread her ass. Both men were huge, and she was tiny. Every time they penetrated her, it was an overwhelming sensation of being stretched taut; this time was no different, even with how hard they'd fingered her. Her ass squeezed on him in spurts, and Art took his time, shifting back and forth to work with her clenching and un-clenching rhythm, slowly sinking her deeper and deeper, until she felt him stretching her wide, and deep.

In no time, her ass found his hips, and she pushed at his hugging arms as the sensation of her ass being filled until his cock pressed against her deepspot had her whimpering. She didn't actually want to escape, but some part of her told her to try anyway, to make them hold her down and take her. She pressed a little harder, and Arturo tightened his grip around her chest as he growled down at her. Every time she tried to get away, the man's arms held her tighter, her breathing increased, and his heart rate did too.

Matthew crawled onto the bed, and Arturo sat back and rolled onto his back. The two of them were in perfect sync as usual, and Matt grinned down at her as he took his massive cock in hand, and aimed it down at her tiny entrance.

“W-Wait,” she said, voice wavering along with her legs. “Slow down!” She managed doe eyes for Matthew, knowing full well it'd drive him crazy with need, but she did it anyway. It'd make him get rough with her, pin her down and pound her. She never liked those things in the past! But now, she couldn't stop herself from teasing the boys, and pulling out that aggressive, hungry side of them.

Totally Jessy's fault.

Matthew went slow, at first. He liked to do that, and she knew it'd only be for the first penetration. Gently, he spread her little slit with his thick, hard shaft, and she squeezed down on him and Arturo both, as the giant pushed his length deeper into her. With Arturo already inside her and little room left, each inch Matthew forced into her was full of blissful, wet friction, and her legs quaked as the hard thing rubbed against every inch of her insides.

Eventually his huge glans pressed against her depths, and she sucked in a breath as the small sparks of pain were immediately buried in waves of bliss. Matthew sank deeper, and her insides stretched. He pushed deeper, stretching her more and more. She sucked in a breath as that sensation, 'that' sensation of being fucked so deeply she could feel it had her insides quivering, and her juices leaking out all over him.

She managed a quick peek down at her belly, and groaned. Tiny as she was, with a thin little waist and stomach, it meant the two boys filled her completely, and made a small distension along her flat belly. God, she felt like she was going to burst.

Matthew growled down at her as he leaned down over her, an animal sound that rumbled in his chest and filled her with vibrations, and tingling chills. The look in his eyes was almost inhuman. She gulped as he came closer and closer, until he eventually got down onto his elbows, weight pressing against her blankets outside Arturo's chest. So close! So close his giant chest pressed against her, and she disappeared between the two huge men.

Both men growled this time, and thrust.

“W-Wait! Not so—”

They thrust faster, and her breath fled as the werewolves plunged into her body, hard. Not gentle, not gentle at all. She squeaked with each thrust as they buried her in their hard, hot, sweating bodies. Her muscles clamped down in a desperate attempt to slow them, but it only made things worse. The pleasure jolts, almost painful with their intensity, spread out from between her thighs, up into her chest and down to her curling toes.

She was cumming. They were cumming. Maybe two minutes into it and both men were growling around her as they pumped cum into her. Her insides clamped down with muscle spasms, milking them as she drenched Matt's cock. But they didn't slow down! They usually slowed down when they came, and sometimes when she came, so they could enjoy the pleasure more. But both men only growled, and continued to pound into her, hard enough she felt the bed and her tiny butt shake.

They rolled onto their sides. She squeaked with the sudden position change, but the men didn't stop. They thrust in rhythm, first Art, then Matt, both filling her and stretching her until she nearly burst, and until she felt their cum leaking out of her. Art pulled out, then Matt, leaving her empty, before they did it again. Fast, constant thrusting that left her gasping, Blush of Life making her think she needed oxygen, even though she didn't.

The two men pressed their bodies into her, squashing her between them. Art slipped his hand up to her neck, and squeezed his fingers around her throat as he filled her ass with his cum. Matthew grabbed one of her outside thighs and pressed her leg tight around his hip. Both didn't stop.

She tried to say something, but Arturo's grip was absolute, squeezing with desperate need. A small part of her mind knew she could communicate if she had to, summon vitae and kick or something. A much bigger part of her mind melted against Art's chest as he squeezed her throat, and she looked up at them both with wide eyes as they thrust almost frantically into her.

They rolled over again, and she thought maybe Art would sit up and pull her back against his chest. He liked to that, especially when he had a hand around her neck. But he stayed down on her, pinning her whole torso between both men's chests. She was completely sandwiched between them, and tiny as she was, she disappeared between them. If anyone could see, she knew the only thing they'd be able to see of her, was her tiny legs spread around Matt's, limp on the blankets. Limp, until another orgasm ripped through her, and she found the strength to kick at the bed in desperation as the boys continued to pump into her.

She lost track of what was where after a while. Never had the boys been this rough with her, desperate and grunting like animals as they squashed her between them. Art let go of her neck at some point, so he could get better leverage on the bed and grind into her all the harder. Attempts to say words failed. All that came out were tiny squeaks.

Finally, they slowed down, and she sucked in a breath deep enough so she could moan instead of just squeak. Moan turned into groan as Arturo slipped out of her and sat back, huffing and puffing, and he wiped a drop of sweat from his brow.

But before she could comment — he looked amazing all sweaty like that — Matthew sat up, and turned her around, so she was on her knees and hands on the bed.

He didn't listen. He spread his knees so his pelvis was aligned with her straight on, grabbed her hips, and yanked. The giant sank every inch of his massive length into her hard enough his testicles slapped against her clitoris, and she collapsed, arms giving out. The blankets caught her, and she turned her head enough to look at Arturo as Matthew pounded her from behind. He was grinning.

Each slap of Matthew's balls against her made a soaking wet splash, sound and all, and she knew it was mostly her. And it only got worse as the man pulled her into him, thrust into her hard, and stayed there, burying himself balls deep inside her as he came again.

Before Natasha could recover, Art grabbed her, pulling her away from Matthew. He threw her onto her back, spread her legs, got between them, grabbed her hips, and lifted her pelvis up. With Art on his knees and sitting up, he had to lift her hips high, and she stared up at him, exhausted, her shoulders and head on the blankets, as the man sank his hard cock into her ass again.

Bent like she was, a yoga bridge, she couldn't see much. But she could feel how his hard cock drove straight up toward her belly with each thrust, the angle and her position guiding it toward her navel. Each thrust into her cum-filled ass was hard, hard enough to make the bed creak again, and have her mouth wide and eyes locked onto the huge man pounding her.

She wanted to reach up and grab his wrists, hold on, but her arms wouldn't listen. She wanted to make some noises, at least squeak, but her body didn't want to breathe anymore. A kine would have started seeing stars. She could only lie there and tremble from head to toe as her lover fucked her ass.

More wetness flowed down her butt, making a splashing mess as the man didn't slow down. She managed to lift her head long enough to get a peek at Arturo's abs, and see a tiny squirt of her juices shoot up and hit them below his navel. And another, and another, before she collapsed back onto the sheets, and let the orgasm rip through her again. No use trying to keep her eyes open anymore.

Hands found her, moved her, turned her. Weight pressed on her, buried her between bodies. Matthew had come back, and now both were inside her again, grunting and sometimes even growling as they wrestled on the bed, rolling and thrusting and pinning her between them. She went limp, arms and legs dangling around them, and bouncing with each impact of their bodies. They were wild animals.

She came so hard, it hurt.

“Bad dogs! B-Bad, bad dogs!” Marching in the front of the two kneeling men, she gave each of them a good smack on the head with a rolled up magazine.

“Sorry,” Art said, wincing after the smack she knew didn't hurt him at all.

“Sorry,” Matt said, mirroring Art.

“You’re supposed t-to do what I tell you, remember? That was the deal.” She thwaped them again.

“Sorry,” they said together.

She rolled her eyes, and did her best to keep the smile off her face. Success, but barely.

The two men knelt in front of her by the bed, while she stomped around, towel wrapped around her. No towel for them! This was a punishment. But it wasn’t like the boys cared they were naked anyway. And unlike her, their legs weren’t shaking.

Cum was still all over the three of them, and the moment punishment was given, shower time.

“You were both like ... wild dogs! Like, as if you had t-to ... take catch me and eat me or I might get away.” She wasn’t Blushing Life anymore, but if she were, that line alone would have had her hot again. The memory combined with the words was powerful. It wasn’t like the boys hadn’t ever ravaged her before, but tonight they went a little far. And while that idea was a bit scary for her, her body disagreed. She’d never cum that many times, or that hard before.

“It did kinda feel like that,” Art said. “And we ... we don’t want to lose you again, you know? I guess that kinda ... made us feel a bit desperate, when things got physical. Plus, you know, we hadn’t cum in weeks.” He grinned at that, and she rolled her eyes.

Matt nodded. The big lug was no doubt thinking the same thoughts as his best friend, but Art was better at articulating them.

“W-Well I’m not going anywhere.”

They smiled at that.

“Yeah?” Art said.

“Yes! Yes you b-big dumb...” Groaning, she set the magazine aside, and kissed Art’s forehead. “We can argue, b-but as long as we respect each other like Matt said, it’s ok. Arguments are fine, as long as w-we ... understand that we n-n ... n-need to try and understand each other, too. I’m not some young girl with st-tupid fantasies that love is supposed to be all roses! Love is hard work.”

Matt smiled up at her, and she leaned over to kiss him, a proper kiss on the lips.

“This whole love relationship, the long term deal, is pretty new to us,” Art said.

“Well, we are in love. So from now on, we d-don’t do things like ... like what happened, with Maria and Avery. We don’t betray each other. From now on, w-we talk to each other. Ok?”

They winced again, but she leaned in, kissed them both again, and motioned for them to follow. They did, frowns fading and growing into giant smiles as they realized she was taking them into the shower.

Soon all three of them were under the blast of hot water, and lathering each other, taking turns with the loofah. She smiled up at them, they smiled down at her, and tension melted away as she could see her words sink into her boys’ heads. They didn’t have to worry and be desperate with her, like she was gonna run away like prey. Like, a weak little doe, all ready to be gobbled up.

What would it be like if they’d transformed? She’d had sex with them once, when they went into their bigger, wolfier human bodies, Dalu. It’d definitely been an experience, being filled like that. But Dalu was nothing compared to Gauru, to the giant werewolf forms, and the aggression that came with it. What would it be like, if she had her hands around two, monstrous girths right now, with two giant beasts looking down at her with animal hunger and giant teeth?

She shivered as the image danced through her mind, and before she knew it, she slid down onto her knees, Blushed, reached up, and guided the shafts of both boys to her mouth. They both blinked down at her in surprise, but it wasn't long before they were both hard again. Long, hard, thick girths, pumping full of blood, teasing her with its rich taste and extreme power.

She smiled at them, opened her mouth as wide as it could go, and eased Matt's cock into her mouth, bathing his glans with her lips and tongue while her left hand stroked him. She did the same for Art, right hand stroking him as she kissed and teased his glans, until she could taste his growing juices. Sometimes she tried to suckle both at the same time, guiding both cocks to fight for space against her lips; they didn't mind.

She made sure to blink her doe eyes up at them, knowing each time it'd have them growling with desire. It did. She watched them as she leaned forward and slowly slid Art's length into her mouth, and then down into her throat, her lips spread by his thickness. Kindred had no need to breathe, and no gag reflex, after all. Her lover groaned, and she smiled up at him, and Matt next. She eased off Art, and did the same for Matthew, taking the man's ridiculous length and thickness into her until her lips found the base of him. And she stayed there for a while, one hand stroking Art while the other held Matt's side as she smiled up at him from around his girth.

She slid back off his length, and let its heavy weight sit on her face a bit, enjoying the heat of it, and how she could feel his heartbeat through it. She did the same for Art, nudging her face along his cock's underside, and planting kisses along its length, tip to base. Satisfied, she set them both against her lips again, and stroked both their lengths as she suckled on the two cocks while they both watched her like she was a meal they'd been hunting with ravenous bellies all night long.

It didn't take long for them to cum again, and she let the white fluid pour down over her lips and chin before it flowed down her thin neck and body. Both of them stared down at her, surprised, and groaning softly in bliss as she milked them. They'd cum several times already, but weeks without an orgasm — and crazy regenerative werewolf bodies — meant they had plenty to spare, and it overflowed her mouth in moments, creating a huge mess that eased down her chin and tiny, slender body.

They both rumbled, and she shivered with the buzz of their voices.

~/♥♥♥~/

She stood up, washed their cum off her skin again, and motioned for them to kneel. They did. First, she took a drink of Matt, and the man sighed happily as his body relaxed with the power of the Kiss. He struggled to not fall over when she was done. She did the same with Art, kissing him, then Kissing him, drinking deep until the man fell on his ass and sat back against the wall of the shower. Werewolf blood was so damn good. Exquisite! As Antoinette would say. It had her body rippling with energy the moment it hit her stomach, and more besides once she'd taken deep of both of them.

“You t-two may be all big and bad and strong, but I'm the vampire.” Nodding and smiling as if she'd announced victory to a game, she stepped out of the shower, leaving her two thoroughly drained and exhausted boys struggling to get back up.

Tonight had been fun. Too much fun. What would it have been like if they'd transformed, and did to her what Eric did to Jessy? She'd probably burst at the seams.

~~Antoinette~~

“Jack survived.” She sighed as she leaned back in her chair, seated in the top floor of her tower, and sighed relief.

Daniel stood beside her, and he nodded as he turned to look out the great window overlooking her Elysium. “He’s very good at his job.”

“Ah yes, the peacekeeper job? That was never supposed to apply to the covenants.”

“Either way, he’s making progress.”

“Yes, he is. Bullheaded and brazen, but he is. And perhaps that is what is needed to wipe the dust from the minds of those like Maria.” After a quiet chuckle, she stood up and joined him. “How goes your hunt?”

“Black Blood eludes me.”

“But not Jacob?”

“Not when he is here, in our realm, no. I have witnessed his traversing to other realms through the old gates, and my projection cannot follow him there.”

“Then it is good your childe is as effective as she is. She will find out more, about whether Jacob is to blame for this, or whether Black Blood is pursuing this strange agenda on its own.”

“I’d prefer you summon the creature. Interrogate it yourself.”

“I do not sacrifice kine at a whim.”

“But you will sacrifice my childe? And yours, for that matter?”

She turned to look at her old friend, but he did no such thing. Solemn, he stared out the window, arms folded across his chest.

“If necessary.”

“What constitutes necessary?”

“If there is an enemy that wishes to destroy us all, then defeating it qualifies as necessary. And I know you understand that, Daniel.”

Her old friend sighed, a slow and heavy sound, but nodded eventually. “Sorry. Just, nearly lost her once already, to Lucas.”

“You have nearly lost her more times than that. Natasha has been in danger many times, and has survived many times. Trust her.”

“And Samantha?”

“I have seen and heard enough to believe Jacob genuinely cares for her.”

“To the point he won’t use her against us if such a situation arises?”

She matched his sigh, and set a hand on his shoulder. “I do not know. I will have to ... reevaluate when more information is available.”

He nodded slowly, not pleased with her answer. And that was why her good friend could not be Prince. Powerful and intelligent as her sheriff was, he did not have the stomach for difficult decisions. She did.

She continued. “If Black Blood truly is pursuing Minerva’s legacy, then if it has any indication we are aware of its pursuits, it might change tactics. If we want to catch it unawares and put a stop to this foolishness, we must pretend we do not know. I will not summon it.”

“You really think it doesn’t know what we’re up to?”

“I think prudence is required. Continue your searching, my sheriff, and I will continue mine.”

---

“Mister Pavel. How unexpected.”

“Prince.”

Both she and her sheriff watched the Begotten as he stepped into the throne room of her kingdom. She leaned back in her chair, wearing her business smile, subtle, and dominant.

Sándor was an attractive individual, slightly tall, a lean but muscular man with a defined chin and some gruff on his face. His dark hair was buzzed short, not unlike Jack’s, and the shape of his blue eyes betrayed his Eastern European origins. If only he wore something better. Dark jeans and a black button shirt? For shame.

“For what do I owe the honor of this visit?”

“Wanted to catch up on a couple things.”

“Normally my love would handle contact between the races, but...”

“He’s pretty busy trying to keep everyone from killing each other.”

She grinned at that. “Officially, he is Invictus and will aid the Invictus in this war.”

The Begotten walked up to her desk, looked around at the luxurious but professional grand office of her Elysium Tower, and managed the smallest shrug.

“We both know that’s not what he’s doing.”

“All too true.”

“I wanted to talk about Jacob.”

Ah yes, of course he did. He had joined Natasha for her discovery, after all.

“I admit, your readiness to help Natasha has confused me, Mister Pavel.”

“Please call me Sándor. It’s...” He looked to the side for a moment, at the enormous wall of black marble with white veins, and the several carvings of dragons that circled various columns of the same material, before looking back to her. He was analyzing her, based on her environment. Intelligent. “It’s strange, hearing that old name.”

“Very well, Sándor.”

“I helped her cause it helps Dolareido, right? And I’ll help her again with this problem, as many times as needed.”

“It is that generosity that confuses me so.”

He managed another quaint little shrug. “Azamel—”

“Would not aid me or mine to such a degree, or so directly.”

He raised a brow at that. “Wouldn’t she? She told you about this weird threat, right?”

Antoinette considered that, and tapped her chin a few times as she watched the man. “Oui, that is true. But your generosity overshadows hers greatly.”

“I guess so. But I ... I’m not just replacing her, when she’s gone.” For all the man’s efforts to keep his stoic expression, a hint of a somber frown took control of his lips. “There’s Julias, too.”

And for all Antoinette’s efforts to maintain her subtle, dominating smile, the man’s words struck a chord, and she let the smile go.

“Surely you do not blame yourself for his death. You were under the control of a dangerous witch.” A flesh witch she knew both Beatrice and Samantha were becoming increasingly involved with.

“Of course I ... My family...” He sighed, shaking his head. “The details are my business, Prince.” And there was that stoic expression once again.

Ah, of course, he blamed himself indirectly, due to the past. It was true that the man had been found and captured by hunters, but that did not necessarily mean he made a mistake in how he hid his paranormal nature. Forever a lesson that avoided even the wisest minds, that one could make no mistakes, and still lose. In this case, a lesson blocked by guilt, and Sándor reeked of it. It would be decades, perhaps centuries, before he no longer reviled himself for the death of his wife and child. It would be an eternity before he ever truly forgave himself at all.

Unfortunately, that also meant those that died while he was controlled by Jeremiah and his tool, were partly under the umbrella of his guilt. An absurd conclusion, intellectually. Emotionally, the reasoning was flawless, and she doubted anything she could say would help him. Perhaps Jack and his disarming ways could, but her? No, nothing she could say would help this poor soul.

“What do you wish to know of Jacob?”

“Whatever you’re willing to share.”

Nodding, she pulled her hair over her shoulder onto her chest, and ran her fingers through it as she looked up with memory.

“Jacob and I came to Dolareido over two centuries ago, with my childe Tony, and a rather bold, powerful up-and-coming Ventrue named Viktor Honors.” The names earned the faintest twitches from the listening man’s eyebrows. Azamel and the others had likely shared much of this story already. “A small town, buildings of wood, where every kine knew each other by name. Over the decades, I molded that small town into the Dolareido you see today. And, as much as I would like to say the credit is entirely mine, the others played roles as well. Viktor and Tony did little but take advantage of opportunities, but Jacob planted hints of the call of darkness within the city.”

“Call of darkness?”

“To sire Kindred who do not reek havoc, or violate the Masquerade without concern, or throw themselves into the sunlight at first opportunity, requires a somewhat unique mentality. And Dolareido was meant, from night one, to be our utopia. Jacob planted the seeds of interest in what occurs after sunset in those silly, ignorant, superstitious villagers. Potential Kindred. And it was not long before vampires from other villages came to our village as well, lured by the dark whispers within.”

“Dangerous, to have a city with rumors of vampires.”

“And that is where I came in, Begotten. I controlled who did what, and I made sure everyone obeyed the rules. With my guiding hand, the Masquerade was maintained and maintained well. Kine did not die to Kindred, or if they did, they were people no one would notice or care about disappearing. And over the decades, I molded this city into my utopia. But ... to my chagrin, Jacob pursued his own agendas, and he hid them well. Only as my experiments with ephemera grew did I come to realize my old friend had become close with a spirit named Black Blood.”

“He didn’t want you to know about it?”

“Jacob knew both his and my goals for a utopia overlapped, but also clashed. If Jacob ruled Dolareido, this city’s nightlife would host a far greater accumulation of dangerous affairs. Flirting with spirits with dark rituals. Deadly games where winners survived and losers did not. Freedom, and chaos. A utopia for vampires of a sort, but not the utopia of cooperation I seek.”

Sándor nodded as he looked down, pondering. “Sounds like a witch.”

“Indeed.”

“And Black Blood?”

She eyed Sándor for a few seconds, and he met her gaze, steady and unmoving. He realized she was analyzing him, and he let her. The Begotten did not lack for confidence, after a fashion.

“Unfortunately I know little of the creature. As far as I can tell, it had been growing in Dolareido since before our arrival.” He did not need to know the creature could be summoned with ritual and murder. The fewer that knew, the better. “I have discovered similar spirits, much younger than Black Blood, and with none of the older creature’s colossal strength. What bothers me most though, about the intolerable spirit, is that its nature is not natural to Dolareido.”

“It’s not? Far as I can tell, it’s a spirit of death and the dead.”

“Yes, but death is no more common in Dolareido than other cities. Less than, I must say.”

“And the blood wraiths?”

Sighing, Antoinette shook her head. “Blood is a frequent point of intrigue in Dolareido. But for those blood-and-flesh-obsessed wraiths to emerge from that intrigue is also unnatural. Or so I assume. The Uratha would know more.”

“Black Blood’s connected to them. It might have had a hand in creating them. Might explain their weird natures, if Black Blood itself is also an oddity. I’ll ask Avery.”

“They are not willing to share their information with me.”

He nodded again. “I’ll ask nicely.”

She blinked at the man, at his steady, solid expression, and she laughed. If he was joking, he was a master comedian for his perfectly unmoving face. Perhaps there was more to Sándor than a simple man scarred by guilt.

“Natasha has deemed you trustworthy, and while I do not share her views, I must admit circumstances suggest I should trust you.”

He frowned slightly at that, deliberating, before he looked past her to the enormous window that exposed her city’s beautiful skyline.

“If Black Blood is a problem, then why did it help me, when Jeremiah cast that ritual on Azamel? We were all blinded and bound by the spell, but Black Blood ... helped me get through it.”

“I do not know, Sándor. Perhaps so Jacob would not potentially lose Othello and Beatrice in the fray? There are far too many unknowns, which is why we need more information. It pleases me that you are helping Natasha, and I hope you will continue to do so.” She leaned forward and set her elbows on the table, adopting her usual business deal stance. “I doubt money has much value to you, Begotten, but I believe you align with my plans for this city. Continue to aid Natasha, and I will see to it that your stay in this city, however long that may be, is a rich indulgence.”

That earned a small smile from him, the sort a knowing soul would make when offered a contract for his soul from Satan herself. He was suspicious of luxury.

“Thanks.”

“There is something else you wish to ask?”

“Yes. I wanted to ask about Beatrice, and Julias.”

Of course he did, to seal in his scars with acid. She was tempted to give him the simple explanation, as Sándor himself acted the simpleton. But the man was centuries old, and far wiser and more intelligent than he wanted others to know.

“A stalker sired Triss against her will. Jerem Montallia. I imagine you have known vampires with similar pasts,” she said. He nodded. “I executed the fool, of course, but the damage was done. Beatrice changed quickly, donning the tattoos and piercings, and embracing the Carthian lifestyle. A rebel. But that changed when she met two men.”

“Two? Oh, Julias, and Jacob.”

“It is easy for most to think Julias has had the most effect on her. He taught her to love others and herself, if you subscribe to clichés. But it is Jacob that showed her she could pursue her own desires and agendas outside of romance.”

He nodded again, eyes stern as he stared at the window. Building the Dolareido puzzle in his mind, no doubt, each drop of information she gave a new puzzle piece to be placed.

“Her relationship with Julias,” she continued, “was painfully poetic. Julias, much like Jack and I, wanted the best for everyone, and for everyone to cooperate. An idealistic, albeit a realists as well, with the will to make difficult decisions when necessary. He was also quite depressed, and it was not until he met the rather harsh Beatrice that her spark kindled his love for his second life.”

“Not Jack?”

“Jack was to Julias what a child is to a parent. Julias found purpose in preparing Jack for his second life, but not happiness. Not for himself, at least. Beatrice and Julias created happiness for each other.”

“And now he’s gone...”

“Oui. And Beatrice, as you can imagine, has thrown herself headlong into the affairs of witches.”

Sándor nodded, frown betraying him. He knew, or perhaps had even seen what the Nosferatu was doing in the shadows.

“I see.”

“Sándor ... it would be a waste to tell you you should not feel responsible for the damage the hunters have caused. But if you truly wish to help those it has, do not go to them seeking to replace that which they lost. There is little you could do to offend them more.”

Another wince. After a few moments of silence, Sándor lifted his head, met her eyes with his steady gaze again, and nodded. “Thanks for the information. I’ll ... see what I can do, about ... everything.”

This man. This silly man. A stranger to their city, brought as a slave and tool by psychopaths, and yet he now felt bound by guilt to help them. The only reason he agreed to replace Azamel as protector for the younger Begotten, no doubt. How often did nightmares of his dead family haunt this poor man’s dreams, driving him to sacrifice himself for those he hurt? Proof, perhaps, that creatures of the nightmare had nightmares of their own.

“Be careful, Sándor. I tell you much of this information in good faith. Perhaps too much. But, as I said, Natasha trusts you.” And she had avoided saying anything too damning during the conversation, of course. “I advise you to leave Black Blood and Jacob be.”

“I will.”

“As for Beatrice, I can see that you feel a need to reach out to her. And to that I say, be especially careful.”

The tiniest smile graced the man’s face. “She’s stronger than you think.”

Antoinette leaned back in her chair, a touch of relief running through her. “Oh? I—no, I will not pry. If you think you can be of help to her, then by all means, do as you see fit. Jennifer certainly sees value in you.”

Sándor hid his smile, but she could see hints of it fighting to show through. “Thank you.” He nodded deep, almost a bow, and left.

She watched after him, and combed her hair idly as she pondered. What effect would this man have on her city? Surely better than Azamel, and the destruction she caused decades ago.

Eric and Sándor, Uratha and Begotten, both helping her Kindred student. A powerful turn of events.

~~Beatrice~~

Romance was in the air, she could smell it. That had something to do with Jen relentlessly groping her, getting her hands under Triss’s tank top while Triss was busy looking through the binoculars. But more so because Clara looked happy.

Triss, Jen, and Samantha stood on a rooftop in South Side, closer to the entertainment district, spending a little time updating their impression of the ongoings in the city and its war, and also for some girl time. Girl time did not imply sex, just the opposite usually, but for some reason Jen felt handsy today. Triss didn’t mind. Sam, on the other hand, kept peeking and then feeling guilty about it and looking away. Which probably had something to do with why Jen couldn't keep her hands off Triss.

"How's she doing?" Jen asked, chin on Triss's shoulder.

"Better than I figured."

Clara was doing the outdoor restaurant thing, the fancy shit. She wasn't dressed for it. Then again neither was Harcourt, but at least he was wearing some dark pants and a white button shirt, a few undone; everyone undid their buttons in Dolareido's heat.

Brace was a pretty damn hot guy, a tall black dude with quite a bit of muscle on him. Short curly hair, and random tattoos, most hidden by the shirt but some peeked out, and some were weird ritual magic shit. And of course he had a few scars on his hands, and a pretty awesome one on his face. Dude looked perfect for the tall, dark, handsome, brooding and scary hunter role.

But a single conversation with Brace Harcourt was enough to let anyone know the dude was a goofball.

And then there was Clara, average height, and damn fit, athlete's body; still looked small compared to Harcourt though. She had tan skin and long dark hair done in box braids, and the face made Triss think she came from close to the equator. Really hot.

Clara looked down and poked at her meal — blue rare steak — as she talked. Introspective? Sadness? Probably a serious conversation then, maybe about the vampires, or even Jack.

Far as Triss knew, Clara still had a thing for Jack, too. She hadn't talked to the girl in a while, but maybe now was a good time to change that? The Circle and the wolves weren't exactly on the best terms, but Clara had put in the work when Jack needed her, leaving her pack behind to do it. Maybe talk to her later tonight, get an update? Maybe—

Triss groaned and looked over her shoulder at Jen. The damn woman was happy to be a nuisance, hugging from behind and playing with Triss's nipple piercings without a single hint of remorse. The damn slut.

“Jen, you are insatiable!” Sam reached over and poked the horny slut in the shoulder, for good measure.

Jen shrugged, but didn't stop, cupping and massaging while kissing Triss's neck. Triss wasn't Blushing Life, so it wouldn't lead to anything, but honestly she really didn't mind. Jen was a Daeva trapped in a Ventrue's body, and that was fine.

“It's probably a good thing Clara's moving on,” Triss said. “Or at least trying.”

“I can't believe she had a thing for my son.” Sam, dressed in a gray suit not unlike Jen's, cupped her cheeks as she looked down from the building rooftop. “How'd my boy get so popular with the girls?”

“Jack has proved his mettle,” Jen said, finally done with the neck kissing, “time and time again. And Julias groomed him well. He looks quite spectacular naked.”

Sam gasped, a classic mom gasp. “You've seen Jack naked?”

Triss laughed and shook her head. “No but none of our clothes survive very long in the fights we get into. I've seen enough of the kid to know Julias must have put him through the fucking ringer to get him into the shape he is.”

Jen gave Triss's abs a gentle slap. “Like Triss here.”

“No one groomed me. I was just a vain bitch who liked it when people looked my way.” Which backfired of course. Fuck that Jerem asshole.

“In any case,” Sam said, “I’m happy Clara’s moving on. I don’t want my boy in a love triangle.”

“Triangle?” Jen laughed and returned Sam’s shoulder poke. “Kindred interests can get a lot more intricate than that. Or are you suggesting Othello and Madison aren’t both interested in you?”

“W-What? No no, that’s just ... sex...” Poor Samantha. She squirmed in spot and looked back down at the street below, obviously recalling all the things Jacob, the Daeva bimbo, and Madison had been doing to her lately.

Triss nodded. “Yeah, it’s just sex. And honestly, I say you’re in the clear to go nuts and keep doing whatever you want in the Circle, no drama to worry about with us. We’re all pretty buddy buddy with each other. But there’s been more than a few ghouls or thralls who’ve been jealous of someone falling in love with their master. Leads to some crazy weird love triangles and stuff.” Jacob had some fucking horror stories about that sorta shit, the sorta stories you told around a campfire at night. Supposedly. Triss’s experience with campfires so far was one, in a dream-not-dream.

“You mean, like with J-Jack!? He—”

“Will be fine,” Jen said, finally letting go of Triss’s tits, and instead taking the binoculars. “The man is careful, and with the Prince as his love, circumstances will surely be ... interesting, but safe. I doubt the Prince’s ghouls hold Jack in ill regard. And Veronica doesn’t seem the sort to stab Jack in the heart and kill him while he’s vulnerable.”

Oh god, why’d Jen word it like that? Sam groaned as she looked down, and clutched her face with both hands.

“Seriously Sam,” Triss said, “it’s fine. Jack’s fine. Other Kindred are fine. The stories Jacob’s told me weren’t from Dolareido. Your sire’s got a good thing going in this city.”

“I guess...” The poor Daeva sighed as she leaned forward and looked down, holding onto a nearby metal bar that stuck up from the rooftop for balance.

After a while, she clutched her necklace and frowned. She wasn't thinking about thralls and ghouls anymore, she was thinking about her daughter again.

Triss and Jen shared a look. Tell her? Yeah, tell her.

“I found a new ritual,” Triss said. “Should let me finish the vessel.”

Sam's eyes shot open. “Really? You told me you had to keep working on the vessel, and it could take months.”

“I ... had a surprise visit.”

“Visit?”

“From, uh, the Crone, I guess.”

Samantha gasped. The girl was just too damn cute, gasping and putting a hand to her mouth with wide eyes. Somehow, she embodied cliches. Jack was right, the woman may have been strong as hell, but it'd be a lie to say she wasn't the perfect example of the dumb mom who gets addicted to shitty phone games while watching and reading too many god awful romance stories that were nothing more than thinly veiled non-con fantasies. It was too cute.

“But I thought ... I thought that was just, mythology and stuff.”

Triss nodded as she stepped back. Jen kept watching the city with the binoculars, sweeping her vision and probably looking for more Invictus and Carthian activity. Tempting, very tempting to grab her tits from behind and see how she liked trying to focus with someone groping her. But, nah, Jen would like it.

“Mythology stuff,” Triss said, shrugging once she and Sam were in the center of the roof. “Jacob tell you much?”

“A little, but a lot of it was vague.”

“Yeah, understandable. He’s vague cause he has to be. Far as we can tell, if there are any mythic entities out there, shit like gods, we don’t understand them, and they probably evolve over time. But, there is crazy shit out there, we know that much. All those old tales from thousands of years ago probably got grains of truth in them.”

“Oh god. So ... gods...”

“Ask your boss. The Prince pokes at that world, right?”

“Kinda, but it’s more ... science, more about writing things down and doing experiments and stuff. So, I mean, I know there’s ephemera, ghost ghost spirit stuff. I know there’s Twilight, where ghosts like ... like Mary hide, and spirits too. I know there’s that spirit place where all the crazy spirit stuff live, like, uh, spirits of buildings or animals or emotions.”

“Yeap, that’s a pretty good summary of the shit we know. But there’s so, so, sooo much shit we don’t know, you know? The nightmare monsters know more but they don’t tell us shit. And crúac rituals seem to poke at that unknown stuff. Like ... ever watch those documentaries where scientists take those tiny submarines down deep in the ocean?”

“Oh yeah! And it gets all super dark and they can only see maybe twenty feet with their lights and ... and ... it’s so spooky, and dangerous.” Fear visibly ran across Sam’s face. Just like Jack, she wore her emotions on her sleeve. Unlike Jack, she hadn’t made much progress in learning to control that reflex. “Oh god, that’s scary!”

“It is fucking terrifying, no doubt about that. And one time, when Jacob and I were going ... diving,” no need to describe the tortures that entailed, “something spoke to me. An old woman, but a lot freakier and, uh ... god-like. She helped me track down Elen so Jack and the gang could take down the hunters.”

“Oh, wow. So ... so it'd be like, you were drifting along in the endless, crushing darkness, and something ... something freaky and huge and deadly found you?” Her eyes went wider and wider with each word. No need to get heavy with the description when Sam would do it on her own. Wild imagination on this woman.

“Yeah. That's a big part of being a witch, I guess. Probing at the dark side, going deep ocean diving and finding out Cthulhu's down there, sleeping.”

“Cthulhu?”

“I—what, seriously? You don't know about Cthulhu?”

“Um, I think Jack's mentioned the name once or twice.”

Oh god, a perfect opportunity to scare Sam. But, no, Dolareido life was scary enough, especially with the shit Triss and Sam were getting into.

“Anyway, so apparently this Crone creature has noticed me. Paid me a little visit in my dreams.” Actually, yanked her out of her dreams, but again, that'd probably scare Sam more than needed. “She ... gave me a tip, on how to make a vessel.”

“Oh wow. That's ... horrifying.”

Triss laughed. “I know, right? Believe you me, I am scared shitless. But I picked this road, and I'm gonna walk it. I'm gonna use this ritual and finish Julias's new body. His ... vessel, according to the Crone. And then we'll see about part two.”

Samantha squirmed and clutched her necklace. “You think it’ll work?”

“I think the Crone didn’t steer me wrong before. But ... but even the Crone thinks we won’t be able to resurrect Julias.” She wanted to be optimistic, but two fucking deities — three if she included Black Blood — already warned her it was basically impossible. Better to not get Samantha’s hopes up. “I’m gonna do the ritual in a few days. Then we’ll see.”

Nodding, Samantha paced in place, clutching that necklace again like her life depended on it. Head pointed down, the poor woman hyperventilated as if it’d help her, and didn’t stop. Triss let her. Sooner or later Samantha would come down from her anxiety, and Triss would be there to catch her.

Sure enough, a minute later, Samantha calmed down, and looked Triss in the eye.

“I ... want to see the ritual when you do it, if you don’t mind.”

“You sure? It’s not pretty, Sam. It’s going to suck, a lot.”

“I’m sure. If this is something we might do for Mary, then ... then I should see.”

Wincing, Triss nodded, rubbing her arm. “If you’re sure.”

“I’m sure. I want to see.”

Poor woman was gonna be traumatized.

Chapter 147

~~Beatrice~~

“Hey Clara.”

The werewolf raised a brow as she looked at her, but before the woman could find a polite way — or not so polite way — to get rid of her, Harcourt clapped once and leaned back in his chair.

“Ladies! Visiting?” And again, before Clara could find a way to tell her date that she didn’t want the vampires around, Harcourt grabbed a nearby chair. For three women. Total dunce.

Jennifer didn’t hesitate. She sat down at the small circular table and got comfy, leaned back in the fancy wire metal chair, folded one knee over the other, and finger waved at Brace.

Clara frowned at Jen, and ground her teeth subtly enough only the dumb dude at the table wouldn’t notice. But, Clara didn’t know Jen, didn’t know Jen was doing it on purpose, to make Clara jealous because she figured it’d get the two together faster, not because she wanted to steal Brace from her. Drama. Jennifer embodied soap opera drama. She really did have more similarities with Daeva bitches like Isabella than a Ventrue like Elaine.

How the fuck did Triss and Jen ever hook up? They kinda didn’t, not really. Sorta just evolved that way.

Triss took a moment to check her hair and make sure it was covering her cheeks. The Discipline Obfuscate had a lot of ways to keep people from noticing her, Cloak of Night being the most used. But Face in the Crowd made sure that while people could see her, they just wouldn’t care about her, and as long as she made sure her teeth weren’t obviously visible, it’d stay that way.

“We were scouting,” Jennifer said, nodding to the hunter. “The Invictus and Carthians insist on being a nuisance.”

Clara put up her hands. “We’re staying out of it.”

“You and the pack, or you and Brace?” The Ventrue grinned as she gestured with her head toward the hunter.

Harcourt shrugged. “Uh, both, I guess? The Prince has done right by Marge, Dennis and me, and she doesn’t want us getting involved. As long as people — kine, I guess — stay out of it too, I got no problem.” Without so much as a glance to Clara for permission, the hunter grabbed another nearby chair, slid it over, and gestured to the two remaining ladies. Clara looked annoyed, but with Brace, not the girls. She probably didn’t realize just how nice the hunter was, until now. Nice to a fault.

But then, maybe that’s what Clara liked? Jack was nice to a fault, or at least he used to be. Still kinda was, but also kinda wasn’t, curse or no curse. Growing up was painful, especially for someone like Jack, and every time Triss caught up with the kid it was easy to see he was growing more bitter and upset with the world. Harcourt, on the other hand, seemed impervious to that kinda shit, considering the rough life he’d had while still being a nice goofball. Maybe that’s what Clara wanted?

Or the girl was just dating a nice guy, cause Jack was off the menu and she finally accepted that.

Samantha glanced at Triss, and Triss gave her a playful shove. Go sit, dumbass. Smiling, Samantha took the other chair and got comfortable.

“I hope it stays that way,” Sam said. “No kine getting hurt, I mean. I’m uh, pretty new to this vampire thing, but—”

A waiter came up to them, but Clara shook her head, waving him off. Yeah, she was annoyed. Well, sucked to be her, an info update was important, and one of the best ways to get one was randomly, like this, catching people off guard so they couldn't formulate crafty answers easily.

“But uh, I'm more worried about Jack,” Sam continued. “He's going to try and fix everything himself, like he always does.”

Clara nodded, wincing a little as she took a memory dive. “He does seem to do that.”

Triss raised a hand. “But we're all staying out of it, right? I mean, you know, barring a really shitty exception, we're gonna let the two idiot groups duke it out. And Jacob says it's not the first time they've butted heads, and they're still here, so it can't get too bad, right?”

Everyone looked at each other, frowning or wincing. Yeah, she didn't believe herself either.

“How is Marge and Dennis?” Jennifer asked. “I see you and Clara are enjoying yourselves,” a bit of a pause to make it obvious what she meant, “but I do wonder about those two.”

Harcourt nodded, taking a bite of his steak and chewing it fast. “They'd been hanging out with Leauvion's crew for a long time. Jack apparently thought they were being, uh, hogged? But now they're seeing what the other vamps are up to. Invictus mostly, though. Not that I blame them. Dolareido's got this whole Las Vegas vibe going, and the crew and I had been doing backwater bullshit for years. Trying out hot tubs and fine dining,” he gestured to his meal, “seems to be more of an Invictus indulgence here.”

“It's not everywhere?” Samantha asked.

“I’ve been in a few cities. Clara too. We’ve seen some weird setups, you know? Dolareido’s the only one I even know of with dragons in charge; we rarely even hear of them, let alone run into them. But in other cities, the Invictus aren’t always rich and wearing suits. Sometimes it’s more like a military state. Sometimes the city doesn’t have any luxury at all, and the Carthians and Invictus becomes more like, local anarchist punks versus the local mob.”

“Tijuana,” Clara said, “was a little more ... extreme. The Invictus were brutal, and thrived on markets a lot nastier than the shit you find in Dolareido.”

“Oh?” Sam asked, with the enthusiasm of a mother getting drawn into a documentary about crime. “How ... how bad was it?”

Clara picked up on Samantha’s innocent mom personality quick, and she laughed as she leaned in a little toward her. “Heavy drugs sold to kids, sex slaves, and we ran into one incident involving organ trafficking.”

“Oh god. And you were fighting the vampires there?”

“It didn’t start out that way, but everything went to shit quick when the vamps realized we were in the city. They didn’t want to talk, just wanted us out. Then we ran into a new Uratha, Arturo Ibarra, and things got even more confusing. Eventually we had to leave.”

“Wow. That ... that does sound a lot worse than Dolareido.”

Harcourt nodded, chewing with one side of his mouth so he could talk with the other, smiling the whole time. “That asshole Jeremiah tricked us pretty bad. I mean, he didn’t have to try very hard; most cities we’d seen with vampires had a nasty side to them. But with Dolareido, he told us a lot of horror stories, and we came here full intent on war, you know? If we’d known the Prince was so strict about how kine are handled in Dolareido, a lot more than just Dennis, Marge and me would have sided with Jack.” His smile faded for a while, but once he started chewing again, his smile came back, and he nodded to them all as he swallowed. Easiest way to a man’s heart, his stomach.

“Perhaps Dennis and Marge could visit the Circle?” Jen said, and she made sure to put a little slutness in her voice. “Or you? We’re all quite friendly in the Circle, and comfortable with each other.” Leaning back, the Ventrue made a small gesture to Sam, and to Triss behind her.

Harcourt raised a brow, but when he saw the other vampires not exactly deny what Jen said, he coughed and choked on some more of his food, before managing to swallow it down.

“I don’t think Harcourt is gonna be seduced by a random offer for an orgy,” Clara said, narrowing her eyes at Jen.

“Oh? I heard y—”

Triss slapped Jen upside the back of the head, and Jen went quiet after a tiny squawk. Harcourt blinked, confused, and Clara breathed a hidden sigh of relief as she smiled up at Triss. Yeah, Jacob might have hated the werewolves, but Triss didn’t, and just cause Clara had made a drunken mistake once or thrice with Jessy’s ghouls didn’t mean it was worth rubbing her face in it. Not that Harcourt would care, but Clara seemed worried anyway.

“Jen’s lewdness aside,” Triss said, “it’s probably best the hunters steer clear of the Circle. You are hunters, and the Circle don’t always do ... nice things, to kine.”

That earned a frown from the man. It didn’t fit his personality at all.

“What?”

Triss put up her hands. “Don’t worry about it. Nobody dying you’d care about. Check the obituaries if you don’t believe me. And I’m guessing the hunters do that regularly anyway.”

“Missing persons reports, actually. But obituaries sometimes too.”

“Ooh.” Samantha’s eyes went wide as she looked at Harcourt. “Do ... do you hunters stand around as you put up pictures on walls, and draw webs connecting them? Or is that all digital now? Do you, um, stay up all night reading newspapers about old, mysterious deaths? Do you do stakeouts and stuff?”

Clara, Jen, and Triss all struggled to keep from laughing. There was no denying the kind of woman Samantha was. But thankfully for Samantha’s sake, Brace was too dumb to pick up on it, and probably just figured she was an inquisitive soul.

“Uh, sorry. Don’t wanna give away trade secrets.”

“Oh! Oh, right, sorry. It’s just so fascinating! I’ve only been a vampire for half a year, not even, and all this cloak and dagger stuff is scary, and interesting!”

“It’s scary, I’ll give you that. Dolareido ain’t like the other cities my friends and I have dealt with.” He sighed as he leaned back, shaking his head. “Kills me that I couldn’t convince more of them to listen to me. But hunters don’t usually cooperate, you know? Solo gigs, sometimes a pair. They didn’t want to listen to me, didn’t trust me.”

“They listened to Jeremiah though?” Triss asked.

“Someone like Jeremiah doesn’t come along often. Dude had connections, magical tools, and the most insane force of will you’ve ever seen. He could have walked into a bar full of strangers, and had everyone in there following him into the pit of Hell thirty minutes later. And Angela, that psycho bitch was scary as fuck, but at the same time, you knew she could get the job done. Whenever shit hit the fan, Angela always came out on top.”

Samantha sighed as she looked down.

Harcourt’s eyes went wide as he realized. “Oh shit, sorry.”

“It’s ok. That was ... it was...” Sam clutched her necklace for a few quiet seconds before lifting her head. “Bad things happened. But Jeremiah and Angela are dead, and I got to talk to my daughter again. I still get to, sort of.”

Brace leaned in. “I heard about that. I ... don’t want to overstep and tell you what you should do with your life. Or your second life, or whatnot. But, ghosts are dangerous, Samantha. Very dangerous.”

“Do you ... know a lot about ghosts?”

He shook his head vehemently as he took another bite of his meal. “Not as much as some of the other hunters I’ve ran into. But I’ve dealt with a few ghosts in my time, and it’s always the same story. Given enough time, ghosts turn bad. I don’t know why, probably something to do with that they’re ghosts and don’t exactly think, just ... do. But every ghost I’ve dealt with, I ran into because they started causing trouble.”

“Trouble?”

“Killing people.”

“Oh.” Samantha looked down again.

“But hey, I don’t know if that’s gonna happen to Mary. Probably lots of ghosts out there we don’t know about because they don’t do things to attract attention.”

But they all knew the dude was speaking truth earlier. And the truth fucking sucked.

---

“I think you were making Clara jealous,” Sam said, “flirting with Harcourt like that.”

Jennifer chuckled as the three of them walked the streets, not in any real direction, just wandering. They were hungry too, and looking for a meal.

“You have to admit, Samantha, that Harcourt is a delicious looking man.”

“Yeah, but he’s dating Clara! Or, you know, kinda is.” Young relationship, far as they knew.

“Jen was doing it on purpose,” Triss said. “She knew it’d make Clara jealous.”

“What? Why? That’s mean.”

“She was doing it cause she’s hoping it’ll give Clara the nudge she needs to be more proactive. The girl hasn’t had the most successful romance life in Dolareido, so a kick to the ass might get her moving, get her out of her rut.”

“Ooooh. That’s smart.” Samantha nodded as she smiled, understanding clicking into place. “Still mean, though.”

“I am a surgeon with a scalpel,” Jen said, returning Samantha’s nod.

Triss laughed, shaking her head. “More like a butcher with a cleaver.”

“Either way, the meat gets cut, and progress is made. Now hopefully Clara will take the initiative and find a little happiness.

And leave her interest in Jack behind before it gets her hurt. Or dead.”

“Dead?” Samantha asked.

“Of course. Jack and the Prince are an item, and if Clara ever pushes a little too hard, I can imagine your sire pushing her back. Off a thirty-story building.”

“Jesus,” Triss said. “I don’t think she’ll kill her. Unless...”

Samantha gasped again. “Unless!?” Damn, the Daeva was just too cute.

Laughing, Triss gave the woman a pat on the arm. “Don’t worry about it. Let’s go find ourselves some men to seduce and drain, and tomorrow night, I’ll try that ritual.” And hope to fuck it worked, and didn’t leave Samantha traumatized for it.

~~Natasha~~

“Jessy, J-Jack is—oh my god!” Natasha stared at her laptop, squeaked, and as realization set in, she groaned. “You said you’d be ok to talk!” Apparently, she should have given Jessy more than a five minute warning she was going to call.

Jessy and Eric were sitting on the couch, facing the laptop they had on the table in front of them. Kat the cat sat on the couch back, blissfully dozing the night away, while her owner and his lover had sex. The damn Gangrel was leaning back against Eric’s chest while the man had his hands holding her hips, and she had her legs between his, almost close enough together to hide her bits. Almost, but not quite, and the angle showed that the two were having anal sex, while a lot ... lot lot of white stuff trickled out of her sex.

Casual, lazy anal sex, judging from the complete lack of movement in the two.

“Sorry,” Eric said as he peeked around Jessy’s shoulder for the camera. “Her idea. We’d been relaxing, and then you texted her, and —”

“Th-This is how you relax!?” She leaned toward the laptop so she knew her angry face filled their camera.

Jessy shrugged and gestured to the cat only a foot away. “Kat understands.”

“Kat is a cat!”

Laughing, Jessy leaned back against Eric’s chest, let her head roll back onto his shoulder, and she slowly spread her legs until they nudged his apart. One of her hands drifted down to caress her very swollen clitoris, while the other teased and massaged her breasts. And the whole while, Eric kept his grip on her hips, and slowly pushed her back and forth.

Well, they were relaxing, that much was true. There’d be sweat if they’d been going at it rough, and there wasn’t any. Which meant Natasha really was interrupting their lazy relaxing sex, which she also knew they both kinda deserved with all the shit everyone had been going through, them included.

“I’ll call b-back.”

“No! Come on, don’t do that. You know I love it when you watch.” Jessy leaned forward until she was literally leaning over the table, and she planted her hands against it as she smiled at Tash. Which of course made her big breasts hang underneath her, and Tash had to make a very strong effort to not look at them.

Natasha didn't have the same bisexual tendencies a lot of women in Dolareido had. Or at least, not as much. That didn't change that Jessy looked really, really good naked.

"Fine! F-Fine. Just ... hurry up, ok?"

"Yeah alright. We've been kinda just grinding for a while now anyway."

~~♥♥♥~~

A moment later, Jessy was on her knees on the couch, a big towel beneath her knees, elbows on the couch arm, and she made sure to arch her back and stick her large ass out as she got comfortable. Eric got behind her on his knees too, lined his length up, took her hips again, and thrust and yanked at the same time, burying himself inside. Tash couldn't see the actual point of penetration, looking at their profile like she was, but the angle indicated anal again.

No matter how much she tried to not, Natasha couldn't help but watch Eric, his thick muscular arms, his defined abs, his hard ass, and his long cock, as he pounded Jessy's ass. Each thrust meant the woman's big butt hit his pelvis hard enough to have the whole thing rippling, and her big boobs jiggling under her. They also had her groaning as Eric picked up the pace.

Kat, right beside Eric from the camera's angle, didn't care in the slightest. She licked herself a few times, glanced at the laptop and Natasha, licked herself a few more, then settled on the couch back once again.

The boys weren't around. If they were, they'd probably say some stupid stuff like 'oh wow look at that' and maybe gesture to the way Jessy's body looked absolutely fantastic in that position, back arched down and ass up. They'd want Natasha to notice, and she would. But Natasha would notice Eric more, like she was now. An innocent treat! The boys didn't mind. And Jessy really liked it when Natasha watched. So did Natasha, much as she kept trying to convince herself otherwise.

Eric liked it too, evidently. He twisted his chest a little, making sure Natasha could see the muscles as he built up a sweat. Show off. He made some grunts and groans that were less natural, more practiced, more the kinda noises a guy made when he was trying to be pretty for the camera. They weren't bad, Tash even kinda liked their more controlled sound, and she doubted Eric noticed he was doing it. A natural actor?

Either way, Jessy certainly loved hamming it up for the camera, and Tash could see it helped her get off, but she wasn't a good actor. Awesome and attractive and full of passion, but a horrible actor. She just did whatever felt good, and whatever she thought made her look hotter.

Natasha gulped, and stared on as Jessy bounced back and forth on the couch until she came. But Tash's jaw utterly dropped when Eric pulled out of her, set his cock along her ass, and came as well, drenching her back in layer after layer of cum. Tash had seen this done to her from her own perspective, but it wasn't the same as seeing it from the outside.

Vampires had the Blush of Life to let them basically fake life, and since that was an ability fueled by vitae, they could push it if they wanted. It made sense why some vampires got addicted to sex, and basically spent all night every night having it, as long as they had some blood to fuel their Blush. Werewolves didn't. Instead, the strange wolf thing living inside them drove their bodies to superhuman abilities, and that included regeneration. And that included, uh, all the juicy stuff.

By the time Eric was done, thick white lines flowed down Jessy's sides, down her ribs, and down to her teardrop breasts hanging underneath her, until they dripped onto the towel on the couch cushions. The cum flowed down her waist, and some flowed down her ass when Eric backed up a bit, and trickled down her thighs as he coated her. Wow, she looked like a painting.

~/♥♥♥~/

“D-Do ... you always have anal sex?” she asked before she could stop herself.

Jessy, shivering as she recovered, eventually stood up and smiled down at the laptop. Having sex in the living room must have been common, cause she reached over, grabbed another giant fluffy towel, and cleaned herself off. She didn't bother hiding any of herself while she did it, of course.

“I like both,” the Gangrel said, shrugging. “Eric likes both. Why?”

“I dunno, I just ... I mean...”

“Well, unlike you, I don't have two guys to fill me up, so I can only do one hole at a time.”

Tash groaned and buried her face in her hands. Trying to talk to Jessy about sex was a mistake, always leading to more ridiculous, crass comments. Horrible talk like that was fine in the middle of sex, when everyone's brains were all clouded with hormones and stuff, but it was vulgar when everything was done.

Or was that just Tash still being a prude? Well, she wasn't a prude, she knew that! Not with her sex life. But still, Jessy was a bit much sometimes.

Case in point, Jessy made sure to wipe Eric's length off with the towel, and made a show of it for the camera. And Eric, completely corrupted by Jessy's evil ways, didn't stop her or twist away or anything. If anything, he posed a little, and subtly flexed his abs and stuff, like posing for the camera before a fighting match.

But he laughed, quite aware of what Jessy was doing, and how silly it was, and eventually slipped on a pair of boxers as he sat down. Jessy tried to sit down next to him, but he blocked her.

“Get dressed.”

“Ugh, fine.” Jessy reached down and put on her underwear and her blouse, and sat down with Eric. The sight of Jessy cuddling, like full on romantic lovey dovey cuddling, was a strange sight, and Natasha couldn’t help but smile. Which earned a flip of the middle finger from the Gangrel at the camera. “What’d you say about Jack?”

“R-Right, Jack. Jack is ... um ... Jack doesn’t know about Minerva’s legacy yet, right?”

Eric winced. Jessy shrugged.

“Course he does. I messaged him. Dude needs to know.”

Natasha sighed, leaned forward over her laptop, and rested her chin in a palm.

“He d-deserves to know, but it might have been better if he didn’t, you know? At least not yet. The Prince doesn’t w-want us to let Samantha know about Black Blood.”

“You fucking serious?” Jessy snapped her eyes to Eric, but he put up his hands in quick surrender, and she groaned as she leaned back toward the camera. “Samantha is the nicest vamp in the whole fucking city, and we’re just gonna let her keep dating that asshole Jacob?”

“The Prince thinks it’s ... complicated, and w-we shouldn’t try and make Samantha do anything. And if we d-did, it might tip Black Blood off. We need to be stealthy.”

“Jesus,” Eric said.

“Fucking right, Jesus! Samantha’s her childe! Jack’s mom! Like ... god damn it.” Realization set in, Tash could see it on her friend’s face, and Jessy leaned back on the couch and against Eric’s shoulder as she accepted the cold truth of the situation. There was some logic to the Prince’s choice, no matter how much they hated it. “Your boss is a cold bitch, Tash.”

Natasha laughed. “So was Maria.”

“Ha, true.”

“W-What did you message Jack?”

“Just that Black Blood is doing whatever Minerva was doing in the past, and is probably gonna get us all killed.”

Natasha frowned at her, and then Eric, who again put up his hands in surrender.

“She pays my salary, Tash. Plus, you know, the whole loving her thing.”

Right, loving her, and thus telling her very secret stuff. A dangerous thing to do, but something Tash would have to seriously think about in the future when dealing with Matthew and Arturo. She couldn’t break her trust with the Ordo, but there had to be a common ground she and the boys could walk on.

“Jack’s smart,” Jessy said. “He’ll talk to the Prince before he does anything.”

And that conversation might not go all that well. Tash had just recovered from a horrible situation with her boys, but what Antoinette was doing might even be worse. Sure it made sense, tactically, but emotionally she was being utterly brutal, leaving Samantha in her situation and ignorant of it besides. Jack might not take it too well, and with the curse thing making him a ticking time bomb, things could get very bad.

“I got a m-message,” Tash said. “From the boys. They said we should talk with Clara.”

“How much Clara know?” Jessy asked.

“M-More than Avery used to, since Jack told her about stuff.” Repaying Clara a favor, Jack told Natasha later. “But, after all that’s happened, I think Avery’s caught up. They were investigating the t ... t-tears before Jack told her about the mysterious threat we’d been investigating. And after what happened with Eric, Sándor, me, and the boys in the Hisil? The Uratha p-probably know everything now.”

“How much is everything?”

“B-Black Blood is responsible for the t-tears, and that we’re terrified that it’s up to something. That it might t-tear down the walls between realms.” The communication software Tash and Jessy were using was secure, hopefully. “Clara knew, and now the boys know that the tears are happening in more places than just the Hisil. And it’s n-not like I could make the boys not tell Avery, not after everything we’ve found out.”

Jessy grimaced. “Shit. Sounds like we’re bedfellows with the wolves, whether we want to be or not.”

“But you’re busy w-with a war.”

“Fuuuuuck, don’t remind me.”

“We should go talk with them then,” Eric said. “Or at least talk with Clara, like Matt and Art suggested. She’s, uh, a little more understanding than Avery.”

“That was then,” Tash said, “this is n-now. A lot’s happened, and I bet she’ll be more willing to help us.”

Eric shook his head. “Maybe. Avery’s stubborn, and it wasn’t all that long ago a short vampire kid thoroughly kicked her ass.”

“Clara then?” Jessy asked. “I mean, back in the day, Jack could just go to anyone and have a chat you know? The monsters, the wolves, the covenants, whatever. Ain’t like that anymore.”

Sighing, Natasha nodded. “Clara then. I’ll t-tell the boys, and we can arrange a meeting. Matt and Art should have told Avery what we want to do, but ... but if you think we should go through Clara...”

“Clara,” they said together.

~~Damien~~

“I don’t think she’s dead.”

Damien raised as a brow as he met Gloria’s eyes. The two of them sat in his apartment, alone. Fiona had been there earlier, but when Gloria Jennings showed up, Damien thought it best the two vampires chat privately. And using her crazy Begotten powers, Fiona had gone into his closet, and literally disappeared.

Sometimes it was so easy to forget that Fiona, bright and fun and jovial and the only sunlight he could touch without immediately bursting into flames, was a monster of nightmares and darkness. An actual, literal, monster of fear.

Mental note: go on a hunt with her again sometime. She’d explained that Begotten like her could sort of feed by proxy, share in the hunt, and alleviate some of their chronic hunger issues. Something about vampires, and other paranormals, all being creatures of the Dark Mother. Azamel propaganda? Fiona had never actually spoken to any sort of Dark Mother entity, but that didn't mean she didn't exist.

Damien leaned back in his couch as he watched Gloria. She sat in the sofa chair, leaning forward with elbows on her knees, eyes set and determined. He didn't need Auspex to see she wasn't lying.

"Why do you think that?"

"Because, I can ... feel her, I guess."

"Feel her? Ah, the childe sire bond."

"Yeah, exactly. I'd feel her if she died, right? I've heard sires talk about it, about how it feels when the childe dies, or when their sire did. They can feel it, literally. And I'm not feeling that."

"I've never sired. I wouldn't know."

"What about when Lucas died?"

"I was preoccupied." Collapsing on his knees in the pile of ashes that was his sire had been a scarring moment. Any emotion he felt then was a maelstrom, mixed, and unknowable except as agony.

"Well I have sired, and the moment Amanda opened her eyes from death, I felt it. It's subtle, but ... but it's there, always tugging at me." She shook her head, hard enough her short black hair bounced against the sides of her wide eyes. "I could be wrong, but I don't think I am. That little tug in my ... in my insides, it's still there."

Frowning, Damien nodded as he looked down, chin in his fingers. "Then we have a problem."

"Problem? This is good news! I just have to find her!"

“You know there’s a issue. You wouldn’t have come to me if you thought there wasn’t. You would have gone to Michael.”

She winced at that, and looked down as well. “I ... don’t trust Michael. He said Amanda’s dead, and when he announced it to the rest of us, he gave me a stern look.”

“You think he knows you’d realize she’s not?”

“I do.”

It was strange hearing Gloria talk flat and serious. The power of the sire childe connection, he supposed. It wasn’t as compelling as the parent child connection, but still, even a vampire could become quite protective of their childe, given the right circumstances.

“That is an interesting situation then. Michael is no fool. If he has hidden Amanda away, possibly staked and trapped in torpor, so he can use her as a catalyst for his war, then he must have realized there would be repercussions. He knew that you would suspect she lived. And he knew that, if and when this war ends, her being alive is a situation he would have to resolve.”

“Resolve? You mean—”

“If he was willing to kill her for this war, he would have by now. It would have been a simple affair for him to kill her when Garry’s distraction set the building on fire. The issue now, is what will Michael do when the war is over. Will he release Amanda? How will that go over with the Primogen?” Damien sighed as he fell back against his couch again, shoulders slumping as invisible lead weights attached to him. “So many unknowns.”

“You’re telling me! That’s why I came to you. After that look Michael gave me, I was afraid to tell anyone.”

“You told me, but not Jack?” No need to ask why not Jessy.

“I ... I thought about it. But Jack’s not Jack anymore, right? I remember the first time I met Jack, the same night he was embraced. Just a kid, intimidated as all hell by everything Julias was bombarding him with that night. Jack is not that kid, anymore.”

That was all too true, but not necessarily for the reasons she thought.

“Jack is trustworthy, Gloria.”

“Jack the Ripper is not trustworthy.”

He winced. There went any hope that that name hadn’t spread to common usage.

“Jack is not the Ripper. That is a separate thing.”

“So I’ve heard! But I don’t know what that means or anything. All I know is sometimes Jack can get pretty crazy, and people die. I know he’s been a problem for ... everyone! The werewolves, the Carthians, especially the hunters. I don’t trust him.”

“You don’t trust him, or you’re afraid of him? Given the things that have happened, I can understand the latter, not the former.”

“You trust the Ripper?”

“Jack. Is not. The Ripper. I can’t go into details. It’s highly personal. But understand Jack is doing everything in his power to be rid of the curse.” Damien’s own efforts to find details about the ritual used to seal the original curse in Susanna had proven fruitless time and time again, as expected. It’d been like looking for a needle in a haystack. “And he’s doing everything in his power to make sure this war doesn’t get anyone killed.”

“I have a hard time believing Jack will be delicate about this, or rescue anyone. That scene at the hospital was—”

“I was there, in person, Gloria. I saw how bad it got, to a degree you—” No, wait, no point in scaring her. Opposite of the point, actually. “I think you’d be surprised at how much good Jack has done, both with and without the curse. You should trust him. I do.”

She sighed as she leaned back as well, and looked around at his streamlined apartment of blacks, whites, and metals.

“You trust him with your life?”

“I do.”

“And with the life of others? My childe?”

“He’s one of the few people I would trust with those burdens.”

After another heavy sigh, she rubbed one of her arms as she looked down, resigned. “Alright. If you wanna tell him, I won’t stop you. But ... what should I do in the meantime?”

“For now, do whatever Michael wants. And if he wants you to kill Carthians, maybe drag your feet on that a little.”

“Sure, I guess. But I mean, you don’t think some Carthians deserve to get dusted? Some of them are real fucking assholes, you know.”

And the Carthians probably felt the same way about the Invictus. This turf war was hilariously stupid, and according to world history, utterly inevitable.

“Do whatever you can to avoid permanent repercussions, Gloria. Jack and I will get this situation fixed, one way or another.”

~~Jack~~

He glared down at his phone, and the message Jessy sent. It was dumb of her, to message something this sensitive, but then again it was unlikely Black Blood was reading their messages.

~Eric and Tash found out that BB is trying to do what Minerva was doing, back in the day. Which is apparently apocalyptic? The fuck do we do?~

After a few minutes to let his hands stop shaking, he texted back.

~We focus on ending this stupid war, so we can focus on BB later. For now, Tash can handle it.~

~Sure thing boss.~

Boss. Ugh. She'd heard Jessy call Julias that. The memory hit him like a punch in the gut, and now was definitely not the time for a trip down memory lane.

He showed up at the Elysium Tower, with a single text message for the Prince. ~We need to talk.~

Naturally, she told him to meet her in the meeting room on the top floor, her main office. He did. Immediately, the room took on an air he was all too familiar with, and one he wasn't expecting: business meeting. Daniel stood in the corner, which was Antoinette's way of saying this conversation was not going to be a personal one, and he had to be aware of that. She knew what he was here to talk about, and she wasn't going to let their relationship affect the conversation.

He mentally rolled up his sleeves. He loved her, but they both knew situations like this were going to happen, and they had to be mature enough, and trust each other enough, to know it wouldn't affect their relationship. Hopefully.

“Black Blood is trying to bring down the Gauntlet?” he asked.

Antoinette nodded. “Indeed. The Gauntlet, and perhaps other things, we are not sure. Natasha is investigating, as is the sheriff.”

Jack looked to Daniel, and the man, dressed in his usual trench coat, nodded as he adjusted his glasses. The Prince purposefully left out how Daniel was investigating, because she knew it was better if Jack didn’t know. Just one of the many little quirks of their relationship, not being able to share all their secrets with each other. It hurt, but he knew it was the right call.

“And my mom?”

“Unaware.”

“And...”

“And will continue to be unaware.”

He frowned and took a step closer to her desk. Daniel took his hands out of his pockets. He didn’t go for his sword or anything, but Jack could see the grip of his sword poking up from over his shoulder. Knowing the sheriff considered him dangerous, even with the love of his life, was fucking infuriating, and Jack squinted at the man as he fought to suppress the growing rage. Throw it into the fire, like Elaine taught you.

Once he was calm, he looked back to the Prince.

“I guess you already know how this conversation is going to go.”

She nodded, her eyes steady. “Oui.”

“I don’t want Mom dating Jacob, or even getting near the guy, if we know Black Blood is actually up to some pretty nasty stuff. My mom is in danger being that close to Jacob. But considering how powerful Jacob is, the only way my mom would actually be safe from him would be if you locked her up in the basement of the tower until this whole situation is resolved, if that ever happens.” Like Michael tried to do with Roland. “And, just because Black Blood is up to something horrible doesn’t mean Jacob knows about it or is helping the spirit. Plus, if we suddenly make Mom not see him anymore, we tip our hand about knowing what Black Blood is up to.”

Her smile grew. Not the loving, tender smile she usually shared with him. This was the smile of a pleased mastermind, glad someone she worked with was capable of thinking with the same sort of intelligence she was. Except thinking this way made him sick.

“Oui, that is how the conversation will go.”

Jack looked down as his fists shook. “You realize you’re asking me to let my mother continue dating a man who’s most likely involved in something so bad, it could get everyone in Dolareido killed?”

“Yes.”

“You know how difficult that is for me?”

She leaned forward and set her elbows on her big desk as she netted her fingers together. “She was your mother in your first life. She is my childe in this life.”

Vampires being vampires. Elaine told him Viktor sired Julius because he wanted a powerful tool. Samantha’s power hadn’t really shown itself yet, but that didn’t mean Antoinette wasn’t going to use her as a tool regardless.

That isn’t fair. Antoinette is just looking at all the options and picking the ones that make sense.

It's still heartless. Mom's not a tool, she's a person, and she trusts her sire to take care of her until she's capable of taking care of herself.

Antoinette hasn't thrown her life away, calm down. It's still perfectly reasonable that Jacob won't hurt her or anything.

Bullshit. Jacob and Black Blood work together and know each other well. Way too damn well.

He sighed. That was the impression Jack had, but not some sort of fact. His mom wasn't dating Black Blood. She was dating Jacob, another person, someone that could be reasoned with, and might not even be a part of what Black Blood was up to.

Worst of all, if they forced his mom to leave Jacob, it might tip Black Blood off.

"So I have to ... just pretend that it's ok if my mom keeps seeing the Circle, and Jacob?"

"Oui."

Slowly, he unclenched his fists, and forced himself to look Antoinette in the eye.

"Is that why you let Mom get so close to Jacob? I mean, Jacob was flirting with her way back when, and I just knew the asshole was doing it to get under my skin, and yours. But now—"

"You do not understand Jacob as well as you think, Mister Terry." Wow, she hadn't called him that in a long time. "He is not some enemy I am scheming against, some villain to be destroyed as Lucas was. Through the centuries, Jacob has proven time and time again to have more depth to him than one could know from the masks he wears and façades he displays. If he has taken an interest in my childe"—her childe, not his mom—"it is because there is something to their relationship that creates a connection. And I would be loath to rip that from my old friend, because of our agendas.”

He watched her closely as she spoke, knowing full well he probably looked angrier and angrier as Antoinette told him only half the truth. Nothing fucking worse than a fucking half truth.

Heat boiled up through him again, setting off a fuse in his mouth. “I’m not in the Ordo. I don’t take orders from you. If I want to tell my mom about Black Blood, then—”

She raised the corner of her lips in a small sneer, and growled. “I am the Prince of this city, Mister Terry. The internal affairs of the covenants are their own business, but this is no such thing. This is business that affects my city in its entirety, and potentially beyond. You will obey me. Do I make myself clear?”

He glared at her, fists clenching again. The moment they did, Daniel shifted. A single inch, maybe a centimeter, but he did, as if ready to respond to something Jack might do.

Fuck them. He turned around, and left. And he made damn sure to not look back.

He knew the only reason the Prince wasn’t grabbing him right now and demanding he listen to her, and pay for the disrespect, was how much their relationship had grown. But right there, for a single stupid second, he didn’t give a shit.

---

The real name of the bar was Tanent’s Bar. Kindred called it the Border Bar.

Jack sat the bar, Bruce at his side, both of them pretending to drink. When the bartender, a Carthian thrall, asked for what drink, Bruce waved a finger and uttered a few words with some eye contact, and the bartender left, convinced Jack and Bruce had ordered already. The joys of being a Ventrue.

This particular bar, riding the line between the Carthian and Invictus half of South Side, was a frequent haunt for Carthians and Invictus who liked to rub shoulders the way American football players did. You had to let off steam somehow, and fist fights were a way to do that. All in all, it was a very stupid place for any vampire to be, especially stupid now that the war had begun in earnest. No one was under any illusions anymore. One misstep meant a dead vampire.

But Michael told him to pay a visit, because Carthians were muscling and trying to turn the bar from its usual 'co-owned' state, to a Carthian bar.

Jack stared at the drink in his hand, fingers slowly tightening as he ran the conversation with Antoinette through his mind over and over and over again. His mom could die because of her. His mom was only alive because of her. She was still being cruel. She was also being smart.

The pendulum in his brain smashed against the two sides of his skull over and over, until the glass shattered in Jack's hand. The few kine in the bar stared at him, but the thrall bartender knew better. She wiped up the mess, and got him a new glass, making damn sure to not meet Jack's gaze.

Christ he hated how scared everyone was of him. Even Bruce avoided acknowledging Jack suddenly shattering a glass. God forbid someone anger the terrible Jack the Ripper. Fucking god. And—

~Master~ Mulder called from outside. ~Carthians approach.~

Jack groaned as his familiars announced the entrance of three Carthians. No, wait, five. No, wait ... eight.

“You’re fucking shitting me,” Bruce whispered.

“Apparently not.” Sighing, Jack turned to the side and faced the group.

Joe of course. He was young, bit over thirty years embraced, and despite how dumb he was, Garry kept putting him front and center. Maybe the dumbass was trustworthy. Or maybe he was better in a fight than they gave him credit for, and he just hadn’t had the chance to show his stuff.

Steve was there, Debby and Bella too. Kathy was there, but she hung out in back, eyeing him like he was some nasty thing that should be killed with fire. He almost expected to see Tilly, but nope. Maybe Garry had told her to avoid him? After he let her go and sent her to Garry, hopefully that act of goodwill had meant something.

Steve, Debby, and Bella were all serious, proven threats, Ancilla that were plenty dangerous in a straight fight. Joe was more dangerous, because he was itching to show he was worth all the attention Garry gave him. It was always the stupid, eager ones you had to look out for to do something really disastrous in the immediate, like throw a molotov like a baseball at a target five feet away.

“Eight of you, really?” Jack said.

“Was supposed to be a couple of us,” Kathy said from the back, “but then I saw you.”

Bruce nodded, and adjusted his tie. “Suppose if it was just me, it’d be two Carthians here. One to get my attention, one to stab me in the back.”

God damn it Bruce. Jack wasn’t trying to goad them. At the same time, he didn’t want Bruce to know he was actively trying to prevent a fight at every possible turn. Michael wouldn't like open defiance. Defiance had to be sneaky.

The kine in the bar didn't need to be asked. They walked out the back door, each glancing over their shoulders as they did, half to make sure no one was going to shoot them in the back, half to see who the hell the small dude in the nice suit was. It was his first time in the bar.

“You think we'd stab you in the back?” Joe said, snarling with every word as he came in closer, pushing aside a couple chairs. At least he didn't kick them aside like some drunk moron.

Steve and Bella came up on his sides, but a little behind. Either they were content to let him throw the first punch, and probably take the first hit in return, or they were afraid of Jack. Both, from the glances they threw his way.

The Ventrue part of him fucking loved the scared, quick peeks. And even with the necklace keeping his Beast and the Ripper quiet, Jack could tell they loved it too. But Jack didn't. Jack felt fucking sick to his dry, withered vampire stomach seeing that shit.

“Look guys,” Jack said, sliding off his stool. “You know why I'm here. Michael guessed someone would show up tonight looking to cause trouble.”

Joe frowned at him. “The Border Bar is ours.” Either the man was too stupid to feel fear, or he hid it very well. Probably the former.

“You know it's not,” Bruce said. “And we're sick of giving inch after inch over to a bunch of—”

Jack held up a hand. Not in a quick 'shut the fuck up' gesture, but a slower 'I got this' gesture. Last thing he needed was to make the Invictus uncomfortable around him, like a lot of them already were.

Bruce knew Julias, and it was only because of that friendship he was willing to work with Jack.

“Give it some time, and everything will go back to normal,” Jack said. “Our bosses are having a tiff, but there’s no need for us to swing for the fences every opportunity we can.”

Bella laughed, but it wasn’t sincere. A fake laugh, the kind you used when looking for a fight.

“You fucks think we killed Amanda. We didn’t, but we know you think we did. You really expect us to believe you’re a peacekeeper, Jack the Ripper?”

He winced and looked down for a moment. That name, that fucking name was going to follow him everywhere. Garry you asshole, he saved Tilly for a reason. The fuck is this about, then?

Or, this wasn’t Garry’s call. Joe’s call? Why the fuck would Steve and Bella listen to this asshole? Maybe Garry was pulling his punches, and they wanted to step up the game? No one had died, since potentially Amanda, and Jack wanted to keep it that way. Maybe the others didn’t.

God damn assholes.

The angry looks on their faces said plenty. They were here for a fight, and they were looking for more than just a brawl. Fine. Knowing Carthians, they were going to get physical, use their fists, maybe some knives, and—

All eight of them reached behind their waists, pulled out hidden pistols, and pointed them at him and Bruce. Oh shit.

Jack pushed Bruce out of the way, just in time to hear the gunfire. Eight pistols, dozens of bullets, all pointed at the two Ventrue. At least Bruce was down on the ground, and not getting shot as he scrambled for cover around the corner of the bar counter.

Jack however, was getting shot. A lot. He'd expected them to come at him with fists and knives largely cause, yeah they were Carthians, but also cause pistols made noise. A lot of noise. And while the Border Bar wasn't in a crowded section of South Side, there were still people outside.

They really wanted him dead. Christ, if they succeeded, did they even realize what the Prince would do to them?

Lead slammed into him, a fucking lot of it. Caught off guard, and with the necklace on suppressing his Beast, the bullets cut into him without issue. Tiny balls of metal that pushed through his suit and into his flesh, where Kindred blood put a stop to them a little too late. Jack collapsed back on his ass, only for Joe to come forward and aim at his head, pulling the trigger half a dozen times in a couple seconds.

Jack put up his hand, and summoned his vitae. Vampire blood poured through his limbs, turning his Kindred flesh into steel. Joe's bullets crashed into Jack's hand, and while Jack struggled to keep the flesh barrier between his head and the incoming bullets, a bit of vampire strength made it possible. Once Joe stopped firing, Jack yanked off his necklace, pocketed it, and stood up.

Every Carthian there stared at him, and their jaws dropped as blood seeped out of the hundred holes they put into his suit. Thick, dark, Kindred blood oozed out from the holes in his body, and snaked around his limbs, sealing skin and muscle and repairing bone. They still had magazines, but none of them bothered to reload as Jack glared at each one of them while he repaired his body and prepared for war.

“Think twice!” Bella said. “Do anything to break the Masquerade and you'll be in just as much shit as we will. Worse!”

Jack glared at the woman, then the door behind her. Still closed. People outside heard the gunfire, no doubt about that, and someone would be calling 911 by now. Invictus wouldn't be able to stop the cops from showing up here for long without it being suspicious. Which would be a huge problem if Jack needed to deal with these fuckers asap, but he didn't. All he needed to do was keep them from establishing some kinda flag of ownership. Even if they did stake a claim, it wasn't real, just posturing. But posturing would turn into a real claim with time, and that was something the Primogen could actually bring to the Prince as a legitimate claim for territory, and blah blah blah.

Necklace secure in his pocket, Jack had an easy time summoning and controlling his blood, and once he was sure he wouldn't be walking out of the bar with a bunch of holes punched into his flesh, he forced the blood to settle. It continued to pulse under his skin, and from the looks the Carthians were giving him, they could see it pulsing. Everything went quiet, except for the quiet clinks of flattened bullets falling out of his clothes.

“Just get out of here,” he said. “Don't make me make you.”

Joe laughed, that half psycho half scared kinda laugh. “The great and mighty Jack the Ripper thinks he can take us all on? You—”

Bruce popped over the corner of the counter, and shot once. The bullet went through Joe's skull, out the skull, and crashed into the pub wall.

Jack snapped his gaze back at Bruce, glaring hard enough Bruce didn't fire a second time.

“I ... He was open.”

The Carthians, ready to scatter and surround Jack, Bruce's bullet a perfect bell to signal the fight had started, managed to not jump around as Jack held up his hands, palms forward and empty.

“This is a fucking bar, on the border, and no one has claim on it. I’m not here to take it, just make sure you idiots don’t think you can, ok? Take Joe and get out.”

The Carthians looked at each other, obviously skeptical, but when Jack stepped back and gestured to the unconscious vampire, they relented. Frowning at him the whole time, they scooped Joe up, and gave him to Bella. She left first, hiding herself and the dumbass with her Cloak, while the others followed after her. Soon the bar was empty save for Jack and Bruce, and he breathed a useless sigh of relief.

Groaning, Jack turned around and looked up at his partner.

“Dude, what the fuck?”

“What? Michael told us to fight off any Carthians who try and take the bar.”

He was tempted to throw Michael a few insults, but he couldn’t trust Bruce. Much as he and Julias had been friends, Bruce was devoted to the Invictus, maybe a little too devoted.

“Michael wants this war a little too much, Bruce. Be careful throwing dynamite ok? Take it from someone who’s been at the center of too many big moments. One wrong move and you piss off everyone, cause a chain reaction, and suddenly everyone’s trying to kill each other, you included.”

“Didn’t you thoroughly dismantle an entire pack of werewolves?” Bruce put the pistol into his vest holster, hidden under his jacket. “Werewolves we were trying to get along with? Clara and Carter used to live in some luxurious suites, paid for by us before that incident, right?”

Jack winced with every sentence. “Yeah, I didn’t handle that situation well. And that wasn’t…” Bad idea to go around telling everyone the curse had a mind of its own, but Kindred understood what it meant to have the Beast tugging at their emotions. “It shouldn’t have happened. My Beast got the better of me.”

“And that curse made it possible.”

Jack eyed the man. “What’re you getting at?”

“Use the curse next time Carthians show up and—”

“I used the curse to be able to do this!” He gestured at his chest and sleeve, riddled with holes, and idly plucked a chunk of lead out of his palm. Flesh sealed quickly.

“You know what I mean. Go on the offensive.”

“Two problems with that. First: there are a million ways going on the offensive could backfire. You think I can just march into Carthian territory and go on a killing spree? Just cause this curse makes me strong doesn’t mean a well aimed molotov isn’t going to instantly kill me. And the more we poke the bear, the more desperate the Carthians are going to get.”

“If they break the Masquerade, the Prince intervenes.”

“They’ll find a way to do some crazy shit without crossing the line. They attacked Xnomina, remember.”

“Alright fine, you don’t want this war to get more heated than it has to. What’s the second problem?”

Jack looked the man in the eyes, dead on, unable to keep the frown off his face.

“I don’t like killing people who don’t deserve it.”

Bruce met his gaze, but not for long, eventually looking down as he stepped back.

“That right?”

“Yes, it is. I don’t want to kill the Carthians, and I don’t want them to kill me.”

“Not many vampires in this city have a kill count as high as you, Jack.”

Jack froze for a moment, but let it go as he did the math. No, Bruce wasn’t talking about that thing with Viktor and Tony, or Lucas. He meant all the shit that happened after, the hunters Jack killed with the help of the curse.

If the man only knew how big the number really was...

Jack’s phone buzzed. He checked it. A text message from Damien.

~Gloria is convinced her childe is alive. Sire childe connection. I’ve told her to stay quiet about it.~

Fucking yes! Not exactly a guarantee that she was alive, but still. Also, shit. Ok, good that Amanda was probably still alive. She was a nice girl and didn’t deserve death. But, that meant shit would get complicated. If Michael had her stashed away, it meant he was using her to trigger his war, but also that he wasn’t heartless enough to kill her. Assuming Jack was right ... what a shitty moral gray area for Michael to be in. If he’d just killed Amanda, then Jack would probably end up killing him, problem solved. If Garry’s stupid distraction attack had accidentally killed her, then Jack could see himself easily being forced to kill Garry, and other Carthians besides. Again, problem solved, shit as it was. But this? The fuck was he supposed to do?

“We’re done for now,” Jack said. “If Carthians show up while we’re gone, it won’t mean anything. They came for the fight, not for the bar.”

“The fight they didn’t get. The fight Mister McDonald wanted.”

“Doesn’t matter. The Carthians know they can’t push us out, and that’s enough.” Jack headed for the back door. “Let’s get out of here before the police show up and give us trouble.”

“You know you could easily wipe their memories.”

Yeah, he could, with the curse’s help. And anything he could do to avoid using the curse, the better.

---

After a change of clothes, Jack decided to do something he almost never did anymore. Take a walk.

He sighed as he walked the sidewalk, hundreds of kine passing by as they drifted from casino to casino, lounge to club. Drunk, high, happy, they didn’t know a damn thing about what happened in Dolareido, about the vampires that used them as cattle, none of it. That was the way it was meant to be.

Michael and Garry were going to ruin it, if they didn’t kill each other first. And then the Prince would get involved, and as ridiculously strong as Antoinette and the sheriff were, they preferred diplomacy over an iron fist for a reason. Sure, the Prince’s views defaulted to diplomacy, but there was also the tiny problem that there were only three dragons in Dolareido, while the Carthians and Invictus had about a hundred vamps each, since the Prince lifted the ban on siring. If Antoinette went to war against those two, who the fuck knew what’d happen. If she helped one, the other would help her, and then might backstab her when all was said and done.

Sighing, Jack looked up and caught a glimpse of Mulder and Scully as they drifted from rooftop to rooftop. Much as he wanted to think about the turf war, his mind kept going back to his mom.

Sure, she was a lot happier now that she was with Jacob, but that'd backfire pretty fucking badly if Jacob turned out to be an enemy.

Ugh, it hurt how obvious it was in hindsight. Of course Black Blood was up to no good, the spirit — not actually a spirit — wasn't exactly an embodiment of good things. Then again, a 'good' spirit might try and do exactly what Black Blood was doing, if it meant it got to do more spirit things.

No fucking wonder Avery didn't like vampires getting into all the spirit stuff. Shit was weird and complicated.

And yeah, all that shit itched at him, but it wasn't really what was bothering him, not completely. It was Antoinette's cold eyes when she told him to leave his mother alone, and let her continue seeing Jacob. Calculating, tactical, smart, and ruthless. Sometimes it was easy to forget how old she was, even though she'd told him on dozens of occasions a part of why she loved him, was cause of how he was honest about his emotions, and easily wore them on his sleeve. Antoinette, on the other hand, wouldn't blink if she had to kill a child to save two more. The Trolley Dilemma was probably a joke to her.

He knew that. He knew that about her from day one. But never in a million years did he think her ruthlessness would be pointed at him, and at his mom. His mom! Everyone knew by now that sure, Jack and his mom had some similarities, but she wasn't Jack. People could take advantage of her, her niceness and naivety. Could and would. He just never expected it'd be the love of his life taking advantage of her.

He stopped. People stepped around him, and some had to shove aside other kine to keep from touching him. Didn't need to be a vampire to feel the power and rage coming off him as he thought about Jacob, his mom, Antoinette, and Black Blood. Fists clenched at his sides, he stared down at the street, at his shoes, and let the rage boil.

Don't let it boil. Throw it into the fire, like Elaine taught you.

Maybe he should talk to Elaine about it? Nah, she'd side with Antoinette. Anyone that was thinking clearly would. Well, his mom was his mom, and he couldn't think clearly about sacrificing her as a ploy to beat Black Blood at whatever he was trying to pull. Hell, he couldn't think clearly knowing his mom was having sex with Jacob.

Sex. Jacob. Ugh!

He laughed. Christ, he needed a laugh. Of course reality came running back and hit him in the face, hard. Now was usually when he'd go back to the Elysium Tower and be with Antoinette, talk about science and music, have sex, maybe feed. And he didn't want to. He didn't want to look at her, not now. Christ, if those Carthians at the bar had pushed just a little bit harder, he would have happily torn off some limbs.

~Clara is following you.~

Jack blinked, and looked up. Scully's voice. She perched on a power line, Mulder beside her, and both crows flapped their wings a couple times before looking across the street.

Sure enough, there was Clara. They met eyes, and she managed a small smile and wave.

~Know how long she's been following me?~

~Since those vampires fired all those guns at you.~

Scully and Mulder's vocabulary grew every night. It was almost scary.

~She probably heard the commotion and investigated.~

~Yes master.~ Mulder said. ~Clara is ... nicer, than the white-haired one, master.~

He rolled his eyes, chuckling. Yeah, of course they'd have something to say about his love life, considering how often they were with him.

Sighing, he walked across the street and joined Clara. He was in his usual Invictus business suit, and she wore a white tank top and blue jeans. They could not have looked more different.

“Hey,” she said. “Got shot?”

“Hey.” He smiled at her. “A lot, actually. You didn't see it?”

“Nah. Can smell it on you. Showed up cause the police showed up. Saw you leaving, but didn't get a good look. Figured you were done for the night when you went back to your apartment, but I—”

“Followed me anyway.”

“Well, yeah, you're kind of important. Sorry not sorry. Avery wants me keeping an eye on this turf war, and we both know shit's going to happen around you.”

He laughed. “Yeah. Just ... shit on my mind. Came back out for a walk.”

“Yeah? Dolareido's a horrible place for walks.” Naturally, someone bumped into her shoulder the moment she said it. People flowed down the wide sidewalks, and while they did a good job avoiding Jack these days, most people didn't have that luxury. “Why do you still have an apartment anyway?”

“In case I get shot up, and need a nearby source of clothes. Rich Side ain’t exactly close.”

“Touché.”

“I’m surprised you’re out alone, and not with the pack, doing Uratha things.”

“We’re laying low. I—how much do you know? Tash been talking to you?”

“Yeah.” He grimaced as he looked down. “Well, Jessy has, cause Eric talks to her.”

“Course he does.” Laughing, a bit awkward and a bit sad, Clara eventually shrugged. “You gonna do something?”

“About Mom?”

“Yeah.”

“Apparently I’m not.”

“Uh, you’re not?”

He shook his head. “Can’t. Might tip Black Blood off. Antoinette—let’s go talk somewhere, not out here.” Much as streets crowds were usually a safe place to chat, he didn’t feel comfortable talking about Black Blood in the open. Deadly secrets of the Danse, no problem. But not Black Blood.

“Yeah, sure.”

---

“I’m not sure which is worse,” she said, gesturing around at his apartment, “the crazy mansion that looks like some rich old pervert stuck in the eighteenth century lives there, or this apartment.”

“American Psycho?”

“Exactly.”

He laughed as he plopped down on his couch. “Yeah, heard that before. Lot of Invictus vamps get these kinda apartments.”

“Any reason?”

“Easy to clean, easy to manage, I guess.”

“Easy to wipe down and clean blood off the floor, you mean.”

He laughed again, and she smiled as she sat down on the couch across from him.

“You know, all you gotta do is ask, and you can have your old apartment back. It was a luxury suite, Clara. Nicer than this place.”

She smiled for him, a pity smile. “Yeah, maybe. But after what happened with Maria and you, Avery’s happier avoiding Invictus attachments.”

“It was a bribe, Jack.”

He shrugged. “So? It was a bribe so you guys would play friendly. And it’s not like you’ve joined Garry and are hammering on us like he is, so it’s still in the cards.”

“Yeah, I guess. And I do miss the hot tub.”

“Hot tubs are pretty awesome.”

She grinned at him. “You’re avoiding the topic.”

“Of course I’m avoiding the topic! Last thing I want to talk about is Black Blood, and Jacob and my mom, and the fact I’ve been told to just ... let my mom keep dating him.”

“That is a pretty shit thing to be told.”

“You’re telling me.”

“And you’re gonna listen to the Prince?”

He leaned forward, set his elbows on his knees, and let his head dangle. “I guess.”

“The fuck? Why?”

“Because she’s damn smart, Clara. If I confront Mom about this, it’ll tip Black Blood off. If I try and be sneaky, and just randomly decide I don’t want her dating Jacob, that’ll lead to a fuckload of drama.”

“Drama, from Samantha?”

“She’s my mom. I mean yeah, she’s super nice, and she definitely tries to go with the flow wherever she is, but that doesn’t mean she isn’t a person. We’ve fought before.”

“Hard to imagine her yelling.”

If only she knew. Even someone like his mom could scream and rage, if her husband died and her son closed himself off to her.

“She likes Jacob. And for some reason, I guess Jacob likes her. I —”

“Ha, for some reason?” She leaned forward, and met his eyes with a little more seriousness than he was expecting. “You’re with a vampire just as old as Jacob, you know.”

He broke first, looking down again. “Yeah apparently, but that’s biting me in the ass now.”

“Because she’s an ancient monolith? Makes super cold, brutal decisions easily?”

“Yeap. Nailed it.”

“You had to know that when you started dating her.”

“Yeah, but I never expected to be on the receiving end of that coldness, you know? Figured it’d always be me standing beside her as she, and eventually we, made those grand decisions. And hell, I’m good at that, I’m good at making heavy decisions.”

“But...”

“But not when it’s my mom!” He jumped up, almost hit the glass table between them, and paced around. Marched around really, considering he stomped his feet. “Christ, she’s always been naive and stupid.”

“Hey, that’s mean.”

“Well it’s true! She’s not smart, and I’m not going to sugarcoat that. She’s not built for this fucking vampire world, the Danse Macabre, and seeing her get manipulated by Jacob—”

“You said yourself Jacob seems to actually like her.”

Fuck. Jack stopped pacing and glared down at Clara.

“I really have a hard time believing that.”

“Hey, like I said, you bagged an ancient elder vamp with the biggest tits in the world.”

“Hey! Not ... not the biggest.”

“And you know Jacob’s been doing witch stuff for centuries. It wouldn’t surprise me if he’s given himself a huge dick.”

“Oh god.”

“With like, bumps and ridges and stuff that feel great going in and out.”

“Please stop.”

“And it probably vibrates.”

Jack covered his ears and shook his head. “I’m not listening. Not listening.”

Clara burst out laughing, and for some damn reason, he did too, and he sat back down as they both laughed, belly bursting sorta laughter.

“All I’m saying is, give your mom some credit. If you’re interesting enough to bag a bitch like Antoinette, your mom can do the same to Jacob.”

“Yeah well, it’s biting us both in the ass now, I guess. Antoinette’s telling me to do something I really don’t want to do, and Mom’s dating a dude who could be trying to destroy everything.” It was a shit deal, either way. And it fucking sucked he couldn’t go to Antoinette and talk to her about this, cause he knew what she’d say.

Clara though, he wasn’t sure what she’d say.

“I guess it is, yeah. She’s half a millenium old. You’re, what, twenty-three, including your vamp years?”

He collapsed back against the couch, looked up and let his head rest against it. “I know, I know.” Ask her? It was dumb. It didn’t matter what Clara said, he knew what he had to do: not tell his mom. But, he wanted to know what she thought anyway. “You think I should tell her?”

“Ah fuck, I was worried you’d ask.”

“I know you got an opinion on it. And I’m all ears.”

She groaned as she leaned back too, folded her arms across her chest, and did the contemplation frown. He expected an instant reply, but she was really thinking about this. Which probably meant she’d agree with Antoinette, considering how perfectly logical the Prince’s plan was.

“I say you tell Samantha.” Or not.

“What, seriously?”

“Yeah seriously.”

“But it’s not a smart move.”

Clara groaned, got up, and sat down beside him. “Ok, maybe I’m sounding like a bitch for saying this, but fuck the Prince.”

“I mean—”

“Fuck the Prince, fuck the Danse Macabre, fuck all the stupid manipulation and deception shit. Samantha’s your mom, and family is important. And I don’t mean blood.” She set a hand on his knee, but pulled it away a moment later. “I’m saying, if you really think your mom is in danger, do something.”

He stared at her, jaw dropping. “What?”

“I’m saying if you go through life, or your second life or whatever, only making the most tactically sound decisions, you’re going to grow into a cruel, heartless bastard. Sometimes making mistakes is what makes life worth living, right? I mean, christ, look at romance. How many of the best romances came out of bad decisions?”

“I’m ... not sure—”

“How many friendships came out of really bad, stupid decisions?”

Jack winced and looked down. Damien. He let Damien live after killing Lucas. Hell, Daniel and Natasha had let him live, a massive risk, and they did it because they had a gut feeling he didn’t deserve to die. Antoinette would have killed Damien, if those two hadn’t asked for his sanctuary.

“I’m still not sure—”

“How many times have perfectly valid, tactical, calculated plans gone to hell, and the only thing that managed to save the day, or salvage something out of the fucking mess, was when people went with their heart?”

“Their heart.” He laughed at that, but it was a weak laugh, killed by Clara’s lack of one. “This really is werewolf versus vampire viewpoint, isn’t it?”

“I guess, yeah. What I’m trying to say is, it makes sense to make plans, but truth of the matter is, it’s impossible to know every detail about a situation, right? Shit always hits the fan in some way or another. If you’re an engineer and you’re building a machine, do the calculations. When you’re dealing with people though, there’s just so much chaos to it, so much emotion, so much unpredictability. Jacob and Antoinette are ancient, so I’m sure they’re better at predicting people than most, but I don’t care if they’re ten thousand years old, they’ll never be able to predict shit perfectly. But instinct, intuition, and good old fashioned heart has pulled me and my pack out of Hell dozens of times.

“We’ve dealt with vampires, maybe not as old as Jacob or Antoinette, but we’ve dealt with vamps who had money and people, agents, thralls, and big plans. That shit fell apart the moment bullets started flying. We’ve dealt with spirits crazy strong before, not Black Blood strong but still, and even their plans fell apart the moment things went head to head. And when people are struggling to stay afloat, and all you can see is smoke, it’s ... it’s not the fucking plans that save people or make things happen. It’s going with your fucking guts, and doing everything you can to help the people close to you, your important people. Your pack.”

Jack let her words sink in, before he gave her knee a small nudge with his own. “Trust my guts and my heart?” Which didn’t even work anymore, vampire body and all that. “Like an anime? Next you’re gonna tell me ‘don’t believe in yourself, believe in me who believes in you.’”

“Jesus, you are such a nerd.”

He snorted on a laugh. “You’re the one quoting an anime speech.”

“I was actually going for more of a hero vibe, maybe World War II. Like, we’re about to get overrun by bad guys, and all of our plans have failed, and now all we can do is fight for our lives, back to back, shoulder to shoulder.”

“That does sound pretty epic.”

“It’s how Uratha do things. We plan the hunt, but when teeth meets flesh, we go with our instincts. Life just has too many variables to plan for everything perfectly. And our instincts pretty much always tell us to help our friends and family, no matter what.”

He nodded, letting his eyes drift down as he tried to digest that view. Antoinette might have agreed with the idea that a plan couldn’t be perfect, but she’d never agree with doing anything based on gut instinct, or a feeling.

“I ... I wonder,” he said, “if I get as old as Antoinette, I’ll get...”

“Heartless?”

“She’s not heartless. She’s ... It’s ... Her heart is buried, I guess, under a shit load of rubble and ice. A big part of our relationship is me digging it up for her.”

Clara frowned at him. “A one-sided relationship.”

“It can be, a little. Normally it’s great. Different, but great, and ... just...”

“Just not now.”

“No. Not now.”

Nodding, she leaned back as well, mirroring him. “You got yourself in real deep shit, dating an elder, especially one as old as her.”

“It’s not shit, it’s ... ok yeah, it’s kinda shit, at least right now. I don’t want my mom to die in one of the Prince’s plots.” And Antoinette did plots. She set up a nasty plot to get her earlier child and a brewing enemy to fight each other, and it worked beautifully. And he knew she’d made dozens of plots, to get Dolareido to where it was today. She hadn’t said the words, but she’d implied more than a few times that the Invictus and Carthians had danced to her tune before, as she molded Dolareido into her city.

“Well, I won’t tell her. I’ll respect whatever you decide. But, yeah, if I was you, I’d tell her. Who knows, she might surprise you.”

The idea of going behind Antoinette’s back made him sick to his stomach. The idea of Antoinette sacrificing his mom for a chance at outsmarting Black Blood, made him boil with rage.

He forced the rage down as he looked at the woman beside him. “You and Brace getting along?”

She sat up straight, and blushed. That was surprising. Clara may not have been completely desensitized to embarrassment like a lot of vamps were, but she was still harder than the typical girl, social situations included.

“Yeah, we are.”

“That’s good. He’s not what you’d expect from a hunter, is he?”

“Nope. He’s a complete doofus.” She chuckled at that, shaking her head. “Not really, but you know what I mean.”

“Yeah, I do. And ... and it’s a good thing you two are getting along.”

“Why’s that?”

“Cause ... cause I’m pissed at Antoinette right now. Royally, really fucking pissed at her. Holy fuck I never knew I could be this angry with someone I love. And if you were single, I might just do something really fucking stupid. That wouldn’t be fair to Antoinette, and it wouldn’t be fair to you.” And it was really stupid to say out loud too, and he regretted it the moment he did. Much as Jack had gotten a lot better at socializing in the past few years of being a vampire, he still occasionally did dumb shit like say too much. Might as well puke his mental guts all over her lap.

But she didn’t frown or wince, despite how over-the-top dramatic what he’d said was. If anything, she smiled more, and looked down at his glass table.

“Good thing, then. Brace is a nice guy. And strange as he is, we get along, really well. Plus there’s the whole thing with his sister, which I can relate with.”

Ok, good, awkward moment gone, thank god.

“Triss says the same thing. It’s surprising that he’s a hunter.”

“Yeah.”

He managed another small smile as Clara fiddled with her fingers.

“I’m ... glad you’re not scared of me, Clara.”

“Scared?”

“A lot of people are scared of me. Terrified of me. They think I’m a time bomb or something about to go off any second. And I kinda am, I guess. After what happened at Maria’s place with you and Avery and ... I’m glad we can still talk, you know? Christ, I’m so sorry. This fucking curse is ruining everything, and—”

Clara leaned over, and kissed him.

He froze, blinking at the beautiful woman. It wasn’t a quick kiss, the sort she might do if she was saying goodbye to the idea of the two of them ever getting together. It was a full blown, proper kiss, and she half closed her eyes as she leaned into him.

He didn’t push her away.

Chapter 148

~~Jack~~

After ten seconds, or an eternity, Clara pulled away. She blinked at him a few times, surprised. Well, he was damn surprised too, half by the kiss, half by how he didn't push her away. And surprised again, but how much he liked it. Antoinette's kisses were perfect, every single time. Clara's were not. They were shaky and a little rough, and ... and he really liked that.

"Surprised you let me do that," Clara said, smiling. Not a big, happy smile. A sad smile. She knew what he was going to say.

"I am too. I ... shouldn't have."

"Shouldn't have? Jack, you're dating an ancient vampire who probably doesn't even know what romance feels like. I'm trying to get through to you that you don't need to be with such a cold bitch."

"That's not fair. She ... she knows she's different than me, knows her age has made her ... jaded. It's not something she just accepts, and turns me into some sort of fly in her web, Clara. She tries. She really tries to dig up those parts of her, the young parts that got buried in centuries of vampire bullshit."

"Can't teach an old dog new tricks, Jack. She's a deadly, ancient vampire, and she sees everyone and everything around her as a tool for her goals."

"I..." Fuck, it was hard to refute that point, after his argument with Antoinette earlier. But, a memory surfaced, and tugged at him, tugged until it hurt. "One time, when something bad happened to me, and it was partly her fault, she was ... she almost panicked with concern for me. Like, I was standing there in front of her, having nearly just died, almost chopped in half head to crotch, and when she realized I'd gotten dragged into something she caused, she was terrified." The memory of waking up in her tower after Viktor had nearly killed him was a night he wouldn't forget. Especially cause he had sex with her for the first time not long after.

"Terrified?"

"Kinda, yeah. We hadn't been dating long, but I could tell her conversations with me were something she hadn't had with another person in ages. She was really, genuinely panicked that she might lose that."

"Not really sure what you're driving at."

"I ... I'm just saying that Antoinette knows she's lost a lot of what makes her human in her age, and I help her find those lost parts. And I don't mind doing that. Hell, I like doing that. I like helping her find those pieces." Jack loved to fix things. And each time, it felt great. It felt great because he loved her, and he wanted to help her. "It's not fair to say she's a cold, ruthless bitch. I mean she is, but that's not all there is to her."

"And you're really comfortable being her emotion dowser? Christ Jack, she's telling you to let your mom bite the bullet."

"That's not ... that's twisting the truth."

"Is it? If shit hits the fan, your mom's on the front lines. And the Prince, your girlfriend, told you to just accept that. She even let you argue?"

"I got to say ... stuff." It'd been a short argument, with Antoinette in her 'mastermind puppeteer' mode. Or maybe 'cold, ruthless queen' was the better descriptor.

“Jack, listen to me. Antoinette is half a millennium old, and if you think she’s cold now, it’s only going to get worse. I won’t.”

He looked away. “No, but you’ll die eventually.” She wasn’t a vampire.

“I got another hundred years left in me, Jack. And you know what I want to do with it? Spend it with a stupid kid who keeps thinking he can fix everything. Cause he’s got a great heart.” She pushed his closer shoulder into the back of the couch, forcing him to twist and face her. “And cause despite being a pipsqueak, he’s fucking ripped.”

He managed a smile at that, but he didn’t meet her eyes, not now. He didn’t want the temptation.

“Thanks.”

“And I’m not some ancient bitch vampire. I’m here on a fucking whim, not planning some plot or manipulating people.”

“Manipulating me a little bit, don’t you think?”

Frowning, she got up, pushed both his shoulders into the couch, and straddled him. He gulped as he blinked up at her, body freezing more than it did when she kissed him. Uh oh.

“Jack, listen to me, you god damn idiot. Antoinette is what, your first girlfriend?”

“N ... Not technically.” He kinda had a girlfriend before, sorta, temp prom date thing that died quickly.

She rolled her eyes, seeing through his bullshit instantly. “You’re like the naive girl who married her high school sweetheart, and never experiences anything else, never realizes there are other types of dudes out there who don’t suck.”

“I’m straight.”

“You know what I mean. Look at Damien! Dude’s dating a chick who can’t go five seconds without bursting at the seams with joy. You ever think you might be happier with someone like that?”

“Like Fiona? Not really. Pretty sure I’d go insane if I was around her too much.”

Sighing, she leaned in until they were almost kissing again, and with the couch behind him he couldn’t pull away.

“And me? You really want to spend however many decades with a cold bitch like Antoinette, when I’m right here? I’m warm, Jack. I’m warm, and I do everything by the seat of my pants. And I wouldn’t look to you to be some missing half of me that I desperately needed, for fuck’s sake. I look after me, for you. You look after you, for me. A healthy, normal, functioning relationship.”

She was definitely warm. So close, he could feel her breath on his body, and her warmth pushing through his clothes into his skin. He was lukewarm, and compared to him, she was a furnace. God, it’d be so easy to reach out, hug her, kiss her, touch her.

“And Brace? What about him?”

“Brace is great. Dumb, but nice as hell, and with a great body. Prime himbo material.” Apparently Clara wasn’t completely ignorant of memes. “And tall. Shit load taller than you.”

“Hey, low blow.”

She grinned at him. “But I’ve gone on two dinner dates with the dude, nothing more.”

“He seems like the three dates kinda guy. Maybe five.”

“Maybe.”

“And ... and you’re going to have that third or fifth date?”

“That depends on you. I’m not going to string Brace along, but ... I’m not gonna just sit here and say I don’t have feelings for you, Jack.”

“Christ, what do you want me to say, Clara? Yes, I like you. I like you a lot. I went to you for help with the hunters for a reason.”

“I should have asked for a better favor in return.”

He eyed her suspiciously. “Like what?”

“Obviously to have sex with me.”

“Um—”

“I’m kidding, Jack. But I would have asked for ... for something more personal, I guess, than being let it on a secret. Maybe a date.”

“You really want to piss the Prince off that badly, don’t you?” He peeked past her to the door, half expecting Antoinette to walk in. Nope, thank god. He didn’t need anymore soap opera drama. If Antoinette found Clara sitting on his lap like this, it could easily end in blood.

“I don’t give a shit about her, except that I think she’s got you wrapped around her finger. Even if she’s sincere, it’s still fucked up that you’re doing so much for her, and she’s just leeching off you.” Clara leaned closer, enough their noses touched. “I wouldn’t.”

Something had clearly happened to make Clara a little — lot — more aggressive about her desires. And Jack was floored. A lot of what she said he kinda agreed with, and it was making it very hard to not take her up on it.

That's what adults did, right? If they thought there was something wrong with their relationship, they evaluated. Fixable and worth it? Stay in relationship. Not fixable? Abandon. Abandoning a relationship was tough when it meant you were going to be alone, but Clara was right here, and very much willing to replace Antoinette. It was such a horrible way to look at it, but it was very true.

It was so easy to look at shit logically from the outside. But when looking at things from the inside, when buried in all the drama and emotion, everything got real blurry real quick. It'd be so easy to say yes, to dump Antoinette and her cruel bullshit. Clara was fun and ... and normal, emotionally, intellectually, in a good way. He wouldn't have to navigate Antoinette's maze of a personality with Clara.

And his Beast fucking loved the idea of holding Clara, hugging and squeezing her tight, cumming inside her and Kissing her, and drinking deep of that prized werewolf blood. Just one word, right now, and she'd strip for him and straddle him again, let him penetrate her, and they could fuck the rest of the night away.

But the moment the thoughts ran through his mind, he did what he always did: considered both sides of the argument. His true curse, he supposed, a need to understand things in a logical way, the way Antoinette would. It stopped him — usually — from making bad decisions. He just never thought it'd happen in a romantic context.

The moment he thought about leaving Antoinette and spending the next ten, twenty, fifty years with Clara, thoughts of Antoinette ran through his mind. And hit him in the guts like a fucking semi.

He wanted to wake up next to Antoinette. He wanted to talk with her, about all the things they talked about, things other people wouldn't find interesting but she did. He wanted to hold her, kiss her, have sex with her, and spend the next hundred or five hundred years with her. He wanted to work with her to get through shit like they were experiencing now, not just abandon it because an easier option came along.

And amazing as Clara was, the only thing that was making him even consider taking her up on her offer right now, was that she was easier than Antoinette. That's all this was, a moment of weakness, because an easier option came along to tempt him.

He slowly took Clara's wrists, and pulled her hands off his shoulders. "Maybe she does have me around her finger. Maybe I have her finger in my grip. It's ... it's not fair to say that just because our relationship is different, it's bad."

"It sounds like a toxic relationship to me."

"It's not toxic, far from it. There are problems, like this shit that's happening now with Mom. But I'm not going to dump Antoinette because of problems, not ones that can be fixed."

Groaning, Clara got off him and collapsed back on the other couch. "Christ, you really do think you can fix everything."

"Not true! I think she and I can fix things."

"You really think a super ancient vampire is going to change for you? You sound like a stupid young girl, reading some shitty Twilight fanfic."

He couldn't help but laugh about that. "Maybe. It's ... it's not the same."

"Jesus you are loyal, so loyal it fucking hurts."

"Sorry. Can't go against my programming."

Her turn to laugh, and she leaned forward in her seat again as she shook her head. "Well, can't blame a girl for trying."

“No, I can’t.” He leaned forward, matching her as his eyes drifted toward her before looking back down. Couldn’t maintain eye contact, not after this. “I ... I would, you know? If I hadn’t met Antoinette, I would.”

“Thanks.”

“And Brace, he’ll—”

“Brace is nice! Too nice. Truth is we’ve been on more than a couple dates, and he’s very ... afraid to get aggressive.”

Ooooh. Brace was a nice guy, but too nice. Jack wasn’t some kind of girl expert, but Antoinette was, and talked to Jack about social dynamics constantly. The solution to this problem was simple. Brace needed to learn that nice and passive weren’t the same thing. Yeah, be nice to the girl, but when it came to sexual chemistry, be aggressive. Kiss her when she’s not expecting it. Take her wrist and hold her. Pin her against a wall and kiss her deep.

Dude probably just didn’t realize how much women hated being idolized and held up on altars.

“You are a werewolf. Maybe he’s afraid to get all masculine on you, cause he’s pretty sure you could kick his ass?”

“Only when transformed. Right now I am just girl, a hard to kill girl, but a girl, who is much smaller than Brace and would like to know what it’s like to have a guy sweep her off her feet.”

“And you expected me to do that?”

She laughed, louder this time. “You were different.”

They both laughed, and slowly let the laughter die. After a while, they looked at each other, both sighing, and Clara took the cue. She got up, and opened his front door.

“Don’t ... don’t tell Brace about this, ok?” she asked. “Just a moment of weakness, right?”

He smiled. “Too right.”

She left. He collapsed back against his couch, slapped both hands against his face, left them there, and groaned.

---

Later that night, he decided to pay a trip to see the monsters. Anything so he could keep his mind off Antoinette, how pissed he was at her, and Clara, and how fucking easy it would have been to just say ‘yes’ and begin a relationship with a normal functioning woman. Was he against normal? Did he dislike normal? Did he love Antoinette because she was so strange, and hard to navigate?

And calling Clara normal was kind of an insult. She wasn’t normal, just, normal by comparison to people like Antoinette and Jacob.

And she was hot! So damn hot. He’d seen her breasts, a fucking long time ago but he had, and the image was seared into his brain. When she’d been straddling him tonight, if he’d reached out and touched them, she would have fucked him right there. And if he’d pulled her down to him, he could have Kissed her, drained her, left her an exhausted mess of arousal, and fucked her until—

Jack groaned and smacked the side of his head. Which of course made the hunter beside him raise a brow and look at him. He brought Brace with him, down deep into the tunnels of Dolareido, because Jack was a masochist.

“Still don’t think this is a good idea,” the hunter said.

“Damien and Jessy are busy dealing with Carthians. I need back up.”

“Uh...” The hunter scratched the back of his neck. “You know I’m only human, right?”

“Yeap.”

“I won’t be of much use to you.”

“You’re a hunter. You’ll be fine. I don’t expect anything bad to happen, I just need someone with a gun and a set of eyes.” Which could have been anyone besides Brace, but Jack didn’t trust anyone in the Invictus at the moment.

Braced eyed him, eyebrow raised. “I still—”

“And I wanted to talk to you.”

“Aaaaah, ok now it makes sense. Kinda. Whatcha wanna talk about?” Even as he asked, the hunter put another step between him and Jack.

“Dennis and Marge seeing more of the city?”

“Yeah. Told your mom about that, actually.”

“You talked to Mom?”

“Yeap. She and the Circle — Jennifer and Beatrice anyway — dropped by when I was on a date with Clara.”

“And you ... had a conversation with them?”

“Well yeah.”

Jesus christ this guy. Why would Clara like this guy, romantically? Then again, why was she into Jack? No accounting for taste.

“You were on a date with Clara. Insanely hot, single Clara. And when a few other vamps showed up, you...” He slowly looked at Brace, complete with slow dramatic head turn for effect.

“I ... pulled up some chairs for them.”

Jack facepalmed. “Dude.”

“What? What, I was just being nice.”

A small part of Jack very much wanted to just let this guy fuck himself over. If he was too clueless on how to be romantic in a way that actually worked, let him suffer.

It was the same part of him that wanted to grab Brace and have a drink. The same part of him that liked the idea of binding Clara with the Vinculum and adding her to his inevitable harem. A werewolf, his slave, sex slave, companion, and bodyguard? The fun he'd have with her, and the things Antoinette would do to her, the kinda sex you can only have when you hate someone. Hate sex.

Jack clenched his eyes and shook his head. Shut up, Beast. He was hungry, and it was fucking with him. Maybe bringing Harcourt was a bad idea?

No, he needed to talk to the dude. Jack owed Clara, and if he could fix this, he should. He couldn't fix much lately, but maybe he could at least fix this.

“How the fuck are you so nice, dude?”

Brace shrugged as he looked ahead down the tunnel and its flickering lights. “It's a long, stupid, sad story involving my sister. Life is hard for hunters. Every hunter I've run into has been ... well a lot more of them are like Angela than you might think. I swore I wouldn't be like them.”

There was depth to Brace Harcourt, much as he didn't give off that vibe. Goofball, sure, but not a complete moron. There were thoughts in that skull of his, and when shit hit the fan, those thoughts were actually damn useful. He kinda reminded Jack of Fiona, someone with a past and lifestyle that should have crushed their personality until they were bitter assholes. But somehow, they survived. Like they were more naturally buoyant than other people.

He envied them.

“And speaking of the other hunters.” Jack took a moment to wipe the rising malice from his voice. It was hard to say her name. “Athalia might want to know about Angela. She talk to you yet?”

“Nope. Ain't nobody been talking to us from that side of the fence.”

“You know much about Angela? Personal stuff?”

“Uh, not that much, no. She was close with Jeremiah, father daughter kinda relationship ... between psychopaths.”

“You know Athalia was her mother?”

“Know that, yeah.”

“You know they had a super rough history? Athalia was a Begotten when Angela was just a kid. I don't know all the details, just...” He sighed and shook his head. “Athalia feels so damn guilty about what happened to her daughter. Completely destroyed relationship, plus she did some nasty monstery things to her daughter when she was growing up. She didn't want to, but yeah.”

Brace whistled. “I mean, I knew Angela wanted to kill her, but ... I guess the group and I put it together that Athalia must have done something to her. Didn't think that, though.”

“So if Athalia asks you about Angela, try and answer if you can. And don’t sugarcoat it ... much.” Athalia definitely preferred things blunt, but even she wouldn’t want to hear the absolute worst things about Angela, especially not after what happened.

“Alright, I’ll try.”

“And back on topic. Clara the first girl you’ve ever dated?”

“What? No ... There’s been other girls. Sorta.” Sorta sounded a lot like fling.

“Uh huh. And the other girls, were all short flings brought on by dramatic hunter situations? Save the girl from the scary monster. Sometimes the girl’s grateful?”

“Well ... I mean...” Poor guy adjusted his trench coat and groaned. “So there was this one girl. Her parents died in an accident with a vampire. I helped her out for a few months.”

“Slept with her?”

“Uh, yeah.” Judging from the look on his face, she probably threw herself at him.

“And then you left, determined to continue your hunter job?”

“ ... yeah.”

“And...”

“And there was this other girl, a rookie hunter. We bonded a bit on a monster hunt.” He didn’t need to explain what bonded meant. “We went our separate ways when the hunt was over.”

“And...”

“And there was this other girl, another hunter. We ended up being rivals, kinda, in a ghost hunt. Somehow we got together, until, you know, the ghost was dealt with.”

Jack didn't need to ask about this girl either. No doubt the woman got aggressive and made the first move.

“So Clara is the first girl who's not traumatized or all ... hunter-brained,” Jack pointed at his temple, “you've ever dated.”

“Put it like that, I mean ... yeah.”

“Ok, that means social norms apply. If you're on a date, you focus on the girl, and other people should be told — politely — to go away. If she's giving signals, you reciprocate by getting closer. If she continues to give signals, you make a move, even if it's just touching her hand.” He was quoting Julias at this point. It sounded so easy to understand social cues when saying them, but knowing them in the moment was a whole different beast. “So next time you're with Clara, pay attention, and do something romantic, would you?”

Brace raised his eyebrow again as he looked Jack in the eye. “Why're you so concerned with Clara?”

“I owe her a lot. She was with us when we went after Jeremiah, remember?”

“Yeah but—”

“And anyone with half a braincell can see you ruining a good thing from a mile away. So hey, you did me a solid, and so did Clara. Now I'm gonna do the both of you a solid. Stop dragging your feet and be more aggressive with the girl.” Jack rolled his eyes, shrugged and kept walking. The cold shoulder was mean, but necessary to convince Brace he was being straight with him.

Jack also felt guilty. Clara was willing to abandon her potential relationship with Harcourt, for him. That was a strange, strange feeling, and Jack hated it. He also hated how it kept teasing some baser desire in him, the Beast in him, or his lizard brain, wanting more women to drink and fuck.

God, he hated all this soap opera drama.

“You like to give advice, don’t you?”

“Eh?”

“You got that kinda know-it-all personality.” Harcourt grinned at him. “But I mean, with everything that’s happened and you coming out on top every time, it’d probably pay to listen to you.”

Jack returned his smile. The guy really was way too nice and well adjusted to be a hunter.

---

“Full house?” Jack asked.

Azamel coughed from her bed. Sándor stood nearby, watching like a gargoyle on its perch, off to the side and not on the stage. Athalia frowned down at Jack. Fiona waved. Mark didn’t so much as move his head. Other than the gargoyle, they were all sitting on the stage of concrete, Azamel with her blanket up to her waist, head and back propped up by some pillows, and a cigarette in hand.

She looked emaciated. He’d seen corpses in better condition than her.

“It won’t be long now,” Azamel said, coughing between puffs of smoke. Eventually she motioned to her fellow monsters with the trembling cigarette. “They’re here to bother the fuck out of me in my last days. So are you, apparently.”

Bother the fuck out of me. Not exactly how Azamel normally talked; close, but not quite. Sure she had a nasty mouth, but she normally talked with a bit of nobleness to her, like she was a queen born and raised in royalty a hundred years ago. A queen who hated being a queen, and hated everyone who insisted she be one. Natural potty mouth, sure, but not a casual speaker.

It hurt to hear her talk like that.

“Not here to talk to you at all, old bitch,” Jack said.

Everyone raised brows and looked at him, except Azamel and Mark. Mark smirked before disappearing into a book again, and Azamel laughed.

“The fuck do you want, then?”

“Wanted to talk to Athalia. I heard she might have seen something the night Garry’s little crew attacked the Xnomina HQ.”

Athalia groaned as she walked over to the edge of the concrete stage. “I see a lot of things. But you told us to stay out of this little turf war.”

“Kinda?”

“Ok mostly related. I want to know if you know what happened to Amanda.”

Again she groaned, hopped down from the stage, and landed in front of him. Her hard eyes always scared him, even now with the curse to protect him. A black woman, with long black hair and a tall, slim build, and utterly gorgeous. It wasn’t surprising the sheriff was attracted to her, but Jack couldn’t begin to imagine how the man was able to puncture her hard exterior.

“From what I’ve heard, Amanda’s death is a big deal,” she said. “Sorta Michael’s main point for why he’s given you vamps permission to use lethal force.”

Lethal force. Jack couldn’t help but smirk at the word choice. Vampires fighting vampires wasn’t some sort of organized affair run by a branch of the military or secret service. It was a dirty affair, chaotic, and personal.

“I don’t think she’s dead.”

Athalia’s face remained stone. “Oh?”

“I think Michael’s staked her and stashed her.” He looked to the others as well for a reaction. Fiona’s eyes went wide with surprise; she didn’t know. Sándor kept his face looking straight ahead, not directly at Jack, and his expression was made of stone. Not hard, mean stone like Athalia used, but the almost boring, indifferent stone a sculpture has.

Mark wasn’t any better. He sneered. Whether that meant he knew something Jack didn’t, or he was just delighting in Jack’s ignorance, Jack didn’t know. The dude was never happy since the Prince caught him spying.

Azamel, on the other hand, grinned at him. And no chance in Hell she grinned at him without meaning to, knowing full well he’d notice and jump to a conclusion from it.

Athalia smirked. “And what if he did?”

“I need confirmation. I’m going to do something stupid, super stupid, and I’d really prefer to know for sure if Amanda’s alive before I piss Michael off.”

“Aren’t you busy? Azamel’s convinced those tears are leading up to something nasty, and you’re running around dealing with some stupid vamps and a turf war?”

“I’d love to be done with this turf war! That’s what I’m trying to do.”

“Then just kill Garry and his top vamps. Or kill Michael and take over. Whatever.”

Jack glared at her. What was it about him she didn’t fucking understand? “I don’t want to kill anyone, Athalia.”

“Your curse—”

“I don’t want to kill anyone! I am not the curse! I’m me, Jack, just a young guy who thinks we could all get along if we pulled our heads out of asses and worked together.” He’d been mostly hands off with Athalia since her daughter died, but if the conversation with Maria taught him anything, it was tough love worked; on adults anyway. “Think what you want, it fucking kills me that I’ve killed so many people. Fucking kills me. Nightmares, all the fucking time.”

“Not one of mine, much as I’d love to say otherwise.”

He hadn’t even considered that maybe one of the Begotten had managed to find a way to torture him with nightmares. Yeesh.

“Ok, well, I’m not a killer, and you fucking know it. Stop being a bitch, and be straight with me. I’m on your team.”

Athalia returned his glare before looking to Azamel, only to frown when her boss smiled and nodded.

“You know if I start talking about what I saw, I’m getting involved?”

“And I’ll do everything in my power, and the curse’s power, to make sure no repercussions come the Begotten’s way. If I have to kill Michael and anyone else to keep you guys out of this, I will. I'm not here to ask for information to win this war, I'm asking for information so I can end it. No one wins."

Sighing, she stepped back and turned, and set her butt against the stage edge as she folded her arms across her chest. "And what about him?"

"Harcourt?" Jack shrugged as he looked up at the guy.

Harcourt put up his hands like he was about to be shot by a firing squad. "Just giving Jack some back up."

"You trust Jack?"

The hunter shrugged. "I mean, yeah? Dude seems cool. I've seen a lot of shit in my life you know, and ... and Jack's the nicest vamp I've ever dealt with. Ever."

Rolling her eyes, Athalia shrugged. "Fine. Amanda's alive."

Finally.

"Thanks. Did you see what happened exactly?"

"From a distance. I was dropping Sándor off, and the building was on fire. But I saw Michael and her talking. And then he staked her."

"What I thought then?"

"I guess. Except the girl didn't react to the stake, except to just stand there like she was ready for it."

"Like ... she was ready for it?" Jack winced and paced in place. "Ah shit. Shit shit shit. I thought Michael sprung it on her. Never even fucking occurred to me he convinced her."

"What's that matter?" Athalia asked.

“Means if I go on a rescue mission, I’m rescuing someone that probably doesn’t wanna be rescued.” That made everything so much more fucking complicated. God fucking damn it, why couldn’t things just go smooth?

“I expect you to keep your word, Jack,” Athalia said. “Putting a lot on the line here.”

“He will,” Azamel said. Everyone looked to her as she erupted into a coughing fit, and she wiped her lips off with her scrawny, cracked fingers, before grinning at Jack again. “So, Michael has conspired with Amanda to trigger his war.”

“I don’t know about conspire,” Jack said. “Might be blackmailing her or something.”

Azamel groaned, coughed again, and forced herself to sit up. Mark got up, but Azamel waved him off, and the man sat back down.

“This is concerning.”

“What?” Jack said. “Now it’s concerning you?”

“Yes, now, idiot boy. Before when Michael and Garry fought, it was typical vampire nonsense. But after Athalia told me what she saw, I’m feeling this battle is too personal.”

“And ... that’s a problem for you.”

“Yes, it is. The Invictus and Carthians fight each other in most cities, but usually for the typical reasons.” She took another drag of her cigarette, and blew the smoke at him. Even up on her stage, twenty feet away, she still managed to reach him with the smoke. “Michael and Garry are letting personal history affect their actions. Volatile. This city has enough problems dealing with the tears, and likely Black Blood itself, a far greater problem than this stupid war.

And I will not leave my family to contend with this idiocy when I am gone.”

The will and strength in that voice did not match her appearance. But everyone in the room paid attention anyway as power radiated from the old, dying woman. Even Brace stepped away from her, for the seventh time, and did his best to avoid looking directly at her. He’d seen what she really looked like, they all had, and no one wanted to mess with the giant angry elephant god, deathbed or not.

Jack put up a hand. “I’m working on it, ok? But the fuck am I supposed to do? Garry and Michael hate each other for some ugly personal shit.” No need to tell them the details. They—

“The suicide of Michael’s childe, yes yes, I know.” Azamel waved her free hand while smoking with the other.

“You ... you knew?”

“Of course. I was here long ago, boy. Remember? I involved myself in the affairs of Kindred quite a bit back then, almost ninety years ago.”

“Didn’t know you’d gotten that involved.” Jack approached the stage, but didn’t jump up when Mark glared at him. But again, Azamel waved her bodyguard off, and Mark relented, returning to his book. Jack jumped up, and sat down beside the old woman.

“I involved myself in the squabbles of Garry, Viktor, Lucas, and Michael, yes. It was a way for me to feed, to pursue my goals, to look for a nesting ground, where other Begotten could rest. To pursue my inheritance. Things didn’t go well.”

“So I heard. Antoinette says you destroyed some buildings.”

Harcourt took another step back. Of course, doing so put him a little closer to Sándor, and a look his way filled the hunter with obvious awkwardness, and he stepped back from him too, getting closer to the tunnel entrance every minute.

“The vampires and I didn’t get along. I made a point.” She leaned in toward Jack, and squinted an eye as she met his gaze. “Sándor doesn’t have the ruthlessness needed to deal with the vampires, Jack. If this turf war is still going on when I’m gone, we may very well get dragged into it, like the Uratha inevitably will.”

“The werewolves are going to stay out of it.”

“Don’t be absurd. Give it time and things will happen, they always do, and Avery will side with the group she identifies with.”

Jack looked down. “The Carthians.”

“Exactly. And you know this turf war is a distraction. The timing is too perfect.”

“Yeah, yeah I know. I ... Fuck, I don’t know. I need to get Garry and Michael into a room together, and get them talking.”

“Ha! You think pop psychology will save the day? They are ancient predators, Jack. The only thing they understand is brute force.”

“The Prince—”

“Cannot deal with them without risking her precious city and her precious experiment. She has negotiated herself into a place of passive power, and now any move she makes will trigger the house of cards to fall.” Azamel puffed again, and blew the smoke upward; a step up, from blowing in Jack’s face like usual. “It would have been better if she’d ruled with an iron fist.”

“Yeah, maybe. I’m still thoroughly in the cooperation camp.”

“Of course you are. Well, understand that while Garry and Michael do not despise each other to the degree Garry and the Prince despised Lucas, that doesn’t mean their hatred isn’t real. And as you said, it’s personal. They will fight each other, like angry dogs.”

“Well, if they’re dogs, then maybe I should let them fight?”

She grinned. “You mean face to face? In what universe do sniveling, cowardly elder vampires ever risk their own necks? Garry, perhaps, he is still young compared to other elders. But not Michael.”

Jack threw up his hands. “I need some way to get those two assholes to stop. If it’s really because of this personal hate building between them for a fucking century—”

“Or whatever force is manipulating circumstance.”

“Or that, yeah. Black Blood?”

“Perhaps. I’m thinking Jacob.”

“Oh fucking god.” Jack grabbed his head and shook it. “Ok, I’ll worry about Jacob and Black Blood later.”

“Even though your mother is—”

“I know!” His voice bounced around the large concrete room.

Azamel sat up a little straighter, and everyone looked at Jack like he’d just challenged the devil to a ring fight. But after a few seconds of painful, awkward silence, the old monster laughed.

“You will not be able to resolve this anger between Michael and Garry.”

“I don’t need to resolve it, just bring it down from a boil to a simmer. If I can keep it simmering for all eternity, I’ll be fucking happy. But the moment a vampire makes a single misstep, I’ll wake up the next night to news of twenty dead vampires, and the Invictus going into full DEFCON 1. There’s going to be firefights in the streets. Kine are going to see vampires using abilities. The Prince will get involved. It’ll take another hundred dead vampires before things calm down. And I. Don’t. Want that.”

Azamel watched him for a while, her smile shifting between different types he couldn’t identify. She was thinking about something. Thinking about a lot of things, from how her eyes eventually looked up to the ceiling, and her smile changed again, before she looked back to him.

“Your only option is to force the two to confront each other directly, without their realizing, I imagine.”

“That ... will be difficult.”

“For you, and even for me. But you do know someone who’s good at manipulating people, don’t you?”

God damn it. “Yeah, I guess I do.”

~~Beatrice~~

“You’re sure you’re sure?”

Sam nodded. “Yes. Let’s do it.”

Beatrice nodded, and she and Jen stepped down into the basement of the old factory.

It took Triss a long time to find this place, abandoned and unknown, filled with undisturbed dust, and a giant walk-in fridge. And a small modification to the handle made it easy enough to lock on the outside with a padlock that'd take a blowtorch to get through. A perfect place to stash stuff.

It wasn't just that she found some random, abandoned building from the bygone era of Dolareido's industrial boom. The building's wiring was totally fucked, and she made sure to extra fuck it, so in the random case someone decided to re-purpose the building, it'd take them weeks to get it fixed, plenty of time to get her shit and get out. And that wouldn't happen. This whole section of North Side was abandoned, and no one was going to randomly buy some shitty old building that must have been some big restaurant that failed.

She opened the padlock, and pulled open the big door. She held up a hand, stopping Samantha and Jen, before she stepped into the room, turned around, and ran a finger along the door frame. It was coated in blood, and she clutched her crow skull necklace in her left hand as her right hand ran the whole frame, beginning to end.

Ritual deactivated, the blood vanished. She'd have to cast it again before they left. She wasn't going to risk people finding this. She had enough things to worry about without breaking the Masquerade.

Once Beatrice motioned for them, Samantha followed in, and gasped.

“Oh my god.”

“The part of witchcraft people don't really appreciate,” Triss said. “The murder part.” Sighing, she squatted down in front of the pile of bodies, men and women she'd killed, and forced herself to look at them. “Before you ask, I made sure each and every person I've killed deserved it. Dolareido's a big, big city, and there are some nasty fuckers doing nasty shit, if you look hard enough.”

“I ... I believe you.”

Triss looked over her shoulder to the woman, and did a quick check on her expression. Samantha was definitely shocked to see a pile of bodies, six in total, piled up in the old walk-in fridge, but she wasn't freaking out. Girl had seen a lot in her ... what, six months since being a vampire?

"It's one of the reasons Dolareido is the way it is," Jen said. "I'm sure both Antoinette and Jacob made sure the city had an undercurrent of ... vileness, so they'd have access to people like these."

"Better than other cities," Triss said, shrugging. "Like Harcourt and Clara were talking about, vamps aren't so nice elsewhere."

Samantha gulped. "But—"

"But it's still murder, I know. And that's what it's like being a witch, Sam. It's why Jacob hasn't included you in anything the Circle does." Saying the 'Circle' helped eased the burden, but truth was the only people in the Circle getting their hands bloody like this were Triss and Jacob. "And hey, I went through that phase when I was younger, not wanting to kill people. Lasted a few weeks."

"A few weeks!?"

"The typical shit a Nos goes through. Woke up from a death that I didn't ask for, looking like a fucking shark. You're damn right I had anger issues. Didn't take long to learn that vampires are allowed to kill, and I knew exactly where to go for some therapy. Devil's Corner. Waited until I found a real asshole, someone who really fucking deserved to die, and I fucking killed them. Scared them until they pissed themselves, then I drained them, and I made sure it hurt." Triss slowly stood up and turned to face the very scared Daeva. "Lots of vampires do it, find humans who deserve death, and kill them."

"Like, um, vigilantes?"

“No, the Prince would stop any vampire vigilante, cause that shit would end up on the news eventually. But if you’re careful about what you do, you can find humans in this massive city that no one will care about disappearing.” She shrugged. “There’s a reason homicide and the real fucking shit crimes are lower in Dolareido than other cities. The Prince made it clear that vamps should focus on cunts who deserve to die, if we find ourselves needing, or wanting, to kill.”

Poor Samantha. She squirmed in place, eyes drifting between Triss and the pile of the bodies. “They’re ... they’re not rotting.”

“No. Elen showed me a trick to keep them from rotting.”

“Magic stuff?”

Triss nodded.

Samantha’s eyes went wider. “Wow.”

“My point is, you’re a vampire now, and you should feel ok with killing people. Which is a fucking horrible thing to say, I know, and I don’t really mean it. But at the same time, we’re predators. You have to be comfortable with this sort of shit, if you’re going to ... do witch things.” Like reviving your dead daughter. “Hell, you need to be comfortable doing it, in case shit happens.”

“Like Jack did with Mrs. Pavala.”

Ah right, the kid killed someone on his first night, and had to hide the evidence. Christ, what a shitty way to get introduced to his second life. It was nothing compared to waking up with a crocodile mouth, but still.

“Not exactly the same, but yeah. Or if you ever give up the Masquerade to someone who was alive, you’ll have to do something. That could mean killing someone.” Triss made damn sure to avoid saying just how nasty that situation could get. More than a few vampires had been forced to kill innocent people because some kind got too deep or too lucky, and getting a Ventrue to wipe their memories wasn't a fast enough option.

"I ... I know." Poor woman. Sam shook her head as she hugged herself. "I know."

Jen sighed, and set a hand on the shivering Sam's shoulder. "We wanted to keep this from you, for obvious reasons. But we've been working with Elen to build a new body for Julias for a while, and we kept running into problems. We've had to ... acquire more and more bodies."

"Oh god."

Yeap, that sounded bad. That sounded really fucking bad. Seeing the shock on Sam's face was a kick in the guts.

"We're doing our best to be ethical about this," Triss said. "But yeah, I ain't gonna lie to myself about it. We're killing people, a lot of people, so we ... so I can try and resurrect Julias. And we can argue philosophy and shit, about if it's right to do that, even if I'm making sure I only kill scum. But I'm still gonna keep going. I'm neck deep in this shit, and I'm gonna keep fucking going."

Staring at her, Sam managed a heavy gulp, and looked back at the pile of corpses.

"I'm a vampire. I'm a vampire. I'm a vampire. I have a vampire son, and a ghost daughter. I drink blood. I'm half dead." Evidently she had a mantra.

"Alright. Now, don't watch if you don't want to. This is gonna get messy."

Samantha nodded, wriggling some more, eyes wide, but she didn't look away. The mantra worked.

Triss squatted down in front of the dead, her kills, and grabbed some dude's body. Some fucker who beat his wife and sexually abused his kids. Maybe she should pick a girl body? Not like Dolareido didn't have women the world was better off without, and she'd piled a couple of them here. Whatever. Julias was a dude, so maybe that mattered.

She grabbed the guy, yanked him toward her by the leg, and picked him up. Lifeless eyes. A quick glance Sam's way showed the woman staring at the corpse, right in the eyes. Rookie mistake. With her left hand holding the corpse up by the back of the neck, Triss closed the dead man's eyes with her right.

And then she cut his flesh open. Her Nos claws were short, but plenty sharp, and cutting through skin and flesh was easy enough. Through the throat first, through cartilage and muscle, and then the spine. The body fell away, ka-splat, with enough impact to cause what little blood the corpse had to squirt a bit from the neck hole.

Samantha screamed and spun around. "Oh my god!"

"Told you to look away." Triss gave Jen a sad glance, who returned it as expected. This was a bad idea, but the woman wanted to see. And after stealing the book and knife from her sire, the fucking Prince of Dolareido, the least the witches could do was let the woman see how the sausage was made.

Samantha managed a few more peeks, but each time it only lasted a couple seconds, as Triss's work only grew bloodier. She needed the skull, the seat of the mind, not the brains and eyeballs and jaw and stuff; apparently blood magic was a little behind the science of what actually held the mind, thinking it was the skull and not the brain. Whatever. Triss ran her claws over the skull, splitting skin, and she tore it off. She sank her claws into the eye sockets, and scooped them out. She ripped off the jaw.

Getting the brain out wasn't so easy, and she knew it wouldn't be. But she'd come prepared, and she used a small metal long spoon stick sorta thing Jacob had given her. Because her boss literally had the tools lying around to get brains out of a skull. Scooping it out through the, according to Jacob, Foramen magnum, the hole at the bottom of the skull, was fucking nasty, but Doctor Jacob had given her good instructions.

Soon, all that was left was a skull. A bit bloody with gross, old dead man's blood and some flesh bits, maybe some brain bits still inside, but a skull. Strange how small it was compared to an actual head.

She held the thing in her hand, the first skull she'd ever extracted from a corpse, and she let the weight of it sink in. A skull, bone, seat of the mind. Ok yeah, maybe the old superstitions about skulls meant something, cause she felt a lot more than literal weight, holding it in her hands. This was something real, something more than a bunch of calcium meant to hold a brain in a protective cage.

Fucking chills.

She handed the skull to Jen. Jen didn't wanna touch it of course, and she grimaced when she held it in her palm, flashlight in her other hand. But once she felt the weight of it too, she stared at the bloody sphere of bone, and Triss got to see what she must have looked like when she held it. There was wonder in those eyes. Much as Jen didn't really consider herself a witch, she was a member of the Circle for a reason, and she'd stuck with Triss through shit that'd scare off any pussy Invictus or Carthian.

Triss squatted down over the corpse, and took a second to think. How to get it out? Bone saw and shit? Nah, fuck that. It wouldn't have the same weight, the same meaning and value, if she cheated.

She was a vampire. Crúac was blood magic for vampires. She had to do this shit like a proper vampire would.

She ripped the dude's shirt open, sank both of her claws into the chest sternum, and ripped the body a fresh new hole.

Samantha outright squeaked this time. "Oh my god! Triss, you ... what're you doing?"

Ripping a chest cavity open wasn't a seamless process. She had to break ribs, tear through flesh, and push shit aside. Messy. If the corpse had any blood left in it, she would have been soaked in gore before she was done. It was noisy too, and every crack, crunch, and squelching rip earned more panicked noises from Samantha.

But when Triss wrapped her right hand around the fucker's heart, and sliced it out with her left hand's claws, the same chills shot up through her hand and into her whole body. She stood up and stared at the organ in her hand, a flesh pump, a muscle that only knew how to move blood through a body and nothing more. But to a lot of cultures and beliefs long dead and gone, the heart was the seat of the soul.

She had a hard time believing that. Hell, she was a vampire, and had been for a decades now. Her heart wasn't anything more than a withered prune unless she was Blushing Life, and she damn well knew she had a soul. But holy fuck, holding the organ in her hand definitely had her questioning if she should dismiss those old beliefs. Power. Tingling, almost electric power coursed down through her arm and into her core. Holy fuck, what would it feel like to rip the heart out of a living person?

No wonder Jacob had all those tools for dismantling bodies in his main ritual room. Assuming that was his main ritual room. Dude had to have others.

“There, got what I need.” Triss picked the body up and set it beside the pile. Beside, not on. Didn’t want the guts and whatnot spilling on the other bodies and making a disgusting mess even worse.

“Finally.” Samantha turned around again, and looked at the skull and heart, eyes wide and locked. “It’s ... it’s really like in the stories. Witches and stuff.”

Triss grinned at the woman, pulled the big black — had to be black — jewelry bag out of her pocket, set the heart in it, and held it open for the Ventrue. Jen was considerably gentler with the skull than Triss was, and she was stuck somewhere between grimacing and smiling with each moment. But Triss could also see the intrigue there, the curiosity, the wonder, as she set the skull in the bag.

Even Samantha stared on, curious, making an effort to keep her eyes off the pile of bodies, but drawn by what Triss was doing.

Triss took a deep breath, pulled out her phone, and brought up a picture at an angle so Jen and Sam couldn’t see. Julias. Dude was sitting around reading a book when she took this picture, but he’d looked up quick and managed to get a pose. The classic, subtle but powerful smile, the sort really confident rich dudes who could secretly be mastermind villains had. Fucker was so damn photogenic, it was hard to take a bad picture of him. Not that she’d taken many, Masquerade risk that it was creating any sort of paper trail of a vampire. But she had a couple, and this was one of the better ones.

She dug through the memory, and let it envelop her. Julias’s damn, stupidly awesome smile. His big arms wrapped around her. His calm, soothing voice. His demeanor, the suaveness that she loved and hated. The way he had a big soft side that was so sappy, it was painful. To other vampires, Julias was a deadly ancilla. To her, he was a big mushy puppy dog. Except when he wasn’t, except when he took control, and took her into his arms, held her down, and did things to her. Except when he kissed her.

She dug through the memory until it hurt, until she'd rather be cutting herself open and pouring acid in the wounds. She'd suppressed these memories, and let them fade as best she could. Jen had helped a lot. All the sex helped a lot. Hanging out with the Circle, watching Sam getting DP'd and loving it, and Triss watching, enjoying by proxy, it was all an indulgence that helped her forget.

And she threw months of progress out the window as she cast the ritual. She reached into her core, that part of her that could summon vitae the way everyone knew how to flex a muscle. The strange energy poured up into her, and she funneled it into her right arm. With a heavy sigh, she bit her wrist open, and continued to pour her energy through her and into the arm, until she summoned a large droplet of vampire blood. Dark, thick, so much thicker than kine blood. And she stared at it as she infused her vitae into it, and her memories.

The blood fell into the bag, held by her left hand. Another drop, and another. This wasn't a small ritual, something easy like a warding spell. She was summoning a piece of Julias, a chunk of who and what he was, something she'd use as the seed for his actual body, the seat for his mind and soul.

She was a child, reaching into dark water, completely unaware of what lay beneath. Well, maybe not a child, cause she was smart enough to be fucking terrified. Something lurked in the dark, something that listened to Triss and her ritual, something that was dancing to her tune. The Crone? No chance, she was too big, too powerful. Each ritual probably touched on something different, and each one probably came with its own risks of touching things that shouldn't be touched.

Didn't matter. In for a penny.

She stopped the bleeding, closed the bag, and held it up with both hands.

“Be found and returned, Julias,” she said. The words were stupid and cheesy, and every part of her thought she’d cringe saying them. No way witches did idiotic shit like chant crap verses like this. But when she said the words, she knew it was like knocking on the door of whatever was out there, listening, and waiting. “I call to the darkness that watches and listens, that knows the dead. Find, and bring a piece of Julias back to me.”

The room had been pretty damn dark before, with only Jen’s flashlight lighting it up. But when the still air turned into a swirling wind, and a howl that didn’t sound like wind at all filled the room, the tiny flashlight flickered, flickered, and died.

The bag grew lighter.

Triss held onto the bag with both hands as it shook. Something was inside the bag, and it fought to get out. Hisses, growls, it shrieked and wailed in the same pitch as the wind that filled the corpse fridge.

“Triss!” Sam yelled. “Triss, what’s going on!?”

“Nothing! Just stay put. Wait.”

What sort of rituals had Jacob cast that had repercussions a thousand times scarier? What crazy sort of shit did he do, that had everything around him reacting? She could imagine it, easily, Jacob sacrificing a kine under the full moon in a forest, and the forest flipping the fuck out. The fire would go out, animals would flee, and the wind would start shrieking like a fucking banshee, like it was now.

Thank god Triss’s little ritual didn’t last long. The bag got lighter and lighter, and soon it stopped fighting. The wind in the fridge turned into still air again, and the shrieking died with it. The flashlight flickered again, and stayed on.

That was a quick brush with one of the more fucked up rituals. Jacob had warned her they could get nasty, and dangerous, and she might have to do more than just say a few words and sacrifice some vitae next time. Wrestling with the forces of darkness, struggling to keep them bound to the ritual, to force them to enact the witch's desire? Yeah, that sounded witchy. And what Triss did felt almost like she'd been teasing a cat with a toy, and then yanked the toy back.

Which of course meant there was a chance she pissed something off, and it might bite her in the ass later. No wonder witches supposedly made protection talismans for themselves and whatnot.

She lowered her hands, rubbed her crow skull necklace with her right, and let the bag dangle at her left. Tempting to look, but it could wait.

“It's ... it's done?” Jennifer asked.

“Yeah. Let's get back to Elen. I don't know how long this ... this thing will last, and I don't want to do this again.”

Her friend grinned. “You don't? You looked almost excited to be casting a ritual.”

“Excited ... yeah, I guess I was.” Excited. Terrified. Some mix of the two. She didn't really know.

Sam threw up a hand. “That was scary! Oh my god, it was like a movie! And I could hear howling, and and and—”

Jennifer gave Samantha a pat on the shoulder, and everyone went quiet as they looked at the bag in Triss's hand. It was a lot lighter, and not bulked with mass anymore, but it wasn't empty. Something was in there, and it wasn't fighting against the bag anymore, but it wasn't holding still, either.

~~Antoinette~~

“Ann, what ever is the matter, dear?”

Antoinette sighed as she looked down, and combed her hair over her shoulder. Elaine sat across from her at her desk, and set a hand on it as she leaned in and looked her in the eyes.

“My childe is in a terrible predicament.”

“Samantha?”

“Jacob is ... perhaps involved in terrible things, and I let my Samantha get close to him.”

Elaine sighed as she relaxed in her chair. “I thought you wanted that?”

“I did. But now that her life is in danger, I am ... regretting the decision.”

“Because her life is in danger? What has Jacob done?”

Antoinette shook her head. “I cannot share the details. My apologies, but this is deeply important, and dangerous.”

With a heavier sigh, Elaine leaned back in her chair as she shared a sorry smile with her. “Well, if it is Jacob we speak of, then I can only agree. Not about your regret over Samantha, but the man's tendencies. Whatever he is up to, it is probably quite dangerous. But ... I saw him with Samantha, Ann. I did not get the impression he was being insincere with her. Perhaps a little overtly flirtatious and playful, but not insincere.”

“I am sure Jacob seduced her to annoy both Jack and I, but since then, Samantha has shared with me details of their time together. I believe what was likely Jacob being his typical, mischievous self, has evolved into something more.”

“Ah, a classic tale of romance then? The mischievous man plays with a girl’s heart, only to find himself smitten?”

Antoinette could not help but smile at that idea. She had done the same to Jack, the first time they met in Bloodlust, oh so long ago. A young man, attractive, intelligent, squirming with fear and surprise, and she could not help but indulge her desire to tease the man, balancing his fear with arousal and intrigue. But then they had begun to converse, and she quickly found the boy far more interesting than he had any right to be.

Surely the same had happened between Samantha and Jacob? Her childe’s sexual indulgences did not exactly speak to typical juvenile flights of romantic fantasy, as Jacob, like Antoinette, did not mind sharing their lover with others; as long as they were there, of course. Perhaps that sexual freedom offended others, but to ancient vampires like Antoinette and Jacob, the act of sex meant little. It was the emotional exploration that carried weight. And Samantha had certainly spent time exploring with Jacob and the Circle. But once one took eccentric sexual tastes into account, Samantha’s tales of Jacob spoke of more than simple mischievous play.

“I believe my childe is safe. I believe Jacob is not a villain.”

“As do I. But then, one does not need to be a villain to be an enemy.” Sighing, Elaine shook her head as she tapped her chin with a finger. “But if something has happened that now causes you to doubt Jacob’s romantic interest in her?”

“No. But ... we should be careful with the Circle, I believe.”

“If the Circle will cause trouble, that is not a trouble that will befall Samantha due to simple proximity.”

“Perhaps. But physical proximity and emotional proximity are not the same thing. If Jacob does something, something dangerous for the city, Samantha may find herself involved.”

“I think you should trust Jacob to not use your child against you. He is many things, but he is no vile serpent.”

Antoinette sighed relief. She knew this, but to hear another confirm her beliefs was important, especially after her argument with Jack.

“Jack, he knows.”

“Oh my. He has told her?”

“No. And I gave him orders not to.”

Elaine smiled softly as she met Antoinette’s eyes again. “That is why you seem depressed. I cannot imagine that conversation with your love went well.”

“It did not.”

“Will he obey?”

“I am not sure. He is intelligent, and capable of tactical reasoning. But after what the hunters did to his mother, he feels immense guilt about her. No doubt the boy will do whatever he feels is necessary to fix whatever situation Samantha finds herself in.”

“Even if by doing so, the situation for others will worsen?”

“I ... do not know.” Jack was unique for a man his age in his ability to use sound reasoning. Given time, he would grow to become a powerful ancilla and eventual elder, with the power of his will and the sharpness of his intellect. But at the moment, he was undoubtedly trapped between his intelligence and emotions, and the strange power the curse granted him.

“Well, since you are determined to hold your secrets from me,” Elaine held up a dismissing hand, not offended, “I believe I can safely say that Jack will not act without yet another conversation with you. And perhaps in this second conversation, you can plead your case?”

“True. But, I am also concerned about the emotional repercussions. Jack has never been on the receiving end of my decisions, not like this.”

“Ah.” Elaine nodded as she tapped her finger to her chin once again. “In that, I do not believe I can be of help. It has been centuries since I have known the taste of love, and I cannot even begin to imagine the strange circumstance you find yourself in. Young Jack, confronted with the truth about his love, that she can be cold and ruthless about someone as important as her own childe, and his own mother.”

“Please stop.” Antoinette groaned as she leaned back in her chair and combed her hair faster. “As you said, you have not known love for centuries. I have tasted it and I will not let it go. I...” Her frustrated groan turned into a weary sigh. The Daeva half of her would sooner see Dolareido burn than give up Jack. He was hers, and there was no universe where she would let him go. The human half of her realized how quickly that would destroy their relationship. To grasp sand tightly was to lose it.

“I do not know, Ann. Perhaps explain to him you do not make these decisions easily? Appeal to his emotions?”

“Perhaps. It would not be a lie. I am tempted to lock my childe up in the basement and leave her there until this issue with Jacob is resolved. But, that would tip my hand to Jacob. And I do not wish to damage my relationship with Samantha as with Tony.”

“Come now, Samantha could not possibly become another François.”

François. How many years had it been since she had used that name for her now dead child?

“Did you not think the same of Viktor, Elaine?”

Elaine shook her head. “Viktor had a dark seed in him from night one. I sired him for the value he would provide me, you know that.”

Ah yes, Elaine could be just as brutal as Antoinette. More so, as a Ventrue with as troubled a past as her. But then, Elaine also had a soft side to her. The two of them would not be friends if her dragon rival had not displayed genuine moments of emotion and empathy over the years. Unfortunately, Elaine’s experience in romance was less than Antoinette’s.

Elder vampires did not indulge in true romance. Not because the opportunities did not present themselves, but because elders struggled to connect with their emotions, particularly where vulnerability was concerned. Jacob and Antoinette were oddities in that regard, and perhaps Daniel, given his interest in Athalia.

“I have told Jack that I would do much, sacrifice much, for our love. If I had to sacrifice my position with the Ordo, I would. But...”

“But Dolareido is more than a position in an organization. It is your child. You have spent over two centuries building it, nurturing it, and shaping it. If you had to pick between Jack and a project you have devoted your second life to, what would you do?”

Antoinette raised a hand, ready to slam it upon the desk. But she did not. Eventually she let the hand come to a rest, and took a deep, useless breath as she looked at her friend.

“What do I do, Elaine?”

Elaine laughed and shrugged. “If I knew, would I hide myself away in the Ordo for decades at a time, focused on my studies and nothing else? You have done here what few dragons would dream of, let alone pursue.”

“And come the next gathering of the Ordo Dracul, I will advise them to not pursue it. This project has been...”

Elaine laughed again as she leaned in. “Come now, Ann. This city is a labor of love. Do not deny your attachment, and your successes.”

“Is it? I have apparently built my so called utopia upon a damned land. Black Blood itself rises from the dead and dying that came long before I or Jacob ever stepped upon these shores.”

“Such is the curse of us who live in the paranormal world, I suppose, to forever stumble upon deadly threats beyond the flesh.”

“I—” Her phone buzzed. A quick glance told her it was one of her thralls operating a drone. The joys — and terrors — of the future. “May I?”

“By all means.”

Nodding, Antoinette scanned through the images sent to her. The drone took pictures from quite high, but she recognized the streets of her city well, and knew how to read the patterns and behaviors below.

“A gun fight, at the Border Bar. How lovely.”

“How drôle,” Elaine said, mimicking Antoinette’s French accent.

Antoinette returned her friend's play with an annoyed grin, and scanned through more images. "A handful of Carthians, and ... oh, Jack and another Invictus."

"Any deaths?"

"I do not think so." The camera could do little to find Kindred hiding with Obfuscate, but the body language suggested angry Carthians, not Carthians struggling with war. "Jack's doing, I suppose. Even with Michael ordering him to push this war, he strives to keep my vision."

"Yes, you and the boy align on many things." Elaine's smile turned into a serpent grin. "For better or worse."

Antoinette rolled her eyes, and checked the next image. Jack, returning to his apartment. Jack, exiting his apartment building, with new clothes. Jack, going for a walk, and looking morose. A natural reaction, with the decision he now faced, a decision that left Antoinette anxious and depressed as well. What he decided would affect more than the city and her plans, it would affect their relationship.

Ice shot up through Antoinette's fingers as the next picture showed something she did not expect. Clara. And Jack. Slowly, Antoinette slid to the next picture, and the phone trembled in her hand as the image showed Jack going to Clara. It stopped trembling, when the next picture showed Jack and Clara going back into the apartment building.

"Ann, are you alright? You look like you have seen something horrible."

The next image showed Clara leaving the apartment building, alone. Thirty minutes later.

Five minutes is all it would take for that wolf slut to find her pleasure. Five minutes to destroy a relationship nearly three years old. Five minutes to rip away the first true note of pleasure Antoinette had found in centuries.

Slowly, Elaine reached out and took the phone from her. Antoinette did not stop her. After a few moments of silence, her friend sighed as she set the phone down on the desk.

“If ... if this were any other time,” Elaine said, “I would say to trust the boy.”

“But this is not any other time. Jack is livid with me.”

“I ... Yes, he is.”

“And people have betrayed each other for less.”

Elaine set her hand upon Antoinette’s. “Jack is not other people.”

“No.” She took another useless, deep breath. “But he is also not as old as you or I.” Old, ancient, and fully in control of their thoughts and actions. To understand the self, the desires of the subconscious, and to pursue such desires consciously was the purview elders, not young men barely older than boys.

“What do you want to do?”

“I want to pay Clara a visit, and rip this damn woman’s head from her shoulders.”

Elaine’s grin returned, larger. “Then, perhaps we should? Not everything must be devious plots filled with nuance. The Carthians at least understand that sometimes, the best approach, is to kick down the door.”

“Perhaps. Perhaps it is.”

Dressed in their business suits, the two eldest women in Dolareido walked the streets, knowing full well the night could end in murder.

Neither Daeva nor Ventrue were naturally talented at Obfuscate. To wrap the self in the Cloak of Night and hide the body, or nearby bodies and objects, was difficult. But Elaine and Antoinette were ancient creatures who had spent hundreds of years mastering the Disciplines, including those their blood clans did not have innate talent for. To hide themselves in darkness and disappear into crowds was a simple affair, and allowed the two women to approach the Carthian district easily enough.

“How long has it been since we have done this?” Elaine asked.

“Done what?”

“Take matters into our own hands. Walk the streets, ready to enact violence with our own might, instead of the might of those who serve us?”

Antoinette could not help but raise a brow as she looked at her old friend. “Strange to hear a Ventrue speak of using her own hands.”

“You say that, but I did much with my own hands in my youth.”

“You were cursed in your youth. Literally. And you have still not shared how you removed said curse.”

Elaine eyed her with a touch more annoyance than Antoinette expected. Antoinette knew it was a difficult subject for her old friend, but she also knew Elaine kept her secrets, as Antoinette kept her own.

“It was hundreds of years ago, Ann. Tell me, how much do you remember of the first time we met?”

“A blur. A haze of motions. Words, sentences, random. I remember you came to my castle. I remember we got along well, and indulged in my host of thralls and ghouls.”

“That is what I remember. Bits, pieces. There is not a single conversation I can detail, or a moment I can fully describe. And yet you expect me to keep secrets of such a time from you? I rid myself of the curse at a similar time.”

“That ... is true. I apologize. I am frustrated.”

“Clearly. But I have not forgotten. My thrall servants continue to pour through my notes, and I have delved into my memories as well as I can. They are ... not pleasant memories.” Elaine looked down as she cradled her chin in a couple fingers.

Antoinette knew Elaine well enough to recognize her pensive look. Whatever thoughts danced through Elaine’s mind, she was not sharing all of them, but she was struggling with them. Both Antoinette and Jack knew Elaine’s motives for visiting Dolareido were not pure, but there had been opportunities for Elaine to perhaps attempt to capture or subdue Jack in some way, and she had not used them. Several times now she could have staked the boy when his guard was down, and taken him from the city, back to her hold to perform her experiments on. Or perhaps even steal the curse from him through some brutal reenactment of the original ritual that would no doubt leave Jack a pile of ash. But she had not.

Perhaps it was not a matter of Antoinette’s original idea of what her old friend was up to being wrong, but rather Elaine found herself struggling to enact it? It would be a great betrayal of her old friend, but a prize perhaps worthy of any betrayal, for an elder of her age to have the curse at her whim. Then again, Jack had made it clear to Antoinette that the curse was a terrible thing with a mind of its own. Perhaps her lover had convinced Elaine, directly or indirectly, to not pursue her original plan? It was almost expected at this point, that Jack would have such an effect on others. Her lover...

“Ann, you look ready to kill someone.” Thankfully, her old friend’s voice was lost in the crowds they past. “You are not angry with me. You are angry with Clara.”

“Obviously.”

“Will you kill her?”

“I do not know. Perhaps I will know when I see her.”

“If you kill her, you know Avery will go to war with you. You will be forced to expel her by force.”

Antoinette looked down for a moment as she let that reality settle upon her mind. Yes, if she continued to let her emotions, emotions she had long buried before she met Jack, now lead her into a confrontation, she could find herself triggering the problems she fought hard to prevent.

“Once, Avery and Simon confronted Viktor about some of his actions.”

“My childe did not react well to that, I assume? Even before I embraced him, Viktor did not take well to being denied, or accused.”

“He did not. He Dominated them. A rude awakening for Simon, to know an elder Kindred is a more powerful creature than even the most gifted Uratha.”

“A terrifying thought for the Uratha, I assume.”

“Undoubtedly.”

“Do not underestimate Avery, old friend.” Elaine reached out and touched Antoinette’s shoulder. “It has been many years since Avery left Dolareido. Jack reported that she is capable of using a strange sort of spirit fire on her claws, correct?”

“Correct.” And that was a terrifying idea. The damage Avery had done to Jack ... the Ripper’s body, was immense. And the Ripper curse had displayed feats of true power, especially in defensive abilities, such that Antoinette feared if the creature could ever be killed by anything other than fire or sun. If Avery had managed to damage him so completely with a single swipe of her claws, that was not the Avery Antoinette knew when she served Simon.

“Then consider that when you confront her second in command.”

“I thought you wished for me to kill Clara?”

Elaine laughed and shook her head. “I am intrigued by the idea, but I think when we confront Clara, you will not kill her. Exile her perhaps, but kill her? No.”

“You think I am too soft.”

“Nonsense. I think you are too intelligent to risk another problem for your city.”

Antoinette was not so sure. So many decades she had spent without emotions running so loudly through her mind. She was not used to hearing them scream in her ear, scream for vengeance, scream for love and hate and pain. For the first time in many years, Antoinette did not know what she would do.

The uncertainty terrified her.

The two vampires walked through the front door of the apartment building the Carthians had adopted, and deactivated their Cloaks.

The werewolf guarding the small lobby, Caleb this night, jaw-dropped.

“Uh ... hello, Prince. Elaine.”

Antoinette glanced at Elaine. Elaine returned it with a knowing smile, before she met Caleb’s eyes.

“What room does Clara sleep in?” the Ventrue said. And one did not need Auspex to feel the power that radiated from her ancient friend. Poor Caleb never stood a chance.

“Clara.” His voice turned deadpan, and the expression from his lively face vanished. “She sleeps in room 105.”

“And I assume she’s there now?”

“No. She went out. Hasn’t come back.”

Had not returned? She left Jack’s apartment, without Jack, but had not returned. Antoinette nodded to Elaine, and left.

“Forget you ever saw us, young wolf.” A moment later, Elaine was beside her once again.

---

It was perhaps a good thing Clara was not in her den, to give the Prince more time to cool. Antoinette still did not know what she would do when she found the woman. But oh, the delight that would flow through her, ripping the girl’s head from her body. As with all elders, she rarely used her own hands, but now she ached to feel them sink through the girl’s skin and bones. And yet, would she truly feel delight, once the moment had past?

“You sure you do not wish for your sheriff to handle this?”

“This is personal, Elaine.” Antoinette managed to summon a knowing smile for her friend. “And you merely wish to spend more time with the man, despite how he has already made his interest in Athalia obvious.”

Elaine shrugged with an exaggerated eye roll. “A woman can dream.”

“Is there no one else you are interested in? Perhaps back in Europe?”

“Alas, no.”

“Are you even interested in Daniel? So far, you have only convinced me that you are interested in teasing and tormenting him.”

“Interested, of course. But in the way Athalia is? I do not think so, no.”

“Then I suggest you leave him be, for Athalia’s sake. The woman has suffered enough.”

Elaine looked at her quizzically. “Why do you care for her? Is she not a thorn in your side, along with the other Begotten?”

“I was concerned the Begotten would follow in Azamel’s footsteps, and rain arrogance down on my city. The damn woman did destroy a large building, last time she hid within my walls.”

“She does not appear to be that woman anymore. It seems she has a family now.”

“A family, in a way. Though now that the woman is dying, she has passed that mantle to Sándor, the gargoyle. And under his far calmer guidance, perhaps the other Begotten could become ... a part of my city.”

“Why Antoinette, are you opening your heart to others? Has Jack rubbed off on you?”

Rubbed off on her, in perhaps the worst way, if Antoinette was now plagued with such thoughts. Perhaps—

Both women stopped and stared down the street of the Carthian district. This late at night, not many kine walked the streets, making it easy for the two women to see who was walking toward them. She would not see them, as both elders had wrapped themselves in Cloaks of Night, and she walked forward with her head pointed down.

Clara. A beautiful woman, the sort who was both gorgeous, and ‘sporty’, as the children of the modern age would say. With hands in her pockets, the woman slouched horribly as she stared at the sidewalk, and all her usual predatory grace was gone. And in the quiet of the night, with only flickering street lights to show the woman, her sniffles were audible, and her tears obvious.

Chapter 149

~~Jack~~

He left Harcourt with the monsters. Athalia said she wanted to talk to him, in private, and Harcourt agreed the same way a scared child might agree to something. But Jack knew the monsters wouldn't hurt him, not while he was still under the Prince's protection.

A part of Jack wanted to stick around, be a part of the conversation, maybe build some sort of bridge between him and Athalia, like she and his mom had. A much larger part of him knew he'd rage and snap, talking about Angela, and that wasn't what Athalia needed. The woman needed closure, not an enemy. And as much as she'd nearly become one, Athalia wasn't an enemy. Better to leave her be and let her recover without his interference. It wasn't like Beatrice was going out of her way to talk to Athalia; far as he knew the two hadn't talked to each other since she killed her daughter.

He wanted to fix things. It ate at him, like a fucking ant in his shoe, when he couldn't fix something. The problems with the Invictus and Carthians, the problems with Begotten and Athalia, the problem with Mary being a ghost, and now the problem with his mom dating a bastard who might actually be trying to destroy the fucking world or something. The shit he would do for a magic wand, so he could just zap away and fix the problems.

“Jack,” Sándor said, “I wanted to talk to you.”

“Yeah, gathered that, from you coming with.” He kept the words light, playful, testing Sándor's disposition.

The gargoyle didn't so much as smile at the comment.

“And don’t worry. Harcourt will be fine.”

“I know.”

“I ... wanted to ask about Beatrice.”

Right, cause the man was a masochist and was determined to make himself feel even more guilty than Jack did about his mom. What a pair they were.

“Alright. Hit me.”

Sándor nodded. At least the two of them understood the value in being straight with each other, and not dancing around bushes.

“She and Julias. I understand they were a close couple. A bit of a ... two wayward souls finding solace in each other situation.”

Jack sighed. “Ah, you want to talk about Julias too.”

“Sorry. But—”

“It’s ok. We can skip the typical back and forths, the apologies and creeping on eggshells stuff. I’m guessing you’re sick of it.”

“Sick is a strong word. But ... I appreciate your candor.”

“Same. And yeah, Triss was your typical angry Nosferatu, and Julias was depressed with his second life. They really helped each other out. He helped her with her anger, she helped him find happiness again.” Jack put up his hands. “I’m quoting him, by the way. These are the things he told me. Though really it was the whole Circle that helped Triss get over her issues with her Nos deformities. They don’t care. Julias can’t take all the credit for that.”

“You were close with him.”

“Pretty close. Becoming a vampire put a strain on the relationship. But yeah, even when things got heated, we were still friends. Close friends. We talked to each other about almost everything, Triss included.” Ah fuck, that brought up the memory of the conversation in the hospital, the last normal conversation they had. “He was going to marry her; propose, anyway. She would have said yes.”

Sándor only barely flinched, but with this guy, that was essentially running him over with a train.

“Julias was ... You were there, at the end. I guess I don’t need to say how amazing he was.”

“No ... you don’t.”

Nodding, Sándor took a breath, pushing past the pain, same as Jack was.

“And Beatrice now?”

“We don’t talk as much as we used to. She’s probably doing some ritual shit that I’m happier not knowing about.” Jack looked Sándor’s way. If what he said meant something, Sándor didn’t react to it. “So, you want to know about Beatrice? She’s an angry punk on the outside, but on the inside she’s a normal girl, right down to fantasies of being a princess. When she was alive, she wasn’t anything special, just a really pretty, athletic girl who liked attention. Would be an instagram ass model if she was alive today.”

“Instagram ... ass model.”

Jack grinned at the man. Yeah, made sense Sándor wasn’t exactly up to date with online stuff.

“Internet, self made model, showing off her ass.”

“I see. She was that ... bold?”

“Ha! Vain is the word you’re looking for, dude. And before you defend her, she admitted it to me herself. She was a vain bitch when she was alive, and hey, if a girl wants to show off her ass for clicks and likes, or whatever they did back in 1990, by all means. But she got the attention of a stalker, a Nosferatu asshole. Course the Prince killed the fucker for siring without permission, but, yeah, waking up from death with a new set of big nasty teeth, that left her pretty angry. Down in the bones angry, you know?”

Sándor slowly nodded, eyes ahead and on the tunnel tracks. He knew. He probably knew better than anyone in the whole damn city.

“And Julias helped her overcome that?” he asked.

“Yeah. Julias was great at helping others. Not so good with helping himself.”

“Who is?”

“Good point.”

“And Beatrice. She’s taken to the Circle well?”

“Yeah, really well. I don’t trust Jacob, but I guess he called it right, getting her from the Carthians. And I guess I see it, now that she’s neck deep in it. Triss will make a good witch.”

“You didn’t think so before?”

“Nah. Before I knew her very well, I thought she was kinda like Jessy, loud and angry. But they’re nothing alike. Getting sired against her will really fucked her up, and that proud pretty girl she used to be shattered and turned into someone with a lot more rage and ... depth, I guess. Depth she probably didn’t want, but she got it anyway. Jessy isn't like that. Deep as a plate. Awesome, in her own way, but yeah."

That managed to get at least a small smile out of the gargoyle.

"That's good."

"What, that Triss has depth? Why? You kinda gave me the impression Jen's attempts to seduce you with TNA was a failure." Jack put up a hand again before Sándor could ask. "Tits and ass."

"I see. I ... guess I am interested in Beatrice, yes. We've talked, and she's intriguing."

"Don't mind the crocodile teeth?" Jack pointed at his cheeks.

"No." A complete lack of explanation. Typical. But it made sense. Dude was a Begotten, and probably met a lot of monsters who looked fucking horrible. Just another day for a nightmare creature.

"Well, from what I can tell, Beatrice and Jennifer are best friends, and friends with benefits. If you want one, you get the other. Which, I mean, Jen's ridiculously hot, so I imagine most guys would be happy with that arrangement. But something tells me you're more of a vanilla guy?"

Even wording it like that, hoping to poke the guy's ego a bit and crack his shell, got nothing. Pure deadpan face.

"My life with my wife was ... not vanilla." Jack's words didn't crack Sándor's shell, but his own did, for a split second at least. He flinched, just barely. Interesting.

Jack chuckled. It felt good to laugh, after everything he'd been through lately.

“If you want to ask her out or something, I say go for it. Just ... just be careful. Julias’s been dead for a while, but not so long it doesn’t still sting.”

“I’m not sure dating is what I had in mind.”

Not sure? Dude had something in mind.

“Triss is awesome, but probably a little fragile right now. Julias was her pillar, you know? She leaned on him, and she isn’t the sort of girl to do that lightly.”

“I hear a lot of people relied on Julias.”

“Yeah, that’s true. He was a Right Hand of the Invictus before I was, and the Invictus relied on him heavily. Then his sire died, and Julias replaced him on the council. Everyone was happy about it, cause yeah, people trusted Julias to not only do his due diligence, but he also didn’t have ulterior motives. Usually. Of all the Kindred in the city, he was the only damn one you could trust to not screw you over.”

Sándor nodded as he took it in. “Dolareido is worse for his passing.”

“Yeah, it is.” Jack almost launched into a ‘it’s not your fault’ speech, but Sándor had made it clear he didn’t want to hear it. And Jack was happy to oblige. “I’m not entirely sure what you’re aiming to do, Sándor, but there’s no way you can replace Azamel, be a protector and teacher for all the younger Begotten, and simultaneously replace Julias, you know? If anything, replacing him is my job.”

“You’re a little busy to replace him, don’t you think?”

“I guess.” The turf war was definitely something Julias would have handled, and better than Jack was, but the shit with the tears,

Black Blood, and potentially Jacob, was a twist he doubted his sire would know how to handle any better than he did.

“And I suppose I’m not looking to replace your sire. But I am looking to heal the wound as best I can.”

“So you can fix things.”

“Yes. I have to fix things. Even if they’re not my fault, they’re still my responsibility. I ... have to fix what I can.”

Jack smiled at him. “I know the feeling.”

It’d be sunrise soon. A bit over an hour. Tomorrow night he’d pay Antoinette a visit, and see what they could do about ... about everything. In the mean time, he had one other thing to check up on, one other thing he was trying to fix.

He stepped into his old house, his mom’s old house, and let the darkness and cold envelop him. The house was officially haunted, and all those old movies made a lot more sense. Haunted houses weren’t just creepy, they had an aura. You felt death when you entered them, in a way only a ghost could cause. Unnatural death.

“Mary, you here?” He took off his shoes and set them beside the side door on the mat. Habit. The side door took him into the kitchen, and he walked through it as he looked around. “Mary?” She usually hung out in her room upstairs, but no reason to not ask out loud for her before he got there.

Sure enough, no response. But the place felt cold, weird and in the bones cold, and that seemed to be an indicator she was around. So he headed upstairs, and knocked on her door.

“Mary, you there? I’m coming in.” The memory slapped him in the face. He’d said those exact words before, when he was young and she was still alive.

He stepped into her room, and the cold bit into him like knives. Not real cold. A vampire didn't really give a shit about temperatures outside of absurd extremes, but something about being around a ghost made that defense moot. It was painful cold in Mary's room, and mist flowed over the floor up to his knees.

Course all that was forgotten the moment he saw his sister sitting on the edge of her bed, looking through a photo album. It sat beside her, not on her lap like Jack figured she'd hold it. Then again, ghost.

"Hey Mary. You uh, learned how to touch stuff?"

She shook her head. "Mom helped me with this. It's ... it's taken a lot of time and effort, but I can turn the pages. Barely."

"Anything else? Open drawers or anything?"

"No. Not without either doing nothing, or throwing it across the room."

Nodding, he came over and sat beside her, picture album between them. "Been talking to Mom lately? Guess you have, if she put this together for you." Looked like a new photo album, a big one, and full of pictures his mom and Mary had taken. Even his dad was in there. The memories of the Terry family in one place.

"Yeah. She's happy!" The ghost opened her eyes wide as she snapped her head up, the motion a blur. Jack almost jumped back. Those empty eyes. "I'm glad. Mom should be happy. It's been so hard on her."

"Hard on you too, Mary."

"You're right, you're right. But I'm dead, and ... and that's ok. Mom has you now, right? And that Jacob man."

Fuck Jacob.

“Yeah, I guess she does. Not really a fan of Jacob, personally.”

“Would you be a fan of any man Mom dates?” Well, Mary was being surprisingly clear and articulate. He didn’t know if that was a good thing, or a bad thing.

“I guess not. But Jacob is a dangerous guy, scary dangerous, and —”

“Mom says a lot of vampires say that about you.”

Fuck. “I’ll fix that.”

“You can’t fix everything, Jack.”

“I can try.”

She laughed. A little too shrill to sound nice, but it was a lot better than angry Mary throwing him around with telekinesis and whatnot.

“Mom’s been pretty shy about it, but I think she’s getting laid, too.”

Ugh, he wasn’t old enough for this conversation. The idea his mom had to have sex, twice, to have two children still irked him. Give him another ten years and maybe he’d be able to think about it without cringing, but not yet. Mary definitely had a one up on him in that aspect of maturity.

“I guess she is.”

“Some pretty nasty, kinky sex, too.”

“What? Oh come on, Mom doesn’t tell you about that stuff.”

Mary grinned at him. Spooky. “She does, at least a little. And it’s not hard to guess what she means when she says something else. You know Mom, and how much she likes to undersell.”

“I guess.”

“Which means Mom is enjoying some pretty big sex fantasies. Like, orgies and stuff.”

Jack plugged both his ears. “La la la la la la.”

Laughing, Mary swung out to bat away one of his arms. But her hand past through it, sending a harsh jolt of cold up into his shoulder. Somehow, he managed to not yelp, but it wasn’t enough to stop her from dropping her empty eyes. He got ready to jump out of the way if she flipped out and decided to throw the bed or something, but she only sighed, and turned the page of the photo album. It took her a few tries, fingers passing through it again and again, but she managed.

Jack lowered his hands, and looked down at the pictures as well. Better to ignore how fucked up the situation was, that Mary was dead and couldn’t touch anything. Hell, with Beatrice doing crazy ritual stuff and flirting with Death herself, maybe she’d help his mom and Mary out? Which would undoubtedly end horribly, and probably make everything worse.

“I remember this picture,” he said. “Banana Bananza Waterpark.” Samantha, James, Mary, and Jack. Jack was a scrawny little kid, pasty white, and shivering. Water cooled him down a little too well.

Mary nodded, and pointed to the picture beside it. “There’s us when we went camping.”

“You hated it.”

“You were supposed to hate it, too. Didn’t think my nerd brother would like climbing trees.”

“I was ten. It’s a boy thing. Climbing or digging snow forts.”

Her smile returned, and she flipped to the next page. No need to describe any of these pictures, they both knew what they were. The last birthday Jack had when his dad was still alive.

“I’m happy Mom’s happy,” she said. “Every time she visits, or every time I...” Her fingers paused over a picture of their mom, her hugging their dad’s arm and smiling for the camera. “It hurts, seeing her hold onto me so tight.”

“I thought you didn’t want to ... you know...” Die. Leave. Pass on. Cross over.

“I don’t know!” She snapped her head up again, empty eyes wide, but Jack didn’t react this time. “I can feel something in me, and it wants to latch onto ... onto anything. But I’m scared of the dark places I can see! That place where that ... that thing comes from.”

“Black Blood?”

“I think so. I told Mom, but she’s...” Mary sighed and shrugged. “I don’t know. Something’s going on, and I don’t know!”

“Me neither. But I’m working on it, and so are a bunch of vampires. Mom’s sire, she’s—”

“Your girlfriend?”

Jack turned away. “We got in a fight.”

“Bad?”

“Pretty bad.”

“Don’t let her go, Jack. She’s good for you.”

“How do you know? What’s Mom been telling you?”

Mary smiled as she turned the page. “That Antoinette’s super smart, and assertive. Two good things for you, I think.”

“Oh?”

“Yeah. I think a more normal girl would probably bore you after a while, you know?”

Clara wouldn’t bore him. Would she?

“Well, that super smart, assertive part of her is part of why we’re in a fight.”

“Fights can be ended, you know? You can fix them and—” Her head twitched, fast enough it left a hazy afterimage that it snapped back into after a moment. “Sorry. It’s hard to ... to keep thinking.”

“Antoinette and other people are working on this weird thing with tears, the things you’re seeing. We’ll get it figured out, and then you can ... I don’t know. What do you want to do?”

“I don’t know either.” Slowly, Mary closed the book, and her body shimmered, like flickering TV static as she struggled with it. “I got a visit from that other ghost again.”

“Oh shit. Sabrina?”

“Yeah. She wants to get in. But you said to stay away from her, so I won’t let her.”

“Good! Good. Christ she was a scary fucking ghost. She’s dangerous, and not just for me, but you too.”

“I’m safe here. It’s my home. She can’t get in.”

The fact Sabrina was roaming around, not tied down like Mary was, was god damn fucking terrifying. The last thing Jack needed was that psychopath ghost learning Jack killed her master.

“Alright. I’ll go now.” He got up, but she got up with him, and floated in front of him, blocking him off from the door.

“Jack, I ... I don’t know what I’m going to do. M-Maybe, if things change in the future, I’ll go. Maybe if ... if things go differently, who knows. I know I can’t stay here forever. I’m ... I’m lucid now, but I know I’m not always like that. Something has to change.”

He couldn’t look her in her empty eye sockets, not from this close, not with what she was saying. Not with what he knew Triss was doing.

“I know.”

“But whatever happens, you can’t die, ok? Mom won’t be able to handle it. I don’t care what happens. I don’t care who you have to fight, or ... or kill. I don’t care what enemies you make. Don’t die, ok? It’s the best thing you can do for Mom.”

Don’t die. Just don’t die. Honestly, with the curse poisoning everything, him dying wasn’t what he was worried about. It was him killing everyone else.

The memory of Maria’s nightmare echoed in his mind, like a speaker shrieking with feedback, until he thought his ears would bleed.

~~Antoinette~~

Once upon a time, in an age long past, Antoinette had given up on the idea of love. The very thought of sharing true intimacy, physical, intellectual, and emotional, with another Kindred was a silly, juvenile thought, something most elders had given up on. And while Antoinette often avoided meetings with the Ordo, as she much preferred to work on her projects without interference, she had met plenty of elder Kindred deep in the recesses of the organization who had also given up on romance. The elder mind struggled to think in such terms.

Jack. Silly yet mature, cynical yet optimistic, logical yet emotional Jack, had dug up a part of her she had long thought dead, and she would not give it up easily, especially not for some plebeian mongrel. Jack was hers. If she had to kill Clara to keep it that way, she would. Illogical as it was and likely to doom the relationship, she would.

But seeing the damn woman walk the street, alone, struggling to not sob even as tears ran down her cheeks, ripped a hole clear through the bubbling anger in Antoinette's chest. Why? The damnable woman was her enemy, and all was fair in love and war.

And yet, something about seeing the werewolf struggle with her sadness as she walked the street pulled at something inside Antoinette. For the life of her, she did not know what, or why, but she released her Cloak, and walked toward Clara.

“Wha—shit!” Clara jumped back as she stared at the Prince. “The fuck? What are you ... oh shit.”

Sighing, Antoinette held up a hand and shook her head. “Peace, Miss Moreno.”

“Peace? Why are you even here? You—”

“I saw you, entering Jack's apartment. I saw you leave Jack's apartment, a while later.”

Clara's eyes widened, and she took another step back. “You came here to kill me, over that? You ... fucking psycho.”

Antoinette ground her teeth as she glared at the woman. “I came to parlay.”

“I don’t believe that for a second.” With a sniffle, Clara wiped her nose with her wrist, her eyes with her fingers, and took another step back. “And don’t think I’ll go down without a—”

“Clara Moreno, cease your incessant prattling! I am not here to kill you.” Though with the way Clara insisted the conversation go, she was making it increasingly easy to return to that plan. “I am here to talk ... about whatever happened tonight.”

“Yeah, go fuck yourself. I—” She spun around, hand out, and the back of her hand collided with air.

Elaine stepped back from the backhand, wearing a toying grin as her Cloak faded, and idly rubbing her cheek where Clara had hit her. “Impressive.”

“Two elders for one wolf? You two really that scared?”

“Of course not.” Sighing louder, full dramatic effect intended, Antoinette waved Elaine off, and her old friend stepped around Clara to join her again. “Forgive the Ventrue her ... mischievous ways. I wish to speak to you Clara, about Jack.”

“I didn’t fuck him, calm down.”

“I gathered.”

“Ha, how? Cause I’m crying?”

“By the time frame. Half an hour? Please.” A small attempt at a joke, to lighten the mood. She had indeed thought, for a furious moment, that perhaps Clara had seduced her little Jack. That idea had shattered upon seeing the woman’s tears, and now Antoinette did her best to recover the situation. It earned a surprised, raised brow from the woman, and Antoinette could not help but mirror Elaine's domineering grin. But she suppressed it quick enough, and took another step toward Clara. "If I wanted to kill you, Clara, I could have arranged it, easily. No need to dirty my hands."

"Unless you wanted to bloody them. You come across as a cold bitch, but I've seen more than a few vamps just like you. When shit gets personal, you freak the fuck out and get vicious."

Antoinette glared at the woman, and a small part of her hoped the stupid creature would shatter into a hundred shards of frozen blood and gore, there on the street.

"I admit that, perhaps, I originally wanted a rather terse word."

"Terse? Gimme a break."

"I swear you will not be harmed, Clara. But I do wish to speak." She almost worded it as an order, but she knew Clara, like any of the Uratha in Avery's pack, would respond to even the most logical order with resistance. Better to ask, and save herself the headache. "Please."

Clara eyed her suspiciously, but after another sniffle, shrugged and nodded. "Fuck it, fine. The fuck do I have to lose."

---

"Bloodlust? Really?" No doubt the woman felt self-conscious about her clothes.

"It is a secure location. We may speak privately." Antoinette nodded to the bouncer at the door, and walked toward the side staircase. Kine ceased chatting to stare at the tall white-haired woman in the business suit, before their eyes fell to the tall blonde in a similar suit, and then eventually to the tan-skinned woman with box-braid hair, wearing a t-shirt and jeans. The kine knew better than to interfere.

Soon, Antoinette sat upstairs in her usual booth, far in the back. Elaine did not join them however, nodding before departing to find another booth. On the hunt, no doubt.

Clara eventually sat down across from Antoinette in the large, circular booth, eyes locked on Antoinette. Her tears had stopped, though Antoinette could see she was holding them back to save face. Such a child.

“I assume Jack has told you about the situation with Black Blood, and my order about Samantha.”

“You’re lucky he did. I was thinking about dropping by and giving Samantha a check-in, see if she’d put some distance between her and that asshole Jacob. At least I was until Jack said you told him to not tell her about the situation.”

“You disagree.”

“Course I fucking disagree. She’s your childe, isn’t she? The fuck —”

Antoinette held up a hand. “I did not invite you here to speak of Samantha. Know that if you warn her, I will consider that an act against me. And not a personal attack, but an official one, orchestrated by your pack.” She leaned in and glared daggers into the wolf. “Respect that you are guests in my city. Do not make me remove you.”

For all Clara’s bravado, for all her strength and rank as second-in-command of her pack, Clara was a gnat compared to Antoinette’s power. The wolf tried to hold Antoinette’s gaze, but failed, and looked down and away after several seconds.

“No idea what Jack sees in a bitch like you.”

Well, if the woman had no issue making this as personal as possible, Antoinette would stoop to her level.

“No doubt you assume the only thing he sees in a vampire comme moi, is the size of my breasts.”

Clara snorted as she finally regained her confidence, enough to glare at Antoinette at least. “I think you’ve got the whole ancient seductress thing down pat, yeah. I think you’ve got Jack all twisted up inside, so he can’t think straight when he’s around you.”

Not entirely an unwarranted opinion. Antoinette had indeed gone out of her way to become a seductress, physically and intellectually, even resorting to strange, forgotten measures to ensure her unusual body. To an outside eye like Clara, Antoinette’s actions must have seemed terribly shallow. But Clara was a young fool who did not understand her own heart, her own desires, or the reality in pursuing them. Antoinette took no more offense in her ignorant views about the Prince’s body than she would if a four-year-old child had insulted her shoes.

“We discussed my relationship with Jack once before. You thought I was selfish, that I was putting my desires before what was healthy for him.”

“I still think that.”

“Even after what Jack has told you, about my order about his mother?”

A hole in Clara’s opinion, that Antoinette would risk Jack’s anger instead of tricking him. Naturally, the werewolf sneered and looked away again as she realized it.

“You probably think he’ll come back to you like a dog on a leash, coming back to its master no matter how many times the master beats it.”

It took more effort than Antoinette wanted to admit, to not reach across the table and tear the damn woman's eyes out.

“He will come back to me, because we love each other, Clara. And while he and I are quite different, and it is through those differences that we have found synergy.”

“You know all that shit about two opposites attract is just that, shit, right?”

Antoinette found herself smiling. “Oh?”

“You think Uratha can't read about things? Fuck you. Yeah, I read stuff sometimes, and what do you know, turns out that shit about opposites attract is just romanticizing. You need to have common ground, or it's a doomed relationship.” Well well, the woman was smarter than she seemed.

“And you think Jack and I have no common ground? That we are opposites? Surely he has told you otherwise.”

She turned to her other side, now facing out toward the club and the other booths closer to the stairs and railing. “So he says. I can't see how a young guy can really have common ground with an ancient bitch.”

“Then you do not understand Jack at all.”

That earned a surprised glance from Clara, before she leaned back, folded her arms across her chest, and glared at Antoinette. “Enlighten me, then.”

“That is why we are here ... partly.”

“Partly?”

“Later. For now, let us speak of Jack then. You think Jack is a young man, a silly boy thrust into circumstances that have hardened him, and sculpted a man. Oui?”

“I guess, yeah. Dude was what, twenty, when he was embraced? That wasn’t even four years ago. He’s grown up into a pretty awesome guy.”

“Clara, I was attracted to Jack long before any of the events that molded him befell him. If anything, I have worked to undo the effects those traumatizing moments have had on him.”

“Uh huh.”

“I do not lie. The first time I met Jack, I thought him nothing more than an unusual choice for Julias Mire, nothing like him at all. I met the boy later at Bloodlust, in this very booth, and he displayed unusual courage, and unusual wisdom.” Clara did not need to know the details of that conversation. Jack, a young man with utterly no world experience, had remarked that Antoinette was lonely, even as the boy trembled beside her in fear. “I was attracted to him when he was ... unknown, when he was simply a young man with a mind that did not fit such a simple description.” Antoinette leaned over the table toward the wolf woman. “Jack is an old soul, Clara.”

“Old soul? And if I don’t believe in reincarnation?”

“Metaphor. Jack is not a young man, or rather, not young in many regards. Surely you have noticed that.”

“I have. Kid’s definitely got an inner grumpy asshole.”

“Quaint. Oui, there are aspects to Jack that allow him and I to communicate in meaningful, deep ways. I am sorry if that offends you”—though they both knew very well that she was not—”but in truth, Jack is not the sort of man you could spend the rest of your life with, Clara.”

“Says you.”

“That I do. Could you truly imagine discussing the minutiae of music or the acting techniques of the older versus younger generation? Could you spend hours discussing how dialog was written in older movies, versus the movies of now? Or how terribly modern movies insist on balancing audio?”

“I—”

“Can you imagine spending three hours comparing the writing techniques of authors? Or perhaps indulging Jack one of his hour-long rants where he does nothing but insult social media?”

“I—”

“Do you have any topics that could engage his mind? I have spent hours explaining to my love the intricacies of Mozart and the tragedy of Beethoven. I have detailed the rise and fall of communism in Stalin’s Russia. I have regaled him with talk of economics, the complexities of law, and techniques to manipulate stock and taxes. I have discussed the emergence of languages over the course of history, the discovery of spices by different cultures, and the psychology of genders, all to his utmost interest.”

“So you’re both nerds, so what?”

Antoinette leaned in closer, and forced Clara to hold her steady gaze. “Jack does not dance. Jack despises social gatherings, and only engages at my request. Jack did not indulge in alcohol in his first life, or drugs of any kind, and not because of any sort of fear, but because the idea of not being in total control of his mind at all times did not sit well with him. Jack’s perfect night includes solitude, perhaps an intriguing film, and hours of discussion.

“You,” she pointed at Clara, “are a social creature, non? Your best nights undoubtedly included enjoying the company of your pack, perhaps joyful nights on the town, full of alcohol. Your most joyous days — something Jack will never see — were probably when you and your group hunted in the woods, or perhaps when engaging in a rough brawl with dissidents? Your most treasured memories likely include the sheer joy of sharing an experience with a group of others, likely often your pack, but also perhaps your family from your first life? I can easily picture you sharing in elation with fellow students when you were young, cheering over a sports team or some such. Perhaps even now. While Jack does not know the name of most sports teams, and not the name of a single player of any of them.”

Again, Antoinette leaned in closer, continuing to hold the frozen Clara’s gaze. “Be under no illusions, Clara. You and Jack would greatly enjoy each other’s company, for a time, but I have seen better matches than you two, who saw perhaps two months of shared bliss. The two of you would be nothing more than a temporary relationship shared between the young, full of short lived passion. But Jack and I will survive ages together. And while our differences are great, we connect in ways you do not appreciate, in the ways a husband and wife do. Our connection is not only sexual and emotional, as yours would be, but also intellectual, the ability for us to speak about what interests us, and to spark the genuine interest of the other.

“You would not connect with Jack in such a way Clara. Your relationship would be doomed before it began.”

Clara broke their gaze first, leaning back and looking down. And despite her attempts to hide it, the werewolf sniffled. If not for the music of Bloodlust, other booths would have heard her.

“You really are a bitch, you know that?” Clara forced down a sniffle, but it did not last, and she sniffled again as she struggled to control her tears. Those too fell, and she wiped them away quickly.

With a heavy sigh, Antoinette slid along the booth, closing the distance between the two until a single foot separated them.

“Clara, I ... apologize, for how I managed this. I admit learning of your time with Jack tonight left me ... infuriated.”

“Yeah well, you were right. Jack doesn’t want me. Even when he’s pissed at you, still doesn’t want me.”

“Do not be absurd. Of course he desires you, Clara.”

“What?”

“If Jack were not with me, he would happily succumb to your flirtations. You are an amazing woman, Clara, strong and beautiful. Not the most intelligent woman—”

“Hey!”

“But intelligent enough. Do not think you are unworthy. But do not be so childish as to not understand the difference between true romance, and a passionate desire.” Slowly, Antoinette offered the woman a gentle smile. An olive branch. “I am happy that you are so concerned for Jack, to the point you are willing to anger me. But I do suggest you be careful with Jack from now on, and do not tempt him further. Not because of him, but because of me.”

“That a threat?”

“It is.” She said it with no malice. The tears in Clara’s eyes robbed Antoinette of what anger she looked for. They would not have, in years past. “But you and I need not be enemies, Clara. Leave Jack be, and—”

“You don’t even know what Jack is gonna do, after this shit you’re pulling.”

“And the idea of losing Jack because of this development with Black Blood haunts me to my very soul, Clara, in ways you do not understand. You, who bursts at the seams with emotions. You who will never know centuries of...” Antoinette leaned back, pulled her hair over her shoulder onto her chest, and combed it with one hand as she looked out to the other booths. “I will do what I can to ensure our relationship survives. I know Jack will as well.” Now that the fury in her veins had calmed, it grew easier to see that, and to trust her love. Their relationship would survive this. It would.

“You got a lot of faith in him to still want you after this.”

“I do.”

Clara sniffled again before taking a deep breath and silencing her sobs. “Christ, I don’t even know why I’m crying.”

“Emotions are not always logical. And while it has been ages since I have shed tears, I am sure I shed plenty when I was your age.” She shrugged as she continued to offer her peace smile to the werewolf. “And if those feelings are of guilt, due to your budding relationship with the hunter Harcourt, do not be so hard on yourself. Your relationship with him is young, while your interest in Jack far older, and deserving of investigation.”

“Fuck, does everyone know I’m dating Brace?”

“Ugh.”

“And, if I may be so bold, your future with Harcourt holds more potential than with Jack. While the hunter and my love share little in common, they do share some similarities in personality, similarities you undoubtedly find appealing.” His emotional forwardness, his deep rooted desire to do right, his adorable awkwardness.

“Yeah well, that may be true, but Harcourt doesn’t seem interested.”

“Oh? If you are willing to tell me, by all means.”

Clara wiped her nose, gulped down her tears, and sat up straighter. “Fine. I guess if anyone knows a thing or two about romance, it’s an ancient Daeva.”

Antoinette knew far more than most, about typical romantic interactions, true. Countless interactions from her youth that, while faded, had sharpened her social instincts into a scalpel. Countless books read. Countless young kine and Kindred seen, monitored, and documented. Her own romantic woes were strange, absurd things, and not easily understood, but Clara’s would be far simpler and easier.

Sure enough, as Clara explained the situation, the solution was clear. Brace Harcourt was a passive man, and a moron. Two hundred years ago, a woman would drop her handkerchief near a man she was interested in, and the man would return it, creating the avenue for conversation. If the man had the wherewithal to recognize what the gesture meant, he would pursue the woman with romantic interest. Signal sent, received, and the chase began.

In the modern age, the tools of the game had changed, as had the overall game itself. But in some ways, nothing ever truly changes, and the desires of those involved in the game of romance remained the same. Women enjoyed being chased, desired, even fought over. There was hardly any shame in that, but the modern world had most definitely altered the ways such a game was played. Women had to adapt.

“I will speak to the man.”

“What? Oh god, please don’t. I—”

“Clara, trust me to know how to be graceful, and discrete. The man will not even know what I am doing.”

“This is really fucking weird.”

“Perhaps, but as I said, I do not want us to be enemies.”

“We’re ... we’re not enemies, ok? Enemies are the fuckers I had to deal with in Tijuana. Enemies are the assholes that made Art’s life a living hell until we got him outa there. You and I aren’t enemies.”

Antoinette gestured out toward the booths nearby. Heads were visible over their backs, making it a simple task to see who was engaged in romance with others.

“You act as if romance is hardly a reason for enemies, young werewolf. I have seen houses destroyed over romance. I have seen atrocities you cannot imagine, over romance.”

Clara snorted on a chuckle, the sound mixed with her suppressed sobs. “Sounds like a soap opera.”

“Indeed. I have known kine to kill each other over romance, as I am sure you know. I have known kine to go to war for the love of another. Battles that flooded the streets have been fought over romance. Learn your history, and you will find romance has been at the heart of many wars.”

“Yeah well, I’m not that sort of person.”

Antoinette glared down at the werewolf, and Clara stopped sniffing. “Few who find themselves slaughtering others in a fit of passion and rage think themselves capable of it, Clara Moreno.”

Clara stared up at her as realization set in. “You ... you’ve killed people, over romance?”

“No. At least ... not in the way you think. My relationship with Tony was troubled, and...” She shook her head as she looked down. “My point stands. Your interest in Jack terrifies me, Clara. It terrifies me because Jack has helped me in a way I thought impossible. He has helped me find a joy I could not imagine ever finding again. And it also terrifies me, because I do not like what I imagine I might do, if I ever found myself reliving the tales I described, tales of romance and murder.”

They two looked at each other for a while. Antoinette was being dreadfully honest with someone she did not fully trust, and that was a risk. But if she was to encourage cooperation and understanding in her city, than she had to act as such.

“I believe we are done here,” Antoinette said, and she slid out of the booth.

Clara nodded, joining her. “Just so you know, I’m glad you didn’t kill me.”

“Naturally.”

“I mean it. I ... fuck, I don’t know. This is the last thing I expected.”

“Then I hope this experience has opened your eyes, young werewolf. Not all elder Kindred are heartless monoliths.” With a grin Antoinette walked toward the stairs, and Clara joined her.

“I guess. There’s still a bunch of elders in Dolareido I don’t trust at all.”

Antoinette aimed her grin down at the woman. “You trust moi?”

“Fuck no. But, after tonight, I guess I distrust you a little less.”

“That is something, I suppose.”

Before they reached the stairs, Antoinette turned, and looked down at the one of the booths they walked by.

Of course, Elaine. Her suit jacket and blouse were both open, and she straddled a woman's lap, a short creature with dark skin and frizzy short hair. The kine had both hands on Elaine's naked breasts, along with her lips, and she devoured Elaine's breasts hungrily. A man sat beside her, also of dark skin, shaved head. His fly was down, and he casually masturbated as he watched his wife — she wore a wedding ring, at least — kiss Elaine's bosom.

“Christ you vamps,” Clara said as they walked past, “are all ridiculous.”

“Oh?” Antoinette grinned down at the werewolf as she came to a stop at the railing. A spot they could both watch Elaine as she indulged the touch of the two aroused kine. “You are hardly one to judge. Did you not enjoy Jessy's ghouls? All four of them? At once?”

Clara blushed until her face looked near to bursting. “Everyone knows?”

“Naturally.”

“I was sad, and drunk, and—”

“Clara, my point is not to shame you. My point is, cease your incessant judgments, and enjoy your indulgences. Surely with how many times you have risked your life for worthy causes, you do not feel shame over drowning in an indulgence every so often?”

She looked down at the dance floor below. “I guess not. But I don't view sex as something you just ... do, like eating a fucking chocolate bar.”

“No, I suppose you do not. Though if you did, I would have said you were welcome to join Jack and I in bed, little werewolf.”

Clara blinked up at her, and gulped. “You serious?”

“Of course. You are beautiful. I would have gladly brought you to orgasm a dozen times as you rode my lover’s length. I know Jack would certainly enjoy filling you several times until it poured out of you. But, you have made it clear you do not separate sex from romance, and I will not share Jack with another romantic partner.”

The Uratha, predictably, blushed all the harder, and did not even look Antoinette in the eye as she squirmed. “Yeah. Probably a bad idea.”

Antoinette adopted her devil smile, and serpent voice. “Indeed.”

~~Beatrice~~

The three vampires walked toward the outskirts of the city, on the way to the cave where Elen was kept hidden. Thankfully that meant roads that took them outside main city areas, desert on one side and city on the other, and that meant no kine around. No one to stop them from having a private conversation.

“You think Sándor would take the offer?” Triss asked. “Assuming I can get this ritual working, think he’ll try?”

Jen shook her head. “I don’t know. Maybe? The man is clearly depressed over the death of his family.”

“Imagine that,” Samantha said. When Jen and Triss looked her way, eyebrows raised, she winced and shook her head. “Sorry. That sounded mean.”

Jen put a hand around Sam’s hip, hugged her, and kissed her cheek. Which of course earned a smile from Sam, cause the woman was so totally empathetic, any positivity sent her way had her smiling.

“Sándor visited us a little while ago,” Triss said. “Found Elen. He ... he’s not a stick in the mud or anything. Gives off that vibe, right? But he’s pretty open to stuff.”

Jennifer grinned at Triss, and then Sam. “And, he’s gorgeous.” And of course she said it without stopping her hug.

Sam’s earlier depression vanished, replaced with shy giggles. Too easy.

“He is.”

Triss rolled her eyes. “Oh god, not you too.”

“He is! He’s so stern looking, but kinda dreamy too.”

“Sam, he looks like a taller, older version of your son.”

“That is not true! That ... that is kinda true. But he’s not my son. And besides, Jack is a handsome man.”

Jen laughed. “He is. And Sándor is also definitely a handsome man. A bit tall, lean and muscular, with just enough gruff on his face to look positively beautiful. The deep eyes, blue, dreamy. The defined chin. The buzzed hair works well, I think. But I wonder how he would look with a full mane?”

“Fuck me I’m working with two Daevas. A full mane? He’d look like the dude on romance novel covers. Just brunette instead of blonde.”

“That does sound dreamy,” Sam said. “And ... and agreed, about everything. Sándor really is gorgeous.” She squirmed a bit as she looked down. “Now, don’t be mean! But, he kinda reminds of Viggo, you know? In that scene where they first see him, in Lord of the Rings.” She squirmed a little more. “Jack made me watch it.”

Triss laughed. “They were good movies. And yes, Viggo Somethingsen was stupid hot in that opening scene. Very sizzling.”

“Sándor does remind me of him,” Jen said. “And yes, I saw the movies as well.”

There wasn't any way around it, Sándor was fucking hot as hell. And as much as he gave off those smoldering, brooding stoic vibes, there was definitely more to him than that. Apparently alcohol worked on him, and helped bring out a side to him that really humanized him. Well, maybe not humanized, he was a Begotten. Whatever, he was a lot more interesting than he initially seemed.

Which made all that shit when Jen dragged him to the ball feel really strange now. Triss hadn't really thought about Sándor as anything other than a poor, fucked up dude who'd been royally screwed by life, back then. Now, well, dude was interesting, and hot, and wasn't put off by all the witchy shit Triss was up to. And the widower thing was, horrible as it sounded, kinda hot too.

A sharp jolt shot up from the bag in Triss's hand, right up into her fucking heart. Nothing magical, nothing crazy weird, not witchy, just plain old guilt. She was trying to revive her dead lover, and now she was thinking about Sándor in the exact way Jen had planned. But it wasn't anything Jen had done that'd really changed Triss's outlook on the guy, it was that night he got drunk with them, and talked about his dead family. Triss talked about Julias, for the first time in a long time, and it'd been ... nice.

Plus, he liked metal music, and apparently had a healthy, adventurous sex life with his wife. Which pretty much made him the perfect man.

She refused to think of Sándor that way. Fucking refused. She had a mission, and it made no god damn fucking sense to look for a man for her, when she was trying to revive one. Christ, how fucked up was that? That she was even thinking it? Made her insides hurt like someone was jamming ice shards through her guts.

Jen just thought Sándor would be an awesome fuck; that was her main reason for dragging him into stuff, not romance or anything. And he probably would be. And that gargoyle form was, uh, scarousing. That'd be pretty interesting, honestly, and—

“If ... if he's open minded,” Sam said, “then maybe you should ask him? About reviving his family?”

“Yeah. Yeah maybe I will. I get the impression he'll say no, cause ... cause he's smarter than us.”

“Smarter...” The Daeva sighed as she stepped up close to Triss's side, Jen on her other, and she leaned in to press her head against Triss's shoulder. “Yeah, he probably is. But I don't care. I want my daughter back.”

---

“You sure?”

“I'm sure,” Sam said.

“ ... really sure?”

“Yes! Yes, I'm sure Triss.”

The three of them stood outside the cave entrance on the outskirts of Dolareido, the cave where they kept Elen, and their experiments.

“We've been keeping you out of this for a reason, Sam. Jacob hadn't gotten you involved for a reason, too.” They'd talked about this before. Getting Sam involved in the nitty-gritty of all this shit was a bad idea. Hell, Sam had understood that. Maybe it was because of how long the ritual was taking that Sam wanted to get involved now, or maybe it had something to do with her ghost daughter?

“I know, but I’ve been thinking about it hard, and I ... I need to know more. If I’m going to ask Mary to jump into a body, then I should know how it’s made, beginning to end, right?”

Jen and Triss looked at each other. Yeah, it was a good idea. It was also a good idea to try completing the ritual with Mary’s ghost, before Triss jumped into the deep end and tried grabbing Julias’s soul from across the god damn universe.

Christ this would all be so much easier if he’d turned into a ghost, too. Why hadn’t he? Didn’t feel he had any unfinished business? Fucking asshole.

“Samantha,” Jen said, touching the trembling woman’s shoulder, “we don’t know if Mary’s ghost is truly Mary. We have no idea what will happen if we rebuild Mary’s body, and then ask your daughter to possess it.”

Triss and Sam stared at Jen as the woman pointed out the elephant in the room, and shot it with an elephant gun.

“I know! But ... but shouldn’t we try it with her first anyway? She’s here! And Julias ... Julias isn’t. And you said yourself getting his soul will be the hardest part.”

Hard was an understatement. Jacob and BB had said they had to kill a fuck load of people for just a peek into wherever souls went, and Triss was already pushing it with how many people she’d killed for her resurrection project. If she went after a little more a little faster, she’d get the Prince’s attention. And doing whatever ritual Jacob had done would take a fuck load more than just a dozen.

The only idea Triss had that could work, that wouldn’t leave her a smoldering crater of guilt, was to find a large, maximum security prison, and kill everyone inside. And even that would be fucked up; not everyone in prison deserved to be there. Maybe someone like Jacob could harden himself enough to go on a slaughter spree like that, but she couldn't, and she knew Julias wouldn't want her to.

"It will be," Triss said, shrugging. "Figuring out how to get his soul will be ... a problem. Elen won't die, but she is falling apart, so we need to use her while we can. Get her to build the bodies first, and figure what to do about the souls second. Hopefully since she's immortal, her flesh magic will keep kicking, and keep our ... bodies alive." She almost said zombies.

"Then that means we should make my daughter a body soon, right? If it'll take a long time to do the ritual to get Julias's soul, we might lose Elen as our ... might lose her help before she gets to make Mary a body, right?"

"Yeah, you're right. I don't know long she has left before she's just a pile of meat that won't die, so ... you're right." It was stupid of them to think they could keep Samantha out of this forever anyway.

Triss knew why she didn't want Sam to see all the shit she was up to. Shame. Butchering kine like sheep so she could pursue a ritual for purely selfish goals? Yeah, it was pretty fucked up. She could only hope Julias wouldn't hate her for it. She did everything she could to make sure good kine didn't die for this. Hopefully.

"Alright then," Triss said. "If you're sure."

"I'm sure."

"Because we can't completely trust Elen, Black Blood possesses her. So you're going to be in a room with that ... thing. Dude. Dude thing. Still sure?"

That got a proper shock out of her, but after a few long seconds, Sam nodded again. "I'm sure."

---

Sam covered her face with her hands when Triss pulled down a blanket, exposing a pile of bodies. Inside the cave, with Elen dangling from ropes over a giant metal bowl, the air was thick with the smell of flesh. Not rotting flesh, since Elen knew how to keep it fresh and pulsing, but there was no stopping the smell of skin, blood, and all the other smells that told a vampire wounded prey was nearby. It almost made things worse. A pile of rotting corpses might have been easier to ignore than a pile of perfectly fleshy, borderline alive bodies.

“I ... I thought the ones in the fridge were the only ones.”

Sighing, Triss pulled the blanket back over the bodies, and then stepped over to one body in particular, sitting on a chair by the bowl. A blanket covered this one too, and Triss stared at it for a while before she looked down at the jewelry bag in her hand. Something shifted around inside gently, and didn't seem to show any signs of stopping, so hopefully she had enough time to get things going.

“Elen, I have a piece of Julias here.”

“Oh dear,” the old woman said. “I can sense it. I'm not sure what it is, but I can sense it.” Her voice was hoarse, quiet, but Triss didn't care. Fuck the old woman, she deserved worse than getting hung up by the wrists to dangle over a big bowl. Hell, Jacob originally had her wrists skewered with a giant hook, but the old woman's hands would probably rip off soon, and Triss needed those hands.

“You don't know what it is?” Triss held up the bag.

“I'm not a vampire. You do things differently than I would, dear.”

“Well, the ritual got the piece, and all I know is you need to ... uh ... fuse the piece into the body, and then you know what to do.”

She grinned at that, nodding. “I can do that, dear. I can fuse items into a body, and essence as well. I should be able to fuse whatever you give me.”

Triss eyed the old woman, before looking at the bag again. “And if it’s a soul? Can you fuse a soul?”

“What is a soul? I have played with magic for a long, long time, vampire. I have never seen a soul.”

“You don’t believe in souls?”

Elen smiled. “I never said that, dear.”

The damn woman was so hard to read. Her skin hung off her bones, and every look she gave had serious granny energy, but the words didn’t match. Plus, the whole nearly dead but refusing to die thing made her weird to talk to, every word a scratchy, whispering mess. No wonder the hunters used to go around with an oxygen mask for her.

Beatrice tightened her grip on the bag, and looked to Jen. Jennifer got to work immediately, lighting candles in the small cave. Samantha kept on staring, looking around at the mess, the covered bodies, the dangling old woman who refused to die, and the blood. Blood was everywhere, refusing to fade or rot with Elen’s magic turning the cave into one of her fleshy magic zones or whatever. All in all, it was a terrifying place to someone who wasn’t used to it, and Triss wasn’t used to it, let alone Sam.

It was only going to get worse.

“Black Blood,” Triss said, and she held up her hands, “I summon you.”

With how much death there’d been in the cave, and all the other preparations Jacob had taken to make it a summon-friendly zone,

Triss didn't need to do much to call the spirit. If she wanted Black Blood to have a body to possess, so he could walk around and do shit with his own hands, she'd have to kill someone and immediately call him. But she didn't need that for a friendly conversation. And in this case, he'd have a body to possess anyway.

Black Blood crept into the room as he always did, straight out of a horror movie script. Triss tried to get used to it, hoped it'd get easier to be around, but feeling the stabbing, unnatural cold of his presence as the walls began to bleed black, was too fucking much. You didn't get used to death.

Samantha froze. Her eyes flicked around in panic, but she didn't move, didn't even turn her head. Even when the black ooze began to creep up her legs, she didn't look down, still staring ahead at Elen and the wall behind her as the creeping blackness overwhelmed everything. The candlelight turned into weak little flickers, barely brighter than fireflies, and the still air whispered with the screams of the dead. More of the black ooze flowed into the small cave, seeping out of the bowl Elen dangled from, and from the stones and bones that held the bowl.

Samantha finally squeaked when some of the black ooze literally dripped upward, falling from the floor and splashing against the cave ceiling with all the urgency of a leaky drain. She hugged herself, hands against her biceps, and she backed away toward Jen as she looked left and right. Thankfully Jen caught her, done with the candles. Surprisingly, Samantha didn't jump or freak out at a hand catching her shoulder; too busy looking at the overflowing waves of black ooze that slowly enveloped them all.

It felt like being buried alive. It felt like being trapped deep in the hull of a sinking ship. It felt like getting stabbed in the guts in a dark alley, left to bleed out alone in the darkness. It felt like being locked up in an isolation ward in a straitjacket, with all pleas ignored. It felt like dying.

No wonder Samantha eventually screamed.

Beatrice looked to Sam and motioned down with both hands. “You’re fine, girl. You’re fine. See? We’re all here, alive.”

“Oh my god oh my god oh my god oh my god.” Ok, maybe this was a bad idea after all.

“Now who in the Sam Hill is this?” a Southern accent called from the darkness. Sounded like a regular dude, probably someone in his fifties. Also sounded like an alien creature with a booming, raspy voice.

Sam Hill. It was almost funny.

“This is Samantha Terry,” Triss said. “She wants to see what we’re up to.”

“Oh my, this is Sam Terry? Howdy.” The voice came from everywhere, BB not having picked a body yet. Sure enough, Sam spun around a few times, looking for the source.

“I ... I...”

Triss joined Sam and pat the woman on the shoulder. “Don’t worry about Black Blood. He can’t hurt you. Just don’t make any deals with him, no matter how small, or accept any gifts from him, no matter how small, and you’ll be fine.”

“Now Triss, you wound me.”

“Don’t give me that shit. You’d happily have us sign our souls away on a dotted line if you could make us.”

The darkness around them chuckled. “I don’t know about that. Wouldn’t be no fun if you were my slave. We’re partners. Business partners.”

“Uh huh.”

“Swear to God.”

“Uh huh.”

Again the darkness laughed, merrily at that, before his voice settled. “Samantha Terry. I’ve heard a lot about you.”

Sam, hyperventilating pointlessly, stared at Triss before looking around randomly again. “You have?”

“Malachi talks about you.”

“M-Mala—”

“Jacob,” Triss said. “Old name.”

“Oh. He ... he talks about me?”

“I reckon he talks about you more than anything else these days.”

Despite how obviously terrified the girl was, Sam managed a small smile. “I ... um ... I didn’t know that.”

“Well of course you don’t. Heavens to Betsy, it wouldn’t be very manly for a man to go telling his woman how much he talks about her to his friends.”

Oh god, this conversation was going to drive Triss to drinking. Or, drinkin’.

“I guess so,” Sam whispered.

“I know about your boy, too.”

“Jack? My son?”

“I reckon so. Boy has made a lot of waves. Got a powerful force of will, that boy. You must be proud.”

Naturally, a compliment thrown her son’s way melted a lot of the ice the Daeva was currently buried in. She smiled more.

“I am.”

“Don’t let the smooth talker trick you,” Triss said. “Black Blood is an evil fucking spirit of death and the dead.”

“Well I think that’s a matter of opinion, little missy. Now, did you summon me just to trade barbs, or did you actually have something you wanted to get done?”

Triss held up the bag. “Need you to possess Elen again. I’m gonna put ... whatever’s in this bag on the body. You figure out how to infuse it into the body. Supposedly it should basically create a perfect copy of his body, or something.”

“Well now, that is some mighty fine magic you’re summoning, to get that problem sorted.” Black Blood went silent for a moment, probably analyzing the bag, and how whatever was inside it never held quite perfectly still. “Crúac ritual?”

“Now where did a little witch like you learn a powerful ritual like that? I can do many things with a corpse, but to craft a living body perfectly after a dead person? That’s a sneaky bit of magic right there.”

“Had a visit from the Crone. She gave it to me.”

Silence. But before Triss could speak up, Black Blood jumped in again.

“The Crone paid you a visit.”

“Yeah. Didn’t have to sacrifice people like last time or anything. Totally random.”

Silence again.

“And she gave you a ritual. Why? Out of the goodness of her heart?” The darkness scoffed. “Unlikely.”

“Hey, you wanna take it up with her, be my guest.”

“I’m fixing to.”

Triss did not like the way he said that. That wasn’t the sound of a spirit curious as to why some god entity took an interest in Triss. That was the sound of a spirit who wasn’t happy someone he knew was getting involved in his affairs.

How much of what the Crone said had been about Black Blood?

Triss gulped down her questions, nodded, and motioned to Elen. “Well either way, let’s see if it works.”

Just as Samantha got over her fright of the spirit, she froze again as the black syrup oozed up the bowl, and up the dangling Elen’s tattered old clothes. Triss half expected Sam to start screaming again, but she didn’t, petrified as the obsidian liquid forced its way into Elen’s body. Under her clothes, under her fingernails, her tear ducts, her mouth, and her nostrils.

Elen didn’t fight it. Every night, her mind was a little further gone, and now she didn’t say a word as the spirit forced his way into her. Black Blood insisted even if her mind went, he could still use her magic, use her for years and years until she was nothing but a ball of cancer. Insisted, but also wasn’t completely sure. Fucker was one of those optimistic types.

“There now,” Elen and Black Blood said together, “let’s try out this item you’ve acquired”. Most of the booming rasp was gone, but a hint of it remained, mixing with Elen’s voice, Southern accent gone.

Triss glanced back at Jen and Sam. Sam was pretty much a statue, but Jen stayed close to her, close enough their shoulders touched. Should be enough to keep Sam from freaking out too much. But Triss kept her in the corner of her vision anyway, as she pulled the blanket off the corpse sitting in the chair.

“Oh my god! That ... that ... looks a lot like Julias.”

“You met him?” Triss asked.

“Only a couple times. He’d taken an interest in Jack, and was sort of tutoring, or mentoring him. He ... he was a very nice man.”

Sighing, Triss nodded as she looked to the corpse. “Too nice.”

The body did look a lot like Julias. Considering the amount of people they’d burned through trying to rebuild him, he’d ... it’d look like a fucking Frankenstein’s monster if they had to do it with tools, sewing needles and thread or whatnot. But Elen was a master of flesh magic, and Black Blood was a master of the dead. Together, the two were able to merge corpse flesh like people mixed paint. Strange bedfellows.

With Elen keeping the corpse from rotting, the body sitting in the chair looked like a perfectly normal, attractive dude. Even had blood in his body, keeping his skin looking normal. Eyes closed, he sat in the chair, unmoving, no heartbeat, no brain activity, nothing. If Triss opened his eyes, they’d stay open, lifeless. Last thing she wanted to do was look into the lifeless eyes of a Julias look-a-like corpse.

She jumped up onto the big metal bowl, and helped Elen down from the rope. As Black Blood got comfortable with the body on a chair in front of the corpse, Triss opened a small safe they had in the room. The cave was a good place to store Elen's knife and book, but no way Triss was going to leave the old hag alone with it. So Triss kept a key for the safe, one key, no copies.

She gave Black Blood the knife and book, and with shaking hands, the spirit set the book on her lap, and the knife on the book.

“Alright deary, let's see what the Crone's ritual dug up for you.”

“Don't call me that. You're not Elen.”

“Whatever you say, sweetie.”

For fuck's sake.

“Alright. I ... I haven't seen what's in this bag yet.”

“No time like the present, then.”

Right, no time like the present. No time like now, to reach into a bag and pull out a moving, living thing, that was supposedly the piece of the puzzle needed to craft Julias a proper body. If the vessel wasn't right, jamming Julias's soul into it could lead to some freaky shit according to Black Blood and Jacob. Like, anything from eyes melting in their sockets to straight up rabies symptoms.

If Triss fucked up, they might end up with a fully aware, functioning body walking around with no soul. And who the fuck knew how that'd end up? Jacob had more horror stories, about vessels without souls, constructs and shit, that could think and act but didn't have the spark of life in them. Sometimes they did crazy shit like start eating the hearts of people, convinced they could get a soul that way.

But, fuck it. No guts, no glory. She was a witch, and that meant risking nasty shit. That meant putting her god damn heart and soul into rituals that could leave her a scarred mess. That meant ... becoming like Jacob.

She reached into the bag, half expecting to get bitten by something. But her claws found something smooth, and circular, or spherical. Slowly she slipped her fingers around the shifting thing, and removed something that felt almost like a Christmas ball.

It was glass.

Triss blinked at the ball in her hand. A crystal ball, the size of a baseball, and it gave off a gentle golden light as it gently nudged around in her grip. It teetered on the edge of her hand, and she snapped her other hand up to cup it with both palms.

She was holding life in her hands. Life, or just a memory, she couldn't tell, but the crystal ball softly rubbed against the sides of her hands as images played within it. She stared into the ball, and forced down the rising urge to scream as it showed something she never, fucking ever, wanted to see.

Julias, on his knees, with some kine with a gun behind him. Julias, smiling. His last moments, and his last memories. Scenes of her. A lot of memories of her, playing through his mind.

Her lover had spent his final moments thinking about her.

She had said she'd need to do nasty shit. Christ, how many fucking times had she told herself this ritual stuff would get nasty, in all sorts of ways? Hundreds. But words didn't mean shit when holding the literal final moments of your dead lover in your hands. Final moments, in the form of a crystal ball.

It didn't get much witchier than that. It didn't get much worse than that.

Triss gulped down more screams, silencing every one of them, as she fought against her hands' urge to tremble. Slowly, she forced her eyes away from the repeating memories, and set the bulb against the corpse's chest. The only thing keeping her from drowning in tears was she wasn't Blushing Life.

"Ever see something like this?"

"No," Black Blood said, and his, or her, eyes stared with wonder at the shiny ball. "But I can tell what it is. The last piece of Julias in this world. Not what you expected, I guess?" Grinning, the flesh mage opened her book, and scrolled through the pictures and weird text. "Elen has a spell to merge a body with a magical object. It was meant to be used for protective talismans and the like, but I think it'll work with this."

"This ... This ... Christ, I'm holding..." She shook her head as she gritted her teeth, and refused to look into the ball anymore. "Just hurry up."

Elen nodded, reached out, and sliced into the body with the knife, below the sternum. Message clear, Triss slipped the ball into the corpse's abdominal cavity. Didn't get much closer than being inside.

Elen recited words from her book, and Triss took a step back. No need to be involved anymore, and the idea of the corpse opening its eyes with Julias's eyes was horrifying. What if it spoke? What if it looked right at her, and told her she was a fool for refusing to let him go?

All three vampires gasped, as the body changed shape. Naked as it was, it was easy to see where the changes happened. The muscles, the bodyfat, the hair, all of that changed subtly, enough that it fit his big and strong, lean but not six-pack-abs lean build, but it was a pale comparison to the changes of his face. A sliver of movement for the eyes. A millimeter for the eyebrow ridge. A touch of the ears. A trace of the chin. Tiny changes that each felt like sliding a puzzle piece into place, until she froze at the sight of Julias's face.

Julias took a breath.

“Oh fuck!” Triss jumped back hard enough her head hit the cave ceiling, and she crashed into the ground with a thunk.

Sam did the same, not high enough to hit the ceiling though, and Jen caught her before she fell like Triss did.

Triss scampered to her feet and stared at the corpse. Not a corpse. A living person? Oh fuck oh shit oh fuck oh—

“Relax,” Black Blood said. “The body lives. The mind doesn't. He is an empty shell.”

He. Oh fuck, he. Triss forced herself closer, and stared down at the body of Julias. An exact replica of him, right down to the tuft of chest hair, the waves of his blonde hair combed back, and the very, very kissable lips.

She reached out, and touched them. The body didn't react, but it did breathe. Warm breath. It's not like breathing was something she associated with Julias; they were vampires. But seeing the body sit there, breathing, like a comatose patient, felt real. It felt so fucking real. And as she softly slid the blunt side of her claw along his lip, the heat told her it was real.

“It worked?” Jen asked.

Elen nodded. “So it would seem. The Crone's ritual worked. Once it was inside the body, I had the blueprint to fit the pieces together. It did a lot of the work for me.”

After a few more seconds to recover, Sam stepped closer.

“It worked? That ... that does look even more like Julias.”

Triss nodded. “It’s definitely him, right down to this.” She pointed at a spot on his chin. Julias was clean shaven, but sometimes he woke up from his daily torpor with a single hair on his chin. Something from before he was sired that he sometimes forgot to prevent from regrowing.

Sam gulped as she came even closer, until she touched Julias’s shoulder too. “So ... so if ... if I do the ritual, and we ... get the parts we need, we—”

“We can build your daughter a body.” Triss smiled at the Daeva. “I can’t guarantee anything, and we have no idea what’ll happen if Mary tries to possess it, but ... but it’s worth a shot, right?”

It almost hurt, watching the understanding work through her. Samantha really wore all her expressions on her face, her heart on her sleeve. From terrified to excited to terrified and back again, all as she realized what she had to do, what they all had to do, and then what could happen if things went badly. Triss was tempted to tell her to wait until they got Julias’s soul somehow, but that could take who fucking knew how long. Mary’s ghost was still around.

But if it wasn’t Mary’s soul, but some weird ghostly afterimage thing, the fuck would happen then?

Christ, they were all in over their heads. Even Jacob didn’t fuck with this shit, and Black Blood said souls weren’t something he could affect. It was all so big, so beyond a few vampires fucking around with crap. They were kids playing with their dad’s gun.

But Julias sat right there in front of her. A breathing, living body. Elen’s magic would keep him preserved, giving Triss the time she needed. She couldn’t waste this opportunity.

“Let’s do it,” Samantha said, and she clutched her necklace. “Let’s do it. I owe it to Mary to try. I ... I owe it to myself!”

Triss grinned. Wow, a pretty huge breakthrough for Samantha to say something as selfish as that. Good. The woman was so nice and giving, she was the last person on Earth that deserved the shit that came her way. Dead husband, dead son, sorta, and dead daughter, sorta, and woke up a vampire, not her choice. Woman needed some god damn happiness in her life. Sure, she was really enjoying being with Jacob, and the Circle was pretty damn good at soothing woes with mountains of sex, but if she could have her daughter back, just imagine how much happier she’d be.

Imagine how much happier they’d all be, if they could have their dead loved ones back.

~~Jack~~

The next night, Jack sat in his mansion, on the stairs in the main lobby. There were much more comfortable places to sit than some big stairs; shit wasn’t carpet, or even wood, it was marble or something. His ass did not appreciate. But he didn’t care, he had thinking to do. And a habit he picked up when he was younger was sitting on the stairs between his living room and upstairs hallway. Mary and his mom would have to step over him or around him. And one time, his dad had tripped on Jack’s leg going up the stairs, and chipped a tooth. That day ended in a grounding.

“Veronica,” he said, “what do you think of Antoinette?”

“The Prince?” Veronica stood near him, wearing her modern maid outfit — with one too many blouse buttons undone — and she looked up at him from her spot at the bottom. “She’s beautiful and brilliant, master.”

“Be frank, Veronica. What don’t you like about her?”

“Don’t like? She ... I mean, I haven’t spent any time with her except ... sexually.”

“But?”

“But ... she um, she’s definitely ... not, um, like most people. Like ... people. Her and Elaine, they’re so ... calculated. Every word, every movement, everything is all so perfected and controlled.” She smiled as she looked down. “They’re gorgeous. But I wouldn’t want to be caught alone with them. I feel like they wouldn’t hesitate to use me as a shield if someone shot at us.”

Jack grinned. Yeah, that was one way of looking at it. Elaine and Antoinette wouldn’t give a shit about bullets, but they would definitely use a thrall as a shield if they had to for some reason. Not a ghoul though, someone they poured life, time, and energy into. Right? The idea of Antoinette sacrificing Ashley and Julee if she had to, to achieve her goals, was sickening. But if she was willing to risk his mom’s life, why not theirs?

Because there’s a difference between dooming someone, and making a calculated risk, Jack. Calm the fuck down.

Jack sighed as he clutched the necklace Elaine gave him. “You’re not entirely wrong.”

“But, you love her, right? I’m sure there’s good reasons. I trust your judgment, master.”

Ah yes, the mindless devotion of the Vinculum. That was something he was quickly getting used to, something all elders were probably completely used to, maybe even bored of. Given enough time, Jack would think and act in the same way as Antoinette, or Elaine. Or even Jacob.

But Jack would either eventually turn Veronica into a ghoul, and then a vampire, or he’d ween her off his blood, and then wipe her memory so she could go back to her old life. He didn't have the stomach to be heartless, not when it came to people who didn't deserve pain.

“There are a lot of good reasons I love her. But we're having a bit of a fight, and ... No, never mind. Forget I said anything. That's an order.”

She stood up straight. “Yes master.”

He couldn't help but smile at that. Straight to the ego. He doubted all thralls were so subservient, but Veronica definitely gave that vibe, that ‘please master I've been a good girl, praise me love me fuck me’ vibe. Antoinette probably figured that out before picking her as a thrall for Jack. And honestly, she had been the one to pick her, not Jack. She picked well, cause god damn, the way Veronica looked at him, the happy sex slave look, struck a chord in him he didn't know was there. Maybe it was the Ventrue part of him, or just the guy part of him, he didn't know.

“The mansion looks clean.”

“Thank you master! It wasn't all that dusty, and there wasn't really much to clean upstairs. The ... the basement is harder.”

The dungeon. Yeah, upstairs in the mansion, it needed maintenance, but without regular people walking around, there wouldn't be much dust. The dungeon on the other hand was underground, and got damp and stuff. And there was outside the mansion, the huge lawns, the statues, the fountains, all of that needed maintenance too.

He needed more thralls.

“It's a big place.”

“It is, master.”

“It’ll need more than only you to take care of it.”

“I ... You’re right, master. I can try, but places like this usually have a crew working on it, I think. Yard workers, gardeners, cleaners and stuff. I don’t think you’ll need a big crew, unless you had humans over frequently, and a lot of them.”

“Definitely not.”

“I’ll do what I can, master. But ... did you have others in mind?”

“I don’t know, but Antoinette would. She knows what I li—need.”

“You trust her with everything, don’t you master?”

“Pretty much, yeah.” Much as he didn’t want to admit it right now, he did trust Antoinette with everything. He didn’t want to trust her with his mom’s life, but she wasn’t really his mom anymore, she was Antoinette’s childe. And even if she wasn’t, Antoinette wasn’t doing what she was doing because she was an asshole. She was doing it because it’d potentially save her city, and the lives inside it.

He hated that he agreed with her.

Chapter 150

~~Jack~~

He took a deep, useless breath, then another, and another, before pressing the elevator button. Up to the top floor. Up to Antoinette.

He stepped off the elevator and stared at the big door that opened to Antoinette's enormous main office. What to say? How to come at the conversation? What angle, what trick, what stance? He'd walked through a thousand different possibilities in his head, a thousand different ways the conversation might go, and he knew he wasn't a tenth as prepared for it as Antoinette was. She'd probably had this exact conversation with people before, or something like it at least; she'd had millions with how old she was.

So, what the fuck was he gonna do? Hell, he didn't actually disagree with her, and he hated himself for that. And it wasn't like they knew what was going on. Azamel was convinced the tears Black Blood was creating were dangerous, for everyone. Ok, fine. Now Natasha said a spirit was convinced Black Blood was trying to do what Minerva was up to, and that might potentially be apocalyptic. Ok, fine. Jacob and Minerva were lovers, very close, and there was no way Jacob didn't have at least some interest in what Minerva used to be up to when she was alive. Ok, fine.

Fuck. Fuck! He couldn't trust Jacob, but he couldn't quite come to the conclusion the dude was out to kill everyone. The bastard was strange, maybe a little psycho, but Triss wasn't, and Triss had grown pretty devoted to the guy. And if Triss thought his mom was in danger, she'd do something.

Of course, Triss was getting neck deep into dark magic shit, and considering what she was up to, it was only a matter of time before his mom get involved. And that idea was almost as terrifying as Black Blood's tears dooming the city. If something happened, something involving Mary, and it turned into a fucking horror movie, what would his mom do? She couldn't even watch previews for horror movies without getting scared.

Jack slapped himself in the face. Focus. This isn't about your mom. This isn't about Black Blood or Jacob. Right now, this is about a stupid turf war between two stupid elders who don't know how to let go of a grudge. He had to get this situation fixed now.

He knocked on the office door. It opened, revealing the sheriff, who gave Jack a small nod before he backed off and joined Antoinette by the desk.

And there she sat, face neutral, hands on the arms of her chair, sitting straight up. Power pose. She probably thought he was here to argue about his mom. Well—

“How was Clara's visit?”

Oh fuck. Oh shit fuck. The shock on his face — he knew it was there — sealed the truth before he could say a fucking word. Fuck fucking fuck.

“You were spying on me?” When in doubt, deflect.

“I spy on everyone, Jack. This is my city.”

He sighed as he looked at her. If she was angry or offended, she didn't let it show, but considering what they were talking about, there was a good chance she was angry. Livid, maybe. Tear his throat out, just possibly.

“You don't trust me?”

“One of my thralls spotted you with a drone, Jack, and decided the footage warranted sending me.”

A drone. Well, the future was now, he had to be conscious of that. Maybe Scully or Mulder could drop some rocks on them?

“Alright. But I’m not here to talk about Clara, and I’d prefer to move on.”

Antoinette’s steel eyes were impervious. “Yes, perhaps that is for the best. For now.”

He did his best to hold her gaze. He managed, barely.

“I need your help.”

“Oh?”

“Yes. I need to break our no business rule.”

“I will not help the Invictus win this war, Jack, you know that.” At least she was calling him Jack, and not Mister Terry.

“I know. This isn’t about winning it, this is about ending it. I’m trying to do you a favor.” And himself. Last thing he wanted was a bunch of dead people. Last thing he wanted was to be the one killing them. Last thing he wanted was the Ripper getting another foothold in his mind.

“Ending it? I am powerful, Jack. My sheriff is powerful. But I have used diplomacy to rule this city, not an iron fist.”

“You say that like you don’t have the ability to wipe out both Invictus and Carthians.”

She grinned, sly and smooth. “Perhaps.”

She was too smart to not have a bunch of shit set up for all out war if she absolutely needed it. Thralls, enslaved with either the Vinculum or her Majesty, trained and ready to die for her. Hidden explosives. Secrets she knew about people. Hell, it wouldn't surprise him if she had a nearby military base under her control, and if shit hit the fan, she could launch anything from a coordinated military raid, to a fucking missile strike.

But those were all end game options. If she used them, her vampire utopia would be ruined, the streets turned into rubble, with open war waged in the open. She'd have to start over.

“I need to get Michael and Garry in a room together.”

“Now that the two have declared open hostilities, they have refused to join my Primogen meetings until such hostilities have ended.”

“Not there. I need them together somewhere where it's a lot more ... where they can tear into each other.”

She leaned back in her chair. “Ah. You wish to recreate the scenario between Tony and Viktor.”

“Yeah.”

“That scenario took months of effort to craft, Jack. Years. I did not simply throw pieces of bait into the city, and watch the two men run headlong into danger.”

“I understand that, but this time you'll have better bait.” He walked up to her huge desk and set his hands on it. Negotiator mode. “Roland.”

“Michael's dead childe.”

“Michael blames Garry. Garry blames Michael.”

“That was a hundred years ago.”

He shrugged. “So? You telling me vamps don’t hold grudges? If anything, Kindred suck at dropping grudges. We’re all stuck.”

“That is ... not entirely untrue, though Kindred can evolve their minds. It is difficult, and takes effort, but we are capable. You are partially correct. Kindred do struggle to move on, trapped in our unchanging biology.”

“Exactly. I think Roland is a big part of why Michael and Garry hate each other.”

The Prince slowly nodded as she looked up. “Yes, I have always suspected as much. But you can confirm?”

“Maria told me. Details about Roland are uh ... a little more personal than I expected. His death wasn’t the sort of thing anyone would just forget. In another city, I’m sure Michael would have killed Garry for it. But not in Dolareido. And Michael’s been resenting Garry ever since ... and probably you, for how Dolareido is run, that he can’t just go kill Garry without upsetting you.”

Kindred on Kindred violence hadn’t exactly been outlawed, but the Prince had made it pretty damn clear it was discouraged. Killing an important Kindred would be a recipe for disaster. That sort of shit had led to the purge of the Lancea et Sanctum.

“You believe I should exploit the emotional attachment those two men had to Roland, and lure them into a confrontation, with their fury as the guiding beacon?”

“Yeah. Get them angry. Get them very angry. Get them so angry they can’t think straight, and barking like rabid animals.”

“Doable. They are Gangrels, after all.”

“Exactly. You get them livid and furious with each other, and trick them into doing something dumb. Maybe drop a hint about a cheap shot they could take to hurt the other, something they’d know would be taken personally by the other, something they couldn’t pass up on.”

“That, I believe, I can do.” Antoinette’s grin grew. “A devious plot. Well done.”

“Yeah well, I’ve run out of ideas on how to fix this. Azamel suggested this, not my idea.”

Apparently Antoinette wasn’t convinced, judging from the grin.

“I am sure.”

“Whatever. You going to help me or not?”

The grin vanished. “Jack, do not be curt with me. I am the one with grounds to be upset.”

“What, because of Clara? I said we can talk about it later.”

“I wish to speak of it now. You knew very well Clara is romantically interested in you, and yet you invited her into your apartment.”

“Excuse me for wanting to talk to a friend! Christ Antoinette, I ripped off her fucking arm. The whole damn city is terrified of me, and I thought for sure she would be too, but she isn’t. I just wanted to talk to her.”

“And is that all you did?”

“That ... She kissed me, ok? She kissed me, but I stopped it.” Eventually. “And I explained that nothing was going to happen between us. I'm fucking pissed at you, but I'm not a moron. And I'm not unfaithful, you know. How can you even—"

"I spoke to Clara."

Jack took a step closer until his knees almost touched her desk. "You fucking what?"

Daniel took a step forward as well, and Jack slowly turned his head to glare at the man. But before they could say anything, the Prince held up a hand.

"Daniel, please leave us." She didn't look her sheriff's way, keeping her hard gaze locked on Jack.

"You sure?"

"Oui, I am sure."

With a stone cold gaze, Daniel adjusted his glasses with a single finger against the bridge, nodded, and left. One glance over the shoulder before he opened the door, and closed it behind him.

"I said, I spoke to Clara." Antoinette met his gaze again, though he didn't see anger there. Frustration, sadness, subtle in her practiced stare, but not anger. "And I admit that, perhaps in the heat of my rage, I thought you had betrayed me. But it was a fleeting thing, and I quickly realized that nothing would happen between you two. I trust you."

"I ... thank you. But, then if you went to see her anyway, you ... Oh fuck, did you kill her!?"

"Non."

"Hurt her?"

“Non.” The fact she didn’t react to the absurdity of any of these things struck him cold. God damn.

“Then ... what did you speak about?”

“Her relationship with you. Her inability to see how doomed it would be, regardless of whether I was a factor.”

“I ... That...” He didn’t disagree. Strange as Antoinette and Jack were together, and as different as they were, they also had a lot in common. A lot of shared interests. A lot of shared passions. He woke up excited to talk to Antoinette about stuff.

He knew damn well he’d have basically nothing to talk to Clara about. They liked each other a lot, and were attracted to each other, but it took more than that to have a lasting relationship.

“And Clara understands that,” she continued. “It was a painful conversation for her, but she understands that. Harcourt is a better match for her, but—”

“He doesn’t really know how to, uh, be a ‘man’ about it.” He air-quoted ‘man’.

She grinned. “Oh? You spoke with Clara about Harcourt?”

“Yeah. Before she ... yeah. I talked to Harcourt yesterday too, after that, and I think I gave him a decent nudge in her direction.”

“Oh Jack, please tell me you were discrete?”

“Um.” He scratched his buzzed head as he thought about it. “ ... no, definitely not.”

Sighing, Antoinette rolled her eyes and stood up. She motioned for him to follow as she stepped over to the giant window behind her chair.

“You made a mistake, inviting Clara into your apartment. I understand you were trying to salvage your friendship, but you put her into a dangerous and painful position.”

He groaned as he joined her in front of the window. “Maybe.”

“But I made a mistake as well. The thought of her touching you, had me ready to murder her. I made a terrible assumption, and went to her quite willing to end her.”

“But you didn’t.”

“No, I did not, and while I like to believe I never would have, it was when I saw her ... her expression, as she returned to her den, that I realized I was being foolish.”

Her expression?

“You know I’d never cheat on you, Antoinette. I mean, yeah I’m angry at you, at the situation, but it’d take more than this to end the relationship, right? And even if I’d decided to end it, I wouldn’t touch any girl until we’d talked, right? I mean come on, this is me. The one thing, the one damn thing I got going for me, is I stick to my guns.” Sticking to his guns was a nice way to put it, an ego-stroking way. Truth was, he pretty much couldn’t break his word. It didn’t compute, didn’t resolve in his brain.

“I know.”

“And, I was telling Arturo and Matthew this, but ... there needs to be room in a relationship to be angry at each other. Problems happen. Mistakes happen, right? I mean, I know I’m preaching to the choir here, but—”

“I have forgotten more about the nature of human interaction than others will ever know, my love. But I became an observer of such things centuries ago, not a true participant.”

“I guess. I ... I’m just trying to say, we can get into arguments about stuff, and not worry about the relationship disappearing. Even about serious stuff like ... like what to do about Mom. We need to be able to trust each other.” Talking about relationships was hard, and awkward, and painful. And it sounded dumb saying shit like that, but they needed to be said, because they were true.

“I trust you, my love. I do not trust others. They will manipulate you, lie to you, deceive you, or take advantage of your honesty. Our relationship is precious to me in a way a child like Clara will never understand.”

He looked up at her, but she kept her gaze on the window, and her city, even as her expression softened into something pained and sad. To her, their relationship was more than a romantic one, it was something she was sure no elder her age could ever have. Combined with her Daeva tendencies, Antoinette was possessive. Smart enough to realize it, but still a slave to it.

It was a weird relationship, and he wouldn’t trade it for the world.

He turned, faced her, and gave her a small shove. Tall as she was, a foot taller than him, reaching her shoulders required reaching up a bit, but he managed.

She stumbled a little, something he didn’t think he’d ever seen her do before.

“I beg your pardon?”

He smiled up at her, and gave her another shove. Apparently being shoved by him was something so unexpected, she couldn’t imagine it ever happening twice, because she stumbled back again.

“Jack! You—”

“Antoinette. I know you think you need to be the ancient vampire in everything, all the time, even when you’re with me. But you know I know you’re still a person, right? Not a god or statue or something.”

“What are you—”

“I’m saying ... relax.”

She blinked down at him. “You are telling me, to relax? You? The boy with the weight of the world on his shoulders?” She said that last part sarcastically.

He shrugged. “You’re right you’re right. What I’m trying to say is, when it comes to ... to us, to you and me? We’re solid, ok? Like ... like...” He blinked at her, then down at the floor. “Like, you ... you know I want to spend the rest of my life with you, right? That includes the arguments and butting heads. I mean, fuck, I was getting worried that we never butt heads! It was too good, too perfect, too surreal. We should argue sometimes. Arguing is real.”

Score one for Jack, he’d managed to surprise the five-hundred-year-old Daeva.

“You wish to argue more?”

“I want a relationship where we can feel comfortable arguing. Little things, serious things. I want you to be comfortable knowing I’m not going to abandon this relationship just because we aren’t perfectly in agreement about everything all the time.” He looked down and squirmed a little. “I’d ask you to marry me, you know? If it made sense for us. If...”

“If I was not Prince. If I was not of the Ordo Dracul.” With a heavy, but happy sigh, Antoinette spun her chair around to face the window, and sat. “But, please understand the sentiment is received, my love. There is little I would not do for you. For us. And with my childe, it ... it is a decision I made not only because I felt it necessary, but also because, despite the strain I knew it would put on our relationship, I knew ... felt, it would survive it.”

He laughed as he walked up to her, and took her hands into his. At least with her sitting, he was taller than her.

“But a visit from Clara and you freak out?”

“I did not freak out. Ancient vampires such as myself are beyond freaking out. We ... enact our will.”

“Uh huh.” He kissed her hand, and came in closer, until his knees were touching hers. “I ... I mean, I’m still angry about the situation with Mom. But I don’t really disagree with you about what you’re doing either. I guess maybe I’m angry at myself for not being...”

“Cruel enough, to potentially sacrifice your mother to save others? Come now Jack, no one should be forced to make such a decision. It was part of the reason I did not ask you. I knew it needed to be done, and if I laid the decision at your feet, you would tear yourself apart making it.”

He groaned as he nodded. “You’re too damn smart.”

“That I am.”

“Humble too.”

“Of course. Though I am no Ventrue.”

And back to laughing. “Clara thinks all this tactical, cold reasoning doesn’t hold up when the bullets start flying. That it’s will and love for your ... fellow soldiers I guess, that really save the day.”

“Do you believe her?”

“I mean, kinda? I guess I only believe that, when it’s about the heat of the moment.”

“As you said, when the bullets fly.”

“Yeah. I think if I wanted a military general making macro decisions, I’d want you.”

“You would do well in such a position, Jack.”

“Maybe.” And probably hate himself every day of it. He sighed, and as he leaned in, she leaned in too. With him still standing, he set his forehead down against hers, and they held each other’s hands in a ball on her knees together. “I won’t tell Mom.”

“Thank you.”

“Clara won’t either.”

“That is good.” She tilted her head upward, and kissed him.

He kissed her back. “I uh, wanted to talk about Michael and Garry. Things are getting pretty bad. The fighting’s getting worse. That whole thing with sparing Tilly, I’d hoped it’d calm him down and get him to back off, but...”

“He is angry, Jack. Angry to the core of his being. And perhaps, no longer reasonable.”

“I know that feeling.”

“Do not we all.” She grinned and kissed him again. “I will do what I can. With emotions as the bait, perhaps I will be able to have the two dogs chasing it easily enough. I will need ... two weeks. Do you believe you can keep their turf war managed until then?”

“Two weeks? Maybe. Amanda, she...”

“What? A secret?”

“Kinda, yeah. It’s Invictus business, but ... I know Amanda’s still alive. Michael staked her. Has her stored somewhere.”

Antoinette pulled back a couple inches. “Michael has tricked Garry. He has tricked me.”

“Kinda, yeah.”

“I should—”

“If you do, Michael will know I told you. This is an Invictus thing, and I shouldn’t have told you.”

“But you did.”

“Because something’s going on,” he said. “Michael didn’t stake her against her will. If that’d been the case, he might have just killed her outright. But Michael isn’t that colossal an asshole.” She raised a brow, unconvinced, but he set his hands on her shoulders. “He isn’t. The thing that concerns me, is it seems like he didn’t take Amanda against her will.”

“Oh?”

“Yeah. I don’t know enough details, but I do know she let him stake her. Maybe Michael’s blackmailing her, maybe not. But there’s something weird going on. The timing of this turf war is just too perfect.”

She nodded. “Indeed it is. I constantly find my attention diverted by it. I am ... researching avenues to deal with Black Blood, options, but my thralls bombard me not with information of the spirit, but of Garry and Michael and their infuriating skirmishes. If they violate the Masquerade, I will need to squelch the issue, and I have been forever preparing to deal with those two if such a problem arises. It will get violent.”

“I’ll do what I can. But if we don’t get this issue between them resolved, they’ll keep pushing until someone dies or crosses the line.”

She nodded as she leaned back in her chair, but she didn’t let go of his hands either. “We will fix this. And then we will deal with Black Blood, you and I.”

“Ha. Partners?”

“Indeed.” Nodding again, she pulled him in to her, and before he knew it, she’d turned him around and set him on her lap. “I missed you last night, my love.”

“Because of—”

“You were not with me, and I admit that the troubles that befall my city have left me frustrated and stressed.”

Frustrated and stressed was what Antoinette used to describe Jack, as a precursor to sex. After those words, he’d usually wind up sitting or lying down, and Antoinette would be treating him to some sexual de-stressing.

Message received. He laughed, and turned on her lap. Yeah, she was a foot taller than him, a lean-but-curvy goddess, and he fit pretty damn comfortably on her lap. He nuzzled his head into the groove of her shoulder and neck, undid one of her jacket buttons, and another.

~~Eric~~

He stared across the river, into the city of concrete and fake light. Behind him was the forest, chirping with crickets and caressing his fur with a breeze smelling of bark and grass and moss.

“I’m dreaming.” Easy enough to tell that. He was in his wolf body, sitting on his haunches, and was able to talk without actually moving his mouth.

“Yes, you are,” the shining light above said. Above and below, the moon’s reflection shimmering in the river.

“Haven’t talked to you in a while.”

“I have been busy, young Uratha.”

“Busy?”

“Do not ask. I am not allowed to speak of it.”

Not allowed to speak of it? What sort of things could a moon goddess not talk about?

“Alright.”

“You are soon to work with Avery to investigate the tears in Dolareido.”

“I am.”

“How do you plan to deal with the blood wraiths that guard the tears?”

He shrugged, as much as a wolf could shrug. “You don’t know? Seems you’ve been eavesdropping.”

“I ... am not omniscient.”

“Big of you to admit that.”

“My reach is far, and my power vast, Uratha. Or did you think I had not touched this city?”

“Touched the city?”

“Surely you have enjoyed its sexual indulgences.”

“You—oh. Us being in better control of our Gauru form. Kinda thought one of the big sex spirits in the city was responsible for that.”

The moon shimmered a little more. “I would be lying if I said I did not consult with them. The choir of sexual spirits in Dolareido are powerful.”

“A moon spirit colluding with sex spirits to ... what, let Uratha fuck more?”

“I need not explain myself to you. But I am happy to know you have been indulging my gift.”

He laughed. “Jessy has been, anyway.”

“Surely you have as well. The power, the desire, holding her naked body and forcing your immense length into her insides, to—”

“Not going to talk about my sex life with some spirit god that gave me a curse I didn’t ask for.”

“Curse?”

“Being a werewolf.”

“I gave you a gift.”

“Uh huh. You knowing I fucking ate someone my first night transformed?”

“I do.”

“You think I wanted that?”

“How is your knee, young Uratha?”

He growled as he paced the river shore. “I suppose you think you can do whatever you want. Us humans are just pawns for you fuckers to play with.”

“I think you do not understand the game if you think you are but a piece on a chess board.” The moon sighed, somehow. “Regardless. How are you, Eric?”

“I ... I’m fine.”

“Do not lie.”

“Alright, better than fine. I’m great. My knee’s healed. I’m in the best shape of my life. I got an amazing girlfriend. I make great money. Dad’s out of the hospital and happily retired.” And probably looking at pictures of his girlfriend’s tits. “But I’m also neck deep in life or death shit.”

“You were always in danger, Eric. Now you can actually do something about it.”

“I still don’t know why me. It’s not like I’m—”

“No, it’s not like you are special. But Dolareido has been at the center of rising events for a while now. Others like me are here, and we’re invested in the outcome.”

“You mean the tears? And Black Blood?”

Silence.

“Luna, if you know about what’s going on, you have to tell me.”

“I am bound by the rules, as are the others.”

“Others?”

“Continue as you are, and you will learn more, I am sure.”

He grumbled and groaned and shook his head. “Why are you here, visiting my dream then, if I’m not important?”

“You represent my presence in this city.”

“Do I?”

“You do. Be thankful. It is why I speak to you. I wish to grow my presence in these walls.”

“Why?”

Silence, for a moment. But after a few seconds, the breeze in the forest grew to a hard wind, the river rippled under its power, and the distant city went quiet.

Rustling in the bushes. Eric turned around, and froze. A white wolf. The larger wolf crept out from the woods, deep eyes shining with stars of their own as she approached.

It didn’t feel like a dream anymore. It felt very real.

“Things are happening in this city, so I touched it with my hand. Enjoy the gifts I have given you,” the big scary white wolf said.

“But ... what?”

“I cannot tell you.”

“Then why tell me anything?”

“Because I am happy to see the fruits of my labor have helped someone.” She came closer before she walked past him, and sat by the river beside him. Close. He was so close to her. And dream or not, he could feel the power radiating from her, like standing in the eye of a hurricane. “Maybe things will be different in this city in the future. Maybe my children will find a little happiness, instead of this endless march to fulfill their father’s duty.”

“Father?”

“Father Wolf.”

Father Wolf, a mythic figure he knew next to nothing about. Except, what Avery had told him, about how his children killed him, and doomed the world to this weird split between physical and material. Sounded like a load of shit to Eric, but a moon goddess was sitting next to him. You could only take denial so far.

“I ... see.”

“I miss him, you know.” The white wolf shook her head and patted the water once with a paw. “And perhaps I made a mistake in my anger. My children have ... fought hard, carrying his burden, even the stubborn ones like you.”

“I’ve done his duty?”

“Are you not doing what you can to keep the spirits in Dolareido under control? Sneaking away into the Hisil to kill those you consider problematic?”

“I ... I was just helping out my city.”

“And that is why I chose you. Not because you are special, but because you consider this city yours, and it is this city that I consider special.” Sighing again, she lowered herself until she lay on the river shore. “Maybe my children will find a little respite here.”

“Are you, uh, giving the Uratha a break? Like, fifteen-minute break from work, in Dolareido? Cause this is just one city, and it’s not like I’ve been doing this Uratha gig long.”

“Perhaps with time, things will be different. Be happy that I am testing what can be done here and now, as my temper has ... waned.”

“Temper? How long ago did Father Wolf die?”

“Tens of thousands of years. A blink of the eye in the lifespan of Gaia.”

That was true. If the Luna spirit really was a spirit form of the moon, however that worked, yeah she’d been around for hundreds of millions of years. And the idea that he was sitting next to her was too damn big to wrap his mind around.

“What ... What is Dolareido to you, Luna? What’s so special about it?”

“I cannot tell you. But I am sure you will find more on your own.”

“But—”

“No more questions. I am not here to indulge your curiosity. I am here to see how you are doing, how you are enjoying my gifts, and to ... settle my guilt, I suppose.”

“Guilt?”

“It is my will that Uratha are to bound to Urfarah’s duty, these ... Forsaken children of ours. Perhaps they will not be so forlorn ... within Dolareido’s walls.”

At this point, he gave up asking. Either she didn’t answer, or her answers were beyond him.

But she'd made one thing obvious: she felt bad. Guilty about something she'd done thousands of years ago. Sad her, uh, lover was dead. Maybe lonely? The fuck did he know about spirits that were basically gods?

"Mason," he said, "he told me about what happened to him, when he first transformed. Killed and ate a bunch of idiot punks. Then he spent months just wandering around, life ruined. Everything was hard for him. Avery found him, and life got better. But he tells me Dolareido's the best place he's stayed, the only place he's lived in that, as an Uratha, he feels like he can be who he is."

Luna lifted her head, looked at him, nodded in a gesture his wolf brain recognized as a wolf's equivalent of a smile, and set her head back down on the river's edge.

"This city is a respite for more than just Uratha. I hope it stays that way. I hope you all survive."

Well, that was certainly foreboding, and he really wasn't up for more foreboding. Things had been foreboding for far too long, but he knew Luna wouldn't answer his question. She wasn't here for him. She was here for herself, and he was just the closest ear she had.

Who else like her was in Dolareido? As much as someone like her could be 'in' a city. Black Blood? Did they exist on the same level? So many questions, and she was going to leave him in the dark about all of it. And honestly he'd prefer to not know about any of it. Just let him keep doing what he was doing. Don't tease him with information about gods playing games.

Was that so bad? Just let a man enjoy his new werewolf life. Sure it had some shitty parts, and he constantly found himself driven by some sort of instinct, demanding he hunt spirits and look for weird balance problems between the Hisil and Gurihal. But the health, the power, the sex drive, it was all amazing. He was happier than he'd ever been. And now she was hinting that it might all go up in flames.

But there wasn't any point in bitching about it. So, after looking down at the literal god paying his dream a visit, he did the only thing he could do. He lay down beside her, and watched the reflection of the moon in the river, and the reflection of the city lights across the way.

~~Damien~~

One week later.

Somehow, no one had died yet. It'd gotten close. Jack had been involved in three skirmishes, and had caused serious injury to half a dozen Kindred. Damien had been in one, and had been shot several times. Jessy had been in half a dozen, and had beaten up and been beaten up as many times.

Two buildings had been burned down. Thankfully they were office buildings in North Side. One had been abandoned after the industrial boom, but another hadn't; empty at the time, thank the Lord. The Masquerade was still intact, but burning buildings made the Prince angry. She made that anger felt when she sent the sheriff knocking on their doors. He didn't give an order, barely said a word, but both the Invictus and Carthians got the message: damage to the city was frowned upon.

But Damien doubted Garry or Michael would listen. Maria would. She cared about the city, and the potential to slowly revive the Lancea et Sanctum within it. Michael and Garry did not. Like Jack said, they were dogs, barking at each other over a fence. But unlike most dogs, they were willing to fight and fight hard the moment someone gave them a nudge.

Damien peered through his telescope. He'd moved it to a better position, where he could watch the main street that crossed much of the city. A straight road, peering down its length allowed him to see all the way to the Carthian district. If anything strange happened, he might catch it before it showed up on the news. Might even catch some Carthian activity, and stop a fight.

But he wasn't looking down the streets to watch the Carthians at the moment. Right now, he was adjusting the focus and pointing it at nearby buildings, the tall buildings of the South Side entertainment district, and their enormous windows.

He stepped back, and Fiona stepped in.

"I can see!"

"Remember how to change the focus?"

"Aye! Aye I got it. I ... wow. Ye can see everything!"

Nodding, he sat down on the rooftop's raised edge, and looked down below. They were on one of the apartment buildings, shorter than the others, cause it meant the telescope could get a better angle seeing directly into the windows of other buildings. Peeping, obviously, but in Dolareido, people wanted to be peeped on. The windows were massive for more than sight seeing, but also being the sight.

Fiona burst into giggles a second later. She found one.

"Ah, gross! There's an old couple fucking on a sex swing!"

Try as he might, Damien couldn't help but laugh as well. "There's a lot of exhibitionists and whatnot in Dolareido, and they're not limited by age."

She groaned and pretended to vomit, but she was smiling. “I suppose it’s cute. The power of viagra!”

“Probably.”

She turned the telescope a bit. “This couple is ... two lads with little miniatures on a ... big table that looks like a ... battlefield?”

“You thought every window was going to be a perfect porn display, didn’t you?”

“The first one was! If I was eighty!”

Damien rolled his eyes, got behind his girlfriend, and gently nudged the telescope to point toward Jessy’s building. “Sixteenth floor, corner room. Jessy’s room.” Fiona moved her head a second and he doubled checked. “Yeap, that’s it.”

“Ye know where her apartment is?”

“Through no fault of my own, I promise. But I examine the city regularly, and Jessy had a habit of having sex in front of her window with her four ghouls. An orgy, against a giant window, is kinda hard to miss.”

“Ah bugger, blinds are closed now.”

“If you wanted to watch her have sex, just ask. She’ll give you a video or stream it or something.”

She laughed as she stood up and grinned at him. “Ye dinnae mind?”

“Born and raised in a city of sin, and then fifty years hiding in its sewers and tunnels. Pretty desensitized to public sex.”

“Aye, but I mean, most lads can get pretty prissy about their girls seeing other lads fucking.”

“I guess.” He shrugged, and gestured to the telescope. “The Lancea et Sanctum teach humility.”

“Ha. Are ye humble?”

“It wouldn’t be very humble of me to say I am humble.”

“But ye said the ... the...” Laughing again, she looked back into the telescope, and scanned nearby buildings. “Ooh, I see something good! Pretty lad, pretty lass.” She paused for a moment before she squealed and giggled. “He’s fucking her ass!”

Well, he couldn’t resist an invite like that. Promptly, he gave Fiona a nice slap on the ass. She jumped up with a squeak, turned around, punched him in the shoulder, blushed, and looked back through the telescope to hunt for more exhibitionists.

“You said you didn’t like anal,” he said. He hadn’t ever prompted her for anal, never asked, but they had talked about the things they liked. Damien barely knew what he liked, but Vrall knew a lot, and Fiona had experimented a heck of a lot in her short life. All behind closed doors with toys, but she knew.

“Aye, but that does nae mean I dinnae want to see some other lass get manhandled and fucked in the butt.” She motioned for Damien to come in, and he did.

In the window was what she said, a human fucking another human. The woman was on her knees, and the man was fucking her from behind; the angle made the anal penetration obvious. The brunette with the fake breasts looked out the window, and the pleasure on her face was blatant as she realized people were looking at her. She couldn’t see Damien or Fiona, far as they were, but there were dozens of nearby buildings that’d be able to see into the huge window.

“See?” Fiona said, giggling louder as she nudged him out of the way and took the telescope back. “It does nae need to be for me, to look hot.”

He decided to not ask about her porn habits. In the modern world, there was plenty of porn for ladies, free porn for anyone with an internet connection, and he was sure Fiona had explored it quite a bit. Dolareido’s sex-obsessed aesthetic didn’t surprise her much when she arrived.

She moved the telescope again, and giggled as she found someone else to spy on. “Did ye fight any Carthians yet?”

“Yeah, just yesterday. Maria wants me to try and get back the territory Garry took over after she was injured. I did a little inspecting, and got into a fight.”

She gasped as she turned around, and grabbed his hand. “Ye dinnae tell me!?”

“I was fine. I shot them a few times, but nothing serious.”

Gasp turned into angry frown, and she poked him in the chest. “Ye should still tell me. I’m yer girlfriend, and I ... I get worried about ye. Azamel says we should still stay out of the fight, but ... but ye’re in the fight!”

He reached out, and pulled her into a hug. She struggled a bit, not happy, but a good squeeze soon had her relenting and hugging him back.

“I’ll be careful.”

“Ye better.”

“And if you think there’s something you can do to help Jack, by all means, tell him. This isn’t Invictus versus the Carthians. It’s Jack, trying to save both.”

“Aye I know. But Azamel still wants to stay out of it anyway.”

Damien wasn't entirely sure about that. According to Jack, she'd changed headspace, and was now trying to leave Dolareido a better place for her family before she died. Commendable, but 'better' probably didn't include vampires as a focus.

He kissed Fiona. She kissed him back. They nuzzled into each other, and he breathed in the smell of her as he slid his hands down her back. Once his fingers got to her jeans, filled by her large ass, he squeezed the softness and earned a small giggle and mewl from her. He—

His phone rang, and he knew the ring. Jack's ring. Lord, do you not have mercy for this poor soul who desperately wants to spend time with his girlfriend?

Fiona sighed and stepped back. “I know I know.” Nodding, she grinned playfully, and set her eye to the telescope again.

Damien rolled his eyes, and answered. “Hey Jack.”

“Damien. Whatcha doing?”

“Hanging out with Fiona and my telescope.”

“Let me guess. She's spying on people.”

He chuckled. “It's a large city, with large windows.”

“Part of me thinks Antoinette made sure the city was shaped this way, specifically so people would get eyefuls of everything.”

A reasonable theory. Dolareido had millions of people living in it, but it wasn't nearly as spread out and sporadic as some cities, like Los Angeles. It was more like Hong Kong, cramped, but with the Las Vegas sexual flair. You couldn't walk anywhere without seeing every carnal sin.

Lucas hated that. To him, kine indulging in sexual pleasure was an insult to God's purity. Now, Damien disagreed, but a part of him could understand why a hyper conservative, volatile, angry man like Lucas would find Dolareido and the Prince's way of things so offensive. A small part.

"Need something, Jack?"

"Yeah. I know this is your day off, but—"

"We get days off?"

Jack laughed. "Good point. Can you get up here? North Side, Tanvar building."

"Your detail?"

"Yeah. Mulder and Scully are reporting some activity. I need some eyes that can get closer."

Damien closed his mouth and looked to Fiona. She glared at him. "I ... I'll be there."

"Thanks. Tell Fiona please don't hate me."

"She won't hate you." He offered Fiona a small smile, but all he got was glares. "She will be angry though."

"Welp, can't help that. Thanks."

"No problem." He hung up, and winced as he tried to smile some more for Fiona. "I have to go."

"We're on a date!"

“Jack thinks the Carthians are going to attack the Tanvar building again.”

“Get Jessy to—”

“She’s busy patrolling the border. There’s been more skirmishes there lately, more brawls. A couple Invictus nearly died.”

Frown only growing, Fiona marched up to him and put her hands on her hips. With her short stature and wide hips, it was a delightful image, and he couldn’t help but smile before putting a kiss on her forehead.

“I promise I’ll be safe. Jack just wants me to do some recon.”

“Ye just said some other Invictus nearly died!”

“I’m not Invictus.”

“Close enough!”

“Maria works with the Invictus, and I have the Right Hand title, but it’s not ... I take orders from Maria, not Michael.”

“And Jack?”

“It wasn’t an order. It was a request from a friend.”

“Nu uh! Ye know Maria would ask ye to do it, too.”

He slipped his arms around her and hugged her. “Fiona, come on, you know we’re doing everything we can to end this fight as soon as we can. What about you? Azamel still got you investigating those tears?”

“ ... sometimes ... from a distance!”

“That’s dangerous, too.”

“N-Nae it’s not! I stay good and far away.”

“We do dangerous things, Fiona. But I’ll do everything I can to make sure I don’t get hurt, ok?” Which was about as empty a promise as someone could make, almost as empty as when a soldier promised his wife he’d come home alive. The same soldier would sacrifice his life to save a comrade.

Damien was a little more selfish than a soldier, but that didn’t mean he wouldn’t try and help Jack if things got bad.

But, he also knew if things got really bad, he might just bail. Not because he was selfish; not by Kindred standards at least. But, the idea of breaking Fiona’s heart hurt. Really fucking hurt.

How did Julias do it?

~~Jack~~

He popped his head over the counter, and fired five shots before slipping back into cover.

“Would you go away!”

“Fuck you!” Gunfire followed the shout, and Jack ducked lower as a chunk of the countertop went flying past his head.

It was only a matter of time before they came for the Tanvar building again. Last time, it’d been about making a statement. This time, maybe Garry wanted it for its actual territorial value. Apparently sparing Tilly’s life hadn’t done much to persuade him to go easy on the Invictus. Maybe he thought Jack was trying to trick him.

No, that couldn’t be true. After everything that’d happened between the two when they were fighting, he felt Garry finally understood Jack was trying to help everyone. Then maybe the fact no Kindred had died yet was because of that. Maybe Garry had been giving him time to get shit sorted.

Well either Garry thought he'd given Jack enough time, or Joe was taking initiative. Probably both.

Near him and by the broken front window sat Bruce again, a shotgun in hand. No Jessy. Instead he had Vivienne, Natasha's child. Poor girl was a vamp barely older than Jack. Supposedly defending this building was a good opportunity for Vivi to prove to the Invictus she was trustworthy, after that whole joining Lucas fiasco. The kid hadn't joined Lucas on the kamikaze mission, none of the Invictus Lucas had managed to recruit had, but building trust in the Invictus was a damn hard thing to do, especially after breaking it.

He envied the Carthians that. They weren't at each other's throats. And much as the Invictus looked like a fully functioning, prim and proper society on the surface, they were always at each other's throats, just silently. The Carthians were a family, a close gang, a bunch of stupid punks that were at least united in their stupidity.

It was easy to understand why the Invictus resorted to violence when dealing with Carthians. Only Viktor had actually tried to negotiate with them, and Jack was sure that was just a way to manipulate them. But Garry wasn't as stupid as Viktor thought he was.

There were other Kindred with Jack, upstairs instead of down in the lobby with him. Zack, Manchester, Derick again, and the pair Vicky and Parker. They also had a half dozen thralls and a couple ghouls, all in different floors, and shooting out at targets across the street. Everyone had guns.

It was raining bullets in Dolareido that night. The cliché made him groan.

Across the street, the Carthians were shooting at them from the closest building. Windows were gone, glass was everywhere, and bullets littered the walls. It'd take weeks of work for a cleanup crew to find all the casings, if they even bothered. It was a shootout between rival gangs, as far as the media knew. Problem was, now that the media knew, they watched the police like hawks. Awkward activity meant Masquerade risks. That meant the Invictus couldn't tell the cops to sit around doing nothing while guns were being fired.

That meant they were on a time limit.

"I'm giving you guys an out!" Jack yelled over the counter in the lobby. "Leave!"

"Fuck you!" Oh god it was Joe. Always with Joe. "Fuck you, fuck the Invictus! Fuck you all!"

Apparently, Joe had caused a few more brawls since Jack dealt with him a week ago. Say one thing for the moron, he was tenacious. Maybe he held it against Jack, for dealing with him last week. Maybe Joe had some long, serious problems with the Invictus, that left him filled with unending hatred for them. Or most likely, he was a moron, a stereotypical fucking idiot who looked at any sort of organized hierarchy as evil, and his idiot brain was overwhelmed with a need to burn it down. Stereotypical anarchist. Couldn't see past his own nose.

Jack poked his head up again. Bodies ran across the street, getting closer. Some of them blurred into shadow. Others crouched low and used hand claws for grip on the asphalt. One of them jumped high, and scaled the wall, going up. Vampires. No thralls or ghouls, just vampires. Carthians used less thralls and ghouls than Invictus, but still, they usually had at least some.

If they brought nothing but vampires, that meant business. Shit. Fucking shit. No Garry though. Was it Joe, trying to make a statement? If Jack had to rip off the man's arms to put the fucker out of commission for a few months, he would.

Jack put his pistol away, and pulled out his shotgun. "Fuck this. If things get hairy, get lethal."

Bruce smiled and nodded, but Vivi blinked at him.

"You sure?" she asked. Poor kid. Older than him, but the look in her eyes told him one thing: kid.

"I'm sure. This is getting ridiculous. We're the defenders here, and I'm not going to lose people because I'm trying to keep people from dying. If it's us or them, it's them. Got it?" Whatever Antoinette was doing to get Michael and Garry to boil over and be willing to be in the same room together, it wasn't happening fast enough. Or this was a side effect.

Vivienne gulped, and grabbed her shotgun.

~Master!~ Scully's thoughts. ~Incoming! Five Kindred coming to you! More going up!~

Kindred could take a lot of punishment. Even a fledgling could survive a bullet through the head, as long as the bullet didn't rip open a giant hole on the way through. But a shotgun from close range did a lot more than a single hole. It'd rip a canyon through any Kindred that wasn't focusing on keeping vitae protecting their bodies, and still seriously injure one who was.

"Stay down, only take a shot if I'm up and being a target," Jack said. Bruce and Vivienne nodded.

Jack took off his necklace, stored it inside his pants' pocket in a little bag that would supposedly resist fire and tearing, and he poured his vitae through his body. No need to bring the blood out to the surface, not yet. Going juggernaut was unbelievably draining, and he had to rely on the curse's power exclusively to fuel the absurd ability. The more he relied on it, the more he relied on the curse, and the more chances he gave the curse to get out. He'd avoided letting the Ripper out, truly out, for weeks now, and he was going to keep avoiding him for as long as he could.

He poked his head up, spotted movement behind a car, and fired. Pellets shattered the window, ricocheted off the hood, and earned a grunt of pain from a vamp who quickly ducked back behind the car. No time to evaluate, Jack aimed to more movement, a Kindred running across the street, and fired. But the Carthian jumped, easily clearing twenty feet, and probably landed on a windowsill on the floor above Jack.

He didn't want them to get closer. If they got too close, there was a good chance someone was going to die, and it wasn't going to be him.

Vivienne and Bruce stood up and fired. Bruce made an effort to aim, and mostly succeeded, but Vivi was obviously more comfortable with knives and keyboards, not firearms. She struggled with the recoil, and growled down at the gun in frustration before resettling the butt of it against her shoulder.

She shouldn't be here. Tash's childe was a Mekhet, and sure, Mekhet could be amazing in battle, but Vivi wasn't Tash or Damien. She was happier using words or computers to do her battles, not guns.

The whole situation was fucking garbage.

Jack ducked down, loaded a few more shells, and popped back up, only for some giant metal disc to smash into his chest. He flew back and crashed into the back wall, but with vitae enforcing his insides, the sewer cover hadn't managed to break any of his ribs. And he'd managed to hold onto his gun. Live and learn.

By the time he got up, several bodies jumped in through the big lobby front window. But not a couple of neonates like last time. No, two ancilla jumped in, Steve and Bella again, and they smirked at him as they immediately turned to their sides, and jumped Bruce and Vivi. Vivi went down before she could get off a shot, but Bruce got his barrel up and put a shell into Bella's arm, but only a graze.

Jack hopped up, and put a shell into Steve's side as he tried to punch the girl. "Get the fuck off her!"

Steve roared as pellets ripped open his shirt and side. He jumped against the distant wall, landed feet first, jumped off it, and came at Jack down low. Fucking acrobatic Daeva asshole. Jack took two shots at him as the man flew through the air, missed both, but once Steve was only a foot from him, ready to dodge a third shot, Jack swung the gun like a bat into the side of the man's head.

Steve flew to the side, half in a barrel roll before he struck against the wall of the office building's lobby. With how hard his head had been jerked to the side, Jack had definitely done something to the inside of his neck, tearing muscle and maybe breaking something. He'd be down for a minute though, and Jack had other problems.

He aimed his shotgun at Bella, but she was in a melee brawl with Bruce, the two of them engaged in some cross between a fistfight and a wrestling match. God fucking damn it. Jack ran for them, and swung the gun's but for Bella's head.

He didn't reach her. Metal shars slammed into his side, ripped up his suit, and sent him sprawling against a corner. Not a shotgun, but heavy caliber pistols, slugs heavy enough to throw his weight around easily.

"Fuuuuck." He got up as quick as he could, but his shotgun was gone, ten feet away and under a desk. Before Jack could get it, three vampires jumped in through the window.

Joe, and two other Kindred, ancilla, Garner and Kass. All four ancilla were older than Joe, but were following his lead. Why? The fuck did this idiot do to get the most powerful Kindred Garry had, to follow his lead? Figure that out later. For now deal with the fuckers jumping in.

Jack got up again, but as he did, he grabbed the manhole cover they'd hit him with, and threw it at the closest vampire, Garner. They didn't expect a kid barely over a hundred pounds to whip a hundred pound disc right back at them, and it crashed into Garner's chest hard enough to send him back out the window he'd come in through. Fuckers didn't understand. Just cause Jack wasn't a Daeva or Nos didn't mean he didn't have strength, and the curse had plenty.

Bruce and Bella fell wrestled on the ground, roaring and punching and even clawing. They were similar age, and Jack trusted Bruce to hold his own, or at least not get killed while Jack dealt with these three. And then he had to deal with the other vamps on the roof and other floors; he could hear the gunfire and shouting.

"Get out," Jack said.

Joe laughed, and pointed two pistols at him. "No." The dumbass didn't hesitate, and fired. Apparently Jack hadn't been thorough enough teaching the man a lesson at the Border Bar.

Jack brought up his vitae, and hardened his skin, flesh, and bones. With the thick liquid pulsing under his skin, and with his necklace off, he had no issue limiting the damage bullets did, to almost nothing. How stupid was this man that he'd try the same thing again? How the fuck was this moron giving him—

Joe quickly slipped his pistols into the holsters on his holster vest, reached over a shoulder, and pulled out a shotgun. Oh fuck. Jack dashed forward, but Joe didn't so much as blink as he lined up the shot and unloaded the spray of pellets into Jack's face, from ten feet away.

Jack managed to get his hand up, but the metal pellets collided with it, and his right shoulder, and his chest. At least none hit his eyes, but the impact of a shotgun was too much, and Jack flew back again. His back hit the wall, and he slumped to the ground on his ass. Joe didn't hesitate to shoot at Jack again, but Jack had enough time to get his arm up to stop the fucker from shooting him in the face. So Joe aimed for his chest and stomach, and Jack groaned as the tiny bits of metal shred through his jacket and shirt, and flattened against his hardened skin.

"Tanvar building is ours. I don't know why the boss let you live last time he was here, but fuck that. Fuck that, fuck him, and fuck you, Jack." Joe shot again, stopping Jack's attempts to get up and pinning him to the wall again. "Cory, get the girl."

Cory, a vamp hanging just outside the broken window, hopped in, reached down, and picked up Vivi while Kass joined him. Poor girl was scared, eyes wide and clutching her arm. Broken, from one of Steve's punches. A young Mekhet like her wouldn't be healing that without a day's torpor and a fresh meal.

Joe pointed the shotgun at her chest, and fired.

"Vivienne!"

The small woman went down almost instantly. The pellets shredded in through her suit jacket, and smashed her down and back against the floor and wall as Cory let go of her. Jack stared at her, waiting for her to move, to scream out in pain, to do something, but she lay there, eyes half open, staring into space.

For a second, rage shot up through Jack like a lava geyser. If Vivi died, Natasha would never forgive him. She still felt guilty about her childe, about their failed relationship. But the rage died down before anything could come of it. She wasn't a pile of ash. Still alive, just in torpor.

But Joe wouldn't be for long if he kept this up. Jack tried to get up again, but again Joe shot him, and so did Cory, using Vivi's shotgun. Cory was no ancilla, but you didn't need to be to use a shotgun. Kass shot him too, using some large caliber pistol that would have punched holes through walls easily enough. Jack blocked them all enough to keep from getting turned into swiss cheese, but bullets were bullets and there were a lot of them. Eventually the shards of metal punctured skin and lodged into hardened insides, only to be joined by more as the bastard Carthians riddled him with gunfire.

The whole night was quickly turning into one giant mistake. Jack had been sure Garry would pull his punches, after Jack had let Tilly go. And as far as it seemed, Garry had been doing exactly that. But Joe, this rat bastard, was apparently doing this on his own. Jack had made a big, big mistake.

"Holy shit you just won't die!" Joe groaned as he finally stopped shooting and loaded some shells. "Like shooting an elder. Except an elder wouldn't be stupid enough to get caught with their pants down like this. Well, whatever. Fuck you and your fucking bullshit. You're dead. We're taking this place, then we're gonna finish the job and take down Xnomina. You—"

Jack snapped his head up, and met Kass's eyes. He reached out with his mind, found hers, and slammed through her gate with all the grace of a wrecking ball. He put the power of the curse behind it, dangerous as all fuck and could potentially fuck her mind up forever, but he did it anyway, and crashed through her mind's barriers until he found the little woman and her Beast.

Stop him.

Kass dropped her pistols and grabbed Joe's shotgun.

“The fuck!?! You fucking idiot, don’t look into his eyes!”

Too late. Ventrue didn’t wear sunglasses for a reason. As long as a target could see his eyes, he could reach out and grab their mind. And he’d gotten pretty damn good at Dominating quickly over the past year. Kass didn’t stand a chance, and she wrestled Joe to the ground in seconds.

It turned into a dogpile after that, the two Carthians rolling around and struggling to get control over the other. Cory panicked and aimed down at the two wrestling Kindred, realized he was aiming a shotgun at his friends, and spun around looking for help. But Steve was in the corner of the room, trying to get his head on straight, literally, and Bella and Bruce were still grappling. Garner was outside, groaning and rolling around on the street, likely trying to get his ribs in order again.

That left young Cory, and Jack, as he got back up and glared at the man. Cory was smart enough to look down at Jack’s stomach, avoiding eye contact, but not smart enough to load another shell. Click.

Jack jumped over to him, landed in front of him, and with the ground as an anchor, drove his fist up into Cory’s stomach hard enough to tear through muscle and flesh. Oh shit, not what Jack wanted to do. The man erupted into screams of agony, and Jack threw him out of the lobby through the window with his other hand, ripping his fist out of the man’s guts at the same time. Vampire blood coated his hand, and a few seconds later, faded into ash.

Roaring, Beast in his throat dying to get out, Jack reached down and grabbed Kass. She was breaking out of his suggestion anyway, but before she did, he punched her in the back between the shoulder blades, hard. Crack. She screamed and flailed, but her legs turned into a twitching mess on the floor.

Before Jack could grab Joe though, he snapped his head to the window as another body came at him. Garner again, chest still looking a little caved in, but body functioning enough the man threw himself through the window and tackled Jack to the floor. For all Jack's strength and power, he was still a little guy, and Garner wasn't. The Nosferatu — everything below the nose hidden behind a face wrap with skull art on it for a jaw — got on top of Jack, and drove both of his big fists down into Jack's face.

As long as Jack had something he could use as leverage to deal with how light he was, melee combat was easy. The curse wanted him to summon a legion of critters, an army of creatures. The curse wanted him to grab Garner's mind and crack it, turn him into a mindless slave. But it could do brawling just fine, and Jack grabbed both the man's fists in his palms. And squeezed.

The sensation of breaking bones in Jack's grip had his guts churning and trying to push out food he hadn't eaten in years. And as Garner cried out and tried to pull away, Jack brought up his knees to his chest, and smashed both feet up into the man's already broken ribs. Cries turned into garbled squawks and wails as the man again flew out the window, and landed with a loud crack against the street.

This was insane. They knew they weren't as strong as him. They knew he'd taken on and beaten a pack of werewolves on his own. How insane did they have to be to think they could beat him in a brawl? Either Joe and his crew were even more stupid than Jack thought, or they were up to something.

~Mulder. Scully. See anything unusual?~

~No master, ~ Scully said. ~Your friends fight on roof.~

~Friends winning, ~ Mulder said, ~but confused. Battle seems pointless.~

~It really fucking does. Keep me posted.~

Jack got up, grabbed the twitching Kass up off the floor, and drove his fist into her throat. Breaking someone's fingers with his grip had been disgusting. Breaking in a woman's throat with his knuckles was a whole other level of disturbing, and he scowled at the woman as she fell back, clutching her throat as she stared up at him, as if she could somehow find a grip that could remove the huge dent in it. Eventually she fell back to the floor, uselessly gripping at her neck as she struggled to heal her back enough that her legs could work again.

Joe, on his back on the floor, opened his eyes wide as he realized what was happening. The perfect opportunity for Jack to jump the man and give him a stern lecture.

Fuck that.

Jack kicked the man in the guts. Hard. He pulled his punches with most Carthians, but not this group, not these idiots who were stupid enough to follow Joe. And especially not with Joe.

Every action he did he was usually careful of, now that the curse was fueling his movements. It was like every movement used to be driving a simple car, but was now like driving a tank. With rockets. And with the necklace off, it was easy to turn the rockets on, and Joe deserved to get run over by a tank; kick in the guts worked fine, too.

Joe tried to yell, but all he managed was an open mouth as he flew through the air over Bruce's head, and crashed into the other side of the lobby. The white drywall broke, and so did the wooden beams he crashed into. He didn't have enough mass to smash through the wall and into the other side of the building, but he got halfway there, ass and parts of his legs breaking through.

Jack didn't bother following through. He marched over to Bruce and Bella, who'd gone from a wrestling match to a chaotic mess of clawing, punching, and tearing. Say what you will about vampires, even a Ventrue gets primal when they have to, and Bruce had blood on his mouth where he'd bitten into Bella. Hopefully the man was smart enough to not swallow any.

Jack picked the woman up, and before she could so much as take a swing at him, he threw her at Joe. The younger Gangrel may have gotten stuck in the wall, but the collision with Bella was enough to drive him through it and into a storage room. Papers, more boxes; not with cigars this time.

"Holy shit," Bruce said as he stood up and dusted himself off, suit a mess. "You really are strong."

Jack managed a weak smile. "Yeah."

"And you ... want to get rid of this, uh, curse?"

"Yes, I do. And you'll be happy when I do."

"I guess. But—"

Jack put up a hand. "It's not worth it. Trust me, ok?" Before Bruce could answer, Jack got down on a knee beside Vivienne. Still in torpor, and—

Her eyes snapped to him. "They gone?"

"What? Did you—"

She sat up, and poked at one of the holes in her jacket and blouse. "I'm not a Ventrue or Gangrel, but I am smart. Wore a bulletproof vest. Small one, pretty thin. Works well for pellets."

He smiled. Didn't even occur to him. The crew had geared up, and they all probably had vests on to stop something like a shotgun from blowing a hole through their chests. Last thing Jack was worried about was a gun, especially from Carthians, but that'd change once the curse was gone.

~Master. Other vampires. Leaving.~

~Thanks Scully. Keep an eye on them, but don't risk yourself. If they notice you following them, get out of there.~ The Carthians shouldn't have things like sniper rifles, but with Terra Den fueling their war effort, he wouldn't put it past them.

“Alright,” Jack said, “now—”

Steve ran past him, at full speed. Kass too, recovering faster than he figured she would. Maybe he didn't punch her back as hard as he thought. Both were still blatantly injured, and in obvious pain, but they both ran past Jack like fire was chasing them.

Jack blinked after them. That was very much not Carthian behavior. Say one thing for the asshole punk anarchists, they didn't give up on shit. He was fully expecting to have to break their arms and legs, and send them back to Garry on stretchers or something, maybe with a post-it note on their chests with a shitty joke like 'Package returned. Reason: Damaged goods'.

“Guess I should have snapped their legs. I...” He slowly turned to face the hole where Joe had fallen through. Bella had already gotten up, managed one quick glance at Jack, before she ran out the front door as well. With Cory and Garner already outside, that left only Joe.

Joe walked out of the storage room into the office lobby by the door, made a quick glance at the hole he'd come through, and then made a quick glance to Jack. He was good at avoiding eye contact, and kept his eyes on Jack's chest, or looked at Vivi and Bruce instead. It took most Ventrue a lot longer than a split second to Dominate someone, but with the curse giving Jack nukes when he should have had a BB gun, he could do it fast. Joe knew it.

“Fuck you.”

Jack smacked his forehead with a palm. “Really? You somehow manage to convince Garry’s strongest Kindred to come here and start a fight over a drop zone and distribution center for fucking illegal cigars, after we’ve already fought over it, and you have the fucking nerve to stand there like I did something?”

“Fuck. You.”

Jack threw up his hands. “The fuck do you want me to do, Joe? I’m trying to keep the peace, but I’m not going to let the Carthians march over the Invictus. I—”

Joe reached behind him, and tossed a small, circular object onto the floor at Jack’s feet. He did it in such a casual way, no one even tried to stop him.

Jack had never seen one of those before, at least intact like this. But some Invictus brains had put together the remains of one, from the Xnomina attack.

Time slowed down. An instant moment of surprise turning into a spike of awareness. Jack knew what that was. Jack had seen the damage it’d done to the Xnomina building. And the Tanvar building was flammable.

Jack summoned his blood, and forced it out of him and over his body. Thick Kindred blood gushed out of him, through his pores and skin, until every inch of him swirled with writhing veins of the dark, crimson liquid. And as he summoned the power of the curse, he threw back his arm against Vivi with enough power to break bone. But he had to get her away.

Bruce was closer to Joe, but further from Jack, and further from the incendiary explosive. As the fire exploded outward, rushing out from the small device like a cracking egg filled with napalm, Joe jumped back hard, but Bruce didn't. Jack stared, body frozen, limbs unmoving except for the one that flung out for Vivi, as the fire enveloped everything around him.

For a flash moment, everything froze, and he could see laughter in the eyes of the fire.

It crashed against his shield of Kindred blood, and the Juggernaut Discipline fought against the oncoming wave of fire. Liquid, infused with vitae, but still of Kindred, and still weak against flame. Unbelievably weak. The fire pushed against Jack, spewing everywhere in a strange, small, but point-blank explosion of something that burned. It took every bit of effort Jack had, every ounce of vitae he could summon in the instant, to keep the insane flame from reaching through the shield.

The building was just an office building. The outer walls were made of concrete, but it wasn't like Xnomina and its use of marble. There was wood everywhere, and drywall with wooden studs, and boxes and paper and cigars and everything between. It all quickly caught the unusual flame.

Jack spun around as his self preservation reflexes finally kicked in. Move, get out of the way, get the others out of the way, do something! But he wasn't a Mekhet or Daeva. Speed wasn't natural for him. Even if it was, Joe's apparent kamikaze was so insane, the fuck was Jack supposed to do? He turned and put his back to the flame as best he could, but the weird grenade had already done what it was supposed to do. Fire was everywhere.

Jack managed one quick glance back at Bruce as the man's pants caught the flames, eyes wide with a single moment of horrified understanding, before his fellow Ventrue erupted into screams. Jack blocked them out as best he could as he scooped Vivi up, threw her out onto the street, and jumped out the window beside her. He was on fire, he knew that. The blood protected him, but it didn't protect his suit, and the flames spread along it like kindling. He could hear it in the crackling, in the strange roar of the flame, 'die vampire die'. He tore off his suit as quickly as he could, ripping off what remained of his jacket, shirt, and pants.

"Aaah!" Vivi, on her side on the street, shrieked as she flailed her right arm. Jack jumped up and snapped his gaze around, taking stock of the other Carthians nearby, before looking back down at Vivi. Some of the strange flame, carried by some sort of liquid, had gotten onto her arm, and was eating through the clothes and her flesh. And vampire flesh burned like paper.

Jack grabbed her arm with his blood-covered hand, pressed his shoe down against her chest, and yanked.

The arm came off easily, and he tossed it aside where it burst into flames. And he knew he'd never forget the weird sensation of how her flesh had resisted his strength for a moment before tearing.

Vivi stared at him, eyes wide, mouth open, and silence fell on them for a few seconds before she screamed again.

"My arm! My arm!"

"Vivienne! Calm down! You'll regrow the arm eventually," he said. She disagreed, from the noise she was making, screams and screams and screams, and existential terror in her eyes as she stared at him. Growling, he got down on a knee beside her, grabbed her by her remaining shoulder, and shook her. "You're fine! Yes, it hurts. Yes, it's miserable. Take a moment to feel it, accept it, and get control of yourself!"

Control. Get control of the situation. He looked around again at the nearby Carthians, but they were skulking away,

~Mulder, Scully, report.~

~Carthian vampires gone, ~ Mulder said. ~Your friends, confused.~

Jack reached for his radio. Gone. He looked over at his pants with the belt and equipment, and jumped for them. Radio, destroyed. Bag! He yanked out the small bag with his necklace, and sighed relief as he plucked it free before the flames could grab it.

The Tanvar building was not so lucky. Whatever was in that weird grenade, it burned hot, and fast, and the lobby burned like a Christmas tree in July. Flame poured out of the window as the insides of the lobby erupted, wood and paint and paper exploded in heat and smoke, and Bruce was still inside.

Jack looked up. His companions looked down over the building edge, realized what the fuck was up, and bailed, jumping off the building and out windows. It wasn't tall, and some of them landed on the ground, others on nearby buildings, and the ghouls and thralls could risk the fire escapes. They'd be fine. Vivi would be fine. The Carthians Jack had easily dealt with would be fine. Bruce would not.

Joe got out. Somehow, the stupid Gangrel clawed out of the lobby by the front door, some burn damage dealt to his chest, but he must have taken off the shirt quick. He knew what was going to happen, and how quickly to get it off him. He knew. He'd planned this.

He'd fucking planned this, to kill Jack.

Bella, Steve, Kass, Garner, and Cory all came walking toward Joe from where they'd run off to, but Jack, dressed in nothing but his fucking dress shoes and boxers, necklace bag in hand, walked over to Joe too, and put himself between him and his friends. He stared at them, his blood still pooling along his skin, and as the rage boiled up through him, the blood acted less and less like a blanket covering his skin, and more like snakes, red snakes that bore out through his skin and back into it as they coiled around him.

The four ancilla and their young friend backed off, each of them staring at him with wide, panicked eyes as he stood between them and their leader. Jack stared hard at each of them as he ground his teeth, before he turned his back to them and looked at the building. It went up in flames. Sure the building itself would be left standing when all was said and done, concrete outer walls, but everything inside was doomed.

Bruce was gone.

Jack looked back at Vivienne. She'd managed to get control of her screaming, but the look of pain in her eyes was obvious. If she'd been Blushing Life, she'd have been drenched in tears. Slowly she sat up and stared at the burning building, her empty arm socket, and then to Jack.

He hated the look in her eyes. Guilt. Thankfulness. Shame. All the shit that comes with someone else making a hard decision in her favor. Christ, he already knew how the conversation would go later, about how she felt horrible he helped her in the middle of a mini firestorm when Bruce was there too. That he'd saved her instead of Bruce, because she was Natasha's childe, or because she was young, or because she was a girl. The thought of the conversation made him nauseous.

Jack glared down at Joe as the man got up. A big, nasty burn ran the width of his chest, deep enough Jack could see ribs; Kindred flesh didn't sizzle, it just turned into ash wherever fire touched it, leaving a window for Jack to see Joe's insides. The man was in agony, face scrunched up and teeth bared, but he got up to his feet anyway.

And he grinned at Jack.

Jack walked up to the much bigger man, and drove his fist into his chest. The fucker's sternum cracked in half on impact, and Joe fell to the ground with a howl of misery. But they were just sounds. Just the sounds of a stupid man who didn't matter.

He's a cocky fucker. Full of himself. Convinced he knows what everyone should do.

Shut up shut up.

Sure enough, Joe, with a chest cavity barely working anymore, forced himself onto his hands and knees, and grinned up at Jack. The defiant grin of a delusional man thinking he was a martyr.

You know what you want to do, Jack. Hell, you know what you should do. Joe said it himself, fuck Garry. This moron is just doing whatever he wants, against his boss's wishes!

Jack reached down, hooked his hand under Joe's jawline, and picked him up until his feet were dangling. Sure Joe was a lot taller than Jack, but not so tall Jack couldn't lift him high enough the man clutched at Jack's wrists as he hung like a dead fish on a hook.

"Why!?"

"Fuck you."

Jack glared hard, and with his free right hand, small bag clenched in his fist, he punched Joe in his fucked up chest. The man screamed.

"I said why!? Don't make me tear the truth out of you, Joe. Don't make me go dumpster diving through that fucked up heads of yours and rip out every stupid little secret you have."

Imagine how worthless this loser's mind is. You think Garry has ever told him a secret worth a damn? Not a chance. He's a maggot.

Joe coughed between his groans of pain. “Fuck. You. You’re just a stupid Invictus. Garry’s wrong about you. The moment we turn our backs, you’ll stab us in it. You always do that. You’re all fucking evil shits, every last one of you. And you’re the worst. Viktor’s childe. Going to fuck us all over in the end.” He talked well considering how Jack was holding him, even with all the grunts and struggled words. And he managed to look in the corner of his eye toward the burning building. “I guess your friend didn’t—”

Jack lowered the man down until Joe was on his knees in front of him. They met eyes, and Joe finally showed a hint of fear as he realized what was about to happen.

The Ripper ripped his fucking head off.

Chapter 151

~~The Ripper~~

God damn it felt good to be in the driver seat again. God damn it felt good to end someone's life with his bare hands.

Jack the Ripper dropped man's corpse, and it burst into a pile of ash as it collided with the street. Joe was no more. Finally. Fucking finally! Irritating god damn worm. Jack laughed as he stepped onto the pile of ash, and kicked it away. Finally.

He looked to the Carthians who'd shown up. Some stared down at him from nearby buildings. Some stared at him from across the street. The four ancilla, Garry's strongest, stared at him from twenty feet away, each of them injured and hurting. Cory backed away, putting more and more distance from Jack as he clutched the hole in his stomach.

Jack looked at the bag in his hand. This stupid necklace. It forced down the Beast, and Jack, new Jack, was bound to the Beast in a way old Jack wasn't.

But it was also the only reason Jack wasn't staked and tucked away in a cellar somewhere for years while the Prince and Jack's bitch grand sire looked for a cure. So he sighed, and tossed the bag to Vivienne.

"Hold onto that."

"I ... wh-what? O-O-Okay." She snatched it up, and stared at him as he looked to the crowd of onlookers hidden around in the nearby buildings and alleys.

“All of you!” Jack raised a hand, like a fucking emperor, and grinned at all the stupid bastards staring at the kid in the boxers and shoes. “Your little leader is ash. I don’t know what Joe said to convince you all that you should try this, that you should actually attack us, attack me! I don’t know what lies he said, or what delusions he weaved, but let me set the record straight. Jack has been trying to keep the peace, to save as many lives as he could. Jack is the only damn reason I haven’t buried you stupid assholes in the ground.” He tilted his head to the side, and licked his fangs. “You should have listened. Now, you’re all gonna die.”

---

~~Damien~~

Oh God no.

Damien stared on from a distance, buried deep in his Cloak with binoculars in hand. Close enough to hear what Jack said though, just barely. No, not Jack, not anymore.

Stake him? Could he stake him? Last time Damien had staked the Ripper, the curse had just finished a one-on-one with a giant spider monster the werewolves struggled with. He’d been a tattered, broken vampire, weakened and drained. Now, Jack looked like he’d just finished his warm-up and was ready for a proper fight. It would have been funny that he was standing around in his underwear, if not for the look on his face, a blend of excitement and psychotic glee.

Damien scanned the sky for movement. There was none save for two crows, who broke off from what looked like pursuit of fleeing Carthians, and now circled the sky above. Like vultures. But no swarm came, no flock of crows, no legion of rats, nothing. Either the Ripper was saving them for when he needed them, realized they wouldn’t be of use with his targets fleeing, or he actually cared about the Masquerade. Strong as he was, even the curse couldn’t take on a few billion humans armed with flamethrowers, and nukes.

Jack walked toward the Carthians. Damien recognized them. Garner, Kass, Bella, and Steve. Garry had about ten ancilla in the Carthians, but not all vampires did combat well. These four did, and were often considered the biggest threats in the Carthians save for Garry himself. Frontliners, fighters, people who liked to throw down. People who probably agreed with an anarchist like Joe.

The four of them spread out as they circled Jack. Were they serious? Did they actually want to fight him?

No no no, everything was going wrong. Killing Joe was recoverable. Everyone knew the man had a problem, that he was hungry for action. But if the Ripper started wiping out Garry's whole covenant, everything would be over. The war would turn into chaos. The Prince would get involved. It'd be a giant mess. And Damien and Maria's goal of reviving the Lancea et Sanctum in Dolareido would be lost.

Damien pulled out his phone.

---

~~The Ripper~~

"Gotta be honest. I expected you fucks to run." He grinned at each ancilla as they surrounded him. "You really think you shitheads can beat me? Four of you?"

"You can't use your pets here," Bella said. "The cops will be here soon. You won't violate the Masquerade."

Jack tapped his chin with a finger. "True. I don't want to piss off the blue."

"You don't want to piss off your Prince."

"My Prince?" He raised a brow at that. "Ain't no Prince of mine. But either way, I won't summon my legion. Yet. But hey, if you fucks think you can really fight me, you better commit. Otherwise Cory is gonna die.”

Bella stood up straighter before snapping her gaze to Cory.

Of course Cory stuck his head out from behind a car, and looked at Jack, confused. Looked him right in the eyes.

Poor Cory. The young Gangrel was only twenty years embraced, far as the Invictus knew, and a bit more timid than his stupid dog brethren. He clearly wasn't used to a Ventrue being up front and center, and a single mention of his name was enough to have the man looking at Jack with wide eyes.

Jack glared at him, and again, Cory didn't look away. Eye contact was powerful, even without Dominate. Predators knew that, human predators, humans who knew how to prey on weak-minded fools. If you wanted to crush someone's mind, break them, reduce them to a pathetic child incapable of a single thought, you met the eyes. Glare into their useless souls and make them submit. Cory couldn't look away.

Jack reached out, and broke the kid's mind. Like snapping a plastic spoon.

Come to me.

Cory walked to him.

Steve was closest, and he made a running dive to get in Cory's way, but Jack's suggestion was powerful and overruling. Breaking someone's natural desire for self preservation was the hardest part of the mind to break. Everyone had self preservation as the most basic, deepest instinct, and if you could override that, you could make anyone do anything.

Cory jumped over Steve, and ran over to Jack before standing beside him. Ah, the look of shock on Steve's face, and the blank stare in Cory's face. Fucking beautiful.

“So, get over here and fight me, fist to fist, or I rip off Cory's head, just like I did Joe. Or maybe I'll rip off his limbs first and see how much damage it takes before he finally goes poof.” Grinning wider, Jack kicked at the pile of ash under his feet again.

The four ancilla glared at him, but they were smart enough to avoid meeting his eyes. When the fists started flying, Jack wouldn't be able to break their minds. Even Jack the Ripper took longer than half a second to Dominate someone, and they probably knew it. That was fine. He wanted to get his hands dirty tonight.

“Well, let's hear it,” Jack said. “Let's hear the speech. Let's hear how much the Invictus suck, how horrible we all are. Let's hear about how we're all a bunch of soulless lawyers and greedy accountants. Let's hear the stupid bullshit about how Invictus are evil, and you Carthians are the passionate, sympathetic good guys trying to make this city a better place. Let's hear all the ridiculous, delusional crap you tell yourselves. Come on! Now's your chance for last words.”

They looked at each other, checking to see if anyone actually had something to say. Apparently they did not. The only thing Jack saw there was panic. Joe was dead, and Cory was soon to follow. Say one thing for the idiots, they were in it for each other. A bunch of morons who shared stupid ideals, and they'd die beside each other for their stupid ideals.

“Oh, before I forget.” Jack kicked at Cory's leg, the knee, the outside of the knee. Crunch. It was enough pain to immediately break his suggestion on Cory's mind, and the man fell to his side screaming. “Don't want you going anywhere.”

That was enough to set them off, and the four Carthians ran for him. Perfect.

Of course, the Carthians weren't so stupid to think they could just take him in a straight fight. They'd been outside for a bit now, and in the chaos, some of them had gotten some guns again. So much for a fist fight, Bella pulled out a pistol and unloaded on him while her three friends rushed him. Hell, it was actually a smart move. The bitch was a good shot, and Jack had to lift a hand and cover his face to stop bullets from slamming into his head. Some bullets hit his chest, and one hit his jaw, but they flattened against his skin and flesh, barely able to scratch him as his pulsing snakes of blood emerged again as she fired.

She threw the gun aside, getting the hint, and he grinned at her as the coils of dark crimson seeped back into his skin. Of course the moment he did, the other three Kindred dove at him, a delightful mix of fear and anger on their faces.

It quickly turned to mostly fear as Jack spun, and backhanded the fucker going for his back, Garner. Slow, already injured, Garner fell to his side hard. Useless. But Steve came at Jack fast, looking for some payback for Jack smashing his head in with a gun. And sure enough, he came at Jack with a knife.

Jack stuck his hand out as Steve came at him for the stomach stab, and Steve sank the blade up through his left hand. With vitae hardening Jack's flesh, Steve had come at him hard and fast, intent on puncturing him like he was a wall of wood, and the blade pushed up through Jack's palm, right between the middle and ring finger. The pain was an afterthought, lost in the glory of a good fight. A great fight! Jack clamped his hand down on Steve's hand, over his knuckles and the blade grip, and squeezed. Steve screamed.

Kass came at him opposite of Steve, and Jack was off balance, holding Steve and slowly crushing his hand into mulch, but leaving his right side open. Kass's throat was looking better, but there was still a big dent there, and she didn't run with as much speed as she should have. Probably trying to avoid putting bouncing pressure on her fucked up back. Well, stupid her, she came at him a little too slow, and he turned to face her, Steve in toe, until they were face to face.

Kudos to her for still having the balls to come at him straight regardless, and she swung a straight punch for his face. He took it, head twisting slightly with the impact, but he punched her back a moment later, and he punched at lot harder. She went down, clutching her jaw; not broken, since she rolled with the punch, but close. She got up quickly and dove at him, full body tackle, maybe thinking if she got in close she could grapple him.

Jack spread his feet, braced his weight, and spun. Steve swung around him as his feet came off the street and stuck out with inertia, and Jack let go of his hand when he collided with Kass. A beautiful side-on collision that had them both rolling over the asphalt like fucking dolls. And hey, the knife was out of Jack's hand too, so that was nice. He watched, happy tickles working up his spine, as Steve and Kass rolled over the street hard enough to tear open skin.

And then thud, something hit Jack. The ground came up to Jack pretty damn quick, and he collided with his chest first before his chin crashed into it. Thankfully a Kindred used vitae to fuel their body, not their actual organs, not truly, or he'd have suffered a pretty nasty concussion from how hard his head hit the street. Someone had fucking tackled him when he'd been distracted. Bella was on top of him, and she was smart enough to pull out a knife as she dove for him.

Once, twice, three times she stuck him in the back with the knife, putting every bit of strength she had into it. But when she tried the fourth time, he forced the blood out through his skin again, and the knife sunk halfway into his flesh, and got stuck.

He rolled over. She was a smart enough grappler to stay on top of him as he did, letting go of the knife, but she wasn't strong enough to keep him from pushing down on the street until he was sitting up. And she didn't expect him to drive his forehead into her chest. Not a good angle for maximum damage, but enough to send her back and reeling.

“Ow! That hurt!” He reached behind him and pulled the knife out of his back. “You got a little fight in you. I like that.” The best Ledger impression.

“Fuck you.”

“Ugh, my wit is wasted on plebs like you.” Laughing until it echoed through the street, he marched toward Bella, stomping his feet as he did. “Fee fi fo fum, I smell the blood of a Carthian bitch about the lose her head.” He winked at her, and waggled her knife in front of him.

And there it was, panic, fear. Bella scrambled to her feet and put her fists up, eyes on his for a split second before she remembered to avoid holding his gaze. It was kind of annoying, how everyone knew now how quickly he could Dominate people. It was so much fun when they didn't see it coming.

He took a step toward her. She took a step back. He chuckled darkly, licked a fang as he drank in the fear, and took another step.

“I'm going to cut open your gut, and rip out your insides piece by piece. I wonder how many organs it'll take before you pop. Then I'm going to rip your friends apart.” He pointed the knife at Garner, still recovering from what looked like a broken jaw, and Kass and Steve. They hadn't just hit each other when he threw Steve at her, they'd rolled over the street a dozen times at high speed. They'd broken bones. Well, more bones. “I’m going to collect all your ashes into envelopes and mail them to Garry. And—”

Bella stopped walking. He stopped talking. She blinked past him, eyes snapping to something else, something she didn’t expect. Jack expected it, the sudden wave of power that came from behind him. It was bound to happen eventually, and it might as well happen now.

Slowly, Jack turned around, and sure enough, there he was. The mother fucking sheriff of Dolareido.

Daniel stood there in his usual dark trench coat, wearing his subtle glasses, and he looked at Jack with the steady gaze he always did.

“Carthians,” the man said. “Take your injured and leave.”

Jack laughed. Old faithful was a stone cold fuck.

“Howdy sheriff. If you’re gonna entertain me instead of these fuckwads, I’m cool with that.” Shrugging, Jack turned toward Cory, and kicked him. Of course he put force into it, bracing his weight as best he could, so he could send the dude half flying, half rolling toward Bella, screaming as he did. A fresh dent in his side, complete with ripped open flesh, threatened to spill his withered spleen.

She caught him as best as she could, but she wasn’t in the best condition either. All of them had broken bodies, and running on vitae to keep from collapsing. She fell back with a whimper of pain as the man flattened her to the asphalt.

The others joined her. Slowly, Steve and Kass got up off each other, Steve cradling his hand and Kass holding her throat. Garner clutched his broken chest and jaw, but after a couple steps, he collapsed, and cried out in agony as he did. Steve and Kass helped him, each slipping under one of his arms and half carrying him as they walked.

“Bye guys,” Jack said. “But remember, we’re not done. You poked the bear. I’ll make sure you’re all dead, sooner or later.”

Each and every one of them managed a quick glance to him, and he relished the look in their eyes. They were terrified of him now. He’d have been hard if he’d been Blushing Life.

“Jack,” Daniel said. “Where is your necklace?”

Jack shrugged and gestured back to Vivi. “She’s holding onto it.”

“You didn’t destroy it?”

“Well if I did that, you, the Prince, and Elaine would bust my ass and do everything you could to lock me up, wouldn’t you?” He winked. “I’m just out for a bit of fun.”

The sheriff, predictably, didn’t react to his words. The perfect straight man, Jack could make a living telling jokes with this guy.

Daniel looked to the building beside them as it went up in flames. “We have four minutes before the police, and fire department arrive.”

“Of course.”

“Will you put the necklace back on?”

“Not until I’ve had a bit more fun.”

Daniel glanced to the fleeing Carthians. “I ... don’t think Jack would want you to.”

“I am Jack.”

The sheriff frowned. Subtle, but any sort of expression from this statue was saying a lot.

“Vivienne, are you alright?”

“Y-Yes.”

Ah, right, Daniel was her grandsire. Jack felt his smile grow as he looked at the sheriff, and then glanced toward his grandchilde. A menacing glance.

Message received. Daniel’s scowl remained, and he adjusted his leather gloves as he glared at the Ripper. “How do you want to do this?”

“I wanted a good fist fight, but these Carthians failed to deliver. So, I won’t summon my army, if you don’t use the sword. Deal?” Jack looked the man up and down a moment, waiting for a response. “Come on, hit me!”

Daniel hit him.

‘Hit him’ didn’t really put into words what it was like to get hit by a five-hundred-year-old Mekhet who’d been working as an enforcer for most of that. Daniel was a blur of movement. If there’d been any indicator, any tip off in his eyes and face, Jack didn’t see it. All he saw was a haze of trench coat and glasses come at him, and then a fist collided with his face.

Jack had been smart enough to pull up his vitae and reinforce his flesh, but he’d also let the blood coils seep back into his skin, dormant. Mistake. Well, even someone as awesome as him could make mistakes and underestimate someone. But damn, the sheriff hit a lot harder than a Mekhet had any right to, and Jack flew back as the world spun around him.

The moment he landed, Daniel was on him, grabbing him from behind. Not mounting and punching, like Bella had tried. Daniel was smarter than that bitch. Daniel got behind him, and picked him up by hooking his arms under Jack's armpits.

Daniel was a tall man. Jack was not. Daniel hunched over him as he hooked his arms up under Jack's shoulders and then his hands behind Jack's head, pinning him under the sheriff's weight and forcing Jack's chin down to his sternum.

"You serious, sheriff? A full nelson?"

The sheriff said nothing. What an asshole.

Well, grappling was definitely an art Daniel knew that Jack did not. And Daniel had a hundred pounds on Jack. For all intents and purposes, Jack was already defeated.

Jack pushed his arms forward and together, driving the strength of them directly against Daniel's grip against his head. It hurt having his chin driven down into his own sternum, but it also directly put the strength of his arms against the strength of Daniel's forearms and ability to keep his fingers entwined. And Jack was fucking strong. Daniel's grip broke, and he slipped his arms out before Jack could trap them against his sides.

But he was too close to avoid getting a proper backhand as Jack spun around. Back of the fist to Daniel's shoulder was enough to have the sheriff flung to the side, but like a fucking acrobat the man rolled through the air with it, and landed on his feet and one hand. With the sword still in its sheathe on his back, and the trench coat flapping in air, he looked like a fucking shitty cyberpunk ninja or something.

Daniel rubbed his shoulder where Jack hit him. It'd been a good hit, something broke, but Daniel adjusted the shoulder with an audible crunch, and rotated it around as he looked at Jack.

“You heal fast for a Mekhet.”

“Practice.”

Jack laughed. “You get beat up a lot?”

“Not as much as you.”

“Touché!” Jack rubbed his jaw as he grinned at the man.

In typical, cold, brutal fashion, Daniel came at him unannounced. Such a shame. The sheriff wasn't interested in goofing around. To him, this was just a job to get over with as efficiently as possible, and that meant no banter. Dude was not the sort to talk around the water cooler.

But Jack the Ripper was! People at the office loved him.

Jack ducked. Apparently Daniel didn't expect Jack to summon enough speed to do that, cause he collided with Jack, chest to Jack's upper body. Jack laughed as he punched up, and nailed the fucker in the chest.

“Haha!”

Daniel, somehow, managed to jump with the punch, and back as well, landing on his feet again, with minimal damage. There'd been contact, knuckles to bone, and the sheriff rubbed his chest for a second with the most dispassionate, stone face Jack had ever seen. This wasn't nearly as much fun as Jack had been hoping.

Don't you dare hurt him.

Shut up kid. I'm having fun. You lock me up for weeks and expect me to just sit around when I finally get out?

If you hurt him, the Prince will—

Do what? She can't hurt me, without hurting you. So shut the fuck up and let me have some fun. If he dies, he dies.

The Ripper rolled his eyes, and crushed the voice in his head. He was in the driver seat now, and he wasn't going to let some idiot child he was forced to share this body with dictate a god damn thing. Shut. The fuck. Up.

"You're fast, you know that?"

Daniel didn't respond.

"If you were using your sword, I bet you might even be able to hurt me. Maybe even kill me."

Daniel didn't respond.

"Course, if we were playing for realsies, I wouldn't be out here, would I? I'd be hiding in my tower, like the Prince. I'd be sending my legions, my thralls and ghouls, my pets, my army. I'd be sipping a fine red and looking out the tower window, while my latest ghoul blows me. Sound about right? Maybe something Viktor would have done?"

Daniel didn't respond. Fuck, this guy was more than just boring. He was professional. Ugh!

Sighing, and wearing his biggest, best grin, Jack pointed his hand at Daniel, and made the classic 'come at me' gesture. He was tempted to voice it, say something like 'come at me bro' or 'get over here!' or some such, but it'd wasted on this fossil.

Sure enough, Daniel came at him. Faster. Jack didn't manage to duck this time, and the fist came straight for his face, dead center on the nose. And the fucker put some power in it too, cause despite Jack keeping his vitae up and ready, strengthening his body and hardening it, his nose went crunch.

Jack flew back, hit the street, rolled a half dozen times, and collided with the front of a car. The bumper dented in, and so did the hood where the back of Jack's head smashed down onto it.

Seeing stars, Jack fell forward to his hands and knees, and blinked a bunch until the world stopped spinning. Concussion? Nah, vampire. Broken bones? Nah, super vampire. Broken nose? Apparently. Teetering, Jack stood up, got his bearings quick, and glared at the asshole a good fifty feet down the street from him.

Daniel clenched and unclenched the fist he used to punch Jack. He'd hurt himself, punching that hard.

Chuckling loud enough it echoed against the big, empty office buildings, Jack began the walk back to the sheriff. And naturally, Daniel stared at him with those cold eyes the whole time. Perfect.

“Come on, no speech? Nothing to say at all? Sheriff, I'm giving you the perfect opportunity to tell the audience what you're thinking?”

Daniel didn't so much as glance at the nearby Kindred, thralls, and ghouls who stared on. His eyes remained focused on Jack, hands at his sides, elbows slightly bent and ready to get his hands up again. Laser focus.

As Jack closed the distance, he reached deep down into him, found the biggest wrecking ball he could, and smashed it into the bastard's mind.

Jack the Ripper was strong, fueled by an ancient curse passed onto his bloodline by the Strix themselves, forged from the ashes of diablerie. He had power in spades. But tackling the mind of an ancient vampire as old as Daniel was a pretty big task. The most powerful Ventrue didn't go around dominating vampires of similar age, that's just not how it worked. With Dominate, you punched down, and broke the minds of weaker foes.

Punching straight, hitting Daniel's mind, was like a regular human punching a tree. Jack's assault came to a quick stop as he smashed into a giant wall of steel in the sheriff's mind. And within the metaphor of his mind, Jack the Ripper looked up and up at the steel gate that barred his way.

Beside him, Jack the weakling stood there, arms folded across his chest, a big stupid grin on his face, and he gestured to the gate.

“You think you can break that down?”

The Ripper snarled, and slashed out at the gate with one of his many claws. He poured his power into it, and sure enough the metal scratched and dented where his will struck it. But that was all.

“Yes.”

“Sometime this century?”

The Ripper snarled down at the stupid boy. “It wouldn't take a century.”

“It'd certainly take longer than a minute though. And right now, you and Daniel are standing in a street, with a bunch of Invictus and Carthians watching.”

The metaphor around them happened a thousand times faster than the physical world outside. The Ripper had time to think and work, but he knew he wouldn't be breaking into this fortress.

A glance around showed more than the steel wall. Beyond it, a steel building with no windows, square and beyond boring. And above that, a pale sky, with no moon or sun or clouds. And underneath their feet, endless dark stone, or metal, or something hard and featureless.

Fortress didn't do justice how fucked up this man's mind was.

The Ripper had traces of memory of the lives that came before him. He had shreds of moments from Julias's life, before siring Jack. Of Viktor's life, before he sired Julias. Of Elaine, before she sired Viktor. And of Susanna, before she sired Elaine.

None of them had minds like this, but then, his chain of memory didn't extend to their minds post siring a child. But he doubted any of them had developed a mind quite like this. Susanna definitely didn't. Her mind was an orgy of sex and gore and murder and rape and torture, an excess of stimulation that she relished. Elaine and Viktor and Julias's minds were predictable, small houses that slowly raised into castles, and would have continued to grow if this incarnation of the Ripper had stayed within.

What sort of fucked up past did Daniel have to turn his mind into this? No wonder he was interested in an angry bitch like Athalia. Her stupid loud voice was probably the only thing on the planet capable of penetrating this shit.

Snarling, the Ripper let the Dominate hold go. Instantly the streets of North Side were visible again, the heat of the burning office building, and the eyes of the onlookers. To them, they'd have seen a couple seconds pause in the fight, nothing more. To Daniel and Jack, it was a failed attempt to Dominate.

Daniel didn't even bother grinning, but he did take it as a sign to attack. Again, Daniel came at him, and again, it was a blur of movement. It wasn't just speed. Daniel was a masterclass assassin, and used his Cloak to hide his movements. Jack, normal Jack, still remembered what it was like when Daniel had slaughtered the dozen or so Kindred that'd been with Lucas, after he'd used Damien to kill him. The sheriff had been a ghost, appearing for only a second to slice someone in half, before disappearing again.

Well, Jack was not some young Kindred. Jack poured his vitae into his senses, into his awareness, and jerked his head to the right.

Daniel's fist came at him, for the head again, with enough speed to make a car jealous. But he'd underestimated Jack, probably because of the failed Dominate attempt. The curse was strong, very strong, and Jack summoned enough speed to tilt his head out of the way, and get his closer hand up and on Daniel's arm.

Finally, a look of surprise on the bastard's face. Subtle, but there, and it made the fight worth it.

Jack got his left hand's grip on the man's punching hand, his right, and he grinned at the bastard as he returned the punch, straight for the fucker's chest. And this time, with a firm grip on the fucker's wrist, Daniel wasn't going anywhere. All Jack needed was an anchor and he could pour his strength into something, and that anchor was their connection.

Broken bones. He felt them, the delicious sensation of bones breaking like fucking pasta noodles snapping in half, and Daniel's face lit up with pain and rage like he was Italian. No scream though. The others screamed, the Carthians, screamed like stuck pigs. But not Daniel, just a grimace. It took the sheriff a second to get his precious statue face back, but Jack had already lined up another punch.

Jack missed. Daniel stepped back far, twisting away even as his right arm stayed locked in Jack's left hand. But with some distance between them, Daniel had enough room to bring up one of his feet for a face kick, taking advantage of Jack's forward momentum from the missed punch. Punches hit hard, but kicks hit harder, and Jack only just managed to twist his head enough to keep the boot from colliding with his nose. It'd only just gotten realigned and he didn't want to do it again.

Apparently Daniel really was a ninja, because he balanced on one leg, and with torso facing Jack, kept the same kicking foot up in the air, bent at the knee and hip, and kicked out again, this time at Jack's chest. Not the power of a full kick but it still fucking hurt, and Jack recoiled with the impact. Which left Daniel an opening to kick him in the face, with the same foot, all without lowering the leg. And he repeated the motion several times.

In a shitty kung fu movie, it'd have been silly, with exaggerated sound effects. With an elder vampire doing it, it was pain, and Jack groaned as the five-hundred-year-old Mekhet's boot collided with his chest and face hard enough Jack could feel his hardened flesh struggle against it. Daniel's boot also started to split with the strength of impact, but it didn't stop the sheriff from kicking him again and again anyway.

Snarling, Jack yanked on the man's hand, hard. That sent Daniel toward Jack's left, and Jack toward his right, and with enough force they both fell over. But Jack didn't let go, and he scrambled over to Daniel to get beside him. He punched down, but Daniel rolled out of the way. The street cracked around Jack's fist like glass. Daniel had half rolled, half flipped, getting back to his feet and yanking on his right hand. For a second Jack thought he was trying to get the hand back, but he yanked Jack right toward him, and like a yoyo, Jack came up to him.

Daniel slammed his forehead down against Jack's nose.

"Fuck!" Jack slumped down, dangling from Daniel's clutched wrist, nose broken again. "Oh you fucking asshole!"

"Jack, get a hold of yourself and—"

Jack squeezed. Fuck this. He didn't want to squeeze and potentially lose the anchor he had on the slippery bastard, but he did anyway, and Daniel's face broke into more delicious, subtle signs of agony as Jack crushed the bones in the man's wrist. And that created a lovely opening for Jack to get back to his feet, and punch the fucker straight in his nose. And Jack punched harder than this fucker. The man's glasses shattered and flew away.

And Jack didn't let go of his hand either. Oh the glorious way the sheriff twisted onto the street as he fell from the impact, and his broken wrist bones ground against each other. Nose shattered, he looked up at Jack with a quick snap of awareness, and far faster than Jack would have, recovered and got back to his feet.

"I'm going to beat the shit out of you," Jack said, grinning as he squeezed harder on the sheriff's broken wrist. It was enough to stop the man from whatever punch or kick he was about to throw. "I'm going to beat you into fucking pulp. I'm going to smash your bones." To prove his point, he yanked on Daniel's wrist again, and punched him in the other shoulder. For all Daniel's speed and strength, he didn't have the resilience of a Ventrue or the curse, and he almost fell again as the punch broke something. "I'm going to rip off your kneecaps. I'm going to rip out your teeth and make you swallow them. I'm going to break your face in until there's nothing left, and Annie has to spoon feed you blood for a decade before you can feed yourself again. I'm going to—"

A small jolt of pressure made Jack stop, and he blinked down at his chest. Something thin and sharp was sticking out of him.

Jack the Ripper growled as he looked over his shoulder, at Damien. "I'm going to fucking kill you." He spun, and Damien jumped back, but not fast enough. The back of Jack's fist collided with the man's side, and sent him spiraling through the air before crashing into a streetlight.

Jack let go of Daniel, and turned to face his so called friend, and his wide eyes. "I'm going to kill you. Then I'm going to rip Fiona's guts out, and ... and..."

---

~~Damien~~

Thank the Lord.

Slowly, Damien crawled back up, and cradled his side where the Ripper had backhanded him. The curse was faster than Damien expected, and that single hit was enough to break several of Damien's ribs.

But thank the Lord, Jack's eyes closed as he slumped forward, and fell on the street.

"Damien," Daniel said, and he gently held his broken wrist. "Thank you."

"Can't believe you agreed to a fist fight with ... the curse. You know it won a fist fight with one of those azlu monsters. It won one against Sándor too, you know. In his gargoyle form."

The sheriff sighed as he reached up to his broken nose with his good hand, and righted it with a crunch. Mekhet weren't as resilient as Ventrue or Gangrels, but Daniel was hundreds of years old, and could probably recover from simple wounds easily enough. Just, maybe not a dozen of them.

"Lesson learned."

"Did ... did he destroy the necklace?"

"No!" Vivi ran over to them, a small bag in hand. Her only hand. "No, it's here!"

Both men blinked down at her, before Daniel finally managed a small smile.

Damien took the bag from her, took out the necklace, thanked the Lord yet again, and slipped it over the head of the unconscious vampire.

"Vivi," Damien said, "your arm?"

“It caught fire, cause of that asshole Joe. Jack ... tore it off, to save me.”

“Leave it to Jack to make a hard decision fast.”

Nodding, Vivi knelt down beside the man. “I ... I knew the curse was dangerous. Everyone’s been talking about it. But he ripped Joe’s head off! Ripped it off!”

Farewell Joe. You will not be missed. Not by anyone outside the Carthians, at least.

“And...” Vivi sighed and shook her head. “And Bruce is dead, too. The fire got him.”

Damien winced as he looked up at the burning building. “Garry—”

“I don’t think it was Garry. Joe wanted to do this on his own. Or at least, it seemed like that.”

The sheriff raised a single finger. “Either way, the fight’s over. Damien, get everyone out of here.”

Right, get everyone out. He wasn’t Invictus, but he was a Right Hand.

“Right. And—”

Daniel reached down with his good arm, and flung Jack over his good shoulder. “I’ll get Jack to the tower, where we can awaken him safely.”

Damien stared at the man. How was the sheriff still standing? He’d watched the fight from a distance, as far a distance as he could manage with binoculars, so he could run in if he ever found Jack truly distracted. Damien was sure one good punch from the Ripper would take Damien's head off; it nearly did. And Daniel had taken several.

"You sure?"

"I'm sure. Get this situation handled." The sheriff nodded to his grandchilde, and the burning building.

Damien returned the nod, and as the sheriff disappeared into his cloak, Damien noticed the man limp as he faded. He was deeply injured.

The others didn't know, they hadn't seen. Damien knew. He'd seen how hard the curse could punch when he had to use his fists. The others didn't realize that Jack had punched the sheriff hard enough to break concrete, hard enough to break the legs of a giant spider monster, hard enough to kill younger Kindred outright. Hard enough he'd left a fist print in the street.

And why? Daniel could have come at him with his sword. That could have killed Jack outright. Maybe. The blood shield the curse could summon might have been strong enough to prevent it from cutting into him at all. And if he got angry, he might have thrown the Masquerade to the dirt, and summoned his legion.

Daniel risked his life to play it safe, and to avoid killing Jack too. All for Antoinette.

That was a friend.

---

~~Antoinette~~

She removed the stake from the boy's back, and waited in front of him.

He dangled within her prison, arms up and bound by chains. The prison had been designed to contain even the most powerful paranormal creatures, but the raw strength the curse demonstrated rivaled that of Antoinette or Jacob, ancient Daeva and Nosferatu and naturals of strength. If Antoinette needed to, she knew she had the strength to lift a truck and hurl its mass. If she needed to, she knew her strength allowed her to bend the hardest metals, and tear through the sturdiest walls. With centuries of power to draw from and a Daeva's natural affinity for strength, she was confident she was one of the strongest creatures on the planet.

The curse's strength terrified her. For it to be able to Dominate entities quickly and easily, summon entire legions of creatures easily, recover from and prevent wounds easily, and also summon absurd strength? How many years would a Ventrue need to achieve such power? A millennium?

Jack snapped open his eyes, and she found his eyes as the boy looked around in panic.

It was him.

"My love," she said, smiling. "How are you?"

"Antoinette? I ... oh ... oh." He looked down as depression rushed him with all the subtlety of the fire that burned the Tanvar building. "Oh christ, I made everything worse."

"How so?" She reached up and undid the shackles upon his wrists, and then the shackles upon his ankles. A precaution she was not sure would hold him, but the look in his eyes told her the truth. Perhaps it was the torpor, or the necklace, but he was himself again.

She needed to thank Elaine once again for the artifact. Whatever plots her old friend schemed, she had helped her love far more than anyone else had.

"That fucking asshole Joe attacked the building, even set it on fire. It got Bruce. Nearly got Vivienne."

“But not you?”

“It got me, pretty bad, but...”

Ah yes, the curse summoned its power to protect him. As deadly as the sun and fire were to vampires, those with the strength to summon the Juggernaut’s Gait to protect themselves were immune to them, and indeed almost all potential sources of injury. For several seconds. The curse’s ability to use its power for an extended period of time was nothing short of extraordinary, and no doubt had saved Jack’s life on multiple occasions. Terrible power at a terrible cost.

They walked together, and Antoinette held out a hand toward one of the many rooms filled with chairs and couches. A room with no other raison d’être other than socializing.

Jack sat down upon a sofa chair, and she sat upon the end of a couch near him.

“What happened?”

“That fucking asshole Joe. I knew he hated the Invictus, but I didn’t think it’d be this bad. He let it drop that he wasn’t happy with Garry, so I’m guessing Garry told him to ease up with his vendetta against us. He didn’t like that. Guess he exploded.”

“Oui, I imagine he did.” The damn fool. A perfect example of all the things Antoinette fought against. “And you killed him?”

Jack, sitting upon the chair in nothing but his boxers, looked at Antoinette as if an anchor hung from his neck.

“I ripped his head off.”

“Oh ... oh dear.”

The boy slowly nodded as he leaned back into the cushions, and closed his eyes. “Ripped Vivi’s arm off too. But it was the only way I could stop the fire from spreading.”

“The fire sounds unusually ravenous.”

“Yeah. It was some liquid or something, from one of those incendiary devices Terra Den’s made.”

Of course. Garry had chosen well, siring Jeremy Long. The Invictus underestimated the Gangrel’s ability to make decisions with the future in mind, as had Antoinette. And now their war was fought on even ground, whereas the Invictus usually had the advantage in terms of hardware.

“And ... the curse emerged.”

Jack nodded, eyes still closed. “It did.”

Antoinette mirrored Jack’s sigh, and watched the boy as he kept his vision sealed. Slowly, he let his head fall back against the couch, and his arms went limp between his thighs.

“It had the opportunity to destroy the necklace,” she said. “Once again, it did not.”

“He ... it knows I need it. It’s playing the long game, like a typical vampire. It thinks it’ll get me with time. If it destroyed the necklace, it knows when I eventually got control again, I’d stake myself, or you’d stake me and lock me up or something.”

A cruel, painful reality that Jack accepted without hesitation. Prudent, and disheartening, to say the least.

“And you believe you will be able to wrestle back control of your body every time?”

A painful question, but it had to be asked, and he finally opened his eyes to look at her.

“You know I don’t.”

“Oui. We are under a time limit.”

“More than one.”

“And Daniel tells me you did more than kill Joe.” Ah, poor Jack. The word ‘kill’ pulled a wince from him, and she reached out to touch his knee. “You nearly killed five other Carthians.”

“I was going to, before Daniel and Damien showed up. I would have. The Ripper would have. He would have killed every one of them.” Despite Jack’s attempts to refer to the taint that infected his mind as ‘it’, ‘he’ yet again rose in his words. The menace was a powerful force in more ways than one.

“Daniel tells me the curse challenged him to a fist fight.”

“It takes time to summon an army. The curse just wanted a fight it had a chance of winning. It couldn’t penetrate Daniel’s mind, so we know it isn’t God, despite its opinions.”

“That is good. But ... the damage my old friend suffered was severe.” The curse listened to every word they said, so Antoinette worded her statements carefully. But no doubt the curse knew how close it had come to defeating Daniel.

Jack winced and sighed again. “Could Viktor hit that hard?”

“Non.”

“Fuck, it’s so damn strong, despite me — and it I suppose — being a Ventrue. If Daniel had used his sword, it’d have been a different situation. Maybe...”

Maybe. Yes, the curse and its mastery of the Juggernaut Discipline was horrifying, if it could withstand the sword of her sheriff. But for all its power, the curse was not God, as Jack said. It could not penetrate Daniel's mind; no Ventrue could. And Damien, a skilled but young ancilla, managed to surprise it, and quite literally stab it in the back. Another weakness.

"The other Carthians," Antoinette asked, "why did they follow Joe into battle?"

"Not sure. Joe had beef with the Invictus, and with Viktor personally. I get the impression Viktor probably did some nasty shit to them. Like, seriously dark shit."

Antoinette tapped her chin with a finger as she let her mind wander. "I have monitored the activities of the Invictus since I arrived in Dolareido. Viktor Honors proved devious, frustratingly so. He performed many sleights against the Carthian in ways they could not directly accuse him of."

"Like any good businessman or politician."

"Indeed. I am sure Viktor has hurt their lives in ways even I am not aware of."

Groaning, Jack stood up, joined her on the couch, slipped under her arm, and cuddled into her side.

"Bruce is dead."

"I am sorry, my love."

"I ... I could have saved him, I think. Maybe. But Vivi was right there..."

The classic dilemma, and one of the greatest sources of guilt. When forced to pick between two people, one survives, one dies, how does the chooser manage the guilt that follows? Antoinette had long grown immune to the irrational guilt such a choice led to, mostly, but for Jack, it would haunt him for years yet.

There was little to say. Jack knew the reality, far better than most. What was needed now was not words, but silence, rest, intimacy, and touch.

Sighing, Jack nuzzled into her side a little harder. Message received, she smiled down at the boy as she leaned back, and presented her lap to him. He set his head upon her legs, smiled up at her, and closed his eyes.

“Any luck getting Michael and Garry together?”

“I have pursued ideas, but I cannot share them with you.”

“Why? I—right, cause Michael might pick up on it if I say or do something odd.”

“Precisely.”

“I hope you get something together soon. I ... I don’t want to take this necklace off again.”

She nodded as she caressed his buzzed head, and earned a quiet sigh of pleasure from him as she brushed her hand against the grain.

“I am confident I can create the circumstance you wish, my love. I am not so certain you can turn it into the outcome you desire.”

“Neither am I, but I need to do something. It’s a shitty, sloppy plan, but it’s all I got.”

Nodding, she continued to caress his head, lulling the boy back into relaxation. “If there is a Kindred in this city that can force those two mongrels to listen, it is you.”

“I hope so. Christ, I hope so.”

~~Natasha~~

Slowly, Natasha climbed out of the mess of limbs, and over to the camera. She flipped it off, and let out a slow, happy groan as her legs refused to stop shivering.

In her apartment, she and the boys had decided to make up for lost time from all their weeks separated. Sex, sex, and more sex. They were waiting until Avery felt she had a good opportunity to talk to Red Tide, and while Tash and the boys kept going into the Hisil to investigate stuff, they tried to remain more hands off. Didn't want Black Blood catching on to what they were up to. So, they had time for sex.

And Natasha had time to pursue her sudden interest in film! Well, not really film. Sure there was that, her getting to totally nerd-out on all the aspects to filming, the gear and lighting and stuff. But then there was the sex, and how much Dolareido — and Jessy — had poisoned her mind. A good girl does not like being in porn! But Dolareido insisted otherwise. Jessy insisted otherwise.

Despite her claims of being a good girl, she had enough self awareness to see where her sexual tastes were going. This latest film had a lot of ‘no please stop oh no don't you can't oh please not there no please let me go oh please’ dialogue in it. Also lots of grabbing, holding, fingers around throat, being held down, and getting fucked hard in all sorts of ways.

And it looked amazing on screen. Something about seeing her very tiny body and dainty frame bouncing around between two huge guys, was super arousing. It wasn't like Natasha was a curvy, super feminine creature, but having two big guys get all ravenous horny and pound her until she was mewling and cumming and soaking them, all on camera, was strangely empowering. She didn't have to look like Jessie or Antoinette to be sexy.

But of course, part of that was just an excuse for the truth: she definitely had a CNC kink. Next time, maybe they could tie her up, like she was a prisoner? A helpless prisoner, not able to do anything, as two horny guards take an interest in her? Or maybe something a little more epic, like, she was a captured assassin! And two royal guards were having their fun with her while she plotted her escape.

Honestly, she kinda liked the former one better. Something about being helpless tickled her insides and made her smile. She definitely wasn't helpless, Antoinette had helped her see that. But in a sexual situation, when her boys were all over her? She was helpless when they fucked, a little, trapped between two much, much stronger men who were lost to their lust.

She squirmed with the pleasant memory as she saved the latest project to her laptop.

“Shower time!”

The boys sighed. Not a happy sigh, like her sighs. Annoyed sighs. But showering together was fun, and didn't always lead to sex. Not usually, at least.

They got showered — no sex — and changed the sheets on her bed. Then they climbed into it, and did the best thing ever. Post-sex cuddling. Though, since Art and Matt weren't into each other, just her, it made it difficult to find a good position. She tried being the little spoon, but that didn't work cause one of the boys got left out. She tried lying between them, but she couldn't hold onto both of them. Plus it made any sort of movement really awkward, legs and arms hitting people.

Ultimately, they had to settle on taking turns. So she cuddled Matt for a little while, kissed him and hugged him, then she cuddled Art for a little while. Kissed him and hugged him too. And then they did other stuff.

TV. Stream a movie and relax. Anything to make her stop thinking about all the horrible things happening.

“Words going around Jack really hurt the sheriff,” Art said. Thankfully he’d waited until the movie was over to say anything. A couple of hours not thinking about Jack and the sheriff’s fight had been nice.

Natasha whined and hit her head against his arm. “D-Don’t say that. You know it wasn’t him.”

“No you’re right. Guess I feel a little better about getting my ass beat by the Ripper though, if he was able to take on the sheriff. That dude is terrifying.”

“My sire isn’t ... t-terrifying.”

Matt, sitting on her other side, looked down and blinked at her. “Yeah he is.”

“Ok, he is. A little! B-But he’s not so bad, once you get to know him.”

Art laughed. “Hard to get to know a statue like him. How did you two ever meet?”

“It’s ... n-not a very impressive story. I was studying in university, and we met in the library. He was reading about some w-weird stuff, in the mythology section. I asked. We ... t-talked, sort of.”

“Sounds like the start of a professor-student porn.”

“Hey! There w-wasn’t any attraction there. Just, a shared interest, about mythology. Though thinking back on it, he m-must have been reading the book to learn about spirits.”

Ancient Egypt was a pretty big source of information about spirits, and how they interacted with humans. So much about their mythology was based on their environment. The desert, the Nile, the animals, and their lengthy interest in death. No doubt the Hisil around Egypt a few thousand years ago would have been a mighty sight, full of metaphor and powerful spirits. No doubt Antoinette had been researching it for her experiments. No doubt, Daniel saw something in Tash that night that made her a potential dragon in his eyes.

Natasha sighed as she melted against Matt’s arm. “Sometimes, I w-wonder ... about all the bad stuff that happened to me after becoming a vampire. Not me. My mom and dad. Sometimes I think ... m-maybe I resent Daniel for all that stuff.”

Art shook his head, and gave her a soft punch in the shoulder; he had the room, with her leaning against Matt.

“Not a chance. We’ve seen the look in your eyes when you talk about him, Natasha. Yeah, you’re sad about what happened to your parents. Anyone would be. But resenting him? Never seen that. If anything, you feel guilty.”

“I...” She knew she had a habit of feeling guilty about stuff. But awareness didn’t help all that much when dealing with a personality trait. “I guess I do. B-But about what?”

Art pulled her off Matt and into a hug against his side. “The stuff you told us about? About leaving the Ordo? Joining the Invictus?” He tightened his hug on her. “Why you thinking about this stuff now? Cause of Jack and Daniel fighting?”

“I guess, yeah. I ... I feel b-bad, knowing he got in a fight with Jack. More than I thought I would.” It’s not like she and her sire had a close relationship. “I d-don’t know. It’s weird. Daniel and I aren’t close, but ... but things happened, that make me...” Feel bad about him and for him. Leaving the Ordo when she was young had been painful, largely because, despite his cold exterior, she knew she’d hurt her sire.

Matt nodded to her. “I hear Jack, before the Ripper got out, did good work and saved Vivi’s life. That must make you feel good, right?”

“It does! It d-does...” A relationship she never quite managed to salvage. Part of her wondered if she’d do what Daniel did when Lucas showed up at the tower, with Tash as a hostage. Would she put Vivi’s life over the life of her friends? She didn’t know. She had a lot of questions about herself, about her relationship with Vivi, her relationship with Daniel, and how she fit in the Ordo. A turbulent time in her life.

Self reflection was a dangerous habit.

She smiled up at Matt and Art, and hugged each of them. As much as everything was getting super dangerous, the fact she could sit down and talk about personal, deep, important stuff with her boyfriends was a very big deal. It was, frankly, pretty amazing how much better her life had gotten in the past few years. Turbulent, with so many things having happened, but amazing.

And then the doorbell rang.

Natasha blinked at the boys, pulled out her phone, and checked for a missed message. Weird. People didn’t just show up unannounced, not in the modern world with technology available.

But a moment later, they all felt it. A heavy, powerful presence. The aura of an elder vampire making no effort to hide it.

Natasha gulped, got up, and answered the door.

“M ... Maria?”

“Natasha. I wished to speak with you.”

It was easy enough for an elder as powerful as Maria, and a fellow user of Obfuscate, to go walking through the city, and even building hallways, without being noticed by kine. With someone as powerful as Maria, kine could literally bump into her and think they'd tripped on their own feet.

But her Cloak was off now, and Natasha could see the corpse woman from close. Small as Maria was, Natasha was smaller, and she looked up at the disgusting, horrifying woman from only a couple feet away.

“T-To me? Is it ... important?”

Maria shook her head. “Personal.”

Personal? Natasha stared at the elder for a few seconds. Maria had visited her once before, where she'd sort of stumbled her way through an awkward conversation where the elder tried to salvage some trust between them. It'd been the first time Maria had ever shown any sort of vulnerability to Natasha, despite several decades of Natasha working in the Invictus, and years working as a Right Hand.

“Um, Matt, Art, can we meet up later?” They still had time before Avery got back to them.

“Sure?” Art said, squinting at Maria as he did.

Maria did a lot more than squint. She snarled. A quiet, dark sound, the sort you'd expect to hear out of a corpse in a white dress leaking mist everywhere. Natasha almost expected her to follow it up with something like ‘you will die in seven days’ before she disappeared into a well.

“I’m s-sure. I’ll be fine.” Natasha stepped aside, and Maria stepped in. Maria could hold a gaze that’d break glass, and she pointed it at the boys as they put on their shoes and left. They tried to meet her eyes, but no one could beat Maria’s angry glare.

Once they were gone, Maria — not Natasha — closed the door, before she sighed and let the angry expression go.

“I am sorry for my anger. I am ... beyond redemption in that regard, I assume, when it comes to Avery and her pack members.”

“I t-told Avery you’re not dangerous, n-not in the way Avery’s investigating.”

“Yes, the way Avery is investigating.” Before Tash could say anything, Maria put up a hand. “I know you and the Prince and the Uratha are delving into something deadly within Dolareido, something outside of my purview. I was dragged into something, perhaps even framed, but I do not know enough to come to any solid conclusions. That is not why I am here to talk with you. Keep your secrets and keep them safe.”

Maria was smart. Maria was too damn smart. Natasha was sure Michael and Garry knew nothing about Black Blood, except that maybe it existed. The issue with the tears, the red wraiths protecting some of the tears, the potential damage Black Blood might cause to the Gauntlet and maybe even to other barriers between realms, all of that was well beyond what Michael and Garry could even think about, let alone plan to deal with. Those two lived in a world of territory, money, blood, and nothing else.

“Then w-why are you here to talk to me?” Tash stepped back and motioned for Maria to go wherever she wanted. She saw pink as she did. Pink sleeve? Tash blinked down at her arm. Oh shit, pajamas.

Well, she wasn't going to cuddle in a suit, but she didn't want to talk with her old boss in pink pajamas with blue bunnies on it either.

“I am here ... to talk about ... the harm I caused you, Natasha Vola.”

“Harm?”

“What I did to you, letting Lucas take you hostage.”

“Oh. B-But ... I thought we—”

Maria held up a hand again as she shook her head. “I had a ... painful conversation with Mister Terry. I realized that I have not ... that I have...” Sighing, Maria looked down for a moment, and then away. Whatever Jack had said to her had put a pretty big crack into her personality, because she never, ever showed vulnerability like this.

Hopefully that's what it was, vulnerability, and not some sort of trick so she could somehow betray Natasha again.

Betray. Ugh, such an ugly word. Natasha didn't like to think about what happened through that lens, but she also knew she had a habit of downplaying bad things that happened to her. Jessy had made it abundantly clear that yes, Maria had betrayed her; she'd had to yell it at Tash a few times, but she'd managed to sink the message in.

“I realized,” Maria continued, “that in our last conversation, I did not truly admit fault. That I did not apologize with the depth owed.”

“I ... thought...”

Sighing, Maria stepped past her to the TV, stood beside it, and peeked out the curtain before closing it again. Afraid someone might hear her apologize? Definitely vulnerable.

“No. What I said last time wasn’t good enough, Vola. I need to be clear, with you and myself. I need to admit painful truths, or I will be forever trapped in the past.” Maria looked at her, straight at her and into her, to the point Natasha froze. “I am sorry, truly sorry, Natasha. Not only did I do you a horrible deed, but I debased myself to do it. For a ... for something as juvenile as romance.”

Natasha gulped. Maria had implied all of this in their conversation about it, long ago, but she hadn’t really been able to say it.

“Romance isn’t j-juvenile.”

Maria smiled. “No, I suppose it is not. Nevertheless, it is important you understand that I am ... not that person anymore.”

Natasha got that impression before Maria had even said anything. The way Maria looked at her, the somber posture, the vulnerable expressions, it was all very not Maria.

“Th-Thank you, Madam Turio.”

Maria smiled at her. A genuine smile. Natasha froze. Can’t freeze twice, so she basically petrified. Which made Maria chuckle a little, before she pat her on the shoulder.

“If you ever need something of me, Natasha, ask. I did something horrible, and I will repay you that debt.”

Repay the debt? Did she know what she was saying? That was a pretty big debt, now that Natasha tried to put it in those terms.

“I ... I will, thank you.”

Smile unwavering, Maria nodded to her, and left.

---

Tash the vampire, Sándor the monster, and Avery, Clara, Eric, Noah, and Arturo and Matthew the Uratha, all sat around in Natasha's apartment. Of course Natasha had trouble focusing on the task, considering the conversation she had with Maria just yesterday. Her conversation with Jack had apparently cracked the woman right open. A monolith no longer. Freaky.

Natasha, dressed in an actual suit now and not pajamas, shook her head. Focus! Important stuff.

"We f-found tears here," she pointed at the map displayed on her laptop, "here, and here, and here." Click click, she drew a thick red dot on each point.

"And we're ignoring old tears?" Noah asked. Natasha nodded. "Then, we know about tears here, here, and here." He took the mouse and repeated the procedure. "Thankfully none of the tears from the Gurihal — physical world — seem to be visible to the naked eye. Likely the work of Black Blood, not wanting the Kindred in Dolareido learning what it's up to."

Sándor nodded as he stepped in and took the mouse from Noah. Somehow, he knew how to use one. The elders preferred to use a touchscreen, and Kindred knew better than to push the issue; oldies liked to touch things with their fingers.

"I've traveled through the dream, and have found tears that could..." He frowned at the map of Dolareido on the screen. "How do I mark elevation?"

Natasha stood up straight. "Elevation?" She hadn't even thought of that! "Um, uh, g-give me a moment. I'll get this loaded in another program." Everyone stared on, Avery and Sándor with obvious confused expressions on their faces, as she loaded the 2D map of Dolareido, and set it as a flat plane in a 3D map of Dolareido used by the Invictus. A few seconds of tabbing between the programs, and she redrew the marks they'd made already.

Sándor took the mouse back, but frowned at the screen as the map rotated in three axes wildly.

Natasha managed to choke down a giggle, and took the mouse from him again. “T-Tell me where it is.”

The poor man sighed and nodded. Smart enough to use a mouse, not smart enough to understand how to hold middle click and drag a focus point through three planes.

“Up. Maybe a mile up.”

“Up there?” she asked. “W-Why?”

“It’s not easy to think about the dream realm as a place alongside the physical, unlike the spirit realm. But there is ... levels, to the dream world. There is distance.” He frowned as he looked down, processing. “It’s hard to think of it like that, but not impossible.”

Natasha was happy not trying. Maybe Begotten had some sort of sixth sense about it, but the time Natasha had been in the dream realm, she could not imagine trying to understand where it was in the physical world. It wasn’t in the physical world! Trying to locate where it fit in the real world was a strange idea.

“There is a connection,” Sándor said, reading her mind. “A geographic connection. Human minds are like tethers on the dream realm, and it’s ... attached to the world, in a way.” Nodding to himself, his words more for his own benefit than hers, he pointed at a spot. “Here. A nightmare about a city here. And here, a nightmare about a basement filled with the dead. And ... here, the hospital nightmare Jack, Clara and I found a tear in.”

She drew on the spot, but he shook his head. Of course, he was pointing at a 3D image on a 2D screen, and it took some back and forth before they got a good spot.

It made sense, in a strange way. The Begotten didn't tell Tash much, but Fiona told Damien a few things, and Damien told Tash a few things. Human minds — probably vampire minds too — dreamed, and lived in their own mental realm when they did, safe and protected, mostly. But sometimes they could have a dream or nightmare so powerful it created a mark in the dream world. It was a place, something to find. It had to have, if even in the most weird and indirect way, some geographic connection to the physical world.

She wasn't sure she entirely believed that, or if it was true, it could be like pointing out where a floating object was in the ocean on a map, and then saying it was still there months later. Maybe true, maybe not.

“And,” Sándor said, “here, here, and here.”

“Mhmm.”

“Dreams and n-nightmares?”

He shook his head. “Dreams and nightmares both go into the dream, which ... which isn't actually above, but it does feel like it rests above.” Oh god even Sándor didn't trust his coordinates. “The ones below are from The Great Below, including the one Jack, Clara and I came out of.”

“You went back there?” Clara asked.

“I've been there before. I'm sure I'll go there again.”

“Why?”

He managed a slow shrug as he looked at the screen. “Monsters go where we wish.”

Natasha blinked at him. It was easy to forget Sándor wasn't just a man, or even a paranormal like the vampires and werewolves. He was a nightmare monster, a whole different class of paranormal, a creature that vampires and werewolves could only look at with awe. More than once she'd heard Jessy or Jack compare them to Pennywise, in all regards, and that was far more terrifying an idea than any vampire or werewolf. Clowns were scary enough.

"It's still dangerous, don't get yourself killed," Avery said, earning a few raised eyebrows pointed at her. "If you're scouting for tears, and Tash is busy, ask us for help." More eyebrows raised. "Oh fuck off."

There were chuckles. Even Sándor managed a smile.

Natasha however, stared at the 3D map in front of her, and slowly rotated it with the mouse as she considered. That was a weird mess of dots.

"Anyone see a pattern?" Noah asked. Everyone shook their heads. "Natasha, any sort of algorithm you could run to test for possible patterns?"

"M-Maybe. I don't know how, but I could get someone in the Invictus to help." She stared at the arrangement some more. "But ... if ... if there's one more tear here," she pointed at a spot in Dolareido, beneath one of Sándor's, "I think I see a pattern."

"You do?" Noah almost sounded offended. Matt and Art chuckled at each other, earning a quick frown from the man. Private joke?

"Um, y-yes. Here. Three dots from above can be make a triangle. The three dots below can also be a triangle. B-but there's eight dots between them. Except, eight could be..." She added another dot, completing the point of a triangle, far sharper than the triangles above and below. Then she added some more dots, finishing more triangles, until the eight dots in the middle became twelve.

“It’d have taken us months, maybe years to find those,” Clara said, blinking.

Natasha smiled, and drew some lines, connecting the dots.

It was a weird shape, and a 3D shape at that. A six-pointed star plastered in the center of Dolareido, with a triangle above it that fit nicely into the star’s hexagon center, along with the triangle below it.

“I b-bet, if Sándor went looking, he might find a tear ... here.” She drew a dot above the three high ones he drew. “And here.” Another below the three on the bottom. She attached them with lines, completing an almost symmetrical, crystal shape. “I d-don’t know about how you’d find those. Those look ... high, and um, deep. But they’d confirm.”

Sándor returned to his usual statue face as he looked at the shape. “I can look, but you’re right. That is high, and deep. It would be dangerous looking for them.”

Noah shook his head. “It’s an interesting pattern you’ve created. And yeah, it would have taken us years to find those other tears, assuming they exist. We should check if they do. But we don’t have to find them all, just one or two to confirm this shape is probably what’s up. If it is, then...”

Avery nodded. “Then we check out what’s going on in the center.”

“We’ve been there before,” Clara said. “Didn’t find anything unusual. It’s just a street in South Side, right?”

There was only one special thing about that spot in that particular road. According to the map, it was basically the most center point of the populated part of the city. People typically thought of the Elysium Tower as the center Dolareido, but it was more the center of South Side and its entertainment district. There were other parts to Dolareido, the more Northern neighborhoods, Devil's Corner, and Rich Side, and they skewed what would really be considered the population center of the city.

Thankfully the 3D map included a color legend for population centers. Everyone in Natasha's apartment could see the weird shape being drawn centered on it.

Natasha nodded. "There's nothing there. M-Maybe in the tunnels?"

Clara shook her head. "Been through there too. Didn't find anything."

"Then maybe there is no center p-point. Maybe these high and low t-tears are what need to be finished?" She pointed at the tears Sándor was afraid of looking for. "Or ... m-maybe whatever's going to happen in the center hasn't happened yet?" Finally, some potential good news. Everyone relaxed a little as they realized they might actually be able to get ahead of this problem.

"Then we can get some people on it," Avery said. "Or you can?"

Tash paced around in front of the laptop. People stared at her, waiting. In the past, that many eyes on her waiting for her words would have made her so anxious, she'd turn into a stuttering mess. Not anymore! Well, not so much.

"I can ask the P-Prince to have our best trained thralls investigate, but ... b-but if we're thinking this is something Black Blood is doing, then we should have a paranormal investigating, maybe?"

They all looked at each other. Who to send? Who was good enough to keep an eye out?

Sándor shook his head. "Too risky. Black Blood isn't like other spirits. We might need to bide our time, and only check that area every so often.”

Arturo groaned and growled simultaneously. “You mean wait for it to make the first move? It’s already made first move! Lots of them!”

But the Begotten just shook his head. “Nothing has come of Black Blood’s actions yet.”

This time, Tash shook her head. “I d-don’t know. This war between the Invictus and Carthians is odd, and the t-timing is awfully convenient.”

They all nodded, even Sándor. Something was building up to something. Unfortunately, they had no idea what that something was. A ritual? A big explosion?

“Still,” Sándor said, “let’s go slow. I want to see what’s on the other side of that tear we found here.” He pointed at the far triangle point, the tear they’d found in the Hisil, the one he was confused about. “It’s important.”

“It better be,” Avery said. “I had to negotiate with fucking Red Tide to get it to help us.”

“Make a bad deal?” Eric asked.

“No. It knows Black Blood is a problem, and it wants it gone, too.”

“Didn’t have to convince it about the tears being Black Blood’s doing?”

“It already knew, the fucker. And it’s agreed to provide Black Blood a distraction while we investigate the tears. So as long as we do that, deal satisfied.”

Tash frowned. Red Tide was horrifying, and the idea that it was also smart enough to get information like that made it worse.

“So that’s the plan,” Clara said. “Tomorrow, we take a trip into the Hisil, and Red Tide provides a distraction.”

Eric raised a hand. “What kind of distraction?”

Avery shrugged and laughed. “I guess we’ll know when it happens. Red Tide, is an asshole.”

---

“She did what?”

Tash smiled as she sat down on the stairs beside Jack, in his big fancy mansion, and gestured to nothing in front of them, as if the memory was on display for them in the center of his lobby.

“She apologized! I w-was very surprised.”

Jack smiled at her, then at himself as he looked down. “Good. Good.”

Mulder sat on Tash’s shoulder closer to Jack, while Scully sat on his shoulder closer to Tash, so both birds were next to each other. Jack reached up and pet Scully behind the head, scratching under her feathers, and Tash did the same for Mulder. Of all the things Tash knew of Jack, she hadn’t known the boy had an interest in birds — crows, at least — until after he made friends with the two birds. Well, crows and ravens were interesting birds, and Kindred naturally gravitated toward them.

Would it be in the same, in a much smaller city? Maybe a town in the woods? Probably not. Dolareido overflowed with rats and crows, but in the woods, Ventrue and Gangrels probably acquired other animals. Owls, coyotes, maybe snakes. Owls would make for awesome, and hilariously cliché familiars.

“You sound, um ... I d-don’t know. Like you’re relieved, that she apologized, I mean.”

“I guess I am. I guess a part of me has been afraid I’d grow up to be an elder, trapped in my old ideas.”

“Oh, right. I g-guess that is a real fear. Some Kindred can’t change, except maybe from what long torpors cause.” And it wasn’t like those changes were wanted ones. The dreams were supposedly quite intense.

“I was wondering about that. Daniel. The curse tried to break into his mind, but couldn’t.”

“Well, I mean, n-no Ventrue could Dominate an elder, especially one as old as my sire.”

Jack shook his head. “His mind though, it was ... it was a fortress, Tash.”

“F-Fortress?”

“The curse sorta gives me a metaphor to see, to visualize what’s going on.”

“Really?”

He nodded. “Yeah. I guess it’s a side effect of it being able to communicate with me.”

Suddenly, Natasha knew exactly what it felt like to be a member of the Ordo Dracul. She very much wanted to dive into Jack’s mind, and unlock the secrets of the curse. She wanted to take a scalpel — metaphorical of course! — and dissect his brain. She wanted to do experiments and see how he responded. She wanted to record data, and then see if she could recreate whatever things about the curse made it... ‘the curse’.

It didn't take much to jump from that, to picturing herself a hundred years from now, wearing a lab coat or some such, and doing experiments on a strange creature she'd caught, something pinned down on a surgery table. If Antoinette could somehow do that to spirits, she'd probably do that. Maybe she already had, and just didn't tell Tash about it? She definitely had dark secrets she didn't tell her about, secrets Tash would learn with time. Spooky.

“Extraordinary.”

Jack laughed. “You sound like Antoinette.”

Uh oh. Caught.

“Daniel's mind,” he continued, “is ... Holy fuck. No wonder he is who he is. You got a hell of a sire. And honestly, I kinda understand his interest in Athalia now.”

“Oh?”

“She's the only woman who could penetrate that man's walls.”

That definitely made sense. Natasha struggled to even talk to the man, and Daniel actively tried to open his gates to her. Tried and failed, but tried. Athalia was direct and loud enough she could probably kick them down.

“I ... I w-wanted to thank you. About Vivienne.”

With a heavy groan, Jack stood up and paced in front of her. “Please don't.”

“D ... D-Don't?”

“Don't. It was a shit situation, and I let Bruce die to save Vivi.”

Natasha nodded as she squirmed. “Sorry.”

“Aw, come on don’t apologize. It ... It’s not like that. I just really don’t want to go through the typical conversations about it, you know? I don’t want to sit down and have a painful talk every time shit goes bad. Just ... Let’s just say Vivi survived and Bruce didn’t, and Joe was to blame. Done.”

Poor Jack. Why did horrible things keep falling in his lap? They happened so often, he’d grown frustrated not with the events, but with the conversations that followed.

How many horrible talks had Jack had in just a few years? It must have been dozens. Conversations with his mom, with Athalia, with Beatrice, and probably others Tash didn’t even know about.

Jack continued to pace, glancing her way every so often between what looked like compulsive scratches he made on Scully’s neck, like someone with a nervous tick scratching their head, which Jack also did. Scully liked scratches, so no harm no foul.

Mulder cawed from Tash’s shoulder. No need for Animalism. He was concerned for his master.

“I understand,” she said. “B-But, thank you anyway.”

He managed a small smile for her, before sitting down beside her again.

“Progress on figuring out the tears situation?”

“Avery’s got a plan. W-We’re gonna ... do something soon. Dangerous.”

“Need help?”

She laughed. “You know you c-can’t. You know—”

“I know. Gotta handle the fallout of this stupid Joe situation. Christ, I—”

Tash pat his knee. “Let me handle the t-tears issue for now, ok? I’ll be fine. Avery’s on board now.”

“Thank god. After ... after the fight the Ripper had with her, I was afraid they wouldn’t help me.”

Tash smirked at him. “B-But I’m not you.”

“Good point.”

Chapter 152

~~Antoinette~~

“Feeling better, old friend?”

Daniel managed a small nod as he sat down across from her. Deep in her tower, in one of her offices, the two could discuss matters privately, without fear of spies or accidental ears from a wandering Samantha. A quiet room of soundproofed walls, with only two chairs, a single desk, and little else. A room she and her sheriff used rarely, and only when to speak of the most painful of situations.

The fact her old friend sat, instead of standing as he usually preferred, was sign enough.

“Your boyfriend hits hard.”

Antoinette could not help but chuckle. “You know very well my little Terry could do nothing of the sort, even if he wanted to. The curse is what allows him such power.”

“Perhaps. He was always unusually skilled.”

“True, but there is a difference between natural skill, and what the curse is capable of.”

“True indeed.” Daniel rubbed one of his shoulders, and earned a wince. For her sheriff to make any sort of expression warranted note. “The curse hits hard. Will take another day to recover.”

“I did not imagine you fighting the creature with your fists, Daniel. You know what terrible feats the curse has accomplished.”

“It was either that, or use the sword, and then the curse would have ... done whatever it wanted.”

“The curse takes longer than a single second to summon his legion, according to Jack.”

“Yes. But it could have tried anyway, and ... I didn’t want to use the sword.”

Antoinette sighed, reached out, and touched her friend’s knee. “I appreciate the risk you took. My love appreciates it as well. But ... but the Masquerade is more important than Jack, or you, or I.”

He nodded. “I’ll keep that in mind.”

They both looked down. Yes, Antoinette had just given her sheriff permission to kill Jack if it was the only way to save the Masquerade. Of course, while modern technology was a curse, it was also a useful tool. If yet another swarm of crows was seen in the city, the Prince and the Invictus had stories in place to prevent the media from spinning it into something supernatural. But then, hunters could see through such lies, and more would come. And with hunters, came yet larger Masquerade risks.

A delicate balance, and her sheriff flirted with it, for her.

“You are lucky,” she said, “that the curse is smart enough to predict what would happen if it simply gave into its desires, and terrorized the city with its power.” She would lock it and Jack away until a better course of action could be found. The idea was disheartening, but a better reality than his death, or the death of the Masquerade.

“Agreed.” He rubbed through his shirt at a spot on his chest. “Didn’t feel lucky at the time.”

Was that ... a joke? From her sheriff? Ah, of course. An evolution in her old friend's state of mind, from a private visit he made following his encounter with the curse. A visit last night that left Antoinette surprised and delighted.

"How did your visit to Athalia's go?"

Daniel eyed her. "Have you been spying on me, old friend?"

"Certainly not. But I have eyes and ears everywhere, as you well know. Are you surprised someone noticed you?"

"I didn't try and sneak there..." He did not look convinced. "The visit went well."

Grinning, Antoinette leaned forward and met her sheriff's eyes. "Quite well, I imagine."

"Ann..."

She put up her hands in surrender. "Forgive a Daeva her sexual curiosity. But I can see the twinkle in your eye, Daniel, despite your attempts to hide it. I think, perhaps, visiting Athalia while injured has awakened your relationship to a degree it did not have before?"

The cold stare was her confirmation. Daniel was a true master of hiding his expressions, but the two of them had worked together for centuries. It took little more than a small fidget of a finger, for her to see the man's heart; or at least his guilt over a night of sexual bliss.

"She ... was surprised."

"That you came to her while injured?"

"Yes."

“Ben oui, she likely considers you a difficult man to penetrate, old friend.” And what woman was not tickled by the classic romance plot of the wounded soldier and the nursing lady?

“I’m ... not difficult.”

“Come now. Far be it from me to criticize you, or to point fingers, or to call attention to the troubles you and your childe have had.” Playful words, not meant to insult, but meant to draw attention to truth nonetheless. Daniel and Antoinette were comfortable enough with each other to navigate the most difficult and deadly of social mazes: offering criticism. “But, you are quite difficult. Women thrive on social cues, the meaning hidden in words and their inflections, the meaning in words said and not said, the stories shared in a glance. You, my old friend, offer little of this. Most would find it easier to strike a conversation with a stone.”

He smiled; again, a small thing. “I suppose.”

“Allow me to hypothesize how your evening with Athalia went.”

“ ... alright.”

“You visited her, perhaps unaware yourself as to why. Athalia was shocked to see the mighty sheriff injured. More shocked, to see he came to her while so vulnerable. And Athalia, a loud, angry, and scarred woman, found herself terribly uncomfortable by the circumstance. At first. But as the reality sank into her poor soul that you, old friend, decided to come to her to spend the rest of your night, she saw a side of you you had never shown before? Which led to some tender, and dare I say, emotional sex?”

While his steel gaze would have fooled most, Antoinette saw the break in his glare, the twitch in his lip, and the uncomfortable way he adjusted his glasses with a single finger.

“Yes.” Yes. Of course, yes. The most direct response to man could possibly offer. “It went ... well.”

“I am happy for you.”

“Though, she ... she told me she uh, wants me to...”

“Allow me another guess. She wishes to disappear into her man’s arms, and be treated like a naughty princess?”

“Naughty ... princess?”

Antoinette laughed. “Come now, you know exactly what I mean. She wishes to be taken care of. Understandable. Athalia has suffered many hardships, and would love for someone else to take the reins of many aspects of her life. She is tired. And beneath that harsh, brutal visage she wears, there is a woman who wishes to bathe in the sweet bliss of being ravaged by a man in control.” With a playful smile, Antoinette held out two palms over her lap. “In one hand, she wishes to be pampered, to recover from her life. In the other, she wishes to be taken, rendered helpless, and ... fucked. Relentlessly.”

Athalia was tragic in many ways. She did not want to be the ruthless woman she was, but her Begotten curse, combined with her traumatizing, guilt-laden past with her daughter, forced her to become an angry creature. Angry, resentful, and unwilling to let anyone get close, as if someone had given a wolverine the quills of a porcupine.

But Athalia was no master of the social game. She was easy to understand to anyone familiar with psychology, let alone an old creature and student of human nature such as Antoinette. Athalia harbored deep, hidden secrets, perhaps secrets she once hid from herself, that she wanted to give in to another, surrender, and indulge in the strange joy of helplessness. She wanted a man she could trust, a reliable man like Daniel, to hold her down, perhaps even tie her up, and force sexual pleasures upon her.

And Daniel knew this. While the man was certainly no master of social interaction, he had the intellect and years to be able to understand someone like Athalia. The issue was not her, but him.

“She didn’t say it like that. But, she ... did try and say that.” He sighed. “Guess I’m not good at talking.”

“Not true. You merely lack the confidence for social aggression.”

“Confidence?”

Antoinette nodded. “Or do you believe your history with others and social connections, has been solid, and has benefited from your habit of standing by, or stepping back? Your passivity?”

He winced slightly as he looked down. “I guess not.”

“Precisely. And that is why it is good to have a friend such as moi, mon ami.” Her smile grew as she leaned forward. “While I am no mind reader, I believe I can safely say that, after last night, your relationship with Athalia has grown. She will feel easier about opening herself to you, and will doubtless be thrilled if you were to take her roughly.”

“I’m afraid of hurting her.”

“Physically?”

“Mentally. She—”

“Is not made of glass, Daniel. Do not confuse the desire to be sexually submissive, with some sort of mental fragility. If anything, quite the opposite. The woman has been through Hell and has survived. She will not break if you take her hand and pin it against a wall.”

Slowly, perhaps a touch reluctantly, he nodded as he met her eyes again. “Alright. Thanks.”

“And do be sure to enthrall me with the details.” She beamed at him, and he rolled his eyes; again, barely.

How many times had they danced this dance? She wanted the best for her sheriff, and that included sexual fulfillment; low on the list of priorities for elders, who often found their satisfaction through the Kiss and nothing else, but still. But despite centuries of the two of them being close companions, Daniel rarely engaged her desire to talk of eroticism. Frustrating, considering Antoinette’s great interest in sexuality.

Perhaps now, with Athalia, he would grow more comfortable discussing sex? Or Antoinette would forever be doomed to a sheriff who kept his sex life private. At least Elaine enjoyed indulging Antoinette her sexual interests. Indulge and partake.

Hopefully the woman would not spoil Athalia’s first slice of joy in years.

“Natasha,” Antoinette continued, “has made progress. She, Sándor, and the Uratha have concocted a plan to learn about one of the more interesting tears. A dangerous plan.”

Daniel nodded. “I trust her, and Sándor.”

“But not Avery?”

He shrugged. “Do you?”

“No, I suppose not. I trust her heart, but she is ... not cold enough to make difficult decisions.” And, naturally, had helped nurture Clara to become as equally an emotional and irrational leader. “But regardless, Avery will fight to protect Natasha. And if she does not, Sándor certainly will. The poor man is bound to us by his guilt.”

“A useful leash.”

“A savage one.”

Daniel nodded. “But not one of our making. If Sándor wants to break his back helping us, I say let him.”

There was wisdom in that. A cold, cruel wisdom. Antoinette and Daniel often traded positions on who was the more cruel in how they managed Dolareido. And where Sándor was concerned, Daniel was a touch crueler.

“And your childe has also discovered this.” Antoinette reached across the wooden desk, and pointed her laptop toward the man.

“Dolareido. And ... a strange crystal drawn through it.”

“The location of tears, most found, some presumed. Miss Vola extrapolated, by eye.”

“She extrapolated this? Impressive.”

“Make sure to tell her that.” Like a wife, forcing her closed-off husband to expose his nurturing side to his daughter.

“I will. How goes your attempts to bind Black Blood?”

She groaned as she sat back. “You know it fares poorly. Finding rituals to bind spirits is difficult enough. Finding a ritual capable of binding that creature? I waste my time.”

They both knew the search would be pointless. She could summon it, but had no way to pin it. And each time she summoned it, she felt the spirit gleamed more about her than she did of it.

“And getting Michael and Garry to follow the Roland rumor?”

“With such little time, I had to use the most obvious draw.”

Daniel raised a brow. “And that is?”

“My little Ventrue is going to find two angry Elders hot on his tail soon enough. I will need your eyes, and perhaps sword, in two or three days.”

“Sounds rough. What’s Jack said?”

“Jack ... is not yet aware.”

“You didn’t tell him?”

“I will, tonight. But you know Jack. If he knew, he would find it difficult to manipulate Garry and Michael. My love is a poor liar.” Though, to both her joy and dismay, he grew more skilled at deception with each passing night.

“That’s why you love him.”

She smiled. “That it is.”

---

~~Jack~~

“You killed Joe.” Michael tried to keep the grin off his face, but a hint of it showed through. Asshole.

Jack nodded. “I did.”

“And from the accounts, severely injured not only five other Carthians, but the sheriff as well.”

Jack winced at that. “We agreed to a fist fight. The curse is ... better at fist fighting than it should be.”

“So it would seem.” Michael stepped up from the table, and paced back and forth between it and the large touch screen on the wall that showed an interactive map of Dolareido. “Bruce Vanna is also dead.”

“Terra Den’s incendiary grenade spouts a liquid around. I managed to save Miss Maiorie from it, not Mister Vanna.”

“Mister Vanna was older, stronger, and a larger asset to the Invictus.”

Jack met the man’s eyes, and stared. “Bruce was further. I didn’t know if I could save him. I knew I could save Vivienne.”

Michael returned the stare. Michael may have been afraid of the power of the curse, but that didn’t stop him from being who he was, a powerful Gangrel and elder who was now the ruler of the Invictus in Dolareido. To him, Jack was now a problem, but a valuable tool, so naturally he was going to do what he could to use the tool without exposing weakness to it.

It was the sort of situation that made Jack question whether he should get rid of the Ripper. If he did, yeah sure Michael wouldn’t look at him like a nuke ready to go off in his face, but he’d also be free to get revenge on Jack for all the disrespect Jack was not-so-subtly showing him.

Well, not entirely true. Michael couldn’t touch Jack without earning Antoinette’s wrath. But that didn’t mean he couldn’t orchestrate a situation Jack couldn’t survive.

Kindred sucked. The Danse Macabre sucked.

“The Tanvar building is a loss,” Michael said. “A multi-million dollar loss.”

“There isn’t much I can do to stop the Carthians from burning down buildings, Mister McDonald. With technology, they could throw one of those flame grenades from pretty far away, and the building's gonna burn." The attack on Xnomina made that obvious enough.

"They're salting the earth."

"Yes sir." Because Garry hates you so much, he's willing to burn down the shit you own, instead of take it for himself. "But, how many of those buildings were Joe's doing? I don't think Garry wanted Joe to go gung ho like he did."

"Only the Tanvar building, as far as I know, can be blamed on Joe's overzealousness."

Damn.

"Then ... we have a problem."

"Indeed. If Garry continues on this path, the Prince will eventually interfere, but not before he's damaged our financial basis considerably."

"What do we do?"

"We deal with Terra Den."

"Deal with, sir? Terra Den is a considerable portion of the city's income. The Prince won't be happy if we kill Jeremy Long." What a wonderful world they lived in.

"Maybe. Terra Den is a corporation, Mister Terry, not Jeremy Long himself. If he dies, that doesn't mean the corporation dies."

True enough. Terra Den wasn't a publicly traded company, but that didn't mean there wasn't other people in its chain that had serious holds over its shares. And of course, the fact Terra Den was basically a corrupt company meant that if Long died, someone else just as corrupt would take his place. Maybe that person would be a little more open to running the business like it used to, instead of getting involved with Garry. Or maybe, willing to get involved with the Invictus.

Michael was smart, and that made him damn frustrating to deal with.

“You want me to kill him.”

“I want you to investigate the option. Talk to him first, and see what he’s willing to do. He’s under the impression he’s given the Carthians a tool we don’t have, and that impression needs to change. Make him understand that if he helps Garry continue to escalate the situation, we will rise to meet him.”

Oh god, what a nice, fancy way of saying the Invictus would start blowing shit up.

“Will do, sir.”

“And Mister Terry. Understand that the Tanvar building loss is your failure, regardless of that idiot Joe’s kamikaze. Do not let another major location burn down because of your pacifism.”

The two glared at each other for a while, long enough for the silence itself to send a message, before Jack nodded, and left. There was something in Michael’s eyes Jack didn’t expect, a question his boss wanted to ask, but didn’t. Something about the curse, maybe? Jack couldn’t tell. Michael was angry with him though, over something he didn’t say.

Fucking lovely.

---

“Ready?” Jessy asked.

Jack glanced to Damien. He nodded. Jack nodded. They were ready.

They knew this wasn't going to end well, but it had to be done regardless. And with the death of Bruce and Joe, they all knew people weren't going to pull punches. Gloves were off. Kindred were going to die.

It wasn't the first time they'd been to the Terra Den building. It was where Jessy had punched Garry, turning a bad situation worse. It was where Eric — not with them tonight — confronted Long about his right hand man Montoya, and the death of his loan shark Pitt. It was where they learned Jeremy Long was a vampire, and Garry's new childe.

The building was typical, as far as Dolareido business buildings with shady backgrounds went. A few warmer colors than the blacks of Xnomina or the Elysium Tower, but still, slick and modern. The office plants in the corners of rooms were real. To someone like Jeremy Long, aesthetics were important. He wanted people to know he was dangerous and sophisticated.

He really should have been a Ventrue, and Invictus.

But Garry saw something in him, something that gave him an animal edge. You had to have that animal edge to be worthy of a Gangrel siring you, according to Jessy, some part of you fully willing to get crazy when shit hits the fan. Gangrels didn't look for potential childer who knew how to say one thing while meaning another. Gangrels didn't look for potential childer who knew how to use money as a weapon, or intimidate someone by wearing the perfect suit. Gangrels looked for the sort of people that would, in the heat of a fight, not only throw fists until they saw stars, but were willing to use their teeth if someone was stupid enough to get too close to their mouths. The sort of people who shut off their brains and went psycho animal when they had to.

Garry siring Long always seemed strange, but it told Jack there was more to the man than they realized. Which made any Invictus nervous.

Long sat at his desk, dressed in a nice suit, and sporting an animal grin. Average height, and he filled the suit nicely. Chinese heritage, but born in the US. Short black hair, face shaved smooth, he had that eternally young, maybe sold his soul to a demon kinda look to him, considering the grin on his face.

To his left stood several thralls, sporting assault rifles. To his right stood several thralls, sporting anti-personnel shotguns. And at the office door the Right Hands just walked through, several thralls armed with shotguns and, hilariously, swords, let the three vampires in. Vampires with swords were deadly. Thralls? Even ghouls, stronger than normal humans, were laughably weak compared to vampires, let alone thralls. The fuck were they gonna do with a sword?

The shotguns though, those were a problem.

“Be aware,” Long said, “that this room is being recorded and monitored. If you do anything strange, we will all die in fire.”

Jack smirked. Quite the bluff, but the curse was strong enough to deal with fire. Though, maybe not an entire building on fire. They were several stories up, and the office didn't have windows. Less an office, more a cell. A fancy, beautiful cell, but Long definitely wanted anyone who came into his office to feel like they were trapped.

He wasn't lying, either. There were cameras in the corners of the room, and they moved a bit to follow Jessy as she paced around in the office. Cameraman were aiming them. Long trusted his employees quite a bit, if he was willing to give them a button that'd set the whole place on fire.

“Noted,” Jack said. “You like fire a lot, for a vampire.”

“It’s a powerful tool.” No accent, except for a pompous edge CEOs often seemed to have, like he was talking down to Jack.

“One mistake and it’ll kill you.”

“Yes, I am sure it would. “ Long tapped his fingers on his big desk as he met Jack’s eyes. Not afraid at all. Jack couldn’t exactly Dominate the man without it being a little obvious, especially since the man kept tapping his fingers on the desk. If Jack jumped into his mind, he’d stop doing that. Did he really have them all sitting on explosives, under the control of someone else, who’d detonate them if Long stopped tapping his fingers? Crazy.

“The fire is a problem,” Damien said.

Long chuckled. “For you.”

Jessy shook her head. “For everyone. You’re burning down the city.”

“You mean Garry is burning down the city. And hardly. Three buildings does not qualify as burning down the city, not in Dolareido. Are you aware of how many kine live in this city, Miss Herrington? Over four million. Buildings burn down.”

Jessy gave him the finger, but didn’t say anything. Long wasn’t wrong. It was true the Invictus and Carthians were causing property damage, but so far it hadn’t reached a level where the Prince would feel the need to intervene. Yet.

“It’s only going to get worse,” Jack said. “These incendiary grenades of yours are a problem, and I want you to stop making them.”

“No.” More tapping.

“You don’t think the Invictus could use fire, Mister Long? You don’t think we have the tech to put together a similar weapon?”

“I think you do. But I also think you realize burning Carthian property is a waste of time. What possible property target do you have that could affect the Carthians in any way if it were lost?”

Jack gestured at the room around them. “Uh...”

“You think you can destroy this building, Mister Terry? I let you in because you are no threat. I don’t care if you can summon a legion, and defend yourself from flame. You could not survive an inferno, and your legion is of no use here. If you tried, you would fail. And if you somehow succeeded, the damage you would cause to the Masquerade would be immense.”

This man was simultaneously full of himself, and paranoid. He was practically an elder already.

“We could burn this building down without being in it, you know.”

“I’d like to see you try.” And there it was. The Gangrel part of him.

“And Joe? Did Garry give you permission to give him some of those grenades?”

Long’s smile faded. “You killed Joe. Why should I tell you anything?”

“Joe killed Bruce. First, I might add.”

“Such is war.”

“That wasn’t war. That was an idiot man with a fucking delusion. And someone gave him a deadly weapon.”

“A molotov is just as deadly.”

“Bullshit. A molotov just splatters and quickly burns. That shit was like napalm, and unlike a fucking molotov cocktail, it didn’t come at me as a glass bottle with a burning rag attached to it. It was an innocuous little sphere.”

“Not innocuous enough, evidently. Thank you for the feedback. I’ll make sure future devices are less noticeable.”

This guy. This fucking guy. Jack stared at the man hard, ready to shatter his mind and turn him into a mindless puppet. But the man held his gaze as he tapped his finger. The best poker player in the world, or he was telling the truth about his defense measures.

This was definitely the sort of man who’d use his teeth in a fist fight if he had to.

“Jeremy Long, I am warning you. If you continue to bring fire to these skirmishes, the Invictus will respond in kind.”

“Then it’s a good thing the Invictus are the ones on the defense. It’s you who stands to lose territory.”

“Not true. We’ll take the Mirrden district back, but if we can’t, Michael is prepared to cause permanent damage.”

“Oh ho, permanent? Oh please, you have no leverage in this game.”

Jack stepped up to the man’s desk. Every thrall pointed their gun at him, and Jack ignored them.

“Xnomina has been in the business longer than Terra Den. The Invictus have been playing this game for a lot longer than you, or even Garry. You really think we can’t beat you at this?”

“I think you’re an old monster who’s gone too long unchallenged. Now, you’re fat, weak, and lazy, and the younger generation has to take you down.”

Jack didn't know much about the Uratha, but that story sounded oddly familiar. Eric said something about it. Father Wolf?

“Long, I'm giving you a chance. Stop helping Garry with the tech, or we'll make you.”

“No. Now, if that is all, get out.”

Well, this was a waste of time, except to learn that Long was smarter and deadlier than he had any right to be. Garry sired well.

Jessy snarled, but when Damien turned to leave, she followed. Jack followed last.

“And Mister Terry,” Long said. “Stop digging up Roland's family, would you? My sire does not appreciate you stirring up the past.”

Old Jack would have worn his surprise on his face. But after years of bullshit and hard lessons, Jack kept his gaze cold and steady as he met Long's, before he walked out the door, and took the elevator down with his friends. The fuck was that about?

---

“Roland's past?” Jessy asked once they were out on the street. “Like ... Michael's childe before me, Roland?”

“Yeah. Been doing a little digging.” But not into Roland's family. In fact, he didn't know a single thing about Roland's family. “Can't really talk about it.”

Damien and Jessy blinked at each other.

“Uh, what?” Jessy asked.

“Really, can't talk about it. It's ... a weird situation.” The fuck were you up to, Antoinette?

Roland was Jack's best bet of getting Garry and Michael to trip up and make a mistake. It was the seed that had the two Gangrels hating each other so much, and if he could use it against them, he could maybe manipulate them with it. But if Antoinette was up to something that had people looking to Jack like he was up to something, that could very well bite him in the ass.

When in doubt, deny deny deny. Antoinette would tell him more when it made sense to.

Damien shrugged and pat Jessy on the shoulder. "If he says he can't talk about it, he can't talk about it."

"Ugh, fine." She gave him a sharp poke in the chest. "But make sure you call me if shit gets crazy, ok? You killed that fucker Joe and I wasn't even there to see it."

"Jessy, I nearly killed five other people. And I'm glad I didn't."

"What? Why? You don't think that fucking bitch Bella deserves it? She's been a thorn in my ass for decades, and I know a couple Invictus disappeared after a run-in with her."

Jack sighed. He was tempted to ask about her past, if she'd killed any Carthians in her fifty years, directly or indirectly. Sometimes the little brawls Invictus and Carthians got into weren't very gentle, and Julias told him plenty of stories about how they got pretty bad sometimes. Kindred died.

He stepped into a dark alley, and they followed.

"Jessy, I don't want anyone to die, ok? I ... Christ, you think I'm happy I killed him?"

"A bit, yeah. Joe was a douchebag. World is better off without him."

Glaring, Jack snapped his eyes to Damien, but his friend shook his head dismissively.

“Jessy,” Jack said, “the fuck would Julias say?”

“Julias?” She glared at him, but after a few seconds her anger broke, and her gaze fell. “He’d say stop making things worse, and look for a way to get everyone on the same page.”

“Yeah, and that’s what I’m trying to do. I didn’t want to kill Joe, the fucking curse did. Bruce died too. Vivienne nearly died. And ... christ, I’m just trying to get people to stop killing each other. Ok? This is the most stereotypical war hate shit I’ve ever seen. Garry isn’t Hitler, and Carthians aren’t nazis. Get me?”

“I get you I get you. But last I checked, the Carthians are coming at us hard, Jack, not the other way around.”

“They thought differently, when we took the Mirrden district from them those years ago.”

“No one died!”

“Jessy, I saw Joe’s eyes before I killed him. He was utterly convinced the Invictus ... and Viktor and me by extension, were evil and needed to die. I can guarantee you Joe has lost friends to Invictus. He...” Jack looked down. “Enough, ok? Enough.”

Slowly, she nodded, and gave him a gentle tap on the shoulder. “Alright, I get you. Just, you kinda gave me the impression with Long that you were ready to go to war.”

If Jack had to go to war, he wouldn’t be Jack for very long. He be the fucking Ripper, drowning the whole city in blood and ashes.

His phone buzzed. A message from the Prince.

~Expect contact from Roland's family soon.~

Uh, what? Roland's family? Dude died a hundred years ago, why would—oh god, what was Antoinette up to? She sent him that text message on their personal channel too, which wasn't exactly secure. They avoided sending anything other than romantic stuff on it.

Ok, time to visit Antoinette and see what the hell this Roland business was about.

~~Eric~~

He could be doing something else, instead of risking his life like this. He could be back in his fancy apartment with his girlfriend. He could be showering with her, touching her. He could be relaxing in the hot tub with her. He could be going out for a night on the town with her. He could be taking her back to her place after she'd fed on one — or more — humans, getting her randy as all hell, and he could be spending the night fucking her amazingly huge, athlete's ass, at her request. He could be living the dream.

Instead, here he sat in wolf form in the Hisil, him and a bunch of Avery's pack. Jessy wasn't with him. She had to deal with the Carthians, defend borders, fight off punks like Joe. Except Joe was dead, and now the Carthians and Invictus were willing to open up with lethal force from the get go.

Which meant, while Eric sat here, waiting for Red Tide to make its move, his girlfriend was in mortal danger. Not unusual. She'd been in mortal danger plenty of times. But now she was in heavy, real, could die at any moment to an explosive hidden in a car danger. That idea irked him. He knew the only reason Michael hadn't shown up at his door with a dozen Kindred and demanded Eric help them fight the Carthians was because of Jessy. If she died, Michael would probably drag his ass into the war.

Course, at that point, Eric would happily join. Kill the Carthians who killed the best thing to ever happen to him? Sure.

He growled, and forced the thoughts out of his mind. Focus. Him and the pack sat in the shadow of a building near the edge of the city, the outer edge of Devil's Corner, hidden in Natasha's Cloak. Some of the wolves like Art could hide themselves, and Sándor was somehow able to hold so perfectly still, he stop registering as a living entity to Eric's wolf senses. Gargoyle, yeah.

It was quiet. The strange sky, this far from the city's center, showed its beautiful stars and oddly colored clouds. Few spirits wandered out here, the edge of the city; they were drawn to where humans stirred chaos instead. Which meant it was strange to see the red wraiths and their massive claws floating about at the city's edge, guarding the glowing tear. They should have been in the city, guarding Black Blood's territory.

Which was why Sándor, and everyone else agreed it was important to examine the tear. It was either a very clever diversion by Black Blood, or legitimate.

Eric looked over to Clara. Her, Caleb, Noah, Matt and Art, Natasha, and Sándor were there with Eric. The rest of the pack were working with Red Tide, deeper in South Side, to stir up some sort of trouble. Avery didn't know what that trouble would be, which meant the rest of them could only sit here and—

The city erupted with noise. Everyone looked down the street toward South Side, but the winding road and tall buildings blocked their view. They could hear it though. Crashing, smashing, and roars.

They all looked up as a cloud of debris shot into the air, and spread, almost like a mushroom cloud, with bits of red mixed in.

“Holy sh-shit,” Tash whispered. Props to her for keeping the Cloak up, because the sound rushed out to hit them, along with heavy vibration. A building had just collapsed.

Roars. Alien screams and shrieks. The oddly colorful sky over South Side darkened, and red splashed a quarter mile into the air. Clouds swirled and crashed down, disappearing behind the distant buildings, before sending another shock wave of vibration and sound their way.

Red Tide and Black Blood were fighting.

Well, if there was anyway Red Tide could create a distraction, this was it. It wasn't like the two hadn't fought before. Street-Tail King was happy to manipulate things from the shadows, and go for easy wins, but Red Tide was a big, angry, powerful spirit. Far as Eric knew, it rose up from the centuries of violence hidden in Dolareido, from even before Antoinette and her buddies showed up. Something to do with the blood, the way Dolareido attracted it, attracted vampires, attracted its weird, unspoken violence. Usually unspoken.

Sometimes it was easy to forget — he'd been born and lived here his whole life after all — Dolareido was a strange city. No wonder Luna took an interest.

Clara took two paw steps toward the noise, froze, growled, and looked back toward the tear they were scouting. Slowly, she looked to Eric, and the steady look in her eyes said it all: she wanted to help Avery.

Eric wanted to, too. They weren't even his pack, and he wanted to. He didn't know what Avery would do, now that Red Tide was causing a ruckus. Black Blood had made it clear she wasn't to interfere with his city, and if she did, he'd get his hands dirty. So the fuck was Avery going to do? She should have been here, with him and the others, in case shit hit the fan and they needed her.

That's what Clara was thinking, and it was quickly becoming what Eric was thinking. Say one thing for the bitch, Avery could get shit done.

The explosions grew closer. All six wolves and one vampire crouched low as a dust cloud rushed out onto the street, another crash of sound preceding it and slamming over the group with enough impact to have them shaking in its quake. Sándor didn't move an inch.

The explosions grew closer again, until enormous chunks of rubble flew into the air, and smashed into the street where they could see it. Still a ways away, but close enough it wasn't hidden by the winding street and buildings anymore.

They all froze until they looked like Sándor, as an enormous, black-tinted skeletal arm reached into the sky, body hidden by buildings, and slammed down. The city shook, and more rubble scattered skyward before raining down on everything within a hundred yards. Holy shit. But Black Blood's fury was met with an equally big, red tentacle, something that looked like it was made of blood and crimson leather, and it swept through the air before crashing down against a building out of their sight as well. Same effect. The whole city shook. Red Tide was not fooling around.

Eric had managed to avoid the giant kraken creature and its weird half-blood body in all his hunts. It didn't take many trips into the Hisil to learn that Black Blood and Red Tide were two juggernauts battling over the city the same way Godzilla might. Big, strong, and unstoppable. Avery was smart to avoid engaging them directly. With titans like them, you had to find out their bans and banes first, and smart assholes like Black Blood were good at hiding them.

Everyone in Dolareido either gave those two their room, or served them. Avery and her pack were the exception, because they were all apparently suicidal.

Sure enough, as the explosive battle loomed closer, the red wraiths circling the tear on the outskirts of the city headed toward them. Black Blood calling for reinforcements. Except one stayed behind.

Red wraiths spent a lot of time hovering around as wisps, clouds of red and black smoke. But when they needed to be involved and hands on, they solidified. Hissing creatures, they had human-like torsos, but no face, just a flat black mass with red demon eyes that glowed. Long arms with equally long claws, but no legs. They floated, like ghosts.

They were called red wraiths, or blood wraiths, cause each of the obsidian, hovering legless creature with claws, also looked like they were wearing a strange cloak or robe of dripping red. Literally dripping, as if they had wounds that never closed.

The gang expected this. Even had a plan on how to deal with it. Rush it while protected by Tash's cloak, and kill it. Avery's pack wasn't really good at subtlety.

All wolves looked to Tash, and she glanced back to Sándor. The man pushed off the wall of the building, and slowly, casually, got into a runner's stance. You didn't need Uratha senses to tell the man was calm, like this was just another Wednesday for him. No increase in heart rate, no jitters, nothing.

They took off in a dead sprint for the spirit. It was out in the open at the end of a street that merged into the desert, and they didn't know how effective the Cloak would be against it. Better to come out running.

Good thing they did. They still had fifty feet to go before the spirit turned its eyes to face them. They widened as realization set in, and it turned to flee.

And then it flew up.

Ok, kink in the plan, kink in the plan! The fuck were they supposed to do if the creature could fly? They—

Sándor swept past them, over them, and into the sky. A dark silhouette erupted from the man's back, utterly massive wings that looked colossal on his frame, and they spread to catch the air. They launched him with a single flap that sent the wind out in an explosion around them, and Sándor rode the wind like he'd done this a million times before.

He came down on the spirit hands first, thirty feet in the air, and the two came crashing down with a heavy thud. Sándor landed on top, and for a single second, the silhouette of the gargoyle was visible again, its titanic limbs, and its huge claws. And he used them on the spirit.

It only took a single second for the crew to catch up once he landed, but by then, the spirit was already wounded and dying. It slashed out, but Eric bit into one wrist, Caleb bit into the other, and they ripped its hands off as it flailed. It died a few seconds later.

“Mission ... s-successful?” Tash asked.

The wolves all looked around. Natasha quickly wrapped them in her Cloak again, but there was a lot of people in their group, and they'd literally just had a man fly through the air. It'd been quick thinking, but if anyone had been watching, they'd have seen the gargoyle, the pack, and the vampire.

But then, two giants were fighting in the city, not too far from where the group was. And considering the ridiculous amount of destruction Eric could hear, it was a safe bet all nearby spirits were either watching the destruction, or hiding for their lives.

“Get rid of the evidence,” Sándor said, gesturing to the body. Not an order. The man simply asked in the most deadpan way possible. Caleb didn't hesitate, grabbed the spirit, and carted it off. It'd disperse into essence soon enough, or some rat bottom-feeder choir would find and devour it.

Clara and Eric hopped up onto the gas station, transformed back into human form, and stood near the tear that hovered at about head level. Sándor and Tash joined them. Noah, Matt, and Art backed off and returned to the city edge to hide in shadows. If someone else did spot them, hopefully they could do something, but even with Red Tide distracting the whole damn city, they probably only had minutes.

They all looked at Sándor, and waited.

“W-What do you see?” Tash asked.

Sándor stared at the hole. It hovered about five feet over the gas station’s roof, perfect staring height, and the dude did just that. Stared, with wide eyes.

And this close, Eric could understand why. They all stepped up closer, and the world went silent as the four—three of them stared into the endless, golden oblivion the tear was exposing. One of them was a bit too short to see.

“Um ... uh...”

Eric held out his arm, elbow bent and forearm up, and created a hook for Tash. She smiled up at him, reached up, put a foot against his thigh, and half hung from his arm, half pressing her weight into his leg, so she could get an extra twenty inches height. So damn light, he barely noticed her boot pressing into him.

“W ... Wow,” she said. Yeah, wow. “Sándor, you’ve ... n-never been there before?”

“No.”

“D-Do you know what, er, where it is?”

“No.”

A lie, maybe? Sándor had some idea, but he didn't want to tell them, judging from the expression on his face.

“Can we go in?” Clara asked.

Sándor shook his head. “No.”

“Why not? I mean, we've been in dream realms, and we've even been to the underworld. Can't—”

Sándor reached out, and gently pushed down the hand she'd been raising.

“You haven't been to the underworld,” he said, “not the underworld you mean. You've been to a realm of ghosts. It is not the same thing.”

“Ok, so ... what? What's that mean?”

“It means ... there are places too high, and too low, for living things to visit.” He held out a hand and moved it close to the strange white oblivion, but as his hand grew closer to the tear, he winced. The endless gold and white of whatever they stared into didn't like his hand, and tiny waves of white struck out against it.

Instant smells of burning. Everyone pulled their heads back and stared at Sándor as he casually lowered his hand, burn marks on his palm. That had to hurt, but the man barely reacted. Just, lowered his hand as he stared into the white before them.

“This shouldn't be here,” he said.

Clara choked on a forced chuckle. “Yeah, we know. That's why we're investigating.”

“It shouldn’t be here. It can’t be here. It...”

“Can it take us to another tear or not?” Eric asked. “Or, you know, same tear, just tearing into another place on Tash’s map.”

“It could. It probably does, but we can’t go there. Nothing living, nothing physical, no spirit or ghost or Changeling or...” He shook his head. “We can’t go through.”

“Then we’re done here,” Clara said. “Avery is going to be pissed.”

Pissed was an understatement. Investigating the tear had basically meant go through it, and learn more about whatever was happening, and how to stop it. It might have taken them to a new spot to put on the map. But from how it reacted to Sándor’s hand, it’d incinerate them in white fire if they tried.

Well, fuck.

---

“Holy shit,” Clara said. “You guys ok?”

Avery groaned as she slowly sat herself on the couch. “Fine.”

They all went to Eric’s apartment. Lot bigger than Avery’s, good for a meeting. Plus, he had to feed Kat.

Kat didn’t mind the company of course, and she took her time visiting each person for her expected pets and scratches. Which was a lot. Avery’s pack of a dozen, Sándor, and Tash, each got a visit from Kat, even Avery herself, who glared down at the dumb feline as she got comfortable on Avery’s lap.

Avery, David, and Carter all sat on his main couch, each of them pretty beat up, with torn up clothes that showed they got into a fight of some kind or another. But they weren’t bleeding, so it couldn’t have been that bad if they could heal from it. Even werewolves took longer than an hour to heal from the really nasty wounds, the sort caused by silver or powerful spirits. Or chainsaws, according to Carter.

“Eric, why is your cat ... doing that.” Avery gestured down at Kat, and how she snuggled onto the woman’s lap.

“Because she sees that I don’t mind you.” Though he doubted Kat actually cared what Eric thought. “And because you obviously don’t like her.”

“ ... yeah, I don’t like her.”

Tash giggled. “B-Because you’re ignoring her, she likes you.”

Avery threw up her hands. A big enough gesture to scare off any other cat. But Kat was Kat, and she gave no fucks. If anything, she purred louder.

“Your cat is—”

“Brain damaged, I know,” Eric said. Of course, the moment he opened the drawer with the cans of wet cat food, Kat meowed and came running. By the time he had a can in his hand, she was already rubbing against his legs.

“What happened?” Clara asked.

“Red Tide’s distraction was fucking chaos. Red wraiths showed up, and Red Tide started attacking anyone nearby. That included us. Black Blood itself showed up, and ... I guess Red Tide attacked us so Black Blood wouldn’t suspect us, but Red Tide pulls no punches. Some other spirits got involved, trying to take advantage of the chaos; fuckers hate us.”

Spirits did seem to default to hating Uratha. It made hunts into the Hisil pretty fucking annoying, but there was also a strange thrill to being universal hated, and feared. Uratha were strong, and could deal with spirits in ways most things couldn't. But it also meant spirits might do something like get involved in a fight if they saw an opportunity to kill a werewolf. The respect and power said spirit might earn, if they managed to devour one of the pack, would be huge.

Bunch of assholes.

“We didn't know what Red Tide would do,” Carter said. “I don't think it knew what it'd do. But it worked ... right?”

All eyes fell to Sándor. Eric, in strategic brilliance, took extra long scooping food out of the can for Kat, in the corner of the room, out of the crossfire.

Sándor shook his head. “We got close enough to touch it. But ... we can't cross it. And I can't go there ... ever.”

Avery raised a brow. “Come again?”

“There are realms,” Sándor said, “that we can visit. The realm of spirits, you know well. The realm of dreams, Begotten know well. There are others. The realm of ghosts. The brighter places of the dream Begotten avoid. Darker places of the Great Below. You can go higher in the place of dreams, and higher to places above that. You can go deeper in the Great Below, where ... where more than the dead die.”

More than the dead die. For a stoic, quiet man, Sándor could be damn poetic when he wanted to be. Creepy.

“I can go high in the dream world, and deep in the land of the dead. But...” He shuddered as he looked down at his burned palm. “That tear cut into some place far above the dream, far above the places above those places. As if Black Blood had cut into...”

They all stared at him as the room grew deadly silent, until the only noise was Kat's licking and munching.

Heaven. He was talking about Heaven, or something like it.

Avery shrugged. "Ok, so, what's that mean to us?"

"It means ... I don't know. It means whatever Black Blood's planning isn't ... as small a plan as we thought."

"Small!? It's trying to tear everything down and—"

"That's small scale, compared to ... compared to what I was looking into."

Avery half got up, winced, groaned, and sat back down. "Explain then, for fuck's sake."

"I can't go into the realm that tear cut into."

"Yeah, I get it. So?"

"Monsters go where we want. There isn't anywhere I can't go. If there's a door, I can open it." His eyes hardened as he looked at Avery. "Anywhere. But ... I couldn't go where that tear went."

"W-What Sándor means," Tash said, "is ... we thought Black Blood was maybe trying to tear down the Gauntlet, right? And then w-we realized, maybe it's trying to do more, cause the tears cut into other places too. Other 'realms'," Natasha air-quoted realms, "that, um, are nearby?" She looked to Sándor, and he nodded. "Like, m-maybe it was going to turn everything into a big mixing pot, mix all the realms together. But ... b-b-but if Black Blood is making tears to ... to sacred places, maybe it's not about that?"

"Sacred places?" Clara asked.

“Places we’re not allowed to go,” Sándor said. “Places only ... souls can go, I guess.”

Avery laughed. “You guess? Thought you Begotten knew everything.”

“ ... we don’t.”

Well, that silenced the room pretty quick. Except for Kat. Finished, the damn cat jumped back on the couch, and without hesitation, once again got comfy on Avery’s lap, completely oblivious to the cold blanket smothering everyone in the room.

Sighing, Avery eventually set a hand on Kat’s head, and absentmindedly pet her as she looked down at the cat in thought.

“What’s that mean for us?”

Sándor slowly shook his head. “I’m not sure. But ... I think, according to the ritual symbol Tash drew, the center of the ritual is probably not the point we need to worry about. It wouldn’t make sense if the ritual is a 3D shape, anyway. It’s probably a point above or below, finishing the crystal shape, points where Black Blood is ... reaching, maybe using points higher and lower, to reach even higher, and even lower.”

“You said those places were dangerous,” Noah said.

Right, Sándor had said there were places in the dream, and in the underworld, that were ‘above’ and ‘below’ the six places he’d found in both realms. He could go to those places, but said they were dangerous. And apparently, the tear they found tonight, cut into a place even higher. Fucking confusing.

“They are dangerous. But we don’t have a choice, do we?” the Begotten said.

No, they didn't have a choice. Eric sighed as he sat down on his couch arm by Avery.

"Guess we go scouting," he said. "And if we're going into deep places, or really high places, we can't do that without your help, Sándor. Or maybe the others."

The others had avoided involving themselves in this tear business, except for Azamel supposedly being the first one to warn the Prince something was up. Other than that, Athalia, Fiona, and Mark didn't get involved. Probably on order too, since it'd become clear Black Blood was their enemy, and Azamel didn't want them getting hurt. Sándor apparently didn't agree.

When Azamel died, Sándor would be the big bad Begotten. They'd listen to him. Maybe then, he'd ask them to help?

Of course, the idea of Fiona getting neck deep in dangerous shit irked Eric. He liked Fiona. He still felt a bit guilty about touching her; way too young and bubbly for him. Sure, she was a lot smarter and more mature than she appeared, a lot like Jessy. But in ways, wasn't.

It was funny. Damien was older than Eric, but a better match for the young woman.

"I should go alone," Sándor said.

Caleb laughed. "You know that's bullshit, dude."

Clara nodded. "You take a group of us to scout a location, and we'll go together. Maybe not the whole pack, but I know Tash is going, and she's still got the boys on a leash. I'll probably go." A quick glance to her leader confirmed. "Noah and Caleb too."

"And me, I guess," Eric said. Because hey, if everyone was jumping off a cliff, there had to be a good reason.

~~Damien~~

Two days later.

Bella, Steve, Kass, and Garner all being injured meant the Invictus had an opening. Much as Jack did his best to keep the peace, the ramifications of the curse's actions meant the Invictus had the opportunity to push an advantage. And they did. Predictably, the Carthians pushed back, and they pushed hard.

And this time, people did die.

The Right Hands weren't there to see it, but a couple Carthians and Invictus died. In fire. Kindred on site said it was an accident, that one of the Carthians had one of those devices from Terra Den, and didn't plan to use it, but the brawl grew extreme. Kindred were using powers left and right in the basement of an old apartment building in Devil's Corner; officially abandoned, thankfully.

Buildings in Devil's Corner were built in that strange time period when humans thought it was a good idea to build large buildings with wood and brick. The result was extreme.

Damien stared up at the burning building as the fire department arrived. No delay this time, they arrived in droves, and immediately took to the ten-floor building with enormous geysers of water. But the building was doomed. It burned and burned, and Damien stared at the flame from across the street atop another building.

Vicky and Parker stood beside him.

"This was one of your dens?" Damien asked. They'd been the ones to describe what happened.

"Yeah," Vicky said, eyes wide as she looked the burning building up and down. "We had ... a bunch of prostitutes working here. We got them out, barely.”

“More kine you enthralled with Jacob’s help?” Good to remind them he hadn’t forgotten those two had a strange artifact that helped them enthrall kine, an artifact they got from Jacob.

Parker grunted and threw Damien a hard glare, but he sighed and nodded as he looked back to the burning building.

“Jacob had nothing to do with this attack. He helped us out, and we let him dig his fingers into the kine in the area. This, this was the Carthians.”

Much as Damien wanted to interrogate the man further about what Jacob might have been up to with their help, he was right. This fire was because the Carthians and Invictus got into a fight, and it went bad, just like Jack knew it would.

And there wasn’t any chance Jacob let either of these two in on any secrets. They were hedonists, concerned only with their own pleasure, nothing more.

Damien believed them. If this was one of their brothels like they said it was, they didn’t want to lose it. The war was reaching out further and further, and now it was affecting everyone. At this rate, it wouldn’t be long before it reached out and affected Kindred who stayed out of reach of most issues. Leauvion and her acting troupe, for example.

The Begotten, for another.

He shook his head. No way the fighting would drift into their neighborhood. Sure, all Kindred used the tunnels, but the Begotten were well out of the way of the most commonly used tunnels. But then again, fights were chaotic, could lead to chases, and...

Damien pulled up his phone, and called Jack.

No answer.

First reaction: mild panic. The Right Hands were all on call with each other with this war on. The only reason they could have for turning off the notifications on their phones, or ignoring them, was they were in some sort of stealth mission, or they were indisposed. Or dead. So he called Jessy.

“Yellow.”

“Jessy. I’m here in Devil’s Corner.”

“Shit, yeah. That apartment building on fire. Our fault?”

“Carthian and Invictus brawl turned ugly.”

“Shiiit.”

“One of Vicky and Parker’s brothels.”

“Shiiiiit.”

“Four dead. Two Invictus, Donny and Carlyle. Two Carthians as well.”

“Shi—”

“I get it. And Jack isn’t answering his phone.”

“Jack did seem a little preoccupied last I talked to him. And we know there’s no chance he’s dead.”

That was true. Much as Jack had to worry about with the amount of enemies he’d made, there was essentially zero chance the man was dead. Unless someone found him with a high powered sniper rifle from an extreme distance and took out his head, or hit him with a nuke, the curse wasn’t going away any time soon.

“I—hold on.” A message from Jack.

~I’m gonna do something really stupid, and I need you and Jessy to head down to the Carthian district and stir up trouble. I need a distraction.~

“Jack ... is asking us to do something.”

Jessy laughed. “Of course he is. You know we’re both seniors on him, right? By fifty fucking years?”

“The boy has a knack for tactical reasoning and quick thinking.”

“Pfft, I guess. What’s he want?”

Damien looked at Vicky and Parker. They were both watching him, and making no efforts to hide their eavesdropping.

“Let me call you back.”

“Fine fine.”

---

“We seriously gonna do this alone?” Jessy asked.

“Yes.”

“Why can’t we ask for help?”

“Because Jack doesn’t want us killing anyone. And now that people are dying, we can’t tell fellow Invictus to avoid killing.”

Jessy grumbled as she leaned over the building’s rooftop railing. Most rooftops had them in Dolareido, railings or raised edges, as if Antoinette and the others knew they’d be frequently used by both Kindred and kine when they built the city. Considering the woman’s intelligence, she probably did know.

“Can’t believe Carlyle and Donny are dead. Holy shit, I was talking to them last night.”

Damien shook his head. “Don’t. If you get angry about it, you’re going to kill the Carthians we’re supposed to be distracting.”

Jessy frowned at him, but it didn’t last long. Eventually she relented and nodded before looking back out to the crowd.

“Eric says the shit they’re dealing with is getting even bigger than we thought.”

It was Damien’s turn to frown. “The moment we’re done with this war, we have to shift targets.”

“Done with this war? Yeah, I guess. But Garry and Michael have been at each other’s throats for a long time, you know? And even if they weren’t, Carthians and Invictus are like oil and water. Shit just doesn’t mix.”

That was true. Even if Jack managed to find a way to end this war, and return Garry and Michael to a truce, it’d be temporary. Somehow, somewhen, they’d start fighting again. Maybe it would be better to try and wipe the Carthians out entirely?

Not possible. Not only was Garry smart enough to have defensive plans, likely extreme ones, even if he did die along with his covenant, other Kindred would move to Dolareido and restart the movement. Unlike the Lancea et Sanctum, there was no shortage of young Kindred who felt their anarchist ideals were a better fit for Kindred society.

“We do what we can for now.”

“I guess.” She sighed as she rotated her shoulders, getting ready for a fight. “God, I want this shit over. I want to go back to Eric, and get stuffed by some giant werewolf dick, you know?”

Damien slapped his forehead. “Must you?”

“Ha! Come on, I know you’ve been fucking a spider monster girl. You can’t give me shit.”

“Fiona talks to you too much.”

“Fiona talking to me is half the reason you’re such a lucky man.”

“I’m sorry, what?”

Jessy snorted on a laugh. “What, you think Fiona learned how to do that thing she did last night on her own?”

Damien squirmed. “You—”

“I didn’t touch her, calm down. Haven’t touched her since that night at the club with Eric.” Laughing, Jessy reached out and gave him one of her patented buddy punches in the shoulder. “Anything else you want to try with her? I can give her tips. I can give you tips.”

“No thanks.”

“Aw. You doing that guy thing, where you don’t talk about shit?”

“I’m doing that guy thing where I keep the details of my sex life private.”

“Well that’s no fun. Come on, talk to Eric about the sexy stuff! Trade pointers. Share measurements.”

“I’m not going to—”

“Haha! I’m fucking kidding, about the measurements thing anyway. Don’t mean you can’t talk to each other about what things girls seem to like and shit.”

“I saw far too much of what you like through your window.”

“Well if you didn’t go spying on the city with a fucking telescope all the time, you wouldn’t have seen it! And it’s not like you had to gawk while I enjoyed my ghouls.” She turned, put her back to the railing, and rested her elbows on it as she grinned at him. “Bet you enjoyed the show, though.”

He rolled his eyes. “You are attractive, I admit that.”

“Damn right.”

“But I never indulged myself watching you, if that’s what you were thinking.”

“Ha. I was wondering, yeah. Lot of people do, you know? Jerk off — or jill off — while watching the windows. That’s half the fun of putting on a show, knowing people are watching and enjoying it.” Her smile faded. “Much as I love Eric, and the sex is fucking great, I do kinda miss having more legs in the bed, you know?”

“I don’t know.”

She grinned. “I can guarantee if you asked Fiona, she’d consider it. Girl is just as much a hornball as me. You lucky fucker.”

Fiona was definitely that. And maybe in some sort of strange, distant future, Damien would do something as crazy as a threesome. But not yet.

“She’s not the barrier there. I am.”

“Ah man, you too?”

“Too? Eric?”

“Yeah. I mean, I can tell he’d love to ram that werewolf dick into some kine girl I’ve got my teeth in and legs around.” She fisted the air, mimicking a sexual motion. “But he’s hesitant. PTSD from shit with his wife, and probably from living the rich life only for it to all to go up in smoke.”

Damien sighed. Why were they having this conversation? Jessy reaching out and trying to be his friend, he supposed. Jack and Damien talked about books and psychology when they wanted to have a fun chat, not sex. At least, not usually sex, and they both did their best to navigate the topic without too many details.

But not Jessy.

“We should trade sex tapes! Tash and I do it all the time.”

“All the time?”

“Yeah. Got a few vids of her now. Holy shit that little thing can take a pounding! And she makes my sex tapes look like cheap corner store garbage. Which, I mean, they kinda are. I just set up the laptop and point it at me and stream shit sometimes. Tash though, she’s gone full blown porn director. Fancy cameras and lighting and everything.”

Sometimes, just sometimes, in a tiny little dark corner in his mind, Damien could understand Lucas’s desire to purge the city of deviancy.

“I—”

“And don’t tell me you got a problem with public sex. Fiona told me about that time you fucked her in Bloodlust. Jen and Beatrice showed up and you fucked her anyway, right?”

“I ... that...”

Jessy winked at him. “I know all and see all.”

“You’re a gossip.”

“So’s Fiona.”

That, was true. Jessy’s gossiping annoyed him, but Fiona’s gossiping was cute and endearing. Or more likely, he was being biased.

“I don’t plan to have anyone else in our bed any time soon. And Fiona is happy with that.”

“Buuuuuuuuuuuuut?”

“ ... but I imagine you’ll be telling all this to her later.”

“Of course.”

“And you’ll put the idea of filming a sex tape in her head. Any idea she’ll love.”

“Undoubtedly. That little redhead is a perfect fit for Dolareido.”

Lord help him.

“I ... agree. She is.”

“Ha, right? And those tits, my god. Gs?”

“I’m not telling you her cu—you already know, don’t you?”

“Now you’re catching on.” She gave him a pat on the arm. “I got a vid from Jack, too. Couple, actually. Want?”

“I know, and no thank you.” That would add a new angle of awkwardness to their friendship he did not want. “Can we focus on the mission please?”

“Ugh, fine fine.”

“ ... am I insane, or am I noticing a pattern, that the women in Dolareido are very, very ... lustful?”

“Dude, you don’t think every girl out there wants to get railed? That the idea of getting thrown over a table and just fucking pounded doesn’t get her wet? You even pay attention to what erotic books and movies make the most money, and who’s buying the tickets?” She shrugged. “Girls are usually just more careful who they share this with, and the words they use. Not in Dolareido, though. Fuck that noise. Girls can be just as shameless as the guys. My favorite part of the city.”

Dolareido. Special for so many strange reasons.

---

Jessy kicked in the door of one of the apartment buildings, and they both went in, guns blazing. Literally. Damien kept his pistol in his left hand, sword in his right, and fired several shots into the walls of the building. The heavy gauge rounds would penetrate the walls and cut into the various rooms on the bottom floor, as well as announce their presence. No fear of unwanted deaths. Only Kindred lived in this building.

“The fuck!?” the one Kindred in the lobby said. But she went silent when Damien snapped his gun in her direction, and put a bullet through her heart. A neonate, a fledgling at that, some young girl who’d likely been given guard duty for this nest of young vampires.

The cruel, harsh reality of being a Kindred: age mattered. Fledglings could barely function, neonates were weak, ancilla were strong, and elders were gods. The girl fell over, groaning and crying, unused to pain, but she’d recover eventually.

Jessy came in with a shotgun. Damien had insisted otherwise, but relented when Jessy promised she wouldn’t aim for any torsos or heads. He wasn’t entirely convinced. Yes, they both believed in Jack's cause, but Jessy had issues with the Carthians. Damien had abandoned his issues with them with the death of Lucas, but Jessy was probably itching for an opportunity for some payback.

But he trusted her. Barely, but he did.

Kindred responded quickly. They poured out of the apartments and into the hall, leaving Jessy and Damien both aiming down a hallway filled with Kindred and open doors.

"Y'all have seen this movie before!" Jessy shouted. "Love John Woo!" Movie? What? Who?

Jessy threw herself to the side, and unloaded several shots from the shotgun as she did, mid air. Pellets ripped and tore walls, opened doors, the tile floor, everything. True to her word, she didn't aim directly for anyone, but that didn't mean the spray didn't catch some unlucky Kindred in the arms, legs, or even the chest and head. They screamed as they fell back, but none took serious damage, relative to what Kindred could handle.

Problem. More than fledglings lived here. Neonates with a decade or three under their belt came out of their apartments, and they didn't hesitate, unlike their young friends. Armed with pistols and shotguns of their own, they pointed directly at Jessy, and fired as she scrambled. The small lobby contained only a single staircase, and the path of apartments, but thankfully the hall entrance was smaller than the lobby, giving Damien and Jessy a wall to hide behind. He took the left. She took the right.

"Come and get it, bitches!" She poked her head out long enough to fire again, before quickly ducking behind cover as a hail of bullets came her way. The building's outer walls may have been concrete, but the interior was wood, and bits and pieces of it and drywall alike flew past her.

Which gave Damien the opportunity to poke his head out and fire a couple shots. The hall was a mess of splintered doors used as cover and Kindred firing through the holes Jessy's shotgun had made, but Damien managed to spy a few opportune shots. One Kindred screamed as they lost a toe. Another fell back, hollering as a bullet ripped through their knee.

Attacking an apartment building filled with fledglings and neonates was one of the greatest insults a covenant could give another. A good distraction. A good idea from Jack.

It was a fellow Mekhet that made a dash down the hall as Damien and Jessy reloaded, that got the worst of it. The moment she passed through the arch, Damien slashed down with his sword, and her right hand flew up into the air along with her shotgun. A moment later, it burst into a cloud of ash as it landed on the floor along with the gun.

The woman screamed and fell, and rolled on the floor, clutching the stump where her wrist used to be. She'd regrow the hand eventually, but Damien did not envy her the pain. He knew what it felt like.

Jessy, on the other hand, was not feeling so empathetic. She looked down at the screaming woman with a knowing eye, but a glance back up at Damien stayed her hand.

She spun around, and blasted a shell up at the stairs over their heads.

"Don't think you can sneak up on me motherfuckers!" She fired several more shells up at the stairs, and pellets ricocheted in a chaotic mess. But most of the hail of metal sneaked through the steps, and the Kindred above shrieked and yelled as they jumped back.

Part one of the distraction, complete. Damien nodded to Jessy and then to the door behind them. She did the same, and the two of them ran for the exit they'd come in from literally two minutes earlier.

They weren't in North Side. Close, but not quite. The Carthian half of South Side was filled with people, but they mostly stayed in bed at night, unlike the other half of South Side. Run down buildings and apartments, but not as bad as Devil's Corner. Damien and Jessy were mostly in the clear to make a ruckus without accidentally killing any humans. Mostly.

But the Carthians knew that too. As Damien and Jessy ran back out into the street, bullets rained down on them from above as a few eager Kindred poked their heads over rooftop ledges. Submachine guns. Damien and Jessy slid into cover behind a car, and covered their heads as the sounds of metal slamming into metal at high speed deafened them.

“Dude, Cloak us!”

“A little hard to do when we're being shot at!”

She rolled her eyes, poked her head up over the car, and shot up at the building across the street. The Kindred above ducked back into cover, and used a different tactic: aiming over the rooftop edge without actually looking. Which meant bullets went everywhere.

“Fucking hell man, Cloak us!”

“Give me a moment, for fuck's sake! I—” He pointed his pistol at the door of the apartment building they'd just left, and fired several bullets, each whizzing past Jessy's head and crashing into the metal door frame. The two Kindred about to stick their heads out jumped back into safety, but a moment later they came out just enough to return fire.

Jessy holstered her shotgun, grabbed the passenger door of the car they hid behind, ripped it off, and turned it into a shield. With left hand now preoccupied, she took out her pistol, and fired through its window at the two Kindred trying to get out of the apartment building.

“Do something!” she shouted.

The panic was half fake, half real. They had to be a distraction. According to Jack, they had to be a very obvious distraction, and obviously a distraction. The damn boy didn’t elaborate, and now Damien wished he’d forced him to, because now bullets came at him from above and beside, and the last place he wanted to die was beside Jessy in the middle of a pointless firefight.

Using the Cloak under duress was not easy. It was like trying to do a card trick, while being shot at. But Damien and Daniel had trained plenty, and that included using Obfuscate while being assaulted. Damien closed his eyes for a moment, blocked out the insane onslaught of sound, and summoned his vitae.

He grabbed Jessy’s shoulder, and focused. With vitae pouring up into his core, he forced it out into the world around them, and over him, Cloaking himself and his partner in its power.

“Alright, let’s go. Next target.”

“Christ, Jack owes me a hundred porn vids for this.” No longer shooting, Jessy put the door down, holstered the pistol and drew the shotgun, and followed him.

The Cloak of Night was not perfect. It was limited by two factors: his talent and abilities, but also the eyes of whoever he was trying to fool. A drunkard was easy to fool. A hardboiled detective with several decades of service would be a hard set of kine eyes to deceive. Vampire eyes currently shooting at the target trying to Cloak themselves, were borderline impossible to trick. But Damien was skilled, quite skilled, and both he and his partner managed to escape from behind cover as the assaulting Kindred suddenly found their targets difficult to see.

Difficult, but not impossible. Their eyes would glide off Damien and Jessy, or see nothing but a hazy blur where the two were, but they still had some idea of where they were. And the only thing that kept the Cloak from breaking, was Damien constantly reapplying it, which took vitae. He couldn't do it forever, and the Carthians kept shooting at their general location regardless.

Jessy was no Mekhet or Daeva, but she was fast, and she kept up with Damien as he sped up. Their jog turned into a run, run into sprint, and sprint into a gallop no human could match. But they were pinned down, with more Carthians poking their heads out windows to lay waste to the area they thought Damien and Jessy were with bullets, bullets, and more bullets.

Step two: get up on a roof, and get the Carthians chasing. The chasing part was done a bit prematurely, and Damien snarled as said chasing Kindred managed to cut a bullet across his shoulder. Jacket and flesh tore, but nothing debilitating, and Damien snapped his hand and grabbed a fire escape railing. Jessy followed, catching his meaning without a word, and the two ran up the old, bent, rickety stairs of metal as the hail of bullets and pellets continued.

It was a tall building. Dirty windows, windowsills with peeling paint, and old brick stained by time surrounded the two Kindred as they scaled the wall. Some kine looked out the window, but remained oblivious to Damien and Jessy, as Damien's touch blanketed the metal stairs with Touch of Shadow. The shaking, the creaking, only a kine paying close attention would notice. Or a vampire.

The two Right Hands jumped the final ten feet up to the rooftop, but another Kindred waited for them. Damien recognized her, an up-and-coming woman named Jody, and she aimed both her pistols at Damien's head.

Jessy pushed him aside, full body tackle. Bang bang. Jessy's scream announced she'd been shot. Damien crashed to the rooftop, rolled, and dove at Jody. She tried to right her aim, but as Damien closed the distance, he shot her, and the bullet landed in one of her thighs. Screaming, Jody took a step back as the pain hit her, and Damien closed the rest of the distance in moments. She didn't get the chance to shoot again, Damien slicing his sword up and cutting off one hand. And as she fell back, he brought the sword down, and cut off her other hand.

Jody fell on her ass and stared at both her wrists as she screamed, but managed to bite it down halfway as she looked up at Damien.

He pointed his pistol at her, but he already knew he wouldn't shoot. And the fear in her eyes when he aimed at her sent a jolt of nausea through him.

"Shut up and don't move." Sighing, Damien walked over to Jessy and crouched beside her. "Wounded?"

"Yeah. Bitch got me twice in the chest." Jessy stood up and rubbed her chest, exposing the bullet wounds. They didn't penetrate far, probably an inch. A bulletproof vest would have worked better than her own flesh, but Gangrels hated trying to move in one. 9mm bullets weren't the most effective against Kindred capable of hardening their bodies anyway, such as Ventrue and Gangrels. It made logical sense that she push him out of the way and take the bullet for him.

But he also knew that thought hadn't crossed her mind at all when she pushed him out of the way. She did it because it wouldn't even occur to her to do otherwise, like it would Damien.

Sighing, Damien helped her to her feet. "Thank you."

“Oh shut up, come on.” She pushed him off, but she teetered a little as she did.

Damien frowned, but there'd be no point in helping her. He knew that about her as well.

He broke into a run, and she followed. Cloaked, the two ran together, jumping across rooftops as they made their way through Carthian territory. They still had more ruckus to make.

~~Jack~~

He sat in the big empty room, and waited. A damn big room too, the basement of an abandoned library near the edge of South and North Side. There were people nearby, other buildings that had people in them, apartments and casinos. But the old library had a deep, deep basement. Apparently it'd been a storage facility for shit before becoming a library a hundred years ago, only to die when the internet swooped in and took over.

A lot of libraries adapted, became internet and information centers in other ways. Not in Dolareido. It was a surprise a library ever got off the ground at all. There was a bigger one in South Side, at a university, but you could barely call it a library anymore. An information hub, all computers and tablets, nothing more.

This library was the love project of someone who loved books, and no good deed goes unpunished. Alas, the tragic case of Dolareido. Antoinette would have found it poetic.

Jack looked around at the empty, dingy old room, the concrete walls, floor, dirty wood beams, and steel support pillars. And he grinned as Garry kicked in the door, literally. Old building, wooden door. It was bound to happen.

“Jack,” Garry said, and he stomped his way into the room. “I’m going to fucking kill you.”

Jack shrugged, threw his feet up onto the desk he sat behind, the only desk in the big empty room, and smirked at the Gangrel.

“Garry Tones. How nice of you to drop by.”

Chapter 153

~~Jack~~

~Are you alright, master?~ Scully asked, perched on a powerline outside.

~I'm fine. Any kine wandering nearby?~

~No.~

~Any signs of Michael?~

~Not yet, ~ Mulder said.

The ability to communicate with his familiars over distances psychically was freaky and awesome. Normally Animalism required some sort of visual or auditory contact. But now that Mulder and Scully were his familiars, dead and revived as half vampire creatures, no auditory or visual connection necessary. Full on magical connection. Ye're a wizard, Harry.

Garry waited, tapping his foot, growing angrier by the second.

“Kill me?” Jack said after a perfect dramatic pause, voice dripping with sarcasm. “What did I do?”

Garry glared at him as he came closer, eyes scanning for weapons. Well, Jack had none. He sat in a crummy old chair behind a crummy old desk, and with his feet up on the desk, he hooked his hands behind his head, and grinned at the Gangrel.

Garry growled, a little more like a predator — from Predator — than Jack liked. Scary. While Jack wore his usual suit, various shades of gray, Garry wore the usual as well, a white tank top and blue jeans. And with Jack sitting behind a desk, the situation reeked of a stereotypical Carthian Invictus encounter.

“The fuck are you up to? Fucking rat.” Garry came up to the desk, and licked a fang. Not the sexy kinda lick that Antoinette often did. This was an angry, get ready to fight kinda lick, like an animal getting ready to bite something.

It was an empty room, despite Garry’s obvious concern it wasn’t. No vampire sat around in the dark corners, waiting to spring up out of their Cloak, lit only by the few old bulbs flickering with age. Garry could tell. No explosives covered any surface. It was just a big, empty room.

“Whatever do you mean?”

“Don’t fuck with me, Jack. I know you set up a meeting to talk to one of Roland’s relatives. The fuck are you trying to prove?”

Jack shrugged, and picked up a stack of papers on the desk.

“The fuck do you care?”

“The fuck do I care? You know why I care! Otherwise you wouldn’t be doing this.”

Grinning, Jack looked at the pages, picked one, and set it down where Garry could see the picture. A copy of a newspaper article from fifty years ago.

“1970. Mugger dies, quite randomly, in a dark alley. Stolen purse found on corpse. Cops delivered it to the woman who lost it.”

Garry’s eyes widened.

Jack flipped to another page. “1984. Car accident. A man nearly died, and the hospital needed a special kind of blood for him. Some weird deficiency. And for some reason, a woman no one knew shows up at the hospital to give him a transfusion of her blood. She had the kind of blood he needed to save his life. Turns out she lived in your neck of the woods.”

Garry’s eyes hardened into sharp slits.

Jack flipped to another page. “1920. A robbery goes bad and the robbers take a couple hostage. Later, the robbers are found dead, the hostage were fine, and all the hostages can say is something happened in the dark. Something loud, and crunchy.” He couldn’t help but laugh as he read over the paragraph again. “Cops were pretty perplexed, and it was the 1920s. A lot of them got superstitious about it. Called Dolareido the Blood City.”

“Are you fucking serious? You tracked my...” Garry snarled and looked away. That was as good as admitting.

Jack didn’t track all this information, of course. He didn’t know the first fucking thing about it. Hell, the idea that Garry would go out of his way to help Roland’s family after Roland’s death didn’t cross his mind. It crossed Antoinette’s mind though, and she dug up the details without issue. She was too damn smart.

He kinda wished she’d told him she’d left breadcrumbs pointed to him, though, breadcrumbs for Garry to find. He understood why she didn’t, cause he might given up what was happening if she did, but still, risky.

“As you can probably guess now,” Jack said, gesturing around them, “no member of Roland’s family is on the way. I tricked you into coming here, to take a peek at this.” He gestured at the stack of papers.

“You tricked me here? You?”

“Evidently.” The right word to use to piss him off.

“ ... and the distraction in my turf?”

“You knew it was a distraction.”

“Of course I knew it was a fucking distraction.”

“And when your tail told you I’d been up to something here, you came running when you realized I was distracting you. You have had a tail on my ass for a while now, right? Someone who noticed I was looking up information on Roland’s family? Someone who thought I set up a meeting with them?” Someone that Antoinette tricked. “You thought ‘oh that fucker Jack is distracting me while he gets involved in my shit. Well surprise, Jack, I know where you are’. Sound about right?”

Garry stared at him until his eyes twitched. Every word Jack said was right, and Garry was going to boil over any moment as Jack rubbed it in how stupid the man was. He wasn’t stupid, of course. Antoinette was just really fucking smart, and even she couldn’t have put this together without Jack’s help. Even she didn’t anticipate how important Roland had been to Garry. But, better Garry didn’t know it was her plan, not yet. Probably not ever.

“Jack ... you’ve crossed a fucking line.”

“Have I? Just dug up some records.”

“You don’t—”

“Garry, shut up.” Oh the anger in the man’s eyes. It was kind of thrilling, doing this. As shitty a sport as bullfighting was, Jack couldn’t deny it must have been thrilling as fuck to be a matador. “Roland isn’t the first lover you’ve lost like this, is it? A little bird told me you were romantic with another man, someone in the Lancea et Sanctum. Lucas killed him.” Jack shook his head. “You really just can’t catch a break, can you? No wonder you hate Michael with—”

Garry flipped the desk. Papers went everywhere. Jack barely had time to react as Garry dove under the desk as it flew through the air, and tackled him. But Jack already had the necklace off, safe in his pocket, and his Beast responded just as quickly. He grabbed Garry's wrists before he could get them around Jack's throat, and held him at a distance. Jack was still sitting however, and inertia was a thing.

They landed in a roll. Jack wanted to kick up against the man's chest with both feet, push him off, but physics were a bitch, and the two landed and rolled the moment friction had a say in the matter. And Garry didn't come at him with some weak tackle either. The concrete floor ripped and tore up Jack's suit like a cheese grater as the two rolled until they eventually slammed into the wall.

No longer tethered to each other, Jack rolled up and away faster than Garry, and hopped up to his feet. Up and away. Garry, eyes wide with absolute rage, chased after him, and didn't bother with the slow build up like last time they fought. The man's clothes disappeared into his skin, talons erupted from his boots, a tail shot out from behind him, and giant wings burst from his back, leathery, with a giant claw on each main joint. Similar to the creature Jack had fought last time, but with some minor differences. Maybe he couldn't recreate the same shape every time? Well, either way, a gargoyle creature ran at him, and this time, Jack didn't have a dozen tables and a thousand boxes to hide behind.

Then again, Mulder and Scully weren't in the room either. They were circling outside, keeping an eye open for inevitable arrival of Michael. Which meant Jack didn't have to worry about them.

Garry charged at Jack with all the subtlety of a monster truck, mass included, and his talons tore up the concrete as he grew heavier, and bigger. His tail split into two, and flailed wildly behind him as spikes emerged on its tip. His jaw split down the center, and spread into mandibles. Extra eyes opened on his forehead, seven of them, and his newly formed mandibles grew extra sharp teeth that would have made a crocodile envious.

“Holy shit!” Normally Jack would say that in his head, but sometimes you see something so damn freaky you have to say it out loud.

Garry, on the other hand, didn't say a thing. He probably couldn't with a mouth like that, except maybe for some sinister laughter. Jack was tempted to make the joke about that, but the bastard closed the distance so fast Jack had to roll to the side as the behemoth stomped past him. Each step hit the floor hard and pulsed the area with vibration, like Garry weighed twice as much as one of the werewolves. Sure, he was like a mini Sándor, but that was still huge. Plus, he was really freaky, like 'oh god it's going to eat my brains' freaky.

And the look in his ... nine eyes, was pure, unadulterated hatred.

Garry tried to veer and catch Jack on the roll, but whatever he did to his body, he was too heavy now. It was like a car trying to turn on a dime, or a transport truck. The freak alien gargoyle thing ran past Jack as he turned, and his talons ripped ravines through the floor as he struggled to stop his mass. But he managed, and picked up the chase again as Jack put as much distance between him and the Gangrel as possible.

“Kill you,” Garry said. Ok, apparently he could talk. It didn't sound human in the slightest, like some freaky demon without lips had to use only tongue and throat to make sounds, but he managed. “Fucking kill you!” A loud, raspy voice, mixed with high pitched shrills. Yeap, alien.

But the huge alien came to a stop — after digging a few more trenches in the floor with his talons — when another person walked down the tile stairs and stepped into the concrete room.

“Garry Tones,” Michael said, snarling as his eyes moved from the alien to Jack. “Mister Terry.”

Garry stood there, all nine eyes showing some weird mix of hate, rage, and surprise.

“Well well, Michael, nice of you to drop by,” Jack said, and he waved.

Michael’s eyes hardened. “What is going on here?”

Garry looked between the two of them, and snapped both his tails against the floor, but said nothing. He was confused, too.

Grinning like the biggest jackass alive, Jack turned, and walked back toward the desk Garry flipped. Right past Garry too, to help stoke that rage. The papers were everywhere, but after rooting through a few, Jack stood up with one, and turned to face the two Gangrels.

“Michael. I got a record here about a financial collapse in 1953, a street corner store. “ Jack squinted at the paper, dramatically of course, before smiling at his boss. “And three days later, the store opened for business again. Apparently they’d gotten an anonymous donation, and some new traffic.”

Michael just stared.

“This one is even better. 1921. Looks like whoever held Roland’s funeral didn’t have to pay out of pocket.”

“Jack,” his boss said. There went the titles. “I’m warning you.”

“I got a bunch more here. Looks like one of Roland’s cousins, the one who came to the funeral, suddenly came into a hundred grand. And one of his daughters got a free education. And her grand daughter is currently undergoing leukemia treatment for free. Some sort of strange loophole in the insurance that doesn't actually exist, but Roland's family now thinks it does."

Jack shrugged, and grabbed another paper. "Here's a report about a guy who disappeared for a while. Addict, got mixed up in a bad crowd. Looks like he was about to get, uh, 'iced' by a loan shark, after a thorough round of torture." Yeap, the language on the report actually said 'iced'. "But then the loan sharks let him go. Told him to keep his nose clean, and his debts were wiped." Jack tossed the paper aside. "Now, I don't know about you, but the loan sharks I've met would sooner cut off their own children's fingers than give up an opportunity to make a statement to other customers. Oh, and this guy was dating another person related to Roland."

Garry took a step closer to Jack. "You had no right digging up shit about us, our past."

"This was ... is, our business, Jack. Not yours." Michael came closer as well, his eyes drifting between Garry and Jack, back and forth several times, rage building.

Jack blinked between the two guys. "Wait, our business? You ... knew? You two knew you were both playing guardian angel to Roland's family?"

Michael tilted his head to the side, like he was going to crack his neck. Vampires couldn't crack joints or knuckles, but the effect was still the same: intimidating. Michael was a big, beefy guy, and he looked like he was getting ready for a fist fight.

"We knew," Michael said. "Garry's useless guilt gestures—"

"Gestures? Guilt!?" Garry stomped his way toward Michael. "You try and buy everything! Even love! Money won't wipe away your guilt you fucking—"

Garry was already boiling at full rage, which was exactly what Jack wanted, but Michael still needed—

“You think your empty gestures mean anything, Garry? Roland is dead because of you! You tore him apart, and helping his family with your useless acts means nothing. At least money helps them. You pretend to be a vigilante guardian angel for them, and then disappear. Useless!”

Ok, the gaps in the puzzle were filling in. Garry and Michael knew that the other was helping Roland’s family out, and it turned into some sort of twisted competition over the years. That was a sort of a good thing? Kinda? It meant both had compassion for Roland, and Jack was banking on that. But it also meant they were trapped in some weird guilt spiral that had them trying to outdo the other. Which meant they were probably brewing up this rage guilt bomb over the past century.

Well, he had more than enough fuel to piss them off. Now the problem was whether he could use it to play psychologist.

“This is quite the soap opera drama, isn’t it?” Jack said. “You two idiots had some bad shit go down a long-ass time ago, and now, instead of talking about it and working out your differences, you’ve got the whole damn city fighting.”

Garry stopped marching, and turned to face Jack instead as he clenched his hands into fists. When he unclenched them, he grew out his claws until they were six inches, and sharp on the inside curve, like swords.

“The turf war is not personal,” Garry said.

“Wrong.” Jack kicked some of the pages under his feet. “Contempt, anger, all just bubbling under the surface, edging each little brawl and scuffle until it turned deadly. Four more Kindred just died because of your bullshit! Oh, and don't forget the shit Joe pulled."

"Joe was..." Garry snarled and shook his head. "Joe was—"

"A fucking dog," Michael said. "A dog you fed with your lies and bullshit and delusions of idealism. Viktor hurt him, and you took advantage. And now Bruce is dead because of that mongrel."

More puzzle pieces.

"Joe didn't deserve what Viktor did to him!" Garry roared, outright roared, and the room shook with the vibration. "It doesn't matter anymore. The Carthians and Invictus can't coexist."

"It could!" Jack threw up his hands. Like talking to a fucking wall. Walls. "You don't see what I'm fucking pointing out here? You two idiots have been at each other's throats for so long, making everything worse for everyone, but you're doing it over the most idiotic reason! You both loved this dude, and—"

Michael's body erupted in an explosion of mass, flesh, and madness.

Jack jumped back and stared on as the man's height rose until his head hit the ceiling. His shoulders expanded wide, and his arms grew thicker than his original body. As his suit disappeared into his skin, a third arm erupted from his right shoulder and neck, thinner than the others, but longer, with long claws. His legs remained short, but their width increased more than enough to handle the hulking titan of mutating flesh.

His face devolved, eyes shifting over his bulging bone until everything looked lopsided. One side of his mouth grew larger than the other, and the fangs on that side of his mouth grew large enough to split skin. And as the Gangrel grew heavier and heavier, he leaned forward, and put his weight onto his enormous knuckles, like some sort of mutant gorilla. As he did, another new limb shot out of his body, a tail, something leathery but still the beige color of his normal skin. The tail looked like it was made of hands connected to each other, holding onto wrist after wrist after wrist. John Carpenter would have been proud.

Jack stared on, and glanced at Garry, who didn't look super surprised by Michael's look, but rather by Michael's actions. Apparently he didn't expect Michael to flip out, but he'd seen it before. The two assholes had probably fought each other multiple times in the past, in secret. Elders didn't normally fight, but like Jack was saying, this shit was personal, even if they didn't believe it.

“Jack,” Michael said, voice deep and gurgling in his giant, fat throat. “You tricked me into coming here. You tricked me into thinking you were going to tell Roland's family about me. You tricked me ... and Garry, for what? To tell us that we've been fighting each other because of an emotional grudge based on nothing?” With a heavy, alien snarl, Michael's mouth opened far wider than it should have been able to, exposing a hundred misshapen teeth as rolls of neck fat fell over each other. “Your curse has made you a dangerous ally, but I was willing to put up with it. Now? After this insult? Die.”

How the hell did either of these two dudes manage to talk with fucked up mouths like that?

Michael charged him, the same way a gorilla would. Small, beefy legs doing double time between galloping crunches of his hands against the floor.

Jessy had told Jack about the crazy shit her boss could transform into. She should have taken a picture. He was not ready for the absurd insanity of the disgusting monstrosity straight out of Resident Evil charging toward him. Sure, Jessy could transform into weird stuff too. He'd seen her grow enormous claws and weird, chitinous body armor. He'd seen her warp her skeleton so she could run on all fours, with a fleshy tail to match. Jessy was a strong Gangrel who'd displayed some impressive feats of Protean, but she had centuries to go before she could do anything like Michael was doing now.

He wants to kill you. Hit him. Hit him so hard he learns his fucking place.

Jack waited until the barreling monster was right on top of him, before he jumped, and drove his fist up into the titan's blubbery mess of a face. And he let the rage of the curse pour up through him as he did.

He didn't let the Ripper out. He had no plans to do that. Every time the curse got out, he got his stupid fingers deeper into Jack's mind, made it harder to push him out. But the curse had power. With the necklace off, Jack could summon some of that power. But in order to really tap into its ridiculous strength, he had to call on his Beast, the thing the curse infected. Gangrels did it all the time, but not Ventrue. Calling up the Beast and using it like a war horse was not something a Ventrue would ever be good at. But that didn't mean he couldn't do it.

This war horse came with a second rider, someone trying to rip the reins from Jack's hands. He had to be careful.

His fist collided with Michael's chin, or something approximating it, and the titan slammed up into the wood beams above. The fucker's mass was enormous, and parts of his body continued forward with momentum even as his skull hit the ceiling and came to a quick stop. Body parts a lot harder than Jack thought they'd be slammed into him, and threw him back until he smashed into the back wall, again. Only then did the giant collapse to the floor under his own inertia, like King Kong falling.

Groaning, Jack got up to his feet, and glared at the two bastards as he summoned up more of his vitae. More, and more of it, until he was swimming in it, until its tingling power rippled down into his fingertips.

“You’re both so full of yourselves,” Jack said. “Like Viktor. Just like fucking Viktor. So fucking sure of yourselves, of what you’re doing, of what’s led you here, that you think it’s okay. It’s not okay, you stupid fucks. Christ, how many fucking Kindred have died because of you two. Not Maria, not Viktor, just you two, poisoning every interaction so Carthians and Invictus couldn’t help but hate each other? All because you’re both so fucking full of yourselves you can’t accept you’re both pissed at each other when you should be reconciling! You should be learning how to coexist so shit like Roland doesn’t happen again, but instead, you blame each other, as if there’s no fucking way you had a part in it.”

He was tempted to bring up Amanda, but it’d have to wait. If Garry knew Amanda was alive, it might put him into politicking mode. He needed him emotional and stupid, not conniving like a typical Kindred.

“So you know what? Fuck the both of you. I’m going to beat some fucking sense into you. You don’t get to do this. You don’t get to be in charge, and be assholes, getting people killed because you’re both too fucking stupid to see you’re both nothing more than angry, idiotic, worthless morons. If you’d just talked to each other, come to some sort of understanding about Roland, how many people would still be alive?” Jack took a step toward Michael as the giant climbed back to his feet, and knuckles. “So yeah, I got you both here, tricked you, because you both need to be taught a lesson you’re too stupid to learn on your own. You’re both so pathetic, I could put you in a Shakespeare play and you’d fit right in with all the characters and their tragic bullshit. Get me? You’re both children, pretending to be adults, and neither of you should be in charge of anything!”

Well, that did it. Garry didn't even look at Michael anymore. The huge gargoyle creature let out an ear-piercing shriek, and ran for Jack, leaning forward with wings snug to his back, tails flapping around in the air behind him. No more thought, no more reasoning, no more words, Jack had insulted Garry enough the man went into full animal psycho mode. If Garry had his own curse, it'd have taken over.

Problem. Jack wanted the two of them to fight him, and each other. A big free-for-all mess where emotions would come out flying. But they weren't looking at each other. They were both looking at him, and even with their alien faces and strange expressions, he could tell they were both pissed. Royally, totally, didn't give a shit about the Prince anymore pissed.

But they both stopped when they heard the chittering, and the claws.

Jack stood his ground in front of the two beasts, and snarled as he glared between the two of them. They thought they were scary. They thought they were strong. It was a struggle to not laugh as he brought his vitae up to the surface of his skin, and pulsed the invisible force out into the world as he summoned his legion. The curse laughed in his head, coming right up to the surface with the Beast Jack needed.

He was in control. He was in control. He was in control.

Garry and Michael weren't as smart as they thought they were. Or more likely, they just refused to think a kid like Jack could actually be pretty smart. They refused to think Jack put this plan together; half true. And they refused to think Jack might have actually gotten ready for this fight they probably thought was a surprise.

It didn't even dawn on them he'd already prepared, had already left trails of his blood outside the building hidden in shadows, had already summoned legions of rats, and was ready for them.

Veronica, and several kine besides, would sleep for a week, he'd drained them so deeply, but he knew he'd need it. And he did.

Garry and Michael both turned to the stairway, and took several steps back as the legion poured in. The streetlights were, conveniently, out. There were plenty of dark alleys. There was a manhole directly in front of the building. The rats had no trouble flowing up onto the street, and down into the building's storage basement, like a flood of living, breathing brown water.

Garry responded a little faster. Maybe it was because of his lither transformation compared to Michael, or maybe because he'd seen Jack summon the legion before and was ready for it. But when the flowing tide of rats scurried over each other until they rose, like a brown ocean with thousands of dark, beady eyes, he took a couple more steps back. It was far more rats than last time. It was the same amount of rats the Ripper used to defeat the hunters.

He was in control.

Jack pointed both palms at the two fucking dogs, and squeezed them shut. The rats launched themselves at the two monstrosities, swarming over them and around them with all the gentleness of a tsunami. Both titans fell, huge bodies crashing into the floor as thousands upon thousands of tiny bodies jumped them, and bit into them. Rat claws were irritants. Rat teeth were deadly weapons, capable of breaking through anything. Maybe not deeply or quickly, but not even a Gangrel's Resilience couldn't keep thousands of rats from puncturing skin, and flesh, not for long.

The moment the two juggernauts went down, they thrashed around as they roared, and limbs cut through the swathes of rats like butter. Jack didn't like seeing rats die, but he had no choice. Small comfort. The two Gangrels ripped through them with their alien limbs, enormous claws, and ridiculous mass. Blood and fur went everywhere. The squeaks of dying rats echoed through the huge basement. Hundreds of tiny, beady black eyes went out.

Jack jumped into the mess. Garry first. He'd hit Michael once, now it was time to hit the other bastard. Garry was on his back, twisting and turning and trying to throw off the myriad of rodents burying him. He'd found his footing though, and rolled onto a palm and knee, only to find Jack running at him.

Football kick, straight to the fucker's face.

Garry flew up and back, nearly hit the ceiling, and landed on his ass again, only for the rats to swarm over his new position. As Jack ran after him, the rats spread around Jack, avoiding his path. Moses, parting the Red Sea. And they parted just as smoothly when Jack jumped onto Garry's right arm, and punched down at his chest.

Crack. Jack felt it when his knuckles collided with the bastard's sternum, felt the bones bend and snap. The punch was hard enough to send Jack back in the air, and he stumbled back as he struggled to keep from falling over.

You suck at this. You don't know how to use your strength with your small body.

I'll manage.

You'll get us both killed.

Jack snarled as he shook his head. Shut up shut up.

Garry rolled over again, and spread his wings with a harsh snap. Rats went flying, squeaking and shrieking. Jack ignored the sad noises as best he could, and charged at Garry again.

Mistake. The sound of crushed rats and heavy impact announced Michael's charge, and Jack spun to face the giant. Something that big shouldn't have been able to move that fast, but Michael came at him like a freight train breaking through a snowbank, with little bodies scattering in every direction as he bowled through.

His body slammed into Jack's, and Jack went flying. The world turned into a streaming haze of colors as Jack spun, body turning into a frisbee from the angle of the collision. He was just too damn light. Michael hitting him may as well have been like a truck hitting him, and Jack choked out a groan as he rolled, rolled, and smashed into the back wall. For the third time.

Michael fell over, his huge mutated body hard to balance, but he recovered quickly, as if stumbling onto his colossal shoulder was a perfectly expected thing. A clumsy oaf of pure strength. Blood coated him, rat blood, and in places Jack didn't expect.

A mouth opened up on Michael's chest, big demon teeth and a big jaw, and bit down on one of the rats. The creature died instantly, and the mouth disappeared a moment later, only to reappear on a different part of the man's alien body to do it again. Holy shit, it really was like watching The Thing. What the ever living fuck. Gangrels could do some crazy shit with Protean, but not this.

You have no idea what an elder Gangrel can do. Garry is barely old enough to be considered an elder, but Michael is nearly twice his age.

I can handle it.

You mean I can handle it.

Jack got back up, and yanked on his arm. Pop, back in the socket. The split skin on his head and knees healed over fast. Torn AC reattached.

Two Gangrels and a Ventrue. This was going to be a long, bloody fight.

But Jack had prepared well, and more and more rats poured into the room, his army of devoted servants. And they poured over the back of Garry and Michael again in a new wave they did not expect.

“You two fucking assholes,” Jack said, “you probably think I’m here to kill you, or to take your positions. You probably think I’m in this for me, that I’m here, putting my ass on the line dealing with you two, because there’s some way for me to spin this so I’ll come out on top. Christ Garry! I spared Tilly’s life for no fucking reason other than I’m trying to save as many lives as I can!”

He raised his hands, and the rats flowed off the snarling, clawing Gangrels, giving them a moment of peace. They were covered head to toe in bite marks, some of them deep enough to draw vampire blood. But just like Jack, their wounds healed over quickly as the writhing veins of Kindrd blood pulled skin over skin, flesh over flesh, in the most disgusting way to heal imaginable.

More rats poured in, more and more, joining the original swarm that now sat back and waited for their master’s next order, and both Garry and Michael peeked over their shoulders at the growing flood. The three of them were spread out now, each a good fifty feet from each other, but that didn’t mean much to a vampire. Ballsy of them to actually look away. Either they were intimidated by the ever increasing, scurrying flood of rats, numbering in the tens of thousands, or they didn’t think Jack would stab them in the back. They were right.

Garry spoke first. “I think—”

“I think,” Michael said, voice bubbling up through his titanic chest as a booming gargle, “that you’re a naive fool, child, and you deserve to die for disrespecting me. You need to die because of your curse, before it breaks the Masquerade and dooms us all. You will die painfully because of your manipulations.”

“My manipulations? You’re the one with Amanda hidden in a box somewhere, staked! The fuck did she say to you, Michael? The fuck did you say to her? The fuck happened?”

Garry froze and slowly turned to face the other beast. “Amanda’s alive?”

Ah fuck, Jack you idiot.

Michael snorted, and slammed one of his huge arms against the ground, the bigger arm. The whole body was pretty lopsided.

“It doesn’t matter. You know that. This war had to happen.”

Garry slammed his tails against the floor, hard enough the concrete splintered. “Except the Prince thinks I started this war! You motherfucker! People are dead because of you!”

“You’re the one who brought fire to this war!”

“You fucking deserved it, you lying fuck! Roland’s dead because of you!” Bit of a segue, but Garry was spitting venom at this point. Jack knew the feeling. No coherent thought, just pure anger driving the brain and turning every word into a mess. “You’ve ruined everything, again!”

“It does not matter! We should deal with the boy first. Then—”

Garry opened his crazy mouth, and bit into his wrist. Oh shit.

The elder splattered his blood against the floor. Jack quickly pulsed out his vitae and told the army to attack, but it was too late. The tide poured over itself, raised into giant mounds five feet high, and rushed toward the two elders. But as the rats reached Garry, the mound collapsed. Thousands of rats rushed over Michael and again poured over the titan to renew their assault, but the rats near Garry fell upon each other. Chittering turned into shrieking as the rats killed each other, biting into furry necks and clawing at faces.

Stupid. Stupid fucking idiot! He gave them a break, a pause in the fight, and the moment he fucking did everything went to shit. It'd worked on Maria. A couple good hits in and she was able to at least talk to him. But the look on Garry's face, including all the extra eyes, was the same look Angela gave Jack when she tried to kill him in the hospital. Pure, utter hatred.

Garry loved Roland, more than Jack had figured.

Garry rushed Michael. So much for politicking. His massive talons ripped through the floor as the Gangrel summoned a new rage. Learning that Jack had tricked him using very personal history, with plans to beat sense into him? That pissed him off. Knowing Michael faked Amanda's death? That pushed him past the point of no return. Garry roared, more of that shrieking alien sound Jack attributed to H. R. Giger creations more than anything, and the younger Gangrel pounced the older.

Garry's form was big, but Michael's was bigger, thicker and taller and a shit load grosser. More importantly, heavier, and even though his legs were kinda small for his body, his titan arms rarely left the ground. He was too damn big to knock over. Garry crashed into him, climbed onto him, and tore into him like a lion mounting a water buffalo. And unlike the rats' teeth, Garry's claws were very, very long.

Micheal roared as the elder sank his claws deep into his hulking flesh, and tore into him. But the titan was too big, too much mass, and Garry's stab was like trying to kill a boar with a sewing needle. Sure, he punctured flesh, a lot, but all he did was make the creature angry. Michael spun around, sending rats flying and forcing Garry to hold on tight.

A fresh arm grew out of Michael's back, shooting out of his spine with zero subtlety. It cracked and broke on the way out, bones snapping and reforming as it added on length until it was the size of a normal arm, but covered in fleshy lumps that looked like knuckles buried under skin. It grabbed Garry's ankle, yanked him down hard, and slammed into the floor hard enough Jack felt the impact. And before Garry could get back up, Michael slammed both of his much larger arms and hands down against the alien gargoyle.

The rats swarmed over Garry and up Michael's arm. Many rats still fought amongst themselves, torn between Jack and Garry's control, but thousands, lost in the mess of orders from both Gangrels, worked together on Michael. Maybe Michael wasn't very good at Animalism compared to Garry and Jack, Jack didn't know, but maybe he didn't need to be considering he was a Protean expert. Either way, he made no effort to control the swarm, but Garry did, and in the chaos of the two of them trying to claim ownership, plenty of the rats knew to attack Michael with kamikaze intent.

They bit into him, his arms and legs, his back, his extra arms, his neck, his face, but Michael ignored them as he smashed Garry into the floor again, and again, and again. Garry tried to get up, but Michael went full ape mode, and slammed down both hands like an angry gorilla, hammering them down on the other Gangrel over and over. Bits of concrete broke, splinters turning into churned chunks as Michael crushed Garry.

The aggression came at a cost. The rats kept eating Michael alive, but the man just didn't care. For all his proper, controlled attitude, this Michael was a snarling, roaring freak of nature, hollering and yelling as he crushed his rival underneath him. It wouldn't have surprised Jack at all if he thumped his chest in a quick beat, like a gorilla.

"Michael! Stop!" Jack walked toward them, waving his arms in the air. "Stop it! Stop fighting! I'm trying to get you to see how fucking stupid this fighting is! You morons let your hate over Roland's death poison every fucking thing you've done to each other for a century! Enough!"

The fuck are you doing? You wanted them to fight.

Fight, yes. Not rip each other to ribbons! They're going to kill each other.

Yeah, and? Look at them tearing into each other. Wait until they weaken each other, kill whoever lives, and take over. It's a perfect plan.

That wasn't the plan!

Sure it was. You knew they'd fight each other if you forced it. And you knew there was a good chance they might kill each other. Win-win scenario. A very vampire plan.

Shut up. Shut up shut up!

The worst part was, he knew the Ripper had a point. Jack wasn't stupid. He put this plan together knowing this might happen, that shit would get so crazy the two elders might actually flat out try and kill each other. Elders were paranoid by nature, and avoided risking their own necks, but not always, not Gangrels, not if you pushed the right buttons.

Roland was apparently a bigger red button than Jack anticipated. Or maybe he had, and a part of him hoped Garry and Michael killed each other. Maybe.

Jack ran up to Michael, and threw himself at the giant's back. The extra arms were still there, two of them, and they swung out to grab at Jack as he scaled the titan's bulging spine. But Jack was small, and ducked around the gross limbs as they brushed against bits of Jack's suit.

Climbing monsters was a lot harder in real life than video games. Holy shit, just trying to get a grip on something was basically impossible, especially since Michael's suit was gone, and all he was now was a towering behemoth of warped flesh. But Jack managed, getting his shoes hooked into blubbery flesh mounds as he scaled the titan, got one arm around his giant throat, and with a proper anchor, punched Michael in the back of the head, hard.

The giant teetered forward, and stopped punching Garry as he used his arms to keep from falling over. His arms reached out and caught the ground around Garry instead, and he roared as he spun around all the more. But Jack was a much smaller target than the huge gargoyle, and the extra limbs struggled to get a grip on him.

Jack punched him again, hard enough the blubbery layers of fat and skin split against Jack's knuckles. And he hit him again, and again, each time causing Michael to stumble forward. A human — or anything alive — would either be dead or unconscious from their brain bouncing around in their skull. Even an ancilla vampire would probably get knocked into torpor. Not an elder, and especially not Michael. But that just meant Jack had to keep punching him, slowly building a crater in the back of his damn head.

“Michael! Enough! You're going to listen to me, you fucking asshole, even if I have to—”

Something grabbed his ankle. Jack jerked his head down, and gulped. That wasn't an arm, that was a tail, that freaky long tail that looked more like a centipede made of arms and hands. It yanked on Jack hard, and lifted him into the air.

Michael whipped Jack into the concrete, and didn't let go. Jack grunted as the impact knocked the wind out of him; he didn't need the air, except to make noise, and his noises came to a sudden stop as his diaphragm stopped working.

Michael swung him again, onto his back this time, and Jack's skull cracked against the floor. Only his vitae and Resilience kept his head intact. But Michael wasn't done. He whipped Jack up into the ceiling, bending his body against the pillars above and tearing his suit into bits, before slamming him into the floor again. The Gangrel ignored the hundreds of rats biting into him, focused entirely on Jack, and slammed him down again, whipping him around between each slam.

Bones broke. Knees dislocated. Shoulders dislocated. Femurs snapped. Forearms snapped. Neck broke. All mixed into a maelstrom of sensation that was too big and overwhelming to register as pain. He could tell when each body part stopped working, but couldn't really feel the pain of bones grinding and tendons tearing. White noise. The colors of movement as Michael whipped him around were pretty lights, blurring together, and Jack stared on as he went limp.

Michael slammed him into the floor one last time, before his tail let him go, and the brute turned to face him more directly. He raised his two arms into the air, eyes locked on the jumbled mess of a vampire on the floor on his back. He was going to kill him.

The world went black. Jack tried to stay awake, to stay in control, but his skull had been smashed open. Still no pain, but he knew it'd come for him later. For now, all he felt, was his consciousness grow heavy as torpor pulled him under. And something massive rose up to take his place.

Everything faded away.

~~The Ripper~~

Michael's fists slammed down together, full body double hammer punch. And Jack took it, absorbing the huge blows into his hardening body. What a fucking joke, getting beaten up by an oversized mutated gorilla. The Gangrel pulled both his hands away and stepped back, but when he looked down at Jack, probably expecting to see a splattered vampire going poof in a cloud of ash, he roared with frustrated disappointment, lifted his hands, and tried again.

But it was too late. Jack returned the snarl as he slowly sat up, his skin already pulsing and swarming with snakes of crimson. Arms and legs snapped into place. His neck straightened itself out, spine righting itself. Tendons and ligaments reattached, pulling joints back into their sockets. His skull sealed, cranium growing new bone to replace the old, before his blood covered the wound; regrowing skin could wait. He just needed his body functioning again. The pain of missing skin and exposed muscle and bone would be a fun spice on the fight anyway.

Jack put his hands up, and caught Michael's. Of course Michael was thousands of pounds heavy, and hilariously massive. His weight drove Jack straight into the ground, but Jack caught the weight regardless, his back against the concrete. Unharmed. Michael tried again, and this time Jack rolled out of the way.

"He gave you a chance," Jack the Ripper said. He couldn't help but laugh. "You spit in his face. Guess you die."

Michael wasn't listening. Just another stuck up elder utterly convinced of their superiority. What a fucking tool. The Gangrel charged him again, but Jack got in close. No point trying to beat him at the range game, so Jack got within a foot of the bastard, a full dash straight for his crotch. Old Jack would have gone for the chin. Old Jack was an idiot.

He punched Michael so hard his fist went through his dick and into his pelvis. The following high pitched shriek from the Gangrel was orgasmic; ironic. And before Michael could recover from what must have been the worst pain he'd ever felt in his whole second life, Jack ripped his hand out, drove his strength into the floor through his legs, jumped, and smashed the same hand up into Michael's throat.

New Jack punched a lot harder than old Jack, and Michael flew back as his head snapped up hard enough to tear things in his neck. The way his weight, his back, his extra limbs and big, fat, disgusting, inflated limbs, all crashed into the concrete floor, was glorious, and Jack laughed louder, loud enough for it to echo in the room.

“Christ I've been wanting to hit you for years, you fucking sack of shit. Guess it's my lucky day. No one's leaving this—” He swung his arm out, and backhanded Garry. Fucker had gotten up, put himself back together, and sprinted for him. Not Michael, but him. What an asshole.

Garry was pretty tall all transformed though, and Jack had to backhand him in the shoulder. But he hit him as hard as he fucking could, poured every bit of vitae he could summon in the split moment into it, and the gargoyle creature flew to the side as his shoulder cracked and collapsed inward. Jack spun like a top, the force of the hit sending him flying back and turning on his shoes. Strong as he was, he wasn't a fucking ballerina, and he spun out of control and fell on his ass.

Laughing all the more, Jack got to his feet, and rotated his shoulders inside his ripped and ruined suit, and looked between the two Gangrels. Michael was, of course, still on the floor, trying to recover from having his dick imploded.

“As I was saying! Neither of you are leaving this room except in an urn.”

Garry dragged himself back to his feet. Talons. Whatever.

“Fuck you.” And the look in his eyes said it all. He was going to turn into a cloud of smoke again.

Jack pointed a finger at him, and poured his vitae through him out into the room, and further, out into the blood that he'd circled the area with. This area was his, he'd claimed it, and no one was leaving.

The swarm rejoiced, and rejoined him, abandoning the weaker Garry's call. His legion ceased fighting among themselves, and like a hive mind, a living creature of ten thousand autonomous parts, the rats threw themselves at Garry. And the rats dug into him, clawing, biting, tearing, and the Ripper spared no expense. The rats were told to use every bit of energy they could, every possible spark of effort they had, to bury Garry in agony.

Their teeth broke, and some of them broke their jaws. But that was the point of an army, after all, to sacrifice it to make the bigwig sitting behind the desk more money. He was the bigwig tonight.

"Where's that fuck Jeremy?" Jack said. "And his fucking grenades? Where're your ancilla buddies? I didn't hurt them that bad, did I? First thing I'm gonna do after I rip off your fucking head, is take a visit to Bella. Gonna fuck her and cut her open at the same time, see how long it takes before she turns to ash, all over my dick. Gonna—"

Garry shrieked his banshee cry, and slammed his wings outward hard enough they buried the area in a tornado of force. The rats couldn't hold on. And before they could reestablish their hold on the gargoyles, Garry burst into a cloud of smoke, and flew out the stairway.

"Fucking coward! You can't run from me! I'll get you!" He was tempted to chase him, but it'd be pointless. A Ventrue running through the street, waving his arms in the air like a mad man, foaming at the mouth? Not a very empowering image. Ah well, he'd get Garry later, probably over the ashes of all his friends. He knew where to hit him. Some kid named Mike.

Jack turned, and faced Michael. The big guy was only just getting back up off the floor, hole in his pelvis partially healed, but a thousand rats had been munching on him the whole time. His skin was covered in holes, and while they closed quickly, not quick enough. He couldn't heal from that, and the massive hole Jack had punched through his crotch, all at the same time.

Jack ran up beside the titan, and kicked him in the face. Michael collapsed onto his side, nose broken in, and he glared up from the ground as he recovered. Tough brute.

“Those transformations take a lot out of you, don't they?” Chuckling, Jack smashed his boot down on the fucker's face, knocking him back down. It half launched Jack into the air doing it too; the curse of being small and light. “They take a lot of vitae. You can't go around looking like Swamp Thing's inbred cousin, and pop out of here with that smoke trick at the same time. If you even can normally. Garry got that trick mastered, and you don't?”

“I—”

“Shut up!” Jack kicked the man in the face again, hard enough his shoe split at the toe. Ugh, not again. These were expensive shoes. Fuck it, it was worth it to see Michael's cheek split and the cheekbone dent. “That's probably why Garry's managed to do so well, despite being so much younger than the others. He's smart enough to know when to run. You, on the other hand, are used to giving orders, having them obeyed, and being a big, stomping Goliath of idiocy. If you were as smart as Viktor, maybe it'd work.”

“Viktor,” the giant gargled through the swarm of rats that poured over his neck and shoulders, biting and scratching, “was a tyrant. And you are no better.”

“I am better. Unlike Viktor, I'm more than willing to get my hands dirty. I don't need an army, they're just a nice bonus.” He kicked the fucking shithole again, hitting his mutated jaw hard enough it cracked and dislocated. The cracking bone sounds followed by Michael's roar of agony made it all worthwhile. "So hey, good job, you fucked up so bad you're going to die, and I'm going to take—"

Jack spun around and brought up an arm, and poured his vitae through it until blood poured over the skin. But he'd been in the middle of a beautiful speech, a speech worthy of presidency. The best speech. No one did speeches like him. So, yeah, a little distracted.

Garry's enormous set of claws slashed into his forearm, hard. And for some reason, the claws also hit Jack's shoulder, despite his forearm being in the way. That was weird. He blocked the attack.

Jack looked down at left his arm as it poofed into a mess of ashes. Garry's claws were now sunk halfway through Jack's left arm above the elbow, and everything below the elbow was now on the floor as a pile of soot. Well damn, Garry hit hard, and cut clean through the forearm and into Jack's upper arm.

"Not running. Strategic retreat," Garry said, and he leaned into his claws, trying to push them through what was left of Jack's arm and shoulder. But the claws were stuck now, the blood shield that coursed in and out of Jack's body locking them down and refusing to let them go any further. Considering they'd gotten halfway through the arm and shoulder, and nearly into his torso, it was probably a good thing.

Jack smashed his remaining hand down against Garry's assaulting hand, right on the wrist, and the Gangrel shrieked like an animal as the wrist broke, and the claws came out like popping sticks out of the mud. Of course, that mud being Jack's flesh, having Garry's claws pop out hurt like a motherfucker.

Before Garry could respond, Jack kicked the man. Garry was smart enough to see the crotch kick coming, and twisted away enough it hit him on the inside of the thigh. But Jack kicked hard, and Garry collapsed back as his leg threatened to break from the impact. It didn't. He rolled away from it in time so all Jack managed to do was put a good dent in it. Fucker was good, especially considering he had wings and two god damn tails.

Jack looked down at the stub below his left elbow. Dark vampire blood flowed over the wound, sealing it well enough to keep the wound from splitting. Regrowing binding tissue was easy for someone as strong as Jack. Regrowing half a limb was a little more difficult. He'd do it later. For now, he'd deal with these fuckers first.

"You came back. Honorable," Jack said, grinning at the man, "but foolish." Complete with a heavy Chinese accent.

Garry didn't get the joke. He charged Jack again, and a hard shake of his broken wrist snapped it back into place as the beast ran to him. He thought Jack was vulnerable, that he was weaker cause he was missing an arm. Fucking idiot.

The two crashed into each other, and everything turned into rolling colors again. That was good. Michael and Garry had the tools to fight from a distance, or at least a bigger distance than he did, with their Protean transformations. But when shit turned into a wrestling match was when Jack could really lay into the fucker.

They landed in a heap, but Garry landed on top. Garry wanted that. But before he could right himself in a full mount and claw Jack's face into mincemeat, Jack pulled his knees up to his chest, and kicked straight up. Short legs were easy to maneuver, and he got them right under Garry's chest and sternum. The huge creature flew up and slammed into the ceiling of the storage basement hard enough he cracked the beams above, and put a huge dent into the next floor.

Garry came crashing down, and Jack rolled away before the Gangrel could recover. Once Jack had a couple feet between them, he pointed his good hand at the man, and summoned his legion.

More rats poured into the room from the stairway, fresh recruits to join his reclaimed legion.

“The Crow Lord will not be undone by a couple of dogs!” Laughing until he thought he’d burst, Jack poured his vitae out into the world, and demanded his army come. The world went silent, even the rats ceasing their biting and chittering for a few seconds, as the sound of hundreds of beating wings teased his ears.

The wall of black feathers came in a moment later, just as Garry got up. He turned to face the new threat, and Jack could feel him try and break Jack’s hold on the animals with his Animalism again. But it was useless. Old Jack was like a general, while new Jack was a dictator. The birds, the rats, they obeyed him and only him. And they swarmed over Garry with the pure heartlessness of a swarm of piranha. Swarm of anything, really. Nothing said ‘heartless devouring force of nature’ quite like a swarm.

A shame he only summoned a couple hundred crows. Anymore and he’d be risking the Masquerade, even in this area where he’d sabotaged the lights.

The gargoyle fell to his knees and covered himself with his wings, but he couldn’t stop both a hundred beaks from pecking him, and many hundreds of rats from biting at his ankles, and then his legs, and then his thighs and chest and arms and neck. He looked up at Jack for only a split moment, a mix of rage and fear in his many eyes, before he looked back down and did his best to stop the rats from devouring him alive.

Fear, in the eyes of an elder. If only Jack had a camera to take a picture. Ah well, Beast would ruin a picture anyway.

Michael got up, and charged him. Even as bits of his body fell off, even as one of the extra arms he’d grown rolled off his back and burst into ash, chewed off by the rats, the giant charged him. Like an angry elephant, all mass and bronze, no finesse or grace at all.

But when you're that big, you don't really need any, and while Jack was busy directing his choir to trap Garry beneath a living, breathing blanket of fangs, claws, and beaks, the big brute smashed into Jack's side and flung him.

Jack flew through the air, for the millionth time tonight, and crashed in a roll. Again he smashed into the wall in the back of the room, opposite of the stairs, and he landed on his ass, back against the wall. He stared at the two elders as Michael tried to follow up his charge, but the big bastard fell over with an enormous thud as the rats worked through one of his bigger arms. Too thick to cut through it completely, but a hundred rats biting into anything was enough to weaken it, and one of the brute's giant arms cracked below the shoulder, unable to carry Michael's weight anymore.

Michael landed so hard, it was like someone had just shot a rampaging elephant with a high gauge rifle. And the moment he was down, the rats resumed their attack, joined by a few dozen crows.

Mulder and Scully stayed outside. Probably for the best. Jack didn't want old Jack screaming in his head for all eternity about a couple dead pets, assuming the Ripper couldn't eventually crush the other personality into fucking dust.

Laughing again, voice bright and cheery, Jack pushed himself back up to his feet with his one hand. It gave him trouble, fighting the broken bones and torn ligaments. The shitty thing about being small: people could throw you really hard. He was beat up, and for all his power, this damn body refused to heal fast enough. The stump of an arm was proof.

Just like when Avery got him good in the chest with her stupid fancy magic claws, he couldn't heal from everything instantly. Fucking infuriating.

Well, two elders down, and this body was only, what, not even four years embraced? He'd get stronger with time, stronger than any other fucking vampire. Strong enough he could throw the Masquerade away, and become overlord of the entire planet!

It was always good to think big, and shoot for the stars.

“Ok, I’m done fucking around. Time to die.” Jack gently shook out his head until his brain stopped bouncing around in his skull, and marched his way over to the two Gangrel’s still pinned beneath his army. They used a lot of vitae to use their transformations, smoke cloud included, and they didn’t have the power or reserves Jack the Ripper, mighty Crow Lord did.

What would he do once these two were dead? Kill any Carthians who disagreed with him, or any that didn’t like him, or any that looked at him funny. Same for the Invictus. Except maybe Leauvion. The things he’ll do to her.

He chuckled. Hell, he giggled, as he tossed and turned the gory thoughts in his mind as he walked back over to Michael; he was closer.

“Christ, you don’t even know, Michael. You’re so fucking ignorant.” Jack squatted down beside the giant as he was devoured alive. “You’re not the first elder I’ve killed.”

“What?” Wow, he could still gargle a response, even as rats bit into his face.

“I killed Viktor and Tony, you moron. That fire? I set that fire, knowing full damn well what would happen.”

“You...”

Jack pat the downed man on his massive, disgusting shoulder.

“I killed Lucas too. Dominated Damien, and tricked that fucker good. Cut his head clean off. But I don’t have a sword now. So, I’m just gonna rip yours off like I did Joe's."

Michael's eyes widened as his world shattered around him, realization setting in. Christ, it was better than murder. But hey, he got to do the murder part too, so best of both worlds. Jack set both his hands on Michael's head, and braced his feet.

Everything went black. Jack could still feel Michael's head, and even hear him, but someone turned off the lights, blanketing in the basement in total darkness no vampire could see in. The joys of a basement. Except, there wasn't anyone else in the room. What the fuck?

A few moments later, someone turned them back on.

The world froze. Jack froze. The sound? What happened to the sounds of the city? Gone. The sounds of his army were still there, but they stopped attacking the two pinned Gangrels as they looked to the stairway.

Everything had changed.

Jack slowly stood up as he looked around. The storage room was different. The same, but different. Darker. The few weak lights had grown weaker, and had changed shape. Instead of incandescent bulbs inside wide metal shades, they drooped from darkness, as if a layer of black fog coated the ceiling over their heads.

The floor had changed. It was damp. And the concrete was tinted red. Red veins moved along the concrete too, almost invisible in the dim, weird light of the strange bulbs above. And the walls trickled with the dark, crimson liquid, as if a flood of red water had soaked the area. As if a monsoon come by, and drowned the city in blood.

He knew where he was.
