This kine had good reflexes. She almost managed to pull away, but he got his arms underneath hers, and brought his hands up behind her neck. A full nelson; hilarious position, and difficult to end a fight with. But it did render the other person incapable of using their arms. If done on the ground, she wouldn't be able to use her legs either, but they were standing, and she tried to kick back at him. All she got for her trouble was a hard jerk of her whole body, vampire strength used to whip her from side to side, and douse the flames of her struggles.

“Ye’ve been a bad lass,” Fiona said, stepping around Damien and standing in front of their prey.

“What the fuck are you—” A punch to the gut, from the tiny redhead, shut up the meal hard.

“Ye’ve been bad. Ye’ve been hurting people.”

“I ... what ... what’re you...” Gasp and squirming, the woman tried to lift her head up to look back at Damien, but with both his hands pressing down on her neck, it was easy to keep her head under control. If he wanted to, it’d be easy to dislocate her shoulders, or break her neck. They weren’t allowed to kill, though.

The twinkle in Fiona’s eye told him she’d be able to, if she wanted to. Maybe not this prey, who hadn’t done enough to deserve death, but it was plain to see the Scot didn’t have any of the struggles with violence he expected of her. Judging from what she’d told him, her life in her old home had been boring, and contained none of the violence or salaciousness of Dolareido. How had she’d become so confident, and perhaps a little sadistic? It was at such odds with her bubbling joviality.

“Ye’ve been hurting folk. Ye’ve been stealing from folk. Ye’ve been bad.”

“I—”

Fiona punched the girl in the face, hard enough to make her jerk a little. “Ye stole that lad’s motor, and hurt him. He was taken away in an ambulance.”

Perhaps Fiona was at peace with being a monster, as she seemed to be at peace with a lot of things. The secret to her happiness, or willful ignorance, he couldn’t tell. Maybe both. He was excited to learn more about her though, what made her smile despite the insanity thrown her way. She’d only become Begotten a year ago, barely twenty years old, and yet looked comfortable with assaulting a thug.

“What’s it to you?” the prey said. Wow, she was tough. Courage and stupid went hand in hand.

Fiona leaned in close to her, and pulled out a knife. It was enough to stir the prey, make her squirm, struggle, but when she tried to use her legs again, Damien was quick to give her a hard jerk once more. Hold still.

“Ye ken what I do to mean folk?” Fiona said. “Minging folk like ye?” She set the blade against the woman’s neck, under the jaw, and pressed up. With her head trapped between the knife and Damien’s hands, it was enough to get the woman trembling. He couldn’t see her eyes, but from how she was shaking in his arms, he knew the prey’s eyes would be wide.

“P ... please don’t.” The threat of getting a knife up through the jaw and into the tongue would break anyone. No shame in that.

“Ye shouldnae hurt folk.” Fiona pressed a little higher, and Damien breathed in the smell of a drop of blood. Delicious, thick, warm life. The prey continued to struggle and squirm, doing her best to push her head up and away from the sharp thing pressing against the soft underside of her jaw. It smelled intoxicating, and he was growing hungrier by the second.

“I ... I won’t ... hurt anyone anymore.”

“Ye better nae. If ye do, I’ll be back with my friend, and I’ll jam this knife right into your head.”

“Please ... d-don’t ... do that.”

Smiling, as if someone had injected heroine straight into her veins, Fiona let out a long sigh of bliss, and nodded to Damien.

He adjusted his hands, one pulling the woman's head to the side, the other holding her torso against his chest, and he sank his fangs into her neck.

“What!? What are you ... do ... ing.”

The Kiss, hard, fast, left prey little option but to become weak, paralyzed, and exhausted within seconds. And as her blood gushed into his mouth, he swallowed it down, and her exhaustion became unconsciousness. He let out a small growl into her neck as he drank, and looked to Fiona as she watched him.

She looked hypnotized.

He growled again. Something about being watched by a beautiful creature, someone else seeing the dark, almost dirty act of a Kindred feeding, sent a spark up his spine. The two of them had found this woman, this prey, cornered her, and fed on her, together, without having to split the resource. He got all the blood, while Fiona looked quite happy with the result. She fed on the fear. How, he couldn't begin to understand. But it was obvious with how she smiled at him, that she was satisfied. More than satisfied. She looked like she was high, eyes almost rolling up, matching the intoxicating bliss of thick, warm blood coating his throat, filling his stomach, and sending pulsing life into his dry, withered veins.

He licked the bite mark until it was healed, let the prey go, and set her down against the wall, sitting. He'd drank her fast, and he quivered for a moment as he focused on the tingling bliss of the belly full of warm blood, spreading out. It shot life out into his extremities, forced him to Blush Life, and got his dead heart pumping. A shot of adrenaline, for a vampire.

“That was delicious,” Fiona said, coming up to him as she put her knife away. “When ye bit her, she must have thought ye stabbed her, cause she was terrified. Absolutely terrified.” She rubbed her arms, and came in closer. “Perfect.”

He took a deep, useless breath, and managed a small smile for the little redhead. "I'm glad you enjoyed it."

There was silence for a moment. The two of them stood there, looking at their prey, and then each other. Of course he broke eye contact first. Eye contact was difficult. And with the meal's blood pumping through him, everything took on the edge of biological influence. A beautiful girl smiling at him filled him with ... fuzzies, he supposed someone might call them, goosebumps too. He wasn't sure, it being the first time he'd ever felt them.

She stepped up to him, reached out for his arm, and put it over her shoulder. A snap of her fingers later, the two of them stepped out onto the street, and began walking the sidewalk again. With his arm on her shoulder, it must have looked like he was leading her, when she was very much the one leading him.

"Ye should tell me a wee bit about yerself!" she said.

"Me?"

"Aye. I dinnae ken much about ye."

"Um." Ok, talking about the self, his favorite topic. He could do that. Sure. "I don't remember much about my time as a human. It was long ago, and there wasn't much noteworthy. Except for meeting Lucas."

She nodded with the man's name. "I dinnae ken anything about yer sire."

"He vied for power. Fifty years ago, Antoinette killed all of his bishops and any of his followers that stood against her. She'd have killed me too, if the sheriff hadn't decided to spare me back then ... and again, later. I helped Lucas go into hiding, in a hole deep underneath Devil's Corner. He went to sleep, into a deep torpor, so the sheriff would not be able to find him; as easily at least. It worked. I waited fifty years for the right time to revive him. Within weeks of his revival, he had recruited a group of young Invictus and Carthians, and had concocted a plan to kill the Prince. It almost worked, but ... it didn't. In the end, most of his followers had died, and him as well. I almost died, but Daniel and Natasha saw that I was ... not happy, with the new Lucas. He'd been a zealot and dictator in his previous life, and when I revived him, I did not realize torpor would make the horribleness of him, things I'd been in denial of about my sire, even worse."

When he glanced down to the small thing under his arm, he blinked at her staring.

"Oh my god, Damien! When I said tell me about yerself, I meant, like, what do ye do with yer free time? What kind of hobbies do ye have?" Laughing, she pat his back, and nudged her head against his side. "Ye need to learn to relax, but I cannae blame ye for being stressed, with a history like that! Fifty years? What did ye do during that time?"

He raised a brow. Thinking about his past like that was normal for him. Maybe that was a problem.

"I hid. I rarely left Devil's Corner, but I quickly learned how to use the Cloak of Night to greater skill than most. I tried to enforce the Lancea et Sanctum's philosophies; punishing the wicked, scaring strays back into the arms of God, and the like. It ... it was hard, staying in the shadows for that long."

"Awww! Poor lad." Without a hint of sarcasm in her tone, the monster clutched him with her one arm behind his back as they walked. "That does sound horrible."

"I try to—"

"No no, come on, it was horrible. Admit it."

“ ... it was horrible.”

Nodding, she rubbed her cheek into his side and chest, and hugged him closer. “Ye were hiding in this sort of place for fifty years. I’m only twenty.”

“It’s not really the same. Kindred don’t age, and our minds don’t really ... change much, as we get older.” Outside of the horrible twisting torpor could cause, at least. “My personality will be the same for eternity, I guess.” A gift or curse, depending on that personality. He wasn’t sure, himself.

“Begotten age, but how we age is different per person. Azamel aged very slowly, and I wouldnae be surprised if I do, too.” Nodding, she squeezed his side a little harder. “And even if I don’t, I wouldnae let that worrying stop me from enjoying the now.”

“Are you sure? Remember what happened in Highlander?” Even he had seen a movie every now and then. Swords interested him. So did the band Queen.

“Highlander? Never heard of it.”

He laughed. “It contains a tragic tale of an immortal who finds love with a human, and stays with her until she dies of old age.”

“We could go watch it?”

“Um, sure. It has ... Christopher Lambert, French American actor, playing a Scottish swordsman. And Sean Connery ... playing an Egyptian ... Spaniard...”

She raised both brows, and tilted her head from side to side, scanning him to see if he was lying about the strange casting. He was not.

~~Natasha~~

She smiled up at Art, and melted against the man's chest. He was underneath her, and sitting in the tub, while she was lying on him, her head on his chest, and her ass snug to his pelvis. They were in their normal human form, Hishu they called it, instead of Dalu form; it meant a noticeable drop in their aggression, and a small drop in size. Gentle sex was back on the menu.

Jessy having sex with one of them in Gauru form must have been absurd. Dangerous! So dangerous, and ... strangely hot. But still, very dangerous. Their Dalu forms had been enough to give Natasha a fright, despite how awesome the sex had been. Awesome, and a bit painful, considering the size difference.

They were almost done now, she hoped. Much as she was loving gentle sex, she was exhausted. Matt had already cum inside her, twice, and Art was working up to a second orgasm too; and the man was in her butt, as he had a penchant for doing.

The water-resistant lube was working well, though, so that was a huge plus. And, much as she whined every time he penetrated her there, she'd couldn't deny how good it felt, feeling the head of his length pressing up toward her belly, as she relaxed on his chest and abs. The heat of the water against her skin, and the pressure of his cock against her insides, was lulling her into post-sex bliss, while still having sex.

Matt chuckled down at her, and looked between her, and his phone. "Avery says the vamps are going to be putting together teams of three, to sweep the city. They want one of us to join each team." Not in the tub anymore, the bigger man was doing ... something. She had a hard time caring right now.

"Each?" Art said.

“It ... it’s ... a good idea.” With a quiet whimper, she hugged herself as Art continued to gently thrust up into her ass, causing some of his cum from earlier to leak and coat him. “I knew the Prince ... w-wanted to ... take advantage of ... your abilities.” She reached down, spread her thighs, and slid a couple fingers into her trembling insides. The bliss of post-orgasm sensitivity. Just touching her clitoris was almost painful, but her insides were more accepting, and hungry, for stimulus. She curled her fingers up against her aching g-spot, and looked up to Art with a tiny smile.

The man grinned down at her, reached down, and pushed on her two fingers with two of his own. She mewled, and clenched on the man’s digits; it didn’t stop him. He pushed in his two fingers, and with his hand on top of hers, she couldn’t remove her own. And unlike her, he was a bit less gentle with fingering up against her g-spot. Waves of bliss began to pulse outward from her depths soon after.

The private bathroom the Prince was letting her use had many amenities; particularly, a door she closed before they’d begun bathing. It was far easier to feel less shame and guilt about enjoying something this lascivious, this carnal, with the door closed. No one would sneak a peek at her cumming on her boyfriend, his length in her ass balls deep, and her butt snug and molding to his steel body, as he fingered her. Matt watching her cum with his gentle eyes and warm smile was enough to melt her twice over. So carnal, being watched like this, so naughty.

Mixing business with pleasure wasn’t a very good idea, but inevitable, with how horny her two boyfriends always were. It was easier to give in and enjoy the ride, rather than try and pull their minds out of the gutter.

“D-Do ... you ... th-think you’ll ... help?” she said as she shivered. Talking, mid orgasm! God, she was devolving into more of a ridiculous vampire cliché every night. The pleasure sparks erupted outward from her pussy, up into her chest and down into her thighs and legs. Trying to talk during that was difficult, but there was something empowering about it. Antoinette probably did it all the time. And it wasn't like vampires needed to breathe; the endless panting was a reflex, not required.

Art eased up on his fingers, but continued to gently push up into her ass, earning more sighs and mewls from her. "Yeah I'm sure we will. It's a good plan, as long as people know how to do recon."

Right, Arturo was Irraka. Recon and stealth were in his blood, like a Mekhet's. He didn't behave like any Mekhet she'd ever met though, and she turned her head to nuzzle her cheek into his chest.

"As long as we can get along." Matt stood in front of the mirror, and looked around at all the black marble everywhere, shaking his head at the undoubtedly expensive extravagance that was the Prince's obsession with the building material. "And honestly, Avery will want your teams to answer to us, not the other way around. Vampires are good with managing groups of people, but hunting? Legit hunting something down? That's our world." He pulled out a beard trimmer, and started on his face, getting his facial hair down from too long, to nice and short. Gruff length.

Watching a naked man, a giant one of muscle at that, trim his beard, was delightful, and relaxing. The fact his friend was currently having sex with her butt, was a strange spice, that made her melt onto Art's chest again, and again, as she felt the rising heat of pleasure begin anew; and not from her fingers. She removed them, lifted them, and started to caress her hard nipples where the water gently rocked back and forth. She was going to cum, from anal sex. God, if Jessy knew, she'd tease her for eternity.

"Matt's right. Avery's going to make sure the teams know it, which means your boss and the Invictus bosses, and probably the Carthian boss, are going to get a dose of something they won't want to hear.” Art set his hands on her hips, and started rocking her back and forth in time with his thrusts.

She whimpered, and kept her cheek against his chest, getting comfy along his body of steel, as she started to cum. The head of his cock kept pressing up toward her belly, hitting her deepspot again, and again, as the thickness of him pushed up toward her pussy. Every gentle thrust was euphoric, and sent pleasure waves through her body in time with the waves gently splashing against her breasts. A tiny squirt of her juices escaped her, just a little thing, immediately lost to the water of the tub. And another, and another. Something about that deep penetration got her so hot and shaking, each tender thrust rocking the pleasure waves working down into her toes as much as it rocked the water. Slow, gentle, and so very deep inside her.

A few harder thrusts earned a loud squeak, before Art stopped, and had his turn cumming inside her. For the second time that night.

She reached out, took his wrist, and guided it to her mouth. Just a taste! Just a small taste. To have a Kiss while riding orgasm aftershocks, and give the pleasure of it to her man, as he filled her insides? Only a vampire could do that. And she moaned onto his wrist as she bit into him. He returned the moan, and she smiled around his wrist as she felt the man’s cock flex with almost desperate, small thrusts, coating her insides with his cum.

Matt smiled at her, and watched her in the mirror. “Think you’ll be put on a team?”

“I ... I um ... m-maybe?” She was one of the few ancilla in the city, and very good at the Cloak of Night, or any aspect of Obfuscate. As much as Julias and Jessy used to be her partners, the three of them often worked alone, because they were strong enough to do so. “And if ... I d-do, you know they w-won’t let us go on the same t ... t-team.” She was getting better at it, talking, as the tingly waves danced up and down her limbs, along her swollen nipples, and down her legs.

Art let go of her hips, and hugged her. She looked up to him, beamed some joy his way, and relaxed as she felt his member start to soften. Finally.

The bathroom was a large, fancy thing, and it had a drain on the floor to handle both splashes from the hot tub, and the shower above. Matt took full advantage, turning on the shower — utterly enormous shower — and reached into the tub. She was far too relaxed to stop him, and she squeaked as he took her hands into his, and lifted her up. Smiling at her, he held her up and up, her arms over her head, and her feet dangling, as he held her under the shower head with him. He leaned in, held her at eye level with him, and kissed her.

She wriggled and squirmed, and did her best to ignore the feeling of cum leaking down her thighs before being washed away in the warm water. Grinning at her, Matt set her down, and she struggled to stay standing; legs muscles were still tingling, and did not want to work.

“You’re right,” he said. “I guess Jack will be involved, and try and find a way for all of us to get along.” Grin unending, the big guy got a loofa, soaped it up, and gave it to her.

Right, right, they were supposed to be washing. She returned his grin best as she could, and set the loofa on his body. With Art’s blood in her belly, she shivered as the warmth of it mixed with her fading tingles, and she let out a long, happy sigh, as she set the loofa onto Matt’s pelvis. One hand for the loofa, her other took his cock, and she shivered again as she admired the weight of it in her hand. It was such a Jessy trait, to lust after a big, strong man, who was well endowed; or as Jessy would say, big man with big dick.

She smiled as she pictured her friend with Eric. Eric was lean and strong, but he wasn't a big guy, and lacked the dumbness Jessy was normally drawn to. Hopefully he'd be good for her, before she inevitably corrupted him.

"You t-two ... b-be on your best behavior! Be nice, with whoever y-you get paired with."

"We'll try," Art said, sinking into the hot tub some more. The water got filtered, to clean itself of the mess they kept making in it, thankfully. "How are things going with you? With the Prince and the sheriff."

"I uh ... n-not sure what you mean." Professional question, or was he prying for secrets?

"Just wondering what it's like to have a sire who's so old, and a boss who's so old, and have both of them be the only other people in your covenant." Shrugging, Art rolled in the water, turned to face her, and set his elbows on the tub edge so he could put his chin on his forearms.

Oh. That was an easier question to answer. Kind of a 'how was your day' sort of question. It was nice to hear that from her boyfriend.

"Daniel is ... quiet. He d-doesn't talk much. We try and talk sometimes, b-but it's ... it's always difficult." And she doubted she was much better. Two stones trying to talk to each other. Sighing, she moved the loofa around Matt's body, mind drifting as she soaped up his legs. "Antoinette is ... a dragon, and a succubus. It's w-weird. One minute she's ... d-doing Ordo Dracul things, that I can't t-tell you about, but they're very scary. The next minute, she's being so ... sexual, about everything."

"Is she?" Matt said, eyebrow raising. "Example?"

“I’ve ... s-seen her ... having sex with J-J-Jack ... in the open.”

“Must have been a sight,” Art said.

“She is ... s-so beautiful. And...” She held out her hands in front of her small breasts, far away enough to suggest Antoinette’s size. “And they just ... jiggle everywhere.”

“Jealous?” the bastard in the tub said, evil grin on his face.

“ ... a b-bit.”

Matt shook his head, and got down on his knees. “Don’t be. You have the most amazing body. So petite, and your breasts are amazing. And good god, this,” he set his hands on her hips, and turned her around, before he pressed his thumbs into her butt cheeks, “is the most beautiful, tight little ass to ever walk this city.”

She rolled her eyes, and turned around. It didn’t stop him from continuing to play with her body though, and he pulled her close into a half hug as he massaged her butt. She was still standing, so him on his knees was good for her to wash more of him, though it was hard to do, with how much he was sinking her fingers into her ass.

“You b-both are just like her. Always thinking about sex.”

“Something tells me she thinks about other things too,” Art said.

“True.” Tash got the shampoo, and got to washing Matt’s hair. Shoulder length hair was fun, and she enjoyed running her hands through it. “She ... she controls the city, and tries t-to ... to consider the future in all things. I’ve n-never known a boss to think so far ahead.” The man probably had no idea how to properly take care of hair; not that she could judge much, since her hair was eternal. But his wasn’t, and could do with some shampooing and conditioning.

“How far ahead?” Matt said, staying on his knees for her. No way she could wash his hair unless he stayed down.

“She’s t-talked to me about ... about space travel, before. What will it be like f-for Kindred, when we start colonizing space? Who knows? Will ... w-will we be able to survive off the planet? We fight each other all the t-time, get in each other’s way. B-But ... that’s not even the biggest concern. What will happen to us, if we go into space, and ... and night and day are no longer things?” Nodding, she got a good lather going in Matt’s hair, before she guided it back under the falling water. “She thinks about ... about a lot of things, that other Kindred d-don’t, b-b-but should.”

Art whistled. “That is thinking ahead. I wonder if Kindred go into space, you’ll just go to sleep? Or maybe, the lack of day or night will cause you to devolve into monsters, mindless, bloodthirsty, and any spaceship or station unlucky enough to have a Kindred or two in their midst will find they’re now in a scifi horror story.”

Both Tash and Matt looked at the evil bastard in the tub, Tash’s jaw dropping.

“Th-That ... I ... that’s horrible!” Lovely. Now her dreams of the future were nightmares.

Matt threw the loofa at him. “Asshole.”

Laughing, Art ducked, before peeking his eyes up over the tub edge. “Hey, I don’t know what’ll happen. It’s impressive she’s thinking that far ahead, though. I suppose issues like these hunters are just a bump in the road for someone as old as she.”

“She really five-hundred years old?” Matt said, looking up at her, eyes wide with intrigue.

Shrugging, she leaned in, and put a kiss on his nose. “It’s d-d-difficult f-for elders to know. Memories can blur and fade, and ...

and it's hard to trust their old journals and t-tomes. But the Ordo Dracul handle the long t-torpor better than other covenants. Somehow, they ... they know ... ways to m-make it not so hard on the mind." While the Prince's works in Dolareido were primarily in pursuit of arcane secrets or whatnot, generally about spirits and other ephemera beings, she knew the Prince had delved into more vampire-rooted experiments in the past. And others in their order, that the Prince only rarely contacted, were far more devoted to experiments seeking to understand the strange life cycle of the vampire, she said.

"Jacob must be. Fucker kicked our asses like it was nothing." Sighing, Art slid onto his back in the tub again, and stared up at the ceiling as he hooked his hands behind his head. "Then he saved our lives, with a fucking Incarnae,"

"W-What's Incarnae mean?" she said.

"Spirits come in tiers," Matt said. "Sort of. When they get powerful enough to be ... gods, basically, we call them Incarnae."

"Gods?"

"Mhmm, in the classic sense. If you went into the Hisil in certain places, you'd find grand beings so powerful and defined, you might think of them as ... say, a bear god who resides in a mountain. Or maybe a god of change and destruction, who rests inside a volcano. There are larger things than Incarnae, but we've never had to deal with them, thankfully."

"And ... and B-Black Blood? What is ... it?"

"Something old," Art said. "Far as we can tell, it's been around for ages, centuries, longer than Jacob's been in Dolareido. It's good at hiding its nature. Doesn't let us know exactly what it's about, which makes finding its bans or banes such a pain."

Oh, oh, information! “Bans? Banes?”

“Bans are what rules a spirit has to abide,” Matt said. “They’re not people, they don’t have souls, they’re direct manifestations of things and ideas, and have to play by whatever rules their manifestation represents. A fire spirit, maybe one that’s been born in a city from buildings burning down, might be unable to cross a firefighter’s water hose.” Shrugging, Matt held out his hand, and Art tossed him back the loofa. “And banes are the things that hurt us.”

“Silver for us, and fire and sun, for you,” Art said, pointing at him and then her.

“Am I a sp-spirit?” she said, tapping a soapy finger to her chin, before washing it under the falling water, and reaching for some conditioner.

“Werewolves are, partly,” Matt said.

Werewolves were part spirit? That was worth noting. Nodding, she started working the conditioner into the ends of his hair.

“I wouldn’t be surprised if the Begotten had banes as well,” Art said.

Banes she had been looking for, though not under that word. It was difficult to learn anything about the monsters because of how unique each one was, but if the werewolves did that on a regular basis for the spirits they hunted, maybe they’d know what to do?

Her priority was dealing with the hunters. Secondary was trying to find a way to deal with Azamel and the other Begotten, if it came to that. Investigations into spirits and the other side of Dolareido weren’t on her to-do list anymore; which was a little frustrating, because with Matt and Art right here, it was one of the easier things for her to learn about.

“Slut City is rubbing off on everyone,” Matt said. That was random, and she raised a brow as she looked at him. “Carter says Clara’s been getting visits from four rather horny ghouls.”

Ah yes, Jessy had texted her about that, in good faith; but if her boyfriends knew about it already, she could talk about it. It was nice Clara was getting to have a bit of fun, with Jack being out of her reach.

“I’m ... h-happy for her. It m-must suck, if she w-wants someone, but can’t have them. If Jessy’s ghouls can ... you know, make her a little happy f-for a while, that’s good,” she said. The two boys looked at each other, and smirked. “W-What?”

The man in the tub laughed, and climbed out to sit on its edge, facing her. “We know Clara. Once she sinks her teeth into something, it always comes back to haunt her.”

“W-What do you mean?”

Matt shrugged, and stood up again. “She seems to like Jack. It’s kinda been a thing in the past, that when something interests her, she sorta keeps going after it, even much later. Even when she knows she probably shouldn’t.” Smiling down at her from his tower on high, the gentle giant took his heavy cock into his hand, and began to stroke it. Slow, deep strokes. Uh oh.

“Props to Jessy for trying to make Clara a full-fledged member of Slut City, but she’ll swing back around to what caught her attention first. She always does.” Art, watching, started to masturbate as well, full, leisurely strokes that had his girth swollen with need in moments.

They were aroused, again. She tried her pouting face, as if that might stop them; it never did. Art got up, walked over to her, and as he continued stroking his cock with one hand, he set his other on her head, and gently pushed down.

She managed a weak whimper, and complied, getting down onto her knees. Both boys started to masturbate faster, growing to full hardness, as they each pressed their exposed, swollen glans against her cheeks.

With another little whimper, she put her lips onto Matt's cock, and offered the engorged head a long kiss, engulfing the whole of its pink flesh in her lips, before pulling back, and doing the same to Art. Long, slow kisses, lips wrapping tight around the edge of the glans, before drawing back with suckling pressure to the tip. While she kept her hands on their thighs, the two boys took turns, guiding their cocks into her mouth, and her doing her best to satisfy them both, one boy rubbing his glans into her cheek while she suckled on the other.

She should have known they wouldn't be satisfied yet. And from the heat growing in her body, she wasn't either.

---

Ok, enough sex for now. Not that getting on her knees and giving both of her boyfriends blowjobs hadn't been terribly arousing, and the fingering and licking they'd given her after terribly satisfying, but sex all night every night since the Prince had given her a vacation was warping her mind. Time to get back to work.

Antoinette frowned, and typed a few things on her laptop, before looking back to the strange necklace. The tiny loops of string, each holding a small, smooth rock, yanked her attention like a pile of bills due might; the necklace that had summoned the spirit of secrets. Angry Prince was not a Prince Tash wanted to interrupt, so she let the Prince sit there and write whatever it was she was writing, while Tash took a moment to update her own reports on the shared networked.

They'd been on vacation all this time, so, there wasn't much to update. Still, any information was useful, and the Prince's network was secure times a thousand.

== Possible weakness for Begotten: banes. Banes appear to be something everything has. Spirits, werewolves, vampires. If ghosts are real, it's likely they also have banes; silver or iron or salt, or something related to their previous life. There may be a way to gleam a bane from this recurring thread. ==

It was a sad little entry, almost not worth writing.

“Vola,” the Prince said. “How was your time away from your assignment?”

“It was n-nice! Spent a lot of time with the boys, and I l-learned a thing or t-t-two about the wolves. I m-mentioned the sweeps idea to them. They agreed with it, b-but they're worried it'll ... um...”

“Cause tension.” Sighing, Antoinette leaned back in her chair, picked up a tablet, and pulled her hair over her shoulder with her other hand to begin combing it. “It seems so absurd, when looked at from a distance, does it not? Why would there be tension between us and them. But, such things are difficult to understand or predict, with nuance and details hidden until such situations are created. And the devil is, unfortunately, in the details.”

“I d-don't understand.”

With a nod and smile, she set the tablet down. There was a picture of Dolareido on it, a blueprint. She'd been analyzing the city. “It is easy to describe how people act and react, behave and respond, and easy for someone such as I to attempt to manipulate the output of their interactions. But any entity with a soul will render such predictions inaccurate at the best of times, opposite at the worst. Sentience defies prediction in the strangest ways. For all my expectations that people will behave reasonably, mixing people with people, is mixing oil and fire.”

“I ... I still d-don't understand.”

Laughing, the Prince smiled at her. She could be patient, when she wanted to be. It was good for Tash then, that teaching her philosophies about life, was something she enjoyed taking her time with.

“Even two logical people can be driven to anger, and blows, when situations filled with nuance and uncertainty arise. It is forever a goal of mine to lead and control, and I am forever usurped by this unpredictability. I fear that, if Avery agrees to sending one of her pack with each of our teams, that there will be tension, as said. The absurdity is that I cannot prevent it, no matter what I do, because people are ... people. I cannot predict them perfectly, only mitigate their random impulses.”

It sounded like she had a desire to control the human condition. Understandable. She probably wanted to control everything, and knowing that having Uratha with the Kindred would lead to arguments, arguments she undoubtedly considered stupid, grated on her.

“W-What do we d-d-do about it?”

“I am afraid there is little to be done beyond what I already do, except manage the fallout. Or rather, Jack will attempt to manage the fallout.”

“Is Jack d-doing better? He ... he must feel horrible, about letting Angela live.”

Nodding, she got up, and started to pace around the experiments room. “He does. I wonder if his rise in ability is due to a natural skill, skill of his bloodline, or because he is forever thrust into such extreme circumstances.”

“P-Probably both. Julias was always better than other Ventrue. But, horrible things didn’t ... d-didn’t fall on his lap every month or so.” Comparatively speaking, Julias and Tash had had quiet second lives. Or at least, that was true of her. Julias did have fifty years of his second life before Tash had been embraced, fifty years she wasn't too familiar with. "Was ... was Julias involved much ... during the Purge? Or b-before?"

"The Purge was my doing, along with some help from the Carthians. Avery's last visit, I do not believe Julias was involved much, except perhaps to observe Viktor's aggression with them. With Azamel though, I believe he had multiple dealings with the old monster. But, her violence erupted on her environment rather than others, and Viktor was the primary wall between her and the Invictus, regardless."

Right, Viktor. Always Viktor.

"I wonder ... s-sometimes. About J-Jack, I mean."

"Oh?"

"He's b-been through so much, and now this hatred toward Angela ... it's scary."

"Hatred?"

"I—" Oh! Oh shit! Oh no no no, Jack had said to not mention it to the Prince. Recover! "He ... he's mentioned that the whole t-torture ... thing ... and that it's bothering him, and—"

Wham! Antoinette slammed her hand down on the table, hard enough to make their laptops, and the various priceless artifacts on the table, jump. If Tash was still alive, it'd have stopped her heart dead. The glare alone from the Prince was enough to borderline disintegrate her.

"I warn you, Vola, that while in matters of the city, of the Ordo Dracul, and anything you could consider official, I am a consummate professional. In matters of my love, I am a violent aggressor who will do anything to defend him.” She leaned in, set her elbows on the table, and glared at her. “You do not hide your feelings well. Something is amiss, something to do with my little Ventrue, and seeing that you are not Invictus, you have no reason to not tell me. Speak. Now.”

Oh god. Oh god oh god oh god. This is what happens when you spend days doing nothing but fucking, fucking, fucking, and more fucking! Completely lost of her sense of professional control.

“He ... he t-told me not to ... to tell you. That ... that he ... w-w-w-would eventually...”

“How long ago was this?”

“Um, uh ... when w-we found the first ritual.”

“Almost four weeks ago, and he has not mentioned this thing to me.” Frowning at her like she was going to tear her in half, Antoinette leaned in closer still. “The look in your eyes says this is important, Miss Vola, and after what Angela did to my love, I will have you tell me.” Tash wanted to back up, but she was paralyzed. Antoinette looked angry, really angry, like, ready to hurt her angry. Daeva obsession screamed in her eyes. “The boy is too young to know what is best for him. I know better. Tell me.”

Did she really, though? It was hard to tell if Antoinette was being hyper possessive like Daeva often were, or simply being wise and efficient, at that moment.

But, Antoinette deserved to know, if only because of how much she’d done for Natasha already.

“ ... J-Jack’s ... angry, with Angela.”

“Are not we all?”

“Y-Yeah, b-b-b-but ... he’s ... he’s uh ... really angry. Like ... like ... not natural anger. He’s ... it’s ... b-bad, he says. Like, b-b-b-blinding ... murderous ... rage ... B-But, I think he’s exaggerating ... a little.”

The fury in the woman’s face broke, and her eyes softened. She leaned back, let out a long, slow sigh, and began using both hands to comb her hair down her chest.

“Jack is like you in a way, Natasha. Despite his best efforts, he wears his emotions and thoughts in his eyes. He does it differently than you; for him, it is a display of his soul, breaking through in his gaze, genuine honesty tearing its way to the surface. It is one of the reasons I love him.” A snarl cut across her lips, and she glared down at the table. “Something has been bothering him, and I was waiting for him to tell me. I ... am frustrated with myself, for being unable to wait and let him come to me on his own, and for being so direct with you, demanding you answer me. I apologize, Vola.”

“It’s ... it’s ok. You w-were just concerned.”

“I did not respect his privacy.”

“Um, it’s not like y-you’re ... digging through his phone, looking for conversations with women you s-s-suspect him to be ... cheating with.”

Nodding, she sighed, and looked up at the ceiling. “I suspect, if this anger issue is as he believes, then I would not be surprised if he turned his eyes toward a potential cause. Introspective to a fault, that boy. Ventrue are prone to arrogance and pride, but anger? Jack has never struck me as the angry sort; a bit cynical and bitter, but only enough to add flavor, like dark chocolate, supposedly.” She made a tiny shrug. No doubt the Prince had no idea what dark chocolate tasted like. “Julias has an edge to him, a quality, where I could see him unleashing his anger if circumstance demanded it. But ... Viktor had a dark side. That monster used his fury as a weapon, like how Gangrel use the rush of the beast, or how Nosferatu use fear.”

“Yeah, Mister Hon—Viktor, w-was ... a monster.” She shivered at the man’s memory. Having him for a boss had been horrible. One wrong word and he was liable to stare you down, or cut you down.

“I can imagine those thoughts weigh heavily on my love’s mind.”

“About Viktor? You ... think he’s ... afraid of ... d-d-doing the things ... Viktor did?”

“Do you not see traits in your sire and in yourself, you do not agree with? That, perhaps, you wish to break free of?”

“ ... yes.” Definitely. She definitely wanted to break free of some the sheriff’s mold she was growing into. She didn’t want to die alone, lonely. She didn’t want to be a stone that no one could talk to. She enjoyed privacy, solitude, and quiet, but Daniel took it too far.

“There are traits I witnessed within Tony, that I ... confess, haunt me. It is easy to become obsessive, as I just demonstrated to you, about Jack.”

“It’s ... ok.”

Shaking her head, she leaned in toward her, and offered what Tash could only assume was an apologetic smile. “Thank you for telling me. I will ... see what I can do, about Jack. To imagine the boy with anger, to the degree you describe. That is worth considering.”

“It w-was ... eating him up inside.”

Oh no, the smile was destroyed again. Antoinette lowered her gaze, reached out to pick up the necklace again, the necklace that had summoned the secrets spirit, and sighed.

“It seems many Kindred have something eating them up inside, in these dark days.”

---

---

~~Beatrice~~

They went back to Julius’s place, washed off the blood, and put their proper clothes back on. But, that was stupid. All of them had a buzz going, something tingling up and down their skin, something that made them feel special and powerful and fucking badass.

They grabbed the first servant Julius had, and drained him dry. Triss and Jen smooshed their bodies against him, buried him in boobs, and Kissed him. Before he passed out, Julius got a quick taste too. The joys of owning a mansion, lots of money, thralls for servants, and being able to do whatever the fuck they wanted.

Now, they had two buzzes going. Some blood in the belly, and the knowledge they’d fucking sacrificed a chicken in their depraved, witchy witch ritual. That went double for her. The others, they didn’t know what it felt like to have Crúac flowing through the veins, filling the mind. It was scary, strange, overwhelming, to have the beast so close to the surface, to have its roar and purr in the ears, as something inhuman reached across from where-the-fuck-ever to work its magic. Her magic? The Crone? Something was out there, something that existed, something that spoke to the beast in Beatrice’s gut, communicated, worked with, and used, to create the insanity of Crúac.

Christ that was so fucking awesome.

The three of them started the walk down into the bunker where they’d been sleeping most nights.

“Think Jacob minds us sleeping in the enemy’s basement every night?” Triss said.

Jen shrugged. “Maybe a little? Fuck him.”

“Hey now, the Invictus aren’t your enemy.” Superman rolled his eyes as he walked behind them, until they got to the next gate, which he opened for them, before they passed through first.

“Don’t ruin my ‘sleeping with the enemy’ fantasy.” With a big grin, she looked over her shoulder at her lover, before coming up behind Jen, and hugging her. Of course, she made sure her hands landed on the girl’s breasts, and she squeezed them through Jen’s shirt, massaging and kneading; no way she could judge Jack anymore, cause big tits were addicting to play with.

“Instead, you could think of it as, girl seduces billionaire?” He opened the final gate, and motioned toward the bed.

Jen chuckled and shook her head as she moved forward with Triss. “Bah, you’re a millionaire, not a billionaire. It’s just not the same if there isn’t a few more zeroes on the number.”

Laughing, Triss pushed Jen onto the bed, and crawled onto her. Straddling her helpless victim, Triss reached down, and started undoing the buttons of Jen’s shirt. Julias whistled at the sight, and she laughed at him, winked at him, and returned to her work. Tonight was a good night, and she was going to have some fun. Fun at Jen’s expense, of course.

“Superman, get the lube!”

“Yes ma’am.” Chuckling, the big Ventrue stepped around the grand bed, and fetched her box of toys. Read her mind, knowing she’d want more than just lube. He set it on the bed, started to undress, and sat on the edge of the mattress, watching. His patience and desire to see Triss do her thing was such a fucking turn on.

“I—”

Shaking her head, Triss put a finger and claw on Jen's lips. "You've been taking charge a lot in the bed these days. Tonight, I'm in charge. I'm the queen, and you'll do what the queen says."

Jen blinked up at her, before laughing and nodding. "Yes ma'am."

Julias laughed at the mirrored affirmation, and tossed aside his clothes. Well damn, he sure got naked quick. Lying on his back, the man turned on his side, elbow to the bed so he could prop his head up on a fist, and casually began to stroke his cock.

Damn, her man, masturbating, watching her. The fire lit up inside her in seconds, and she shivered as she started working faster. It was hard to look at Jen though, when Julias was right there, big, broad, strong Julias, hand around his dick, his confident smile on display, and his eyes looking right at her. She had to look at him, and Jen, and her mind struggled to focus; if she didn't, she might stab her friend with her claws by accident, trying to unbutton her shirt.

Buttons undone, Jen helped her toss the shirt, and Triss sighed with joy at the sight of her naked torso. No bra despite the large breasts, because the damn woman was a slut. A very, very attractive slut, that had Triss staring at how her large breasts flattened and pulled to the sides of her chest with their natural weight.

Groaning as she felt heat build up between her thighs, she put her weight onto her knees on the bed, and pulled up on Jen's arms, to slide her along the sheets. The woman chuckled, but otherwise did not move, as Triss edged her up further on the bed until her head found a pillow, and Jen was lying next to Julias on her back.

Triss threw off her tank top with no fan fair, and sighed bliss as Jen's hands reached up, and caressed her torso. From neck, to shoulder, down across her breasts and hard, pierced nipples, down her abs, and down her waist. Jeans blocked Jen's fingers from finding more, and Triss kept it that way, inching down along the bed, and kneeling between Jen's knees.

"You know," Triss said, as she started undoing the button and fly of Jen's suit skirt, "maybe we should find Jacob a girl?"

Julias raised a brow. "He's not over Minerva."

"That was a long time ago. Besides, there ain't nothing good pussy can't fix." Nodding like she had found the secret to infinite wisdom, she yanked off Jen's skirt, and licked her crocodile teeth with her long tongue at the sight of Jen's lingerie. But, off with that too, no time to dawdle. Well, there was time, Triss just didn't want to wait any longer.

"You're sounding more and more like Jessy," Julias said.

"Am I? Think I've said three words to do her my whole second life." Shrugging, Triss tossed Jen's panties away onto the floor, and got onto her knees between Jen's, before scooting down the bed, so she could get onto her elbows and stomach. Jen's delicious thighs, toned, but not as hard as Triss's, smooth skin and lightly tanned. So delicious. Triss offered the soft skin some kisses, as she slowly eased her head down closer toward Jen's equally smooth pussy.

"I think," Jen said, "that Triss is right, and the man could use a woman in his life. Some—" The Ventrue gasped, and let out a long, sultry moan, as Triss set her lips onto her slit. Triss may not have had cheeks, with crocodile teeth there instead, but she still had a normal mouth with normal lips in the front. And, she had a really, really long tongue. "Someone to soothe his aches, and—fuuuuuck..." Jen lifted her head, and stared at her, as Triss forced her tongue a couple inches into the woman's clenching cunt. "Someone to ... do shit like this for him. A blowjob could do the man some good."

Triss nodded, lips still on Jen's slit, and as her long tongue fought against her friend's squeezing insides, she made sure to bury and suckle on the girl's clit. Jen may not have been the absolute horndog Triss was, but she was still a sensitive creature who aroused easily. A few licks, and the woman's insides began to grow wet, juices joining Triss's lips and tongue.

"I admit, blowjobs can do wonders for a man's disposition." Julias scooted in closer, pressed his body to Jen's, leaned over her, and began to caress her breasts. Head still propped up by his other hand, the man was clear to watch and admire how the woman's huge tits molded to both his hand, but her chest as well, the weight and natural softness of them causing them to flatten slightly.

"I seem to be the center of attention," Jen said.

The bigger Ventrue nodded, and winked at Triss, before he leaned in, and kissed Jen's neck. Oh, those were good kisses, he was good at those. Jen, predictably, melted in moments, and craned her head to the side, exposing more of her neck, as the man placed gentle little kisses up and down its length, from jaw to shoulder. Triss smiled around Jen's slit, watching her man at work, and continued to force her tongue into the woman's pussy. They'd only just started, so it wasn't like Triss was going to push for an orgasm yet; she kept the depth shallow, a couple inches, enough to press up against the woman's g-spot, while her top lip buried and massaged her clit. The tongue was long enough that it came up in waves, and some of it reached high enough to rub against the woman's swollen clit, while penetrating her at the same time.

Once Jen was panting and squirming, getting more into it, warmed and ready, Triss sat up, and smiled down at the sight of Julias working his magic. He knew how to place every kiss with purpose, and his hand caressing Jen's tits knew to explore, to roam, to run along their undersides, before teasing around her areola, until her nipples were swollen as fuck. Only when the nipples were puffed up and begging to be touched, did Superman begin to caress those as well, fingers offering gentle pinches between deep massages.

Triss grinned at the sight of Jen's cunt clenching, leaking, begging, as Julias's expert touch got her boiling. The bastard did love to do that, get a girl's body just screaming for it, before he got to fucking. And Triss had just done that too, so, poor Jen was boiling twice over. Good.

Triss reached for the box, opened it up, and got digging. "Talk to Aaron or Othello lately, Jen?"

"No, other than them telling me they won't be coming to tonight's ritual." Jen tried to sit up, but Julias didn't let her. The man rode Triss's wavelength without her having to explain a thing, so awesome.

"I wonder if they'll notice how much you two have changed," Julias said.

Triss raised a brow. "Oh?" Aha, lube. She set the bottle by Jen's legs, and went back to digging. Different kinds of lube, different kinds of jewelry, different kinds of toys. She had some giant dildos, the big ones, a bit rough to fit but fun. Not what she was looking for right now though. Right now she wanted something more practical for the position she had in mind.

Voila. She pulled out a purple vibrator, with a sort of loose V shape. One half of the V was the handle, and the other was meant to go inside unsuspecting pussies not aware of how much pressure such a tool could put on a g-spot. The part meant to hit the g-spot was very fat and thick, and the handle had a switch for some vibration power. Muaha.

"Yeah. You're both ... witchy."

Jen laughed, and turned onto her side to face Julias. She nuzzled into his big chest, and kissed it a couple times. “Witchy?”

“Yeah, witchy. Like, witches. Like, scary, dangerous, empowered witches.”

Triss nodded, and tapped on Julias’s leg as she showed him the lube. He rolled onto his back, arm by Jen out so the girl could snuggle into his chest, and snuggle she did, into the nook under his shoulder, squishing her breasts to his side. Of course she did, she was proud of those things, and loved to rub them all over Julias, and Triss.

“It’s true,” Triss said, crawling up to sit between Julias’s legs. Lube in hand, she trickled the liquid over the man’s cock, and smiled at him as she gripped it in her other hand. He shivered, and she licked her extra teeth at the sight of her big guy, and the look of bliss on his face, as she massaged the lube up and down his girth. “We’re the Sisters of the Night, or something. We’re dangerous.” They were getting more in touch with their beasts every night, and would probably be dancing naked in moonlight around their kills, soon. Every night, that fantasy sounded more fun and appealing.

Triss reached over, and picked up Jen. The Ventrue squeaked, and Triss grinned. So much stronger than her, physically, and that was fun to exploit and abuse. She set Jen on Julias’s waist, straddling him, facing him too, so Triss had full access to the slut’s perfect, smooth butt. She gave it a small slap too, earning a tiny gasp from her friend, before Triss grabbed the lube again, and started trickling it down Jen’s ass.

“Sisters of the Night.” Jen looked over her shoulder at her and nodded, as if Triss had found the perfect title for them. It did sound pretty fucking awesome, so she returned the nod, before taking Jen’s lube-soaked butt, and began guiding it down onto Julias’s cock.

Guiding her fellow Sister of the Night's ass onto her lover's shaft? Yeap, that was the sort of stuff she hoped to be doing if she was in a witch's coven. And damn, it really was a nice ass, smooth and firm, not as hard as Triss's but still shapely. Big enough to jiggle when Triss slapped it, too. With a hand on Jen's hip to guide her, and a hand on Julias's cock to guide him, she stared at the beautiful sight of Superman's glans pressing against the soaked hole of Jen's butt. God. Fucking. Damn. The way Jen's ass spread, and resisted his cock, until the flesh enveloped his shaft's head, and swallowed it in, had Triss groaning.

Jen may not have had a bit of an anal addiction like Triss, but she knew Jen still enjoyed it; the sounds she made, and the way she gently ground her ass left and right, as she sank her butt onto Julias's cock, proved it. Once she got her butt all the way down, cheeks pressing against Julias's pelvis, her knees out beside his waist, Triss got up on her knees, and pulled in Julias's legs together. She lifted her knees so she could straddle his legs, Julias's thighs together underneath her, her weight on her knees outside them.

She scooted forward, and pressed her breasts to Jen's back, kneeling slightly higher so she could see over Jen's shoulder. Such a fucking amazing sight, Julias lying there, his hands holding onto Jen's thighs, his muscles looking so god damn delicious. With Jen sitting on him cowgirl, Triss was free to snuggle up against her back, and after she wiped her hands clean of lube, she set her claws onto Jen's breasts, and began to massage them. Damn heavy things, and so fucking soft, they filled her palms, overflowed her fingers, and molded around her fingertips and claws. Triss had to be careful, such softness liable to get hurt from the small-but-sharp claws she had.

"Dark witches," Triss said, "enacting our secret desires." She kissed Jen's neck, earning some more moans from her. She pushed her pelvis forward against Jen's butt, joining the girl in a slow, deep, back and forth rhythm, fucking Julias together. Triss's jeans were getting soaked in her juices, but there was something empowering about only being half naked, while the two Ventrues were full naked.

“Hey, I was an innocent flower before you corrupted me.” Jen smiled at her, turning her head so she could meet Triss’s lips with her own.

That was a unique perspective that Triss hadn’t really noticed before. Jen corrupted her, got her really vibing on having an extra set of hands and tits in the bed every night with her love. She, on the other hand, did kinda drive Jen to start delving into the more twisted side of the Circle of Crone.

“I feel like I’m about to be sacrificed,” Julias said.

The two girls laughed, and Jen leaned back, grinning a big, evil grin, as she reached down, and spread her slit. Smooth lips soaked in her juices leaked hot wetness onto Julias, earning a groan from the man, as he watched the show the girls put on for him.

“Not sacrificed,” Triss said, “but definitely our slave.”

“Big bad Invictus council member, our sex slave.” Jen nodded, agreeing.

Casually, not wanting Jen to realize what she was up to, Triss scooped up the vibrator from behind her, brought it around, and set it to Jen’s slit. Jen moved her hand out of the way, looking down with a moment of confusion, before she erupted into a groan, as Triss forced the thick thing into her clenching pussy.

Both Jen, and Triss’s white knight groaned. That was one of the best things about the arrangement. Fucking Jen’s slit with the toy, was going to be bliss for the man inside her ass, too. The dildo’s curved shape meant Triss had half of it in her hand for leverage, and it was really easy to drive the fat head of it forward, toward the woman's g-spot.

Jen moaned openly, and her thighs trembled around Julias, as she leaned back more and against Triss. She stopped moving her hips though, and Triss had to be the one to keep pushing her hips forward, forcing Jen to keep fucking the man.

“God damn,” Julias said, eyes wide, staring. His eyes lowered to the toy Triss was driving back and forth in Jen's tight snatch, and Triss grinned at him as she watched his eyes struggle to stay open. Pleasure had a habit of doing that.

After a minute, Jen, squirming and wriggling, grabbed Triss's wrist, and started to cum. Triss hugged her with her other hand, but the hand on the toy didn't stop, content to continue fucking the woman's wet pussy nice and hard. Gentle was great, but right now Triss felt like making the woman in her arms have one of those really big orgasms, the kind you get from a hard, proper fucking. The kind that always had Triss squirting buckets.

Jen didn't squirt, but that didn't mean Triss couldn't try to make her.

“Triss ... slow ... down.” Sure enough, Jen reached down again, and actively tried to stop Triss from fucking her with the toy. Triss was far, far stronger than her, and it was easy to ignore her weak attempts to stop her hand. Back and forth, back and forth, she moved toy faster, causing the bulbous head within the slam into her girl's g-spot, while Triss pushed her hips back and forth as well, to get a nice fucking rhythm going in tandem. Half to make sure there was some good, lubed friction happening for Julias and his cock inside the girl's ass. Half so Triss could admire her friend's tits bouncing around.

She raised her free hand, and wrapped her grip around Jen's neck. Like lightning to the body. The thrill of power, and control. Having this woman in her hands, unable to get away, unable to stop what was happening to her, unable to stop cumming, was such a fucking rush. Normally, she'd happily give into Julias doing this to her, but to do it to someone else was awesome too. Really, really fucking awesome.

More awesome, when Jen started squeaking, and some blatant juices began leaking from her. Nothing like Triss might do, but a peek down showed the girl's smooth, clenching lips were coating the toy with more liquid than she normally did. The poor Ventrue was trembling, wriggling, and soaking Triss's love with her cum.

They slowed down after a while, gave Jen a break; fifteen seconds at most, before Triss started fucking her slit again. And, not satisfied, Triss turned on the vibration. Instantly, poor Jen was reduced to a quaking, squirming, wriggling, overstimulated creature, and more juices leaked out of her slit, splashing over the toy, and onto the man beneath them.

Julias reached up, and began massaging Jen's breasts. Probably for the best, with the way they were bouncing around; had to hurt a bit. His big hands took them, caressed them, cupped and fondled them, as his thumbs teased around her nipples. The upper half of her body wasn't rocking around too badly, but the lower half of her body was slamming back and forth, as Triss gripped the woman's neck tight enough to cut off her breathing. Poor Jen came again, juices splashing around Triss's hands, and soaking over Julias's pelvis.

After a few more thrusts, Triss let her go, and eased the vibrating toy out of her cunt. She set it aside, and batted Julias's away from the girl's breasts; she wanted to play with them. Laughing, Superman put his hands back on the girl's hips, and Triss returned his laugh as she cupped the woman's big tits. Soft, and heavy, she massaged them with her palms and fingers, and kissed Jen's neck as the Ventrue woman shivered. Playing with a woman's breasts, as the woman came down from her orgasm high; best thing in the world.

“I made ... a mess,” she said through her panting. “Nothing like you would.”

“You’re just jealous.” Triss set her lips higher, finding the woman’s jaw. Jen leaned to the side a bit, turned her head, and kissed her properly, hands holding Julias’s on her hips.

Triss was still pushing her hips into Jen’s butt, slowly back and forth, and with the way Jen was trembling, no doubt she was clenching on Julias’s cock with each thrust. A long, quiet sigh from Superman announced his orgasm, and Triss slid her kiss down from Jen’s lips, to her jaw, and back onto her neck, while making sure to massage her tits in a very look-at-these-gorgeous-breasts sort of way, for her man. And, she continued thrusting of course, a nice, slow rhythm, as she held the quivering woman in her arms.

Jen reached down to her slit, and spread herself again. It was enough to get the big bad Ventrue underneath them to groan, and he stared at Jen’s cunt clenching in spurts, as he pumped her ass full of cum. Juices continued to trickle out of her snatch, and Jen added a few exaggerated, delightful moans into the display, as she helped Triss with the gentle, rocking rhythm.

“If we were in a tub or something,” Triss said, “I’d say we should get some kine in here. They could bleed on us, and we could lick the blood off of each other, while we fuck.”

Jen nodded, and blew Superman a kiss, before she started turning around. Oh, yum. “That sounds delightful.” Taking her time, and keeping Julias inside her, she managed to turn herself around, nice and slow so she didn’t break the guy’s dick. Once she was comfortable on her knees again, except now facing Triss, she set her hands on Triss’s hips, and pulled her toward her.

Triss grinned at the woman, and got in close, pressing their bodies together, and setting her lips onto her friend's. The helpless Ventrue managed a swoon and giggle, before she returned the kiss. Her hands drifted up Triss's back, and earned a moan from her; Julias must have told her how much she loved that. Asshole.

Triss looked past Jen, and smiled. Superman looked entranced, staring at Jen's body from head to ass. It was a great ass, and Triss set her fingers on it, squeezed and kneaded it, pressing the cheeks together against Julias's pelvis. Breaking from the kiss, she leaned over Jen's shoulder, looked down, and moaned at the sight of Julias's cum leaking out of her.

"I think, I'd like to drip some blood down my body, while you licked it up." With a long sigh, Jen leaned back, and back, until she was lying on Julias's body. She set her fingers on her breasts, traced down them, down her stomach, down to her cunt, and she spread herself again.

"You ladies are scaring me," Julias said.

Triss laughed. "You're still hard."

"Maybe I find being scared arousing? Scaroused, as Jack would say."

"Well then you're in good company." The Nosferatu gnashed her teeth together a few times, opening her jaw wide, wider than a human jaw could, to show off her chompers. It gave Julias a little shiver, and Jen a much bigger one.

"Think your thralls would be willing?" Jen said.

Superman nodded. "Very much."

"We should definitely do it." Nodding, Triss backed up and up, put her knees between Julias's, and leaned down as she put her hands on Jen's thighs. The beautiful sight of her pussy, smooth and dripping, with some cum leaking out of where Superman's big dick was spreading her ass.

What would it be like to drip delicious human blood down their bodies, and lick it off each other? Maybe do it outside in the dark, with kine holding candles. Or maybe inside, on a bed with blankets they'd ruin, white silk sheets, and the whole area surrounded in candles. Candle lighting seemed to be the theme her brain latched onto, when it came to the idea of kine dripping blood down their bodies, as she fucked Jen and Julias. Candles and witches went hand in hand, after all. Mood lighting.

She set her lips onto Jen's wet slit again, and pressed her tongue against the clenching entrance. Her friend's slit squeezed down, and Triss had to work a little to get her tongue into her. But, with a little more force, Triss forced in the first inch of her tongue into the hot, trembling tunnel of her fellow witch's body. Then another inch. And this time, she kept going, deeper, and deeper.

"Oh ... gods." Jen spread her legs, pulled out her feet so her legs were straight out, resting along Julias's, and she reached down to slip her fingers into Triss's hair.

Triss had a very long tongue. It couldn't do the hard pounding a big cock or a nice dildo could, but there was something to be said for going gentle; and in the case of a long tongue, gentle, and deep. Jen's body reacted immediately, squirming and wriggling, and Triss's equally squirming, wriggling tongue pushed in further, and further. She opened her mouth, enveloped the whole of Jen's slit, her lips burying her friend's labia, as she pressed her tongue's tip against the depths of Jen's snatch.

"So ... deep..."

Triss chuckled into her friend's slit, and pressed harder, while rolling her tongue upward. The long appendage could bend and push in ways nothing else could, and she took full advantage, making her tongue roll in waves, applying pressure to the g-spot, the deepspot, and everything in between, while her top lip buried and rubbed against Jen's clit.

She should get paid for cunnilingus, considering how good she was at it. And poor Jen was helpless to do anything but writhe and mewl, as every literal inch of her sex was massaged by tongue. Julias managed to start thrusting again, but he kept it slow, matching the gentleness of Triss's tongue. Triss wasn't really trying to be gentle, but there was only so hard you could wriggle a long tongue, especially when it was being squeezed on by a flesh vise. Jen could probably use the break, anyway.

The trembling Ventrue pushed her hips forward and back, matching Julias's rhythm, and Triss had to hold onto her thighs to keep her mouth against her friend's pussy. But after a few moments to get into sync, Jen and Julias were like two waves, cycling against each other, most of the movement done by Julias so Triss could continue licking.

It wasn't long before Jen was soaking her lips. The Ventrue clenched on Triss's tongue, hard enough Triss had to fight to keep wriggling the appendage. But each wriggle she managed, was a loud groan she pulled out of Jen. Staring up her body, Triss grinned at how Jen's shivering made her breasts jiggle, the two of them pressed together slightly with how Jen was reaching out to hold Triss's head, biceps pushing them together on her chest. She really did know how to show off her body while having sex, and could probably give Antoinette a run for her money in that department.

A minute later, Triss lifted her head, and let her tongue dangle for a moment. Drip drip, juices fell onto the pelvis of the squirming woman. Julias didn't stop fucking her, continuing to sink himself balls deep into her, each gentle thrust making her breasts move back and forth, and her ass ripple around his cock slightly with the soft impacts. It was hypnotizing to watch, and Triss stared at it, at how Jen's leaking slit continued to clench on nothing as Triss's lover fucked her ass.

Grinning, Triss climbed onto Jen, and into her awaiting embrace. She made sure to drag her nipple piercings along Jen's stomach, before eventually getting over top her, Triss's knees against the blankets between Julias's thighs.

Jen was panting, and smiling. The glow of orgasm aftershocks looked fucking amazing on her, like a runway model giving everyone the o-face, and Triss pressed her body down against hers, hugging her friend, and setting her lips on her neck. Right on time, Julias lifted his hands, and hugged them both.

"You two are getting pretty close," he said, grinning up at Triss.

"We are." She winked back at him, and pushed her body down on Jen's body in the same rhythm Julias was fucking her. Perfect time to put on a strap on, but she didn't want to stop what she was doing. Besides, Jen was enjoying herself as was, considering the little groans and moans she was making.

Julias was cumming again. His o-face was adorable, always was, and she wondered for a moment if he knew how much the hard, cold shell he carried faded away when he came. He looked like a big softy. Triss lifted her head, and watched Jen cum too. Jen, of course, looked like she was a fucking succubus, with a deliberate, small, perfect smile as she shivered in orgasm, putting on a show. What a slut.

Rolling her eyes, Triss pressed her body down against Jen's again, before she resumed suckling on her neck. "Whore."

"I learned it from watching you," she said, with just enough whine to her voice it was obvious she was quoting a meme. Kids these days.

Laughing, Triss sat back down between Superman's knees, and watched the glorious display of Jen's spread legs, her leaking slit, and Julias's cum looking out of her smooth ass. So deliciously carnal. If blood was mixed into it, dripped onto their bodies during this? No wonder some Kindred really got into some self-perpetuating cycles of Kiss addiction; you could mix it with so many things.

Jen and Julias both eventually came to a stop. Now that Triss was off of her friend, Julias's hands slipped up, and took the woman's breasts again, cupping them and caressing them, squeezing them just enough their size spilled over his fingers. He kept fucking her too, in that slow, deep way he liked to when he was cumming. Triss loved that. It always dragged on the orgasm aftershocks, feeling his cock press up against her insides like that as the pleasure sparks ran down on her legs. She could use some of that.

But both Jen and Julias were growing still, in that way people did when satisfied.

"Hey! Hey you fuckers! My turn," she said. They didn't move. "Oh, you dicks."

Chapter 78

~~Antoinette~~

She combed her hair over chest, and sighed. She was still dressed in the suit she wore, though she had dismissed the jacket, more comfortable in the white shirt and gray skirt. Sitting with one leg resting upon the other at the knee, she leaned back upon the couch in one of the many lounge rooms of her Elysium tower, and looked up at the ceiling. The holes had been drilled into the marble to house LEDs, and the wires that powered them hidden in the black and white stone. A ridiculous expense, and one she was glad to have spent. What use was immortality and fortunes upon fortunes, if one was unwilling to indulge.

Sighing all the more, she refolded her legs, and waited. Not long ago, her thoughts had been on how to share this indulgence with her love for years to come; him being a member of the Invictus made their relationship a touch complicated. Now, her thoughts were on hunters, monsters, werewolves, territory being fought over by short-sighted vampires, and the pain her love was suffering. Such was the ups and downs of ruling a city. There would be times of tranquility, such as after the death of Viktor and Tony, and again after the death of Lucas. And there would be such times again, once these hunters were dealt with, and this looming threat in her city crushed.

It seemed unlikely the Begotten would ever leave, even if Azamel died of her age. And the Uratha, she had to admit, were more equipped to deal with both the strange Azlu entities that had infiltrated her city, but also Black Blood. Oh, how she hoped Avery would end that infernal entity's existence. Could it be done? She did not know, and she dared not ask. Eyes and ears were everywhere, and she did not wish to let anyone know of her desire, lest they plot to undo them.

Far better for her to do as she always did, and manipulate the individuals and circumstances involved. Black Blood was not invincible, and if Antoinette gently nudged events into confrontation between the werewolves and Jacob's alien friend, perhaps her desire would be satisfied. If not, she could simply try again in the future. Such was the joy of indirect tactics and careful misdirection.

The hunters were the larger threat at the moment, and Avery's aid in hunting them down was paramount. The introduction of this shaman woman Elen had rendered the more passive approach futile, if she was capable of hunting targets with seemingly magical means. The introduction of a Begotten as a member of their group was even more problematic, as the monsters had many ways to both infiltrate, and affect places in ways the others could not. She could not rest until she had dealt with them, or had at least surmised a foolproof plan to deal with them.

And then, of course, was her love Jack. He should be here soon, and she could both inquire about the proposal to the Uratha, and perhaps gently nudge him to expose his secret to her.

She could ask, and the boy would tell her; such was his way, and his honest soul was part of why she loved him so much. But like a creature breaking free from their hatching shell, learning to break free of one's own barriers is important for growth. She would give him more time. For now.

The boy waved to her from the labyrinth hallway, and walked up to join her before sitting on the couch.

"Hi," he said.

"Hello," she said.

“I talked to Avery. She’s down with pairing a pack member with these sweeper teams.”

Smiling, Antoinette raised an arm, and let the boy snuggle into her side. “That is good. Impulsive and aggressive as she is, she is intelligent.”

“She did demand to be the one who picks which Uratha go with which team of Kindred.”

“Naturally.”

“And ... she demanded that the Begotten get involved.”

Antoinette raised a brow. “That, I did not predict. She trusts the Begotten?”

“Eh, more of an enemy-of-my-enemy situation.”

“And you spoke with Azamel?”

“I did. She’s not happy about the idea, but she agreed. Fiona, Mark, and Athalia will help some of the sweeper teams.”

“I see.” She was happy the boy had taken initiative, bringing Avery’s proposal to Azamel. And no doubt the boy had already reported this to Julias and the rest of the Invictus council. But, perhaps, not as content about the prospect of Begotten becoming yet more involved in their affairs.

“I think I got my work cut out for me, making sure everyone gets along.” The boy nudged his nose and cheek into the side of her breast, and nuzzled into her. “I think it’ll be alright, except for maybe a few of our louder Kindred causing a fuss.” Again he nuzzled into her side, and brought in a hand as well, using it to touch her thigh as he pressed his cheek and nose into her closer breast.

The boy was being awfully forward with his desire, compared to usual. Ah, yes, she had enjoyed his touch earlier this evening, while also teasing him of awaiting pleasure in the future. Talk of emotional trauma would salt the very soil she had seeded six hours ago; not a terribly fair thing to do to her poor little Ventrue.

Or perhaps, she was running from the inevitable pain of the conversation, and how she would be forced to look the boy in the eyes, his deep, honest, powerful eyes, as he confessed his rage and agony to her. And that could wait until tomorrow night.

Grinning down at him, she turned on the couch to face him, one leg hooked over the other as she leaned over him, and began to undress him. His face lit up like the fourth of July. “Interspecies romance grows in the city. Perhaps the tension between monster, wolf, and vampire, will not be as large as I fear.” With practiced hands, she slid him out of his jacket, tie, and shirt. The sight of his lean, defined form, his muscles and abs, and the way the Blush of Life brought color to his skin, earned another smile from her. She Blushed Life as well, and grinned down at the boy as she motioned to her chest.

Jack tried to undo her buttons as quickly as she had his, but his fingers fumbled on a few of them. Cute. And when he reached behind her to try and undo the clasp of her bra, he fumbled a few times as well. Adorable. Laughing, she waited and watched, and scratched his head as he at last freed her breasts. His eyes devoured her, and a groan escaped him, as he buried his face in the heavy teardrops.

“Which Kindred do you think most likely to cause problems?” she said, as she reached down and started undoing his pants.

“Jessy, undoubtedly. I know Joe from the Carthians has a big mouth. It wouldn’t surprise me if Hella causes problems, too.” With a big grin on his face, he helped her get him out of his pants and boxers, sliding them both off at the same time, and exposing his shaved-smooth pelvis, and growing erection. Out in the open, the lounge, with no walls to hide them, and the boy was ready for sex in seconds. She had utterly destroyed the sexual barriers he once had; delightful. She was sure there were more barriers to find, and break if she desired, but now, she could indulge in the sexual openness she craved.

She still wore her skirt, but tonight was about pleasing the boy; and there was a certain joy in remaining half clothed, while her partner was nude.

Smiling her best devil's smile, she slid off of the couch, and got down onto her knees between his. She set her hands underneath her breasts, lifted the heavy pillows up onto his lap, and buried his raised member in the softness. Immediate groans from the boy, each sending a small shiver through her, spurred by the sight of his pleasure-laden face. In the past, he may have been overwhelmed by something so simple, and let his eyes close and head roll back, lost to delirium. Now, he stared down at her and where her breasts pressed snug to his pelvis and thighs, as if looking away for a single moment would rob him of witnessing lightning in a storm.

“The three you listed, if you did not realize, are Gangrel.” She pressed her breasts together harder for a moment, and pulled another groan from her love. “They are quite a handful, I admit.”

“Handful ... lot bigger than a handful.”

She rolled her eyes, and laughed. The look of almost desperate desire in his face was too precious, and that he managed a joke as he gawked at her, was equally wonderful.

To reward him, she leaned down, scooting her butt a little further back so she had the angle to encompass the swollen head of his length in her kiss. She tilted her head to the side, and looked up at the boy, as she both kept her breasts pressed into the groove of his pelvis and thighs, overflowing much of his body, as she suckled on his cock. Soft, gentle kisses, meant to build the pleasure, slow and tasting the sexual need that radiated from him.

Movement drew her eye, and she almost let the impulse to look spoil the moment. But, no, she kept her eyes on Jack as she lifted her head up, and leaned in forward, to completely engulf his cock with her breasts.

Natasha was watching.

The Mekhet had likely finished her work, and was going back to her room to read. Sunrise was soon, after all. She must have been walking past when the two lovers had drawn her attention, and like any Mekhet was prone to do, she cloaked herself in her Cloak of Night, and sneaked in to see what was happening. Mekhets, forever attracted to secrets.

But Antoinette's habits with her love were no secret. If Natasha wished to watch, she did not need to cloak herself. Still, if that was what the girl needed, in order to find the courage to watch, then that was fine with the Prince. The little creature was a good fifty feet away, and only poking her head out from around the room entrance enough for her to watch. She likely thought she was far enough, and her discipline strong enough, to not be seen by a Daeva, even one as old as Antoinette. Silly girl.

“Do you know what the teams will be for the Invictus?” she said, before she leaned down, and again set her lips onto the boy's cock, keeping it wrapped in her breasts so only the glans was exposed.

“I uh, probably either a Nos or Mekhet in each team, for Obfuscate. They'll probably keep us Right Hands together, and have us exploring the more suspected zones.”

She nodded as she kissed and licked, before she started working her head up and down. Keeping her mouth tight and snug on the sensitive head of his cock, as she forced her kiss to work back and forth over the base edge of its swollen girth, was enough to have the boy trembling in moments. Precum leaked from the boiling glans, and she kissed it away.

Perhaps it would be fun to put on a show for Natasha? Smiling around his cock, she lifted her head, and used both hands to begin kneading the heavy pillows together. Large as they were, and her so close to Jack's body, kneeling between his knees, each time she pressed her breasts together as a forward wave, they spilled over her hands, and onto his thighs and abs. Each forward press buried his cock completely, causing gentle friction of her silk skin along his glans. In minutes, the boy began to orgasm, and he reached out to hold onto her shoulders as he did. His first gush of cum managed to squirt upward with force, and she licked her lips as she felt the thick warmth coat her neck and under her jaw. The next was lost to her breasts as she squeezed them together with her hands, burying his glans proper, and ensuring each new gush of cum coated them from within. Several more waves followed, each contained and hidden between her breasts, until it began to drip down her stomach.

"I ... I'll try and ... stop Jessy from ... getting into fights with whoever we're working with." Poor boy, panting and squirming with pleasure, completely unaware Natasha was watching.

"Come, stand for a moment, so I may lie down for you," she said as she let go of her bust, leaned back so the cum-soaked, heavy breasts slid off of him and impacted against her with gravity — as intended — and stood.

The boy hopped up, big grin on his face. A prime moment for Antoinette to turn, and glance Natasha's way.

Oh? The girl's head was inching about, easing back and forth a bit. And her shoulder were lifting up and down ever so slightly. Ah, yes, it was a motion Antoinette recognized immediately. The girl was touching herself, masturbating, using the wall as a barrier to hide what her hand was undoubtedly doing underneath her skirt.

Natasha's eyes went wide when she realized Antoinette saw her, and wide again, when she realized Antoinette knew what the little creature was up to. The power of a little eye contact, and a subtle grin.

As Antoinette sat down, she offered Tash two unspoken words, each single syllable, each easy to read upon silent lips: come watch.

She did not wait to see how the little Mekhet reacted. A little suspense, a little mystery, it all added to the joy and thrill of such open expression. Grinning all the more, she rolled onto her back, set her head upon the arm of the couch, and held out her hands for Jack. His grin was equally large, and he climbed up onto her so he could straddle her waist.

To her lover's delight, she brought her hands up to her collar, setting them over top where her breasts connected at the top of her chest. This way, her elbows were brought in, and each arm forced her breasts up to sit on top of her chest, instead of falling to the sides with gravity. More than enough of a signal for Jack to lean forward, his knees outside her arms on the couch, and slip his length into the crevice underneath and between her breasts. With his own cum as lubricant, the boy let out an obvious groan as he set his hands around the outside of her breasts near her elbows, and held them, pushing them together, as he sank his cock balls deep into the crevice.

"My love," she said, smiling up at him, "how goes your training with Julias?"

"It ... it's um ... going well. Getting better at Resilience. Should be able to use vitae to keep my body together a bit easier." His eyes drifted between her gaze, and where he was easing his cock back and forth between her bosom. With his torso leaning forward somewhat, he managed to keep the angle of his shaft aligned with her chest, and the pressure of her breasts pressed together by both her arms, and his hands, was enough to keep it secure. It would not slip out, giving the boy the leeway to gently fuck her breasts without anyone having to hold his cock in place.

“That is good. Julias is quite the master of Resilience. It takes much to damage him properly.” She licked her lips as she watched her lover rock his body back and forth, the tip of his length appearing for only a moment, whenever his pelvis pressed against the undersides of her bust. He was moving hard enough to make her breasts ripple with each impact, gentle but not overly so, and she chuckled at the feel of it. The heat of his cum and girth along her skin was pleasant, but it was the look of rapture on the boy’s face as he stared at her body, that had her cravings for more build.

Movement, in the corner of her eye. Oh? Antoinette kept her eyes on the boy in front of her, on his beautiful, naked form, and the joy dripping from his gaze, while peripheral vision allowed her to track the movement of the spying Mekhet. Natasha’s masterful use of Cloak of Night was enough to fool all eyes except for another Mekhet using Auspex, or a Kindred as powerful as Antoinette. She’d have no trouble hiding her presence from Jack as long as she did not get too close.

This was quite a growing moment for Natasha. The girl was standing off to the side, maybe fifteen feet away, and was staring, jaw dropped and unable to close. She was no longer masturbating, but that was undoubtedly too far a leap out of Natasha’s comfort zone for the little Mekhet to handle. Perhaps, in the future, the Prince could change that.

“Coat my nipples, my love, when you cum.”

Groaning again, the boy nodded, and started thrusting faster, both his hands holding her breasts snug around his cock, their size spilling over and around his hands and wrists. After another minute of consistent, gentle thrusts, he let go of one of her breasts, though it remained where it was, kept snug by her own arms. The free hand took his cock instead, and guided it up onto one of her breasts, to begin rubbing his dripping, engorge glans upon her swollen areola.

Immediate sparks pulsed out from the swollen nipple and into her chest. Antoinette half closed her eyes, and made a deliberate moan, picking the right pitch, the right timbre, the right volume, to have the boy melting. He continued to rub his glans against her nipple, and did not stop as a gush of his thick cum washed over it; less of a squirt, and more of a heavy wave tonight. She watched the ripe head of his shaft let loose another wave of his hot, thick cum, and another, coating her nipple as he circled it with his length's tip, before he slid his cock along the silky skin of her breasts, and onto her other nipple to continue the same treatment. The touch of his wet glans pressing and rubbing against her aching nipples was heavenly, and she sighed joy again as his rubbing earned a few more gentle, warm sparks of bliss that reached into her chest, and inched their way down toward her sex.

“Now, resume as you were before,” she said.

“Yes ma'am.”

Perfect. With her puffy areola thoroughly coated in cum, she eased her elbows down a little, and her hands down her bosom farther, before taking her nipples into her palms. With almost milking motions, she squeezed around them, lightly pinched her nipples, and put pressure around the whole of her areola, before she eased up, tracing her fingers around the aching buttons. With the boy's hot, white fluid coating it all, it made her touch divine, and she offered the boy another calculated moan, to entice his arousal yet again, as she masturbated with her breasts.

He leaned in, took her breasts into his palms on the outside, and again pressed them together as he guided his cock into the crevice they created. As he resumed fucking her bosom, she pleased herself with them, knowing exactly how much pressure, and exactly what motions to use, to make the tingling waves build.

Natasha moved in closer. Her mouth was still open, her whole head blushed beet red, and despite herself, one of her hands stroked one of her nipples through her shirt. Wonderful. Sometimes Antoinette wondered if her student realized her Prince's attempts to spread sexual openness were not empty words. No doubt the child would be terribly embarrassed later, and Antoinette would again have to explain there was nothing to be embarrassed over. Jack would not mind, if she told him; and she eventually would.

“And Dominate, my love? How do you practice?” She shivered as the waves of pleasure built up more, and she eased off of her play for a moment, before she resumed. Squeezing, milking motions around the whole of each areola were delicious when her breasts were wet, and she pulled her hands forward onto the nipple, where she traced and teased, circled, and ever-so-gently pinched.

“I ... I've been ... having mental battles with Julias every so often. I still can't get him.”

“It would be a wonder of the ages if you could dominate your sire at your age, my love. Your skill grows rapidly, but temper your expectations.” Once she resumed caressing her nipples, it did not take long to earn the sparks again, and upon that, the waves that coursed down into her chest, down further to her sex, and then outward. She licked her lips as she met Jack's hypnotized gaze, and a few quivers worked up and down her thighs and arms, as the pleasure tremors spread into her thighs. Despite herself, she closed her eyes for a moment as the unique sensation echoed through her chest and core, before she looked up to Jack and his enraptured gaze.

Natasha's eyes widened, perhaps more than Jack's, and she stared all the more. To orgasm from breast play was perhaps a unique concept to the little Mekhet.

"Y-Yeah, but ... I still wanna." Jack slid his length out from between her breasts, and once again set his glans upon her nipples. Smiling down at her, staring at her, drinking in her gaze, his eyes slid down to watch himself as he masturbated slowly, and took the time to rub his boiling hot glans around her swollen areola. "I ... I think I ... think I could use some practice with you, too. With my Disciplines, I mean."

The sparks hit her immediately, skin sensitive from orgasm, and radiating pleasure all the more as her love pressed down on each nipple, taking the time to half bury the head of his cock into the softness of each breast.

"I will take that challenge, my love." Chuckling, she pressed her soaked breasts together as she buried her nipples with her white-covered hands. "Again. And this time, keep your eyes closed."

"Um, yes ma'am." With a moan, he set his hands outside her breasts again to hold them in snug against his thighs and pelvis as he hid his cock between them. "Three times? Thought you'd want me to try and stop using my vitae so much to fuel sex."

"Three is not so large a number to worry over. And tonight is special."

"It is? Why?"

"I will tell you in the future." Chuckling, she lifted a knee and nudged it against the boy's back. "Eyes closed."

With a nod, he closed them, and began to gently rock his body back and forth, fucking the very well lubricated sleeve of flesh he made of her breasts. Perfect.

She looked Natasha's way, and smiled. The girl was still dumbfounded. Why were so many so shocked by sexual expression? There were cultures in the world that had sex in public as often as they ate their meals. The absurd notion that nudity and sex had to be kept behind closed doors bothered her to no end.

Antoinette could order her student to come closer, but that would be crossing a line. If Natasha wished to explore sexual boundaries, it was something Antoinette could only encourage, not force upon her.

The order to have Jack close his eyes bolstered the girl's courage, though, and the tiny Mekhet took a couple steps closer. Now, she stood only five feet away, in front of the couch, and her eyes were locked onto Jack. He was an attractive man, to be sure, and his defined muscles and lean frame were on quite the display as he worked toward his third orgasm. Slow, controlled thrusts, that had both women admiring how his defined musculature flexed with each motion, and how delicious a sight it was when he took a moment to keep his cock balls deep within the crevice of her breasts.

The Mekhet's eyes drifted down his body, and glanced Antoinette's way a few times with skittish eyes, before they stopped on her breasts. Jack was clutching them snug to his body, and large as they were, his hands had almost disappeared into their softness. Much of his inner thighs were covered in them, and so too was the entirety of his pelvis. It made the ripples his thrusts sent into her bosom quite blatant, and Antoinette made another purposeful moan, as she looked the body's flexing body up and down. As old as Antoinette was, with a long second life that had been filled with sex of every sort, there was something still terribly arousing about the sight of a man's abs, easing back and forth, and burying his cock into her sex; or in this case, her breasts. Arousing became carnal hunger, as she looked up to his face, to find his mouth dropped and head aimed downward, pleasure etched into his closed eyes.

No longer tingling with the blissful remains of climax, she set her hands about her large, cum-soaked nipples once more. As she began to masturbate with the swollen points, gentle milking motions that squeezed from areola toward her nipples' tips, she offered Natasha another smile. The little Mekhet was fucked with aggression, heat, mass, depth, and wild abandon, nigh every night by her boyfriends, no doubt. It was a joy to show the tiny creature that sex could be much different. It could be soft, gentle, slow, and focus on a man enjoying the unique softness of a woman's body, rather than the woman being overwhelmed with pleasure by hard, ravenous men. Instead of burning heat, it could be calm, soothing, and a quiet moment between two lovers — or more — wishing to indulge in nothing more than the tender touch of each other. It was sex that could last hours.

They did not have hours before sunrise, but Jack, perhaps psychic, decided to slow down anyway, and eased his thrusting to tempered speeds. He kept himself balls deep within the crevice of her breasts, and breathed deep as he no doubt focused on the silkiness of her wet skin pressed snug around his cock and its swollen, dripping tip. He inched his knees a little further forward, causing her breasts to rise higher up on his thighs, pelvis, and against the base of his abs, as if the boy were desperate to feel the weight of them upon his body.

His hands drifted over her bosom, and found hers. Ah, he wanted to use his thighs to keep her breasts together. With eyes still closed, he mingled his fingers with her own, found her wet nipples, and offered them small pinches, pinches she had long taught him to master with correct pressure and softness. And as he massaged them, caressed and teased them with his fingertips and his cum, she milked her areola from outside his touch, working her hands around in subtle circles, as she slid her grip in toward her nipple with gentle, squeezing hands. The tingling waves of bliss built once again, and she sighed joy as a tiny quiver worked down her body and into her thighs.

She came. With another perfected, practiced moan, she smiled up at the boy's shut eyes as she felt the sparks work into her chest, and down toward her dripping sex. She kept her eyes open, but only partially, enough so she could both watch the boy continue fucking her breasts with his slow, controlled motions, and so she could watch Natasha. As she teased herself, continued to caress her her nipples, careful to keep her touch light as the sparks of bliss danced along them and into her chest through her climax, she offered a gentle grin for Natasha. A student of hers, of the Ordo Dracul, and perhaps, if the small woman was open to it, a student of sexuality.

Not that she planned to invite Natasha to her bed, but with how the tiny Mekhet was staring, frozen, entranced, it was clear to see the woman was interested in sexuality and sexual expression far more than the old Natasha would have ever admitted. To see her watching, from only five feet away, eyes locked and body almost trembling at the sight of Antoinette masturbating with her breasts, was delightful. She would have to thank Jessy, for opening her new student to new worlds.

When a wave of white began to leak out of the crevice of her breasts, and flowed up onto Antoinette's neck, Natasha quivered, and stepped in a little closer. Her eyes were locked on both Jack's lean body, and down where his glans poked out a sliver with each gentle thrust. Each time it did, a heavy gush of his white cum flooded up onto Antoinette's neck, around her collar, and down around the top curve of her breasts.

She let go of her nipples, and instead used her hands to push her breasts together tighter, earning a groan from her lover as he continued thrusting. The friction of her breasts along his length and glans, wet and tight, was more than enough to have the boy cumming more, and releasing his fluid over her body with each thrust. It pooled underneath her throat, in the dips of her collar bone and shoulders, and between her breasts, before it overflowed and spilled past her shoulders and onto the couch. Natasha leaned forward, and stared down at the mess of cum that now coated the Prince's neck and shoulders, completing the coating of white, and painting her a heavy necklace. The boy's sex drive was vast, and his ability to use his Kindred body as a conduit for it, divine.

If she was not careful, she would have him addicted, as per the stories she had described.

She nodded toward Natasha; more than enough signal for the Mekhet to run away. The little creature slipped away, Cloak of Night masking her footsteps. Only once she was back out in the hall, did she peek around to look at them again. Smiling like a child who had stolen a cookie, she offered Antoinette a small finger wave, before disappearing. No doubt on a quest to find her boyfriends and indulge. Antoinette had expected the look of embarrassment to be glued to the Mekhet's face, not be replaced with a smile of wonder, awe, and mischievousness. Miss Vola had grown quite a bit, in mere months.

Antoinette sat up. "You may open your eyes, my love."

Jack's gaze looked up to her, and she met his green, deep, overwhelming eyes with her own. "Eyes closed? Was someone spying?"

Oh my. Perhaps she had been a fool to expect he would be oblivious.

"Indeed. Natasha was walking by, and I created the opportunity for her to witness our love making. Does that offend you?"

Laughing, he shrugged. "Nah. I think you've destroyed any shyness or shame I may have had." The boy slid off the couch, and spent a moment looking down at his body and the cum that coated his length, testicles, and pelvis, before he turned to look at her. Even as his length grew flaccid, he licked his lips as his gaze devoured the sight of her torso dripping with his seed.

“My love, only when you and I perform such an act in the center of one of my banquets, for all Kindred, and Begotten and Uratha, to witness, would I consider that true.” And even then, she was sure there were more barriers to destroy, if they ever desired to. Chuckling, she ran a finger down her breast, from neck to nipple, trailing through the layers of cum, before she lifted the digit.

“I uh ... m-maybe ... in ... decades?” The boy was hypnotized, staring at how his fluid connected to her, from fingertip to nipple in a long strand. So precious, her little Ventrue.

This boy, young man, her little Ventrue, had an angry side to him? It was difficult to imagine Jack, as he stood there with his deep, green eyes staring at her topless body with hunger and wonder, could summon such depths of rage.

But she did have to ask. Later.

~~Julias~~

“I love you.”

“I love you too.”

“Awwww!”

Julias and Triss looked over at the other Ventrue in the bed, and both rolled their eyes. The three of them were on his bed in the bunker, and despite Julias and Jen having been thoroughly satisfied, the two Ventrue had just finished making sure Triss was satisfied, too. Probably a good idea. She'd been ready to sink her claws into the two of them, if they didn't.

Now, he was spooning against Triss, holding her close to him, one arm pressing elbow down into the bed so he could hold his head up on his palm. His other arm hugged the scary woman to his chest, and a finger gently traced lines up and down her stomach, sternum, and around each pierced nipple. He leaned in, planted a kiss on her neck, earning a quiet mewl from her, before he lifted his head, and resumed smiling down at the amazing woman.

The three of them were under the covers, too, though they only had the blanket pulled up to their hips. No need to care about getting cold or uncomfortable, especially when the sun eventually decided to rise and knock them out. You didn't feel anything in torpor, except for the most extreme disturbances. But by the time you realized you were on fire, it'd be too late to do anything about it. Hence, the safety bunker.

Jen was on her side, facing them, big smile on her face, eyes filled with wonder as she watched Julias lean down again, and kiss Triss. He used his hand to guide her chin up to him, and she smiled before their kisses met; though she kept her snake eyes open a bit, so he could see the joy in them. Happy as a clam. And the sight of her being so damn happy, such a huge change from how she was just over a year ago, filled him with joy. Felt like a fluttering in his chest.

His fingers drifted down to her crow skull necklace, and he nudged it a couple times, appreciating the weight of it. "Creepy."

"You mean badass," she said.

Jen nodded. "Very." The Ventrue slipped in a little closer until she was almost touching chest-to-chest with Triss, before she leaned in, and planted a kiss on her friend's chin. "You need the necklace on all the time?"

"Just for the one ritual. Which reminds me." Sitting up with a bounce, Triss gave Jen a slap on the butt, before she hopped off the bed and walked over to the door. Both Ventrue sat up and watched her, though as she started working a knife on her hand to split the skin, Julias turned his attention to the woman beside him.

Jennifer Denver. Four secrets down. He smiled as his eyes drifted up her body, and took a moment to admire her heavy breasts hanging underneath her chest like teardrops, as Jen was sitting while leaning forward, elbows on her knees. Raven hair to her shoulders, like Triss's, and similar height. They could be sisters. Beatrice was the sister who went to beaches and worked out a lot, got a tan, abs, tattoos, and piercings. Jen was the sister that went to balls and banquets, and made friends with the rich and fashionable.

Two sisters. Was that one of his kinks? He didn't think it was, and yet here he was, sitting next to someone who looked quite similar to his love. It was so decadent and indulgent a fantasy, he almost felt guilty.

He slid back a foot, and crawled in behind Jen.

"Oh?" She looked over her shoulder at him, and grinned a succubus grin. Yeah, she'd get along with Antoinette, if the two ever tried.

He put his legs around hers, and wrapped his arm around her torso, while the two of them watched the naked Triss paint his door frame with her blood. She wasn't small, but he was a tall man, broad, and had no trouble putting his chin on top of her head as he squeezed her close.

"You seem to adore romance," he said. Every time he kissed Triss with his 'I love you' kiss, if Jen was nearby, and she often was, she made that 'awwww' sound.

"I do." Nodding, she leaned back, and rested the back of her head against where his shoulder and collar bone met. She offered him dreamy eyes, too, though he could see they weren't for him. They were for something else. Not someone else, but, something else. "Wanna know secret number five?"

“Hit me.” If he had to guess, she was going to tell him about where she picked up her love of romance, and why she found it so intoxicating, despite not wanting it for herself. First woman he’d ever known like that.

“When I was a young woman, I read a lot of romance novels. It was good escapism. But, I always found the characters terribly idiotic.”

“Same,” Triss said, changing from post to post of the door frame. “So I stopped reading them.”

“I didn’t.” Nodding, Jen leaned back as she set her legs straight out on the blankets between his, and nudged her nose into his jawline. “I always found it magical, enchanting, and addicting, to read about two people falling in love. But, I never put myself into the shoes of whoever I was reading about. I don’t know why, honestly, stupidity of the characters aside. I didn’t want to be the princess rescued by the knight, or the college girl who discovers love with the college boy. Didn’t want to be the cold business woman who finds she’d be happier in the arms of the poor guy. Didn’t want to be the queen who seduces a demon, falling in love by accident.”

“Some of those sound specific,” Triss said, finishing up with the door.

“Yeah, I was addicted, and read a lot of those trashy books. Then I discovered erotica, and those quickly replaced most of my romance novels.” With a long sigh, she pushed her back against him a bit more until he was sitting a bit straighter, and then she guided his hands off her arms, and onto her breasts. He should have expected that. “And, there was this one particular story, that turned me on so god damn fucking much.”

He smiled down at the Ventrue in his arms, still with her head in the nook of his shoulder and neck. Triss crawled onto the bed, and lay on her back between Jen’s legs, head resting on Jen’s pelvis so she could look up at them. The smile on her lips grew to a grin, as Julias started to gently massage the heavy, soft pillows filling his hands. The three of them had spent a long while having sex and satisfying each other, and now was a good time for relaxing; Jen just happened to like having her breasts massaged, and her nipples caressed, when she relaxed. Pampered princess.

“What story?” Triss said, staring up at Jen, green snake eyes wide and waiting.

“It was about a king and queen, and a slave girl. In the story, the king and queen were a loving couple, running a nice kingdom, in a medieval world. They didn’t know a slave market existed under their noses, and when they found out, they dismantled it and saved the slaves. The girl’s parents were dead though, so the king and queen took her into their service. And as the story progressed, the girl, a very young woman by this point, sort of ends up in their bed.” Sighing again, eyes closing as she waltzed through her memories, she reached down for Triss, and started caressing her neck and shoulders. “I was fifteen when I read that book, and it awoke my sexual appetite like an erupting volcano. Something about a loving couple with a healthy sex life, pulling in someone inexperienced into their bed, someone young and impressionable, someone like I was then? I masturbated the whole day away first time I read it.”

Laughing, Triss reached up and poked the girl in one of her breasts with a claw. “Not sure Julias and I really fit that description. Or you, for that matter, slut.”

Jen slapped her hand away, and set both hands flat on Triss’s face, covering it. “Back then, I was an innocent flower.”

“Uh huh,” Triss said from underneath her new finger prison.

Julias smiled down at the woman as he continued caressing her soft skin. This was an aspect of a Kindred-on-Kindred relationship he rarely experienced. Talking about their pasts, coming to terms with who they used to be, and who they were now? It was a powerful topic for Kindred, comparing who they used to be and who they had become, a topic lost to them as they got older and their memories blurred.

He said nothing. Jen could remember her past in great detail, young as she was, and he wouldn't rob her of the opportunity to talk about it.

“I don't know why I never wanted to be the couple, to be the queen or wife or girlfriend or whatever. But when the story described the young girl, a virgin and terribly uneducated in the ways of sex, getting caressed and fondled by the king and queen, it was like a fire lit inside me.” She leaned a little higher to kiss Julias on the neck, before she slid her hands off of Triss's face, and one idly plucked at some of her crocodile teeth. “I remember a scene in particular. The girl, sitting, leaned back against the queen's stomach, head between her tits. In the story the girl was really tiny, so when the king started to penetrate her, the author took the time to describe in excruciating detail every aspect of the very large man penetrating the tiny woman. And as she's slowly getting penetrated by this enormous cock, her hole stretched to the limit, the king's being super slow and gentle the whole time, while the queen's caressing her body, teasing her nipples and clit, and being very affectionate.” The woman shivered in his arms, kissing his neck and jawline again as she groaned with the memory. “First time I'd ever read a romance story where I wanted to be one of the characters.”

“Surprised you never found ghouls who were a couple,” Triss said. “Lot of couples in Dolareido you could ghoulify, and maybe indulge that fantasy with.”

“I didn't think I was strong enough for ghouls while I was a Carthian; and it took years to develop the courage to make some. And in the Circle, I figured it'd be a bit ... awkward, to indulge that fantasy, with ghouls.”

Indulging any romance with ghouls was often a mistake. The addiction and reliance on Kindred blood wasn't the issue, it was the way it altered the mind. Ghouls loved their masters, obsessively, and that didn't always end with a devoted servant. It often did, but Julias knew of Kindred who tried to turn living romantic interests into ghouls, and it not end well. Obsession never did, and love was dangerous at the best of times, deadly at the worst. Turning two people who loved each other, into devoted ghouls to a Kindred, definitely seemed like playing with fire.

Antoinette likely kept her two ghouls as friends, and made it clear that they would forever be only that. If he had to guess, she'd probably made the mistake when she was younger, romantic attachments to ghouls, and had learned from it.

“But this,” Jen said, gesturing to Triss and to Julias, “is pretty damn close.” Chuckling up at him, she kissed his neck again, a smaller, playful kiss.

“I know, right?” Triss said. “Love the feel of a big dick stretching me open.”

Rolling her eyes, Jen set her hands on Triss's face again. “I meant that you two love each other, and you let me get inside that. Like, letting me in on a precious little secret.”

“Besides, Triss,” Julias said, “you got toys a lot bigger than me.” He was a big guy, well endowed and happy to be, but Triss had an appetite, and the two of them had had fun trying to fit very large things into her very tight holes. And they'd succeeded, too. Joys of being a vampire, no aches to worry about for the next day.

Jen reached up and gave him a gentle pat on the cheek, and then a not-so-gentle pat to follow. Ow. “Yes, the sex was a big part of what made the fantasy addictive when I was a teenager. Then I got older, and realized it wasn't the sex I was craving.”

“You sure?” Triss, peeking through the cracks in Jen’s fingers, reached down for Jen’s feet by her hips, and pulled them up onto her thighs, before she idly stroked and caressed the smooth skin. “You were getting laid more than I was, when I first joined the Circle.”

“Sounds like everyone in the Circle embraces hedonism,” he said.

Jen laughed and shrugged. “Yeah, you could say that. Othello and I in particular.”

“Mmhm.” Triss sat up and turned around, sitting on her butt and pulling her knees up to her chest as she scooted in closer to sit between Jen’s and his legs. “Had a bunch of times where I was trying to talk to Jen, and she was in the middle of a threesome. And Othello, couldn’t find him without his dick up some kine’s ass. At least Aaron keeps it in his pants.”

“Ah, Julias, you should have seen it. Poor Beatrice was struggling like a child in a candy store who made a promise to their mom to not touch. You should be proud of her, resisting us.”

“Power of love,” he said, chuckling. “I have to admit, I’ve been in a lot of sexual situations since I accepted becoming a Kindred, but never in an environment like that.”

Nodding, Jen stuck her feet out, and Triss took them. Foot massage, for the pampered Ventrue. “If the Prince has her way, I’m sure that time will eventually come, and everyone will lock legs no matter where they are. The banquets alone are driving us in that direction.”

That was very true. Even with all the shit befalling the city lately, the Prince seemed intent on pushing her agendas, both her personal ones and her grander ones. Maybe some day the city would actually legalize public sex? Probably not without a major reform of the country at large, but there were stepping stones he was sure the Prince was working toward, to make it an eventual reality.

“I ... I was in complete control, the whole time,” Triss said, nodding, and staring down at Jen’s feet. Obvious to see she was avoiding eye contact, and she carried guilt on her face like a flag. “Come on! Othello’s new ghoul is fucking gorgeous. The dark skin, the huge tits, and that ass, fucking god. And he was fucking her, in the ass, and with her pussy on display and everything. And he was doing it night after night after night, and ... yeah.”

Shrugging, Julias slid his hands down underneath Jen’s breasts, cupping them and letting them spill over his fingers, before his fingertips drifted around to caress the heavy, silk teardrops.

“Just meant a very horny Triss showed up at my mansion nearly every night, demanding sex. I was pretty happy with the arrangement.” Nodding, his fingers slid a little higher, offering slow, teasing touches along the underside of Jen’s nipples, and she moaned quietly as she pressed her back into his chest. Triss was massaging the woman’s calves too, doing her best with claws anyway, and she grinned at Jen, and at Julias and what he was doing to Jen’s breasts. That was half the fun, playing with his fellow Ventrue’s bust in a visually appealing way, so Triss stared, hypnotized.

“Fuck you, too.” Groaning, Triss switched Jen’s legs, throwing him glares when she managed to pull her eyes away from Jen’s bosom. The girl was such a tomboy; damn, he loved her. “I visited Damien. Apologized for feeding him some of my blood.” Julias and Jen both raised eyebrows, and Triss shook her head. “Don’t worry about it, it’s not important. All’s good. What is important though, is Maria came by, and ... and I don’t think she likes me.”

“She doesn’t like anyone,” he said. “Don’t take it personally.”

“I don’t know. I can understand universal dislike, but this felt personal. Like, she hates me because of ... well, cause I got people like you.” She gestured toward them before resuming her massaging. “A guy who loves me and my Nos freaky shit. A friend who wants to fuck crocodile mouth, too.”

“In terms of your Nosferatu features not being too invasive,” Julias said, “yeah, you have a step up on most Nosferatu. Liliana still hides out in the tunnels with Bob, and their deformities really hit hard.” Bob looked like a classic Nosferatu from fiction, with the pointy ears, pale skin, bald head, fucked up sharp teeth, the works. And Lil had extra eyes covering half her face. “That said, they were both in good shape when they were embraced. I think they overestimate the impact of their features. Liliana could wear a Phantom of the Opera mask without too much trouble. And Bob probably looks fine naked; pale as fuck, but if he finds a girl — or guy — with a kink for the creepy fangs face, he’s set. And he could wear a mask, too.”

“And Maria, how would she deal with her deformities?” Triss said.

“She ... can’t.” Julias shook his head, and let go of Jen’s breasts. Dark, somber mood now, not the time to be fondling. He set his hands on her arms instead, thumbs stroking them as he looked at Triss. “Don’t mention it to her, don’t bring it up with her, don’t even look at her like you might be wanting to talk to her about this. Only two people she’d be willing to talk to about this are Tash and Damien.” If them at all.

The Nosferatu set Jen’s leg down, and sighed. “And Lucas. And, that’s part of why I’m bringing her up.” Leaning in, she looked left and right, as if checking for eavesdroppers. Secure as Julias’s bunker was, especially with Beatrice working her ritual magic, there was always the chance a paranormal was eavesdropping somehow. “There’s more rumors going around about Maria, and that she’s doing something ... something.”

Sighing, both Ventrue nodded, and Julias raised a brow as he glanced down at Jen.

“Yes,” he said, “but I don’t know what it is. People know, a lot of people by now, that she’s up to something, but no one knows what. I know some people are thinking she’s trying to revive Lucas, but I have no evidence. I can’t act on that rumor. And besides that, have either of you known anyone who’s ever been, done, or seen, or knows someone who knows someone who’s done a resurrection?”

Triss lowered her head, like it’d grown heavy on her, weighed down by something. “No, and ... I suppose if it was possible, Jacob would have succeeded by now.”

“Succeeded?” Jen said.

“Yeah. I mean, I don’t have the slightest clue what he’s done with that goal, but I assume it’s a goal of his. Maybe it isn’t? Maybe he’s given up. But if I was a fucking ancient vamp with all sorts of knowledge about the dark arts, and my white knight died? Yeah, I know I’d do whatever I could to bring him back.”

He winced with her words, but nodded. It was a painful thought, being separated from Triss. As Invictus, he’d just assume she was dead and there was no fixing that; and likely would suffer the extreme depressions that came with losing the one you loved. If he was a witch in the Circle of the Crone, if he sacrificed animals and his own blood to some mysterious godly entity, if he flirted with forces beyond his understanding, then yeah, he’d pursue that outcome too.

“Minerva died decades ago,” he said. “I’m going to assume Jacob has given up on that pursuit.”

“Maybe.” Frowning, Triss climbed over the side of Jen’s legs, came around behind Julias, and hugged him from behind, sitting high on her knees so she could put her chin on his shoulder. Feeling a bit clingy with the subject matter, maybe. He was, too. “Lucas didn’t die decades ago, though. I wonder what sort of shit Maria’s doing, because he died so recently. She’s damn old, too, and I assume she has the patience and drive of any other elder.”

“Except, shit’s different now,” Jen said. “We have nightmare monsters in our tunnels, and a pack of werewolves. Both groups know how to do strange things. And Black Blood...” The woman shivered in his arms, before she turned around, and pushed on Julias.

Like dominoes, Triss fell back and sat on the blankets, while Julias fell onto her body, head resting between her breasts. Triss had to spread her legs wide to fit him. With a sad sigh, Jen climbed onto Julias’s stomach and chest, and lay there, cheek on his chest and face toward him.

“Worried?” Julias said.

Jen nodded, and rubbed her cheek into his chest. “Very. I just want the hunters gone, and everything back to status quo. Even if the monsters and werewolves stick around, fine, we can live with that. But I want things to go back to normal otherwise. Not being able to walk the streets anymore is...”

“It’s what a lot of other cities have to deal with,” he said. “And we’d still be fine to do that, if it wasn’t for Azamel.”

“Still blaming her?” Triss said.

“... I guess I am, a little. But, then again, if I was her, and I knew there was a city that had other paranormals, in a better position than others, I’d probably go to them for help, too.” He groaned and shook his head, shrugging as he looked up at Triss. “Except, I’m not that person. I’m the person that has to clean up her mess, and it’s a giant mess. People are going to get killed.”

---

---

~~Eric~~

“Fuck me! Fuck me fuck me fuck me fuck me fuck me.”

Eric blinked over his shoulder at the woman. In his apartment, she'd stripped, gotten under the covers with him, and was pressing her body against his back. For a second, he'd thought she was angry about something. But, nope, she was literally asking him to fuck her. Again.

“Looks like you're the big spoon here. You fuck me.”

“I don't think you understand how sex works. Unless you were looking to get a strap-on up the ass.” She set her chin on his shoulder, and tilted her head enough to look down at him.

“Not my thing.”

“Yeah, Vincent didn't like it either.”

“Oh Jessy, you didn't.”

“Hey! He is my ghoul, and I can do whatever I want with my ghouls. They're always happy to oblige.” Rolling her eyes, she grabbed his shoulder, and yanked him over onto his back, before sliding her body onto his and pressing her chest down onto his stomach, head hanging off onto the blankets. “I mean, I still managed to make him cum, but I got the impression he'd much prefer cumming a different way.”

“Me too.” He'd never understand the strange relationship between vampires and their ghouls. It was brainwashing, and clearly a form of control. But was it unwanted? Did Kindred turn the unwilling into thralls and ghouls? Probably. Did any in Dolareido? He had no idea, and he was afraid to go down that rabbit hole.

He'd yet to see a ghoul or thrall that was unhappy with their owner, and it certainly seemed like Jessy treated hers well; surprise pegging aside. Did being brainwashed mean all ghouls and thralls were automatically happy? Again, no idea. And again, a little afraid to tug at that thread.

She punched him in the leg, gently. Loved her buddy punches. "Well, if you don't want it up the butt, why you always looking to stick it up a girl's butt? We both have butts."

"You're the one asking for anal," he said.

"Yeah, cause I like it. It's awesome, and my ass is amazing. But, I mean, guys everywhere, always wanting to stick it up the pooper, but the moment you propose sticking something up their pooper, they get all grossed out and shit." She rolled over. He oofed with the less-than-gentle impact of her throwing her self onto her back, draping herself over his body, her back on his stomach and her body perpendicular to him. Like a god damn cat. "A guy can cum buckets from a good prostate massage, especially if you're sucking him off at the same time."

He wrinkled his nose. "I dunno. Just, doesn't seem like something I'd enjoy."

"Well, you're a prude." It took her a few more flops and flomps, before she finally settled on a position on his body, lying on her back on his chest, her head hanging down over his shoulder beside his.

"You think everyone's a prude."

"True." She reached over, picked up Kat from her eternal slumber on bed corner, and held her up in the air. Kat didn't care. She meowed a couple times, and Jess laughed as she dipped the cat from side to side. And as if that wasn't cute enough, Jessy started making vroom sounds, and dipped Kat further from side to side, like she was an airplane.

“ ... you should buy a cat.” If she’d also used her feet, and put them under Kat’s belly while lifting her into the air, he’d have suggested she adopt a child instead.

“I’m afraid they’ll hate me, like my last cat did after I changed. Kat here is clearly brain damaged, or somehow high on catnip all the time. So this is much better.” She brought Kat back down to her chest, and squeezed her, earning a meow and purr from the lazy freeloader.

“Yeah, I got lucky with her.”

“And you named her Kat.”

“I did.”

“Were you trying to be ironic or funny?”

“I ... just named her the first thing that came to my head.”

“Then you clearly have an empty head.” She set Kat down on the corner of the huge bed by their feet, before she rolled over, and straddled him. Naked girl, straddling his stomach. Half a second was all it took, half a second of looking at the gorgeous woman, before he felt some blood start shifting toward his dick.

Kindred could ‘Blush Life’, or not, and keep their arousal under control. He, on the other hand, had no such defensive mechanism against the manipulations of a beautiful woman, especially not a naked one straddling him.

She Blushed Life, bringing color to her once pale skin, and filling out her body with more of the width caused by blood flow and functioning organs. Grinning at him, heart beating steady and confident, she reached down to her sex, and started to lightly stroke her clitoris. Yeah, no defense. He was hard in seconds, cock rising and pressing against the back of her ass, fueled by werewolf vitality. It was almost unfair.

“Talk to Azamel or her goons lately?” she said. Her hand on her clit eased down further, and underneath her as she leaned forward to take his cock. But instead of pointing it up at her, she flattened it against his abs, and sat on it. Grinning down at him, she started rocking her body back and forth, rubbing her soft pussy lips against the base of his shaft, while avoiding touching the swelling head of his length.

“Just that quick visit I made with Jack, earlier tonight.” Sunrise was soon, and he’d gone to bed after returning from that trip. Jessy had showed up not long after that.

“Ah yeah, he texted me the result of that.” Laughing, she set both her hands onto his shoulders, and started rocking herself back and forth faster. Wet, warm juices coated in his shaft in no time. “I still think you should play all the fields. No one’s forcing you to pick one group and work only with them.”

“Yet. No one’s forcing me yet.”

“Good point.”

“I’m still—” His jaw dropped as he watched the woman turn around. Straddling him reversed, she guided his cock up toward her slit, and lowered herself down onto him. He quivered for a moment as her clenching insides enveloped him, squeezing him with far more force than was legal, and he stared at the sight of her large, toned ass pressing against his pelvis and hips as she got comfortable. “I uh ... still trying to ... figure out the politics.”

“I mean, I know they’d all prefer you only stick to one group, but they’re not forcing that situation; probably afraid to, in case it makes an enemy out of you. I say fuck em, do whatever you want. S'long as you're working at Bloodlust and keeping an eye open for hunters, I'm sure I can convince the council you deserve your salary." She looked over her shoulder at him, and grinned an evil grin, when she noticed he was staring at her ass. Slap. She gave her butt a hard enough slap to make it ripple with the impact, and he groaned as he watched.

He was surprised she didn't ask for anal, considering the conversation. But, lubrication would have been required, and awesome as anal was, it didn't make for quick, spontaneous sex.

"Everyone else seems convinced the groups can't get along." He reached out, and set his hands on her ass. Fly to honey. The girl was built like a lean Colosseum gladiator, and that meant the sight of her back, the defined-yet-feminine muscles that highlighted her shoulders, was intoxicating. The slim waist against the large ass and built shoulders and spine made her hourglass figure almost ridiculous, and he gawked at the sight of it.

"Things are different this time. A lot different, with Tony, Viktor, and Lucas dead. And Jack, the little twerp, is a great at keeping everyone happy." She leaned forward toward his legs, grabbed his shins, and started rocking her body back and forth, each dip an opportunity for her to grind her hips down toward his legs, and then grind her ass toward his abs. Holy shit.

"I ... guess I'll try and be friends with everyone. For now."

"Sounds good to me." Nodding some, Jessy lifted her ass up a few inches, and slammed it down onto him, hard enough it landed with an audible, quiet slap, complete with a momentary jiggle. She grinned at him over her shoulder again; damn woman knew exactly what she was doing, and what he was hypnotized by. "Everyone's cooperating with the sweepers idea. What'll you do?" Without skipping a beat, she clenched on his cock, and started dipping her hips side to side, dancing on him.

“I ... I think I’ll ... take a visit to Avery’s, I guess. Learn a thing or two about Uratha, before I”—she clenched on him, and he winced as the woman started rocking faster—”before I see about helping out. And I would like to help out, before that fucker tries to kidnap me again.”

“I hope he does, so I can tear that fuckers throat out.”

He smiled at the salacious beast riding him. Yeah, he didn’t doubt it.

---

The beeping of the heart monitor was slower. Drugs had a habit of doing that, apparently.

Eric looked over the bed, past the curtain, and out to the sunlight. His father’s chest rose and fell, adjusting the blankets ever so slightly with each slow breath. Wake him up? Nah, let the man sleep. Better to let him have his rest when he got it; maybe wake him up before you leave, so as to not waste the visit.

Did he want to waste the visit? It’d make things easier, if the old man was told Eric had visited, after he’d already left. Something like ‘sorry sir, he visited but didn’t want to disturb you.’ Nah, that wouldn’t work either. His father would just get angry at him next visit for not waking him up. Then again, his father would get angry if he did wake him up, for having the nerve to do so. No winning in this situation.

Nothing he could do, but sit there, and wait for his dad to awaken on his own. Even then, he’d probably get a ‘you just watching me sleep? The fuck is the matter with you’ or something.

His new sleep schedule was weird. He thought he had it down, but lately he'd been staying up every hour of the night, instead of getting up before work specifically. Jessy.

She hadn't lied, or exaggerated. She really did want to fuck, a lot. He was happy to oblige, but it was making it difficult to find time to do the stupid shit that he didn't want to do, but had to do. Maybe that was a sign? Stay home and fuck the insatiable fox, and don't hang out with your dying father who has given up on life.

He could do both, he supposed. He didn't have any hobbies anymore, or goals. An hour or two a night for Jessy, a shift at Bloodlust, the occasional visit for his father, and taking care of his cat. Much as he wanted to think he didn't have free time, he did. A decent amount of it, too. Maybe he should get a hobby? He could get back into fighting.

Nah. He wanted to, with his knee feeling good again. But there'd be no sport in it, his new strength and regenerative abilities putting him clear outside the ability of any other human in his weight class. Maybe he could learn a new skill, build a new hobby? Drinking and eating enough crap to give himself diabetes was the only one he learned from his father, after their mother died. That wasn't fair, and he knew it wasn't. But memory was a fickle bitch, picking and choosing what to remind him of at its whim.

But his mom, what did she do? Fuck, that was an old memory.

She liked to sing.

Oh, right. When he was a little kid, he'd been a good singer. Any of that talent still there? No. He didn't even sing in the shower anymore, after she died. That part of him left with her. And with puberty.

Maybe he could pick up writing. Ugh, no. He had nothing to write about, just things to bitch about. Maybe drawing? He was garbage with a pencil; or whatever the fuck it was people used these days. No one used fucking pencils anymore, it was ... it was ... tablets and stylus pens, was it? Something ridiculous. The fuck was wrong with the old, proper shit, like pencils and paper? Like—

He slapped himself in the face. Groaning, he shifted around in the hospital chair, adjusted his suit and tie, got up, paced around a bit, and sat down again. He was sounded like his father, saying stupid shit like ‘back in my day’ and crap. Like someone had tossed some napalm at him, his skin set on fire, and he had to breathe deep to wipe the rage away. What shitty impulse.

Just breathe.

What did that Jack kid say? Flip the switch? From the context of the conversation, the kid meant being cold and logical about shit. That was important to do in a fight, usually. But emotions were useful tools sometimes; rage, in particular, was a powerful tool, if controlled. He was used to letting it boil up inside him, overflow, splash, and scald. Yeah, the scalding was the problem. Maybe the kid was right, and he should ignore his impulses.

Sound advice, if impulses took you down bad roads, like they did for most people, him especially. Dating Sheryl? Impulse, he supposed, a feeling in his gut that told him she was the one. Nothing but hormones. Getting his knee ruined? He told himself he’d gotten tired in a fight, but truth was, he was getting angry and frustrated, and let that rage drive him into an easily exploited position.

But, an impulse was an impulse for a reason. It hits from out of nowhere, and stopping it in time is borderline impossible. And that really fucking sucked for shit holes like him, who had dozens of shitty, self-destructive impulses piled on top of each other. Good luck changing any of those by his age.

Sighing, he looked at the TV. On, and muted, as per usual. Would his dad wake up if he turned up the volume? Probably. Man would likely sleep through the apocalypse, but god forbid he accidentally hear the fucking TV.

His condition wasn't getting worse, or better. The man was old, had done major damage to his body, and wasn't doing much to fix it. The drugs, the machines, the hospital food, that was preventing him from deteriorating. But the fucker refused to get up off his ass. Christ that pissed him off, got under his skin, really—

“Eric?”

He sat up with a jolt, and turned to the door. “Fiona?”

Radiant and full of life as ever, she grinned at him and slid in. Slid. As if walking might make too much noise, she slid her sneakers over the floor, thankfully not making any squeaks, and she got in close to him.

“Aye. How are ye?”

“I'm good. I...” He looked over at his sleeping father. Still sleeping, good. “Let's go to the cafeteria to talk.”

She nodded, and slid out of the room, hands in the small of her back. She wasn't wearing her usual jacket this time, but some blue jeans and a white t-shirt and bra. Of course he noticed the bra, cause the t-shirt was a bit tight, she had a stacked little body, and he'd seen those breasts naked before. He'd seem them bounce and jiggle, ripple as he fingered her until she came on his fingers, seen the contrast of her pale skin and freckles, and how her breasts had far fewer freckles below the cleavage line.

Three seconds and he was already horny, just remembering it. Yeah, he and Jessy were made for each other, if this was all it took to get him borderline erect. Not just the memory of her either, but the smell of her, the smell of her juices, the smell of her sweat, the smell of her everything. Like a hound dog, he was never going to forget it, and it'd now be forever distinct in his mind. It'd make talking to her difficult for forever, far as he could tell.

But he was an adult, he could control his hormones. Besides, she was dating someone else: the emo kid.

A tall, slender woman with dark skin waited for them down the hall. He should have known Fiona found him thanks to Athalia. She was in black jeans and a white shirt, buttons done up, and wearing more feminine shoes. He'd prefer sneakers, honestly. He hated the shoes he was wearing, how uncomfortable they were, and he knew for a fact her shoes had to be worse.

"Surprised to see you here," he said. "Feeling better?"

"I am."

"We came by yer apartment, but ye werenae there." Nodding, Fiona stepped between him and Athalia, and bounced with each step as they moved into the cafeteria.

"Yeah. I try to visit my dad every so often."

"Kind of ye to take care of em like this." She found a table for them, and sat down. The silly girl probably didn't even notice she'd decided to take charge and choose where they were sitting, despite her being the youngest in the group. It was fun.

Sitting down by the window, Athalia sighed and looked out to the sunlight. She may have been healed enough to be out, but she still seemed weak. Her human body wasn't injured, but the nightmare creature she was attached to, Eric had no way of knowing how that thing was doing. Or she was just depressed; understandable, given the situation.

“Invictus pay me a lot, more than I really care to spend.” Not that he necessarily wanted to sink money into the broken machine that was American healthcare, but he did anyway, for some stupid reason he still didn’t know.

“We wanted to talk to you about what you said to Azamel,” Athalia said. “And, talk to you about ... where you stand.”

Fiona didn’t look convinced. With a shrug, she got up, got herself a salad, and came back to start munching on it like a rabbit. Nibble nibble.

“I’m still thinking about it.” Just like he was still thinking about what to do about his dad. He’d never thought of himself as indecisive, but that seemed to be the running theme in his life lately. Frustrating.

“Mark and Fiona got the impression you were done thinking about it, and had decided to side with the hand that feeds you.”

“Would you be surprised if I did?” Groaning, he got up, and got some salami. Not exactly the sort of meat his body wanted these days, but close enough he could stomach it.

“It’s not like if you sided with Azamel, be willing to help her out and protect her, it’d mean that you have to give up your job with the Invictus. Just means that when it comes to the real shit”—paranormal scary shit she meant—“that you throw your bid in with us.”

“And you expect the vamps to agree to that?”

“Maybe.” Shrugging, Athalia looked out the window, sun striking her skin and long, smooth black hair. Jessy would be dead in minutes, or seconds, in this room, but the deadly reaper skeleton monster was fine. The sun gave no fucks. “You trust the vamps to just keep paying you? Sooner or later they’ll want you to do more than just bounce at Bloodlust. And aren't they demanding you see Avery, and learn a thing or two from her?"

All things he didn't want to do. The Avery point though, he was starting to agree with Jack on. Information was power, and the more he learned from Avery, the better off he'd be with whatever decisions he made. But he couldn't shake the feeling he'd be signing on a dotted line with his blood.

"All you can offer me is a safe place to rest my head away from that shit." He leaned in, and frowned at the woman, not Fiona, only Athalia. "And last I checked, your homes aren't exactly foolproof safe. You broke into that gargoyle's home, and I expect he can do the same to yours."

"Azamel, mine, Fiona, and Mark's lairs are connected. He'd be a fool to enter our home, and invite death on himself and his worthless human comrades." She snarled at him, took a piece of his salami, and ate it. Someone else might take that offensively, maybe view it as a display of aggression and dominance. No, she was trying to be nice, and that asshole attitude was how she played nice, like a fucking kid who picks on the boy she likes cause she doesn't know better. If she wanted to be a genuine asshole, she'd be cold and quiet.

Just like he would.

He chuckled despite himself, and shrugged. "If you have to know, I'm not making a decision yet, because I don't have to yet. I will go see Avery, I think, and learn about what I am. And if you guys need my help for something, ask, I'll see what I can do."

"I'd prefer if you made it clear, and make things official. None of this half yes-no bullshit."

"You don't trust easily."

“Neither do you.”

“I trust you well enough,” he said. “You rescued me.”

“I joined a recon mission to learn about our enemy.”

“I expect things will be similar circumstance if I have to rescue you.”

Sighing, she sat back, and nodded to Fiona. “I don’t like Uratha, or Kindred. But Fiona here insists on fucking both of them.”

“Tae fuck!?” Fiona stopped nibbling and glared up at her. “Fuck ye, ya bawbag. I never slept with Eric! Just ... very ... touched things...”

“Uh huh.” Rolling her eyes, Athalia took another slice of his salami, and a piece of Fiona’s spinach. Closest the woman would ever get to being nice and sociable, Eric figured. “Got a dog and leech’s fingers inside you, and now you’re working another leech. Go fuck a human, if you need to get laid so badly.”

Another cat fight. Did he attract these situations? Was it a canine thing?

Blushing — from anger, not from embarrassment, far as Eric could see — Fiona frowned her squirrel frown at Athalia, before returning to her salad. “Yer just jealous.”

The corner of Athalia’s lips twitched. She wanted to smile. She didn’t. Woman was good at keeping distance from emotions that might expose herself.

“If I was captured,” Athalia said, “what reason do I have to believe you’d try and rescue me.”

“Like I said, the circumstance would lend to it, wouldn’t it?
Enemy of my enemy.”

“And if it’s my daughter?”

He stopped for a moment, and looked at Fiona. She grew quiet, chewing slower, trying to disappear, as Athalia yanked the conversation into the most painful area possible.

“ ... I’d try and take that into consideration. I owe you, and I’d make sure to not kill her.”

Her turn to sigh again, as she looked back out the window. “I suppose that’s the most I can hope for. I’d ... I’d ... prefer to capture her, detain her somehow. Just a stupid fantasy, that I can change her mind.”

“Changing the mind of a relative is never easy.”

“Preaching to the choir.”

Sighing, he sat back, and looked out the window as well. A strange thing to bond over, he supposed. He had a love hate relationship with his dad, she had a love hate relationship with her daughter. To try and compare it was ridiculous, but there it was.

“She came ‘ere for that. I came ‘ere to ask ye a question.” Fiona leaned in, looked left and right like she was checking for spies, and held up a hand to her mouth to block any spectators from seeing it side on. “How do ye ... seduce a man.”

Athalia choked on a noise, a chuckle, before she regained her composure, and kept looking out the window.

“You mean that vamp Damien?” he said.

“Aye! He’s very reserved, and I’m afraid I’ll scare him off if I do something stupid.” The redhead groaned and looked down at her salad. Stirring it randomly with her fork, she bounced a cherry tomato around the plate, frowning at it as if the tomato were her enemy.

“I uh ... think you’d be better off asking a woman, like Athalia here.”

“Ha.” Athalia laughed again, and shook her head. “The fuck do I know about seducing men? Angela is the product of me being a moron, not a sexual conquest.”

He winced, and shrugged. This conversation was so damn awkward. “Ask Jessy. She works with him, and she’s been seducing men for decades.” Just mentioning Jessy brought his mind back to that night with her and Fiona. It did for Fiona too, based on the look she made, a shy grin and blush.

“I dinnae ken if that’s a good idea. Knowing Jessy, she’ll scare the poor lad.”

“Yeah, that’s true. But I mean, I don’t know shit about this guy, except that he seems a bit reserved like you said. And shy, I’m guessing.”

“Aye.”

“I knew a shy guy in high school who never noticed how much a girl liked him, despite him liking her too.” Shrugging again, he leaned in, mirroring Fiona’s sneaky demeanor. Might as well.

“Sounds like he has no confidence,” Athalia said. “Total turn off.”

Groaning, he rolled his eyes and dismissed the other with a wave of his hand. “Ignore her. Just because a guy isn’t confident with talking to a girl or flirting with her, doesn’t mean he lacks confidence in general. You know who does have an easy time being confident flirting with women straight on? Assholes and morons.” Starting to sound like a fucking dating expert, fucking horrible. “Only thing I can suggest is to just not take it personally if he doesn’t reciprocate you being flirtatious with him; dude probably doesn’t have the slightest fucking clue how to. Be aggressive, just ... not Jessy aggressive.”

“I think I can do that.” Nodding, smile returned, she stabbed the tomato and ate it in a single bite. Voracious. Maybe she was another Jessy, waiting to emerge from her cocoon. “I wonder, how the Prince managed to catch Jack?”

“Ask him. Or her, if you can arrange it. Though, if that kid had a shy side, he’s changed since then.” Shrugging, he reached out for a piece of her lettuce, and took a bite. Fucking. Disgusting. He forced it down, but fuck, lesson learned. His new body didn’t want plants. Not that he didn’t already know that, but didn’t cats and dogs chew on grass sometimes, too?

“He seemed a bit shy at the banquet,” Athalia said.

“Jessy described the banquet to me. Sounds like going there would trigger anyone’s shyness.”

Athalia took another piece of his meal, and bit into the meat with only parting interest as she continued looking out the window. Seemed like she was thinking about things, things that weren’t the current topic. “Bunch of leeches — and dogs — looking to fuck anything on two legs at that party.”

“I was there!” Grumbling, Fiona elbowed her fellow monster in the side. “And I dinnae gae any loving!”

The two adults at the table laughed. God damn it, Fiona was cute.

“I suppose it’s easy for vamps,” he said, “to do shit like that. They own the city.”

“Vamps own most cities,” Athalia said, “but Dolareido definitely dials up the sex content, compared to the other cities I’ve seen. That white-haired bitch really would have everyone fucking on the streets if she could get away with it.”

“Ye could do with a wee bit of fucking yerself!” Leaning in again, Fiona held up her hand, this time blocking off Athalia from seeing her lips. “She’s a cold fish.”

The reaper bone monster slapped Fiona’s hand down. “I didn’t come here to get laid, Fiona. I’m here to lie low.”

“Good job on that,” Eric said. Mistake. She took the rest of his meat, and started eating it. God damn it.

“I am impervious to Slut City’s influence.”

That was sort of admitting to being a cold fish. Or she was asexual.

“Ye told me just last night ye’d have sex with Chadwick Boseman if he ever so much as entered your peripheral vision!”

He got the impression she was the former.

“To be fair,” he said, “Boseman is gorgeous.”

Giggling, Fiona nodded as she munched on more food. “Aye, but —” Athalia slapped the girl upside the head. “Tae fuck! Ya fuckin knob, ah’ll—” Interrupted again as Athalia grabbed her head, and pointed it at the television on the wall. The news, muted, captions on.

A news reporter was speaking. Looked like there'd been an accident. Daughter and mother stabbed. Daughter dead, mother still alive, taken to the South Center Hospital — oh hey where they were — and the mother was in critical condition.

“Pretty bad,” Eric said, sighing as he looked back down at his empty plate. Right, shit, empty. “Don't hear about shit like that too often in Dolareido.” Huge city, but brutal murders were pretty damn rare.

“It said the girl was Mary Terry, and the mom was Samantha Terry.”

“People you know?” he said.

“ ... someone Jack might know.”

He raised a brow, and looked at Fiona. Her jaw slowly dropped as her eyes stared at the reporter.

Oh, right. Jack Terry.

Fuck.

Chapter 79

~~Julias~~

“Mister Terry, you’ll be working with Madam Leauvion and Madam Jennings.”

The boy raised a brow. “Sire?”

“I know you expected to be working with Mister Burksen and Madam Herrington, but ultimately, they have a lot of experience that would be better served working with younger, less experienced Kindred. In your team, your experience is key, and will compensate for Jennings and Leauvion’s lack thereof, while at the same time, Jennings is Mekhet and old enough to provide a quality use of Obfusate, and Leauvion is more than old enough to be the physical force of your team.”

Jack didn’t seem too convinced. But with a moment to think about it, the kid looked over at Gloria Jennings and Isabella Leauvion, and offered them a nod.

Any Kindred with over twenty years of second life to their name was a part of this meeting, which meant almost a hundred Invictus were in the room; most of the covenant. Jack was the exception, and several Kindred glanced his way as they tried to understand why the boy got such preferential treatment. Perhaps some time with Isabella and Gloria would fix that perception issue.

Julias took a moment to watch everyone’s reaction to the first sweep team. The ancilla Kindred, and Jack, were all sitting at the large, wooden table in the center of the room, high in the Xnomina HQ. The younger stood against the room’s walls, and they were nervous. None of them were old enough to have been through the trials Dolareido had once suffered. The Purge, Azamel’s first visit, Avery's first visit, all incidents that had resulted in violence, and everyone standing along the large room's walls had missed them. It'd be ridiculous to keep the Right Hands together in the same group, when their vital experience needed to be shared.

For each trio of vampires, he gestured to the map of Dolareido behind him, presented on the enormous touch display, and he highlighted routes, problem areas, areas with little camera surveillance, or areas with plenty, and areas with none. Dolareido was a large, complicated city, with millions of people and thousands of hiding places; by design. Jacob, Antoinette, and Daniel had pushed for complexity and underground networks hundreds of years ago, and when more elders came to join their efforts in building the Kindred utopia, they agreed.

Now, it was all biting them in the ass. The hunters had so many places to hide, and that was compounded by the revelation that they had a Begotten working for them. How many hunters could stay in that nightmare at any given time? How did they get in and out? How did any of that work?

He continued, listing off teams. When he mentioned Jessy's name, she winced, and glanced between both him, and Jack. Strange. Something was on her mind, but it could wait. Once he was done, he stepped back and let Michael MacDonald take the floor.

"As you all know," the Gangrel said, "the hunters have demonstrated both a tenacity and professionalism unexpected of hunters. Leadership has turned what were once ragtag bands, and often solo hunters, into a dangerous, armed force."

Jessy threw up her hands before slamming them on the table. "Because Azamel's pissed off every hunter on the fucking planet, and everyone in a five-hundred-mile radius came here to kill her."

"No one's disagreeing with that." Groaning, Michael leaned back against the wall and ran a finger along his bald head. "Removing Azamel would lead to violence, and ultimately, this hunter problem is larger than just her, now. So in the meantime, we're going to deal with these hunters. If any of you try and avoid doing your jobs, because you think it's that old monster's problem, not ours, I will personally cut off your limbs and leave you for sunrise. Got it?"

Jessy frowned at her sire, but nodded as she sank into her chair a little. All the younger Kindred along the walls shrank considerably more; Michael wasn't Viktor, but the man was no stranger to violence, or using it to punish Kindred who stepped out of line.

"We have killed several of them," he continued, "but their leaders Jeremiah and Angela remain at large, and they seem to have an inhuman healing ability. We're going to kill them, one way or another. They killed Master Barry Tellern, and that alone is enough reason to deal with them."

Everyone made sure to not look at Isabella or Hella. Barry's death still stung for everyone in Isabella's group, and bringing him up earned a small growl from the young Gangrel Hella. For a group of actors and actresses, Isabella's gang were more respected than Julias had ever expected. He could still remember when she was sired, how quickly she found a home for her in both Dolareido, and the Invictus hierarchy. And he could remember how effectively she defended herself when other Kindred tried to muscle in on her territory.

Hopefully she'd work well with Jack.

"Moving on. Three of the Begotten will be joining our sweeps," MacDonald said. That got everyone's attention, and everyone looked Jack's way. "Yes, Mister Terry has spoken with Azamel, and she has agreed to help with these sweeps. Deal with it. After this meeting is over, Mister Terry will be talking with Avery, and she will be assigning Uratha to various teams; Garry Tones has already talked to her and recruited some Uratha to join his own. And, as with the Carthians, these teams will defer seniority to the Uratha.”

Some of the vampires grumbled, and some others shifted weight from foot to foot, filling the room with the sound of suit fabric rubbing against itself. No one liked the sound of that, but Julias was smart enough to not wear that frustration on his exterior. Others weren't. MacDonald slammed his palm against the table, and everyone snapped to attention.

“Werewolves are good at two things. Wrecking shit, and hunting. I'm not happy about letting Avery boss us around either, but if we want her help finding and killing these fuckers, we're going to play by her rules. For those teams paired with an Uratha, listen to the wolves in all matters regarding the actual hunt. They will defer to us in matters of the city, and maintaining the Masquerade.” And the look on MacDonald's angry face said it all: so help me god they will or I will kill them myself.

An elder Gangrel versus a werewolf. That would be an interesting battle. Would a werewolf bow to his mastery of Animalism? A scary thought, and a scary memory; Viktor had done similar.

“Dismissed.”

The Kindred walked out, eyes set and determined. A goal to pursue, with steps, procedures, and a clear path toward victory, was something anyone could get behind, especially if revenge was a part of the motivation. But before Jack left, Julias waved him over, and waited for everyone else to leave.

“You going to be alright?”

“With Isabella and Gloria? I think I'll be fine. Gloria's happy to take backseat, and Isabella's happy with me and the damage I've done to Barry's killers.” Sitting down, Jack looked to the door to make sure it was closed before he leaned in toward him, over the corner of the table. “I’m pretty sure she wants to recruit me into her group. Recruit, and ... well, I don’t think she wants to have sex with me; pretty sure she’s a lesbian. But the looks she gives me, I’m sure she wants to involve me in what I can only assume are orgies with her actors. And I assume she wants to do that to get me under her thumb.”

“She’s bold, I’ll give her that.”

“Hella too, though I think she might be a little less ... bold, I guess, in that department.”

The Gangrel being less bold was peculiar, but he knew Hella well enough to know she was brave. The issue was Isabella was ancilla, seventy-years embraced, and was doing what all ancilla did: started pushing for power and stability in their world. And, old as she was, she had the strength to make it a reality, and the intelligence to do it without exposing her hand. Dance Macabre indeed.

“She’ll do justice in a fight.”

“I can fight too, you know.”

“You’re not even two-years embraced, Jack. You’re strong, very strong for your age, but the last incident should have made it clear that you’re not a front liner. Ventrue never are.”

“It’s not like I’m going to take an army of thralls with me.”

“That’s why you’re taking two other Kindred I trust to handle themselves in a fight. And if I had to guess, Avery will set you up with one of the Uratha, and Azamel will set you up with someone too.” He leaned back in his chair and combed his blond hair back over his head, sighing. “If that’s Athalia ... you see where I’m going with this.”

“If our team runs into Angela, I’ll make sure to follow the lead of whoever Avery pairs us with. If Athalia’s with us, I trust her to at least help us detain her daughter.”

“And stay off the front line.” He almost told him to skip the idea of detaining. Kill the hunters. Wanted dead, not alive. But if Athalia was there, that might not be so easy.

“What’s the point in all the training we’ve done together, if I don’t get to use my abilities?” Jack frowned, and sat back in his chair, folding his arms across his chest.

“Ventrue are meant to rule, lead, and control, not throw punches. And, you’re far too young to be risking your second life. You did impressive work escaping their capture, and you’re a Right Hand not only because you’re politically skilled, but because you’re strong. That doesn’t mean I’m going to let you try and take on hunters first hand.” Because, smart as you are, strong as you are, you’re still a kid, Jack.

“Fine.”

“Jack, I’m serious.”

“I know, and I get it, ok?”

No, he wasn’t getting it. Jack was smart as hell, and stubborn as fuck, when it came to his views of himself. It’d take a hammer to the skull to get his point across to the idiot boy in front of him.

If Jack’s team came upon some hunters, and push came to shove, Jack was going to shove back. This stupid kid was going to put himself on that front line, and get himself killed. Of course, Julius knew from experience, had done the same stupid shit, and had nearly gotten himself killed dealing with Carthians on multiple occasions. But they were never at full-on war with the Carthians in Dolareido, not ever, not like with these hunters. The tenuous truces between the covenants in the city had spared Julias his life when he was younger, and these hunters weren't going to do the same for Jack.

If Julias pushed too hard, Jack would push back, like any young man would. Question a man his ability to do something himself, something that the person believes they can do, and the man would naturally try and prove it. Jack was not immune to this, and Julias had to be careful of that.

Hopefully, someone else would run into the hunters in their sweeps.

---

Julias was not going to enjoy this.

Sighing, he sat down in one of the booths, and looked around. One of the late-evening restaurants, that stayed open until sunrise. Monvaltamor's Evening.

The music was quiet jazz. The lighting was soft and moody, with lots of candles, and LEDs set to gentle light to mimic them. The atmosphere was romantic and poetic, with walls of white that looked like stone; fake stone, but convincing. Plants dangled from above, and decorated the walls, coiling and running along the various pillars and arches. Red drapes dangled for a couple feet from the arches, and each table was a hidden inside a nook made to feel like it was carved into a mountain of ivory. The table was only big enough for four, but the restaurant was meant for loving couples or couples of couples. The red booths matched the drapes of course, for maximum contrast and effect.

Everyone in the restaurant was either fucking the other person across the table from them, or was sitting beside someone they were, and talking to someone across the table who was doing the same; swinging couples. That made it the last place Julias expected to be having this conversation.

Jacob stepped in through the front door, and several people looked his way. Seeing the elder in a casual suit was strange, especially considering the color: dark purple, compared to Julias's gray. You needed a certain level of confidence, charisma, and eclectic flair, to pull off a suit like that. The fact Jacob was wearing a white mask over the top half of his face fit all too well. Anyone looking at him would assume the mask was the reason his eyes were solid black, not the lack of eyeballs.

“Julias, darling!” With a flamboyant fling of his wrist, he walked over to him, and sat down at his booth.

Julias rolled his eyes, and leaned back as he took a sip of his drink. The owner Monvaltamor was an Invictus thrall, and of course, had some blood bags in his fridge to serve. The spoiled life of the First Estate Kindred, and ruling every business to some extent or another.

“You know everyone assumes we're fucking now?” Julias said. “And, from the mask, assume that you're my sugar daddy, and you're some politician or whatnot trying to avoid the press.”

“Well isn't that cute.” Laughing, the elder snapped his fingers, and summoned a waiter. From the way he moved his hand, his shoulder, and the way he looked at Julias as he did, it was obvious Jacob was very comfortable in this setting. Why? The man had spent hundreds of years living inside caves, avoiding the benefits of a city or technology, and overall being antisocial. Even when Minerva was alive, she visited him, not the other way around.

Maybe the man just watched too much TV. Somehow.

Jacob leaned forward, and started tracing circles in the white table cloth, like he was being flirtatious. “I'm sure you know why I asked you here.”

“You want to talk about the favor I owe you.”

“Exactly. I—oh, thank you Jonathan.” Nodding to the waiter, Jacob scooped up the wine glass of blood, and took a sip as he finger waved at the man.

“Jacob, why are you pretending to be flamboyant and gay?” And how the fuck did you know the thrall’s name was Jonathan? He wasn’t wearing a name tag.

“How rude! And homophobic.”

“I—” No, don’t fall for it. The man’s just being random to disarm you. “What’s the favor?”

“Come now, Mister Mire, don’t spoil the fun so quickly.”

“I have work to do, Jacob. You may have noticed?”

The elder smirked beneath his mask, and took another sip. “Yes, I understand your triumvirate, and Garry, are putting together teams to sweep the city.”

“And you?”

“Beatrice, Othello, and Aaron, and maybe Jennifer will be doing their own thing, yes.”

“I suppose you won’t allow Avery to pair any of her pack mates with them.”

“Correct.” Like a knife through the bullshit, Jacob held a snarl for a half second, before his crazy smile returned, and he took another sip. “Besides, she’s down one pack member, and by the time this is all said and done, I’m sure she’ll be down more.” His smile increased, and for a moment, Julias was sure he could see the devil through the eye slits of his mask.

“I won’t help you kill any of her pack, Jacob.”

“Didn’t expect you to.” A borderline admission of intent.

“And if you do kill any of them, you think the Prince or the sheriff will sit by idly?”

Shrugging, and smiling with his unyielding jackass smile, Jacob set his glass down, and netted his fingers together. Power pose, like he was going to start negotiating. Precursor for explaining the deal, maybe?

“How’s your relationship with Beatrice these days?”

“None of your business.”

“Seriously Mire? She’s my student and my subordinate. I care about her, tough as that may be for you to believe. And I want to hear it from the horse’s mouth how your relationship is going, considering your rise to council member of the Invictus.”

Yes, it was a reasonable concern from the leader of a different covenant. Except this was Jacob, and he didn’t deal in reasonable. He dealt in manipulation; they all did, but Jacob was better at it.

“Jack’s my childe, student, and subordinate, and is in just as invested a relationship with a different covenant, and yet I leave that alone. Cut me some slack, Jacob.”

“True, true. Though, you don’t think if you had the authority to ask it, you’d poke and prod at the Prince a bit, to see how she’s affected Jack, and what her plans are with him, in respect to the covenants?”

Yeah, he would.

“You want to talk about Triss? Fine. I love her, and while we do talk about the covenants, I haven’t learned a thing from her that gives me any sort of power over you.”

“That’s good. And Jennifer?”

“She’s become a good friend of mine, and a very good friend of Triss’s.”

Leaning in, Jacob lifted the white mask off his eyes long enough for Julias to see the empty sockets. “Beatrice is my first student in a long time, Julias. I hope you understand what that means to me.”

It meant the elder was not only sharing important secrets with her, it meant Jacob was putting a lot of his value, his faith, and his beliefs, into her. That was not something elder Kindred did without reason.

“ ... do you believe in the Crone, Jacob?”

“That’s a strange question to hear from a suit-loving Invictus.”

“You’re wearing a suit.”

“Yes, but that’s because I pull it off better than you.” Leaning back, he smiled a big, Joker smile as he set the white mask over his eyes again. “Why do you ask about the Crone?”

“Because I can’t tell if you actually give a shit about your religious beliefs.”

“Your mistake is thinking of it as a religion. It is communication with things beyond your limited vision. And it is trading, bargaining, negotiating, and struggling with and against a force you ... Words can’t do it justice, unfortunately. But rest assured, Mire, I am a member of the Circle of the Crone. And that is why your constant involvement with Beatrice, and now Jennifer, is a concern. Can’t you go fuck some Invictus bimbo or Carthian tomboy, instead?”

“I was fucking a Carthian tomboy, remember?”

“Oh, ha, right.” He laughed, in a quiet, almost sinister sort of way. “I almost forgot. Beatrice takes to the dark corners of ritual and occult like she was bathed in it at birth.”

“I ... wouldn’t know.”

“I’m sure she’s shown you some things. I never told her to keep Crúac a secret; a hopeless fool such as yourself, bound to physical objects and material possessions, is but a bumbling infant grasping for—”

“I didn’t come here so you could insult me. I love Beatrice, Jen’s our very good friend that we’re happy to keep with us, and we keep sensitive information about each other’s covenants out of our conversations. Now, what’s the favor you want?”

“Patience, Mire. Patience.” If the man wasn’t five times Julias’s age, he’d probably be hitting him right now. “But if you are so intent on ending the conversation as quickly as possible, I want the shaman.”

“I’m sorry, what?”

“The shaman that works for the hunters. A dangerous old woman in a wheelchair, I’m to understand. I want her.”

It was Julias’s turn to lean back. He raised a brow, and looked around to make sure no one was listening. At least Jacob had been smart enough to whisper.

“Why?”

“Why wouldn’t I? She’s mastered some very disturbing and enthralling abilities.” Jacob raised his glass and snapped his fingers. The waiter — Jonathan, evidently — showed up in seconds, and poured him another glass of blood. Julias’s glass remained almost full. “Her age would suggest she should be dead, but she isn’t. And the way she tore the dream apart at the seams was astonishing. It's a wonder Black Blood was able to catch us before we fell into ... whatever it is that lies between."

So Jacob didn't know everything then. Realms between realms. Black emptiness, according to Jack. Sigh. What happened to the world he knew just a year ago? Blood and bullets, suits and cocaine, pushing around uppity Carthians, and building up Xnomina's chokehold on other businesses.

Ignorant of him. People like Jacob lived in this other world with larger-than-life concepts and entities on a regular basis. And now, Beatrice was exposing Julias to that world, to this creepy and dangerous thing that permeated the solid world he was used to. It was important he pay attention, to her, to Jacob, to all of it.

"Giving you Elen completes the favor I owe you?"

"It would."

"And if I say no?"

"You won't."

Julias snarled and folded his arms across his chest. "She's a dangerous person, Jacob. If we find her, we're going to kill her."

"You'd be much better off if you didn't. I'll have to ask a different favor from you, and you won't like my next request."

And of course, the bastard wouldn't tell him what it was. Julias had the option to not satisfy the psycho's requests, but that was a recipe for disaster. Making an enemy of a witch was not good for covenant relations, especially considering Jacob had saved so many of them, including some of Avery's group and Azamel's group. The elder bastard held all the cards, and Julias not paying back what he owed would backfire.

Risk assessment was where Invictus shined. Did giving this psychopath a woman who had displayed strange magical abilities come with risk? Yes, a lot. A large enough risk that it'd be better to piss Jacob off, and kill her? If that meant he'd ask another favor, an even worse one, and Julias denied that one as well, then there was a good chance Jacob would turn violent, in some form or another.

“ ... I'll ... tell the teams to try and capture her alive.”

“Wonderful! And don't worry about Garry, he owes me many favors, and will be trying to do this as well. But don't go telling everyone about this, would you? I'd prefer the Prince and her dog stay out of my affairs.”

Trying to keep anything secret from a Mekhet as old as Daniel was borderline pointless, but then, the fuck did Julias know about the tools Jacob had available to him. Julias always had to assume Jacob and the Prince both had special options the Invictus would never have access to. Those tools had scared Natasha away from the Ordo Dracul and into the arms of the Invictus at one point, but now, perhaps those tools were her tools.

He had to talk to her again, professionally and personally. This world was starting to scare him.

“What're you up to, Jacob?”

“What makes you think I'm up to anything?”

“Don't fuck with me, Jacob. Everyone has their eyes on this hunter issue, but that doesn't change that the council, and the dragons, know you're up to something.”

“Whatever do you mean?”

Julias grit his teeth until he felt the fangs fight to emerge. Squeezing a hand into a fist until it hurt, he leaned in and glared at the masked bastard. “Something is going on. You and that creature are doing something, pursuing something, and you refuse to tell anyone about it.”

“Maybe I told Beatrice about it? How would you know?”

Careful, Julias. Walking on thin ice, over black water, with something lurking underneath.

“Triss and Jen have both expressed concern, over many things, including you. They don’t know what you’re up to, so they’ve said, and I believe them.”

“Careful who you trust, Mire. You sound very concerned about what I’m up to, when you have vipers in your own midst.”

“ ... you mean Maria.”

“Of course. My fellow Nosferatu has quite the agenda of her own. Why don’t you turn your eyes on her?”

“Because, unlike you, I have no evidence suggesting she’s trying to...”

“To what? Hmm? What is it you think I’m up to? You have nothing to accuse me of, no idea what’s going on, and are utterly helpless to stop any of it, if there is anything to stop. So how about you listen to your elders, and take a peek at your own council’s actions before poking your nose in mine?”

“Fine. Point me in a direction, give me a hint, if Maria’s actions concern you so much.”

The asshole adopted a giant grin, and leaned in close. “They don’t concern me. But, you make Beatrice happy, so I suppose I should throw you a bone.” Finishing off his drink, Jacob slid out of the booth, and adjusted his suit jacket. “I’ll let you know this. Avery knows more, and like all those fucking dogs, is refusing to share some pretty nasty details. In my friend's world, the rules are different, and gods stomp around, fighting over the city in their own, strange ways. But, if you can make friends with the things there, you can pursue ... options."

"Options?"

"The universe is a scary place, Mire. There are walls between us and entities beyond our comprehension. I dip my toe in those waters, and so does Maria. Have fun." With a salute, Jacob walked out.

And Julias stayed where he was. Sighing, he leaned back in his seat, and took a sip of his red drink as he stared down into it.

He knew Maria was up to something. Everyone knew it. Did it involve Lucas? He didn't want to think that Maria was actually trying to do something absurd, like revive Lucas, or just talk to him across the ... the ... whatever it was that separated the living from the dead.

Heh. Guess that was as good as admitting he believed in an afterlife.

His phone vibrated. Sighing again, he took a peek at the message. From Jessy. Two kins had been assaulted during the day. Not thralls or ghouls though, so—

Oh no.

---

"Jessy, you fucking idiot. You should have mentioned this earlier!"

"I'm sorry! I didn't know what to do. I thought I should wait until after the meeting to tell Michael. And I bet some other Kindred in that meeting saw it on the news, too!”

Julias paced left and right in his mansion, occasionally glaring at the stupid woman sitting on his couch. Eric sat next to her, both of them in suits. Eric was probably supposed to be working at the club, and his eyes and ears were valuable there, but this was important.

“I saw it on TV, and—”

“Shut up Eric.” Groaning, Julias folded his arms across his chest as he paced. “Jack’s mother is in the hospital, and his sister is dead.”

“We sure it’s the mother?” Jessy said.

“Yes, Samantha Terry. And Mary Terry is his sister.”

“How long has it been since he’s seen them?”

“Kid sneaks out to watch his family all the time.”

She raised a brow at that. “Really? Figured you’d have nipped that habit in the butt.”

“Jack’s handled his embrace a lot better than most Kindred, and at the same time, has had a lot of shit thrown at him. The occasional peek back at his old life is fine, and something many Kindred his age do.”

Eric said nothing. Good. Last thing Julias needed was to deal with this outsider’s interruptions and ignorance.

“I’m surprised you weren’t contacted, Julias,” Jessy said. “Don’t we got thralls monitoring the news, and hospital reports, and shit?”

“They don’t know who Jack’s old family was, and I wouldn’t want them to. We don’t talk about a Kindred’s old family for many reasons, and this sort of shit is one of those fucking reasons.” Fuck. Fuck! Fuck fuck fuck. The worst possible timing. “It’s not their responsibility, or anyone's responsibility, to keep tabs on the kines of our first lives. It shouldn't matter. But ... but Jack is what, a year and half embraced? He is way too young to have to deal with this."

"Poor kid." Sighing, she leaned back and against Eric's shoulder. "News said they were stabbed, in fucking daylight. Been years since I've heard about something like that happening in Dolareido."

"... yeah, it has been years. Assault happens in Devil's Corner frequently, and murder occasionally. But the rest of South Side? Rare. A stabbing? Rarer. In daylight? Extremely rare."

"Thinking what I'm thinking?"

Nodding, he sat down across from Jessy and Eric, and leaned forward. Viktor had created many of his living rooms, family rooms, conversation rooms, and other rooms like this, with privacy in mind. No one was going to hear them. Not that it mattered, but the topic was sad enough he felt privacy was warranted.

"Hunters killed his sister." Groaning louder, Julias leaned back and stared up at the ceiling. The dangling chandelier was beautiful. This was the wrong room to have this conversation in. And it was wrong to have this conversation without Jack.

"I have a hard time believing that," Jessy said. "I saw those hunters. So did Eric. They were high on adrenaline, and fear, but it was that Jeremiah fucker and his pet Angela that were the psychopaths. And besides, hunters are fighting for kine, not against them."

"You think one of those two did this on their own?"

"I do. Tell em, Eric."

The man scratched his bald head, and managed a small shrug. "I looked into Jeremiah's eyes. It ... Jessy's right. That man would kill innocents to reach his goal.” Shrugging, he pat Jessy on the knee. “Not that I know shit about that sort of stuff, but ... but maybe I do. Got a new instinct now, and it’s telling me loud and clear that Jeremiah and Angela could cross that line. They probably did, with the sacrifices for their rituals.”

Julias nodded as he leaned forward again, elbows to his knees. He couldn’t hold still. “Jack’s description of Angela matches. Those two are the problem. If it wasn’t for them, these other hunters would probably leave or lie low.” Hunters had little to no reason to bother with Dolareido, especially now with their three most problematic elders gone.

“So, uh ... what do we do?” Jessy said.

“Jack’s going to see Avery right now. I need to contact him, talk to him about this, but interrupting him is problematic. These sweeper teams are important.”

“More important than his family?”

“They’re not his family!” Julias stood up, and glared down at the Gangrel. Might as well have squashed her under a car, with how she sank into the couch. “I’m his family! Kindred are his family! And if this was anyone else, it’d be years before he had to come to terms with that reality. But no, the kid can’t help but get involved in every possible incident, and attract the ire of the most dangerous beings on the fucking planet!”

Jessy shrank. So did Eric. Julias was yelling at them, and he did not yell often, let alone after only a few words; reasonable words, at that.

Clenching his hands into fists, he started pacing again. The noise of his shoes hitting the hard floor was far closer to stomping. He was angry for a host of reasons, but he didn’t think jealousy was one of them, jealous of Jack's family and the connection between them. A sire's jealousy. Stupid, stupid Julias.

If only the kid was older, and had moved on from his previous life. If only the kid didn't do Jack things, and become the center of attention. If only, if only.

"... I'll call him and tell him now," he said. "The longer we wait, the worse this will get."

Jessy winced, and nuzzled into Eric a bit harder. "Good luck."

---

---

~~Jack~~

He, Isabella Leauvion, and Gloria Jennings decided to walk. Going way outside of the safe zone near Xnomina meant he had to bring a buddy, and he might as well bring these two so they could start getting along. Walking was a little dangerous, but he was confident that, with Mulder and Scully watching from above, they'd be fine. Besides, any hunter sneaking around with a sniper rifle who decided to take a shot at him would be sacrificing themselves, considering the strength of Isabella, and Gloria's speed. That was true for any hunter who decided to try and take out a vampire at long distance, who had a buddy with them. Hopefully.

He missed not having to have a buddy with him on his walks. He missed doing his own solo hunts; not that he did them often, but the Prince and Julias had pushed for it, and he'd gotten good at it. Approaching someone in a dark alley? Easy. Flirting with a stranger at a bar? Eh, still really damn hard. He doubted he'd ever be comfortable doing that. He preferred making eye contact with them at a distance in an alley, using Dominate, and pulling them into his mental embrace.

But since the buddy system had been put in place, he'd only been feeding on Ashley and Julee. That was great, and fun, since it almost always included sex. Both girls had been delighting him with sexual romps with Antoinette to join them, or to supervise like it was a wrestling match. But, he kind of missed hunting. There was a thrill to overpowering prey, and he had to assume it was an instinctual desire of Kindred. An animal wasn't happy if it didn't get to satisfy its instinctual desires, and while that may have been a complicated question for humans, for vampires it seemed moderately straightforward: collect, herd, and hunt humans for their blood.

He really wanted to sink his fangs into something. It didn't used to be like that. Before, he wanted blood, sure, and he knew what it felt like to be starving hungry, so there was a desire to get blood to avoid that. There hadn't been an innate urge to hunt though, like, something bubbling up in his veins that stirred, demanding he settle this desire; until recently, that is. Julias had warned him about this, the Beast building up inside him, threatening to overwhelm and take control.

At the moment, it was just a quiet, slightly annoyed house cat. Hopefully it'd stay like that.

Julias had shared him with him stories about Kindred who had succumbed to the Beast, becoming mindless savages that had to be put down. Apparently it was a consequence of siring too often, or creating too many ghouls, though Julias told him the most frequent cause was by giving into the Beast's violent desires with reckless abandon.

Reckless abandon. The Beast was something you should unleash, let it run rampant, let it do its thing and overflow your body with its power and desires. It was a scary thought, especially because he knew it happened to him twice. That first night he was Kindred, and he'd killed Mrs. Pavala. The second time, it was against the hunters, and he'd been in far more control; and yet, not. Would he have been able to stop himself? The rush of it, the thrill, the power, it—

“Jack!”

“W-What? What?”

“You ok?” Gloria said. She’d snapped her fingers in front of his face, apparently, from how she was lowering her hand. He hadn’t heard it.

“Yeah, I’m fine.” Jack was standing between the two of them, walking down the sidewalk. Must have drifted off in his thoughts.

“I asked if you were going to be doing all the talking in this meeting,” she said.

“Um, yeah. I mean, if you want to say something, go ahead. It’s not like an Invictus meeting. Ever talk to the Carthians?”

“On occasion,” Isabella said, frowning. Yeah, predictable that she’d hate the way Carthians behaved.

“Very similar.” Nodding, Jack glanced up to see if Mulder and Sculley were visible. Nope. Good. Better if no one could see them. “Just, don’t take it personally if they insult you. They’re either testing you to see how you react, or they’re kidding.”

Her frown faded away, replaced by what he could only guess was stone cold disdain masked with the harsh ruthlessness of a lawyer. Not exactly what he was looking for.

He rotated his shoulders, straightened himself up, shoulders back, and opened the door to the crummy apartment building. Introducing two new Kindred wouldn’t be too hard, he hoped. Discussing the list of sweeper teams, and trying to negotiate who should go where, would not be so easy, especially since Avery had priority. She could — and would — overrule him at whim, and the best he could do was suggest what Kindred would get along with which Uratha. And it wasn’t like he was an expert at that, either.

Sighing, he knocked on the door of the apartment. Hopefully they wouldn't mind him bringing friends.

"Come in," Clara said. Figures she'd be there, Avery's second in charge and all that.

"Hey Clara," he said, opening the door. "This is Isabella, and this is Gloria. How ... how ... what's going on?"

Raising a brow, he looked around at the crowd of Uratha; looked like six of the pack were there. All of them were watching the news.

"You watch the news, Jack?" Avery said from the couch. The news was up, muted, talking about some accident or something.

"Not since ... not since an incident with a woman named Pavala, no. Anything pertinent gets filtered into the Invictus network, though, usually before it ends up on the actual news." Pertinent usually meant something in Dolareido that affected territory, and since Invictus owned most things in the city, police included, they were on top of things that meant anything to the Kindred.

Clara sighed, and winced as she looked down. It was like something with claws had latched onto her face, and was cutting down through her eyes and cheeks, nose and lips, as gravity dragged it down.

His phone buzzed; someone had sent him a message. He didn't check it. "What's going on?"

Everyone except Clara and Avery backed away, putting distance between themselves, the TV, and Jack; what distance was available in a crummy apartment, anyway.

But, with the cold weight falling on everyone, it might as well have been across the Grand Canyon.

Clara stepped forward. “You ... um, I—”

He stepped back. He recognized those faces. Ripped out of the black matter of his brain, out of dead, buried memories, those faces came up and taunted him. He knew those faces from nightmares that had faded into blurry memories, and only now were resurrected.

“What’s going on?” He looked back to Isabella and Gloria, but both of them looked confused, too. They didn’t have those faces.

“Something’s happened,” Clara said, that same face cutting through to his fucking insides. Stop. Stop it. “We were watching the news, and—”

His phone started buzzing. Someone was calling him. He always set the stupid thing to buzz-only while out on a mission. Zzzt. Zzzt. Zzzt.

He didn’t answer it. “What’s going on?” Fuck the phone. Fuck those faces. Fuck those eyes, the pity, the weight in their gaze. It was crushing. It was suffocating. Stop it.

He was a kid again, a stupid young boy, standing in his kitchen beside his crying sister as his mom explained to him his dad was dead. It was the same fucking eyes filled with pity that cut into him like someone cutting through his fucking ribs with a chainsaw, trying to get his heart out the hard way.

“Jack,” Clara said, unable to look at him. Just like then, just like fucking then. Stop it. “Is ... is your mom’s name Samantha?”

Please no, not again.

“Y ... Yes...”

She winced again. If his heart still beat, it'd have stopped. He wanted to puke, but there was nothing to puke.

“—cent stabbing on Richmond street has left the district in shock.” The news cut through the thick silence, and Avery sighed as she leaned forward, arms dangling off her knees. “No one knows how this happened, but the police believe it was a mugging gone wrong. Samantha Terry is currently in critical condition, while her daughter Mary, lies dead. Commissioner Landerson has this to say.” Silence again, as Avery re-muted it, emphasizing beautifully the immutable fact of what he'd just heard.

He stared at the TV as someone wearing a police uniform handled a bunch of mics in their face. Dolareido was a big city, and murder happened. But stabbings? In the day? It looked like it was in some alley between buildings, something Dolareido was filled with, but no one got stabbed in the middle of the fucking day.

Wow. He couldn't imagine how horrible it'd be for any family member who had to hear this. Horrible.

He looked around again. Everyone was trying to not stare at him, each making small glances his way before looking at the floor. The only person who was looking at him directly was Clara. She looked sad. Why was she sad?

Oh, right. That was his sister, Mary, and his mother, Samantha, on the news. Stabbed.

It was a distant noise, like someone trying to yell something to him through a blizzard, across a canyon. The wind wouldn't let him hear it. Something inside was trying to talk him, reach out and speak to him, inform him his sister was dead, and his mother was dying. All noise, lost in the snowfall and howling wind in his mind.

He was going numb. He couldn't be angry. Couldn't be angry, or upset, or anything. Numb. Cold. He blinked at Clara, and looked down at his fingers, before he looked back at the TV again. They were still talking, and shots of the crime scene were spliced into the interview.

He knew what was happening. He knew what he was feeling. This wasn't the proper reaction. Wasn't he upset by their eyes a moment ago? The way everyone had been looking at him, reminding him of the face of everyone else, when he found out his father was dead, where was the wretched fear and agony now? It left him. Gone. Now all he felt, was numb.

"I ... I uh ... should ... probably go check ... on her. Samantha, my mom, I mean." He half turned, before he stopped, and looked to Avery. "Um, the sweep teams, I'll—"

"I'll handle it," Isabella said. She avoided his eyes. Everyone did.

"Thanks." Nodding, he turned to leave, but stopped. "Gloria, you should probably stay with Isabella, so she has a partner when she leaves."

"What about you?" Gloria said.

Clara stepped in. "I'll stick with Jack. I'm going back to my apartment, anyway."

Nodding again, he opened the door and made for the street. No one said anything, no one stopped him, no one interrupted his escape. Whatever had happened in that apartment, it was cold, heavy, and he had to get away from it, like stepping out of a walk-in freezer.

Clara followed behind him, and beside him once they were outside.

"I hope Isabella doesn't cause trouble," he said. "She can be pretty aggressive and cold when she wants to be."

“Jack...”

“And Gloria, she’s quiet and passive. She’ll likely let Isabella say whatever she wants. Isabella’s ancilla, of course, so she has pretty huge seniority and rank.”

“Jack.”

“I’ll call us a car.” He looked at his phone, and—oh right, he’d been messaged. Something from Julias; looked like his sire wanted to talk to him about something. That’s who the call was from, too. It could wait. He dialed up a driver from the Invictus. “Hey, need a pick up at Brent and Farrington Street.”

“Come on, Jack, I’m trying to talk to you.”

“Why?” He looked up at the woman, and managed maybe half a second of eye contact before he looked back to the street, and put his hands in his pockets. “This sort of stuff happens. All Kindred eventually leave their families behind, right? Or should have immediately, like I should have. Like I did, sort of.” He tried to look up at her again. Those eyes. He could see the cemetery in her eyes. He could hear the eulogy. Empty words in the cold, metal shell of his skull.

He looked up for Mulder and Scully. Two crows sat upon a power line some distance away, and he squinted for a moment to make sure it was them. It was. Nodding, he stepped closer to the curb as he waited for the driver.

“Jack, you—”

“Don’t look at me that way.” He managed another glance to her, and found those same eyes. Like a smell that brings back a deeply embedded memory, or hearing a song for the first time in ten years, it brought up imagery he’d long forgotten. Ting ting. The images bounced around in his empty, metal, numb shell.

He was aware what was happening to him. He was well aware he was intellectualizing what should have been an emotional response. He was suppressing a need to mourn.

He could mourn later.

“I don’t—”

“People die all the time,” he said.

“Not family.”

Shaking his head, he managed a weak smile at the werewolf beside him. “They’re not my family anymore, they’re—”

The world stopped, and spun around as he fell. Numb as he was, he felt that. She’d punched him.

He rolled over onto his back, and stared up at the woman. Uh oh. She glowered down at him, hands in fists at her sides, shaking.

“You don’t get to say that shit.”

“I don’t—” Shit! She picked him up, held up him by the collar of his jacket, feet tangling above the sidewalk, and she stared at him eye to eye. She only had an inch or two of height on him, but that felt like plenty when someone was holding you in the air.

“I don’t know what it’s like to be a fucking vampire, to be undead. I don’t know what it’s like to not be allowed to see my family anymore. But I fucking know what it’s like to lose family. Stephanie’s death is just the tip of the iceberg. I’ve lost so many people. I’ve lost pack members, and I’ve lost blood. I lost my brother, and he was no werewolf.” She brought him in close, until he could feel the heat of her breath. “And it hurt. It always fucking hurt. It really god damn fucking hurt, right to the fucking bone. I woke up in the morning and all I could feel in every inch of my body, was misery.”

He gulped as he stared into her brown eyes. She was breathing, and he was not; a strange juxtaposition, and it made the fury in her gaze almost painful.

“I ... I don’t ... I don’t know what I ... should do.”

Sighing, she set him down, and looked over her shoulder to the oncoming driver. “Do whatever you want, just don’t dismiss how fucking real this is. Get angry, get sad, do something.”

“Easier said than done. I was a just a kid when my dad died. I ... it ... it’s all the same, the fucking same. A giant, random upheaval of everything I knew, out of nowhere, and suddenly my life is ... is...”

“Flipped-turned upside down?”

He choked on a small laugh, and shook his head. “You’re lucky I watch old TV sometimes.”

She smiled at him. Warm. Her eyes had changed. “We didn’t handle it well. Avery shouldn’t have just ... dumped it on you like that, turning on the TV.”

As the car pulled up, Jack took a moment to check his suit for tears or dirt. A bit of dirt. Sighing, he brushed it off his butt, but he knew he was just dodging the issue. Numb. Intellectualizing.

“I ... I—”

“Let’s talk about it when we get to the hospital.”

“Aren’t you going to your apartment?”

“I’m sticking with you.”

No, don't. Leave me alone. I want to be alone.

His eyes found his reflection in the car window. Glass shattered in his mind, audible, ear-splitting, shredding through his thoughts. He grabbed the roof of the car, and glared at the reflection, at his dry eyes, at the empty, dead creature looking back at him. A stupid, lonely creature, that pulled away when it was sad, pulled away from others, and pulled away into its mind. Held people at bay, kept them at arm's length. Just like Jacob had said he did when Jack's dad died.

You're smarter, this time. Learn from your fucking mistakes.

"... thanks." He slid into the back seat, motioned for Clara to join him, and pat the driver's seat on the back. "To South Center Hospital."

---

He stood at the door to the hospital. People coming, people going, occasional people with tears in their eyes, or joy as they wheeled someone out in a wheelchair. The hospital had a rear entrance for their doctors and ambulances, so no one at the front had to deal with the far-too-real trauma of bodies on stretchers and the trail of blood that kine left when punctured.

His sister was in there, in a morgue. His mom was in there too, probably hooked up to a respirator, dying, a bunch of holes in her gut. Gulping again, he looked to Clara beside him. She was looking at him, but the pity was gone; thank god. He couldn't take that, couldn't deal with that, couldn't handle it as it drowned him in his memories. It made him want to go numb, do anything to not feel it cut through his fucking ribs with a chainsaw.

"... thank you," he said. "For ... not ... not looking at me like that anymore."

“It was my mistake. I ... yeah. I’ve been in that boat, a lot of us have, and we should know better.” She stepped around calling out what it was, the way a gaze could shred a person.

He was still a little numb. The car ride to the hospital wasn’t long enough to snap him out of it. He could barely tell what he was doing. Walking? Autopilot. Breathing? Didn’t need to. Going to see his mother in the hospital? His mother in critical condition. Words. Empty words. Couldn’t appreciate them, couldn’t feel them, couldn’t picture them. Empty words in an empty skull of cold metal.

He stepped into the hospital.

“Jack,” Julius said. He was standing by the desk, and as people and nurses walked around him, the man looked him in the eyes. No pity, no worry or sadness, nothing like that. Just a solid, hard gaze. Thank you.

“Sire.”

“Your mother is in critical condition. Fifth floor. I’ll take you to her.”

He nodded and fell in beside him. The one person who’d been with him from the very start, and the most stable person in his life. Father figure much? He didn’t really think of Julius in those terms, but it was hard to deny the comparison.

“You ... you can go home if you want to, Clara,” Jack said.

She smiled at him and came up behind him. With a slow step, she fell in line with the two vampires, and looked around as they walked. “Been a long time since I’ve been in a hospital.”

The larger Ventrue growled as he glanced over his shoulder. “It’s not a tour.”

“Didn’t think it was.”

Julias looked upset with Clara’s presence. But Jack needed a buddy if he was going to make the trip from the Carthian half of South Side; and he liked Clara. He liked her for the same reason he liked Julias right now, not giving him those death eyes anymore.

“Does Antoi ... the Prince know about this yet?” he said.

“She doesn’t monitor the news the way the Invictus does. But she’ll probably find out on her own before the night is done, if the past is any indicator.”

Nodding, he looked around at the various rooms they were passing on the way to the elevator. Perfectly normal on this floor for people to be walking around, and once they went to the higher floors where people weren’t supposed to just be walking around, Julias would probably use Dominate to make kine leave them alone. Good.

Hospitals. He hated hospitals. He supposed anyone who had a family member die hated hospitals. Something about the cold lifelessness of them. A place that was supposed to save lives was so sterile — for good reason, of course — that it made everything seem like it was solid metal and plastic, the people inside included. The smells were distinct, and now all he could think of when he smelled them, was the same black and white images he’d tried so hard to forget. Walking through its taupe hallways, and following the lines taped on the floor, was a walk through memory lane, a walk he never thought he’d have to experience again.

The elevator. Getting closer. And after this, he was going to go see his sister’s body. Mary’s body. A dead body.

He clenched his teeth together, hard, and ground them against each other until he felt his fangs emerge. His fists tightened at his sides, and his shoulders started to shake. No one had said it, no one wanted to say it, or needed to say it, but it was on all their minds. Someone had stabbed his mother, stabbed his sister, and in all likelihood, it was the hunters. In all likelihood, it was Angela.

“Is the building secure?” Jack said.

“Jessy and Eric are outside. Vanna is on a rooftop, along with a few thrall snipers spread out on different rooftops.” Julias checked his phone, and brought up an image of a city blueprint for a moment, likely checking unit positions.

Jack nodded. He could always trust Julias to figure things out before he did, and take the proper precautions.

“I guess everyone knows.”

“In the Invictus, yes. If the hunters are responsible, it might be a trap, so I made sure to inform everyone. The implications are dangerous, especially if the hunters think they can use this situation to force you to lower your guard.”

“Angela and Jeremiah would have to be psychopaths to think they can attack us here,” he said.

His sire nodded, but looked down at him, frown etched into his face, the same frown Jack was building. “Aren’t they?”

“... they are.”

Clara sighed, and nodded, but said nothing. He was happy he accepted her request to join him on this journey, terrifying a prospect as it was. He was going to see his mom, terribly injured, potentially dying, potentially dead, and other people were going to be there with him. Every instinct, every reflex, every fucking inch of him wanted to do that alone. And he was sure he’d get the chance. But this time, maybe this time, maybe, just fucking maybe, he could not become a reserved asshole like Jacob knew he had become when his dad died.

Christ, Mary. Dead. How much she must have looked for someone to lean on when Dad died, and he'd been too preoccupied with closing himself off to everyone to be there for her. And now she was dead. The last time he saw her, he was wiping her memories of their encounter. All the memories he had to hold onto of her, were things he'd tainted.

Hopefully he didn't have to ruin this last connection.

Ding. With a sigh, he stepped out into the hall, and followed after Julias. The world went silent, and all Jack could hear was the clop clop of their expensive shoes on the hard floor. Some nurses walked by, and some others tried to stop them. Julias made a small hand wave, and said a few words Jack couldn't hear above the ringing inside the metal walls of his mind. The nurses nodded and moved around them, and the three of them kept going. There weren't too many doctors going around at this time of night, near midnight, but for each that inquired about the three intruders, Julias dismissed them all without issue. And knowing Julias's skill, it was likely the doctors and nurses wouldn't remember them when the night was over.

Vampires wiping memories. Was that how ghost stories started?

He stood before the door. Closed. Was that good? If nurses and doctors were pouring in and out of the room, yelling and screaming orders and whatnot, that'd be bad. But maybe she was dead, and had already been removed from the room, or soon to be. Maybe she was better, and conscious, and she'd see them come in? Maybe—

Julias snapped his fingers, and summoned the nearest person. "How's the patient in 534?"

“Still in critical condition, but stable, for now. Unconscious. We’re not sure what level of brain damage she’s suffered, and—” Her voice faded away, lost in the silence that soaked Jack’s shell. She was alive, but stable. Could be dying. Might. Might not. Murdered. Maybe not. But, at least he could visit her.

Paralyzed. He tried to push the door open, but cement blocks were tied to his hands. He wanted to go in, check on her, see how she was doing, but it was all pointless. The fuck was he going to do? She might live, she might not, and all he’d be able to do is stare and mourn, lament, maybe cry if he dared let his walls down; fat chance of that ever happening, not now.

A glance over his shoulder at Clara, and a slow, quiet nod from her reminded him he was here for more than his mother, though. He was here for himself. Selfish as it was, he had to get through this.

He pushed open the door, and walked in.

There was something about the drama involved in someone’s death that TV shows, that movies, that all media failed to ever truly convey. But, as he stood there, looking down at his mom lying in bed, a respirator working her lungs, an IV in her veins, and dozens of wires attached to her in various places, he could understand why. The sheer overwhelming sense of silent weight, of sinking, invisible dread, felt strangely similar to drowning, drowning in nothingness.

Some wires were on her fingers, and others were sneaked under her hospital gown, plugged into the beeping machine beside the bed, though most of her was covered in a blanket of that hospital green. He hated that green. And the sky blue of the hospital gown was offensive. The muted whites of the walls and plastic machines, the metal bed frame, all of it triggered disgust. And fear.

There might as well have been a giant, immovable blanket of black death draped over his mom. He wanted to run away from it, from his mother, and the memory dragging itself out of the grave like a fucking zombie.

He looked over his shoulder. Julias and Clara had followed in after him, but he could see they were both hesitant to actually close the door behind him.

“It’s ... ok,” he said. “Come in.”

“Jack,” Julias said, “you can—”

“I’m serious. Come in.” No harshness to his voice, but no life either. He could have a moment alone with his mom later. For now, Clara had called him on his bullshit, and while the sting of her voice and fist were fresh in his mind, he was going to let other people, people he trusted and liked, in a little closer, when every part of him wanted to lock itself inside the metal walls of his skull, away from everything else.

“She’s lost weight,” Julias said, “since I last saw her.”

Samantha was average height for a woman, maybe a couple inches shorter, and normally she had long brown hair; it was shorter now.

“You ... right.” Nodding, he came up close, and stared down at his mom’s closed eyes. He’d forgotten that Julias had seen her before, talked to her, on a couple of occasions when Jack was doing his internship with a different company. “Amanda noticed that, too. We think she ... she was trying to get herself back on her feet, maybe start dating again.”

He nodded as he came in closer, and stood beside him. “She looks good.”

Clara came in a little closer as well, winced when she looked at Samantha’s face, and glanced between Jack and her. Yeah, Jack could see himself in Mom's face. If she opened her eyes, he'd be looking into big, green eyes, like his own. His weren't so big right now; could barely open his eyes half way.

Mom had cut her hair. Nice and short, to the ear, with a bunch of curls put into it. Definitely something Mary had her do. Of course, the curls were ruined and the hair was a mess, wrecked by the hell and rescue she'd gone through. The tube coming out of her throat was large, and looked horrible. She was pale as hell. She looked like a vampire who wasn't Blushing Life.

A vampire.

He gulped on nothing, lifted his head, and stared down at his mom. Samantha Terry. With a heavy sigh, he leaned in close, and put his hand on her forehead. Alive. Warm. Unlike him.

He looked Julias's way, and his sire met his gaze with a small shrug. No need to say it, he was thinking the same thing. Siring her was a choice, if he wanted to save her. But, he wasn't old enough to sire her himself; it was a major drain on a Kindred's mind and body when they sired someone. Julias had sired him well over a year ago, but it'd be way too large a request to make him, to sire again so soon. And it'd be a deeply rude, offensive, inconsiderate thing to ask of another Kindred. He didn't need anyone to tell him that, he just knew it.

Turning her into a ghoul was another option. Would that be so bad? Kindred blood, infused with vitae, might be enough to pull her out of this. Maybe. Very much a maybe. Probably not, considering what the nurse said about brain damage. As much as ghouls were more durable than normal kine, they couldn't get up from injuries like this. One of the doctors said she'd been stabbed thirteen times, like a scene out of the fucking Red Wedding, and that alone meant death to a ghoul usually, let alone fucking brain damage.

And turning her into a ghoul would mean she'd be infatuated with whoever owned her. Antoinette asked her ghouls if they wanted to be ghouls before turning them. Far as he knew, Jessy did the same thing with hers. He also didn't know any ghouls who were connected to their masters, before the change. And in Dolareido, it was proper recourse to always ask them, bring them into the fold gently. He doubted Viktor or Lucas did, but, he wasn't them. He was not them. He was not Viktor.

He started pacing. Couldn't hold still, not for long, not next to this. Clara raised a brow and watched him, but Julias understood. Let the young guy think. He had to think. Feelings could come later.

"She ... she ... she might die." The words bounced around in his empty skull, echoing against the cold metal. "That may ... may happen. I ... will have to accept that. And I ... I won't..." Clenching his fists until his fingers ached, he came up to the foot of his mom's bed, and set his grip on the metal bars. "When my dad died, I really ... really fucked that up. I won't do that again."

Julias nodded, and Clara managed a smile before she opened her mouth. But Julias, thank god for Julias, raised a hand high enough to cut her off. A small finger wave was enough to convince Clara to not speak.

He took a deep breath. Useless. He took another anyway, hoping that maybe some vestigial biological awareness would calm him down with the breath. Nothing. He stared at his mom, his nearly dead mom, stared at the big tube taped into her mouth, at the way her hair was ruined, at the wires sticking out of her, at how still she was. This wasn't the woman he saw in the window a week ago, a mom who was getting over her horrible past; no one could be expected to get over losing both a husband and a son. But, she had been. With the help of her daughter, she was putting her life back together.

And now she was in a fucking hospital, with thirteen fucking stab wounds.

Thirteen. Thirteen! He was going to kill Angela when he found her, rip out her innards, dance in the rain of her blood-spurting cries, and spit on her face when she fell to her knees, dying. He was going to stomp on her skull and smile as it cracked under his heel. No, those deaths were far too quick. He was going to tie her to a chair, summon an army of rats, and invite them to slowly eat her. Nibble, nibble, slowly bite away her flesh. First the fingers. Then the toes. He'd tie belts around her limbs to prevent her from bleeding to death. He'd find drugs to inject into her to make sure she didn't pass out. He'd—Julias put a hand on his shoulder, and Jack snapped his head up, as if someone had popped a balloon next to his ear. He looked down at the bed railing in his grip, and removed his hands. The metal was bent to fit the shape of his fingers.

Sighing, he came around the bed again, and leaned in over his mom once more. So pale. He forced down the rising terror in his throat, and kissed her on the forehead.

“Let's ... go see my sister.”

---

It was easier to be in a room full of dead people, than seeing his mom hooked up to tubes and wires. There were a few metal tables around on wheels, of the proper length and width to hold a body, but they were moved out of the way. All the small doors on the walls were closed. The LEDs above were plain white, and the computer was off. A cold, quiet, dead room.

Clara sniffed a few times, and walked over to one door. “You sure ... you don't want to call the Prince?”

He looked down and away, and clenched his fists at his sides. Antoinette. God, if he saw her, he'd break down. He'd shatter into a million pieces. He'd grab onto her and cry and scream and whisper 'Mom' and 'Mary' into her suit as she held him. She was the only person in the fucking universe he had ever truly let into his mind, into the emotional part of him, and if there was anyone who could demolish the walls he was putting up in his mind, it'd be her.

He couldn't handle that, not yet. He wasn't numb anymore, and that was good enough.

"Maybe tomorrow night. But for now, she probably doesn't know about this, and I'd like to keep it that way. I'll ... I'll tell her, when I go to her tower tonight before sunrise." If he told her just before sunrise, maybe he'd be able to keep that conversation short.

Why was he avoiding it? Why didn't he want her to know? Fucking coward. He knew, he fucking knew, if Antoinette looked at him with eyes of pity, of sadness and empathy, he'd crumble. Others would call that mourning, and dealing with your emotions. And they'd be right. But for now, it wasn't something he could handle, and he didn't think it'd be a good thing to take on when they had bigger fish to fry.

That wasn't everything. A small part of him was terrified he might hate her, for looking at him with pity. He wasn't in a rush to find out.

They were losing night hours, and with hunters ruining their lives, his life, he didn't have hours to lose. He needed to get back out there, join the sweeper teams, work on resolving any arising issues with the Uratha and Kindred teams, go talk to Azamel and see where she wanted to put her three, and above all else, find Jeremiah. They'd already taken time to recuperate after the last run in with him, and now it was time to find the hunters so they could strike first. Every moment he was in this hospital, was a moment wasted on a personal indulgence.

His dead sister and dying mother were a personal indulgence. Christ, that did sound like something Viktor would say.

Stop. Thinking. About. Viktor.

He stepped up to Clara, and grit his teeth as he read the name on the small metal door. Mary Terry. A small grin forced its way onto his lips, despite his best efforts to keep it suppressed. It was a funny name, Mary Terry, and when he was young, he remembered the other kids used to tease her about it. Course, Mary was an outgoing person, fun, high spirited, and she just laughed it off. She was more like their mother, happy and laughing, never letting other people bring her down.

Then Dad died. Jack had pushed her away, and she got into the nasty sort of shit social people did when they were depressed. It was a miracle she came back at all.

Then Jack died. Only the women in the Terry family were left, and Jack got to watch through a fucking window, the fall and rise of his sister and mother from the pits of what must have been suicidal depression. They kept each other going, supported each other, and from what he could see through glass, became closer than ever.

Then Mary died. If his mom lived, there was no hope for her. She'd kill herself. He didn't want to think that way, and he couldn't be sure it was true, but the human mind could only take that level of pain so many times. To ask a parent to accept the disappearance of one child, and then to accept the death of another, their only remaining offspring, not even two years later? Parents were not meant to bury their children.

He pulled open the door, and slid out the metal bed. A white sheet covered a body. The final frontier was nothing more than a thin white sheet, cold from being inside a fridge.

“Jack,” Clara said, “you don’t have to.”

Julias shook his head, dismissing her words. “Yes, he does.”

Yes, he did. He pulled the blanket down from her head, and exposed her face.

He was looking at a vampire. An unmoving vampire. If she turned her head to look at him, he would not have been surprised. Pale skin, thin, highlighting the structure of her bones. But it was still her, just a vampire version of her. Dead, like him. Whenever he didn’t Blush Life, this was what he looked like; especially when sleeping during the day. A still, unmoving corpse. Not breathing, deathly pale and sunken cheeks, eyes closed with no movement under her eyelids. It was a face any vampire saw when they looked in the mirror.

He reached out, and touched her forehead. Nothing. No movement, no reaction, nothing. A lifeless, unmoving bag of bones.

He could almost hear the sound of her voice.

“How many times was she stabbed?” he asked.

“Doctor said seven times.” Julias kept his voice cold, curt, to the point, and spared him no sympathy. The man knew him too well.

Jack managed a small chuckle, and slid his knuckles along Mary’s cheek. “And yet Mom’s the one that survived.”

“I ... is that a bad thing?” Clara said.

“Yes,” Julias said, “it is.”

Jack looked over his shoulder at his sire. He knew Julias hadn’t felt this sort of pain, but the man was a century old, and had no doubt seen it before. Live long enough and you could probably map out the human mind.

Maybe that's why he was so terrified of talking to Antoinette about this? His pain was nothing new to her. She'd have advice, things to offer him, and she'd do everything to try and soothe his wounds. He didn't want that right now. Like a fucking moron, he wanted the pain; better than going completely numb. And he almost had, before Clara snapped him out of it.

He looked at the werewolf for a moment, just enough time to get a snapshot of her face. She adapted quickly. No more pitiful gazes from her. She figured out what he wanted fast, and for the life of him, he couldn't see Antoinette giving him that hard edge. The Prince could be brutal, but with him, about personal things, heavy things? He doubted it.

Stop thinking about it. You can tell her later; or she'll find out herself. No doubt she would. Hell, she might know right now, and was letting you come to her. Maybe she did actually understand he needed a little space right now, and he was being a fucking idiot. He'd find out tonight.

He leaned in, kissed his sister on the forehead, and pulled the blanket up over her head. "Let's go."

"Go?" Clara said.

"Yeah, go. We have a job to do."

"Jack, you can't be serious. You just had a huge loss, and—"

He looked over his shoulder and frowned at her. For a moment, she might have been pitying him with her eyes, but if she had been, it was gone by the time he looked at her. Instead, when she met his eyes, she pulled her head back a bit, and blinked at him, several times, surprised.

He was giving her a death stare.

Sighing, he shook his head for a moment to dislodge the expression. “Sorry, I ... We can’t put the sweeps on hold because of this. If anything, this means we shouldn’t have taken as long as we did to recover from the previous encounter.”

“Assuming the hunters are to blame,” she said.

“Thirteen and seven stab wounds. That’s something Angela would do. Were their belongings taken, Julias?”

“No.”

“Then my mom and sister were hunted down, and assassinated. Angela and Jeremiah are to blame.” With a snarl, he swung the door of the morgue open, and started marching. “I’m going to hook back up with Isabella and Gloria, and go see Azamel.”

“I’m on your sweeper team,” Clara said, “so I might as well join you.”

“Oh. That why you came here with me?”

“Nope.”

“Oh.” He tried to smile at her. It didn’t happen. Best he could manage was to not give her that death stare he was trying to stop doing. She came to provide him support, be there for him, and he let her in. The least he could fucking do was stop looking at her like she was Angela.

“Give me a short report before the night is done, “ Julias said as he joined them. “I’ll see what footage I can find around this incident. Got a team of thralls pouring through available options.”

“Thanks.” He nodded at his sire, and continued along as Julias stayed behind. The man pulled out his phone and started a phone call, and from how it started, Jack figured he was calling the council to report.

They met eyes for a moment, and Julias gave him a solid, stern nod. Jack returned it. No one else would have understood. No one else would have known exactly what Jack wanted, and needed, immediately.

---

He was surround by women.

He looked beside him, at Isabella and Gloria. Isabella was a powerful Daeva, and had learned to Obfuscate, to use the Cloak of Night to a passable degree, despite it being outside a Daeva’s natural talent pool. She was a deadly creature, committed, and focused. Gloria was a quiet, shy ditz, short black hair and an average height and build. She blended perfectly into a crowd; just like a Mekhet wanted. And it was her they were relying on for their sneaky endeavors.

Clara walked ahead of them, each step purposeful and calculated. He might as well have been watching the Discovery channel. Maybe David Attenborough would chime in? ‘Notice, how the deadly female handles her movements with a more specific grace, than her male counterpart. The werewolf breathes deep the air, using her unparalleled sense of smell, to hunt for prey. She is a patient hunter, and practiced. The rest of the pack follow her lead, and by observing the wise alpha female, they will learn what approaches to utilize, and what mistakes, to avoid.’

Not even Attenborough could lighten his mood. Sighing, he looked behind him. Athalia. He was hoping Azamel wouldn’t do this, wouldn’t put any of her troupe with him, but the fucking old woman was too damn smart. Athalia wasn’t going to let him do what he wanted if he ... when he got his hands on Angela.

She looked uncomfortable. Good. Your daughter is the reason my sister is dead and my mom is in a fucking coma.

That wasn't fair, and he knew it. Athalia had tried to defeat Angela, tried to help him and his team when they were rescuing Jessy, and had nearly succeeded. She'd done everything he could have expected of her, and more. The fact she'd begged him to spare Angela at the last moment was hardly something he could blame her for.

But it was still her daughter, and no matter how logical he was, no matter how much he could set aside his emotions, he had just come back from looking his dead sister and dying mother in the face, kissing them goodbye, and went out on a hunting mission. He couldn't help but hate Athalia. And that made him a hypocrite. Flip the switch? Like he'd told others to do? Easier said than done.

At least he wasn't numb anymore. Now, he was boiling. Instead of cold metal walls between him and the people around him, there was fire, lava, and boiling blood scalding his withered veins.

He probably seemed like a colossal asshole right now. If that meant people would leave him alone, or at least be direct with him and not treat him like he was made of porcelain, all the better.

"Where we going?" Gloria said.

Clara nodded forward, into the shadows of the tunnels they walked. "This network of tunnels is stupid complex. Apparently, there are tunnels that no one uses anymore?"

"Correct," Isabella said. "The kine use none, but beyond that, there are tunnels so old they have been abandoned by everyone. The elders thought it would be important for future safety. If there are tunnels that fall out of favor, there are more tunnels that can be used when someone needs to hide."

Jack nodded. “If anyone knows these tunnels, it’s Damien.”

The werewolf agreed, nodding as she rounded one of the curving tunnels. “Text from Avery said she put Matt on his team. He’s got muscle if he finds shit and can’t get out.”

“And Fiona is with them.” Shrugging, Athalia pulled ahead, and started walking beside Clara. Didn’t want to be in the back alone, not with Jack right in front of her, probably. Too uncomfortable. He agreed.

“We need two teams down here then?” he said.

The werewolf nodded again, and glanced back before continuing on. “Too many tunnels for us to cover. Your elders went overboard I think, cause there’s enough underground network in this fucking city to house an entire city’s worth of people.”

“That was their goal, probably. Antoinette thinks far ahead, very far ahead, more than most elders. I wouldn’t put it past her to have a back up plan for if everyone, humans included, needed to go underground to hide from an apocalypse on the surface.” Considering her age, and considering it hadn’t been so long since the Cold War, she’d no doubt felt justified in that preparation. He would have, too.

Sniffing the air deep, Clara sighed and shook her head. “I don’t smell anything but a few vamps, and us.”

“Nosferatu hide in these tunnels,” Isabella said. “Liliana and Robert”—Bob to everyone else but the icy Daeva—“may sleep nearby.”

Jack pulled out his phone and checked the city blueprint. With a few taps, he had the layout of the tunnels highlighted. So many old tunnels, and while the subways were all abandoned, there were tunnels below those that had never been used by the public. Those tunnels connected to the old subway, the newer-but-still-abandoned subway, and the sewers.

To any creature that loved the dark and didn't need to eat or drink, like a vampire, such a place was a haven. Any vampire not engaging in combat or using their disciplines regularly didn't need to feed often. If they were, or using the Blush of Life frequently, regular feeding was required, but still not nearly as often as a kine needed water. Deep, complex tunnel networks were perfect for vampires, and other monsters. They weren't perfect for humans, far from it. But these hunters had a monster with them, and that changed the game.

There was a very real chance they'd run into the hunters down here, and he was looking forward to it.

"We need to address the elephant in the room," Isabella said. Oh fuck, not now. "The attack against Jack's kine family was likely done by Angela and Jeremiah, based on all reports I've read about their psychological profiles. The hunters in their employ, I can't imagine are that bloodthirsty as to kill innocent kine. Those two psychopaths likely acted on their own, but to what end?"

"Trying to draw me out, I imagine," Jack said. It was easier to think of it like that, to address the situation as if it was a puzzle to solve, like it was a scene on a predictable crime show, than to think this was happening to him. Maybe that was Isabella's goal? If it was, she was a nicer woman than he figured. She did have a bunch of acting students under her wing, so maybe it wasn't so radical an idea, if she was capable of keeping so many people cooperative.

"Then I would have to assume this was an act on Angela's part, and not Jeremiah's," she said.

Athalia coughed, and everyone looked her way. "If you're going to assume Angela's the vengeful one of those two, think again.

Jeremiah's gone to hell and back because he has a grudge against Azamel specifically."

"It's an Ahab situation," Jack said, "far as I can gather. Azamel is Jeremiah's Moby Dick. Unless you know more, Athalia." Keep the venom out of your voice, Jack. Athalia's not to blame. She's not to blame. Repeat it until it fucking sinks in.

"It's close enough. Azamel has a long and varied history, and the destruction she has left in her wake has scarred more than a few souls."

"Explain to me," Clara said, growling as she turned around, bringing the group to a halt, "why we're helping her, then?"

Jack put up a hand. "In the story, Ahab was the psychopath that got his crew killed, with his obsession in killing a whale that bit off his leg. He wasn't a valiant hero or anything, just a powerful madman devoured by rage." He did not like how real that statement was. But, it did give him an idea. "I have to wonder if these hunters are actually with Jeremiah and Angela on this hunt, committed, devoted. In Moby Dick, Ishmael saw the man's descent into madness. It was something he was aware of, could see, and so could members of his crew."

Gloria tilted her head. "You ... you think you can talk reason to the crew."

"Maybe. Unlikely. Like in the story, they all died except for Ishmael. His crew followed him into the maw of death, despite plenty of forewarning about their doom. It's tough to break free of the shackles of a powerful, vocal figure, especially when they're a passionate one."

Everyone let out a small sigh. Yeah, they all knew that was true. Much as everyone liked to think of themselves as valiant, truth was more people followed the words of another as pure instinct.

Jack scrolled through his messages again. Instructions on where to explore, what areas needed an Uratha's nose, what areas could do with surveillance footage checks, and what areas were likely to need a Kindred's eye for separating city kine from hunters. But the last message, he didn't like the sound of.

The council wanted them to capture Elen alive, and not tell the Uratha or Begotten about it. Like Jack's efforts to keep people getting along wasn't hard enough as was.

Chapter 80

~~Antoinette~~

Oh no.

She sat upon the highest floor of her tower, a tower she had built upon what she designated would be Elysium territory, where Kindred-on-Kindred violence was prohibited, where feeding was prohibited, and where discussion was encouraged. To place her tower within its embrace was a choice she had made, a political stance signifying her devotion to peace and cooperation. And within the highest floor, her main office was her place of control, and where she could personify coolheaded wisdom.

She was boiling. Despite being a creature of death, with no heartbeat of her own, heat filled her body, scalding, raging. She pushed away her laptop along the desk, stood from her grand chair, and walked to the enormous window to stare out over the thousands of lights of her city.

How dare they.

She snarled as she folded her arms across her chest, and stared out the window. How dare they. She would kill them, absolutely, utterly demolish, rend them asunder, and drown her tower in their blood.

She reached behind her and dialed in to the comm system. “Miss Vola, come to my main office immediately.”

Natasha’s tiny voice chipped in over the small speaker. “Um, y-yes Prince. Is there—”

“Now.”

“Yes m-ma’am!”

Sighing, Antoinette turned around and looked out the window once more. It was her city, her labyrinth of tunnels, buildings, alleys, sewers, brothels, casinos, bars, hungry corporations and sprawling districts of factories and neighborhoods. A perfect place for Kindred to herd and control the kine. A perfect place for hunters to hide and reek havoc on her and her kin.

How had she not seen this coming? Poor Jack. To lose his first life’s family, at this age? The gal of these hunters, to murder innocent humans for the sake of their vengeance. It was unheard of. For all the flaws of hunters, for all their murderous intents and all-consuming obsessions, they did not kill innocent humans. To kill a vampire’s previous family, to either draw a vampire out, or to inflict pain upon him, was absurd.

It would not have been hard for the hunters to learn of Jack’s first family. They knew the boy was a young vampire, and they knew his name. To search the city’s obituaries and missing persons reports would have been easy for many hunters, and from there follow the trail back to the Kindred’s first family. But, there was almost never a reason to be concerned over them. Only juvenile Kindred, fledglings with grudges, bothered to harm other Kindred through their first families, and such mindless acts of cruelty were rare. All Kindred knew that first families were things they all had to lose at some point, and to assault a fellow vampire through that tie was only going to free them of that burden sooner. Free them, and turn them into bitter enemies.

But these hunters did not think this way. They did not think in terms of centuries, only in weeks or months. They did this to hurt Jack, and perhaps draw him out, perhaps force him to make a mistake and get himself killed. How that could help them with their goal of killing Azamel, she did not know. Perhaps Angela was simply pursuing payback.

Jack. She sighed as she hugged herself, one hand combing a wave of her hair that cut over her shoulder to her chest. The boy likely knew by now, and had not contacted her. She knew why. The boy had told her of his father's death, and of how much it had hurt him, how badly he had pulled into himself. No doubt he was afraid of doing such a thing to her. Or, perhaps, he was afraid of her, that she would shatter the now fragile state of his mind. She could not deny, that if Jack entered the room at this very moment, she would be overwhelmed with the need to hold him, cradle him, hug him and tend to his wounds.

If the boy, likely holding onto the strength of himself to keep from crumbling, stood before her now, and she could not help but lament for him, he would either retreat into himself, become cold and numb as he did with his father, or he would fall to pieces in emotional turmoil. The latter was necessary at some point, in order for the mind to move on, to mourn, and Jack was intelligent enough to know that. But was he wise enough to internalize that and understand it? Kindred were not kine, and had to come to terms with the end of their first life, and its remains, in unique ways. She had seen it in others; all Kindred her age had. Such was the way of immortal beings.

To make matters worse, the age difference between her and her love was vast, and Kindred did not age as kine did. For all her knowledge, she would forever have the mind of a thirty-year-old woman, and to hold the wisdom of ages in such context could make any conversation about matters strangely painful, and a touch awkward. What could she say to him that would not feel like pandering, or placating? Hollow. Words would fail her.

Perhaps it was best she let the boy come to her, when he was ready. And when he did, she would have to say nothing emotional, and be very careful with how to look at him. Every fiber of her being wanted to scoop him up, hold him in her arms, and embrace him tight enough to wash away his pain. And there would be a time for that, but not until the boy ... the man, had, on his own, accepted and internalized the reality of his situation. There was no way to help him with that, except to give him space.

And that drove her to rage. Being powerless, was infuriating. It was not a feeling she felt often.

The door opened. She looked over her shoulder, and offered her little student a smile. "Vola, please, come, stand with me."

"Y-Yes Prince. You s-s-sounded ... upset, on the phone." Vola trembled a few times as she came closer. Perhaps Antoinette had been harsher with her voice than she realized.

"I am, though not with you, Natasha. Fret not. Have you seen the news?"

"N-No, I haven't. I've b-been reading mythology, ancient m-monsters, seeing if there was any hint about ... about m-m-monsters like Azamel, or the others." She nodded to herself as she looked down and held her chin in her fingers, digging through her mind. "I d-d-don't watch the news much these days, honestly. When I was in the Invictus, I m-monitored our internal network that our thralls curated."

Antoinette had a similar network, though she had long given instructions to her thralls to curate only the most important information; her decisions were made on a larger scale than the Invictus. But her thralls knew who Jack Terry was, who his first family was, and had sent her the information. Would the Invictus? There was always the possibility the boy did not know what had happened, and perhaps she should—

No. Let him come to you, Antoinette. He is not a boy, he is a man, and a vampire. It is important that he overcome the first stages of his grief on his own. Kindred were solitary creatures by nature, and she knew, if she violated those instincts, she might drive her love into himself.

She could ask Julias, if Jack knew about his mother. It was tempting, but as much as she wanted to pry, poke, learn and discover more about the situation, it was better to let the boy and his sire handle it on their own. In the relationship between Jack, Julias, and the boy's first family, she was the outsider.

As Natasha stood beside her, as Daniel often did, Antoinette sighed, and nodded out toward the city. "Do any of your first family still live, Natasha?"

"Um, I have an uncle, v-very old now. Lives in Canad-d-da. I have some cousins, and their children, and ... b-but I haven't talked to any of them. I d-d-didn't talk to them even b-before I was embraced."

Nodding, Antoinette refolded her arms, combed her hair, and forced down the urge to run out into the city to find her lover. "When Kindred come to me, and ask if they can be allowed to bring members of their first family into their second life, I acquiesce, but not without warning. Fledglings, and young neonates, are often at the mercy of their attachments."

"I ... I'm n-not sure what this is about, Prince."

"These hunters are far more brutal than any group of hunters I have met before, to the point they are willing to kill innocents to achieve their goals. And despite their goal of killing Azamel, a Begotten, they are well versed in dealing with Kindred. They know our weaknesses, especially those of our young neonates."

"Um, I—oh! Oh no, no n-no, they didn't ... kill Jack's..."

Her student was intelligent, very much so; Daniel had chosen well. With a sigh, Antoinette looked down at the tiny woman beside her, before looking back out to the city.

“His sister, Mary, is dead. His mother sleeps in South Center Hospital, in critical condition. She may survive. She may not.”

“Oh god, J-J-Jack. Have—”

“I do not know if Jack knows, though if he does not, I imagine he will before the night is over. We have yet to speak.”

“You haven’t t-told him? You ... oh. B-Because, he ... he’s...”

She nodded, but did not explain. Her little assistant was smart enough to piece together the puzzle on her own. Jack needed to deal with this on his own first, before coming to her. It would only be hours, after all, enough time for her love to wrap his mind and feelings around what had occurred, at least a precursor attempt, before he returned to her tower to sleep for the day. And when he did, the challenge would be on her to discover how to handle him.

It was a strange way for the tables to turn. Jack had spent most of his interactions with her trying to figure her out, to know how to react and act around her, no doubt. Now, she was the lost one, unsure of how to act and react around her little Ventrue. It was a not a feeling she enjoyed, after being in control of everyone close to her for so long.

But Jack’s family was not the only reason she had summoned her student.

“Natasha, I have a mission for you.”

“Oh?”

“You are to go to Jacob, and join his sweeper team.”

“Um ... w-what?”

What indeed. She wanted to send Natasha to find Jack, to make sure the boy was ok. But that was not what her city needed at the moment, painful as it was to admit.

Antoinette forced a smile, and looked down at her student. “In this Dance Macabre, we must forever do two things with one action. Give with the right hand, take with the left. You are to present this gift to Jacob, and he will be forced to accept. If he denies me, he knows I will be suspicious of his actions; and I am, we all are. But if he outright refuses to have you accompany his team, then he exposes that such suspicion is warranted. And he knows that. He will have to make a choice about what message he wishes to send, by either accepting you or denying you.”

“B-But, what if he accepts?”

“Then we know that his team did not intend to perform matters he wished to keep secret. And upon that, since I am sure neither Uratha or Begotten will be joining Jacob’s team, you will be a valuable asset. And, upon that again, I would like to know what the witches are up to. No doubt the old Nosferatu is interested in this shaman woman working for the hunters, so do not be surprised if he seeks to learn more about her, or capture her.” She could not deny that she, too, would like to get her hands on this woman. The things she could learn from her, digging into her mind, dissecting her thoughts — or actual brain — would no doubt lead to secrets Antoinette had long sought after.

“That is a lot-t-t of ... of information to learn, from o-one maneuver.”

“Indeed.”

“And, um, I c-could just ask Beatrice.”

Antoinette shook her head before looking back out to the city. “As much as she may be your acquaintance, and perhaps friend, she is a loyal sort. She will trust Jacob, even as ... even as I hope she can touch the man's soul, before he crumbles under the weight of his own thoughts."

"Thoughts?"

"A personal request I made of her, to help Jacob escape the pit of misery forced on him by Avery." Not that Antoinette could deny Minerva was flirting with lines she had been warned to avoid. "I believe it is working. But, I hope you can discover more. And ... I hope you can find the hunters."

"Yes, I'll d-do my best." Nodding, she turned to look out at the city too. If she was trying to be as still as Antoinette, she was failing horribly, squirming in her own skin. Normally the Prince would find it adorable, but at the moment, she did not.

"What would you do, Miss Vola?"

She squeaked, and looked up at the Prince again. Antoinette did not break her gaze from the city, and after a while, the tiny Mekhet looked out the window again.

"About Jack? I ... I d-d-don't know."

"I will ... discover eventually, what to do about my love's pain. But, it is not him specifically I speak of."

"Not Jack? Then I'm not sure. Um, there's ... there's ... oh. Samantha T-Terry."

"Oui. My network is now monitoring her closely. I do not know if Jack knows she's in there, or if he has already been to see her, but..." With a wince, Antoinette turned around, and walked over to her desk. A click later, the camera feed menu for the hospital room for the critical condition ward appeared, and she selected Samantha's room.

And there she was. A tattered, broken, dying woman, with tubes coming out of her, wires attached to her, needle in her arm, and large machines beside her. The feed did not have audio, but that was probably for the best. The sound of a machine keeping her alive and warning of her vitals was not a sound Antoinette wished to hear.

“Oh no! Oh, oh that’s horrible!” Natasha raised a hand to her mouth as she stared, wide-eyed at the sight. “P-Poor Jack.”

“She was stabbed, many times, as was her daughter.”

“Stabbed? It m-m-must have been Angela. She ... she’s a ... psychopath.”

Nodding, Antoinette sat down at her desk, but did not turn off the camera feed. She stared at the screen, sighing, and combing her hair over her shoulder; it did not help. No matter how she tossed the thoughts in her mind, rearranged and molded them, she could not help but stare at this image in front of her.

“I have no memory of my family,” Antoinette said. “I am ... without personal context, for this attachment.” With an open palm toward the screen, she leaned back in her chair, and began to slowly rock. “I understand loss, and the emotional damage it causes. But there is a unique element to family, to a connection etched into the very foundation of the mind, that I can no longer appreciate.” The curse of a vampire’s immortality.

Natasha sniffed, and shivered a little as she came in closer, standing beside Antoinette and staring at the screen. “My mom and dad, I ... I can ... can still remember what it felt like, t-to be safe in their ... their arms.”

The Prince smiled at the small woman beside her. No wonder her necklace of old had summoned a spirit of safety. It was an emotion instilled deep into her being, something in her core memory, perhaps to never be lost. Alas, unlikely. With centuries, all memories faded, and the connections Kindred had to what made them human faded with them. To hold onto their humanity was the eternal struggle.

For a young Kindred to lose so many of those ties so quickly was not a good thing. It could send the boy spiraling into a pit of misery, resentment, and then hatred.

Hatred. She had still not talked to him about this supposed hatred Natasha told her of, the anger and fury her little Ventrue was supposedly capable of. If she spoke true, and her love had wells of rage within him, this event could very well push him into that spiral.

Her little Ventrue was very talented for his age. He would grow to become a greater Ventrue than Viktor or Julias, and she would be happy to have him at her side for decades, centuries, or longer. It would almost be a classic scenario of a man and woman from different kingdoms, getting married to create peace. She doubted Jack would ever join the Ordo Dracul, and she knew she would never join the Invictus, but that did not mean they could not work side by side for eternity. And love each other, for eternity.

It was an image of her future she held dear to her heart, and the thought that it might be torn asunder, poisoned, or tainted by horrible, cruel realities befalling her love infuriated her. The idea that Jack might become as twisted, hateful, and paranoid a man as Viktor was a terrifying one. How quickly such a thought left the realm of absurdity, and into to the realm of possibility. Natasha's warning about his rage, and now this?

She had to fix this.

“D ... Do you think ... w-we could make her a ghoul?” Natasha said. Naturally, her student was thinking the same thoughts.

“I do not know if she would survive it. She is a step away from death, with wounds extreme enough to kill a ghoul. There’s potential brain damage, as well, which could have dire consequences if she survives the transformation. And above all, how would Jack feel about his mother now being addicted to vitae, and also under the spell of the Vinculum?” Shaking her head, she reached out, and zoomed the picture in. South Center Hospital embraced technology; the luxury of money. The picture was crystal clear, and showed the paleness of Jack’s mother, and her limp, comatose body. “You know I encourage Kindred in my city to only create ghouls of kine they have both groomed, but also explained the dire consequences of being brought into the fold.” As it was encouraged with creating Kindred, of course. Antoinette’s sympathy for ghouls was well known, to the point it had led to many altercations between her and Lucas.

To become addicted to a vampire’s blood, and to become enslaved to the Vinculum and how it forced the ghoul to become obsessed with the master, were not aspects to dismiss or treat lightly. She had explained to Ashley and Julee, to the best of her ability without risking the Masquerade, what she had been asking of them. They had agreed. No one could ask a woman in a coma such questions.

“B-But ... she ... she could ... become Kindred.”

“... yes, she could.” Sighing all the more, Antoinette continued to comb her hair, seeking the soothing blanket of familiar comfort. None came. “Jack is not old enough to sire. The drain on his mind would be too great.” Not necessarily true, but a risk nonetheless.

“Then ... I ... I d-don’t...”

Her inability to explain the problem was more than enough barrier to give weight to the reality of it. To sire someone was a massive commitment, never to be taken lightly, and always with a sacrifice. It was a sacrifice Antoinette knew well, and one Natasha was still struggling to come to terms with. Her relationship with her childe was broken, and try as she might fix it, it was unlikely to ever mend.

Better that, than a growing bitterness and resentment that eventually led to a childe like Tony. Then again, perhaps Natasha would be able to repair her damaged relationship with her childe? Rare as it was, it would not be the first time Antoinette had seen a miracle.

“If my love requested it, I would ... be terribly tempted, to sire her.”

“Without ... b-being able to talk to her first?”

“Yes. It would be horribly selfish of me, and my love, to force such an existence on someone who did not ask it. But it is not always such a terrible thing, is it? Julias had the choice to let Jack die, but instead, he forced the embrace upon him. It was for the best, was it not?”

“I ... think so.”

Antoinette frowned at the screen, and squeezed on the ends of her hair. The fact Natasha’s answer was not a resounding ‘yes it was’ pained the Prince. For all Antoinette’s efforts to create a utopia for her kind, for all her faith in her ability to create a world where Kindred could not only live happily, but also pursue new avenues of wisdom and enlightenment available only to immortals, a Kindred’s life was still pain. Her covenant hunted the secrets of that immortality with lifelong devotion, searched for ways to alleviate the damage of torpor, the pain of blood lust, the horribleness of vitae addiction, the chains of the Vinculum, and even for ways to break a Kindred from the corruption of Diablerie. But, in hundreds of years, for all their progress, a Kindred’s second life was still pain. For all her progress in pursuit of peaceful coexistence, hunters were still at her door, killing them.

“Ultimately, she is Jack’s mother. Her fate is in his hands. If he wishes to bring her into a second life, then I will discuss it with him. In the mean time, go, speak with Jacob and his witches, and see if you can prevent their inevitable meddling from ruining our goals. If lucky, you may even find and detain or kill some hunters.”

“Yes, P-Prince.” Natasha took a few more seconds staring at Jack’s half dead mother, before she let out a tiny whimper, and walked toward the door. Stopping halfway, she looked over her shoulder, a small, weighty frown on her gentle face. “I ... I think ... it’d b-b-be better to ... to embrace her, than let her die. At least then, she ... she’d be able t-to choose if she wanted to live or ... die.”

Oh Vola, naive child. What mother would not consider suicide in her situation, even if given immortality? And, what would happen to Jack, if his mother was given a second chance at life, and threw it away?

It was not a decision so easily rationalized.

~~Beatrice~~

“We want to capture her alive?”

Jacob nodded as he walked around the cave, hands behind his back. The eye bandage covered his empty eye sockets, but Triss had gotten pretty good at figuring out where he was looking. Looking at the floor while he paced around, she guessed, like he was being pensive. A pensive Jacob was a strange Jacob.

“We do,” he said.

Triss looked to her fellow Kindred, but the rest of them were all looking at him with confusion, too. Jen and Othello shrugged, and watched their boss pace around. Aaron wasn’t around, but he’d be back soon with a report, probably to also become confused by the strange request.

“Sounds dangerous as fuck,” Triss said. “We’re talking about this old shaman woman who’s supposedly sacrificing kine, and using some strange magic to hunt people down? The one who gave you the boot out of that Begotten’s nightmare thing?”

“Yeap. Old woman. I didn’t get a good look at her when I was there; she was off in the shadows somewhere, and I only got a peek at her, before she tore the world apart.” Jacob jumped a few times in place, laughing, before he spun around once, and grabbed the sacrifice bowl that stood in the center of their headquarters. “What a rush.”

Triss rolled her eyes, and waited. Jacob did love to have his spurts of silly randomness, and she’d learned to just wait them out. A child. Her boss was a fucking child. A super powerful, intelligent child. Wasn’t there a horror movie about that sort of thing?

“Catching her alive will be difficult,” Jen said. Damn girl was too young to be going on these sweeps, but she’d insisted, and Jacob was a ‘let them learn the hard way’ sort of teacher. “Cause, you know, she has a bunch of hunters defending her, not to mention Jeremiah and Angela, and a monster.”

It was sort of a shame that no one in the Circle had been a part of that mission. Jacob had been there for a whole twenty seconds, according to his story, and that meant a thousand details about the whole situation had been lost.

“The Invictus may help us with that,” Jacob said.

Othello tilted his head to the side. “Oh, was that your request of Julias?”

“Mhmm. Unfortunately, there are many circumstances where that may fall out of his hands. Old woman with a breathing aid, in a wheel chair? If they even look at her wrong, she might implode. If she gets caught in a crossfire, she’s dead.” Groaning, Jacob walked away again, and stared up at the bones arranged into painting-like sculptures on the cave wall. “Think I wasted my favor?”

Triss shrugged, waiting by the bowl. “I’m just glad you didn’t ask him to sacrifice his balls to a ritual or something ... That ... isn’t a thing, is it?”

“You shitting me? There are sacrifice rituals meant to give guys bigger dicks and more sexual endurance in every culture.”

Jen snorted on a laugh, before raising a hand to her mouth in embarrassment. Not very lady like. “Even in the Circle?”

“Honestly? I don’t know. Probably.” Chuckling, Jacob came back to the bowl, and ran his fingers around the stained edges. “That woman has power, a familiar power. There’s something there, something in her ability, something that makes her special. She has knowledge, and I want it.”

“She’s a hunter, Jacob,” Triss said. “She’s trying to kill us, and the monsters and werewolves. And, considering what everyone keeps saying about her, she’s deadly.”

“Mhmm.”

“You think we can catch her?”

“She’s a fossil. If she tries to flee, just grab her wheelchair. If she refuses to cooperate, just grab her breathing tube and squeeze it. A little asphyxiation is great motivation.”

Everyone blinked at him

“Torture an old person?” Othello said.

“Torture is such a strong word. More like, push her around a little. Literally. She’s in a wheelchair. Push her here.”

Triss groaned. If this continued, Jacob was going to start making puns. She wouldn’t be able to handle that without bursting into laughter.

Jen raised a hand. “What about Garry? He’s looking for the hunters, too.”

“Garry owes me more favors than Julias. He’ll try and get me the shaman woman more than the Invictus will.”

What sort of favors had Jacob done for Garry to earn so much from him? Beatrice worked for that Gangrel for almost thirty years, and she was completely unaware of this connection until that incident with Tony. Sneaky fuckers.

They all turned around at the sound of another entering. Aaron. The pale man came up to the bowl, but his eyes were down, and he held his chin in his fingers, lost in thought. A normal pose for Aaron, except for the frown.

“Sup?” Triss said. “You look down. More down than usual, I mean.”

“Any of you check the news?”

She shook her head. “Nah, Jen and I came back not long after sunset.” And it’d only been an hour since then.

Sighing, Aaron stepped aside, and held out his arm to someone coming up behind him. Everyone came around the bowl to watch, arms folding across their chests. They didn’t plan for visitors, so this was a bit weird.

A tiny girl in a suit came in, very tiny. But Triss recognized the aura, and the way her beast stood up to acknowledge the familiar power and hidden smell of the small girl.

“Natasha,” Triss said, smiling and walking up to her. “Why are you here?”

“Hey Triss. I’m here t-t-to ... for two reasons. The first, um, is the Prince would like me to join your t-team.”

Wait, what? Triss raised a brow before looking back at the rest of her crew. Othello and Jen both seemed confused, too, but Jacob adopted a smile. It was his ‘I see what you’re up to’ smile, his Dance Macabre smile, which meant Natasha being here to help them wasn’t just the straightforward gesture.

The Prince didn’t trust them. Understandable, especially considering the conclusion they’d just come to.

“I accept,” Jacob said, grinning. “Be aware that I am trying to capture the shaman woman alive. If you’re going to join my group of witches here, I expect you to help in that regard, or at least, not get in their way.”

Whoa. All his cards out on the table. Either he was one of those poker players that liked to bluff with the truth, or it wasn’t all his cards.

Both. Probably both.

“Y-Yes, well, the Prince expected that.” The little Mekhet walked forward, and looked around as she did. So damn cute, teeny tiny Tash with her teeny tiny frown. There was no denying the girl was terribly strong, in her own weird, sneaky Mekhet way, and that she was so tiny made her so cute and awesome.

Heh, it wasn't too long ago Natasha was in the Invictus, and Triss's enemy, a Carthian. How the times had changed.

"Five vamps should be able to handle anything these hunters throw at us," Triss said.

Tash shook her head, and walked closer, eyes scanning the room with blatant curiosity in her gaze. Bones on the walls could do that to a person, not to mention skulls with candles on them, being kept by thralls. "D-Don't underestimate them. They're ... they c-could kill us all, if they catch us off guard."

"Then it's a good thing we have a very tough Mekhet with us." She stepped forward and offered her hand. Tash looked at her, head hanging heavy, before she took her hand gave it a slow shake. "What's with you? You and Aaron, both look like someone died ... Oh fuck, who died?"

Sighing, Tash shook her head before she slipped her hands into her pockets, eyes down. "Jack's sister was stabbed t-to death. His mom ... is in the hospital, almost d-d ... dead."

"Fuck!" Beatrice backed off, throwing up her hands, as if putting distance between her and the messenger might help take the edge off that bomb. It did not. "You fucking serious?"

"Y-Yes."

Of course she was. Tash didn't have the capacity to joke or be sarcastic about serious things, especially dark humor.

Triss managed only a cursory glance at the rest of the Circle, before she started stomping around. They were all shocked; hard to tell with Jacob, but he wasn't moving, at least.

"His sister's dead? Mom's in the hospital? What the fuck? What ... what the fuck?"

“They were b-both stabbed many times.”

“Stabbed! That ... you ... what? Hunters?”

“W-We think so.”

Triss threw her hands up again, and clutched her head in her claws. Oh fuck, poor Jack. Poor poor Jack. Fucking hell. “How’s the kid?”

“The P-Prince is ... still w-waiting for him to ... to ... we don’t know. He’s out on a sweep.”

“Think he knows?”

“P-Probably.”

“Just ... wow, fucking hell. Poor guy.” She kind of felt like the guy’s aunt, considering she was in a committed relationship with his sire. That was a strange way to think of the friendship. But she couldn’t deny she’d started to care for the kid, quite a bit. Even taught him how to hunt kine in the alleyways that littered Dolareido. She was one of the few people he’d told — accidentally, heh — that he’d killed Viktor and Tony.

Christ, he was Julias’s childe! She had to speak to him, both him and Julias, see if she could do anything. The fuck could she do, though? Nothing, absolutely nothing. Nothing except, catch the people responsible. Catch, kill, maim. Hell, she still owed one of the hunters for shooting her, when she met Eric. That was an afterthought, though, compared to your first family getting murdered.

“I’ve t-texted Jack,” Tash said, “but no response. P-Probably underground.”

“Text Julias yet?”

“ ... no. I ... I should, I j-just...”

Frowning, Triss put a hand on Tash’s shoulder, and started walking her toward the exit. “Let’s get out there and hunt these fuckers down, and I’ll throw Superman a text.” A glance for the rest of the crew, and they all nodded.

Jennifer the Ventrue, Othello the Daeva, Aaron the Gangrel, with Beatrice the Nosferatu and Natasha the Mekhet. Best team? Best team.

The rest of the crew shrugged, and fell in behind her, no questions or anything. Othello was too much of a pushover to fight her for command; not that she was in command, but it did feel like she’d be comfortable barking orders when shit hit the fan. Maybe it’d come to that, maybe it wouldn’t. For now, a trip topside to hunt for hunters, and give Julias a call.

“Beatrice,” Jacob said, bringing everyone to a halt and looking back at him, “be careful. These psychopaths will kill you, or torture you, then kill you.”

“No kidding.”

“And they’re a lot stronger than we give them credit for.”

“At this point, I’m under the assumption they’re fucking deadly as shit and could probably do anything. Is that not enough worry?” she said, turning to face him.

“No. It’s not. But if you’re going out there, find out how Jack’s doing, would you? Julias probably knows, and I’m interested.”

She almost asked why, almost said something stupid. But Jacob’s expression wasn’t his usual Joker smile annoying. Instead, it was serious, as serious as he could get with a bandage covering the eyes. Jacob liked the kid, most people did. Everyone liking you was a good way to get attention, and getting attention was how Jack found himself in his current predicament, with enemies targeting him, and murdering his family.

Fucking hell, his sister was murdered, and his mother was assaulted, all because he had a nasty habit of getting on Kindreds' good side. That, and he did far more damage to the hunters than any Kindred his age should have been able to.

“Check out Devil’s Corner while you’re there.”

“Will do, boss,” she said, offering a salute, before she crouched down and started crawling out the exit.

---

Once they were out of the cave and out of the canyon, Triss pulled up her phone. “You really didn’t contact Julias, Tash?”

“I ... I d-don’t ... I’m not sure what I w-would say to him.”

“Hi, your childe’s first family have been assaulted? Sister’s dead?”

“He knows. He m-must know. Invictus network p-pays more attention to this sort of stuff. If the Prince knows, Julias ... m-must know. And I ... I’m afraid of ... what he’d say. His voice is ... powerful.”

Sighing, Triss nodded and squatted down, eyes on the roadside that circled the city. “I forget sometimes that you know him better than I do, and hung out with him for years.” The others were changing clothes to better streetwear, so she had a moment to talk with the tiny Mekhet.

“I ... never slept with him, though.”

“Heh, why is that? You’re a very cute girl, Natasha. And, knowing that you’re banging two werewolves? Gotta admit, that’s sexy as fuck. You must be a fox in bed.”

“I ... I um.” The tiny creature squirmed a bit, and combed her long black hair with her hand a few times. Triss had seen the Prince do that, on more than one occasion. “He was a f-friend. Always a friend.”

“Yeah, that’s understandable. Julias the white knight.” Rolling her eyes, she dialed him. Ring ring. No answer. She got a text back though. ~In a meeting with the council. Love you.~ Awww. Heh, what a dumbass, taking the time to text that when he was talking with two elders. “K he’s busy. I’ll talk to him about it later.”

Soon Jennifer with was with them, dressed in black jeans, a blouse, and a black bra; blouse undone of course, except for one button at the stomach. Tash raised a brow as she took a moment to look at Jen’s exposed chest, but eventually shrugged. In the past, she’d probably have rolled her eyes, but the girl was getting buried in sex on such a regular basis now, she must have become desensitized. Totally hot.

Othello came out, wearing basically the same thing as Jen, jeans and an open shirt, showing off his abs. At least Aaron bothered to button up.

“What’s the plan?” Othello said.

Triss stood up, rotated her neck and shoulders a few times, and started walking. Everyone fell in line behind her. “Gonna scout Devil’s Corner.”

“The hunters have been abduct-t-ting people,” Tash said, walking beside Triss, “for their rituals. They’re p-probably looking for people that fall b-between the cracks.”

Othello sneered. “Smart of them to go for the sick and weak sheep that have fallen behind.”

Everyone in the group stopped, and looked at the moron Daeva. Ok, that was a lot more than Othello usually said. Normally the idiot just focused on his own pleasure, and stayed out of everything. Probably for the best then, with a personality like that.

Aaron, standing beside him, shrugged and sighed. “Grim as that is, that is accurate. The hunters have instincts, good ones, to know how to take advantage of our own hunting grounds without us noticing.”

Triss groaned a little louder as they started into the streets of North Side. “Yeah, I know, but god damn it. They’re still people.”

“You’ve killed people, when you were hungry and looking to let off some rage,” the Gangrel said, eying her.

“I always made sure they deserved it.” And that was true, she did put in her due diligence to make sure those she killed were the nasty sort. “Some of them ended up on the news ... a lot didn’t, I guess.”

“The hunters are doing the same, more or less. So, if we’re going to hunt them down, let’s take a page from your book.”

“My book? Ha, fine. To Devil’s Corner we go.”

---

They took to the rooftops and ran. With Natasha and Beatrice keeping them all wrapped in the Cloak of Night, it was easy to move quick and not worry about getting caught. Course, after learning the hunters had some particularly weird tools at their disposal, they couldn’t discount that maybe the hunters could see through their stealth. Still, hunters would have to be insane to try and attack five vampires in the open.

Fuck, she was underestimating them already. They weren’t only insane enough, they were competent enough. Fucking crazy.

Once they got to the bars deep in Devil's Corner, Triss sat down on one of their roofs, and let her legs dangle a few floors high. Everyone joined her. Like a scene out of a coming-of-age movie. If they had ice cream cones, or a blood sorbet, it'd be perfect.

“Man, Jack must be fucking crushed,” she said.

Everyone nodded, each turning heads in different directions to watch the kine move about below. Lots of jeans all torn up, old and broken shoes and sneakers, dirty shirts, tattoos meant to intimidate instead of just be art, and other crap. People got piercings to look scary in Devil's Corner, not to be cool. She got them to be cool. Bunch of posers.

She reached up, and plucked at the chain dangling from earlobe to nostril. “Look for the ones that are alone. Lot of people sort of drift into their own little pits of misery out here. Much as I'm cool with Dolareido letting people do whatever they want once they're adults ... a lot of adults are really fucking stupid, and throw their lives away on addictions. The really stupid ones, and the nasty ones, end up here, eventually.”

Nodding, Natasha pulled out her pistol, and started examining it, checking the slide and safety. In the past, Triss would have figured Tash was a paranoid bookworm. Nowadays? The little Mekhet was more confident, and each time Triss met her, she started to fear her a little more. Tash was ancilla, and no matter how tiny she looked, she was a deadly creature.

“Can I read a book?” Aaron said.

“No,” everyone else said. Heh, comical.

Sighing, Beatrice put her elbows on her knees, and watched some people coming and going from the more filthy bars. Prostitutes were everywhere, a lot of them with track marks, and plenty of men were getting in on that action, driving by and offering the ladies just enough money to fuel their addictions. The men weren't any better off, most working shit jobs or getting by on petty theft while squatting in some old, rundown buildings, or shacking up ten to a single apartment.

There was a balance, though. It never got too crazy, too out of control, too insane. The Prince, and other Kindred like the Invictus running some brothels out here, had offered enough support for people to be able to live. Those that were willing to fight their addictions and try and climb out of their hole, had options. Shitty options, but options, and that was more than Triss could say for other cities.

Those that weren't willing to climb, and succumbed to resentment, died. The ones that resented themselves died in their own vomit, usually. The ones that resented others became extreme criminals, and were quickly dealt with by the Kindred. The Invictus liked to keep things orderly. The Carthians liked to protect humans who had shit lives and were trapped in that circumstance; or just let out some of their frustration on those deserving, like Triss had done. The Prince hated anyone that disrupted her Kindred utopia, and murderers, rapists, drug dealers dealing to minors, and pedophiles generally fit into that group.

Those were also the best targets for a fanatical group looking for sacrifices.

It'd been a while since Triss had killed someone. She could still remember what it was like, though, to bring a human's life to an end. It'd been a little sickening, at first, but a part of her had enjoyed exercising its predatory desires. Only now did she realize that part of her was the Beast, and she'd become quite attuned to it, far more than most Carthians had; they rarely killed their prey. She'd been careful to not do it often, and only to do it to those who deserved it, but now she had to wonder if other Kindred in Dolareido could kill people as easily as her.

She sighed, and stared down at the oblivious kine, looking for the low of the low, for the ones most likely to be picked off by hunters looking for an easy sacrifice. And, they would make good sacrifices.

If hunters could learn secrets using sacrifices and strange occult magics and shit, why couldn't she? Seemed right up crúac's alley.

Maybe she could.

~~Damien~~

He did not expect Fiona to come with him. If anything, he expected Azamel to assign him no Begotten. Perhaps the girl had asked the old woman for the choice? He was glad to have her, and not. The last time she'd been in danger, he risked his life to save her, a dangerous impulse decision that nearly got him killed. But, he did save her. Every time she smiled at him, strange tingling sensations danced up his spine, and what he could only surmise were butterflies, filled his stomach.

It was exhilarating, and terrifying. He did not know how to process these feelings, and the very fact he thought of it as 'processing' did not bode well for his chances.

He looked up at Matt's back. The wolf was leading them through the tunnels, though Damien was guiding him; no one knew these tunnels as well as him. Parker White and Vicky Goldman were also with them. Those two had been partners in many affairs, and knew how to work together, supposedly. Both were about forty-five-years embraced, almost through their neonate years, Parker a Daeva while Vicky was a Ventrue. They complimented each other nicely, and Damien was more than confident he could keep them all well hidden. Not that he needed to extend such use of his discipline to Fiona.

She would normally be smiling incessantly, but Jack had sent Damien and Jessy a text explaining the situation with his old, kine family, and Damien had relayed that to the rest of the group. It was pertinent information, to know that the hunters had made such a bold move, and it would spread through the Invictus, and soon all Kindred. Many would dismiss it, showing little pity for a young Kindred experiencing the pain of losing the family from his first life. Many Kindred wouldn't understand at all, those feelings long dead with the age, separation, and inhuman distance that formed between a Kindred and their first life.

Damien was one of the latter. He'd been Kindred for fifty years, and the idea that he was once human was difficult to consider. The Beast, as quiet as a Mekhet's Beast was, was a part of him now, as natural as breathing was to kine. Natasha was different, but, he felt she was the unique one, in this regard. To Jack, to any young neonate, there was still growth to be done, abandoning the old life to embrace the second one. A requiem. Whether the hunters knew killing Jack's sister, and wounding his mother, would affect the boy, Damien didn't know, but he knew it would.

That made every second on this hunt painfully silent.

"I hope Jack will be fine," Fiona said.

He nodded, and looked down at the tiny woman. She was walking close to him, in her brown leather jacket and blue jeans. The vampires were all in suits; not dressed for tunnels, or combat, but ultimately it didn't matter. When bullets and swords, and blood and claws were involved, none of that mattered to Kindred. Only the hunters would have to rely on their clothing for protection.

"Jack is a right hand for a reason," he said. "He's strong and reliable, and oddly intelligent and quick minded. He'll ... he'll..." Sighing, he looked up at the flickering old lights of the tunnels, and reached under his trench coat to be sure his sword was still there.

“He’ll probably pace a circle in his own mind until it becomes a hole he can’t escape.” Everyone stopped, and stared at him. He winced, shrugged, and raised his hands in surrender. “Sorry. But, while I do think Jack’s own mind may be his undoing, his relationship with the Prince is unbreakable. I don’t trust the young man to handle this well, but I trust her to get him through it.” Look someone in the eye when you cut off their limbs, and you get a pretty good sense for what sort of person they were.

Vicky and Parker both started to clap. Not loud, boisterous claps, but quiet claps, the sort a rich, older person might use when applauding at the opera. The fact they both did it at the same time was enough to make Damien frown.

But Fiona laughed when she noticed, and gave him a pat on the shoulder, before everyone resumed walking.

“I think yer right,” she said. “I know if ma or da were killed, I would be right livid. But they’re so far away and not involved in any of this.”

“Kindred are different anyway,” Vicky said. “We’re immortal. Separating from family, and then all kine, is inevitable.”

Yes, that was true, but that process took decades for most Kindred.

Fiona didn’t like that answer, though. She turned around and stuck out her tongue at the two vampires, before she hooked arms with Damien, and pulled him along to resume the hunt.

“I hope to live as long as Azamel. Though, there are better ways for Begotten to age.”

“You don’t all age similarly?” he said.

“Nae. The Horror half of us is unique, and different Begotten will pursue their future differently.” She looked around, as if checking for ghosts. “Some Begotten become immortal, and become true monsters.”

True monsters? That was enough to get a raised brow from everyone, and Damien glanced back to Vicky and Parker to see if they had any idea what she meant. But they shrugged, shaking their heads.

Vicky and Parker were an interesting pair. Both born in Dolareido, they came from rich families, and as far as Damien knew, those families made their money on sex and drugs. Unlike companies like Terra Den, which dealt in drugs in a more insidious fashion, Vicky and Parker’s families were more honest, but without any ties to any corporations. A strange circumstance, and it had bred two children who were very comfortable with the criminal life. Natural fits for the Invictus world. Both were nearing their ancilla years, but it was hard to take them seriously; they belonged in a theater watching an opera or plays, not in abandoned tunnels hunting hunters.

Both were average height, white, lean with decently athletic builds as per any well groomed vampire. Parker enjoyed long blonde hair to the shoulder, worn loose, while Vicky also enjoyed long blonde hair, worn longer, and curled into waves. Fashionable, thin, with manicures and whatnot.

They ran brothels in Devil’s Corner, and probably dealt in the drugs, too. Perhaps they did it better than others? Damien lived in Devil’s Corner, hid underneath it for fifty years, and was very familiar with their illegal businesses. They treated their staff and clients well. Damien spent many years trying to scare their customers back into the arms of God, rarely to success.

Not exactly the company he wanted on this hunt, but they were almost as old as him, trustworthy in a fight. But, he wasn’t so sure they were trustworthy outside of one.

Fiona skipped up to Matt without him, and poked the giant man in the side. “How’s yer relationship with Natasha?”

Not a single bit of hesitation or shyness in her voice. Did she grow up watching romantic comedies? Perhaps her contagious, unending joyfulness was due to that, or an unending supply of drugs, potentially from the two Kindred behind him.

“Tash is great. Why?”

“Just, there are two of ye. Art and ye.”

“Mhmm.”

“That does nae get weird?”

“Art and I have been best friends for years. We always share things.”

Fiona tapped her chin a few times before glancing back at Damien. Evil grin. Damien raised a brow and looked around, checking to see if she was looking at him or something else. No, she was looking at him.

She laughed at him before she hopped ahead a few feet, and started walking backward. “So do the two of ye ... ye ken ... at the same time, with Tash?”

“Fiona,” Damien said. “If you really want to know, shouldn’t you ask her?”

Giggling, Fiona came back to his side, and nudged against him with her elbow. “Sorry. I never get to talk Matt alone, and I think Tash is shy.”

The blonde giant ahead of them laughed and shrugged as he walked. “Not as shy as you might think, especially not after we spent weeks sleeping at the Prince’s tower, now.”

Fiona giggled again, and jumped up and down a few times as she clapped, before she leaned up to whisper in his ear. “I think he means she enjoys both him and his friend Art, at the same time!” Laughing, she nodded to herself as she walked along, content with her conclusion.

It was not an unappealing thought, he had to admit. Letting his mind consider more sexual, appealing imagery than he had in the past, the image of little Natasha, between two massive bodies of muscle, was tantalizing. But it wasn’t his fellow Mekhet he fantasized about, it was the bouncy redhead beside him.

Everyone else was having sex on a regular basis. Everyone else was indulging in carnal delights, the sort he had never dared think of, and when he had in the past, he had done his best to suppress the thoughts. But now, there was no reason to suppress them.

He wanted to hold the small, curvy creature in his arms. He wanted to feel her naked body against his, feel her breasts against his chest, his arms wrapped around her, his length inside her, his—

He shook his head hard enough to earn a raised eyebrow from Fiona. There was a reason to not think those thoughts: he was on a mission. He could indulge his silly boy fantasies in his mind later. Or, not his mind, if Fiona’s sexual disposition aimed itself at him. A terrifying, and thrilling thought. The thought she might throw herself at him made him smile, but also gulp on a dry throat. He’d be frozen if she did that. Paralyzed. No idea what to do.

Stop thinking about it, Damien. Jack’s kine family was dead and dying, and now you’re on a mission to find the killers. Focus.

And you're also on a mission to capture Elen, according to Julias. Would Fiona mind? Probably not. Would Matt mind? Maybe. Vicky and Parker had received the same message he had, and he could trust them to help.

He looked over his shoulder to watch the two vampires for a while. Yes, they were trustworthy, to a point, but there was some evidence to suggest they weren't entirely. They ran their own brothels in Devil's Corner, and that wasn't an unusual business for Kindred to run. What was unusual was what Jack told him about their strange amulets or artifacts that attracted sexual attention. He'd seen the effects of it himself, with that giant sexual entity in the Shadow Realm. Where had those two acquired that artifact? He doubted Invictus would deal with such things. The Lancea et Sanctum would have destroyed artifacts that represented such sin. The only covenants that'd be interested in artifacts of that nature, were the dragons, and the witches.

"Mister Bursken," Vicky said, walking up closer.

"Call me Damien when we're out on a mission, Vicky."

"Ah, yes, good point."

"First time getting your hands dirty?"

She frowned at him, but when he offered her a steady gaze, it faded. The Invictus were quick to take offense if you accused them of being new at something; he was just trying to get information.

"A mission like this? Yes. We rarely do things so hands on, or with such high stakes. We were sired after the Purge, after all."

He nodded, and smiled after Fiona as the tiny redhead bounced after Matt again. "Yes, there were many changes after the Purge."

"I suppose you would know, since you spied on us for fifty years."

He looked at the woman beside him for a moment, to make sure he read that right. Yeah, there was a bit of annoyance there. Jealous that the outsider was promoted to an Invictus position, probably, especially one as high as Right Hand. It was strange, and there had been considerable resistance from many people in the Invictus, but Maria had pushed it through. Now would be an awkward time for her to conspire against him, though.

Tread lightly, Damien. Hiding in shadows, he could do well. Hiding in plain sight, with slippery words and misleading smiles, was not a skill he had.

“I did. But, much of my time was spent pursuing my covenant’s purpose.”

“Mhmm. What’s that entail, exactly?”

“I’m surprised you don’t know. Maria is quite devout.”

“She keeps her personal life secret, that includes her beliefs.”

“Yes, after the Purge, I imagine she would.” Sighing, Damien pat his chest again to make sure his knife was there. This conversation had a fire to it he didn’t like, like someone had dynamite and was playing with a match, and it set him on edge. “From what I know from Lucas, she was far more open about her beliefs before the Purge.”

“Explain those beliefs to me.”

“If you were curious, why didn’t you visit Lucas’s congregation when he returned last year?”

“Because you two were holed up in an abandoned tunnel that used to belong to one of the biggest pains in our ass. Going there was asking for people to think of me as an enemy. And hey, what do you know, most of the people who went there ended up dying. Except you.”

“We weren’t aware there was ... something, in that place, something that gave it a strange influence. It gave Lucas’s words power, more power than they should have.” Not that that was the reason Lucas had decided to kamikaze. “But, if you really want to know, I can—”

“Summarize.”

“ ... alright. The Second Estate believes God exists. We believe in a Heaven and Hell. We believe that God created humanity, as per the Christian bible. We believe a man named Longinus stabbed Christ on the cross with a spear, and the event changed him in ways beyond defining. The birth of the Kindred race. Christ gave us, the Damned, a mission: be the wolf that scares the sheep into the arms of the Shepard. Maybe, just maybe, if we do our job and do it well, we don’t have to be damned.”

She raised a brow, and looked back at Parker, before back to him, lips parting into something close to a sneer. “Wow, that’s grim.” Almost as if she didn’t believe him.

“You’re an undead creature that survives off the blood of the living, Vicky Goldman. In front of us, there’s a werewolf that struggles against alien creatures rivaling biblical demons. Beside him, is a monster that embodies literal nightmares as old as the written word ... older.” His words pulled Fiona’s gaze over her shoulder, and she giggled and finger-waved at him, before she started skipping alongside Matthew. Skipping, next to a giant werewolf. The girl was clearly too happy to be real.

“That ... is a good point.”

“Indeed.”

---

---

~~Jack~~

They found nothing. After six hours of exploring the sewers and tunnels, they found nothing. The other teams reported the same thing. No smell, no traces, nothing. Expected. Frustrating. Very, very frustrating. Overwhelmingly frustrating.

He sat on the stairs at the front of the Elysium tower, and looked up to the sky. Mulder and Scully flew down to him, each taking a shoulder, and each pressed their heads into his neck. Soft.

“Yeah, shit is bad,” he said, voice quiet, almost inaudible. “My mom’s dying. My sister is dead. It shouldn’t matter, but it does. Fuck, it does. It fucking does.”

The two crows didn’t understand his words. But, with a little bit of Animalism and some tongue clucks, he shared the meaning. He didn’t bother explaining what a hospital was, or what tubes or wires coming out of a human meant. No need to explain a morgue, or the cold places they kept bodies. No way to get across what nurses and doctors were, what medicine was, what it meant when someone was in critical condition versus stable, or recovering.

They understood injured mother. They understood dead sister. The two birds crooned a few times, before they resumed snuggling into his neck.

“Sorry, I don’t have any oats on me,” he said. They ruffled their feathers, and continued to snuggle into him, apparently unfazed by the lack of food. That made him smile. When you didn’t need to provide food for affection, was a pretty large stepping stone for animals. “Have you two lost family?”

They chirped some more sounds, and his brain managed to put together some images. Other crows, older crows, slower, succumbing to nature. The crows had a very large, almost godly view of the concept of nature, and he struggled to understand it. He didn't bother explaining hospitals, or the machinations of humans, and to counter, the crows noticed quickly that he struggled to understand the interconnectivity of nature. Trees. Dead crows. Predators. Wind, and leaves, and the seasons, sunrise and sunset, bones and flesh and the moon. They understood it, deep in their hollow, light bones.

The First and Second Estate would say the crow's view on life did not apply to Kindred. The Circle would probably agree with the feathered ones. And besides, humans? They weren't vampires. They fit into the circle of life and the paradigm of nature just fine.

He sighed, and let his head hang, elbows on his knees and arms dangling between them. Go up and see Antoinette? Or not. Nothing stopping him from spending the day at his sire's. Hell, Clara was a few blocks away. If he wanted, he could spend the day at her place, sleeping in her closet or something.

Christ, what would Antoinette do to him if he did that? Heh. Probably tear his head off. But, at least he wouldn't get pity from Clara, no more gazes of sadness, as if he was the one who died. He knew Clara wanted to help him, soothe his pain like everyone else did, but she was a street-rough girl who understood—

Why the fuck wouldn't Antoinette understand? She'd been around for god damn centuries. She was wise and intelligent, and he knew she'd try to help him; that was the problem. A personal struggle, something as quaint as a dead family member, and another one dying? Quaint was the right word, compared to her experience.

Christ, he was fucked in the head. Couldn't see his love because he was afraid of how she'd look at him? Afraid she might pity him, or try and help him get past his misery? Jack, you fucking moron.

He felt like a trapped animal, terrified of the person coming for him. No one was coming for him; not true, the hunters were. He wasn't afraid of them. He was dying to get his hands on them so he could wring their fucking necks, so he could kill them in the most painful way possible. No, something else felt like it was coming for him, something he couldn't stop, something that made him horrified.

Inevitability. Fuck, what do you know about inevitability? You're just a fool, a kid with a big brain and a bigger ego, sitting around and contemplating the meaning of life and death. Your sister is dead! Your mother is dying, might not survive, and those things are emotion bombs, nuclear ones. Nuclear launch detected, dumbass. You're stuck hiding from the pain because you've tasted it once, and you're afraid to taste it again. That's all there is to it. You're afraid of having to feel the pain of a family member's death again, and the idea it might turn you into an asshole is a distant second, just an excuse you're using to hide from the fact you're a fucking coward. All this drama, all this intellectualizing and rationalizing, nothing but a way to put distance between yourself and that wall of incinerating pain coming your way.

And it's all your fault.

That's the thing that makes you horrified, Jack. No matter how smart you are, no matter how brave, you're still just a kid who panics the moment emotional pain comes your way. Like a toddler, crying because someone destroyed your sand castle. Worse, because you had a chance to prevent it, and you failed. You're not half the—

Jack twitched as Mulder pecked him in the ear. "Ow! Hey, what—" Scully did the same, nipping at his earlobe, before giving a loud caw. "Message received! Jesus, I get it." Don't be so hard on himself. Or, as the crows thought of it: don't give into the black. Their understanding of death, maybe? Don't give into the black.

What a delightful way to think about depression, something akin to how animals thought of death. Push past it.

Sighing again, he reached up, and stroked Scully's head, and Mulder's. "Did you see anything while you were up there?" The two crows shook their head. "Hmm. Ok. From now on, stick around the hospital, that building I went into today with the werewolf. I don't know where they'll show up, so anywhere around the hospital is good." The hunters would show up, sooner or later. If he went to the hospital regularly, they were bound to.

Both crows nodded, and snuggled into his neck a few times. "Heh, yeah, you can stick around till ... till whenever."

"If they keep your mood elevated, they are welcome in the tower."

He jerked his head again, looking behind him. Antoinette.

"Ah ... h-hey." Gulping, he forced his eyes down to her shoes, and with a little time, forced them back up. She was wearing her work shoes, a nice business suit skirt, no jacket, a white shirt, and ... a strange look on her face. Actually, he knew that look. That was her Primogen meeting look, cold and calculating, quiet, receiving, analyzing.

That ... was perfect. He could work with that.

"Hello," she said.

He forced on a smile, but only managed a small one. Better than nothing. "I suppose you know."

"I do."

"Hope ... you don't mind that I didn't contact you."

She offered a small, annoyed sigh, the same she used in her meetings. "I understand. The sweeps could wait no longer. We have wasted enough time on recreation as is."

“Agreed.” He tried the smile again as she came down the steps to stand beside him. No good, gone in seconds. “You came out here?”

“I wanted to speak before sunrise. I thought that you might be hesitant to enter, until the last moment.”

“ ... yeah, probably.”

“But it is imperative that we do.”

“ ... yeah, probably.”

With a nod, Antoinette continued down the steps, and out into the maze garden. “Come.”

Sighing, he followed after her. Mulder and Scully stuck with him, each offering the elder a quiet caw of acknowledgment as Jack started walking. While Ventrue and Gangrels were naturals at Animalism, any Kindred could use it, and it wouldn't surprise Jack if Antoinette had spoken to many crows, coyotes, rats, and other predators.

She sat upon one of the stone benches, between the professionally trimmed hedges. It was the bench they'd sat upon, when their romance was first starting to build. It was when Tony had showed up, and Jack had walked past him. Only later did he learn Antoinette had punched Tony for some insults.

If Jack had been in her position, and had the power, he would have killed the fucker. But the Prince couldn't go making enemies of Kindred so easily; if they ever decided to join forces, they could oust her, or kill her. If she killed a Primogen, over nothing but an insult, the other Primogen would have had an excuse to do just that. And Jack knew, no matter how intelligent he considered himself, he wasn't so intelligent when he was pissed, and that would make him a bad leader.

He looked down at the old, beautiful bench, the weathered stone, and managed another weak smile as he let the memory remind him of a different time. So innocent back then, so naive. So dumb.

“I have eyes on your mother, my love. If her condition changes, I will know immediately. A measure I am sure Julias has already taken.”

“Probably.” He sat down with her, half a foot between them. Normally he’d be pressed to her side, snuggling, or at least keeping a bit of physical contact. If he didn’t, she’d slide over to him instead. Not tonight.

“Based on your words and expression, no one has found traces of the hunters this night.”

“Yeah. But it’s only the first night. And besides, Jeremiah was hurt in our last encounter, as was Angela. Natasha did good, hurting them like she did at the last moment.”

“Alas, had her aim been a foot higher, one of them would be dead.”

“Yeah ... if only. Christ, if I had just killed Angela when I had the chance, none of this would have happened.” Then it wouldn’t be his fault.

Nodding, she leaned back, and looked up to the sky. It was almost impossible to see the stars, with all the lights of Dolareido’s nightlife, but the moon was visible. “If only Athalia and Azamel had helped earlier.”

“ ... yeah.”

“If only Barry Tellern had had the foresight and skill to notice his life was in danger.”

“Yeah.”

“If only they had not acquired the help of this Begotten creature.”

“ ... yeah, I—”

“If only our surveillance was better. If only Damien or the others had been quicker in your last encounter. If only Eric or Clara or Herrington had found the opportunity to return the attack, when they were captured. If only we had predicted that Angela would stoop so low as to attack innocent kine. If only—”

“I get it!” He threw up his hands, and glared at the tall woman. “I get it. Million events that had to converge to create this circumstance. And that’s how life works. Everything’s a unique circumstance created from an infinitely complex chain of causality, and to blame any specific circumstance with an ‘if only’ is a fool’s game. I get it. I’m not an idiot. I’m not ... I’m not blaming ... myself.” Except, of course, he’d basically just admitted to doing that a moment ago. Fuck.

For a moment, she said nothing, letting the volume of his words fade into the night air. “You are,” she said, words quiet and direct. He half expected her words to burn him to cinders, considering he’d just yelled at her.

“I...”

“I will not lecture you on the folly of that thinking. As you said, you are clearly aware of the lack of logic. But, you are a living creature, Jack, not a robot. Your father is dead, and for a young boy, that must have been a pain beyond my imagining. Now your sister is dead, your mother perhaps to follow, and pain turns to agony, to resentment and rage. You will fantasize, from now until eternity, about how things could have been different. Such is the way of anyone with a soul.”

“From now ... until forever, huh?” He groaned and lowered his arms again. “Fuck me.”

“That is, perhaps, untrue. As centuries come and go, and you are forced to take long torpors to settle your ever growing blood lust, the dreams will blur all your memories. For better, and for worse.”

“Fuck me ... again.”

“Many Kindred keep journals, to catalog and attempt to remember both the joys of their pasts, and the pains. I do suggest you begin to do this.”

Journaling? He never liked the idea of keeping a journal. He never needed it. He was more than capable of fully articulating and appreciating his thoughts without having to see them written out. He talked to himself out loud, arranged logic and events, walked through causality chains to see if they made sense, or if they fell apart upon scrutiny. But, those were words, lost after said. Maybe journaling his thoughts would make sense?

He tried to imagine what it'd be like, a hundred years from now, reading old journals about shit like this. Would he think it silly? Meaningful? Painful?

He didn't want to forget his sister, though. He didn't want to forget his father, either. Maybe starting a journal about his first life, and the experiences of his second life, was a good idea.

“Vampires have a strange time of it, don't they?” he said.

“Indeed. We are not human, and yet, much of our knowledge of existence is built upon a human existence we once had.” With another sigh, she looked down at him, and straight into his eyes. Hers had softened. And, that was ok. “I can offer you nothing more than guidance, from a Kindred's perspective, and a soft place to rest your head, as I always have. But, the pain of losing your first family? I can listen, nothing more.”

“No memory of your first family?” He already knew the answer.

“None at all. I am sure I had a father, and mother, though considering how long ago this was, it would not surprise me if they died to disease, starvation, murder by starving or diseased neighbors, or perhaps they died tragic deaths to cruel occupations? Had I known what would happen with the centuries, I would have at least written their names.”

He leaned back, and stared up at her. Now his eyes were the ones giving pity, shit. “Fuck ... I ... I mean, I know you’ve told me that before, I just ... I can’t imagine forgetting this.”

“And this is why is say, journal it. These memories, even these painful, horrible memories of death, murder, and fear, are precious. Do not let them rob you of your mind, but, do not let them fade away, either. Immortality is a curse, my love. Be careful to not let it rot your soul, as it has done to many others, such as your grandsire.”

Sighing louder, he nodded, and lowered his eyes again. “I ... sorry I didn’t contact you the moment I learned.”

“Do not be. You had work to do, as you said. And I understand that this is a trying time, for more reasons than obvious. You, and I, are Kindred, and that implies our struggles are not so easily defined as a human’s. The five stages of grief? It is not so simple for us.” She slid across the bench, until her thigh was touching his. “Come, speak with me, tell me of the thoughts that haunt you, my love. I am not some all-knowing creature that will laugh at the cliché words you use to describe your pain. If anything, I am a student, hoping to understand what you wish to teach me. And ... and I am your love, hoping to share in your joy, and pain.”

He choked on something between a chuckle and sob. Swallowing it down, he leaned into her side, and pressed his head against her shoulder. So different to Clara. The werewolf knew Jack's pain all too well, while Antoinette had long forgotten what it meant to lose someone as close as father, mother, or sister. He smiled at the thought, at the difference. Clara could be a friend in a way Antoinette couldn't, maybe?

Mulder and Scully hopped off, and took to the bench's back, perching and watching.

"How much do you want to know?"

"Whatever you would hesitate to tell me."

Ouch, straight to the sore spot.

"I ... I do blame myself, I guess. I could have shot that fucking bitch when I had the choice. Now Mary's dead, and Mom's ... almost there." He looked up to her again, to see what she'd say, what she'd do, how she'd look at him.

She didn't. She set her arm around him, and looked up at the moon.

Guess he should continue. "I've ... I've been ... terrified, about ... about this ... rage." He stopped, and waited for the question. None came. She continued to look up, her arm still holding him. "It wasn't there before, before I became Kindred. But now, there's something in me that gets a ... a hunger, I guess. Like, it hungers for ... violence? It's rage, and anger, and it builds up, and ... and it's not rage or anger I'm familiar with, from when I was human." This was good, this was progress. Antoinette had a good point. She was an elder, and that meant her expertise lay in matters of Kindred. Maybe she could help. Maybe he was a fool to think he could get over it, like a human could. "It took hold of me, when I broke out of Angela's torture, and I used it to break the minds of the hunters, and summon the rats. Ever since then, whenever I think of Angela, I feel it crawling around inside me ... screaming, trying to get out. I thought it was just anger at first, but I can't even think about that fucking bitch, that fucking horrible, disgusting, monster, without wanting to kill her. Not even kill her, but torture her. I want her to suffer. I want her to squirm and writhe in agony. I want to hear her beg for her life." He looked down, and felt his hands squeeze, the way he had just hours ago, at the foot of his mom's hospital bed. "Just ... just fucking rip her open. Get my fingers into her guts, and tear them out. Bite into them. Rip ... tear ... shred..."

Antoinette, with her one arm still around his shoulders, reached across her lap with the other, and found his fists. They were shaking, trembling, his forearms flexed and fists squeezing until his fingers were digging into his palms. He was grinding his teeth. His fangs had emerged. Vitae was rising up into his chest, empowering, preparing, readying him for a Kindred's way of combat.

Dominate.

Make them obey.

You're a Ventrue. They're kine. Weak. Blood bags. Inferior. They've hurt you, attacked you, insulted you. They've hurt those who were close to you in your first life, just to hurt you in your second.

How dare they.

"Your Beast is strong."

He snapped his head up. Fuck, right, he was sitting, and she was with him. Antoinette. He gulped as he looked at her, and she met his eyes, gazing at him with stern eyes. Wait, not stern. Interested? She peered at him, tilted her head to the side a little, and kept eye contact with him as she did, red eyes looking into him.

“I ... I guess.”

“You are a terribly intelligent young man, my love, to the point of fault. I am sure you have run your mind ragged with cycling thoughts of understanding this unusual urge within you.”

“Yeah, no denying that.” Might as well put all his cards on the table. Why would he want to keep this from her, anyway? They were in a loving relationship, and much as he had an ego big enough to get in his way, he wasn’t stupid enough to let it, so he thought.

“Julias has always been unnaturally strong, with a Beast capable of great feats. He is on your council because MacDonald and Turio recognize both his value as wise, and as deadly. You are Right Hand for the same reasons.”

“But, where did this come from? I’m ... barely a neonate.”

“A gift, and a curse, from your sire, and his sire, and his sire, and their sire. No one knows about the past of Viktor Honors, including Viktor, but there was no doubt the man was unusually capable. His bloodline grows strong in Julias, and with time, your sire will become stronger than Viktor ever was. And you, the same, for Julias.” Sighing, she leaned in closer to him, and kissed him on the head. “It rarely manifests so powerfully, so quickly, and that is your curse. You will have the Beast demanding satisfaction, at the doorstep of your mind, while you are still young. Such a burden, for one so young, is rare.”

“Lovely.” He groaned after he said it. Complaining. Whining. He hated that. Hated that in other people, hated it in himself, hated it when he couldn’t stop. Whining when something was your own fault was one of his biggest pet peeves. Whining when it wasn’t, was different, but still a useless, pointless, waste of mental energy. He needed to be stronger than this, he needed—

She bopped him on the head. “I can see your thoughts turning, my love. Enough. Accept that ... that the tragedies that have befallen you are terrible. It is ok to take a moment, and feel the pain it warrants. You need not push yourself so hard; or will you succumb to ego and destroy yourself, as men often do?”

As men often do. Pulling out the guns and poking his gender. Ouch again.

“Come,” she said, and she pulled him tighter to her side. “Your sister is dead, and your mother may soon follow. Enemies tear apart our lives. And you ... have a Beast inside you even your sire did not predict. That I did not predict. Life conspires to bury you with burdens one your age should not be forced to contend with, and it ... it must be terrifying, and overwhelming.”

“It’s ... more than that. It’s hard to explain.”

“Please, share with me.”

He forced down the burning sensation in his chest, and nudged his nose into Antoinette’s side. “I was ... I was terrified of ... of going through what happened when my father died. The pain of it, and ... and pushing people away again.” No matter how much he knew it, no matter how much intelligence and logic he had at his disposal, he couldn’t override the emotions. Couldn’t flip the fucking switch. “I pushed my mom away, my sister away, and now ... now she’s dead ... and Mom’s...”

Terrified of pain. Terrified of repeating mistakes. Terrified of losing the things he had. Terrified of the thing inside him, the Beast, and its clawing and roaring frustration. All wrapped in regret. Poetic, and infuriating.

“You will not push me away, little Ventrue. You may try, but now that I understand, it will not happen. Whatever comes, I will be here for you.”

He sighed into her, and nudged his nose into her a few times. “I really hate this.”

“Why?”

“I’m better than this. I’m smarter than this. I shouldn’t let this ... stupid bullshit fuck with me so much.”

“Ventrue hubris. And, to be torn asunder by these events, is to hold onto your humanity, my love. Without it, you are nothing but a conduit for the Beast inside you.”

“I know, I know. I’m stuck running these thoughts, over and over, and I can’t fucking break out of the loop.”

“I know that feeling all too well, little Ventrue. I have spent hours tonight, wondering, thinking, unsure of what to say to you, or how to approach you.”

“... that ... makes me feel a lot better.” Knowing his five-hundred-year-old lover could get lost in her thoughts, the same way he did? “You don’t just ... know how to respond to every situation automatically? Stay in perfect control at all times?”

“Not at all. In fact, as Kindred enter their elder years, paranoia becomes common. Many of us overreact to the smallest threats, and spend decades plotting against each other despite a complete lack of evidence to justify such actions. To be trapped in our thoughts, running them around in our minds again, and again, and again, paralyzed by them, is a trial all elders deal with nightly.”

“Damn.” He’d been like that ever since he hit puberty. Maybe not paranoid, but then again, maybe it was paranoia.

“Come, to bed with us. We can discuss ... possibilities, tomorrow night, if your mother yet lives.”

Groaning, he got up with her, and nodded. She might be dead tomorrow. She might ... be an option for the embrace, too.

Christ, he was going to have nightmares.

Chapter 81

~~Jack~~

Waking up beside Antoinette was a good way to start the night, normally. Waking up next to the beautiful seductress should have been the best thing ever, like usual. Not this night.

He sat up, as did she, and the two of them looked at each other for a little while before she nodded, and got dressed. A perfect opportunity to watch the busty demoness move around naked, normally. He didn't watch. Couldn't get into the mood, couldn't find himself wanting to do anything, except check the latest news.

He put on his suit, as did she, and the two of them walked to a neighboring room, smaller, an office environment with a few chairs and a desk where the Prince had a laptop. She probably had a dozen laptops, now that he thought about it. If you had the money to waste, luxuries became the norm.

Come on, don't look for reasons to be upset. Sit down, shut the fuck up, and wait for her to tell you what the latest news is on your mother.

"No change," she said. Straight to the point, thank god. "Do you wish to see?"

"... yeah." It might make it a bit easier to swallow, if he was looking at a computer screen instead of seeing it in the flesh.

Sighing with every step, he walked around the desk of wood, and stood beside the Prince. His mom was on the screen, deathly still, tube still jammed into her throat, needle still jammed into her arm, same as it was when he saw her last night.

“It is a miracle she is alive, my love,” the Prince said.

“Yeah, it is. Stabbed a ... a fucking ridiculous amount of times.”
Easier to say that, than to say the name of the person responsible. “I ... I think I’ll do another sweep with the team, then visit her again, later tonight.”

“I see.” Antoinette leaned back in her fancy chair, and sighed, combing her hair over her chest in that cute way she did. No matter how dire the situation, he supposed he couldn’t help but notice things like that about her. It made the current situation bearable, if only just.

“I still ... still don’t know if ... if I can ... if I can even ask...”
Groaning louder, he walked back around the desk and sat in one of the chairs. He wheeled it in close, and put both his palms onto the hard desk. If he could look her in the eye, maybe he could say the words. “I...” Nope, fail. He lowered his head and set his forehead to the cold surface.

“Are you worried about how she would respond, if she discovered her daughter was dead? That, her Requiem would be nothing but pain, and lead to a short second life at her own hand?”

He winced, loudly, as she tore the band-aid off with speed, but it took all his arm hair with it. It was awesome that she knew to be so direct with him, that she didn’t let her desire to coddle him stop her from treating him like an adult, and a fellow Kindred, but damn. “I ... I don’t know. Mary’s dead, and that ... that’s going to kill her. It’s really going to fucking kill her. Far as I could tell from my visits, those two were really becoming a pair.”

“Mother and daughter share a unique bond. I have known many, even some who were both Kindred, mother siring daughter.”

“Really?”

“Oui. The mother could not bear to part with her daughter, and sired her once she had several years of a second life to her name.”

“That sounds sweet ... there’s a but coming, isn’t there.”

“In a manner of speaking. Gloria’s sire stayed with her for a decade, but with time, decided to leave for a different city.”

“Oh, Gloria. Oh ... I had no idea. Must have been a pretty huge fallout between those two, for her mom to risk leaving Dolareido.” Leaving a city was a terrifying prospect.

Nodding, Antoinette closed the laptop, and stood. He followed after her, and when she held out her hand for him, he took it. Holding hands. It used to feel naughty, like a precursor to sex. Tonight, it felt like a lifeline stopping him from drowning in the shit show. So fucking sick and tired of shit shows.

“People change when they are embraced, and become Kindred. You have changed. Your mother would change. And, as you know, each blood clan would affect her in different ways. One of the many reasons Kindred spend time with a potential childe, groom them, learn about them to discover how they would respond to a second life. We have none of that with your mother.”

“I know, I know. And ... fuck, I know. It’s a horrible thing to request, but ... but...”

“Who would you ask?”

“To sire her? I ... fuck, I don’t know.” He wanted to say her, and their conversation had already implied it, but asking that felt so wrong.

“You have made many friends, my love, many who would say they owe you much. Consider who you ask, and consider carefully. Were you ... to ask me, to sire her, I would be terribly tempted. It has been centuries since I have sired anyone, and I am more than capable. But she would be my childe, and all the things that includes; a dangerous life for anyone.”

Dangerous, and straight up twisted and weird, he was sure. Antoinette was a dragon, a powerful member of an extremely secretive covenant, who researched things that’d make anyone’s skin crawl. Having his mom pulled into that world would be horrible. Julias had been upfront with Jack about what sort of life he was asking of him, even if he didn’t get the chance to explain it. Not a life of sunshine and rainbows, in the Invictus, and he bet being a dragon was harder.

“I ... don’t know what to do, Antoinette.”

“Neither do I, my love.”

Groaning, he walked toward the door. “I’m out to do another sweep.”

“Take care, little Ventrue, but come to a decision quickly. We do not know how long your mother will survive.”

A time limit on everything he did. Lovely.

---

---

~~Julias~~

He held Triss close, and squeezed.

“Ah! Hey, gonna pop, here.”

The three of them were in his bunker, deep underneath his mansion. They hadn’t had much time to talk, the night before. He’d come out of his planning meeting with Maria and Michael pretty damn late, and Triss showed up with Jen not long after. They had a total of twenty minutes before sunset, and they spent it summarizing the night's events.

But this time, they had thirty minutes before they had to resume their tasks. Enough time to enjoy themselves a little, before they let the weary shit of the world start to ruin their night, as it inevitably would.

He squeezed her closer, spooned her, pressed her tight to his body until he couldn't get any closer, and he nuzzled his head onto hers, against her hair, his cheek to her forehead. Never going to let her go. And with how big his arm was compared to her, he could squeeze a lot of her, pressing against her whole torso until she was wriggling, pinned.

"Looking to fuck?" she said. "Jen, get the lube. I think we got time for a quickie."

"Nope, not looking for sex."

The Nosferatu groaned, and tried to wriggle away. He didn't let her.

"You sure? Feels like you do."

"Nope, just looking to hold the woman I love more than anything, as tight as I can."

Jen sat up, and watched with big, puppy-dog eyes as she got dressed. Not a word, though. Sometimes his fellow Ventrue preferred to stay quiet and listen to their dumb pillow talk. He appreciated it.

"Yeah, I can see that, ya dumbass." But, much as she talked like she didn't like it, she gave up eventually, and pressed her back into him. "You just going to stand there and watch? Help me out, Jen!"

“Nope. Too cute.” Once she had her suit pants on, Jen sat down on the bed, and continued watching, topless. Far be it from her to pass up an opportunity to show off how good she looked wearing pants and nothing but.

He didn't plan on having sex, but, with Jen there, watching, warm smile on her face, and heavy breasts hanging underneath her chest with her forward lean, he might just.

Except, not. Much as he kind of wanted to have sex with his lover, as he often did at the crack of dusk, last night's bullshit was too heavy a wet blanket.

“What're you gonna do?” Triss said, reading his mind. Or, more likely, he wore his moroseness on his face.

“About Jack?”

“Yeah. Kid must be hurting like crazy.”

“Still don't know. It might be best for everyone if she dies.” A fucking horrible way to look at it, but the sooner Jack lost his ties to his first life, the sooner he could obtain safety and distance from it. “He can't sire her, too young to handle the strain; it'd break him. And I'd rather not, not after having sired Jack not so long ago.” Siring wasn't only draining, it was taxing on the soul, or whatever it was inside a Kindred that kept the Beast under control.

“Yeah. Understandable.”

Jen climbed back across the bed, and lay where she'd been a few minutes ago. “I suppose it would all depend on how his mom would react to it. Losing her daughter would be devastating. But, knowing she might be able to get revenge? More of a dad trait than a mom one, but, I wouldn't put it past a mom to want some good old, classic vengeance.” Nodding, she sat cross legged beside Triss, smiling down at her. Putting on pants was probably her way of saying she wasn't going to have sex, but that didn't mean she wouldn't try and instigate it between him and Triss.

“Don't think most women are capable of revenge?” Triss scoffed, and tried sit up, but he didn't let her, forcing a squeak out of her as he squeezed her tight to his chest. “I would totally fuck someone up if they wronged me.”

“Yes, but you're a tomboy. A proper lady doesn't get her hands dirty.” Laughing, Jen reached out, and flicked Triss in the nose. Julias squeezed with both arms around the Nos preemptively, knowing Triss would try and leap out to tackle Jen. That she did, and almost took him with her, strong as she was. But the odd angle, them on their sides on the bed, prevented the attack.

“Oh you bitch. Get your big tits over here so I can body slam you. I'm gonna ... gonna...” Her voice faded away, as Julias started to kiss her neck. He couldn't risk releasing her from his embrace, but he was clear to lean down over her neck as he spooned her, and kiss her jawline, her neck, under her ear, and pluck at her many earrings a few times with his lips.

They were all feeling a little down, after hearing about Jack's first family, but a little neck kissing and snuggling in bed could cure many wounds; at least for them, the spectators to Jack's misery.

“Talk to Natasha yet?” Jen said as she lay back down on her side by Triss. Head propped up on a palm, elbow to the bed, she took advantage of her friend's incapacitated state, and used her free hand to begin plucking at one of Triss's nipple piercings.

“No, I haven't,” he said. “I know I should, considering what you told me. It's been ... weird, I suppose, between the three of us since the changes. I'm Jessy's boss now, and we rarely talk outside official conversations. I almost never speak with Natasha.”

“You should, ass.” Triss elbowed him in the side, head turning to glare up at him. “Thought she was your friend?”

“She was. Is. It’s been difficult to step away from my position, and...”

The two girls glared at him. Apparently, he’d done something offensive.

Jen slid in closer, and closer, until she was pressing her body to Triss’s. “Natasha is nice. She deserves a good friend, so, be her friend.” She offered him the same nose flick, as well.

“In case you haven’t noticed, most of my free time is spent trying to satisfy two Kindred women who keep sleeping over.”

Jen laughed, and gave Triss’s nipple a hard enough pluck to both make her breast ripple when she let go, and also earn a feminine squeak from the trapped woman. “I’d say invite her over, but I think she’s getting more than she can handle with her two boyfriends.”

“They being too aggressive with her?” Julias said, eyes opening wider. Just like that, like someone pinged a tuning fork, he was ready to get involved if someone was hurting Tash.

Triss shook her head, hands reaching out to shove Jen away. “Nah. If anything, they’re bringing out a more confident side to her. She had no trouble hanging with the four of us.”

“That’s good. I’m happy she’s making progress in her new life.” As he said that, his eyes lowered a bit, and a hint of edge in his voice he didn’t plan to have there came out.

“You’re sad she’s gone, aren’t you?” Triss said.

He nodded, and set his cheek down on her head again. “Yeah. I understand why she left, since Maria betrayed her, but ... yeah.”

“I wonder about Garry sometimes. I left him high and dry.”

Growling, Julias set his lips onto her neck. Not a growl for sex, but a growl for frustration. “Your boss is far too sneaky. The Invictus know a lot about the Carthians, and we know Garry has dealings with Jacob, but ... well, I can’t talk too much about it, except to say, your boss is fucking sneaky as shit. I’m sure Garry only gave you up to pay off some hefty favors.”

“Ooh. I’m worth a lot?”

Nodding, he opened his mouth, and bit down on her neck, gently. No fangs of course, but it was enough to make her squeal, a sound she rarely made.

“A lot,” Jen said. Now that Triss was distracted, Jen slid in closer again, and set her lips onto the other side of Triss’s jaw.

“You talk to any of your old Carthian buds anymore?”

“No.” Triss tried pushing Jen away again, but the other Ventrue refused, sneaking her hands around Triss’s body and holding tight so she could squash herself to her. Nos squished between two Ventrue. “Didn’t have friends, not really. Garry himself was a bit of a friend, but even then, that wasn’t really ... friendship, I guess. I hung out in a fucking catacomb mostly, remember?”

Jen laughed, even as she nuzzled her lips into Triss’s neck, next to Julias’s. “I bet he misses you. If we’re going to nag at Julias to talk to Tash again, maybe you should do the same for Garry?”

“Maybe I should. Maybe I—Jen, the fuck, girl? The fuck did you put pants on for if you want to bone so badly?” Triss gave up on pushing Jen away, but did her best to throw her hands up in an exasperated ‘what the fuck’.

“Sorry. Just, the way you were bossing everyone around last night? Arg, so hot. If we had more time when we got back, I would have demanded sex.” Jen lifted her head enough to put a kiss on Julias’s cheek, winked at him, and set her lips onto Triss’s proper.

“Triss was the boss? I know you said you were looking for easy marks in Devil’s Corner, but I assumed Tash was in charge, or maybe Othello.”

“Mhmm!” Jen had to moan to get through Triss’s lips, before she pulled away. “All Triss. Othello’s just a dog, a lazy one at that, but at least he’s loyal. Aaron’s less lazy, quieter, but I half expect him to push back at some point, like any Gangrel. Tash is Tash. Everyone listened to Triss.”

That was impressive. Triss was strong for her age, thirty-years embraced or not, but to take charge of Tash, a very powerful Mekhet, and Othello, one of the few Kindred in Dolareido to near a hundred years of age? Very impressive.

“Well, I do ... really wanna find those hunters, you know?” Triss said. Much as Jen seemed intent on turning Triss on, the somber weight of present circumstance crushed that kindling fire. “Poor kid must be wrecked.”

Sighing, Julias sat up. Queue for the two of them to sit up as well.

“Yeah, he was. And like Jen said, if she’s sired, she might try and get revenge, maybe try a suicide mission. But assuming she doesn’t, she’s still down a child. Hard as it is to lose a parent, it’s a hundred times worse on a parent to lose a child. She might get Jack back I her life, but she still has to go through the grief of losing her daughter.”

Both women sighed and nodded. The oppressive atmosphere was perfect to get dressed in. Lovely.

---

A hundred Invictus Kindred, all in the Xnomina lower levels, all fetching pistols, knives — swords for the Mekhet — and some shotguns. No thralls or ghouls. As much as the Invictus had thralls, trained thralls, capable of managing heavy ordnance like fully automatic assault rifles, sniper rifles, and various handheld explosives, they were needed to guard Xnomina, while also patrolling the streets. And thralls would be a liability, when the bullets started flying.

A Gangrel transformation, or a Ventrue dominating enemy hunters, a Daeva or Nosferatu throwing punches that could puncture buildings, or a Mekhet moving at insane speeds while hidden in shadow, these were the tools needed to fight hunters, when going on the offense. On the defense? Then thralls or ghouls could help.

Some people disagreed with him on that, told him teams should bring thralls, like how he had when he visited Azamel. They didn't understand how different it was, working with a small team of pros, versus a large team of, relative to Kindred, amateurs. Even the most experienced thralls were nothing compared to the Kindred sent on these sweep teams, each a minimum of twenty-years embraced. Even Gloria, assistant and inexperienced, had deadly skills with her use of Obfuscate, and speed.

They could bring the thralls and ghouls if they ever found the hunters, and it turned into a full-on street war. Until then, they had to be tactical, surgical, and use sweep teams. The sweep teams could become strike teams with a single, short order, or could on their own, if circumstances demanded it. They couldn't switch tactics on a dime if they had to carry a bunch of humans with them.

Julias, Maria, and Michael were in an office that overhung the primary equipment room, with a glass wall that overlooked the many metal shelves. There were enough munitions here to launch a war, if they needed. Enough guns to arm a thousand thralls; more thralls than the Invictus had, but that number was always in flux. Far as Julias knew, they had almost five hundred thralls, and over a hundred ghouls these days. The Carthians didn't have as many, but then again, maybe they were better at hiding it than the Invictus suspected they were.

“Are you sure you want your childe out there, Mister Mire?” Michael said, standing beside him and looking down at the many Kindred walking about, arming themselves.

“No.”

“Then tell him to stay. All other Kindred his age, and those well above, aren't going out there.”

That was true, of course. Jack wasn't even two years embraced, and that meant no one would judge him for staying out of these teams. But, then again. “He's a Right Hand, and that means responsibility. He's joining teams because he knows that, not because I told him to.”

Maria didn't agree, shaking her head. “Or because he's emotionally compromised.”

“If there's anyone I trust to keep their head when things get heated, it's Jack.” Or at least, that's what he'd like to believe, but recent events had put a dent in that theory. Jack wasn't as stable as he used to be, quick to anger, quick to argue, and now with his sister dead and mother not far behind, anyone would doubt him. Or, his willingness to be out there, hunting the hunters, despite his age and his predicament, would instill respect and renewed vigor in the other Kindred. Which way it swung would depend on the results.

Julias stepped closer to the glass, and watched the boy check the available armaments. In the old days, Ventrue never did anything with their own hands, always using slaves, thralls, ghouls, and other Kindred to do their bidding. In the new world, guns were a great tool, one Ventrue could take advantage of while the other blood clans used their talents. Mekhet always used swords, due to their speed and stealth. Daeva had the same speed, but the strength of Nosferatu, and usually used their fists. Nosferatu did the same, with the stealth of the Mekhet and the strength of the Daeva. Gangrel were as hard to kill as Ventrue, but could transform in a myriad of ways to unleash chaos, and turn that defense into offense.

The other clans were meant for direct confrontation. The Ventrue were not. They used Dominate to turn unsuspecting victims into slaves, bodyguards, sometimes unwitting spies. That all changed with the invention of guns allowing Ventrue to engage at a distance. Anyone could do a lot of damage to a vampire with a shotgun, especially if they got their hands on acidic shells; the wonders of technology. And, of course, flamethrowers turned any Kindred into a harbinger of death.

Michael's phone rang. "Hello? ... you serious? Hold on." He covered the receiver, and looked to Maria and Julias. "Jessy's in the lobby, says some of the dogs want to get a peek at what's going on down here."

Maria, growling like an angry badger, lowered her eyes to her tablet. "Why?"

"Jess says they want to know what sort of weaponry we have. A show of good faith."

Julias groaned, not too far off from Maria's noise. "What could they possibly gain by knowing what weapons we have?"

The big guy shrugged. "Probably want to confirm, make sure we're not bluffing."

It was just an armament room, meant for standard loadouts. Of all the things Kindred were capable of, of all the things the Invictus were capable of, this was hardly the most dangerous stuff. Secrets capable of toppling massive corporations, experimental weapon designs that incorporated Kindred abilities, potential plans for hostile and non-hostile takeovers of various parts of Dolareido, and many of Xnomina's illegal activities, were found in different places in the building's data centers. Then again, knowing Uratha, they didn't have a hacker, or anyone who understood tech. The damn wolves understood violence, and only violence.

That was better than the Begotten understanding nothing but fear, he supposed.

"Let them in," he said. It was a power play, Avery proving that she could get her way when she wanted, because they needed her. She was right.

Michael nodded. "Jessy, let them in. Keep an eye on them ... What? Why is he here? Fuck. Fine."

---

---

~~Eric~~

The city waited to one side of him, the forest on the other. He sat upon a shore of pebbles of a small river, the same river where a monster had leapt from to attack him. Good enough reason to get away from the river, but instead, he sat there, and waited. It wasn't safe there. The monster might come again. Or not, if Fiona was right, and the strange barriers they burrowed through to reach him were damaged and uncrossable in his area. But, when he was dreaming, was he still in that area, where his body was, in a bed? Was his mind, or soul, actually outside of his body, drifting around and pushing against the boundaries of their world?

He didn't think so, before. In the past, he assumed dreams were just neurological hallucinations. Now, he was half convinced dreams were out-of-body experiences, reaching across ... something, to somewhere, somehow.

He howled at the moon, as any wolf did. If the monster came for him, this time he would be ready for battle. This time he'd summon the gift given to him, and bite into the creature of nightmares, until it was no more. Clara had hurt it, in its nightmare. Maybe he could hurt it here, in his dream.

I need to be able to dream without worry of nightmare invasions, right?

Indeed.

Oh, it's you again. You vanished when a monster infiltrated my mind, my dreams. Left me to die.

I didn't leave you. I will never leave my children. I was blocked by that monstrosity of the human mind.

Children?

Your understanding of the world is so small, Eric Tanverson. If only you knew about the places, the worlds beyond, the things between, the eyes and teeth waiting for anything that dares to step beyond their boundaries. The steps I take to keep it all from collapsing, this Fallen World that struggles to exist ... it is not important, not to you. But know that you are one of the Forsaken, Eric, as are your brothers and sisters. Do your duty, and keep balance between the Shadow and the Material.

You didn't answer my question, and you only add more.
Forsaken?

Do your duty, Eric, child. Your predecessors broke the world, and you inherit the sins of your ancestors. And when the fury, or pain, or oceans of misery overwhelm you, remember: breathe. Center yourself, and bathe in its strength. I have gifted you power, and you are to use it. Or don't, and be lost to its madness.

He snarled as he started to pace the river, looking down at the reflection of the moon upon its small waves. The moon was talking to him, and he was demanding the moon answer his questions. Pretty fucked up.

And if I want to use that power for whatever the fuck I want?

There will be consequences. But it is up to you, what you do with the power of the spirit I have placed within you. Be warned though, if you continue to resist my orders, if you continue to avoid the duty of the Forsaken, I will strip you of many things. The spirit of the wolf will remain, and so too the hunger for violence and flesh, but there will be no more words from me. Cahalith no more, you will be.

And ... if I want to use that power, to have strange sex with a real hot, fun vampire?

If a moon could laugh, it must have sounded like what filled his ears, and his dream. The wind spun around, the clouds whipped away, the river quivered, and the forest beside him twisted. The birds squawked and chirped, and the city beyond went silent, so the forest could make its sounds.

Be careful, Eric.

Yeah, I know. When I'm in that form, the urge to fight and feast is overwhelming, but channeling that into sex with Jessy is—

Be careful, Eric. This forest of metal and concrete will become a fissure, and things beyond reckoning will crawl up from the depths, clawing at the cracks opened for them. If that comes to pass, no words will be able to describe the hell wrought.

---

Yeah, his dreams were weird. He was talking to some sort of alien entity, except it was in his head, and their back and forth wasn't words so much as intersecting thoughts. Forsaken? Children? The Fallen World? The fuck was any of that?

Groaning, he reached over for Kat, and stroked her around the ears. Purring like a motor in seconds.

“Kat, don’t ever ... get crazy on me, would you? I can only handle so much crazy right now.”

More purrs. If there was one thing he could trust in his life to be consistent, reliable, and loving, it was Kat.

As the sun started to set, he stepped into the shower. Another night at Bloodlust, another night wondering what the fuck he was doing with his life.

That kid, Jack. His mom was in the same hospital as Eric’s dad. Unlike his dad, she’d been put there for legit reasons. It almost made him feel embarrassed to visit his old man, when other people were dying in there because of real problems. Getting stabbed an absurd amount of times? A real problem. Refusing to take care of yourself and giving up on life? Not a real problem.

Christ, he needed to let this go. Course, doing that would be difficult while he put in the money to keep the old man alive.

He turned on the shower, took a breath, and let the hot water wash over him. No matter how many reassurances he was given that thralls were watching this building like a hawk, with snipers and multiple levels of digital surveillance, it was hard to feel completely comfortable. His territory was safe, but only relative to other places in Dolareido. Maybe he should find a hole in the ground to sleep in? Jessie said some Kindred did that, found random places to dig in and bunker down for the day.

Don’t do that. You don’t have any practice in that sort of shit. You’re a city boy, through and through. A forest of metal and concrete, right? More like a jungle.

Groaning louder, he set both palms to the wall, and let the water flow over his naked body. Jessy didn't fuck him last night. First night in a while he didn't have an orgasm. Honestly, he'd been happy for the break. Learning about the kid's family had yanked the sex mood out of him, anyway.

Knocks at the apartment door. He stood up straight, but rolled his eyes as the door opened, hinges giving away how quickly, and how far; it was Jessy.

"Yo Eric!" she called out. "Ah, shower. Awesome." And in to the massive bathroom she came, no hesitation, no warning.

It made him smile.

"Hey."

"So, I'm heading out to do another sweep of North Side with Hella and Jonah. And I want you to come with."

"Figured you might ask that." Time to see how this relationship was going to work, when her vampire life started to affect his. "Why should I do that?"

"Oh, hardball? I get it." Winking at him, she threw off her blouse, and Blushed Life as she took off her bra with all the grace of a bulldozer.

"Uh, not looking to trade work favors for sex favors." God damn it, she knew his weakness. Not that it was a secret, that men had a second brain, one in their dick, and this brazen woman was going to delight in exploiting how stupid that second brain was. Lemming off a cliff.

“Not trading. This is gamesmanship.” She tossed aside her suit pants and underwear along with her socks, so she was completely naked. The abs, the large breasts, the curvy and muscular legs, tiny waist, the extreme hourglass figure of an athlete meets model, it was too much. And while some guys didn’t like muscle on their girls, to him, she looked fucking amazing.

Winking at him, she got down onto her knees, in front of him. His second brain kicked into overdrive immediately, pulling all blood out of his first brain, and moving it into his penis instead. God damn it.

“Gamesmanship?”

“Yeap. It’s like bribing, except less blatant. Besides, you think I don’t enjoy this?” As the water flattened her beautiful, short blonde hair to her head, she smiled up at him as she set one hand on his thigh, and wrapped his cock in the other. “The look on a man’s face when a girl goes out of her way to give him a blowjob? It’s like I can see Christmas morning in your eyes.”

“Yeah, it’s definitely a gift I can’t imagine a guy ever getting sick of.” He let out a long, slow sigh, as the deadly vampire set her lips onto the swollen head of his length. Ten seconds and he was hard. “You’re ruining your make up.”

“Meh. I’ll touch up before we leave.” She slid her lips further along his glans, and as she started to work her kiss back and forth along the base edge of the bulbous shape, she worked his length with her hand, squeezing and massaging. He wasn’t going to last long, at this rate.

“Still think I’m leaving?”

“Mhmm,” she said, still sucking him off.

“Seriously though, you’re asking me to risk my life hunting down —”

“Hunting down some fuckers who want to kill you, too.” Pulling off of him, she leaned down underneath his cock, and set it along her face so her lips found where his testicles connected to it. Letting the weight of it press on her face, her other hand still holding it, she gave it a long, slow lick, drawing paths with her tongue, before she started to kiss and suckle the underside of his cock’s head. Ok, maybe she did want this to last a little longer than two minutes, if she was going to start teasing him.

“That is true, I suppose.”

“Besides, this is networking. You gotta at least know what that is.”

“How is this going to be networking?” He struggled to keep the groans out of his voice. But, god damn, she was an expert. As she stroked him, grip snug and firm at the base of his length, her lips engulfed the whole of his glans again, and her sucking kiss worked back and forth along the sensitive, swollen skin. The sparks were already starting to build.

“Cause I’m taking you to Xnomina. You’ll meet some of the other Kindred, and get to know them. Make some friends, even.” Nodding with the infinite wisdom of her words, she slid her face under his shaft again, kissing and licking his engorged glans from underneath. With hot water pouring over his body, flowing down over his chest and abs, the splashes hit her and his cock, but the heavy drops of his precum were thick enough he could see them. Thick, almost clear, and heavy, oozing from his ripe glans and down onto her lips.

When she slid her lips back over his cock, spreading his precum around the dark, aching head of his length, the heat began to build between his legs, matching the hot water of the shower.

A moment later, he was cumming into her mouth.

“Ach! Ugh, gross.” Rolling her eyes, she laughed as she leaned back, let his cum fall out of her mouth, and spread across her chest and breasts, before she started sucking on his cock again. This time, she stayed to the side, keeping the tip aimed at her cheek so the streaks of white fluid ran down over her jaw and neck in the hot water, as she suckled on his glans. “Should tell me when you’re going to cum.”

“Sorry. Kind of distracted by the babe who waltzed into my bathroom and decided to give me a random blowjob, at—” His eyes rolled up for a moment, and he struggled to keep down a groan, as a wave of sparkling bliss rolled up and down his length. She was so damn good, milking him with her grip, as she suckled and licked on his swollen tip.

“Well, I can’t swallow werewolf cum, or anyone’s cum for that matter! Can’t digest it. At least with a vamp’s, it fades to dust before it comes an issue.” She didn’t stop pleasuring him as she spoke, and he shivered as she kept his cock snug to her lips so each word was said into the sensitive skin, lip movement included. “K, there, satisfied?” She stood up with a bounce, pushed him back so his back was to the wall, and she stepped under the falling water. With an obvious, manipulative smile on display, she ran her fingers down her neck where water hit her, helping wash his cum off her skin.

“I, uh, could go again.”

“Bet you could. Christ, being a werewolf agrees with you, horny as fuck all time.” Even as she said it, she cupped both of her breasts in her palms, and bounced them, hard nipples pointed at him. “But, you should finish up.”

“I’d like to, but a rather hot woman is in my shower, showing off her huge rack.”

Laughing, she leaned in, and set a quick kiss on his lips, pressing her breasts into his chest until they were squished. Soft, large, with the firmness of muscle behind them. “All vamps are fucking beautiful and sexy, aren’t we? We only embrace the gorgeous. You must feel spoiled rotten.” She set her lips onto his neck, and let her fangs come out just enough so she could pierce his skin a little. And as she did, she wrapped her hand around his cock again; still hard.

“H-Hey, gonna suck my blood? Thought we were heading out.”

“Just a quick nip. Payment, for the blowjob and the handjob.”

“I—” Nope, couldn’t talk. Hell, he could barely stand, when she sank her fangs into his neck, and started to jack him off with a good, fast, firm rhythm any man with a history of self-loving was familiar with. A perfect rhythm, to work toward a quick orgasm.

“You taste so fucking good.” She groaned onto his neck as she stroked him, pressing her body into him at the same time, making a blatant show of rubbing her breasts into his body. Nipples that could cut glass.

He wanted to say something, but the feel of the Kiss relaxing his muscles, sending pulsing pleasure through his being, and exciting his nerve endings so his member flexed in her hand, was overwhelming. He set his hands on her hips, and did his best to stay standing, as she brought out a record speed second orgasm. And to make things even harder for him, she made sure to press his cock’s tip along her skin, her thigh and hip, and rubbed it against her abs. Painting her own skin with his cum, and making sure his orgasm sent waves of pleasure through him as she rubbed the swollen, dark skin against her own.

“Ok, two down. Should be enough payment for a bit of blood, right?” Panting, smiling, she stepped back, and grinned an evil grin as she lowered her hands to her stomach, and traced her fingers through his cum as the water washed it away.

“Y-Yeah, sure. I ... fuck, I’m gonna need some food before we leave.”

“So you are coming!”

“Fuck, I guess I am.” Shit. Shit shit. He was weak, controlled by sex like a typical man. God damn it. But, he didn’t really disagree with her original proposition either.

He shut off the water, grabbed a towel, and started drying himself. She watched. For a moment, he felt like a slab of meat on a plate, like the one he was about to fix himself; a sexy slab of meat at that. That look in her eye, a hungry look, was almost enough to get him hard again, and he was sure if he walked up to her, and started to touch her, he would be. Two orgasms and a cup of blood gone, and a part of him wanted to pin her down and do things to her. This was insane.

And she knew it. No hiding that his new body came with an appetite, an insatiable one.

He threw the towel at her. “I can see you’re horny too, you know.”

“I know, right? Always been that way. Just a touch, and my skin lights on fire. And after a Kiss? Wet and ready to fuck.” Winking at him, she put on a very blatant pose, sticking one smooth, toned leg out, and ran the towel up and down its curves. “And I look more fucking amazing the hornier I get.”

“Yeap, you definitely do.” He should be walking back to his room to put on some clothes, but there was something too sexy about watching a woman dry herself off, especially when she was blatantly aroused. Her nipples were top hats. “You don’t want ... some help with that?”

“No time. If you’re gonna get me off, I’d want to go for a good while.” She shrugged her shoulders back a few times, and like magic, stopped Blushing Life. Her nipples flattened to her large breasts, her already small waist sucked in a little more, and her skin, beige with life, turned a few shades whiter. Her cheeks sunk in, just a little, and her nipples and lips turned a few shades darker.

Still fucking gorgeous, but the animal in him could tell she was now, officially, a walking, talking corpse.

“Wish I could turn off my arousal with a finger snap.”

“And I’m glad you can’t. If you could, I couldn’t do this.” She started drying her breasts, and she made sure to bounce each of them, several times, so the softness of them rippled with impact against the towel. Naturally, he stared, blinking, eyes locked to the sight. “Girl’s gotta use what she can to get ahead.”

“... you sound like a city girl trying to sleep her way into Hollywood.”

“Ha! I know, right?” Shrugging, she threw the towel back at him, and slid into her socks and pants. Without skipping a beat, she walked up to his mirror, pulled a kit of makeup out of the drawer, and got to work. “Just fixing up a bit. Hurry up, eat something.”

He laughed. He didn’t know she put her makeup kit in there. Sneak moving into his place.

“Yes ma’am.” He watched her for a little while longer. Beautiful woman, touching up her makeup in his mirror? The fact she was wearing suit pants around her large, curvy butt and thick, powerful legs, while standing there topless with her breasts hanging underneath her while she leaned forward, was perfect. If he had a camera, he’d be tempted to take a picture.

Opening the bathroom door led to an assault of meows. Jessy’s arrival had summoned Kat, but she’d been quiet and patient, waiting outside the bathroom. She offered the vampire a ‘hello’ meow, as per usual, before she started following him as he went to his bedroom.

“What am I wearing?” Might as well ask her.

“Whatever you feel most comfortable fighting in.”

“You assume we’ll be fighting? You went on a sweep last night and found nothing, right?”

“Yeah. But I got a feeling we’ll find something soon. Maybe not the hunters’ main group, but something worth tussling over.” She followed after him, fully dressed again, and squatted down to pet Kat, though without picking her up. Didn’t want hair on her suit, no doubt. Understandable. And Kat seemed to be picking up that suits were a no go for rubbing. Thank god she wasn’t like most cats, who considered things they weren’t supposed to do, a God-given challenge to always do. “You strike me as a regular pants and shirt kinda guy.”

“Yeah, that’s true. Sheryl used to dress me up fancier, but, I never enjoyed it.” He fetched some simple light blue jeans and a white shirt, one with buttons, and some dark hiking boots that fit nicely under the pants. If there was going to be lots of walking on a regular basis from now on, dress shoes didn’t really make much sense. “So, I’m going to help the Invictus out, I guess.”

“For these sweeps, yeah. Anything else can be negotiated.” Laughing, she came up to him, and kissed him. Not the quick sort of kiss she usually did, but something longer, something with some weight to it.

“What was that for?”

“I’m feeling clingy.”

“You? Thought only girls got clingy.”

Laughing, she shoved him hard enough to send him flying a little further than he expected. He tripped backward and fell onto his bed, bounced a few times, and managed to sit up. She was smiling at him.

“I am a girl!”

“You sure?”

“I got the tits and ass to prove it.”

“Pretty sure you put tomboys to shame with your sheer ... tomboyness.”

“Tash said the same thing. Y’all just intimidated by a confident woman.” Queue a confident pose. Except, instead of something feminine, she went full macho bodybuilder pose. A lean and sleek feminine body, with the muscle tone of a warrior queen; and she knew it.

He returned the smile as he stood up, set his hands on her hips, and returned her kiss. Too damn adorable. She held his hips in return, and they kissed for a while. But her Blush of Life was gone, and without renewing saliva, he found he was kissing a dry mouth. She must have realized, cause she laughed as she pushed him away.

“Come on, let’s get some food in you, replenish that blood, and let’s make some friends.”

---

He gulped as he stared up at the Xnomina headquarters. A massive corporation, the sort that had surface-level businesses dealing with public-friendly products, and then a shitload of nasty stuff behind curtains. Knowing it was vampires who ran it, it made sense, and made him wonder how many large corporations were actually run by bloodsuckers. Certain movie-making companies, or smartphone-making companies, did the same, and it only made sense they'd be run by vampires.

According to Jessy, Xnomina and Dolareido were pretty nice on the nice-to-evil scale. He could take a little solace in that, at least.

“You know, I was doing pretty decent work bouncing for Bloodlust, keeping an eye and nostril open for hunters. I could—”

“Come on, you pussy. These are the people that pay you. And there a bunch of Kindred here who are actually going to be pretty afraid of you, cause Uratha are deadly fuckers.” As if to confirm, she gave him a buddy punch on the shoulder and a nod.

“I’m still a baby, in ... what, paranormal years?”

“Ha, yeah some of us call us paranormals.”

“So, paranormal years. Not sure I’m as strong as you think I am.”

“You kidding me? Christ Eric, when you’re in werewolf mode, any Kindred would need to be ancilla just to go toe to toe with you.”

“I ... guess.”

“That’s part of the reason it turns me on so much.” She sneaked in closer, and put a quick kiss on his cheek. “With my ghouls, it was always so one-sided. But with you? Knowing you’re dangerous, and could probably kick my ass if you really went all out?” Shivering, she walked up to the Xnomina door, and she made damn sure to sway her ass with each step. Not finishing the story meant he got to fill in the blanks with his mind, and she knew he’d fill it in with nothing but sex, with how she was shaking her butt.

He felt like a kid again, with all the good and bad that came with.

“I’m still not—” He jerked his head to the side and looked down the street, as a group of people walked up.

Avery. Clara. Arturo. Matthew. Noah. The others he wasn’t too familiar with, but if memory served, one of them was Monica. Two more Uratha besides them, whose names he didn’t know at all, and he knew their pack had a few more besides them that weren’t with them; probably gone to see the Carthians. Seeing them all walk together, wearing typical streetwear he’d expect of Carthians — so Jessy said — was enough to make him stand up straighter, shoulders back, and look like he was intimidating. Animal instinct.

“The fuck you guys doing here?” Jessy said. “We’ll come get you, same as before. And—”

“I want to see what sort of gear you’re bringing to these hunts,” Avery said.

“Bit late, don’t you think? Day two of these sweeps.”

“Been kind of busy. And enough with the banter, vamp. We’re not friends, despite your relationship with the new boy.”

Eric snarled. Didn’t mean to make that noise, didn’t mean to sound like an angry canine, but there it was, a full snarl coming out despite his efforts to keep it down. Worse, his snarl earned return snarls from the pack of dogs looking at him at his mate.

“Way I hear it, you got a boyfriend, too?” Jess said.

Eric pulled his head back at that, and Avery did the same.

“Leave Henry out of this.”

“Henry, eh? Seemed like an attractive man, for a human.”

Leave it to a vampire to come at you sideways. Wincing, Eric wanted to take a small step back. But he didn't need new animal instincts to know that'd be showing a sign of weakness. Stand tall, be imposing, all that shit that came as natural as breathing.

Just breathe, the moon told him. Breathe, if he wanted to stay in control, and not give into the animal hunger telling him he should get into a fist fight with these fuckers. Breathe, right?

The other wolves were breathing. Deep, slow breaths, each with fists at their sides, each with chest and stomach rising and falling together. It was blatant in the way they glared at Jessy, that they were doing the same thing as him, each breath struggling to keep something inside them contained. That's what it meant to be a werewolf he supposed, to always have something on the edge of your insides, fighting to get out, and you had to stay in control to keep it there.

He took a deep breath, and waited. Much as he didn't want to admit it, a part of him was kind of excited at the idea of getting into a tussle with these wolves. Would they fight as well as he did? How many of them did fighting professionally? He was eager to find out. Fuck, how long had it been since he was actually eager to get into a fight, just for the thrill of a fight, the joy of a fight? His new body, and instincts, seemed to agree with him.

"You seriously going to go after Henry?" Clara said.

"Nah." Shrugging, Jessy turned toward the building, and opened the front door. "Come on in. I'll give the boss a call and tell'em what's going on. Just don't touch anything, you fucking losers." If Jessy was looking for a fight, she was doing a good job.

Sighing, Eric followed in after her. He tried to make it look like he was upset with her for picking a fight and drawing the other werewolves into an aggressive mode, cause if he let her know it was exciting him, he'd only be enabling her. She was crazy enough as was.

Xnomina had, as you'd expect from any rich corporation, a very professional office building, the sort you might suspect of selling prototype nukes, or maybe stolen organs to the rich who wanted to replace kidneys and livers after destroying them with their bad habits. In a word, clean. Too fucking clean. He smelled the air, and got only a small hint of flesh; thralls, probably. In a building where vampires were rampant, all he got was the hint of ash and stagnant air. The black walls struck him odd. Didn't the Prince use black marble? It looked a bit different, but still, was it a vampire thing? The walls might as well have been slabs of black steel, far as his eyes could tell.

"Because," Jessy said into the phone, "we want their help, right?" Rolling her eyes, she covered the receiver, and nodded to the small girl behind the desk at the center of the lobby. She had long black hair, dark skin like Eric's, and was wearing a business suit. "Miss Pol."

"Madam Herrington." She offered a small nod, before she looked over at the rest of them. Compared to the two girls in suits, the rest of them looked like thugs. "Um ... hello. Avery, I presume?"

Before she could speak, Jessy waved a hand. "Yeah, I know we shouldn't let them in!" Again, into the phone. "But, it's just the weapons hold. They just want to see what if—"

"To see what we're dealing with," Avery said.

Jessy snarled into the phone with a glance back to the werewolf. "What she said ... Ok boss." She motioned for them to follow her, and started down. "Eric's coming with me too ... Cause he's a werewolf and has a nose? Besides, give him a chance to prove his worth."

Oh, lovely, arguing with her boss too, about him. Just great.

---

---

~~Damien~~

Damien raised a brow as he watched Isabella get ready. She paid more than a few visits to Hella, a few lockers down the room, and offered her lover a few kisses. Surprisingly, Isabella had on a corset ... shirt ... thing. It was something out of The Matrix, except a bit less action hero, a bit more exotic dancer. It had sleeves though, black sleeves to go with the black body, and at least those were normal. With suit pants, and a suit jacket over top it, it did look pretty badass, but also sexy. No doubt an aesthetic the Daeva had spent many years cultivating and mastering. Kindred didn't need to breathe, after all. No reason to not wear a ridiculous corset if it made you look good.

She slipped a pistol into her jacket, and one of the larger Invictus knives. And, one of the silver knives that Kindred were still under command to carry. Either a silver knife or some silver ammunition was required. Daeva normally did their fighting with their hands though, so a pistol and two knives did seem a bit overkill.

He looked over to Vicky and Parker, his partners for the sweep. Unless otherwise stated, their teams were permanent until these hunters were dealt with; made sense, so people learned smooth cooperation. He didn't like those two, though. They were the classic example of Kindred who did nothing but indulge in their vices. Lust, gluttony, and sloth if he had to wager a guess. They didn't do much to work their way up the Invictus ladder; or maybe they did, and he was just unaware of it. More reason to not trust them. But at least they were both arming themselves as they were supposed to.

Damien had his own sword that he kept with him, and he also kept one of the larger silver knives with him. A pistol as well to join the mix, in case there was need. He smirked at the memory of shooting Carter in his leg with a silver bullet. Rash, very rash, but Damien had felt a message needed to be sent: the Uratha didn't get to boss the Kindred around. It was a bad time to send that message, considering they were in a different world at the time, at the mercy of spirits and Uratha alike. Still, he was happy to have sent it.

He sighed as he looked Jack's way. The boy was putting on a vest holster, and was considering what weapons to bring. He had a small silver knife tucked in at the rib, and a normal, larger knife at the other side, while above them the two pistol holsters were empty.

"I suggest a fully automatic," Damien said, "and one semi automatic."

"Yeah, I guess. Part of me wonders if I could wield two pistols at once."

"Not if you expect to hit anything smaller than an elephant."

Jack choked on a small laugh, and tried to look Damien in the eye. It didn't last long. "I know. Even with a vampire's hand, shooting a pistol with one hand is tough. Shooting two with two hands would be horrible."

As the boy's eyes drifted down and away before he gazed at the rack of pistols again, Damien forced himself to not stare. Poor Jack. Why was the boy not screaming out in rage? Crying to the sky in pain? Damning the world for its cruelty? Perhaps he was, in his mind, as Damien had predicted; the boy was going to pace circles with his thoughts until he brought himself to ruin. He needed to express his sadness, express his rage, or it would devour him. Fifty years of hiding included fifty years of repressing Damien's own rage, and it was not healthy. More than a few kine had disappeared, victims of Damien's wrath when he was no longer able to control himself. Jack would, no doubt, do the same thing given time.

There was a bubble around the boy, perhaps six feet wide, that everyone refused to enter. The news of his first family was known by everyone, and considering the boy's unheard-of rise to power, it was no wonder everyone was giving him his space. Even Isabella, who wanted to get the boy under her thumb using her feminine wiles, was giving him more space than she would otherwise. Gloria refused to look at Jack for any longer than absolutely necessary.

Every movement the boy made, every action, every word, had a weighted calculation to it, and it set people on edge, like an angry Gangrel. People knew to either give an upset Gangrel their space, or call them out on their aggression. What to do with Jack? No one knew, except to steer clear.

Except, Jack was Damien's friend, and he wanted to help him. How to do that? He hadn't the slightest clue.

The dozen vampires in the room of metal, lockers, racks of weapons and explosives, turned to look to the opening door.

"Jessy." Damien said.

"Sup. I bring guests."

"You ... do?" He raised a brow, and blinked. Confusion was replaced with more confusion, as a bunch of werewolves walked into one of their most secure rooms in the buildings, Eric included. "Explain."

"Just want to see what sort of weaponry you got," Avery said. "Calm down." Groaning and shrugging out her shoulders, she managed a nod to Jack — no one else — and looked up to the glass overhang room where the triumvirate were watching. Maria was in there, out of sight, but Michael and Julias both stood by the glass wall, arms folded across their chests, and scowls on their faces. Uh oh.

“That’s ... understandable, I guess,” Damien said. He looked at the pack for Carter; not there, good. Sighing, Damien checked the slide on his pistol, before he moved to leave. But he didn’t. Better to watch and see how this interaction went.

More vampires came into the room, looking to update their loadouts, or see what other vampires were doing, maybe get some advice from the older Kindred. Instead, they found the room quite full as a group of big, tough, burly types wandered between the large, open lockers, display blades and guns and explosives.

Clara reached into one locker, and took out a silver knife. “Nice to know you guys trust us.”

Jessy yanked it out of her hand and put it back. “We’re letting you in here, aren’t we?”

“You have enough guns here to go to proper war,” Matt said as he walked over to Damien, and leaned against the wall, opposite of the glass overhang. The jolly giant didn’t have his usual smile, and when his eyes found Jack, his frown increased.

Did everyone feel for Jack? The kid had made a lot of friends, that was true, but it was strange to see so many people respond to his plight. Would Azamel behave similarly? That would be a sight to behold.

The static of the intercom chiming in was subtle, but enough to silence everyone.

“The Invictus like to be prepared,” MacDonald said, leaning forward and hand pressing on a button against the glass wall.

“For a city that likes peace,” Avery said as she also grabbed one of the larger silver knives, “you prepare for war like we prepare for the hunt.” She gave Jack a glance, perhaps expecting him to chime in.

He didn't. His eyes were downward, and his expression was blank. Everyone expected him to be volatile, or at least emotional and miserable, but that wasn't Jack. Damien knew him well enough by this point to know the boy was pulling into himself. Hopefully Julias and the Prince would be able to help him. Maybe even Damien would be able to help him. How, he had no idea, but maybe.

Jessy showed off some of their weapons to Eric, too, and while she offered Jack a morose glance, she bounced back to her usual spirited self. How the woman managed to stay so happy and energetic, he did not know. A strange similarity between her and Fiona, to be sure.

Jack grabbed two pistols, semi automatics, and grabbed several magazines, one of which was loaded with silver bullets. The extra pistol was redundant, but after what happened in the nightmare, carrying extra pistols was becoming common among the Invictus. The chances you'd use the second one was minimal, but as their trip into the gargyle's chamber proved, it did occasionally happen where you needed it.

"Ready?" Jack said, looking to Clara, Isabella, and Gloria.

"... yeah." Sighing, Clara followed the small man out of the room, with the other two vampires to follow.

Avery wasn't on any of the Invictus sweeper teams, but she stuck around anyway, watching the various wolves partner up with their appropriate vampires, before leaving the building. It was clear to see the wolves weren't happy about the silver, but that was probably why Avery came, to see what sort of arsenal the Kindred had that would be problematic specifically for Uratha. Now they knew, the Kindred had enough silver to mow down their pack and make sure none of them got back up.

Bold move on the council's part, to let them see that. How desperate were they for their cooperation? Or was it to keep Avery from siding with Garry come some, hopefully avoidable, conflict between them all? A show of good faith to stay on her good side.

He hated these games. He hated the Danse Macabre. He hated how every move anyone made, was laced with extra layers of intent and information gathering. It was sickening. Seeing it as the background for Jack's suffering, how the boy waded through that cesspit as he struggled against his inner demons, would make anyone frustrated. It was a wonder Jack didn't start screaming at people to get out of his way. But, no, the boy kept his eyes down, and slipped past everyone, Clara, Isabella, and Gloria behind him.

Damien, geared and ready for the hunt, nodded to Vicky and Parker, and then Matthew. For a moment, he almost asked the giant man if he wanted a weapon, but he caught himself. When the violence started, Matt would be the first in the fray, and the last thing he'd need was a sword or gun.

---

The tunnels once again. Fiona was waiting for them at the entrance, and she hopped in place several times before running over to them.

"Hi!"

"Hello," he said.

She was so beautiful, and radiant, and blinding. It was still difficult to look her in the eyes; not for his antisocial behavior, but because the girl was smiling and vibrating with such joy, it was almost too much to accept.

She took his hand, and held it as they started down the stairs into the tunnels. He gulped. How could she do that so easily? It was physical contact. It wasn't a glance or a nod or a word, or a laugh or chuckle or smile, it was contact. To her, it was as easy as breathing, something Kindred had long lost.

Did he make that comparison before? He must have.

“How’s Jack?” she said.

Matt chimed in first. “He looked pretty fucked up. Really got that intense brooding thing going, except, with a hefty dose of sadness. Losing his family is tearing him up.”

“Aww!” Fiona let go of Damien’s hand, but only so she could put both hands to her chin and lips, as if she was watching a horror scene in a movie. “From the way ye say that, I wonder ... Matt, do ye —”

“Yeah, I know what it’s like.” He shrugged, sniffed the air of the tunnel a few times, and waited for Damien to suggest a direction. “I was just a kid when my family died. Died trekking over some rough terrain, far up North.”

“Awwwwwww!” And just like that, she took Matt’s hand, and hugged his arm. Which, of course, had Damien questioning everything. Did she touch Damien’s hand because she liked him, or was she like that with everyone? Arg, he hated not knowing.

She pat the big guy’s arm, and returned to Damien’s side. No more touching or hand holding, but she seemed happy to walk only a couple inches from him. Good? Bad?

Damien, you’re an idiot. You went on a date. She’s probably looking for you to ask her on another date. Then why didn’t she ask? Because you’re the man. So? Genders have different proclivities, Damien.

He shook his head and scrunched up his face until the thoughts faded. Now was not the time to have a debate about the roles of genders, in his head.

~~Natasha~~

“Mister Mire?” she said into her phone.

“Come on Natasha, you know I never cared for the formalities.” His voice was his usual calm, deep, confident self.

She stood in the Elysium Tower, and sighed, loud enough she knew Julias could hear her. It was one of the rooms where Antoinette kept various weapons, a small room with many hooks upon metal walls to hold an assortment of deadly tools. It was nothing compared to the Invictus armament room for size, but it offered the same tools: knives, swords, pistols, shotguns, even grenades and assault rifles. Holding the phone to her ear with her shoulder, she reached out, grabbed a pistol, and started examining it to make sure it was clean and operating.

“Sorry, J-Julias. I ... I wanted to talk.”

“About Jack, I assume.”

“Yeah, and ... and um, anything r-really.”

“Well, the Invictus teams are heading out now. I got time to talk.”

“I see.” Nodding, she turned around to look in the mirror, and adjusted her vest holster. A suit with pants, and once she was done equipping herself, she'd put on the suit jacket, and go join the witches. “I'm ... w-working with the witches. We're hunting the hunt-ters.”

“Yeah, Triss told me. How's that going?”

That used to be such an easy question to answer. They used to be partners. Now, they were borderline enemies, different covenants. Every word she could say she had to filter and make sure it was safe to say. It wasn't that she couldn't do that, but doing that to Julias was painful.

“P-P-Poorly. We're hunting them in D-Devil's Corner, but the chances we'll just stumble ont-to them are ... bad.”

“Tell me about it. But that's why Avery's helping us out; they'll sniff something out. And hell, even the monsters are lending a hand. Who knows, maybe they'll stumble onto ... some ... weird inter-dimensional nightmare stuff.” He chuckled after saying it. She didn't. Inter-dimensional nightmare stuff was stuff she'd gone through, fell through, had been rescued by Black Blood through, and took a stroll through with an injured, giant skeleton monster she'd dragged home through.

“How are ... things, with J-Jack?” After learning about the boy's rage issues, his almost inhuman rage issues, she had to wonder how much Julias knew about that. Of course, the man knew Jack better than she did, and the two of them did training together, and worked together and ... and he had to know.

“Jack is ... walking a knife's edge. I know a lot about being trapped in your head; I imagine most of us do. But that kid is ... he's ... got some demons to work through, and this whole thing with his first family is going to push him off. At some point or another, his Beast is going to sink its teeth in.”

“W-What are you going to do?”

“For now? Nothing. Jack's not other people; kid's a fucking porcupine when shit gets serious. He has to work through this on his own, to some degree. Maybe Antoinette can help him with these first steps, but it'll be a little while before my words can reach him.”

She smiled into the phone as she picked a silver knife off the rack. Mire always was too wise. He had a heart of gold, and a coating of misery to give it all context, like the tragic hero who'd lost everything in a previous life. No wonder a troubled, unhappy girl like Beatrice found an escape out of Hell with him. But that wasn't fair, chalking it up to only Julias. The tomboy really brightened her old partner's life.

She was happy to be working with Triss. The others? Not so much. Jennifer was manipulative. Othello was lazy, but old and strong enough to pursue his Daeva obsessions when he wanted. Aaron was unusually calm and contemplative for a Gangrel. The problem with that, was how much that made him seem like a stalking predator, quietly waiting for the perfect moment to strike. He reminded her of a komodo dragon, happy to wait, bite when the opportunity presented, and let inevitable death come for the prey slowly. Solid, deep, unwavering eyes.

Her new companions were an interesting, deadly bunch. There were some Kindred in the Invictus and Carthians that were harmless, by vampire standards, but she could imagine all four witches being deadly in the right circumstance.

"I ... I guess I d-don't ... don't relate."

"Course you do, Tash. The way you lost your first family? That—"

"That's ... n-not the same. They weren't m ... m-murdered." Horrible as those memories were, she could not begin to imagine the anger going through Jack right now, and with his admission of his anger issues, he was liable to snap. As rare as it was, draugr did happen, and if Jack became one, Julias would never forgive himself.

"You should come by the mansion before sunrise, Tash. We haven't talked in a while."

"W-Won't Triss be there?"

"I can tell her I want to hang with an old friend."

“B-But Jack, and—”

“Jack is Jack. Jack is going to lay out the details of his circumstance in his head, make a link web, and run around it until he has some sort of understanding. Only when he’s got a grasp on it, is he going to let anyone in. Like I said, maybe Antoinette can help him out in a way only a lover can, but she’d be the only one that can get through to him before he hits that ‘click’ stage.”

“C-Click?”

“It has to click, he has to understand, like finishing a puzzle. Until then, the worst thing you could do is dump emotions on him. Hopefully Antoinette can push through that, cause otherwise, Jack’s going to keep everyone at arm’s length. Porcupine.”

Sighing again, Natasha grabbed a magazine off the rack, took out the clip, and started examining the bullets. Silver. No, she didn’t need this when she already had the silver knife Antoinette got for her.

“Matthew was here,” he said.

“Oh?”

“Yeah, Avery paid a visit. Half to see what sort of weaponry we had, but half just to prove that we’d let her, I’m sure. Your relationship with him and Arturo going well?”

She smiled. Nice of him to remember, especially considering everything that was happening. “It is. They ... they’ve had r-rough lives t-t-too, you know? Something t ... to bond over. And they’re n-nice.” Very nice. Maybe a bit crazy once in bed, but for the life of her, she couldn’t help but love that.

She checked a few more magazines, ensuring each worked, and ensuring each had normal bullets, before putting them into her holster. Fully equipped, pistol, ammunition, silver blade and normal blade at hand, she was ready to join the witches in Devil's Corner. Same perch as last time.

“If I had known you were bold enough to have two boyfriends at once, I'd have ... you know what? I don't think I know any guys who fit that bill. You're lucky.”

She was lucky. Grinning, she started up the stairs to outside. “I'll b-be there. Later tonight, I mean. Should I invite Jessy? M-Maybe, reminisce.”

“Sounds good.”

---

Back with the witches. The four of them were sitting on an old apartment building's roof, legs dangling from the edge. Natasha didn't sit, though. She wanted to get up and pace around, not sit and be useless. Triss had insisted they were waiting in the prime place to spot potential hunter maneuvers, but it wasn't like the hunters were committing these rituals regularly, right?

Jennifer and Othello were dressed in very appealing fashion, of course, with lots of skin on display. It was strange, how both Beatrice and Aaron were more comfortable in typical Carthian streetwear, while Jen and Othello wore more expensive fancy clothes, but less of it. Othello didn't even bother with a shirt tonight, wearing thin black pants that were kind of baggy, and she was sure they were meant for the dance floor. A lot of muscle on Othello, and she had to admit, she liked his dreadlocks. Jen was wearing her suit mix again, with the white shirt open and black bra on display. She was very proud of her breasts.

Tash smiled, and looked up as she let her mind wander. Just a few days ago, she'd gotten within touching distance of Jack, fucking Antoinette's breasts. The boy was very attractive, a young man with as much definition to his body as Arturo or Matthew, just in a smaller size. And of course, the sight of Antoinette's enormous breasts, bouncing against his thighs, covered in cum, had been hypnotizing. Jack looked so happy in that moment, and confident too, enraptured in pleasure and more than comfortable enough to close his eyes.

He probably knew she'd spied on him. The boy wasn't an idiot, and knew she slept in the tower come sunrise, same as him. The Prince asking him to close his eyes was an obvious request for him to let Tash sneak a peek. Despite that, he'd continued to fuck the Prince's breasts, to the point Tash had run off, and the moment she found her boys, had indulged. What was it about cum on the skin, on the nipples, neck, lips, that was so arousing? These were not very feminine thoughts! Jessy was to blame, obviously. When in doubt, blame Jessy.

Stop thinking about sex. You went almost fifty years without sex dominating your thoughts all the time, and now was a good time to get back into that work-only mentality. There was work to be done, lots of it.

She shook her head out, and peeked over the side of the building. A couple of humans were chatting, boasting about a score, and sitting on some milk crates. She drifted to the other side of the building and looked down. More humans, three girls talking about a new building being built toward the city border, an apartment building. Listening a little more, they were looking for new corners to look for clients.

"M-Maybe we should go start investigating, eavesdropping on more kine?" she said.

Triss leaned back onto her palms so she could hang her head upside down behind her, looking at Tash. "That's not a bad idea. It doesn't get much darker than this chunk of Devil's Corner though. But, we could get down into the crowd if you want?"

“W-Will you—”

“Don’t worry, I can cloak myself fine. No one will see the teeth.”

Nodding, she came over to sit down again, and plopped herself down beside Triss on the outside of the group. “B-But, let’s wait for a little bit.”

“Sounds like a plan.” Triss leaned back out over the building edge, and set her elbows to her knees so her head could hang. A buzzing sound announced she’d received a message, and she pulled up her phone. “Oh fuck, this man.”

“Mm?” Jen said.

“Superman sent me an ‘I love you’ text. Randomly, no prompting. Ugh, clingy guys are such a turn off.”

Natasha gasped, and stared at her. “B-B-B-B-B—”

“I’m kidding, Tash.” The Nos reached out, and shoved her at the shoulder, hard enough to make Tash fall on her side. “Not about the text, though. Look.” To prove it, she held up the phone. Yep, an ‘I love you’ text, from the strongest ancilla in the city. Leave it to Julias to say something so direct, with bold-faced confidence. So sweet.

“Aww.”

Laughing, Triss put the phone away, started to bounce her legs on the building wall, and scanned the swarming kine beneath them. “How about you? You’ve been with those two werewolves for a while now. See that going anywhere?”

Uh oh, girl talk. She couldn’t do girl talk to save her life. It was never a problem with Jessy though, and she didn’t expect it to be an issue with Triss, considering how similar they were. But then, Triss wasn't the same girl she used to be. She'd grown.

"It's ... it's um ... I d-don't know."

"Two guys, one girl," Jen said. "Sounds like a recipe for confrontation to me. Men don't share."

Triss rolled her eyes. "And women do?"

"Better than men. Women are on a different wavelength." With a succubus smile, Jen leaned in to Triss, and set a kiss on her neck. And another, and another. Not Blushing Life meant the kisses were probably a bit dry, but that didn't stop Triss from rolling her eyes again, and smiling. She didn't stop her. She was enjoying it.

"Gender d-d-dynamics ... aside, Matt and Art are v-very comfortable ... sharing..." Thank god she wasn't Blushing Life, or she'd light up the whole roof with her blushing red.

"Well," Triss said, "I was talking more about romance. Lovey dovey stuff. But if you're looking to take the convo into sex territory." Through it all, Jen continued to kiss her neck, her jaw, her ear, while the two men kept eyes on the streets. Either they were very disciplined and determined, or a witch's life had desensitized them to the sexual display.

"W-W-What? I ... I d-didn't ... umm..."

Laughing again, Triss swatted Jen away. "Slut, keep your eyes out for anything suspicious." She looked back to Tash, smiling and gesturing over her shoulder with a nod. "Not to make light of the current situation; Jack's going through shit, and hunters are trying to kill us. But we need to blow off steam, and joking about sex? Good way as any. You know how often I found Jen here with two dicks inside her? Fucking, like, every god damn night, I swear, until she started sleeping with me and Julias."

Tash blinked, several times, and sneaked a peek past her to look at the boys. Again, all they did was watch the people below. It made her feel a little less bad about indulging being a little naughty, then.

“I ... I um ... they’re ... they d-do that with me, too.”

“Now that,” Triss said with a lick of her crocodile teeth, “is hot. There much kissing?”

“There’s ... a lot, of k-kissing.”

“Now I’m jealous.”

Jen laughed, and leaned in over Triss’s lap toward Natasha. “Have you tried controlling the pace, when they’re both inside you? I always found it very enjoyable.”

So glad, so so glad she wasn’t Blushing Life. “I’ve ... I’ve tried, b-but they’re both ... so big, and strong ... and werewolves are aggressive. Sometimes I can t-tame them, for a little while, but they eventually start to ... to move ... on their own.”

Triss groaned, or maybe moaned, and stretched her legs out in front of her as she ran her palms down her pants to the knee. “Choking?”

“... y-yes,” Tash said. Triss made more noises; definitely moans. “And, um, one time, they changed into this ... in b-between mode? Something like, half human, half werewolf. They were a bit bigger, and ... b-b-bigger.” Arg, why was she sharing this information? Well, it wasn’t like she wasn’t used to being bombarded with sexual details from Jessy, and with how much her life had changed, now she was spying on Jack and Antoinette. One could only be surrounded by sex so much before it started to affect how you talked about it.

“Something between human and werewolf mode?” Triss said. “Sounds like ... it’d be hard to fit inside you.”

Jen licked her lips, and leaned in again to put another kiss on Triss’s jawline. “Sounds delicious.”

“Jessy’s the one who’s ... b-been ... getting Eric to fully transform, for sex.”

Both Triss and Jen let out long, low moans. These women were crazy. Maybe it was a witch thing.

“That has to be dangerous,” Triss said.

“V-V-Very, but ... but Jessy is Jessy. If it means g-good sex, I’m sure she’ll risk a lot of things.” Laughing, Natasha looked back down at the crowd below. This was fun. Witches seemed to take serious situations with a slice of casual nihilism, and nonchalance. Now that she thought about it, the few times she’d run into Triss on a mission, years ago, the girl had a certain air of confidence that bordered on apathy, ease, or maybe carelessness. No wonder Jacob was drawn to her.

“Think you’re interested in that?” Jen said.

“N-No! No, um ... Matt and Art are already ... it barely works normally! And, um-um-um ... when they did that ... that halfway transformation thing, they were even harder ... t-to ... you know.” And again, both witches groaned with bliss. So lascivious, these witches. Not that Natasha could complain, considering what her sex life had turned into. “It ... it’s strange, for girls to be t-talking like this, isn’t it? Men d-don’t.”

Triss and Jen both leaned back, and gave Othello a nudge. The beautiful man turned to face them, eyebrow raised, before he looked at Tash.

“She wants to know why men don’t talk about sex with each other,” Jen said, laughing. Yes, it sounded silly, cliché, to ask a question like that. Girls liked to talk, about romance and sex and everything. Guys liked to push heavy things and fix car engines, and stuff. The thought made her smile, silly stereotypes that didn’t really describe Kindred all that well. Except, maybe, in this circumstance.

“Why would we?” he said. Tash giggled, and covered her lips, eyes wide. Woops. But her antics only earned a smile from the man. “Guys like doing, not talking about the doing.”

Triss frowned at the man. “Girls like doing!”

“Yes, but it’s not the same. Men thrive on it, you know?” Shrugging, the man shook his head, causing his dreadlocks to bounce around a little. “Give a man a puzzle and he’ll be content to work on it, alone, without a soul, for days. Women will work on it for days as well, as long as they have someone to talk to.”

Jen and Triss groaned and rolled their eyes. But, Natasha had to agree with him, honestly. Julias was always content to just do something, while Jessy had to talk about it while doing it, or talk about other things while doing it. Or talk, in general; not boasting, just talking. Natasha was always the quiet one, in the Right Hands trio, but online, she was probably the most social of the three. The internet and introverts fit together like a glove.

“I think,” Aaron said, “we should get down there, and start inquiring. Natasha, do you have the names of the two you found dead to the hunter rituals?”

“I d-do.”

Nodding, Triss stood up, and punched her palm. “Time to hunt the hunters.”

Chapter 82

~~Eric~~

All things considered, that didn't go so badly. Into the belly of the beast, and then right back out. He half expected the Xnomina building to bite him during his escape, but it didn't.

He groaned as he rotated a shoulder, and rubbed his trapezoid with his other hand. Course, that only redirected the pain back to the source, where Jeremiah had stabbed him with that fucking silver knife. It was healed, but tender. Were he still human, it'd be a big enough hint to not exert himself, but he was confident his new body could take the punishment.

Jessy was beside him, but he could tell she was waiting for an opportunity to take lead. She liked leading. Unfortunately for her, it was his nose they were following.

North Side. It wasn't a place he'd ever had to work, unlike his dad. Blue collar work, and a lot of it. A lot of abandoned buildings too, as the ages passed, and both companies and people stopped being interested in working what were dead end careers. The growth of technology into software, fashion, media, the explosion of automation, and all that shit meant less and less people were working in factories. That wasn't a good thing. Automation taking over the world meant people were losing jobs everywhere. How long would it be before cab drivers were all out of the job?

He sighed as he looked at the buildings they passed, the dusty windowsills, broken glass, old machines inside meant for God knows what. Making shoes, maybe? Plenty of North Side was slowly being re-purposed with large buildings meant to host company employees for stem fields and whatnot, but plenty of it still wasn't. It was like walking through a graveyard of the 1920s.

Jessy looked back at the two other vampires with them. Jonah LeBrun, and Hella Vendram. Nobody to worry about, according to Jessy. Easier said than done. Hella looked simple enough, a tanned woman, fit, slightly tall; a Gangrel according to Jess. Jonah was a different thing all together. He was keeping them wrapped up in some kind of invisible aura, something called the Cloak of Night, that made them almost impossible to see. Impressive shit. A black dude with some nasty hands, fingers extra long, with claws to go with. He didn't have pupils either, just solid black eyes, and his mouth was lined with very sharp teeth. Fucker probably bit down with the same sort of tearing damage of a piranha.

He was a Nosferatu. Jessy said they all got random, weird mutations that made them look — or smell — like freaks. This guy wasn't too bad off, as long as he wore some sunglasses, didn't open his mouth wide, and kept his hands in his pockets. Chicks like that Beatrice were a bit more obvious. What other deformities did Nosferatu get stuck with?

He sniffed the air deeper. He could smell old chemicals, something sewn into the walls, the brick and concrete, the plastic and steel of nearby factories and their interiors. No smell of humans, though, present company included. Vampires barely had an odor to them; made it easy to ignore so he could focus on sniffing out the hunters.

They stopped by the scene. The tire marks were still there, as were bits of glass, mostly cleaned up but some shards remained against the curb. He breathed deep, smelled, dug for the scents, and walked over to where the kid had got caught under the wheels. Nothing.

“You vamps really don't leave behind a trace, do you?” he said.

Hella shook her head, and squatted down where he was standing, looking down at the tire marks. “Nope. Just a bit of ash. Though, if you kill a really young Kindred, they don’t go poof. You get a decomposed corpse. Nasty stuff.”

Sounded nasty. With his new nose, smelling a rotting corpse would probably kill him.

He walked further, onto the parking lot where they’d stopped. Much as he had a powerful nose to help him track people down, it’d been weeks since him and Beatrice had saved the kid. Rain destroyed the odor trail.

“We really expect to find anything out here, boss?” Jonah said.

“Dotting the Is and crossing the Ts and shit.” Shrugging, Jessy nodded toward the prison down the street. “Plenty of other teams are already running South Side, both halves, and Devil’s Corner, and the tunnels. We might as well start out here, where we know the hunters have hidden out once before.”

Hella stood up, shrugging. “That makes me think they’re unlikely to come back.”

“Me too, but we have new information now. We didn’t know they had a Begotten working for them. We also didn’t know that Angela can’t seem to fucking die. We also didn’t know this shaman woman does crazy shit with flesh magic. New perspective.”

The Gangrel raised a brow, tapped her chin a few times, and nodded. “So we keep an eye open for weird, occult shit?”

“Exactly. Invictus cleanup crew weren’t looking for unusual shit. So, let’s do that.”

Everyone shrugged, nodded, and followed. It was as good a plan as any, he supposed. The fuck did he know about any of this anyhow? All he was was a nose.

Except, that wasn't entirely true. Not long after learning about what he was, some spirits had tried to talk to him, things in the shadows. It was hard to ignore that, hard to forget it. And the fucking moon kept telling him to do his duty or whatever, so it wasn't like he could ignore that either. He was supposed to be guarding the wall between the Hisil — a word he knew without knowing how — and the physical world, and culling problem causers. He wasn't just a werewolf, he was ... whatever was required, a tool of some higher power, to do some higher calling.

Christ, he hated that. But it did mean he should do more than just keep his nose open for strange smells. He should keep all his senses open, new ones included, to see if he could spot anything out of the ordinary. Elen was out of the ordinary, and so was that monster Sándor. He had to think like what a werewolf was, not what his childhood thought a werewolf was.

He kinda preferred the childhood image, a beast of mindless rage and hunger, not this weird border patrol dog on a mystical leash. Then again, childhood image didn't have him fucking a beautiful vampire on the regular. That was a nice perk.

Jessy took them to the prison. Eric curled his nose at the smell of some strange chemical, something the Invictus must have used to get rid of the blood. Not bleach, but something stronger, something they must have tried to wash off with water, but couldn't quite get rid of the scent. Better than leaving traces of blood, he supposed.

Jessy pushed the unlocked gate open, and gestured for them to follow.

“Been a while since I was here,” Jonah said. “Thirty years ago? Still kine, and barely eighteen.”

Eric chuckled, and smiled as he stepped into the prison, struggling to not make a few Dave Chappelle jokes.

“You were arrested?” Hella said.

“Yeah.”

“Why?”

“Had the audacity to look like someone else when I was wearing a hoodie.”

“I don’t—”

“He’s saying racism,” Jessy said, rolling her eyes with a groan. “Progressive as Dolareido is, it wasn’t immune to that sort of shit.”

“Isn’t,” Eric added.

She threw him a smile. “Isn’t.”

Hella nodded as she started walking around the civilian prison lobby, eyes scanning over the old walls. “Guess I really wouldn’t know.”

“Say one thing for Kindred,” Jonah said, squatting down and looking at the scratches in the concrete, “they couldn’t give two shits about the color of your skin.”

“Is it like that everywhere?” Eric said. “Or just here, cause of the Prince?” They all shrugged. “None of you know?”

Jessy walked behind the dusty, worn desk, and started pulling out drawers. “Vamps don’t travel much. Not like I can just take a trip to Los Angeles, and try out the local cuisine. How the fuck would I get there? In a coffin filled with dirt from my homeland, and a bunch of thralls and ghouls guarding me?”

That was true, he supposed. Kindred dying when in sunlight, and passing out come sunrise, were huge disadvantages. They were stuck. Going to another city must have been a massive risk, terrifying really, considering you had a decent chance of being woken up by someone opening the suitcase you were hiding in, in daylight no less. Even if a vamp had a far safer means of transportation, it was still a risk, one you had to leave in the hands of thralls and ghouls to manage in a crisis situation.

“Do the Invictus communicate?” he said.

Jessy nodded as she pulled open the gate to the next lobby, the prisoner lobby. “Yeah. It’s a complicated hierarchy, a large organization with different branches and shit. The council handles all that stuff, though. And to them, it’s all about two things: power, and money. They control so much of the world, but they’re really only concerned with getting local power; cause elders are paranoid fuckers. So they amass wealth and power, and turn the cities they rule into monarchies or dictatorships. Communication with other cities isn’t really in pursuit of any sort of major goal, just, elder assholes, being assholes, occasionally working together to be bigger assholes.”

The other Kindred winced with her words. If this were a monarchy or dictatorship, those sorts of words could get her killed. Brazen Jessy being brazen.

They walked deeper into the prison, everyone keeping their eyes peeled, scanning for any semblance of something unusual, something out of place, something the cleanup teams wouldn’t have bothered with. The first idea that came to his head was an occult ritual circle carved into a wall with a spoon. Some inmates did that, he was sure, but probably as a joke more than anything. Still, considering the weird shit these hunters did, a strange ritual circle was right up their alley.

So many cells. If walls could talk, this prison would have a lot to say, a lot of shit about a lot of horrible shit, probably. Nice a city as Dolareido was, it wasn't perfect, and prisons always had a mix of good and bad people, on both sides of the bars; his dad made sure he knew that.

Old beds were abandoned, mattresses looted with metal frames remaining. The cells were open, and the walls of concrete were filled with cracks. Water damage, and rat damage. Give a rat enough time, and they could chew through anything, supposedly. Considering how many rats and crows Dolareido had, he wouldn't be surprised if they could chew through the whole damn prison.

“Are ... are you here for me?”

Eric froze. He looked to Jessy, then Hella, then Jonah. Nothing. Couldn't have been them.

With a deep breath, Eric entered one of the cells, following the voice. Darkness. Good as his eyes were, seeing in pitch black was impossible. He pulled out his phone, turned on the flashlight, and squatted down as he scanned around.

He gulped, as the shadow moved. A tentacle-like limb pulled away from the light, leaving behind a fading trail of ink. The light struggled to penetrate the shadow around the spirit, and the black mass wriggled, and squirmed, and dragged itself away from him and into the back corner of the cell, underneath the bed's metal frame. Eric came in closer, pushed the light in closer, and the mass of black let out a wheezing sound. It had two eyes, black, blending in with the rest of its amoebous body, catching light and reflecting it. Two round, inky mirrors.

“... what sort of spirit are you?”

“You do not know? You are ... a young Uratha then.” The spirit managed a gurgle, a bubble of something coming out of its—it didn't have a mouth. Where a mouth should be, a bubble of black fell, splashing onto the floor before fading away.

“Yeah, you could say that.”

“P-Please ... d-d-do not ... do not ... consume me.”

“I don’t plan on it. Still eating meat, these days.”

It nodded, head a sphere of jiggling black sticking out of the rest of its slug body. “Young Uratha.”

“Eric, who the fuck are you talking to?”

Eric looked over his shoulder, back at Jessy. With a raised eyebrow, she came in closer, and squatted down beside him, looking around.

“You can’t see it?”

“Um, no.”

Jonah and Hella came as well, and looked at him with the same raised brow.

He knew why they couldn’t see it. More knowledge, more memories, something that dug its way out of the deep matter of his brain. They couldn’t see it because it was in between, in a state, in a place, that was in the physical world, but not really. Shurilam. Twilight?

He snorted, and the bubbly creature recoiled. Shit, he wasn’t angry with it, he was angry because a fucking moon god thing was responsible for knowledge he didn’t ask for. Damn thing probably felt he owed her. Her? Luna?

“Please, no eat.”

“I’m not going to eat you. Why are you here, in an old, abandoned prison?”

“Seriously, Eric, there’s nothing there.” Jessy leaned in closer, reached out, and ran her arm around where he was shining the light. Predictably, her arm moved right through the spirit. With her arm to contrast it against the light, it was easier to see now that the disgusting blob of oozing black, was partly see-through. Yeah, Twilight.

“A spirit’s there,” he said. “Looks like a ... no, it’s not a shadow spirit.”

It gurgled, and its big eyes stared at him all the more. “I am ... hiding.”

“Hiding? Why?” It had to be a shadow spirit, and yet it wasn’t. It was like, someone had mixed shadow with ink, or ... blood?

“Black Blood would devour me if they found me.” More blobs of black ooze splashed outward from its non-existent mouth, landing around its bobbing head, and disappearing into the black. “I ... I only here, to ... to sustain on the ... death, and blood, and black.”

Black Blood. Eric clenched a fist, and forced in a breath. Yeah, this gurgling little spirit did look something like Black Blood. Course, his memories were a blurry mess, having nearly died from his wounds when the strange spirit had come to rescue them. But, he remembered enough. He remembered the inky waves, and the strange, cold-but-not feel of it on his skin, as it pulled him into itself. Swimming, floating, Eric and the others had drifted in what might as well have been a swamp of death and decay, and ... shadow.

“Show yourself to my friends.” He knew it could. Spirits could manifest, become solid, or possess people; more knowledge that seeped into his consciousness.

“B-But, it is very draining, and I—”

“Do it, or I will eat you.” Course, he hadn’t the slightest clue how to make that happen, if he couldn’t touch it. The knowledge he was given, the words of the First Tongue, it was a puzzle missing many pieces. Avery probably had the rest of them.

Blubbering and sputtering, the creature shimmered black, like a TV with a bad signal, before it began to solidify. The vampires stared on, and as the strange spirit manifested, all three of them gasped.

“What the fuuuuck is that?” Jessy said, eyes wide. She slid a step back, still squatted down beside him, but putting a little more distance between her and the tiny thing. Not so tiny, he supposed, since it was about two feet long.

“Some kind of shadow spirit. But, from what it says, it’s got some blood and death mixed in there, too.”

It gargled up another blob of the strange ink, before it wiggled across the floor a little closer. “The ... the city, it ... it overflows, with those things. It is all connected to the Blood Tower, right? Red Tide, and Street-Tail King, they ... they feast on it too. You ... you should go deal with them! Help Flowing Sanctuary.”

That was a lot of random names. Questions for Avery, he supposed.

“Hey, slug thing,” Jessy said, “were you around when a young vampire went on a killing spree in here? Summoned a bunch of rats?”

It gargled another bubble, and dragged itself a little closer. “I was, I was. The carnage ... like a beacon. I came. Hid better.” It had no lips, or at least nothing that could make the sounds it was making. The sound came out of its whole body, instead of a normal mouth.

“Awesome. Tell me—”

“Trade.”

“ ... I’m sorry?”

“Trade. I help you, if you help me.”

Eric suppressed the urge to smile. He knew the spirit would try and trade, would try and work a deal. It’s what spirits did.

“You can’t be fucking serious. Listen here you fucking slug, I’ll rip open your guts and—”

“It has no guts, Jessy,” he said. “It has no blood, or organs, or anything like that. I ... do wonder what this weird abomination is weak to, though.” And it was some sort of abomination. Magath? The word floated around in his mind, but, he couldn’t place it, couldn’t put a meaning to it.

“Will not tell! Can not tell ban or bane, but ... but you want to know about the small one? The one the humans called Jack?”

Jessy, growling, stood back up and began to pace. She was handling the absurdity of what was happening pretty well. Given their encounter with Black Blood, and that Sándor monster, her capacity for insanity must have increased quite a bit; or, his had, and she’d been able to handle this level of fucking nuts for a long time.

“I want to know about the hunters that were torturing Jack. What happened after Jack escaped?”

“I know where hunters went.”

“And,” Eric said, “you want what in return for that knowledge?”

It crawled out a little further again, until it was no longer under the bed frame. Hella and Jonah both had their lights out, and they shined it down at the blubbering mess, their eyes wide and bodies squirming. If it jumped at them, no doubt they'd scream and jump back. The fact that the only source of light was a few phone lights, so the weird blob cast a wavering shadow into the black of the prison cell, was perfect nightmare fuel.

“Let me go? Leave me here. I hurt no one.”

This thing was afraid, of him. It was afraid of Black Blood, but it was also afraid of him. It really didn't need to be; not like Eric knew how the fuck to kill a spirit that could hide in Twilight. But if the creature was afraid of him enough to ask him this, seemed like a perfect opportunity to take advantage.

“Fine,” he said.

It nodded, and began to hover. That was enough to make everyone step back, as its inky, blubberous body rose into the air, and began to drift toward Hella and Jonah. It drifted into the hall, and the rest of them followed after it. Easy to do, since it was leaving a trail of dripping, inky spots.

“You said you knew Black Blood?” Eric said. Jessy winced and looked at him. Yeah, no one enjoyed hearing that name.

“Do not know, no. Avoid. They would devour me.”

Spirits devoured spirits. Devour didn't mean the same thing to humans, though. Absorb was probably the better word. He wish he knew more, but what paltry amount of knowledge was floating around in his skull, it wasn't enough for him to piece together the details. One thing he did notice, though, was how similar this disgusting thing was to Black Blood.

“You got a name?” Eric said.

“No ... not yet.” It looked over its blobby mass of a body at him, and tried to do something close to a shrug. “Maybe soon.”

It was a young spirit, that much was clear. Did spirits get names with age, or were they bestowed them by someone else? He didn't want to care about all this spirit shit, but he did, some part of him drawn to the knowledge and the ancient duty. Fuck, it was frustrating.

Eric looked back at Hella and Jonah, and offered them a small shrug. They tried to return it, but their eyes were wide, and still transfixed on the blob of ink with eyes.

“Where you taking us?” Jessy said.

“Not far, not far.” Hovering a few feet off the dark, dingy floor, it took them out of the prison. Eric expected it to stop at any moment, maybe point out some sort of secret passage, or symbol drawn into the ceiling. Dumb of him, when the Invictus had cleaned the area, and would have spotted anything abnormal.

It took them outside. He should have expected that, he supposed. It wasn't like the hunters would have been able to vanish from within the prison, unless that Begotten monster had done something.

“There,” it said, and an inky limb reached out and pointed to a building in the distance, down the road. “The red place.”

Red wasn't the right word. Bricks. It was an old building, some sort of shop, with brick walls and a sign over a glass door. A convenience store, maybe. Sign said ‘Danner's Stop’ so, he bet convenience store.

“I go now ... no follow? We traded?”

Eric shrugged and nodded. “Yeah, we're good.”

It offered something like a smile, which was creepy as fuck. And it offered a giggle, childlike, and full of black bubbles that fell and popped when they reached the street. Jonah and Hella stepped out of its way, as if the spirit were contagious with the plague, but it didn't seem to care. It floated by them, and went back into the prison.

“Same sort of thing as Black Blood?” Jessy said.

He shrugged again, and started walking, sighing as they passed under a street light. “I guess? It was a weird spirit, and I know fuck all about spirits. So either all spirits are weird and I don't know any better, or it's really a fucking weird thing.”

“Dolareido's a weird city,” she added. “So, I mean, I guess it fits right in.”

He laughed as he shrugged again. Maybe she was right, and what would be a weird spirit elsewhere, was normal for Dolareido.

“I really should pay Avery a visit,” he said. “Just so I can learn a bit more about this sort of shit, what I can or can't do. I—” This late at night, this far in North Side, there shouldn't have been anyone around. But, of course, there was.

His group stopped, and watched as another group stepped around a building on the street corner, jeans and t-shirts and piercings on display. Didn't take a genius to spot a bunch of Carthians, but his nose told him anyway, a draft bringing with it the hint of ash. It was more than the smell, it was in the way they walked, steps confident but quiet, the way their eyes looked around with a little more focus, less blinking, the way they didn't look at each other directly as they walked so they could keep their vision available. Every motion they made was a siren, announcing they were predators.

“Joe,” Jessy said.

“Jessy,” Joe said. From the way the man carried himself, leaning forward a bit with lips raised in a snarl, Eric guessed he was a Gangrel. Behind him were two more vamps, but without any telltale hints about what they were. A woman with tan skin and long black hair, another woman, black, with short black hair, curly.

“Eric, that’s Joe, Debby and Kathy.”

Eric nodded, managing a small I-don’t-really-care-but-I’ll-play-nice shrug. He didn’t want to deal with these vampires right now. Thankfully, they didn’t set off any danger bells in his head, no more than the younger vamps he’d run into had. Dangerous, but not so dangerous he was worried for his life.

It was the other, the fourth, that had Eric’s attention. This man was a werewolf, that much was obvious, and he looked like a young man. A white dude, short red hair, average height, with a fighter’s build, like all the werewolves had. But, he didn’t have the mass of Arturo or Matt, he had slimmer build, something agile.

Jessy growled. “The fuck you guys doing out here, Joe? And who’s this wolf?”

“Doing the same fucking thing you’re doing. And that’s Caleb.” The man shrugged, and nodded his head toward the prison. “Guess you took a peek. See anything?”

“Nothing.”

Joe raised a brow, and looked across the street to the open gate. “Nothing eh?”

Caleb snorted, glared at Eric for a few seconds longer than appreciated, and started toward the prison. “I smell something.”

Eric got between him and the path to the gate. “There was a spirit. It gave us some information, in exchange for being left alone.”

“What kind?”

“Dunno,” he lied. Seemed like the thing to do, based on Jessy’s reaction to their presence.

“No, of course you don’t. Why would you?” The man shoved him aside, and continued on. “Well, you promised. I didn’t. I’ll deal with it. Consider it a favor.”

Eric reached out, and set a hand on the man’s shoulder, stopping him. “Favor? It was harmless.”

“No spirit is harmless.” Caleb shrugged him off, turned around, and glared at him. Lip sneering, some teeth exposed, the man stared at him, growling.

Eric raised a brow, looked back at the others, and found only confused looks. Yeah, ok, no one got why this guy was being aggressive with Eric. Good to know.

“It seemed harmless.”

“So do many spirits, you dumbass. A little water spirit is adorable, splashing around, giggling as it gets papers wet, or fills a glass to enjoy the shape. Give it time, and it becomes a spirit of the Great Storm of the Thousand Waves. It rolls over through the Shadow Realm, unleashing tsunamis and monsoons, crashing and destroying with glee, whatever allows it to bury more things in water. It crosses the Gauntlet and does the same, spreading the only thing it cares about: water. It could create a lake, and it won’t care if has to sink a city to do it.”

Eric gulped. Ok, yeah, that made sense. And if that thing was similar to Black Blood, it certainly made sense to stop it from becoming that. Except, what bad had Black Blood ever done? Fuck if he knew.

“Sounds pretty bad.”

“Yeah, so I’m going to check it out. Now fuck off.” And just like that, he was gone, walking into the prison.

Grimacing, Eric watched the man leave, before turning back to the crew. “Hope he doesn’t hurt it.”

“It was a floating blob of black ooze, Eric,” Jonah said. “Why the concern.”

“We made a deal with it.” Shrugging, Eric resumed his walk toward the building it had originally pointed out. At least, until he realized Jessy wasn’t following. She was eying Joe.

“Ok, you can follow your doggy, and run along now,” she said.

“Fuck you, Jessy.”

“Yeah, fuck you too, Joe.”

Eric took a step back, and looked between the two Gangrels. That didn’t sound like friendly banter, despite how often Jessy would say things like ‘fuck you’ in a playful way. The harshness in their tone was telltale to some real, seeded aggression. Good a time as any to stand beside Jessy, fold his arms across his chest, and glower. Like a bouncer.

“How about you leave?” Joe said.

“We were here first.”

“You know that don’t mean shit.”

“Doesn’t it?”

“Course not. Besides, you were going ... here, was it?” Joe nodded toward the building they’d been heading toward. Lucky guess.

“Serious, Joe. Fuck off.”

There was history in their exchange. It wasn't just flat anger, it was implied nuance, and unsaid details. They glared at each other with intensity, far more intensity than people without grudges or a nasty past glared. And nothing got people fighting like a grudge.

Debby and Kathy stood at Joe's sides. Far as Eric could tell, both were too young to be deadly but strong enough to be threats, strong enough to be a cause for concern, to warrant his attention. Joe, more so, but none of them made him want to run.

That was strange, wasn't it? He'd only been part of this paranormal nightlife for a month. He should be afraid of these vampires who had decades on him. He wasn't. Deep down, where the wolf inside growled and howled, it knew if push came to shove, it could tear these fuckers apart. As long as the vamps came at him head on, fought him straight on, he'd rip them to bits.

But vampires didn't do that. Vamps came at you sideways.

Joe came in closer, sneering, and got in Jessy's face. Part of Eric wanted to do the manly thing, step up, get between Jessy and Joe, and push him off. If Jessy was human, he'd do just that. She wasn't.

“Looking for a fight, Joe?”

“Looking to get you out of here.”

“You know we're supposed to be working together on this?”

“Like the Valor bar, or the Martels?”

Jessy returned his sneer, and shoved him away. “Not our fault Carthians don't know how to be smart with money, or businesses, or contracts.”

Eric winced. Invictus being dicks and using lawyer speak to be snakes and fuck over the Carthians sounded about right. But, it wasn't like the Carthians would be so bitter as to—

Joe punched Jessy. The hard thud of a fist colliding with a face, with bone, resonated with Eric. It was an old song, the thud of knuckles on skin, the deep thunk, like punching wood. Movies always got that wrong.

It was a hard enough punch to send Jessy back and onto her ass, rolling a little, and hitting her shoulder.

“Oh fuck! My suit!” She hopped up onto her feet, and snarled at the man. “You really want to take me on, Joe? Think you're strong enough to take on a Right Hand?”

“Just giving you what you deserve. Invictus have fucked us over too many times, and I'm sick of it. I'm not going to forget all the shit you've done to us just because hunters are here.”

Jonah stepped up, but so did Joe's buds Debby and Kathy. Oh shit. Hella growled, and came in closer, but Kathy got in her way, as Debby did with Jonah.

“Guys, come on,” Eric said, stepping in closer to try and get between Jonah and Debby. “We're hunting hunters, not arguing about covenant shit, right? Maybe—”

Debby swung for him. He'd had people take swings at him thousands of times, and he knew how to read the movement. The way the muscle of the shoulder moved, the twist of the hip, the anchoring of the foot, all obvious signs. What wasn't so obvious was the amount of speed that came out of the punch.

He fell the same way Jessy had, but the sound of getting your own face punched was much louder, especially when it made your brain bounce around in your skull.

“Shut up, wolf. You’re a newcomer to all this, and you don’t get to say shit.”

“Oh hell no.” Hella threw a punch back at Debby, but the woman ducked underneath it, and slammed her fist up into Hella’s jaw, hard enough to send her up a foot into the air, and back a few feet to go with.

Recap time. Jessy had given him a basic rundown on the abilities vamps specialized in. Super fast, and strong? Probably a Daeva; or as Jessy put it, the true sluts of the vampire world.

Eric rubbed his jaw where she’d hit him. Blood on his fingers. He breathed in the smell of it, the iron, the life, and he licked it off his lip. Fact of biology was that girls didn’t have the same muscle mass as guys, even when both trained similar routines, and that was especially true for upper body mass. Girls didn’t punch very hard. Apparently, being Kindred changed all that, cause the punch she hit him with didn’t give a shit about muscle mass, testosterone, or other normal factors in calculating force. Something inhuman, something beastly threw that punch.

He got up, and began to change. Not all the way, didn’t need to go insane. Five forms to pick from, and he knew just the one to choose. The strange, alien words in his mind knew what to call it, too. He was currently in Hishu, and if he wanted to put someone in their place, become Dalu. Bigger, stronger. He grew a few inches in height, and grew almost a hundred pounds in muscle. Felt like fucking Mike Tyson. Felt like speed, and power, and aggression, and ... and hunger, for a little payback.

“What the fu—”

He drove his fist into her face, same way she did him. A little part of him told him he shouldn’t hit a girl, not like this, not with all the power and weight of his body. A much larger part reminded him she wasn't a girl, she was a vampire, and was fair game to have her face broken in.

He looked down at himself. His clothes were filled to bursting, like a good pump at the gym times a hundred. Hell, Jessy laughed and gave him a wink when she looked his way, and licked her lips, too. Of course she'd like it.

Her friend Kathy came for him next, and her speed was also a blur. But, instead of going for a punch, she reached behind her, and pulled out a knife.

“Whoa, whoa!” Jessy said. “The fuck do you—”

Eric stepped in, elbows in, arms up, and unleashed. Kathy wasn't expecting him to go on the offensive, which gave him every advantage. The knife didn't look silver, so he had nothing to worry about as long as she didn't stab him in the brain. Fearlessness, or stupidity, he anchored into a proper punch, and drove his knuckles into her face as well, straight on. Her own forward momentum helped drive her nose into his fist, and combined with the speed and weight of his punch, her head went back while her legs kept going. Clothesline. Her skull crunched against the concrete, bouncing twice, before the vampire unleashed a howl of pain.

Joe snarled, bared his fangs, and took a step toward him. But, the stupid man wasn't so stupid, and thought twice.

“Four on one. Not a fair fight,” Joe said.

Jessy threw her hands up, growling. “It's not supposed to be a fight, Joe. Fuck off. We're looking for these hunters, same as you. Now beat it.”

“Like I'd trust an Invictus to not use this as an opportunity to try and fuck over the Carthians.”

“Of course we will! And you’ll do the same. That’s how it’s always been!”

The two bickered and roared about their covenants, while Eric forced himself to breathe. The Dalu form was empowering, enthralling, and it pumped a myriad of hormones through his blood. He wanted to fight. He wanted to tear into someone. He wanted to sink his teeth into something that wriggled with life. Vampires had no life, but they sure as hell would wriggle if he bit into one. And—

He shook his head. Breathe. Calm down. His heart was pumping, each beat coursing an ocean of blood and desire through him. It wasn’t the same madness that took him the first time he turned full werewolf, Gauru, but it was getting there.

“The fuck is going on out here?”

Everyone turned as Caleb emerged from the prison to join them.

“Find what you were looking for?” Hella said, rubbing her jaw.

“Only the trail. The spirit is gone, and I’m not going to chase it. No point, yet. I’ll tell Avery and see from there.” Caleb marched up to them, and looked down at Debby and Kathy as the two vampires got up, both of them snarling and rubbing their faces. Kathy’s nose was broken, and—crack. She twisted it back into place, and the split skin healed over in moments. No blood. Vamps didn’t bleed like living things did, he knew, but the fact she healed a broken nose that quickly was impressive. Then again, it may have only been surface level, a show, to look tough.

“We’re just settling some old debts, Caleb,” Debby said. “Invictus are a bunch of corporate scumbags, fucking over everyone and everything.”

The other werewolf raised a brow, and looked at each of them in turn. “You serious? We’re kind of busy, aren’t we?”

Joe sighed and shook his head. “The hunter issue is a big deal, and we are working to deal with it, like Garry told you. But, we’re concerned with more than the immediate.” The stupid man shrugged, and stepped in closer. “Side-effect of being a vampire, always looking to the future. And the future? Terra Den is going to put Xnomina in its place.”

This guy liked to talk, that much was obvious. Big mouth, obnoxious, rough sort. Every word out of his stupid mouth had Eric aching to cave it in.

“I don’t give two shits about Xnomina,” Caleb said. “But…” The man reached out, grabbed Eric’s shoulder, and turned him around to face him. And, like Eric, the man adopted the in between form, causing his height to grow, his muscles to grow, and body hair too. A mirror image of testosterone, aggression, and a hint of fangs.

Caleb didn’t go for the sloppy punch. No, this fucker ducked in quick, arms up and elbows in, and sank a right hook into Eric’s face, hard enough he had to take a step back with the momentum.

“You,” the fucker said, “made a deal with a spirit you know nothing about. Fucking with shit you know nothing about, just like Avery said you would.” Again, the man came in quick, the speed of a trained boxer guiding him. The heft of his new body, combined with the pure, insane speed of his punch, forced Eric into the defensive. Arms up as well, he took the punch in the forearm, and the sickening thud preceded the pain, like an explosion and its shock wave.

Eric backed up, out of reach, and growled. Part of him wanted to apologize for stepping out of bounds, making deals with spirits. A much larger part of him wanted to beat this fucker into the ground for being such a colossal asshole.

“The fuck is going on over here?”

Everyone jerked their head again, as another voice added to the cluster fuck of stupid bullshit. Three more vampires came around the corner, out of the darkness and into the glow of a streetlight. A girl's voice, with two dudes beside her. Tattoos, jeans, piercings galore, every one of them had a bit of the poser attitude the grated on Eric. Except, maybe, they weren't posers. If what Jessy told him was true, and it likely was, Carthians really did live on the streets, embodying a punk rocker's dream of fighting the machine. For better, or worse.

They came in closer, smirks on their faces, and each punching a palm in a classic action movie sort of way. Ridiculous, but not so ridiculous, when backed up by strength.

"Carl," Jessy said, "you really want to do this now? I got to put you in the ground again?"

One of the men, a larger guy, white, bald head, enough muscle mass to make everyone step around him, offered Jessy a smile. "Garry's not here, and I'm itching to pay you back."

Ok, if this situation was any indicator, the Carthians really were universally stupid. And, right now, he didn't mind breaking a few stupid people's noses.

---

---

~~Jack~~

People were giving him space. That was good. Part of him wanted to try and be sociable, maybe let a part of him be vulnerable, like other people supposedly did when they were grieving. He did it with Clara, when visiting his sister and mother; a little, anyway. Doing it more would be impossible. Christ, it was so draining just being around other people normally, let alone now that he was a walking, talking, ticking time bomb. Every word had to be carefully calculated, or he'd snap and piss someone off, burn a bridge, or worse.

So, he kept his eyes on the tunnel floor, and his hands in his pockets as he walked. Isabella and Clara were ahead of him, Athalia and Gloria were behind him. Keep the young one protected from all sides, he supposed. Whatever.

"I really have to wonder," Clara said, "if we're wasting our time in these tunnels. It's not like we've ever found the hunters down here."

"Everyone hides down here," Isabella said. "Azamel as well, their target."

The werewolf shrugged, and stopped, last step ending with weight and preparation for an argument. They all stopped to match it. Oh great, wonderful.

"And yet, they've never launched an attack against her."

Athalia shrugged, and took the opportunity to take a break, leaning against the concrete wall. "Because they know we'd slaughter them if they came at us head on."

"Is that it?" Clara said. "Because, these hunters seem pretty well equipped, more than enough to go head first into any confrontation. In fact, I'd wager they have enough information to launch a direct assault on her, but refuse to."

"What are you saying?" Athalia said.

"I'm saying, something is not what it seems. Jeremiah wants to kill Azamel, but if that was true, he'd have launched a direct attack. Something else is going on between them."

That was true. The hunters weren't being too smart about their maneuvers. Unless—

“Unless,” he said, “they are blind. Could very well be they don’t know where Azamel is. They were trying to get that info from me, right?”

Clara shook her head, frowning as she paced around. “They have a witch that can use some sort of weird occult magic to divine understanding by sacrificing people. And based on what she was going to do to Eric, she was going to do more than just ... get a location. I’m sure they could find Azamel and go for her straight on, if they wanted.”

Isabella sighed, combed her hair back with her fingers, and shrugged. “What ulterior motive could she have? Everything we know about her, Jeremiah, and Angela, suggest they are only interested in Azamel. Azamel, and Jack, now that he has sufficiently infuriated Angela.”

That was true. But, he couldn’t help but throw Isabella a stern glance when she brought it up, and she returned it. Was she looking to start an argument with him? That wasn’t like her. Gloria said nothing, at least, staying in the back and keeping her small sword in her hand, drawn and ready. Jack didn’t expect much from her, when the bullets started flying, but maybe that was a mistake, when it was everyone else getting distracted by the topic at hand.

“Nothing makes sense,” Clara said. “I’m wondering if we should be topside looking for a trail, maybe in Devil’s Corner where those abductions happened.”

“Matt and Art visited one, and couldn’t find a trail,” Jack said.

“Yeah, I guess. But I can’t help but feel coming down here is pointless. The hunters are playing some other game, something indirect, something beyond just trying to kill Azamel. You sure you don’t know more about the relationship between Azamel and Jeremiah, Athalia?”

The monster sighed, and started walking. It took everyone a few seconds to get moving again, but soon they were back on the march, if only to hear what she had to say.

“Azamel and Jeremiah know each other.”

“Know?” Jack said. “How much know is know?”

“I don’t know. She’s been vague about the details. She hurt him, but she doesn’t tell me much about that.”

Jack almost asked if maybe there was a connection between Jeremiah, and the mysterious unknown thing Azamel warned him about. But, no, better to keep that secret until otherwise needed.

Fuck, he’d forgotten all about that. Some great, looming threat going on in the background, and all he could think about was the hunters fucking with his life and his city. The perfect opportunity for a looming threat to take advantage, and instigate their plans. Fucking lovely.

“Then let’s go ask her,” he said.

Athalia stopped, and raised a brow as she looked at him. “You know she won’t tell you.”

“Why not? She’s told me plenty already. Seems to trust me.”

“It’s personal for her.”

“Yeah well, I don’t care.” Shrugging, he motioned for the others to follow, and he started heading in her direction. Clara jogged up to him, getting a foot ahead of him; guard point. But, she smiled as she looked over her shoulder at him. Isabella and Gloria didn’t seem to care either way, and started walking too.

Athalia jogged up to him, and put a hand on his shoulder. For a second, he thought she might have been kind, gentle, maybe try and be nice about disagreeing with him on this. But, no, she squeezed it hard enough to make him have to shrug hard to throw her grip off.

“You’re asking for trouble, Jack.”

“Three vampires and one werewolf, and Fiona and Mark aren’t there. If she’s going to get violent, she—”

“I didn’t say she’d get violent. You don’t understand her at all. I meant, she’s going to remember this, and she’s not going to be so quick to help you out in the future if—”

“If she has any information about Jeremiah, and hasn’t shared it, then every bit of help she’s given so far is not enough. These hunters are—”

“What? The hunters are what? So far they’ve killed one vampire, and that’s it. While we’ve killed several of them, and—”

“That’s it?” He stopped, and looked at her. She noticed the mistake, pulling her head back and wincing, but it was too late. Words poured out of him like someone was firing a machine gun armed with explosive rounds. “My sister is a fucking corpse, sitting on a metal table, surrounded by other corpses! My mother is dying in a fucking hospital as we speak! Because of your fucking daughter!” He reached out, and shoved her. Hard. Little as he was, the importance of size faded away the more vitae played a factor, the more the vampire was willing to use the inhuman part of him to fight. And he was looking for a fight.

She stumbled back, but didn’t fall over, back hitting the curved concrete wall and hands bracing against it.

“You know that’s not what I meant.”

“I—” He cut himself off, and stared at her. She was glaring right back at him, half snarling, and with her back against the wall of the tunnel, she was half in shadow from the flickering light. Between the flashes of weak illumination, he could see the silhouette of her, the real her, that monster of death incarnate, of bones and fangs.

This Begotten woman was a bitch.

Sighing, he started walking, and Clara matched him. She was looking at him, eyes stern, but concerned, and he shrugged them off as they all started moving again.

Tension in the air, like a tightly wound guitar string. Someone was going to give it a good pluck, snap it, and someone was going to get hurt.

---

“Um ... what the fuck?” Clara said. The werewolf moved forward, and looked around, the vampires following behind her only after staring for a few minutes.

This wasn't the tunnel anymore.

“Athalia?” Jack said, looking behind him. Gone. Shit. “I guess we walked into a nightmare.”

“A ni ... nightmare?” Gloria said, teeth chattering. She stepped closer to Jack, and crouched down a little, making herself small. “I, I uh ... um...”

Jack looked beside them, at the white floor they were standing on. White stone? Something white-ish, carved, and small ravines were carved into it. They were filled with blood, spilling into a nearby river. They were outside? Jack looked up, and gulped on a dry throat, as he stared up at a red moon. It was close, very close, and it bled onto a palace in the distance, a white stone palace, smooth, with beautiful curved arches and domes, and many pillars. Indian?

If this nightmare chamber was some sort of twisted abomination inspired by India, then it had to be Azamel's chamber. Maybe. He gulped again, and stepped forward, looking down at the beautiful ravines carved into ornate patterns, converging, and flowing into the river beyond. It was as if the concrete stage the old woman kept her home on, was actually this strange platform of white stone, and beyond it, a forest lost in red shadows.

In the strange courtyard, there were guillotines. In many of the guillotines, were people. Most of them were dead, some waiting to die, all with dozens of lash marks. Heads were piled, flies buzzing around them, and nearby, corpses were mounted on upright, large spears, faces frozen with eyes wide, terrified, and mouths open, screaming silence into the stillness of the palace courtyard. There was a pool of shallow blood in the center of the courtyard, as still as the dead that surrounded it.

The corpses began to scream. The three vampires huddled together, Isabella included, and they stared around at the dead as their cries began to fill the air. The men and women in the guillotines began to scream more obviously, their sounds more acute, and their blood gushed into the ravines. The shallow pool began to bubble, churning softly, and Clara stepped up to it to peer down at it. Fearless.

A dozen trumpets blasting caused the four of them to jerk toward the river of blood beside the palace. Everyone's mouth fell open, as something began to rise out of the blood. One hand, and then another, giant hands, holding colossal swords. Two more hands, each holding a chain, one with a corpse on a hook, the other with a fishing net, filled with bloody skulls. Out came Azamel's head, an elephant head, and the body of a literal giant followed. Dozens of feet tall. So big, Jack had once stood in her hand. Its hand.

The sound had been elephant noises, not an actual trumpet. And, as the fat, four-armed giant walked out of the river, they all stared on as it eventually exposed human feet at the base of blood-soaked, silk wrap pants. If Azamel wanted to, she could step on them, and they'd pop like grapes.

With a slow glance down at them, the nightmare horror snorted a trumpet sound again, and walked past them, stepping over the shallow pool, and adopted a criss cross sitting position between it, and the palace behind her. Blood continued to ooze from the moon above, dripping onto the domes of the palace, and the golden spears that lined it.

Isabella and Gloria were frozen. The Mekhet had likely gone into shock, and could do nothing but stare with wide eyes and dropped jaw. The Daeva, on the other hand, had a little more courage to her, empowered with her ancilla years. But there was no denying the overwhelming terror of the situation, the absurd nature of seeing a literal nightmare with waking eyes, and Jack could see that daunting reality earn more than a few shudders from the vampire.

“Azamel,” a raspy whisper said. Athalia's voice, her horror voice, from somewhere behind them, whispered in the red darkness. “Jack wishes to speak with you.”

Jack turned around, and found the skeleton creature walking up on its hands to join them. Walking through the dark and into the tunnel, the flickering light and shadows, it must have hid the weird transition that was Azamel opening this chamber. It was weird how these monsters did that, hid that transition, so no one got to see it happening. It just did, just existed, like that time he took stairs down into Athalia's nightmare. The opening had simply been there, when it normally wasn't. And, this tunnel had led into Azamel's nightmare, when it never did before.

It was a strange feeling, to have walked into a nightmare from the physical world. Almost like, as if he'd walked into a trap, the kind that shut the door behind the animal when it goes in.

“What do you want, vampire?” the giant elephant demon god nightmare thing said.

“I...” He looked over at one of the guillotines. The person stuck in there, on their knees with their head locked into the wooden neck binding, was squirming, screaming, and their back was flayed open. None of this blood was real, all a nightmare, all inhuman, but that didn’t mean his nose wasn’t getting hungry smelling it. “Can you make them stop? Trying to talk.”

The monstrosity snorted a trumpet sound again, and nodded. At once, all the screaming stopped, like a well orchestrated choir.

“Speak.”

“Alright. Um, first, I guess, is why is you nightmare open?”

“I sensed Athalia coming, and thought, given circumstances, it might be prudent.”

That did make sense. “And, I wanted to talk to you ... about Jeremiah.”

Another trumpet sound, long, groaning, before Azamel leaned forward toward them. The fact she—it held up its four arms in a pose, never setting them down, was impressive, and unnerving. It was like, she wasn’t a real creature, but a symbol of something, a tainted and corrupted symbol.

“I have told you enough.”

“No, you haven’t.” He folded his arms across his chest, and glared up at the damn elephant. “Every paranormal in this city is looking for this fucker. We’ve nearly died dealing with him and his entourage. Barry did.” A glance back to Isabella, to make sure she knew he wasn’t forgetting her student had been murdered, not just Jack’s sister.

“You have been told enough, Jack Terry. Do not confuse my aid with reliance. This is a cooperative effort.”

After all the shit she'd dumped on him, she had the fucking nerve to stonewall him now? Screw it.

“Tell me more about Jeremiah. And spare the misdirections and half truths.”

“No.”

Oh fuck this. Fuck this, fuck her, fuck everything. He'd been in this conversation for a whole thirty seconds, and he was already at the end of his patience.

“My sister is dead, you stupid, fucking piece of shit!” He raised a hand, pointed it at the elephant god, and glared until he felt the silent growling in his chest. His Beast wanted out. “Murdered! By this bitch's daughter! And my mom could be next. She's in a hospital bed, dying, as we speak, and for all I know, I'll come out of the tunnels tonight to find her dead!” A hand throw gesture for Athalia, too. “Because you, came to our city, and brought your trouble with you. I was tortured. I was cut into, beaten. I had to murder people to escape that, and unlike a fucking monster like you, that doesn't come easily to me.” Didn't. Didn't come easily. “I try. I fucking try to help you, play the game, try and give you a fair deal, but Julias was right. You don't deserve the help I've given you, pushing for you to get better treatment in every Invictus meeting, every Primogen meeting. You're nothing but a hungry monster, and you're not worth helping. Fuck you.”

If there was one way he was going to die, it'd be pissing off a giant nightmare god thing.

He turned, and began to walk in the direction they came from, toward the black and red forest. Hopefully, the dark patch they came out of, would bring him back into the tunnel going into it the other way.

“Jack,” Azamel said, “come, wait. I ... will speak of Jeremiah.”

He looked back over his shoulder at her. Everyone was frozen, eyes wide, and they were staring at him. Hell, even Athalia looked like her eyes were wide, and she was a giant half skeleton without any facial expressions. He'd probably nearly gotten himself killed right there, but fuck it, he was running on such a short fuse. Calm down, before you make things worse.

“Alright.” He walked back toward the group, and waited.

The nightmare god set down her two giant scimitars, her corpse, and her net of skulls. Reading an elephant's expression was impossible, but as the colossal entity let out a low, rumbling groan sound, Jack could only figure she was sighing. It was humanizing, in a strange way, seeing something that inhuman being bothered by him. Or, was she being bothered by the memory?

“Jeremiah and I were lovers, a long time ago,” she said. Definitely the memory, then.

Everyone gasped, like they were watching a cheesy soap opera. Not so cheesy, when happening to you.

“You're fucking shitting me,” Clara said. “You didn't think that was pertinent information?”

Jack half expected his two vampires to chime in, but Gloria was too busy quivering and staring at the nightmares around her, and Isabella was too smart to open her mouth and draw attention to herself.

The elephant trumpeted a loud blast at the werewolf, forcing Clara to cover her ears.

“Be silent.” Groaning the trumpet sound again, the nightmare god set its four hands on the white stone around it, and leaned in closer, so its trunk reached over the blood pool, and toward Jack. He didn’t step back, much as he wanted to. “I am hundreds of years old, but these last decades of my life have aged me far faster than I could have predicted. When Jeremiah was a young man, I looked a woman in her forties. Naturally, I seduced him. I was mayor of a town at the time, some hundred and fifty years ago.”

“Wait. Jeremiah is almost two hundred-years old?” Jack said.

The elephant monster nodded. “I will explain, but let me get there.” Sighing, the elephant looked to the side, and Jack ducked underneath the tusk. “You do not know the ways of the Begotten, we monsters of nightmares. The Dark Mother whispers, and says you Kindred are merely lost children, but you do not know her as we know her. You do not suffer the hungers we suffer. And, you do not battle that hunger.”

“I’m not sure I get what—”

“To satisfy my hunger was necessary. I controlled that city, and I made sure to crush any and all who opposed me. I ruled with an iron fist. I was just, and fair, and I relished it whenever thieves, relics from the wild West, tried to usurp me or steal from me. I hanged them all. I enjoyed it when others in the city tried to fight me for power, greedy businesses or do-well farmers who thought they could do better than me. I crushed them, ripped the power out of their hands, and kept it as my own. They feared me, the power I had, and I fed on it.”

“Sounds like you were a dictator.” And who didn’t hate dictators?

“That I was, after a fashion. I did not kill those who did not deserve it, or punish those who did not deserve it, but I held power and held it absolutely. Because that is what I feed on, little Ventrue.” She leaned in closer again, and with her head turned, her giant eye came at him, until he could touch it if he wanted. “I take power, and I ... and I ruined poor Jeremiah.”

Ok, if his eyes weren't deceiving him, that was regret in her one eye he could see. Harder to read her expression considering he could only see half her face, but she drove it home when she let her trunk sort of flop onto the white stone.

“Ruined?”

“He did not know what I was, and while we had a strange relationship, it was good. The man was a deputy, and quite devoted to the city and his sheriff. The sheriff, upon discovering what I was through his insatiable curiosity, attempted to push me out of my position. I forced him out of the city, my city. Jeremiah asked how I could do such a thing, and I explained, exposing my true nature to him. I was an idiot, and perhaps, a bit lovestruck. He left immediately, seeking the sheriff.” With another sad trumpet sound, the colossus sat up, and looked down at them all, four hands now pressing on her knees with how she was sitting criss cross. “With his sheriff and a band of men and women, they tried to kill me. So, I killed them. In this group were some of Jeremiah's friends, and family. But, I could not bring myself to kill Jeremiah.”

Oh. Well, fuck. Jack, wincing, looked around for a place to sit; there was none. Best he could do was look at the floor, and fold his arms across his chest.

“What happened after that?”

“I was no fool. I left, before hunters would fine me. I expected Jeremiah to grieve for his friends and family, and then continue his life. But something happened. I assume when hunters learned of what happened, and came to the city, he joined them.” She reached up, plucked at her tusks, and scratched at her trunk as she looked up to the bloody moon. “I move to a city, feed, and move on, surviving on scraps, compared to what I once had.”

“Sounds like you’ve killed people who didn’t deserve death,” he said.

“In self defense. And do not get confused, vampire. We are monsters, and to suggest that we should abide by human instincts or communal laws is absurd. We are predators, they are prey.”

He didn’t want to agree with that, but he had to, he knew he did. That was a conversation for another time, though.

“So, he extended his life somehow.”

“Indeed,” the nightmare said. “Every few decades, he finds me, and I am forced to flee. But not this time.”

“Because—”

“Because I am old, little vampire. Old, and I will no longer let this mistake, this thorn in my side, haunt my final days. And, if I can, if the Night Mother wills it, I will transcend, and become a true monster of the ages.”

Transcend? True monster of the ages? He looked up to her, eyebrow raised, but didn’t ask what she meant, no point. She’d dodge the question, or stonewall him about it anyway. And it was a lot of information. He couldn’t be angry with her for not sharing with him, at least, not in this conversation. Plenty pissed she didn’t tell him more when this all started, but it wouldn’t have changed things anyway.

“Thanks, for telling me.”

“You are welcome, little Kindred.” And, as if adopting a mask, she reached down, picked up the two swords and the two chains with her four hands, and resumed holding them out at her sides. “I am sure you can understand why I do not speak of him. The reason he hunts me, the past we shared, is irrelevant. He must die.”

Not entirely irrelevant. If Jeremiah was using some sort of magic to extend his life, that was information that could potentially prove useful. Maybe Jacob could figure something out? Life extending magic seemed right up his alley.

“I’m sorry, for what I said.”

“And I am sorry for what they have done to you.”

The pain in his throat and guts settled, and he let his shoulders slump with a long sigh. Either he guessed Azamel wrong, or she was a lot nicer in her horror form versus her human form.

“Anything you can tell us,” Clara said, “about Jeremiah? About, how he might try and strike at you? There’s no sign of him in these tunnels, and we’re wondering if there’s a better place to look.”

“I am sorry, but no. That man is terribly resourceful, and will attack in strange and unpredictable ways. Be careful, little monsters.”

~~Beatrice~~

She did feel kind of badass, walking with four other vampires, and being the one leading them. Lead was a strong word, but it did sort of feel like that. They were taking her cue, and asking her questions. It put a smile on her crocodile mouth.

They moved through the crowds of Devil’s Corner, and stayed close together, giving off the air of a group, a clan or something. It was enough to have people step aside, at least enough so they didn’t go bumping shoulders with everyone. Dolareido was a densely packed city, outside of North Side, which was awesome for hunting for a meal, but it made learning information a pain in the ass. Time to get deep in the shit to see if they could dig some info out of it.

Beatrice kept her Cloak of Night up, enough so that people could see her, but her features would be invisible. Kine's eyes would just glide off of her, unable to pin her down with their vision, and without drawing attention. A Face in the Crowd.

"I wish Damien was with us," she said. "He'd know more about Devil's Corner, about who to ask, about where to look."

Tash nodded, and looked up at the faded night sky. "Maybe. He d-did a lot of w-w-work here, trying to make people religious. But, he d-did spend a lot of time hiding, you know? If ... if the P-Prince ever found him, back then, she'd probably have killed him, or exiled him."

Everyone nodded. The Prince would do something like that, especially considering how sore she'd been after the Purge.

Triss sighed, a long happy sigh, as she looked at the people they walked past. She felt like a Carthian again, walking the streets and looking for kine to beat up if they were being dicks, or kine to help out if they were good for the neighborhood. Not that she did that often, antisocial as she'd been, hanging out in a fucking graveyard and shit for years and years. But Carthians did do the punk street walk bit, and she'd gone with them on occasion, helping curate the lower-middle class half of South Side into a decent place.

"Where we going?" Othello said.

"To visit a few dealers who like to sell the cheap shit to poor addicts." She pointed ahead, before adjusting her hair to make sure it framed her face. Much as she was confident she could hide her features, there was no need to make things harder than necessary. "Some of the dealers will have regulars, and I'm guessing the most fucked of the bunch are the sorts the hunters have been snatching up."

“The sheriff believed the same, b-but no one’s had t-t-time to ... to dig through this place. I was ... gonna come find it myself, b-b-but...”

Triss nodded. Made sense. Daniel was off doing crazy shit probably, with how rarely anyone ever saw the man anymore. It wouldn’t surprise Triss if the man was doing crazy James Bond shit in the spirit world, or something. Poor Natasha was having to pick up that slack, no doubt, and considering how few dragons there were, and the positions those few dragons held, Natasha had a big load on her shoulders to deal with, with big people to please. Not that it wasn’t the same with Triss and Jacob; but, Triss took the crazy shit Jacob threw her like a fly to honey; loved it.

Further and deeper into Devil’s Corner they went, past the prostitutes, past the drunks puking on the street corners, past the alleys filled with junkies trying to get a fix, and past boarded windows where said junkies were enjoying their fix. Past the stinky bars, past the convenience stores with metal bars on the doors, they took a corner, and wandered behind some other bars. Bars everywhere. This one though, Triss knew to be a hangout of some very unsavory types; at least, back when she gave a shit. Hopefully they hadn’t changed location.

Didn’t look like it. Behind a bar’s back door, in an empty section of a concrete alleyway wide enough to hold half a dozen people under a flickering light, there sat a few guys on wood pallets. White guy, black guy, Hispanic dude; well, at least they were diverse.

“You three,” she said. “You work for Mark Dunny, don’t you?”

They got up like someone dropped a grenade at their feet, eyes wide, and hands reaching behind them. Going for their guns, no doubt.

Jen stepped up, and eyed all three of them. “You don’t want to shoot us.”

The three men stared at her, meeting her gaze—well, her breasts firsts, then her gaze. Course, that was what she wanted, eye contact, so she could do what Ventrue did: break some minds.

Within moments, the three men lowered their hands, and stared at Jen. Othello came up, put a hand on her shoulder to pull her back a bit, and smiled at the guys.

“Hey friends,” he said. “You want to help us out?”

Triss snorted on a laugh. The man was using the Majesty discipline, and not on a girl; a strange sight from Othello.

“Oh, yeah, sure!” one of the kine said. “Who are you?” With each ticking second, all three kine’s mouths turned into smiles, and eyes opened wide to look at Othello with awe.

“Othello.”

“Othello!” another guy said. “Awesome. You guys know Mark Dunny?”

“N-No,” Tash said, poking her head out from behind Othello. “But, people who work for Mark Dunny are the sort of p-people we’re working for.”

“Yeah, yeah, we know things. Othello wants to know something? Not a thing we don’t know about in these streets.”

Othello nodded. “That’s good. Help out my friend, and answer her questions.”

They nodded excitedly.

Nodding as well, Tash pulled up her phone, and checked it. “A ... Charlie B-Barker? And, um ... Ashley Groodsman.” No doubt the girl had memorized the names after calling in for them earlier. But, Tash was Tash, and had to double check everything.

“Just that they’re gone. Disappeared. A shame, too. Hate losing clients.”

Ok, this was good. A lead. “Any idea where they disappeared?” Triss said.

“Yeah! Yeah, Charlie was taken off of Farrington and Goosen. Ashley was taken off Goosen and Third Park.”

Jen raised a brow, looked back at Triss, and shrugged as she looked at the three dealers. “Right off the corners?”

“Yeap, right off the corners. Someone showed up, stranger, said a few words to them, and they hopped in the car with them.”

“A stranger?” Tash said.

“Yeah. Well, four strangers. Two guys, two girls.”

Oh, those four, the four everyone knew about. But knowing they were working in Devil’s Corner was a big deal.

Aaron poked his head around Othello, opposite of Tash. “What were they driving?”

“Honda Civic, blue, from what we’ve heard.”

Damn, good fucking call. It’d been forever since she’d used a car, she kinda forgot kine had a habit of driving everywhere. Fucking Aaron, being too damn smart for his own good.

“Thanks for the help,” Othello said. “We’ll see if we can stop anymore people from disappearing.”

“Oh, thanks man! Hate losing customers. Tough to find consistent customers like those two, you know?”

Consistent? Hmm. “They have a place they go to often to get high?” She’d assumed they’d go home or to their apartment to do that, but considering the circumstance, there was a good chance they were homeless.

“They both squat in an old, abandoned home on the end of Goosen Street. Burned up a long time ago, but it’s still standing, enough for some people to squat there if they really have no place else to go.”

Holy shit, this was turning into a gold mine.

---

He wasn’t lying, that was for sure, not about the building at least. At the end of Goosen Street, where Devil’s Corner ended and the desert began, there was a building, burned and all sorts of fucked up. But, structurally sound, which meant squatters.

It wasn’t like Dolareido had a massive homeless problem, but it did have some. Just enough of each problem to create a dirty little corner of the city, Devil’s Corner. Most kine had it pretty decent in Dolareido, but not everyone; by design of the Prince, Triss figured. The homeless were the perfect target for certain types of Kindred, and Dolareido was meant to be a Kindred utopia, not a kine utopia. Carthians really hated that.

The five of them stepped into the building. It was an interesting home, obviously built a long time ago, and someone had taken the time to clean it up. Not repaint, not repair, but clean. The staircase to the second floor had some cinder blocks propped up underneath it, jammed up against the busted wood, visible from the open underside. Fancy. It would have been a nice home, before it got burned and fucked up.

Triss poked her head past a burned wall, an open path, and looked into what must have been a living room. A pot was on the floor, along with some utensils. Well, there weren't any tables left, she supposed. She took a deep breath, smelling the air; food, and humans. There was at least one human in the building, probably on the second floor. They could wait a moment.

The five of them stayed silent, and with the Cloak of Night suppressing them, noises would be quiet, and wandering eyes wouldn't be able to see them. Natasha was far more gifted at the art, and had the ability to take the discipline into true invisibility, where instead of eyes sliding off the person, the person was literally invisible. They were relying on her to keep them all wrapped in that total invisibility, a talent Triss was years away from perfecting. It was impressive, and it let them explore the home without issue, as long as they didn't get too far from Tash.

Living room, empty. Family room — old school — also empty. Kitchen, empty. Basement? She looked down the stairs into the black, and took a deep whiff; nothing, and it was a tiny hole in the ground anyway. Whoever was here was over their heads, and she indicated such to her team with a finger pointing up.

They all nodded, and started up the stairs.

At the top, everyone was taking in the scent of the air, looking for kine. It'd be so fucking nice to have one of the wolves with them on this, but it wasn't an option thanks to Jacob. Ah well, they'd make do. And besides, Aaron was a Gangrel, and Gangrels did love to think they could smell better than the other blood clans.

There was at least one kine in the building, in one of the three bedrooms on the top floor. It'd be pretty bad if someone saw five Kindred literally appear out of thin air, so Triss gave Natasha a nod, and the little Mekhet dropped the Cloak of Night. Triss held up a hand to her ear, and listened, looking for the source of the smell.

Yeap, breathing. Someone was sleeping. With a smile, Triss nodded to the door.

Jennifer walked up to the door, and knocked. No words. And no answer. But, the breathing did stop. Jen knocked again. No answer.

“Hello?” Jennifer said. “We had some questions, about two other people who used to live here? Disappeared?”

The door swung open, and a man in some shitty old jogging pants, and a faded, ripped sweater that didn’t match, swung a knife down at Jen’s neck.

Othello stepped in, a blur of velocity. Fucking Daeva and their speed, fast as Mekhet but as strong as a Nosferatu. Annoying, how the pretty boys were like god damn rockets, when fists started flying. He caught the man by the wrist, and wasted no time pinning him to the floor.

“Holy shit,” Jennifer said, and she stared down at the man, eyes wide. “You could have killed me!”

Triss and the others struggled to hide their smiles. Yeah right. Maybe Jen wanted to be an actor? It wouldn’t surprise Triss if Isabella might let her try out for their club; and try to get into her pants.

“W-Who are you?” the man said, eyes wide, breath coming out in pants, and heartbeat so fast and loud, they could hear it. “I d-don’t know anything! I didn’t do anything! I—”

“Relax,” Othello said, and he stood up, letting the human keep his knife. “We’re not here for you. We’re looking for the people who kidnapped the others who squatted here.”

“Kidnapped?” Groaning, the human sat up, and looked between the five of them. Triss made sure to use the Cloak of Night, just a little, so she was just a Face in the Crowd. No need for him to see her teeth; hell, if Othello hadn't stopped him from stabbing Jen, they'd probably have to kill him to preserve the Masquerade. It wasn't like Jen could wipe his memory, too young.

“Yeah,” Jen said.

The man's eyes fell. “ ... dead?”

Nodding, Jen adjusted her shirt a little, covering her bra somewhat. Not the time to be showing off her physique, and she knew it.

“That's ... horrible.” He sauntered back into his room, shoulders heavy, and he dropped his knife. No effort to protect the already rundown place, the squatter let the knife land blade first into the wood so it stuck, standing beside a pile of dirty blankets. “P-Poor Charlie, poor Ashley.”

It didn't take a genius to see the man was wrecked, but not just from the emotional turmoil. The way he swayed, the way his jaw kind of stuttered on his words—not the cute way Tash did either, and his sunken cheeks were the story of a man down on his luck and only making it harder on himself.

“Tell you what,” Triss said. “My friend here will give you some money if you share with us some info.”

Jen and Othello both raised a brow, looking to Triss. Yeah, Dominate or Majesty would allow them to get the info, but come on.

Tash reached behind her, pulled out her wallet, and handed Jen some money. The Ventrue took it, made sure the human didn't get to see the amount, and she smiled down at the cash in her hand before she walked into man's bedroom and stood beside him. He'd already sat down on his blankets, the effort of standing too hard. Course, with Jen having her shirt open and showing off her black bra as some sort of fashion statement, the guy couldn't help but stare.

"I don't know. If ... if Ashley and Charlie are dead, then—"

Jen reached out, and gave the man a couple hundred dollars. "Anything?"

The man licked his hairy chops, took the money, and gulped. "I don't know much."

"See a Honda Civic nearby?" Aaron asked. "Maybe hanging out on the street, a day or three before your friends' disappearances?"

"Y-Yeah! I did."

"Color?"

"Blue. Yeah, it was blue. 2015. Pretty beat up, though."

Ok, lie detector passed. Jen smiled at him, gave the man a rather sexy wink, and slipped him a little more money. Guy wasn't going to spend the cash on fixing his life. He was going to spend it on booze or meth or something nasty. But, maybe he wouldn't. Maybe.

When did Triss become so sympathetic? Hanging out with Julias too much. Damn man was turning her into a 'nice girl'. Bleh!

"Any idea where it came from?" Othello asked. "If you're lying, we'll find out." The big guy left the implication as is, and the poor guy's eyes opened wide and his mouth hung agape for a few moments. He was missing so many teeth.

"Um, I think I saw them coming out of ... out of Barkerton Avenue, one time, when I was around."

Barkerton was a dead end street, with a lot of old homes, maybe a hundred. A hundred homes was a really small number, compared to the tens of thousands of buildings Dolareido had.

“Thanks,” Jen said as she handed the man the rest of money, totaling probably eight hundred dollars. Then she lifted her bra up over her breasts, winked at the man, bounced her tits a few times with some small jumps, even cupped them a little, before putting her bra back on, and walked out of the room.

The man blinked. Everyone blinked. Then four hands slapped four foreheads. Well, if she was trying to reward the man for being a helpful soul, mission successful, Triss supposed.

---

It didn't take all that long to find the guilty house. There was no blue Honda Civic in any driveway, but all it took was a peek in the windows of houses to find the ones with families sleeping in beds. Everyone in Devil's Corner was dirt poor, and those who could afford to live in its shitty housing district were almost as fucked up poor as that poor dude that helped them tonight. Small houses, small beds, with multiple kids per bed, often with some dead-tired father falling asleep on the couch with the TV on, probably so he didn't accidentally wake up his wife going to bed, cause she had to get up at five in the morning for some shitty job.

The Carthian in her was peeking its head out. Carthians didn't just want a better life for Kindred, where everyone was free, anarchy of a sort. They also wanted to make lives better for kine, get them out from under the rule of Kindred. Or at least Garry did. He didn't like that the Invictus or the Prince had millions, billions of dollars, while kine like these poor fucks were surviving on dimes. To the Invictus, the Lancea et Sanctum, and even the fucking Ordo Dracul, money was a way of life to them, while the Carthians were too young a covenant, and too short sighted to have created fortunes. And of course, the Circle of the Crone just didn't give a shit about money.

Maybe that's why she helped that poor fool out. A little money for the old dude, because of a Carthian reflex that asshole Garry had instilled into her. He and Julias would get along more than they knew, if they were on the same side.

The guilty house was the first house that didn't have a soul in it. Just a regular, shitty looking house, the sort that hadn't been painted in years, with a hundred cracks in the driveway. Looked empty, and the doors were locked. They might have to break into every empty home tonight, but she was sure it was this house. There was a strange smell, faint, almost non-existent, but she caught it, and she followed in.

They broke in. Nice and quiet, with some peeks in the windows to make sure no one was watching the door. Not just peeks, but everyone kept an ear and eye open for any breathing or movement. Natasha and her Auspex was perhaps the most useful in seeing if it was safe to open the door, and all she could do was shrug when they looked at her.

In they went, following the subtle, strange smell, into the dark.

Chapter 83

~~Damien~~

As the night went on, two things were becoming painfully clear. First, that the hunters were either not in the tunnel, or hiding terribly well. Second, that working with Fiona was extremely distracting.

It wasn't that Fiona was too juvenile to focus, or too bubbly to ... not bubble around everywhere, but rather Damien's own mind not being able to concentrate. She was too attractive. Ever since that date, where they'd both enjoyed a meal together, it'd become impossible to ignore how beautiful she was.

He'd heard girls liked it when the man swoops in, sweeps her off her feet. Maybe he should swoop? Course, he didn't know the first thing about swooping, and that made the whole prospect terrifying. But, despite a lack of skill, a girl could only smile at you so many times before it was clear she was looking for you to make a move on her. Fiona smiled at everyone, but whenever she met his eyes, she made sure to smile extra hard. When smiles didn't work, she put her hands behind her, together, and pushed her chest out a bit, while also pushing her arms together, so her biceps pressed her breasts together.

The moment they were topside, he was going to ask for that second date. They'd hunt together, fill their bellies, and maybe, just maybe, he might stop being so scared of her, and do what she seemed to be asking for. Kiss her? Kissing was a good first step.

This must have been how Jack felt, when he met Antoinette in Bloodlust. The kid had shared with him the tense combination of terror and arousal he'd felt, when she drew him into her web. She'd used her seductive mastery, and her giant breasts, to seduce the poor boy. And Fiona, to Damien's best estimate, was trying to do the same thing, except she didn't have the centuries of experience to go with her efforts. In this weird dance, Damien was the older, more experienced one. Except, he was older, less experienced.

For now, he did his best to return her smile, and at his most bold, looked at her shapely breasts and how her jacket squeezed on them, when he knew she'd notice him doing so. In return, she offered a small blush on her freckled skin, and nudged her shoulder into his side. Flirting successful? Flirting successful.

"How long have we been down here?" Vicky said.

Damien shrugged. "Four hours."

"That is a long time. Perhaps we should take the search elsewhere?"

Matt shook his head. "These tunnels are huge, and I'd prefer we do a proper sweep of them before we move on. If they've been down here within the past few days, I'll smell them."

Powerful nose on that werewolf.

"Assuming," Parker added, "that they don't have some way of covering their scent. And they are hunters after all."

"Hunters don't usually hunt werewolves." Shrugging, Matt stopped at a fork in the tunnel, and took a long whiff. "Vampires spread. Werewolves are chosen by Luna. Our numbers never warrant hunters hunting us, not the way they hunt vampires. And, we don't feed on humans; usually. It's rare for hunters to devote themselves to hunting our kind."

Parker raised a brow. "Your point?"

“My point is that I’d be surprised if these hunters knew tricks for dealing with werewolves, beyond the obvious like silver.”

“What other tricks are there?” Vicky said.

The giant laughed, nodded toward one of the tunnels, and started walking. “Like I’m telling you. I saw how much silver you guys had.”

The three vampires nodded. A little skepticism and distrust was a healthy thing. And, despite Matt being a werewolf, he was plenty kind and sharing with the vampires as was. Asking him to spill over their secrets was a bit much.

“We’ve covered a lot of the tunnels,” Matt said. “A couple more nights, and we can safely say they aren’t down here.”

“Yay!” Fiona said, throwing her hands up and bouncing in place a few times.

The big guy shook his head. “Fighting down here would be a good thing. No humans around to stop us from letting loose, and they can’t surround us. And maybe—” Matt slammed into the air in front of him like a sleepwalker walking into a wall. Crunch. Broken nose, assuredly. He stepped back, groaning loudly, and held his nose in his hands. “What the fuck!”

Matthew didn’t swear often. Damien almost laughed, until he realized the man hadn’t walked into a wall. He had indeed walked into air, and the air had blocked his path. Everyone froze when the realization sank in.

“Um ... w-what?” Fiona said. She bounced over to where Matt was, checked the big guy, before she reached out against where Matt had been hurt. Her hand hit air.

“A barrier?” Damien joined her, and reached out. Indeed, a barrier. It had the texture of still air, which was barely a texture at all. It confused his brain, touching it, having it press back against his fingers, but it did push back, same as any wall. Soon, everyone was up to the barrier, touching it, pushing against it. Strong as steel.

Matt snorted, and another, quieter crunch sound marked the manual fixing of his nose. He'd heal in no time. With a snort and ka-splat sound of blood leaving his nostrils and hitting the tunnel floor, the werewolf walked up to the barrier as well, and pressed on it.

"If they're behind this," the werewolf said, "then I'd be able to smell them. I don't."

With a quiet snarl, Damien got down onto a knee, and reached down. In the darkness and flickering lights, it was hard to see much, but he managed to spot some strange, black soot, a powder, drawn across the tunnel path from wall to wall.

"What's that?" Fiona said.

"I ... have no idea."

All of them looked down at the soot. And Matt, of course, reached out to touch it. Mistake. He howled pain, and jumped back, clutching his hand and shaking it as if it were on fire. It wasn't, but the noises the man made suggested otherwise.

"Ye awright?" Fiona said, joining him.

"Ouch! Wow, that burns."

Frowning, Damien took in a breath, and blew on the black powder. It didn't move. He tried again, but still it didn't move. Soon, all five of them were doing the same thing, blowing on the strange black soot and trying to move it. No one managed.

This was ridiculous. With a snarl, Damien withdrew his sword, and tried to strike the powder. But the invisible barrier stopped him, blocking the sword from doing anything more than skimming the edge of the powder.

And that was, apparently, another mistake. As Damien put his sword away, a glowing amber started to make its appearance; from underneath them. The five of them stared down as lines started to draw themselves, as if a ghost was painting with glowing amber, encircling them. It didn't take a genius to recognize being inside an amber circle self-drawing onto the floor was a bad thing.

“Go!” He grabbed Fiona, and threw her. She squealed like a squirrel as she flew through the air, and groaned when she face-planted against another invisible barrier. Oh shit.

Whining, she struggled to stand up until Matt helped her. “Tae fuck!? Damien ye wank stain!”

“Sorry, sorry.” Wincing, he walked over to her and offered his best apologetic smile, before he reached out and pressed against the new barrier. This one had a shape, a contour, a curve. It was following the curve of the amber circle that now surrounded the group of them. Shit. “I was too slow.”

“It's awright, ye silly dobber.” Sighing and rubbing her forehead, she pat him on his side, and nudged her shoulder against him. “We ... we uh ... set off a trap?”

“Apparently.” He glanced back to Vicky and Parker. Predictably, they were standing with arms at the ready, but weren't getting involved. Passive, frustratingly so. They were the sort of vampires to sit back, wait for something to happen, and then react. Their reactions would be effective and intelligent, but until that happened, Damien had to assume they were borderline useless.

Matt, growling and groaning, pressed his hands up against the invisible barrier. Wherever he touched, the amber circle that surrounded them glowed brighter underneath the point of contact.

“We’re trapped,” Vicky said.

Parker nodded. “Indubitably.”

Good grief.

They had a decent amount of room to move around in. The circle was almost as wide as the tunnel itself, leaving Damien with more than enough space to start circling the trap. There wasn’t any black powder on the circle or its edges, but with how the amber glowed, he could see some small inconsistencies, as if someone painted it with a paintbrush.

It was a new trap, one the hunters hadn’t used yet. The hunters were far more experienced than any warning tale could have prepared him for, using new tricks at every encounter, and never repeating the same one. Frustrating.

“Anyone have any idea what this is?” Damien said. Everyone shook their heads, as he expected. “It appears to be some kind of ... supernatural trap.”

“It blocked your sword,” Matt said. “And it seemed to block the air from further down the tunnel.”

Damien nodded. “The black soot stuff did. But...” He stuck his sword out. It crossed over the amber circle without issue. “This strange circle appears to be less strict.”

“The first barrier,” a voice called from the tunnel darkness, “is a proper physical barrier, magical, created with that black soot you noticed. The second is a classic entrapment circle for paranormal scum, like yourself.”

Oh no.

~~Natasha~~

They were getting lucky. Very lucky. Too lucky? Maybe. It was perfectly reasonable that the hunters assumed the Kindred wouldn't be able to track this path, considering how convoluted it was. Figure out who was sacrificed, figure out they came from Devil's Corner, have a Kindred in the know about what kine might know something, get lucky that they knew where those who were sacrificed hung out, get lucky with the last kine at that location, and that they saw their vehicle. Convoluted, but not an impossible trail, and there was no doubt the hunters wouldn't leave the trail intact forever. They'd eventually move, or cover their tracks, so the five vampires had to do this quickly, tonight.

It was getting exhausting, keeping her fellow Kindred wrapped in the Cloak of Night along with her. Obfuscate could be used in so many ways, but a full Cloak of Night on herself and four others, to the point the five of them were completely invisible? That was draining. She had to concentrate, and that meant she couldn't devote much attention to looking for hunters or clues. She had to trust the witches.

In normal situations, a less aggressive Cloak of Night, A Face in the Crowd, would be the better choice, saving on vitae while also preventing anyone from noticing the Kindred, as long as other people were around. Not being recognized wasn't good enough for this situation.

It was an abandoned home, as far as she could tell. Everything was worn down, covered in dust, needed repair or painting, and from the smell, no one was living here. A perfect place for hunters to squat. She pulled out her pistol and kept it in her good hand, and held her small sword in her off hand, as she followed the other Kindred around the home. There was another odor here too; more than just an empty house.

First, they checked upstairs. A small bathroom and three small bedrooms. Nothing. Next they checked the living room and kitchen, but they'd already passed through them, and a second glance found nothing. That left the basement, which they'd all assumed would be the place, but it never hurt to be thorough. And, as they approached the basement, the unidentified odor grew.

Othello pointed down at the floor by the basement door. The dust and dirt was disturbed, tracing an outline of how the door would open, if someone had opened it. Jackpot.

Triss nodded to the large man, and with locked eyes, Othello slid the door open. Darkness awaited, except not as dark as the building's main floors. Light had a habit of doing that, of creating gentle illumination with no source, when it was bouncing around walls. And if there was a gentle, subtle illumination in the basement, that meant someone had a light turned on somewhere down there. Or light was coming in through some basement window, a street light maybe.

No, it wasn't a street light. It had an amber hue, like fire. Maybe someone was having a party? No, there wasn't any noise. And the sliver of light that reached the basement was so small, Tash was sure it was bouncing through other hallways to reach the basement they peered into. Maybe someone was running some sort of drug operation, and had another basement built, connected? Maybe. But there was something about the place, something heavy, and quiet, like liquid shadow you could drown in. She felt it, her partners felt it, and that was enough reason to assume the worst.

Othello went first, with Triss behind him, then Aaron, then Natasha, then Jennifer. The only one who bothered with weapons were Natasha and Jennifer. In the Invictus, everyone used weapons to some extent or another, but the witches were all comfortable killing with their bare hands; except Jen, who was young, and a Ventrue besides. The only weapon she had was a knife though, hidden on her belt underneath the open shirt. Not a good choice for a Ventrue, but better than nothing.

The basement was predictable, as far as basements went. No windows, concrete walls with no effort to make them pretty, damp cracks caught reflections of the scattered, subtle amber light, and Tash was sure she caught a glimpse of a centipede creeping along. She managed a small grin at that. When she was human, a centipede would have been enough to get her screaming. Now? Kindred and predators had a strange connection, even insect predators. But a centipede wasn't a rat or a crow or a coyote. If Aaron or Jen could use it to see what was ahead, neither of them tried. So, they continued along, into the basement room.

It was empty. Very empty. Too empty. Tash expected maybe some old boxes, or a ruined couch, or some wood palettes or crates, or something, anything. But, no, the basement was completely empty, except for a bookcase. The amber light was coming from behind it, faint against where the wood met the concrete. Beatrice and Aaron wasted no time, each taking an end of it, lifting, and moving it aside.

Another tunnel, and it seemed to go down. That didn't make sense from any blueprint for a building in Dolareido, not in Devil's Corner, but it was the source of the amber light.

The vampires moved closer. Upon closer inspection, it seemed like the hole was manually dug into the wall, as if someone had sliced it open and then got to digging. But that sort of work was loud, and it would have filled the basement up with a mess of dirt. Maybe that's why it was devoid of any objects? Someone may have done just that, and cleaned it up. Well, whatever the methodology they used, it didn't change that there was a hole in the wall tall enough for them to walk into, and there was a gentle amber glow coming from within.

They followed the same formation, Othello ahead with Triss by him, then Aaron, while Tash and Jen stuck to the rear. And as they followed the curving tunnel, everyone was deadly quiet. No one fake breathed. No one landed on their heel. No one stood straight, crouching instead. Everyone let a bit of their animal instinct to the surface, the part of them that knew how to stick to shadows, move silently, and listen intently.

There was quiet murmuring in the deep, from beyond the twisting, curving tunnel. Tash raised her lip in a hidden sneer, and looked around at the dirt that surrounded them. Someone was down here, in this homemade tunnel? This wasn't a safe tunnel. Without support beams and going deeper, the ceiling of this tunnel was liable to—become soft, and warm, and wet?

Everyone froze as the walls were no longer dirt, but flesh. Flesh. There was no getting around it, no other way for her mind to think of it, no trick of the eye or fancy painting on the walls. It was flesh. She touched it, and sure enough, bits of blood coated her fingertips. Muscle and skin, sinew, tendons, and even some bones lined the walls, curved, unnatural. It was all unnatural, but the bones that lined it weren't from any creature. It was the tunnel's bones, complete with a spinal cord above, and ribs all around.

It was like they were inside a snake, except even a snake's guts didn't look like this, with the bones poking out showing through, with skin taut against them, connecting to their sides, and with slivers of pulsating muscle between bits of torn skin. And it was pulsating, like a heart might. A giant, slow, steady heart.

She'd heard you could walk into a blue whale's heart, that it was big enough to move around in. How fucked up and big a creature would it need to be for this monstrosity?

They continued to creep forward, and Tash poured every ounce of effort she had into keeping them invisible. A very loud thought kept pulsing, that they should turn around and leave, or maybe one of them should. And, maybe, they really should do just that. But they'd discovered a golden opportunity, and might need every one of them there to keep them alive.

Just a little deeper, just enough to get some sort of knowledge about what was going on, and they could turn around and report back. Running away and reporting back a 'flesh tunnel' wasn't really enough information to act on. And, if they left, there was a very real chance the tunnel wouldn't exist the next night. They needed to learn something valuable, anything.

Tash wasn't so stupid as to not have measures in place for something like this. Before entering the tunnel, she ran the 'Unexpected Encounter' app on her phone. It'd ping the Prince, and tell her where Tash was. If worse came to worse, someone would eventually show up and investigate. Maybe they'd be coming to scoop up some vampire ashes, but at least someone would come.

It was like a horror movie script. Anyone with a brain would just turn around, and leave before they traveled any deeper into what was obviously a dangerous situation. But they couldn't. They needed to learn something, and splitting up was too dangerous. It was infuriating, being forced to pick between two stupid decisions, and Tash ground her teeth until her ears hurt. It may have been a witch's tactic, to do everything on the fly, or off the cuff, but the Invictus and Dragon in her very much wanted to pull out a notepad and start creating a proper plan.

Predictably, the witches showed no sign of stopping. They knew the risks, had calculated it no doubt, but, like her, knew the best option was to press on, and learn more.

The murmuring got louder. It wasn't English, and it wasn't being said by one person. It didn't sound like it was being said by people at all. It was deep and rolling, with a resonance and vibration quality that reminded Tash of throat singing monks. Flesh was a good absorber of sound, and shouldn't have echoed or resonated with the odd voices, but it did, and it became terribly obvious as the vampires got closer, that the murmuring was some sort of chant.

Louder, and louder. Everyone crouched low, until eventually people were using their fingertips against the floor to move as silent as possible. The floor was flesh, and ribs, and shallow blood. She was tempted to taste it; what vampire wouldn't be? But, no, better to not taste the blood that dripped from the walls and pooled on the tunnel path of alien muscle and skin. Vampires were immune to disease and poison, but that probably didn't apply to magical or alien things.

Tash bit her lip, and stared on as the tunnel grew larger, widened, and eventually opened up into a room. Room wasn't a strong enough word. Chamber? Whatever it was, it was massive, and it was inhuman. A hundred feet wide, but a hundred feet tall as well. The ribs were gone, and instead, giant pillars of bone lined the walls of the more square room, compared to the round tunnel they'd emerged from. The source of the amber light was clear now. Dangling amber crystals attached to ropes hung from the flesh ceiling, and they glowed.

No, wait, not ropes. Chains. The chains, dangling, swayed gently, occasionally clinking against each other, except the clink sounds were deadened by the sounds of flesh. On the chains, were body parts, attached by meat hooks. Torsos, arms, legs, fresh body parts with skin torn open and bones jammed or tied into the chains, dangled. And as Tash looked closer, she realized the fleshy walls of the chamber had bits of human flesh tied to it, flayed, spread, and hooked to it. Tapestries of skin were stretched taut over metal hooks, latched and secured to the alien flesh of the chamber.

If they hadn't been vampires, the five of them would be vomiting.

The source of the chanting was clear now, too. In the giant chamber, against the back wall, was Elen. She was in her wheelchair, with the respirator machine making sure she had easy access to oxygen. There were a few others standing around, hunters, and they were managing various IV tubes that were ... connected to the wall. And it wasn't the hunters doing the chanting, it was the faces on the wall.

Faces. On the walls. Perfect, smooth, pink fleshy faces, all with eyes closed, all with immaculate teeth, and all chanting the alien language. Not Latin, or any other old language Tash might have recognized, but it was definitely a language. But, the language aspect was less interesting than the fact there were a hundred faces on a wall of flesh, singing. What the fuck what the fuck what the fuck. Was it their blood, in the tubes being fed into Elen's veins? Had to be.

There was someone kneeling at Elen's feet. During all this, Elen wasn't simply sitting there. She was leaning forward, with a scalpel in her hand, and she was making marks on a shirtless man's back. A white guy, dark hair buzzed short, average height, with a lean figure of muscle.

Did they walk into a nightmare? Were they inside some chamber of dreams and fear, where the Begotten lived? It was the only possible explanation for the walls of flesh and bone. But, Begotten didn't just randomly open their chambers, connect them to the physical world, for no reason. And as far as she knew from Fiona, Begotten could open and close their chambers into any place where they'd been, but the place also had to share resonance with the chamber. There was no reason to keep a chamber open, when they could open and close it at will.

Which meant, either a Begotten had opened their chamber preemptively, expecting someone to be coming or going, or this wasn't a Begotten's chamber. She dearly wished it was. Walls of bleeding skin, flexing tendons, tightening and relaxing, and enormous muscle fibers surrounded them. It was the stuff of nightmares. The pieces of corpses used to decorate were almost tacky in comparison.

The faces on the walls, in their perfect symmetry, kept their eyes closed, and continued to chant. What Natasha would do to know what they were saying. Just knowing what language they were speaking would have been a tantalizing drop of honey on her intellectual curiosity. And why, why flesh? Why was everything made of flesh?

Wait. One of the hunters. Tash had seen that hunter get cut open by a werewolf, in the nightmare world. If this shaman could heal the hunters, that made everything so much more problematic.

Elen sighed, leaned back, and spent some time rotating her wrist, in pain from the exertion of carving into a man's back. Frail as thin glass. Capturing this woman alive would be difficult.

"Sándor, if you would stop healing so quickly, I wouldn't need to do this so often," she said.

"My apologies, master," the Begotten said.

All five vampires froze, tension drawn tight until it threatened to snap. Not in a chamber, then, if that was Sándor; he'd be in his gargoyle form otherwise. Unless there was a way for a Begotten to remain in their human form when inside nightmares? Maybe, but from what she'd seen from the others, and what they'd said, it seemed to be expected they be in their horror form when in dreamland.

“No matter. We will do this, again, and again, and again, until Azamel is ruined.”

“Yes, master.”

“And when that day comes, Sándor, you need to pay closer attention. Jeremiah and Angela both nearly died, and if I have to sew them back up again, I’ll take it out of your hide.”

“Yes, master.”

One too many masters. This Begotten was being controlled! Tash managed to poke Triss in the side, and blink several times at her, emphasizing as best she could. The Nos nodded, and mouthed ‘controlled’ slowly. Ok, good, communication. Tash returned the nod, and frowned as she looked out to the room with dangling, amber crystals. If she could see what Elen was doing to Sándor’s back, what she was carving or writing, maybe she’d get some idea about what to do about it.

Or, maybe the five of them should just run in there and kick some ass? There weren’t many hunters, and it wasn’t like hunters could take a vampire at close range. The undead would win this fight, if there weren’t any surprises.

Tash nodded forward, and the five of them pushed out a little more.

They crept forward, everyone low, everyone deathly silent, and moved to a pile of flesh, a mound of it that came out of the red blood like a tumor. It’d be better if they split up, but Tash needed them close if she wanted to make sure they were invisible. And she was getting tired. Vitae, draining more and more with every moment, demanding she replenish it, or at least stop acting like a super hero and keeping a squadron of people invisible.

They were way too deep in this for this to become a problem now. And, with decades of Invictus practice under her belt, she wasn't about to let her discipline break when she needed it most. She grit her teeth, and bore it. They moved in deeper, moving to another pulsating nodule of flesh. Not big enough to hide all of them, Jennifer stayed a bit further back, but still near, finding a big rib bone to stand behind.

This was all so very possibly a trap. Did the vampires find the hunters unawares, or were they hoping to be found? Tash tried to reason through it, but the more she thought about it, the more it seemed like good luck. There was no way Elen would leave herself this exposed on purpose, or have Sándor in such a compromising position.

Compromising position. undefended, and unguarded. She could shoot him. She ... could shoot him! If she got him in the head, he'd die. Maybe it'd make up for not landing the shot, and killing Angela or Jeremiah when she tried. There were a lot of those weird, dangling amber crystals in the way though, and she was already strained trying to keep everyone wrapped in the Cloak of Night. But, if she could get a little closer, and line up a shot, she could kill him, and put a huge dent in the tools available to these hunters.

Except, watching Sándor kneel there, eyes empty, staring at the bloody floor of skin and muscle he knelt on, it was clear that he was being controlled somehow. His face was a blank slate. Tash had seen faces like that before, whenever Julias mind controlled some kine; or Viktor, on the rare occasion Natasha got to see that. And she couldn't shoot a man who was a slave, a mind-controlled slave.

"Here." One of the faces on the wall opened their eyes. Black eyes, completely black eyes.

"Here." Another one of the faces opened their eyes. Oh no.

"Here!"

“Someone’s here.”

“Here.”

“Here.”

Elen started coughing, wheezing, a ragged sound of tearing throat and exhaustion, all caught in the mask she wore. The hunters around her brought up their guns, and started scanning, one of them focusing on removing the tubes and needles from the old woman.

Triss looked back, and groaned, nodding toward the entrance they came from. The pathway closed off, like a constricting ring of muscle. They may as well have been inside a stomach.

Shit.

Sándor got up, leaned his head left and right, earning some loud cracks, and started walking toward them. He may not have been able to transform, but Tash could see the subtle silhouette of the gargantuan gargoyle creature around him.

Double shit.

~~Eric~~

Three vampires, and one fresh werewolf, in a brawl with six vampires, and one experienced werewolf. Shit.

Caleb came for him again, and Eric sidestepped the punch. He returned it with his own, and unlike Caleb, he knew how to skim the line. Whoever this guy was, he wasn’t a professional fighter, and didn’t know how to move by inches. His motions were exaggerated, when they didn’t need to be. His punches would hurt like hell if they got him, but now that Eric was paying attention to him and only him, it was clear to see the man was not trained. He was, on the other hand, a brawler, a man who'd learned how to fight the hard way. If he managed to land a punch, it was going to hurt, more than Eric's would.

Much as fighters like to say otherwise, there was one undeniable fact about fighting that always made fighters uncomfortable: size mattered. It didn't matter if you were Bruce Lee, you were helpless against a two-hundred and fifty pound brawler. And Caleb did have a few pounds on him, a few inches of reach, and height. He'd be in a higher weight class, if this was a proper fight. Getting hit was to be avoided at all costs.

But, playing by ring rules wasn't required either. And to a professional fighter, there were dozens of dirty tricks they weren't allowed to use, that were suddenly on the menu.

Eric ducked in close, too close to get punched, and with his fists brought in to protect his face, raised his elbow and threw it out in a swing. Crack. The satisfying sensation of elbow bone whacking someone in their head. The dirty play came in when, as Caleb stumbled back, Eric struck out the same arm, grabbed the man's short hair, and yanked downward. Having knocked the man off balance meant a good, quality hair pull drove him into the asphalt. He'd only be on his side for a second, but that was plenty of time for Eric to kick the man in his head, hard enough to half spin him horizontal along the street.

Who knew fighting dirty came so naturally to him. Well, they did come at him with a knife. Fighting fair wasn't in the cards anyway.

The others weren't doing so well. Two of the female vampires had jumped Hella, and they were punching her. Joe and another female vampire were circling Jessy, and Jonah had his back to a wall as the two new male vampires came in closer. The Carthians were all street punks with outdated fashion sense, and it made the whole situation look like a Michael Jackson music video. Just beat it.

Eric reached down, grabbed Debby off of Hella, and threw her. To throw someone, get them airborne, was exhilarating. As a human, he'd never fought someone much lighter than him, and never with this much strength available. Debby was light, and he was a colossus in this form. She flew twenty feet before she started rolling. While she was airborne, Eric sank his heel into Kathy's head, hard enough to send her rolling as well.

These vampires were idiots. Picked a fight at the worse time, and they fought like idiot punks. Their movements were powerful and fast, but predictable, and when the two vampires harassing Jonah turned around to swing at him, it was easy to duck underneath, and nail them both in the chest, a fist for each.

If there was one god damn thing, one thing in this fucking world he was good at, it was a fist fight. These Carthians didn't know that. All the better for him.

One of the vamps he punched crumbled, clutching their chest, at least one broken rib. The other was far more durable. He stood up, glared at Eric, and sneered.

“Sit.”

Every ounce of Eric's being, every bit of rage, every bit of frustration and carnage in him wanted to punch this fucker in the face hard enough to collapse it. But, he didn't. He couldn't. As his eyes met this stranger's, a wall crashed into Eric's mind. A steel wall. He couldn't get around it, see through it, stop it, nothing. A wall of total, immutable will smashed into him.

This was a Ventrue, ordering him around.

He almost did sit, too, but Jonah punched the man in the back of the head hard enough to send him careening over. Crack, face to the asphalt. As the ability to think, and move his limbs, came back to him in a rush of glorious freedom, he used it. With a snarl and growl, Eric drove the hard toe of his shoe in the fucker's head, hard enough it jerked to the side fast enough to tear ligaments. Potentially lethal, to a human. A vampire would heal, eventually.

Joe and his friend had jumped Jessy, and had started punching her back and forth. That was strange. Jessy was stronger than this Joe, Eric's instincts could see that, and the woman with Joe seemed only as strong as him. Two on one, but Jessy could have fought back, if she went psycho like she did on the monster gargoyle thing. She was holding back.

He came up behind Joe, growling, and kicked the man in the back. Joe went with the motion, falling forward, but tucking into a roll. Maybe the man was more dangerous than he let on.

Jessy turned her attention to Joe's friend, and jumped her, punching, grabbing, slamming. Perfect time for Eric to deal with this Joe fucker, and—

A shoulder smashed into Eric's back. Flashbacks of high school football, except, without the shoulder pad. Eric went down, hands slamming into the street and skin tearing against the asphalt and small rocks. Ow. Groaning, Eric looked at his palms and the trail of blood they'd made a couple feet on the street, before he turned over his shoulder to growl at the man. This fight was pointless, and they were all wasting time while simultaneously exposing themselves to interference. But, fuck it.

Eric tried to turn over completely, but Caleb was on him; except the man obviously didn't know shit about grappling. Getting his arm was easy. Getting a leg around his neck, and the other around his waist, almost as easy. Eric pinned the man's hand to Eric's chest, and twisted as he locked the man in an arm bar. And unless Caleb wanted his shoulder to dislocate, or elbow to bend ninety degrees in the wrong direction, he had no choice but to move with the grapple. A second later, he was on his back on the street, perpendicular to Eric, his torso underneath Eric's legs, and his arm up along Eric's waist and chest where Eric held it locked.

Of all the martial arts in the world, there were only two he ever worried about. Boxing, and Jiu Jitsu. So of course, those were the two he learned.

“We didn't come here looking for a fight!” Eric yelled, while giving his body enough of an arch to earn a groan of pain from the pinned man. It wouldn't take much to destroy his arm, and sure, the man would heal from it, but that didn't change that getting an elbow bent in the wrong direction was a horrible feeling.

Caleb snarled at him, and tried to sit up. Eric wasn't having it. Didn't the fucker know anything about fighting? Eric locked his grip like steel on the man's forearm and wrist, and arched his back again, forcing his abs up into the man's elbow.

“Fuck you,” Caleb said. “You're just young blood, overstepping your boundaries. A pup like you is going to get people hurt in your ignorance.”

“Because I fucking talked to a spirit?”

“Because you fucking talked to a spirit. Maybe not today, maybe not tomorrow, but it'll happen.”

“I'm willing to talk to Avery, you stupid fuck. Been kind of busy lately, and—” The tap tap of a sprinting set of sneakers forced his attention back to the Kindred he'd taken out in his drive-by. Eric let go of Caleb's arm, and rolled away, crunching over his shoulder and the back of his neck as he rolled backward. Minor damage caused by his weight, and it healed almost instantly as he got back to his feet.

Caleb, still on the ground, grabbed his ankle, and threw him.

Getting thrown was an interesting sensation. For the first moment, his stomach hit the wall of his insides, giving him that roller coaster sensation. Once it caught up to him, he found his bearings enough to realize he was actually flying through the air like a Frisbee, far enough that he'd probably go thirty feet before landing. Problem: he was flying toward a building. With the spinning and the speed of it all, the best Eric could do was pull in his limbs, and pray for a minimal amount of cuts, as he slammed into a window.

It shattered around him, and the downward momentum gravity grabbed him with meant a few more points of the sharp glass cut into his skin than he'd like. Worse was the way the inside of the building greeted him with a lovely, hard slap of tile to the ass. And bouncing, especially in his new, heavier body, was not fun either. Also not fun, was how a set of metal stairs stopped him, his back slamming into it, butt to the floor. Each step was a hard edge punching him in his spine, and he yelled pain as white fire danced up and down his back.

Groaning, he got up, one hand reaching for the stairway railing beside him, other against the wall. Where was he? No signs inside, but it was some sort of office building, with short cubicles and computers within, office chairs, desks covered in random crap, and a high ceiling with warehouse metal bars above. Some company had re-purposed an old warehouse into an office building then.

No one else was inside the building, no noises or fresh scents were present. The stairs beside him led up to an overhang room, where a manager probably watched his workers from the window during the day. Ugh.

Debby and Kathy were the first to jump into the room after him, snarling and growling, like small monsters. Kathy still had her knife, as well. He supposed he should have been happy it wasn't silver.

“What will it take for you to back off?” he said, slowly backing up as they approached.

Kathy returned his snarls, and passed a knife from hand to hand. “You're an Invictus lapdog, literally. So, we'll back off, when we've taught you a lesson. You don't work for them, you stop working for them, and you never work for them.”

Debby nodded, and grinned as she rotated her shoulder. “And of course, since you're fucking that bitch Jessy, we know we're going to have to pound some sense into you.”

He backed up again, back pressing to one of the short cubicle walls. They thought he was retreating. He was setting up his spacing.

Kathy came at him with the knife again, relying on her inhuman speed. Fast. He sidestepped, and her knife grazed along his chest as it slipped by. Her speed was used to cover a few feet, but he only had to move six inches to the side with a twist to keep from getting stabbed, stopping on the outside of her arm. And from there, it was easy to grab her wrist with one hand, and slam his palm into the elbow with the other. Quick, sudden movements, with impact.

He remembered a story once, about training by punching rain drops. Power, speed, direct, instant, stable. These Carthians didn't know how to fight like that, but he did, and he growled at the woman as he destroyed her elbow, bending it ninety degrees the wrong way. Before she could fall, he kicked down at her knee from the side, and with his new strength, it was easy to cave it in, dislocating the knee cap and tearing ligaments in the joint. She fell, howling, screaming, and roaring.

He had to give it to her, she didn't let pain break her. If she was strong enough to heal the damage, she'd be at him again without hesitation. But, if she was a Mekhet like he figured, she wouldn't be healing that—

Debby tackled him. It was laughable how small she was compared to him, especially now, but she anchored herself to the ground, and tackled upward. Vampire legs pushed her up into him like a freight train, and he rose ten feet in the high-ceiling building, before he crashed down on the tile floor. She full mounted him, and started punching, hammering her fists down. But without momentum to give her inertia, she was too light to keep the position, and he landed a single punch in her shoulder at the side to force her sideways off of him.

His turn. As she got up, he threw his weight at her, and drove his shoulder into her chest, while grabbing her thighs so she couldn't touch the floor, picking her up. Anyone else would have had the wind knocked out of them, but the vampire slammed her fists down on his back. The single second was enough for her to hit him thrice, before her back crashed into one of the cubicles. He was bulldozing forward, and with his new weight and hers combined, they broke through it, through the desk, the monitor on it, and through the next cubicle over, before he forced his shoulders down to slam her back against the next desk.

“F ... fuck you,” she said from underneath him. “Invictus dog. Just another tit sucking st—”

He punched her in the face, drove his knuckles down against her mouth hard enough to knock half her teeth out, and earn a shriek of agony. She clutched her jaw and mouth and started rolling from side to side, staring at him for two seconds with total hatred, before her eyes closed as she rolled in pain. Maybe vampires were sensitive to having their fangs punched in? Good to know.

He got up, turned around, and groaned, as Caleb climbed over the windowsill to join them.

“You’re good,” he said. “Haven’t seen anyone fight like that in a long time.”

Eric spit blood to the floor, and faced the man as he brought his fists up, elbows up. “Uratha all fight like you? You’re just untrained thugs.”

Caleb roared at him, and took another step toward him. And began to grow. His steps became heavy, until Eric felt the vibration of weight. His clothes disappeared, fading into his body as fur began to overwhelm him. His shoulders exploded in size, doubling, tripling, quadrupling in mass as Caleb’s head leaned forward, new body haunched, with colossal arms of pure muscle hanging. A red tint came through the fur, hints of it, highlighting the waves of short gray.

His steps were no longer in boots, but enormous claws, and each step forced the claws an inch into the tile. The titan stared up at him, nine feet tall, and rumbled a growl deep in his chest, causing the room to vibrate, and for Eric to shiver in kind. Caleb sniffed, no doubt catching Eric’s scent with a renewed hunger. His mouth was open a little, enough for his breathing to be audible, slow, deep, no thought given to being quiet. The hulking beast took another step forward, and Eric noticed a small tail swish behind him, before his eyes were drawn back to his gigantic size, the barrel chest and python arms, and their huge claws.

“Change,” Caleb said. “I am ... curious.” He struggled to enunciate, big tongue fighting to create syllables against the contours of his long snout and sharp teeth. “If you ... are Ghost Wolf, then I ... will test you.”

Eric gulped, and stepped back again before inching to the side to put a couple cubicles between him and the werewolf. “I—”

A rush of blood flowed up into Eric's chest, and he stumbled back a step as he clutched at his sternum, fingers digging into his shirt. His heart rate skyrocketed, and his breathing became quickened pants. He tried to breathe, to slow it down, but his body wasn't listening. His pulse drummed in his ears, like a quartet pounding on a set of drums in a tribal rhythm. Dum dum. Dum dum. Dum dum.

"You feel, don't you?" Caleb said, stepping in closer. "Feel the call. The madness." Closer the beast came, and Eric fell back onto his ass as he stared up at the werewolf. "It sings. It beckons. The hunt beckons."

Eric gulped and forced himself back onto his feet, only to find himself standing a single foot from the Uratha. Caleb towered over him, buried him underneath his mass, and a drop of drool fell from his chops onto the office building floor. If the man wanted to kill him, he could have done so. He was waiting, and hard as it was to read a wolf's expression, it looked like he was smiling.

"Change."

"I ... I won't. I'm not trying to kill you."

"Need not kill. Blood. No kill. Besides." He leaned down, and brought his teeth within inches of Eric's face. "You fuck vampire, in this sacred form. You can control it. Fight me, and I will test. Come."

It was a drug pumping through his veins. It was a siren's song, beckoning him. It was power and hunger surging up through his body and into his extremities, demanding satisfaction. Something about being near this creature, a fellow werewolf in his most grand form, was calling to Eric. Join in. Change. Transform. Unleash the beast of war within.

Eric lowered his head, but all he found were enormous talons beneath him, Caleb's. He remembered those talons, remembered the feel of them sinking into wood, tile, concrete, and stone under his weight. He looked higher, to the fellow werewolf's claws, and the enormous hands. They were hands he'd wrapped around Jessy, and had delighted in taking her small body, and pulling her down onto his length, forcing it into a hole far too small for it. He also remembered grabbing hunters, tossing them aside like pebbles. He remembered Pitt, barely, flashes and images of tearing him and his goons apart. He looked higher, and winced as he found Caleb's teeth closer, two inches from Eric's eyes. He remembered biting into people, and how satisfying it'd been to split flesh and crunch bone between his jaws. It was more than satisfaction, it was a requirement, a piece of him that demanded he indulge it. To bite, and tear, and hunt, and kill, were no more different than a spider weaving a web. Pure instinct.

He gave into instinct.

Caleb stepped back and gave him room, a strange, inhuman, knowing smile on his snout, as Eric grew to match his height. Eric's fur was darker, almost night black, but other than that, there were few differences between him and his fellow wolf. Titans of muscle and strength, tall, nine feet high, and with long arms that reached their knees since they were haunched forward. Their enormous necks jutted forward from mountainous shoulders, and they pointed their ears at each other as they both offered acknowledging rumbles.

"You fuck vampire, like this?" Caleb said, and reached out with his two hands to push against Eric's shoulders. He might as well have lit a hidden river of gasoline in Eric's gut, with the way a simple shove ignited a feral drive in him. If he was trying to make a point, about how easy it was to go insane with rage in this form, he'd made it.

No longer was Eric forced to obey mass and inertia without a way to fight back. His talons gripped into the floor, and he shoved back against Caleb, harder. His fellow wolf had no choice but to step back, or he'd fall over.

Eric focused on his breathing, and made sure every one went deep into his belly. Breathe. Easier said than done. Seeing another werewolf in the Gauru form was wind fueling the fire in his chest, warm, inviting, and intoxicating. It spoke in words that called to him, delicious and almost erotic. Hunt. Find prey. Kill prey. Devour. Land. Territory. Defend. But, it wasn't taking him over, not yet.

He thought of Jessy, of her naked body pressed against his fur. He closed his eyes and breathed deep, enjoying the memory of her, of her voice, of her animal ferocity. This Caleb fucker wanted to see just how comfortable he was in this form, how comfortable he was as an Uratha, he guessed. How comfortable was he? The Uratha thought he was crazy for having sex in this form. He kind of did, too.

"The moon," Eric said, taking a step toward Caleb, offering a snarl, "it says I ... that ... I—"

Caleb roared at him, and began to circle him, as best as he could in the small space available to the titans. "Luna speaks to you?"

"It does." He returned the roar, quick, more of a bark than anything. Debby and Kathy had crawled away, and both vampires were watching now, eyes wide, butts to the floor and weight on their palms behind them. Out of the way enough so they wouldn't get ripped in half accidentally. Hopefully.

"It? She, worm. She ... speaks to Cahalith, in visions." Caleb paced to the other side, and dragged a claw along the cubicle, causing the soft wall to crumble downward under the casual weight and pressure. "Why speak to you?"

"I am Cahalith." He snarled, and came in a little closer. "She warns me."

“You have no right ... to speak to Luna, Ghost Wolf.”

That offended Eric. He didn't know why it offended him, but it did. It burned his skin, and heated it, heated his throat and core, sending blood and adrenaline pulsing. He demanded satisfaction.

“I am me. I am myself.” He crouched, readying his pounce. This was going to be a duel between monsters, and that deserved a little respect, at least. No sucker punches.

Caleb did the same, rumbling in his chest as he did. “We shall see.”

They both roared at each other, and the two vampires watching were forced to cover their ears as the vibrations of animal sounds filled the office building. This bastard used the Invictus and Carthian squabble as an excuse to put Eric to the test. Well, fuck him.

They pounced at each other, and for a moment, Eric thought he pounced an oncoming truck. Eric tried to grab the man's hands, but Caleb slammed both hands downward with his claws out. A bad move for a human to do in a fight, but a great move to do if you're a werewolf with enormous claws. Two seconds into this fight and Eric already made a mistake, one Caleb predicted.

Claws tore through Eric's forearms, causing blood to gush and splatter everywhere, particularly over Caleb. He wasn't a vampire. His blood made no effort to stay inside his body. Instead, it gushed, the claw marks on his arms deep and slicing through veins and muscles alike. Eric's roars turned into howls, and Caleb snapped and barked twice, before lunging in, and sinking his teeth into Eric's neck.

Werewolves heal quickly. Muscles and veins mended, and as the skin sealed, Eric got one hand onto Caleb's shoulder, and tried to push him away. His other grabbed the man's jaw, and pulled down, forcing pressure off the teeth tearing through his neck. When Caleb pulled away, Eric lifted his leg out to kick. His new body was not made for kicking. It didn't have the correct center of gravity, or the correct ... anything. Another mistake Caleb took advantage of, stepping back clear out of the range of the kick, and then he pounced forward, undoing the space Eric created.

Caleb's weight slammed into him again, and the beast wasted no time, getting into a full mount. But, unlike a human, Caleb didn't straddle and try and rain hammer fists down on him. Instead, the titan started tearing at his chest and shoulders with his claws, and leaned down to once again start biting at Eric. Thankfully, Eric managed to get his forearm in the way, jamming it under Caleb's neck, but the beast was still sitting on him, tearing into him, while Eric couldn't retaliate at all.

Stop letting your trained reflexes guide you. You're not human, you're a beast, a monster. Fight like one.

Eric roared, loud, loud enough it was deafening, and Caleb paused as the unnatural howl smashed into his person. Half a second, more than enough time for Eric to turn his head, and use the reach of his neck and snout, to sink his teeth around Caleb's wrist.

The taste of flesh was haunting and intoxicating. It was delicious. But this was the first time he'd tasted werewolf flesh, and he was not prepared for the overwhelming, overpowering, exquisite taste. If sin and vice had a flavor, it would be this.

Caleb ripped his arm away as he jumped back, leaving behind a chunk of flesh in Eric's mouth. He stared at Eric for a moment, and as Eric got up, Caleb shook his snout from side to side, dislodging bits of Eric's skin and flesh from his own teeth.

“Do not eat flesh. Not of kin, or of man. It will undo you.”

Eric, preparing to swallow down the enticing meal in his mouth, stared at Caleb, and froze. He wanted to swallow it down. God, every part of him wanted to swallow it down, devour, feast on the flesh of someone as powerful as Caleb. But Caleb wasn't tricking him. The man had not swallowed Eric's flesh, and the weight of his voice sounded like a man trying to be calm and serious. Being a werewolf, Eric doubted Caleb would be able to tell convincing lies in the Gauru form. It was a mode of pure, honest aggression and desire, not subtlety and suave words.

He could trust this beast, in this way. A laughable stereotype, that you can always trust the honesty of the fist, but it applied. Eric let the meat flop from his mouth, and it melted into a small pool of blood, with a couple bits of skin. Of course, no werewolf part would stay werewolf once removed. But, for that moment, before it changed back to human, there was a chance Eric could have eaten it.

It tasted divine, ambrosia, but he shook his head until his own saliva washed the bastard's blood away.

"Good," Caleb said, growling an almost pleased sound, before he resumed crouching, ready to pounce at him. He didn't come at him though. Instead, the colossal beast crouched lower, and moved toward a shadow, toward the rest of the remaining cubicles. "We are not mindless. We are in control." His voice blended to the shadow, fading throughout the office building and its high ceilings.

Eric could no longer see him. He was gone.

Growling all the more, Eric started to prowl around, goliath hands resting on cubicles as he began the hunt. Another word drifted through his mind, describing this Caleb, labeling him. Irraka. Sneaky creatures. Assassins in the world of wolves. Irraka would come at him from the side or behind, go for the hamstrings, try and wound him before going in for the kill.

No, he wouldn't go for the kill. For all the aggression and violence the two of them were swimming in, Caleb didn't want to kill him, only test him. That didn't mean the man wouldn't bring him close to it, though. And the man made it clear he was more comfortable fighting in the Gauru form than Eric was.

The instinct was there, but as long as Eric didn't let the rage and hunger inside him overwhelm him, as long as he kept breathing, that instinct was on a leash. That wasn't helping him. Keeping it on a leash meant his human reflexes and training were getting in the way. That's what Caleb was testing, to see how Eric could control himself when shit hit the fan, and someone was trying to tear out his throat.

Rumbling, Eric continued to circle around, slowly walking about and through the office building, between the cubicles, each step slow, no longer sinking his foot claws into the tile. Carefully, slowly, he moved around, and stopped as he came to stand beside the two vampires. They'd both backed up against the wall, and were staring, sitting, jaws dropped, eyes on him.

He crouched down beside them, and rumbled in his throat, like a crocodile. They both squeaked, and their eyes drifted down his body, his mass, before up to his mouth and the massive teeth. They were still injured, and weren't healing anymore. Either they were tapped, and wouldn't be healing without a fresh meal or a day's sleep, or they were too shocked to do anything other than stare. Probably both, by the looks in their eyes.

"Picked a fight," he said, and he rumbled another growl at them. So damn hard to talk with a snout.

Debby managed to find a little resilience, and snarled back at him. A chihuahua barking at the tiger. "Picked a fight with Jessy, because she deserves it."

He was so very tempted to pick up this tiny vampire, and use her as a club against Caleb. No, it wouldn't work. Far too fragile. With another snarl wiping the sneer off the vampire's face, he got up, and resumed his prowl, sniffing at the air. Caleb's scent trail. His scent was everywhere, but focusing on it into exact paths was his only chance of finding the bastard.

He sniffed the air, breathed deep its scent, and let the Beast in him surface; a little. His ears perked up and pointed about in different directions, catching the various sounds. The vampires were quiet, with no breathing or heartbeat. Outside the building, he could hear Jessy, Joe, and the others beat on each other. Hopefully they'd be fine. The Carthians still had four vampires out there, while Jessy only had Jonah and Hella with her. Then again, Jessy was the strongest vampire in the vicinity. She could take care of herself.

He continued along the scent, getting down onto all fours and lifting his nose with his slow steps. Further, through the warehouse building, between the cubicles. Further. He growled as he looked at the cubicles he past, his lower position half hiding his body between their walls. He could smell humans, the scent they left on their chairs and desks, their perfumes, their plants, and their computers; and some alcohol. No Caleb, though.

Wait, there he was, his scent. His nose followed it between the cubicles through the shadow, his mind painting an image of the scent trail before him, like guiding lines in hospital hallways. Vivid, distinct, and blatant in the darkness. He followed it, staying low, though considering his new shoulder span, he had to be careful to not knock over cubicles as he hunted his fellow werewolf.

Movement. Caleb charged at him, dashing from the side, between some of the short, soft walls. Fast! Holy shit. Eric jumped up and away, and the titan blurred into the shadows as he ran past him, biting at the air where Eric's head had been.

And then he was gone, fading into the shadows again. Growling, frustrated, angry, Eric haunched forward but stayed on two legs as he started following the trail Caleb left for him. The bastard was luring him, no doubt, maybe looking for Eric to catch him. Maybe—

Weight crashed into Eric's back. The fucker jumped him, sank claws into his shoulders, and sank teeth into the back of his neck. Roars filled the room, animal and alien, as Eric stood up and unleashed his rage. Caleb hadn't gone for his hamstrings, like he should have. He went for Eric's back, his body, whole mass. Maybe he wanted to pin him, defeat him swiftly, instead of drag the fight on like an Irraka should?

Mistake.

Eric reached up, high and up over his head and Caleb's, and sank his claws into the man's back, through the tough, leathery skin, and into meat. The werewolf screamed and howled into Eric's bloodied neck, but didn't let go, jerking his head left and right, trying to rip chunks of flesh out of him. Eric leaned back, and then brought all of his weight forward, as he pulled on Caleb's flesh, and threw.

Caleb turned upside down, lost his grip, and careened through the air. His back smashed into a wall of concrete between two windows, before he crashed to the floor. Blood was everywhere. It painted them, coated them, splattered the area, and rained down on the cubicles and desks. None of that mattered. All that mattered, was attacking when the opportunity presented itself. Now.

Eric charged forward. Caleb had time to stand up, but that was all he had time for, as Eric crashed into him. Not a pounce, but a full charge, each step gripping into the floor and tearing it to shreds, anchoring him and fueling his momentum. It was more than enough to drive the hundreds and hundreds of pounds of muscle his new body had, into Caleb, through the wall, and into the street.

Shit.

---

---

~~Jack~~

Back to the tunnels.

The visit to Azamel's had been useful, in a way. It was useful to get inside Jeremiah's head and understand him more, but it didn't lend a change in their sweep choice, no chance to their tactics. Jeremiah had a personal vendetta against Azamel, as Jack had suspected, and they now knew the man had used magic to extend his life. Elen's magic? Maybe. Jeremiah seemed like a healthy fifty-year-old, while Elen looked over a hundred. If she had the ability to prevent aging, why not use it on herself from a younger age? Maybe she only learned it in her later years, and had spent hundreds of years a very old woman.

Christ, that'd suck. It was why Kindred groomed a potential child before embracing them; you kept your physical body at the point of the embrace, except for what the Kindred body could heal. His scars on his stomach would never heal, because they were fresh and extreme at the time of his embrace, to the point they were more of a deformity than a simple wound, and the embrace kept physical differences like that. Spending eternity with a nasty problem like being overweight, underweight, or being old, would be horrible.

Old. His mom? No, she wasn't old, not yet. In her mid forties and in great shape, since she'd put her life together. Would the embrace undo the damage of the coma? The brain damage? Would—

He shook his head, and sighed. Stop thinking about it. Stop it. Stop it.

“Want to talk about it?” Clara said.

“What?”

“About whether you’ll embrace your mother.” She managed a small smile, but he could tell it was her trying to hide how much sadness she was feeling for him. It made him angry, for a moment, before he let it go. She was doing a better job of meeting his gaze than other people. Least he could do was not snap at her.

“Me? I can’t. I ... I could try, I guess. But, it’s very draining on a vampire to create a childe, very ... raw, on the soul.”

She frowned with a glance before looking ahead again. The rest of the crew was behind them, but could hear the conversation, no doubt. “I guess that’s why Kindred don’t spread like a virus in the cities where we’ve run into them. Not a fast virus, anyway.”

“Indeed,” Isabella said. “We invest a part of ourselves into our childer. It can take months, or even years to recover from it.”

A part of themselves. A piece of Julias was inside him, and Viktor, and whoever came before. He shivered, and forced down the nasty thoughts.

“I ... I don’t really want to ... to talk about it.” Sighing, he put his hands in his pockets, and lowered his head. He did want to talk about it, but not with them. Maybe with Julias, maybe with Antoinette, but for now, no.

“Just as well you cannot spread quickly,” Athalia said. “The planet doesn’t need a plague like that to deal with.”

Jack twitched, but kept walking. No, don’t escalate that argument. You have a job to do. Focus on that.

Gloria didn’t seem to agree. “Plague? Kindred are not a plague! We are what we choose to be. Unlike you.” Jack looked back to see Gloria glaring at Athalia, and flicking her wrist at her a few times.

Athalia snarled at her, a raspy hiss that earned a squeak from the Mekhet. “Don’t mistake Dolareido for most cities with a vampire presence. The nature of vampires is to spread, slowly but surely, and take over, while turning humans into livestock.”

Isabella stopped, stepped between Gloria and Athalia, and glared at her. “We do not. Kindred are forever balanced upon a knife’s edge, wrestling with our past, our new selves, and our connections. Unlike monsters such as you, we never make decisions carelessly.” Gloria might have been quiet, but Isabella was not.

“Careless?”

“You got pregnant, didn’t you? What business does a monster have getting pregnant?”

Athalia glared at the vampire, and ground her teeth hard enough everyone could hear it. “Don’t assume you understand my life, leech.”

“I’ve lived a lot longer than you, monster, and I have seen and spoken with hundreds, thousands of kine. I know more about life than you ever will. You are the definition of a poor mother.”

Everyone froze, and stared. Ok, that was harsh. That was very harsh. Not that everyone hadn’t been thinking it, but Jack tried to keep an open mind. Athalia gave her kid up to an orphanage when she realized she couldn’t control the circumstances her horror created. That was reasonable, wasn’t it?

Much as that’s how his mind arranged the thoughts, logically speaking, he knew the acid boiling in his guts had a different idea. As far as the venom he wanted to spit was concerned, Athalia was a bitch who deserved to suffer, because of her daughter. Jack hated himself for feeling that, but he did, and he did his best to put the illogical feelings aside.

“Ladies,” Clara said, “we’re not out here to fight each other. We’re supposed to be hunting.”

“Exactly.” Athalia walked past them all, and didn’t bother to dodge hitting Jack with her shoulder on the way past him. “I don’t have to explain my life to any of you.”

Jack glared daggers into the tall, dark-skinned woman’s back. Her long black hair bounced against her back as she marched forward. Images of grabbing her hair, and whipping her into the side of the tunnel danced through his mind. It’d be wrong, it’d be horrible, but just a taste of that revenge against Angela through her bitch of a mother would be great. Great, and disgusting. Sickening. You know it won’t help you, Jack, so let it go.

“I wonder,” Isabella said, “if Jack’s poor mother is indeed embraced, what will she do, when she learns her daughter’s been murdered, by your daughter.”

“Everyone is someone’s son or daughter,” Athalia said, rage only growing. “The fuck do you want from me, vampire?”

“I want some truth and effort on your part, monster.” With a shrug and sinister smile, Isabella slipped ahead of Athalia, stopping her, and began to circle her, her vampire tendencies showing through clear as night. Circling prey. “Mister Terry’s report on what happened in the gargoyle creature’s nightmare was ... forgiving, in how it described your interactions. But I know mothers. What did you say that prevented her death, hmm? What words did you use to save your daughter’s much desired execution?”

Jack was surprised Isabella got her hands on the full report. It was for council and Right Hands only. A good argument to be wary of using technology to record everything, he supposed. And it was true that he hadn’t explained in great detail the final moments of the fight, only that Jeremiah had shown up and saved Angela at the last moment. That Athalia had begged him to spare Angela at the last moment? He didn't write that down, not in so many words anyway. Isabella was an ancilla vampire, smart, and had both the permission to access high level reports, and the intelligence to read between the lines.

No wonder she resented him for being picked as Right Hand over her.

“I'm trying to stop the hunters, my daughter included.”

“Will you kill your daughter?”

Jack already knew the answer to that question. Isabella wanted to know, though, and she had reason to. But god damn it, now was not the time to have this argument.

“No. I will detain her.”

Isabella scoffed, and folded her arms under her breasts. The corset under her jacket had, of course, made sure both breasts were high and bulging, and she kept the top few buttons of her jacket open so they were on display. When mixed with the ice cold gaze she was giving, it really made her look like a cruel mistress. She'd give Antoinette a run for her money, in presentation.

“You might detain her, but the rest of us will kill her the moment we get a chance.” Laughing, Isabella flicked her wrist, in a far more posh manner than Gloria had managed, and began walking again. “Or, perhaps, a Kindred will embrace her? What delightful revenge against a hunter, making them into the thing they hate.”

Isabella didn't get far before Athalia grabbed her shoulder and turned her around.

“Don't touch my daughter.”

“We’ll cross that bridge,” Clara said, “when we get to it. It’s pretty obvious she’s under Jeremiah’s influence, maybe Elen’s too. There’s no reason to think Angela is—”

“Angela is guilty,” Jack said. They all looked at him, but he kept his eyes on the tracks underneath them. “I’ve looked her in the eye, saw into her ... into her. She knew damn well what she was doing.”

Sighing, Athalia walked ahead of them, and ran a hand along the curving walls of the tunnels. “I can’t apologize for her, but I don’t want to kill her. She’s my daughter. I want to capture her, and show her—”

“Show her what?” Clara said, voice growing louder, far more than Jack expected from her. She’d been rather stable in this argument, and now suddenly not. Why? “Show her her mom’s a monster, but she shouldn’t be trying to kill you?”

“I—”

Clara stomped up to her, loud enough to make Athalia stop and turn to face her. “You’re going to get people killed on a fool’s mission, Athalia. Your daughter’s a hunter, and psychotic, like many of them are. Ever convince a hunter, ever, in your life to not hunt monsters? Werewolves and vampires, maybe. Maybe! Maybe, because there’s a connection to being human there. But monsters? A hunter looks at you and thinks they’ve found a literal incarnation of the thing that goes bump in the night.”

“That ... that is...” She didn’t have to say it, they all knew what she was going to say. ‘I am that incarnation’.

Jack found himself squeezing his hands into fists, until they stared to hurt. Literal monsters, they all were.

He remembered the thoughts he had, when he was trapped in that chair, being tortured. Athalia still had hope that there could be communication between hunters and monsters; he didn't. There was no talking, no communicating, no bargaining with these people. Vampires, werewolves, and monsters, trying to be the good guys? No. No, fuck that. Fuck that, fuck them, fuck it all.

He turned around, and started walking in the other direction.

"Jack?" Clara said.

"I'm going home. Sweep's over."

"Mister Terry?" Gloria said.

He didn't look back, didn't check to see if anyone was following him. He heard Clara's footsteps for a moment, and he damn well knew if he looked back, she'd be holding a hand out, silently asking him to not go.

He left anyway.

---

Mary's body hadn't started to decompose yet. It wouldn't, not for a little while, at least. The morgue was cool, and the metal cupboards they kept people in colder. And, he knew, corpses were cleaned and disinfected. It'd start to decompose eventually though, until someone embalmed it, and prepared it for a funeral.

Of course, there was no one to do that. Grandparents? All dead. Aunts and uncles? None that would make the trip to Dolareido for a funeral, for a sister who never talked to them anymore. Maybe it was a Terry thing, for family to become separated in some fashion or another. That made his mom, and Mary's post-Jack relationship unique, how the two bonded and became best friends—or so it had looked through the windows of their home.

"I remember," he said to Mary, smiling down at her as he pulled up a stool and sat beside her, "when you ran away, after dad died. I thought you were the most stupid girl on the planet, and a coward. A coward for running away, and stupid for not having planned it out at all.”

She didn't say a word. That was good. He wasn't looking for a conversation, just someone to listen to him.

“And I was right, of course. You were stupid, and a coward. But so was I.” Smiling, he reached out, and touched her shoulder with the back of his knuckle, grazing the bare skin, white sheet pulled down enough to expose her face, shoulders, and collar bone. “I just ran inward, instead of outward. We both abandoned Mom, but you came back. I ... I never really did, did I?” He grazed her shoulder a few more times, half hoping it'd wake her up. “Just, put a wall between me and everyone else. Pathetic, I know. And I kept that wall there, until I grew into it, stunted, misshapen. Miserable.”

What would Mary say to that? She was as much an airhead as Mom, and didn't have an introspective bone in her body. Like Fiona, she was happy because she lived in the moment, with no thoughts to get in the way. He was envious of her.

Maybe he shouldn't be. People who had little introspective ability ran headfirst into dangerous situations. Like, running away from home. That's what he told himself, thinking he was being smart and correct with his approach to life, using his stupid sister as an example. But then, unlike him, she made a mistake, and learned from it, like running away from home and coming back. He didn't make mistakes, and thus, learned nothing.

He was a child, incapable of growing up, because he was too afraid to take risks and get hurt.

“But, hey, I'm trying. You might just be proud of me, Mary. I've stuck my head out, and my balls, and even tried to shut my brain off for a while in some situations. Beautiful woman told me to kiss her, and I did. Best relationship I could hope for.”

Mary said nothing.

“I even did some other stupid shit I’m happy to have done. Nearly got killed, defending her against a psycho with a sword. Psycho with the sword is my friend now. Don’t get me wrong, I still hesitate to let myself out emotionally, all the time. Especially now, especially with this ... this thing, inside me.” Groaning, he stood up, and started to pace around, shoes making quiet clack sounds against the solid floor. With nothing but metal cupboards around, filled with dead people, the sound echoed. “Now, I’m not so sure I should let myself out of the box, you know? Every time I do, this fucking thing inside me starts barking, and roaring, and clawing at me, trying to get out.”

Mary said nothing.

“I told Ann, told her about it, and how it’s triggering some ‘rage’ issues inside me.” He air-quoted rage. It wasn’t a strong enough word. “Feels like I’m possessed by some spirit of wrath every time I so much as think about Angela. And that was before she killed you.” He stopped at his sister’s feet, and set his hands on the metal table. “She killed you. Stabbed you a whole bunch of times. And Mom.” Sighing, he put up his hands. “Mom’s still alive, for now. Life support. But, she was stabbed more times than you. She’ll probably die.”

With a slow step, he started to pace around again, circling the whole room, hands in his pockets. “That fucking woman, Angela. Scars, glass eye, I know she’s been through some shit. And her mom? Nothing like our mom. Athalia is cold, angry, bitter, and if circumstances were different, she’d probably be cruel and nasty. I’ve tried to lend her a hand, help her integrate into the city, but that’s not going well. Thought I made progress, but then her daughter fucked everything up.” Groaning, he threw up his hands, and stared at the ceiling. “Athalia is worth helping, worth trying to help. But, she doesn't want to kill her daughter. She's stuck between a rock and a hard place, and so am I."

Mary said nothing.

"What do you think? If I kill Angela, and I know I will, Athalia becomes my enemy; assuming she doesn't stop me from killing Angela. But ... but she killed you, Mary. You have to say something to that."

He walked over to her, and leaned down over her, one hand on the table by her shoulder, the other on her chin, her cheek, touching her with a skimming knuckle. "The last thing I ever said to you, did to you, was mind control you, wiped your memory of our encounter. You could have known I was alive. It would have been our little secret." Her eyes stirred. No, they didn't. He was staring at a corpse, expecting it to wake up, and his mind was desperate to see that. There was no stirring. "Can ... can you ... please wake up? I'm getting torn every which way, Mary. All I have are regrets, and ... and it'd ... it'd be great if you could wake up, and wash away one of those for me?" He stared, waiting, watching, but Mary denied him, holding perfectly still. "Please ... I'm begging you. I ... I've made so many mistakes, and not the good kind. I ruined so many ... so many things, from my first life, and now you're gone, and I can't fix them. Please come back."

Mary said nothing.

"I need to fix this! I have to fix it! I have to fix it ... fix it ... It's what I do, right? I fix things, get them working again. I did that for us plenty, when we lived together, right? Fixed your computer so many times. Fixed the stupid washing machine; took a whole god damn week of reading to figure out how, but I did, right? Fixed the DVD player. Remember when you were complaining about taxes, and I had to explain tax brackets to you? Fixed that for you.

“Been fixing things for my new friends and family too! Fixed the Viktor and Tony problem, fixed the Lucas problem, and now I’m some kind of peace maker between all the paranormals. Fixing those problems, making sure everyone gets along. I helped fix a spider problem! Remember how many spiders I killed for you, back at Mom’s? Like that, except a lot bigger.”

Mary said nothing.

He slammed his fist against the table, causing Mary to tremble. “I can’t fix this if you don’t get up! I can’t fix anything if you don’t get up! Please!”

Gulping down on the dry death in his throat, he set both elbows on the metal table, and rested his forehead to the cold material. His palms buried his head, hiding it away, as the gentle tremors started to work up his body. Crying. But without the Blush of Life, there were no tears. Dry heaves in his throat were all he managed, quiet things that forced up the withered, dried guts of a corpse.

Two Terry corpses, and one of them wasn’t ever going to move again.

“I’m sorry. I’m so sorry. It’s all my fault. It’s all my fault, and ... I can’t fix any of it.” He reached out, set his arm across her stomach, and pulled her a little closer, so he could press her shoulder to his head. “Please ... get up.”

Mary said nothing. She was cold, and still. Mary was gone, and all she’d left behind was a body.

He stayed like that for a while. Ten, maybe twenty minutes, crying a vampire’s quiet, pathetic cry. Nothing but dry whimpers. Mary didn’t mind. She lay there, unmoving, quiet, and let him cry on her shoulder. But, once the ache in his gut started to subside, he forced himself to stand, and smiled down at Mary.

“I’ll make sure you get a proper burial. You used to think angels were neat, right? I ... actually, I should take a visit to the house, shouldn’t I? Maybe I’ll find something meaningful to bury with you.” Silence. He nodded, letting the icy quiet sink in as he pulled the blanket back over her head. “Knowing you, it’ll probably be angels, or unicorns, or rainbows.” Everything that a cabinet in a morgue’s wall of corpses wasn’t.

He walked toward the door, and looked over his shoulder as he did. “Goodbye, Sis.”

Chapter 84

~~Damien~~

One of the hunters came out of the shadows. He recognized this one. A woman, short, thick with muscle, and with a shotgun in her hand.

“... you’re dead,” Damien said. “You were one of the hunters killed in the chaos, in the—”

“In Sándor’s chamber, yeah.” She came closer, tilted her head, and showed them her neck. There was a giant scar where an Uratha had torn into her.

“How!?” Matt asked, growling as he began to pace. The big guy put himself between the group of them, and the hunter, a protective instinct shining through. He probably thought of the four of them as his temporary pack, at least in some capacity. Good for them, they needed a frontliner.

“Oh, sorry, let me just spill all our secrets, and our master plan. Get me in a monologue, right?” Sighing, the hunter began to pace the barrier, going from wall to wall, mirroring Matt’s pacing. Matt was trapped in the circular trap though, while she was blocked by the previous barrier, straight as it cut across the tunnel. So she couldn’t cross the barrier made with black soot, while the amber circle beneath the paranormals trapped them. Or at least, that’s how it looked.

Perhaps they were in a stalemate? Unlikely. The trap had been set with a purpose. Perhaps she intended to undo the wall barrier, and then kill Damien and his group with the shotgun? If she did that, she opened herself up to being shot back, as the amber circle didn’t seem to block things like his sword. Both barriers were magical in nature, though, and perhaps the hunter had a way to attack through it.

He had to think. Think. Figure a way out of here, before the hunter took advantage somehow, and shot them like fish in a barrel.

“Tell me what I want to know,” the hunter said.

Matt growled, still pacing, while everyone else stood in the center. Damien found himself partly holding an arm out, keeping it between Fiona and the hunter. Vicky and Parker, naturally, stood furthest back, with quiet and unassuming faces. At least they weren't panicking; Damien could appreciate that.

“We're na gonna tell ye nothin!” Fiona said, frowning and sticking her tongue out.

The hunter raised an eyebrow, looking at Fiona with an obvious look of confusion, before she returned the frown. “Don't do that.”

Fiona blinked, and looked to Damien before the hunter again. “Do what?”

“Act like that.”

“... like what?”

“Like a person.”

Everyone looked at everyone else, vampires, monster, and werewolf trading glances with each other, as they digested that comment. The hunter didn't think they were people. How far did that belief go?

“Tae fuck? I'm a person!” Fiona's frown grew, and she stomped her feet.

“You're a soulless monster and a murderer.”

Damien sighed, and pressed his arm against Fiona as she tried to move forward, blocking her. So the hunter's belief extended into such an extreme, believing that paranormals didn't have souls. He knew he did. His faith reminded him of that every night. And, even without faith, vampires, werewolves, and monsters never abandoned their internal struggle with morality and ethics. If that did not prove existence of the soul, then what did?

But trying to prove that to a human was pointless. Once upon a time, Jack would have disagreed, and said that communication was worth it. Now, Damien doubted it.

“Ye dinnae ken! Ye ... dinnae get tae say that!”

Damien blinked, and looked down at the tiny redhead. There were tears in her eyes.

“I don't? How many humans have you killed, monster?”

Sniffing, Fiona wiped her tears away with fists, and stepped behind Damien. Less a shield from potential physical harm, and more a shield to hide her face, he could see.

“I've only killed the mean ones.”

The hunter rolled her eyes and pointed at Matthew. “And you, werewolf. How many humans have you killed? Vamps need blood, monsters need lots of different things, usually got from crushing humans into mulch. But you, werewolf? You don't need to eat humans. I bet you've killed plenty, though.”

This hunter knew a little about them, more than Matthew had predicted. That information alone was valuable, if a bit late.

“I've killed,” Matt said, glaring at the hunter as he squeezed his fists until they cracked. “I killed a crack dealer that had ruined a neighborhood, South of where I lived. I killed a few murderers, once

I managed to get my hands on them. And I've killed one hunter, some dumbass who thought I should die." The aggression rose in the man's voice, and Damien found himself stepping back from the large Uratha, pushing Fiona back along with him. It was hard to tell if Matt was talking about some past killing, or he was implying the inevitable with the hunter in front of him.

"Yeah, uh huh," the hunter said. "And the possessed? Ones with spirits riding inside them? They could be saved, but how many times did you just kill the human helplessly caught in the middle of your hunt?"

That was enough to stun Matt. The hunter knew way, way more than they could have predicted.

"That ... We avoid that as often as possible."

"Uh huh." She didn't sound convinced. "I'm looking for a reason to not kill you all, right now. cursory poking suggests there's no reason to spare any of you."

Damien snarled, and withdrew his pistol, holding it in his right hand while holding his sword in his left. He pointed it at her, and predictably, she smirked at him.

"Because if you lower the barrier to kill us, we'll shoot you. Is that not a good reason?"

Laughing, the hunter pulled something out of her belt. It took them all a second to recognize it, but she flipped the clear top off of some sort of small handheld metal tube, and showed the red button. A detonator.

Everyone looked at each other with raised eyebrow, confused, but Damien figured it out faster. He looked down and around, before he looked up at the ceiling above. Where were the explosives? It wasn't like the hunters could have simply dug into the concrete of the tunnel. Getting through that material required serious work.

A bluff? Maybe. Damien stared at her, watched her close, and continued to look for any signs of hidden explosives, until the others caught on, and gasped.

“You c-could cause a cave in!” Vicky said.

Yeah, she could, if she wasn't lying. A cave in would kill the hunters, and potentially kill Matthew and Fiona from lack of oxygen. Could Fiona dig them one of her special tunnels into her nightmare world in that circumstance? He didn't know, and he didn't want to find out in that situation.

“Smell any traces of anything, Matt?” he said.

The big man shook his head. “I don't smell traces of anything, somehow. Not ... not even things I should be smelling.”

Their sense of smell was being blocked, or mitigated. Shit.

“Crazy, right?” the hunter said with a laugh. “We have ways. As I'm sure you've noticed, we're not your average hunters. We're organized, and we're—”

“Working with monsters,” Damien said, slowly rotating his wrist with sword in hand.

“Just one.”

“One? I counted four.” Jeremiah, Angela, Elen, and the Begotten.

The hunter woman paused, spent a few seconds longer thinking about his words than Damien expected, before she started pacing again. “Jeremiah is a great man. Been hunting monsters for decades. Sold a big part of his humanity, to become a tool capable of destroying wicked things like you. Some would call that righteous.”

Matt snarled as he paced, though big as he was, the circle was a little cramped for his pacing. “He’s a psychopath. He’ll throw you to the wolves the moment we find and circle him.”

Damien smiled at Matt and his personal twist on the ‘throw you to the wolves’ line, before looking back to the hunter. “Elen, the shaman woman. How long have you known her?” No answer. “How old is she?” No answer. “How does she perform her strange magic?” No answer. “... how can you accept the murder of innocent people to fuel her—”

“She didn’t kill innocent people.” The hunter laughed and shrugged. “Dealers? Rapists? Scum who’ve not only thrown their lives away, but dragged other people down with them? Not one of us is crying over their deaths. World is better off without them.”

He frowned and raised a brow. That was harsh. These hunters had a steel resolve if they didn’t see a problem with that way of thinking, that was for sure. It was something Kindred and Uratha did, sure, kill humans they felt worth killing, in pursuit of their agendas. But humans killing humans was a different matter.

Damien put up his hands, though he kept pistol in one, sword in the other. “You seem willing to talk, while your comrades are not. Why?”

“I like to know my enemy. And maybe you’ll tell me what I want to know.”

“That’s it?”

“Isn’t that enough?” Shrugging, the short woman approached the barrier, and reached out to press a palm against it in front of her, eye level. She leaned her weight into the palm, too, proving how secure the flat barrier was. Two barriers seemed overkill to Damien, but then, these hunters were probably sick of failing in their encounters with the Kindred of Dolareido.

Sighing, Damien lowered his hands, and gestured to the rest of the paranormals trapped with him. "I'd appreciate it if you let us go."

She laughed. "Why would I do that? You're all monsters."

"Because if you let us go, we'll let you go. I'll report back to my superiors that not all the hunters are psychopath killers that need to die."

"Ha! Mercy, from a vampire?"

Damien shrugged. "God has mercy for humans, and plenty of it. Not for us, but for you."

That earned two raised brows from the woman. She pushed off the barrier to stand up straight again, and stared at him, tilting her head to the side. "I thought the Lancea et Sanctum were wiped out in this city."

How did these hunters know this much? It had to be Elen's magic, or Jeremiah's unusual skill set; or both.

"They were, except for me. I survived."

"Yeah well, God doesn't seem to give a shit about hunters, so you're not going to sell me on converting."

He sighed, louder this time. Dolareido didn't care for religion, and neither did the hunters. The only people who thought God still existed was him, who spent fifty years hiding underneath streets and in filth, and a dried-up corpse vampire woman, whose lover and loyal servant of God was dead. With the way the world was going, he couldn't blame people for their lack of faith. But a little faith could go a long way.

“Dolareido rarely had deaths, hunter, of those that didn't deserve it. Even Azamel, for all the ire she's earned, has done little since arriving. The Kindred of Dolareido have changed quite a bit since Tony and Viktor's deaths. Surely we weren't on any hunter radar.” Normally it'd be Jack saying these things, but the boy was in no mindset to be playing ambassador or peace talker; and he wasn't here. If Damien could pull it off, well, the better for everyone.

“You're right, you weren't. But, you gave that elephant freak monster sanctuary. And besides that, you're vampires. You'll eventually cause problems. We might as well kill you along with all the other paranormals. Kind of like a crusade, you know? And hey, if you're a God-fearing vamp, I'm sure you know what those are.”

Damien's sigh turned into a quiet growl. Jack was right. There was no communicating with these people, and that was infuriating because he knew not all the hunters had to be mindless killing machines or genocidal crusaders, with zero consideration for specifics. The Devil is in the details, and that was a painful lesson Damien had learned the hard way, a lesson these hunters had yet to.

He glanced over his shoulder at Fiona. The smile on her face had faded, and her shoulders slumped. She had stayed close to him, and was peeking out from behind him at the hunter. Scared. This was the first time she'd ever faced a hunter, while forced to stay in her vulnerable human body. Worse, this was the first time she'd ever heard the words of a true believer of their cause, someone of complete faith in their views of the world, willing to kill her.

Vicky and Parker were pressing up against the other side of the circle, trying to get out. They were getting a little more panicked, each trying hard enough to escape to force their shoes to slide on the concrete beneath them.

“ ... Matthew,” he said, “transform. See if you can break through this.”

The big guy wasted no time. The juggernaut of strength began to grow, fur pouring out of him as muscle mass appeared from nowhere. Weight, solid, heavy, filled his body, turning the already big man into a Goliath of towering proportions. The hunter stepped back and stared up as Matthew hit seven feet in height, then eight, then nine, and nearly hit ten feet. He would have, if it wasn't for how his head and neck set forward from the shoulders instead of above.

Damien had to step back to give the gargantuan creature his space. His arms were nearly as thick as Damien's whole body, and with the wolf's forward hunched posture, they dangled enough to almost reach the floor beneath him. His tail was big enough Damien had to step back several times to keep out of its way, and doing so drew his eyes to the beast's feet. Not paws, but monstrous feet that looked more at home on a dinosaur than any wolf, with talons there were already starting to puncture the concrete with the Uratha's weight.

The werewolf's breath was slow, but loud and heavy, enormous lungs fueling the giant creature. His snout was thick and long, and his mane of fur around his neck thicker than the short fur on the rest of his body, almost like a lion. His ears were pointed at the hunter, and he rumbled animal aggression deep in his chest loud enough Damien felt the vibration through his shoes.

The hunter gulped, but managed to keep her eyes on Matt as she stared up at the hungry, angry beast. Brave, this woman.

“The reason I'm this close,” she said, “is because this detonator won't punch through concrete from too far.”

However the barrier worked, it didn't seem to block sound. From further down the tunnel, a couple of hunters appeared, each armed with assault rifles, grenades, knives, the works. Shit.

Matt started clawing at the barrier. He had to get through the ring barrier that circled them first; the second barrier could wait, if they were going to even attempt it. Three hunters were manageable, but not if the one with a detonator started the fight off with an—

Boom. The shock wave was immense, far greater than Damien could have predicted; which was stupid, now that he thought about it. Their attack on the Begotten's nightmare had proven the hunters had access to heavy explosives. Why wouldn't they use some now? Well, they were in a tunnel, and detonating a high-yield explosive could cause it to collapse, especially since it seemed to come from above. They must have dug it in there somehow, or concealed it, for no one to see it or smell it.

The realities flashed through his mind, before other images did. A quick glance to Vicky, Parker, and Matt showed them all slowly turning their heads upward, to the source of the shock wave. The world had gone into slow motion, just like in the films. He brought his eyes to the small woman hiding behind him, and winced as he saw the shock painted on her face as she looked up.

His vampire discipline Celerity kicked into override, a thousand times more effective than any human's adrenaline. Speed at his fingertips, absurd speed, the sort that had let him cut off Antoinette's arm and leg, the sort that helped him save Fiona in the nightmare from the unrelenting gunfire, and now, it'd help him save her again, God willing.

Except, they were trapped inside the circle, and among the blast coming down for their heads, were giant blocks of concrete that would crush them into paste. Matt might live, but the rest of them weren't going to be so lucky. And yet, that reality didn't seem to stop him from trying. Parker was Daeva, another practitioner of Celerity, but the man wasn't ready for this; lazy idiot. As the blocks slowly fell, Damien sped toward him, slammed a palm into his stomach so he'd start falling down, and then slammed a palm into Vicky's back toward her partner, so she'd fall on top of him. He made sure his punches were downward angled, and strong enough to drive them into the floor fast so Vicky would land on him before the concrete did. She was a Ventrue, resilient, and had the better chance of survival.

He, on the other hand, was going to break like glass. Ah well. He threw a punch upward, hitting one of the falling blocks, the world still a slow motion symphony of falling death, and used the reversed momentum to drive himself down onto Fiona. Her golden brown eyes were wide with shock. He stared into them as he fell on top of her, smiling, and bracing his weight into his elbows as he put his chest over her head. With any luck, she'd live.

He didn't look up as the explosion crashed into them. It wasn't fire, napalm or such, thank the Lord. It was pure kinetic force though, and it crushed them all into the subway tunnel floor like pancakes. Pain wracked his body, a blanket of agony from head to feet, before the individual balls of pain joined in. Thud. Thud. Sickening crunches, sounds he recognized: bones breaking. He could hear them because they were inside his body, punching through the ringing deafness the explosion caused. Each crunch took a moment to echo with pain, but it did, and it wasn't long before the sonata of agony overwhelmed him. The concrete came in two waves. The first fueled by the explosion's punch, turning each giant block into enormous bullets, and with the second wave, larger chunks of concrete fell, slower, fueled by gravity.

One hit his back. Another hit his shoulder, then forearm of the same arm. Then the other arm, the hand. Another hit his lower back, and others hit his legs in various places. One falling block of death crashed into his ankle, and summoned a cacophony of misery through him as he felt the joint shatter. Another hit the floor in front of his head before toppling down onto his skull; lucky, or it'd have shattered his head like a glass jar.

Worse was the weight of the blocks. Jagged and misshapen, the heavy pieces of rubble crushed him into the ground, pinned him, dug into his broken limbs. He couldn't move, the weight unrelenting, oppressive, and uncaring. And, with time, all was silent.

But, he was alive; as much as a Kindred could be. Groaning, he tried to push against the floor, and couldn't. The very attempt reignited the pain into a concert of agony, and he groaned, unable to muster the energy for a proper cry or sob as his body shrieked in torment. A jagged, sharp piece of concrete was sitting on his head, but another was resting on that, pinning his skull down, and a mess of chaos and weight pinned his limbs. Bones were broken, a hand and wrist, an ankle, a leg, an arm, ribs, and he had the distinct impression one of his hips was, too.

The world was quiet. Underneath rubble, and lots of it, sound was muffled and turned into nothing more than quiet rumbles. Darkness. He groaned again as the pain danced up and down his body, demanding he move but knowing full well he couldn't. A Gangrel or Ventrue would have been able to take the blows better, but not a Mekhet. Vicky was Ventrue, so, maybe she'd pull through?

An explosion ripped outward from the pile that buried him, and his groans turned into shouts as he felt the weight shift, and the darkness split with beams of light. Someone had torn their way out from under the rubble. Matthew.

Half the rubble that covered Damien flew into the air, outside the barrier, including the block that pinned Damien's head to the floor. With it gone, he managed to lift his head enough to look around, and force down his groan as he started taking stock of the situation. His spine was intact, at least, if he could move his head, and send agony into his limbs trying to move them, too.

Vicky and Parker were still buried under the rubble. He looked up higher, ignoring the pain in his spine and muscles, and looked back to the source of the noise. Matthew, on the rampage. The giant beast roared fury as he ripped through the tunnel, barriers destroyed by the explosion; or the titan had succeeded in tearing through them. The beast sprinted down the tunnel, and gunfire erupted, but it was outside Damien's viewing angle.

“D-Damien?”

Oh thank God. He forced his head down to look at the face buried underneath his chest.

“Hey ... F-Fiona,” he said through clenched teeth. “Glad you're ... alive.”

Fiona frowned up at him, and started hitting his chest. “Ye fuckin bawbag! Tae fuck is wrong wit ye! Ye ... didnae have tae ... do that.”

He tried to smile, and managed it for a second or two, before the impacts of her tiny fists against his chest triggered the assortment of broken ribs to revolt against him. He swallowed down the pain as best he could, and let his head collapse against the floor.

“You injured?”

“I'm fine, awright? And ye?”

“... not so fine.” He couldn't find the resolve to dismiss his injuries, and more groans escaped him.

He could faintly remember the sight of Antoinette, filled with holes, a mangled corpse missing an arm and leg besides. She hadn't whimpered, cried, sobbed, or groaned. The steel resolve of the woman in the face of such pain, while he had to bite back his tears as he tried to roll off Fiona, was a testament to the difference in their abilities and age. It was a degree of resolve he strove for, and right now, it was ten thousand leagues beyond him.

But he bit down his pain and groans, a little, and smiled down at Fiona. "Can you move?"

"Aye!" She slid out from under him, and he coughed up some blood through clenched teeth. Shit, that was not good. Kine bleeding through the mouth was problematic, but if he was, a Kindred, it meant his insides were a broken mess.

Once Fiona was free of his body, he collapsed completely, and a few blocks of concrete rolled down from the pile onto him. That earned a short-lived scream, pain he was not expecting.

"Damien! Damien, ye fucking moron." She reached down, and tried to lift one of the blocks. She was a monster, after all, and spiders were strong for their size. But the blocks were heavy and large, and instead of lifting it straight off of him, she mostly rolled it off, and it crushed some flesh on the way off his body. "Shit fuck shit!" She set her hands on a block, and from a black silhouette of eight legs, started to spin webbing. The white thread, she shot out at the walls and ruined ceiling above, and its absolute stickiness was strong enough to get the weight off of him.

By the time she had the rubble off him, there were a dozen white threads latched onto what remained of the walls. Sighing, looking tired, she moved onto the rest of the pile, and started the same process. Damien lay there, and did his best to watch, but keeping his head up was proving impossible. He let it collapse, and listened.

"Vicky, Parker?" Damien said.

"They're alive." Sweating and grunting, Fiona continued to dig, and reached under some smaller rubble to grab their hands. It looked like his maneuver had been successful, and Vicky had protected Parker with her body. Ventrue resilience was a powerful tool, and in the moment, he was terribly envious.

More gunfire echoes filled the tunnels, along with animal roars that threatened to deafen anyone within half a mile; more than they already were. He felt the vibration of it through the tunnel floor, overshadowing the thunderous cracks of the rifles. Whatever was happening, it was beyond a bend in the tunnel, out of sight.

Vicky and Parker dragged themselves over to Damien, unable to stand, but in far better condition than him. With grunts and groans of their own, they reached out and took stock of him, lifting his broken hand, dented head, and other limbs. He shouted when they lifted his broken foot.

“If any hunters come back for us,” Parker said, “we’re fucked.”

Vicky sighed, rolling her eyes. “Mekhet and Daeva, you break like porcelain.”

Parker laughed. Damien clenched his jaw, until Parker peered down at him, and winced.

“Fiona,” Damien said, “catch up with Matthew, and see if he needs your help.”

“What? I’m na gonna leave ye, Damien, or the rest of ye. None of ye could fight a bee right now!”

He sighed, and turned his head enough to look up at the ceiling. Somehow, the hunters had managed to get explosives deep into the concrete, powerful ones. They hid the scent too, of themselves and the explosives. On top of all that, they used two different sorts of magical barriers to set up a trap, and get information. Maybe they hadn’t counted on a werewolf springing the trap, especially Matthew, Avery’s juggernaut, hence the hunter and her back up fleeing.

Damien looked over to Fiona as she moved over to sit beside his shoulder, and set a hand down on his neck. She frowned at him and stroked his skin. It felt nice.

“You’re limping,” he said.

“Ye’re more broken than a crushed box. Stop worrying about me.” Fiona shrugged and looked down at her legs in front of her. One leg was torn up, blood dripping from the wound. It wasn’t like Damien’s legs managed to cover hers perfectly, after all. But at least nothing she had was broken. “Ye going to be ... ok, Damien? Ye’re ... ye’re beat up, in a bad way.”

He stared at the blood on her leg, the exposed, pale skin, and sniffed. As his vitae did its best to mend his wounds, at least enough so he’d be able to use his limbs, it drained quickly. In moments, he was starving, and staring at the slow, dripping blood, of Fiona’s leg.

Pain, white fire, almost cold like ice on his withered veins, demanded he heal. And he was healing, thick Kindred blood pulling into his wounds and forcing his bones back into alignment while mending ripped muscles and tendons. It was slow though, very slow compared to the Uratha. Hours, instead of minutes. He wouldn’t be able to completely heal his wounds without going to sleep for the day, and a belly full of blood.

There was no one to feed on, though. He could feed on Vicky or Parker, but the Vinculum was to be avoided at all costs, not to mention addiction to vitae.

There was Fiona. He stared at her wound, glared at her, and he felt his fangs start to emerge. Thoughts melted away, buried in the agony, and gave rise to an animal need inside him. He was vaguely aware it was there, demanding he give in and let it feed. How long had it been since the Beast in him was let out, frenzy driving Damien to feast? Decades. Many decades. It was a forgotten feeling, the rush and exhilaration of the animal within, caring about one thing and one thing alone. Blood.

He wanted hers.

---

~~Julias~~

The three of the Invictus council watched the screen, and sighed. In their primary meeting room where the three did their usual private conversations, the giant touch screen on the wall allowed them to sort large amounts of information and break it down together. Right now it was showing a blueprint of Dolareido, and had various glowing dots. GPS signals from the phones Invictus were carrying.

Unfortunately, it was only the Invictus showing up, and that provided no end of frustration to the council. Garry didn't let them put trackers on his Kindred. Understandable, but still frustrating.

One of the lights lit up. Jonah's light. A second later, the three council members received a message on their phones.

"Looks like Mister LeBrun's run his distress app," Maria said as she moved over to the table to sit. Jonah was a serious sort, so if he was the one pressing it, it was worth considering.

Michael sighed, growling at the phone. "Not the hunters one, though. Seems he's in a fight with Carthians."

"That's Madam Herrington's team." Julias matched Michael's sigh, and sat back, putting his ass to the edge of the table as he watched the screen. The three dots were moving around in the same area, instead of sweeping the area like they should have been. "It wouldn't surprise me if she picked a fight with some Carthians."

“Give my childe a break, Mister Mire. Herrington’s been learning to temper her impulsiveness.”

“I wonder,” Maria said, “if her relationship with the Uratha has helped calm her nerves? Having a strong man to hold her in his arms, instead of a host of weak and helpless ghouls, may be settling her.”

Julias laughed and shook his head. “Maybe, but I doubt it’ll last.”

“The relationship?”

“No, her being less impulsive, if she is. Sorry to say, Mister MacDonald, but I’ve got thousands of solid hours of work with Herrington at my side. Impulsiveness is in her bones.”

The man laughed and shrugged. “What do you propose we do about this situation?”

“We can’t let this go unanswered,” Julias said. “Whoever’s to blame for this scuffle needs to be punished. We’re busy hunting hunters. Covenant squabbles are not allowed.”

The two elders nodded.

“I’ll go deal with it,” Michael said.

Julias blinked at him, and watched as Michael headed for the door. He was a tall guy with a big frame, lot of muscle, with a shaved head and a single chain that connected nostril to ear. He looked like a Carthian, except for the ten-thousand-dollar suit he wore, a shade of blue so dark, it almost shined with stars.

“Garry might drop by,” Maria said. “We can’t escalate the situation.”

“I won’t escalate it. I’ll settle it. If I have to break some arms, I’ll make sure to spread the pain around.”

Julias shook his head. “What if it’s the werewolves? Eric’s with Herrington, and we know Avery has a half dozen of her pack helping the Carthian sweep teams.”

“Then I’ll break them. Put them in their place.”

“We’re trying to be friends with Avery, aren’t we?”

“Not if they violate the Masquerade. Besides, it’s Garry I’m worried about having to deal with. Avery is reasonable. Tones is just a moron.” With that, Michael closed the door, and was gone.

Julias sat down next to Maria, and looked at her. The small corpse lady was looking at her tablet as usual, and scrolled through pictures with scans of ancient texts. Looked like Latin. Julias couldn’t read it, but it also included some pictures, drawn in ink on the parchment, and it didn’t take a genius to guess they were pictures of spirits. A bit of fire, with eyes. A gust of wind, with eyes. A pool of water, with eyes. She scrolled to the next page, and more pictures awaited, animals with strange features, like foxes with multiple tails, or deer with antlers of colossal proportions.

“What’s this?” he said.

“Research. There are spirits in Dolareido, but trying to communicate with them has been frustrating.”

Ok, that was a little surprising. He didn’t expect her to straight up answer him like that. Dodge the question, sure, but direct honesty? The only Kindred he’d expect that from was Jack.

“You’ve been trying?”

“A passing curiosity of late.”

“You know Avery won’t approve.”

Maria shrugged, and scrolled to the next page. No pictures, and a wall of Latin text Julius struggled to understand. Something about a wall between two worlds.

“I am not Minerva. I can fend for myself, should those dogs come to my door. And, I do not know whatever it was that let Minerva perform such successful experiments.”

Successful experiments? “How much do you know about her experiments?”

“Terribly little. Only that she spoke to things on the other side, and reached across the wall. How she did it, is beyond me.”

Julius nodded. Either that was all a misdirect by her, to convince him that she didn’t know how to do whatever it was that Minerva did, or she was telling the truth. From the way she said it, his instincts said truth, but she was much older than him, and had the better poker face.

“I wanted to ask you,” she said, “about Beatrice Damor.”

He leaned back in his seat and raised a brow. “Oh?”

“You two seem to be quite in love.”

“Yeah, we are.” Dangerous territory. Hopefully the Lucas and Maria comparison wasn’t going to be made.

“Do you plan to marry her?”

He chuckled and scanned the corpse’s face, looking for hidden meanings in the cracked flesh. “You think Kindred should marry?”

“I ... do not subscribe to ludicrous notions. We are immortal creatures, and we are not human. The sanctity of marriage and the roof it provides mean little to our kind. And yet ... I often think of it.”

“Think of marriage?”

“Something akin to marriage, yes. Two Kindred, forever devoted to each other—or at least for centuries. Hundreds of years ago, such pairings in Kindred were not so rare.”

“Hundreds of years ago, Kindred could subjugate entire villages, get a castle for themselves, and become self-made nobles. A different time.”

“Indeed.”

“But, if you’re asking would I spend the next few centuries or more with her, hell, maybe even eternity, at my side? Yeah.”

Maria sighed, but didn’t look his way, eyes still on the tablet. Didn’t look like she was reading though; rather, she stared off into nothing, the tablet in front of her. He couldn’t tell what brought on this topic, but it wasn’t like Kindred didn’t regularly sit and daydream about what ifs.

“You should tell her that, Mister Mire.”

“It’d sound an awful lot like a marriage proposal.”

“It would.”

“I ... I’m not sure how that would go, honestly. Triss is—”

“Tell her, Mister Mire. Ask her.” Maria lifted her eyes from the tablet, glared at him with enough frustration in her gaze to cut into him, before looking back to her studies. This time she did resume reading, and Julias knew better than to interrupt her, especially considering the look on her face.

It was strange to see Maria being emotional like this. Romantic. But it wasn't like he disagreed with what she was saying. Hell, it was the fifth secret he was going to share with Triss and Jen, that he wanted to marry Triss; or at least commit to that in the way Kindred did.

"I think I will."

"Good. Be—"

A phone ring came in, his phone. Sighing, he got up and answered it. "Madam Leauvion, why the call?"

"Mister Mire. I ... I wanted to inform you that we had to end our sweep early."

"What? Why?"

"Mister Terry felt it best to end it prematurely. Tensions were high."

Ok, not good. "Why are you calling me, and not Mister Terry?"

"He ... left, Mister Mire, on his own."

"On his own? Oh for fuck's sake. Thanks for telling me, Madam Leauvion." He hung up, and sighed as he headed for the door.

"We warned you, Mire," Maria said. It was obvious he'd been talking about Jack, of course.

"I know, I know. Guess I just expected ... I'll talk to him."

"Please do. Your childe has been a blessing to the Invictus, and it would pain me to see him perish due to bad decisions. If he left his mission without a companion, he will be easy prey for hunters."

Maybe. He might be easy prey. Or he'd kill them all.

---

~~Natasha~~

Chaos erupted. Once the strange faces on the wall spotted her and the others, there was no chance any of this was going to go well. She'd hoped to eavesdrop and then leave, but this place, this giant room of flesh and the dead, was alive. It saw them, through her Cloak of Night, and now the hunters were together, four of them, hiding behind some pulsating mounds of flesh as they readied their guns.

Natasha broke, dropping her Cloak of Night, and grunting little squeaky grunts as she pulled out her own pistol, her back to the flesh. "S-Sorry," she said. "It's ... hard t-to keep it going in here. So many eyes now." Hundreds of eyes from the wall of red meat behind Elen were looking, staring, gaze flitting about randomly.

Triss nodded and shrugged, before peeking over the mound of flesh they hid behind. "Hello there!"

Natasha raised an eyebrow at the Nosferatu, and grimaced as she looked to see what weapons the witches would bring to bear. Oh, right, they had none. She looked Jen's way too, and grimaced twice more. The Ventrue was too young for this, and unarmed except for a knife, the worst of the blood clans to not have a ranged weapon.

She expected the witches to be panicking. They weren't. If anything, they seemed eager for a fight, grinning and licking their fangs as they peeked around the flesh mound to scan the room. It was true that the witches hadn't had a proper confrontation with the hunters like Tash had, and that this would be their first crack at it, but it was the most horrible circumstance possible. No room for error here, and no back up yet. Would Daniel or Antoinette come? She checked her phone, and—no signal anymore. Of course not.

"So that's Elen," Aaron said. "And the Romanian guy is Sándor?"

Tash blinked at the Gangrel. Romanian? She peeked around the mound of flesh to see if she could still see the man. She could. He was standing now, shirtless, and she had to admit, really damn sexy. Sándor had dreamy blue eyes and a defined chin, with some short, dark gruff on his face that matched his buzzed dark hair. He might have been twenty-five years old. But, there was no way she'd be able to guess his nationality at a glance, or from the scant few words he'd said. Aaron could, evidently.

She nodded at him, and switched the safety off on her pistol. "It looks like he's b-being controlled by Elen and her magic." A far better explanation for how a fellow paranormal could have betrayed them, than the thought that maybe a paranormal simply wanted to help hunters out of the kindness of their heart. "I d-d-don't know how, but we should ... we should kill the hunters, capture Elen, and ... m-maybe detain the Begotten."

Jen nodded from her spot behind a giant rib bone jutting from the bloody skin floor. "Agreed, but I don't see how we're going to do that. I—" Shards of bone shattered outward from her position, and she squeaked before flattening herself to the rib as best she could, back to it and arms held in snug. Gunfire.

Tash stuck her head out, and managed to get a peek of Sándor. He was coming closer. Sticking her head out earned the ire of the hunters, and they unloaded at her, bullets slamming into the flesh around her. The alien flesh that encircled them acted like any human flesh would, when hit with a sudden assault of high speed metal shards. It rained blood, bullets tearing into the masses of red, spraying the crimson everywhere, and ripping up chunks of flesh to go with. The faces on the wall groaned and screamed in pain, but the hunters continued firing. They were connected to the chamber, somehow.

"Tash," Triss said, "this Begotten dude. He strong?"

“V-Very!”

“Othello, Aaron, you two take him. Don’t kill him if you can, but if he gives you no choice, rip off his head. Expect to get shot. I’ll be right behind you, and I’ll engage the hunters close range. Tash can shoot them.” She looked over Natasha to Jen, and made a gesture, pointing at her own eyes, then Jen’s, then at one of the hunters, then a fist grab in the air. Probably a gesture for Jen to Dominate one of the hunters once the chaos started.

The boys nodded, and ran in. No fanfare, no waiting for a ‘go’ order or anything. Witches did everything on the fly, and Tash was going to have to get used to that if she was going to survive this insanity. She stared at Othello as he jumped over the flesh they hid behind, and ran toward the awaiting hunters, and the monster.

Daeva were fast. He might not have been as fast as Natasha, but he was still fast. And Daeva were strong. Like Nosferatu, a Daeva could punch through concrete if they had the years and the vitae, and Othello had those things. It was almost unfair. He darted around the hanging chains, and came at the hunters, chuckling softly as he closed the distance in seconds.

A silhouette of an enormous wing snapped out, blocked Othello’s path, and slammed outward toward him. Half wind, half blurry darkness, it crashed into Othello’s body and sent him flying through the air, hitting the dangling chains, body parts, and the metal and hooks.

Aaron should have taken a second to reevaluate. He didn’t. Growling, the man stood up, and charged at Sándor, spikes erupting from his body as he closed the distance. Tash had seen this transformation before, in powerful Gangrel. Jessy did this transformation, a grotesque mess of muscle and bone. It was as if an alien creature had erupted from inside Aaron, and decided it should have spikes on the shoulders and back and head and elbows and knees and knuckles, and leathery skin to go with.

“Get out!” Elen said. Natasha peeked out again to see the old woman behind one of the tumorous mounds of flesh, in her wheelchair, a scalpel in her hand. It almost glowed with how it caught the amber light.

Othello laughed as he pushed himself up from the bloody floor of flesh. “We can’t. You closed the door!”

“Guess we found you with your pants down,” Beatrice said, poking her head out again. Tash did too, and groaned as two hunters took Sándor’s left side, and another two took his right. A wall between the vampires and their target.

“You are not welcome here!” Her shrieks sounded less human, more banshee-like, as she grew more irritated. It sounded like Beatrice guessed it right; caught with her pants down.

Except, pants down or not, the vampires were now trapped in a room with four hunters, a Begotten, and an old woman with a deceiving amount of power. Maybe they could cut their way out, if they had to; and they might have to. Sándor had been an overpowering presence in the nightmare, and she had no idea if that translated to the physical world.

This chamber of flesh and blood was the physical world. How was that possible? Think think think. The sacrifices, those had been focused on a single thing: the human body. Organs, tendons, sinew, muscle and blood, whatever it was Elen did to do her magic was based around that. What kind of magic was based on that? Not even Crúac was so debased, so disgusting and horrible. Not that she was an expert; she knew almost nothing. But as far as she knew, Crúac was some sort of blood magic for vampires that used vitae, and it was often brutal and grotesque, but not always.

If someone could do magic-y things with vampire blood, and the vitae it contained, could someone do the same with human blood? Why did they sacrifice kine in other locations though? If Daniel found the other locations, maybe whatever it was that they did, was something the sheriff could track.

That made her frown. Kine were for feeding on, not for butchering, especially not for lunacy like this. A strange feeling, one she'd never really felt before, getting possessive over their flock. The Prince would have been proud.

She poked up over the mound, and started shooting. The hunters had been mostly behind cover, staying close to Sándor but keeping some flesh or bone things between her and them. But their heads or hands were poking out, and those were good enough targets to shoot at. She grinned as one of the hunters yelped, when she landed a bullet against his gun. It'd have been better if she shot his finger, but hitting the gun was better than nothing.

She changed targets to the shirtless man, Sándor. He was a Begotten, and Begotten were tough when in the nightmare. But out here, in the physical world? She pointed her gun, and aimed for his knees.

The man knelt down on one knee, and brought his arm around over his chest to place his knuckles to the bloody floor of flesh. A shimmer of blackness covered him, and the wing of the gargoyle appeared for a split second to catch the bullets. Shit. He stood back up, glared at her, and started walking for her.

Aaron ran past him. The monster reached out for him, but Aaron slipped under his arm, and sprinted toward the hunters. More and more spikes covered him, erupting from bones in strange ways, until Aaron didn't look human anymore. He fell to his hands, and jumped up onto the chains. Oh, gross. His claws tore into the body parts that were strewn about the chains on meat hooks, and he swung from chain to chain as the hunters raised their weapons to him. They unleashed a hailstorm of bullets, and the chains clinked furiously, sparks flying, as well as chunks of meat, as the bullets collided with the hell scene.

Othello got up, and darted in, coming for Sándor. With the Begotten looking up at the monkey Aaron, Othello had a second to get in closer, and pull back a fist. Growling, Sándor jumped back, but Othello was on him in seconds, and he pounced him. Anyone would have fallen over with the impact and weight of Othello, but Sándor remained standing, apparently far heavier than he looked.

The silhouette of the man's wings snapped out once more, and he stepped forward, hands connected with Othello's, the two of them locked in a battle of strength. And Sándor was winning.

Triss vanished. Natasha looked around, and gulped as she watched the foot puddles the invisible Nosferatu made as she ran into the chaos. The hunters caught on quick though, and as Beatrice leapt around, splashes following her, two of the hunters changed their target to her.

Not two, just one hunter. Jen had gotten closer in the chaos, and when she peeked out from behind another rib bone, one of the hunters looked at her.

“Lower your weapon,” Jen said, confident, insidious grin on her face.

The hunter froze. He had an opportunity to shoot Jen, but he didn't. He stared at her, arms trembling, fingers fighting to keep a grip on his gun, head twitching. A mistake, to look her in the eye. But it was dangerous for Jen too, standing there, staring at the man, herself exposed as well.

When the other hunter turned to face Jen, raising his gun, Beatrice reappeared, and swung her claws down at her. The hunter jumped back, and rolled backward, soaking herself in blood as she came to her knees. Holy shit these hunters were good.

The other two turned to face Beatrice, putting their back to Natasha. Tash stood up, aimed, and sank two bullets into one of the hunter's back. The woman cried out as she stumbled with the impact before falling. And then she got back up, turning onto her back, a blood puddle half covering her body, as she started shooting at Natasha. Kevlar armor under her jacket, probably. A bullet whipped past Tash's head, and she ducked back down behind her flesh mound cover.

This was the weirdest fire fight, in the history of fire fights.

She peeked over again to see Beatrice grappling with two of the hunters. She was super strong, being a Nosferatu, but these hunters were brutally efficient, and they grabbed her and used her light weight against her, lifting her so she couldn't anchor and throw or tear. Aaron jumped down from the chains, and Tash thought for sure he was going to help Triss, but he ran for Othello instead.

In the insanity, Natasha had stopped watching Othello. He was fighting the Begotten one on one, and he was losing. The two were still locked, fingers and palms together, squeezing, but Othello had fallen to his knees, and his head was hanging between his arms. How the hell was Othello losing a fight of strength?

Aaron jumped the Begotten's face, and started slicing. Sándor let go of Othello's hands and jumped away, before he thrust his palm out, and the shadowy silhouette of the colossal creature slammed a wing into the Gangrel. Aaron went flying, knocking into chains and the body parts hooked on them, but he managed to land on his feet.

Everyone was too busy to really care that the wall of faces was chanting again. They'd closed their eyes, and Elen wheeled herself away to put her back into a groove at the base of flesh wall. There, she started to repeat the chant the faces on the wall were saying.

Her wheelchair looked less like a wheelchair, and more like a proper throne, with how it sat underneath and between a host of visages.

Arms, sickly gaunt and pale, oozed out of the fleshy wall between the faces, and began to encircle Elen. A wall of meat and bone. Either this flesh room thing was sentient, or Elen had summoned them. Gross gross gross.

Beatrice continued to wrestle with the hunters, while Natasha shot a few more times at them. But they did a better job staying in cover this time, and when Beatrice jumped toward their cover, they unloaded two dozen shots her way. Bullets ripped into her and pushed her back, enough of them cutting through her flesh to reverse the momentum.

Oh no. This was going badly quickly. It would have been easy to handle, if Sándor wasn't proving ridiculously strong. Beatrice was forced to fight three hunters, while Jennifer kept one of them frozen, occupied. Unfortunately for the Ventrue, she was too young to rip the man's will away completely; hunters had far too much resolve, and Jen wasn't Jack.

Ok, think fast think fast. She poked her head out, and started shooting again, forcing the hunters to stay behind cover as Beatrice dragged herself behind some cover as well. Sándor remained in the open, and as Othello and Aaron both jumped the man again, the beautiful man slapped them both down with the wing silhouette, slamming them into the shallow blood of the fleshy floor, and causing it to splash everywhere. Everyone was coated in it, and with how it was crashing and slathering everything in red, a little got into Natasha's mouth.

It tasted human.

"Release the B-Begotten, Elen!" Natasha said. Might as well delay the chaos a little, until she figured out what she could do.

One of the hunters cursed, loudly, and started shooting at her. “Fuck you! We’re fighting fire with fire, you filthy monster.”

Natasha rolled her eyes as she slapped in another magazine. To Kindred, and probably every other paranormal, that was some terribly cheesy dialogue. She poked her head out again, and squinted as she scanned the room, looking for the three hunters. Still where they were, but Tash could see they were concerned about Beatrice sneaking up on them again, or one of the boys running for them, or Natasha shooting them if they got caught out. If only Sándor wasn’t there, ruining everything, this would have been easy.

Triss got back up, and vanished again. The hunters started firing at the splashes in the blood her feet made, but stopped a few seconds later, as the splashes came in close to Sándor.

“Sand, look out!” one of them yelled. But the Begotten was too busy fending off Othello and Aaron to do anything, as the invisible woman rushed for him.

Her invisibility ceased as she jumped Sándor’s face, her claws on his chest. Gunfire tore Natasha’s eyes away from the mess of vampires digging into the monster, as one of the hunters started firing. She expected to see one of the Kindred getting shot, but instead, the hunter Jennifer had Dominated was shooting at the other hunters. The hunters panicked and spread out, throwing themselves to different points of cover as their friend fired wildly.

The hunter Jen controlled fought to free himself, eyes glaring, jaw clenched, gun hand shaking. But, somehow, she’d managed to get enough control of him to prevent his escape. Impressive.

“Wake up!” Beatrice said. Tash snapped her vision back to the three Kindred, and winced at the sight of them bringing the Begotten to his knees. Triss was tearing at the man’s back, trying to destroy whatever symbol it was Elen had carved there.

“No!” The old shaman in the back shouted, hidden behind her wall of curling arms and layered fingers.

Blood flowed into the grand chamber with all the grace of a typhoon. It came from beneath, from around, from above, surging and crashing against the walls and flesh tumors and chains alike. Geysers bulbed up from the flesh underneath them, and bloodfalls fell upon them. It shot out from torn holes in the walls like gunshots out of a tsunami, and one slammed into Natasha hard enough to send her flying into the back wall.

She kept hold of both her weapons, though. Progress over last time an explosive force had hit her.

Blood flowed over them, crashing, splashing, churning. As if someone had broken a dam, it swirled with chaos as walls of red turned the world into a whirlpool. Any attempt to get her bearings, any attempt to grab onto the giant bone ribs that filled the room, was pointless. She screamed into the torrent of crimson as her body was thrown into the chains. Body parts with hooks sticking out of them caught her, tore into her, ripped a few inches into her, but didn't hook her.

She dared not open her eyes. It wasn't red water, it was blood. It was thick and overpowering, and a part of her wanted to drink it down in the madness, but she had no idea what would happen if she did that. Worse, she could feel it getting into her wounds. As the crashing waves ripped her up and tore up her clothes, she had to wonder if the hunters and Sándor were going through the same thing. It didn't seem like it, from the little she managed to see when her head broke over the waves. The hunters were by Elen, where the blood did not touch.

Sándor, on the other hand, had managed to grab hold of one of the dangling chains, and was weathering the raging waters with all tenacity of a colossal boulder. It crashed against him, but he did not give into the heavy liquid. Tash stayed curled up as a ball, knowing full well if she stuck her arms or legs out, they'd snap in the liquid insanity.

And then they got sucked out. She choked on a bit of the strange blood as the new momentum pulled her stomach up into her throat. Her back hit something soft, then hard, as she bounced around a smaller area, the tunnel they'd come in from. Like a ball bouncing around in an arcade machine, she ricocheted over and over, body hitting bone and flesh of the snake-like entrance tunnel, until she landed on her back on something much harder than bone.

The concrete of the basement greeted her, and she coughed and sputtered up blood as she lay there, staring at the dark ceiling for a moment. Once reality set in, she sat up quick and looked around; no sword, and no pistol. Damn it, dam—oh! She scooped through the blood, picked them up, and sighed as she put them away.

She groaned as she forced herself up onto her feet, and glared at the tunnel entrance. Blood flowed out of it, and so did Beatrice, Othello, Jennifer, and Aaron. Once they were in the basement with her, a foot of blood around them, the tunnel of flesh closed itself. She stared at the flesh, and walked up to it as it started to turn darker, and darker, until it blocked off the amber light completely. She touched it, and sighed as her fingers found concrete, the same concrete of the rest of the basement wall.

Absolute blackness. She used her Auspex, and her unique quirk to see in darkness, and gasped as a white circle, something drawn with chalk or something, appeared. They'd drawn some sort of summoning circle, and—wait, this was the same circle they found at the ritual sacrifice sights. It wasn't a summoning circle, it was a traveling circle! Traveling to ... some sort of ... weird flesh chamber thing. Gross, so gross.

She looked down at herself, and then the witches. They were all soaked. She'd hoped that, once outside the strange chamber, the blood would go away, but it did no such thing. It was real blood.

“Natasha.”

She squealed and turned around. A light flashed, and she raised a hand to block it before it incinerated her eyes.

“S ... Sire?” She sighed relief as Daniel stepped down the last few stairs, except stopping before the final two. Keeping his shoes above the blood, no doubt.

“I see that you’ve encountered something suspicious.” He gestured to the blood, and the four witches sitting in it.

Beatrice laughed and stood up. “You could say that.” Groaning, she tried to wipe the blood off, but it soaked and coated everything. “You boys ok?” she said to Aaron and Othello.

Othello nodded and stood up. Tash tried not to stare, but, the man did have an obnoxiously sexy look to him with his dreadlocks, and all the blood dripping down his tan skin. Yum. Aaron, on the other hand, was still covered in all the strange mutations and protrusions Gangrel grew when they wanted to fight; or at least, the powerful Gangrels. It was haunting.

Sighing, the boys climbed to their feet, before Aaron reached out to help up Jen. As he did, the spikes disappeared, along with the grotesque leathery skin, and the deformed facial features that had him halfway to some sort of dragon monster thing. It didn't bother Jen though, and she took his hand with a quiet slap of wet palms. She got up, and groaned as she adjusted her now only half-on bra, still shown blatant since she kept her shirt unbuttoned.

“I'd offer a cloth,” Daniel said, “but I feel it'd be pointless.” The five vampires looked at him, and laughed. “Report?”

Natasha nodded as she took off her jacket, and began to wring it out. “W-We found Elen, and Sándor. Elen seems t-to be able to use some kind of ... flesh ... magic? Whatever it was, it w-was alive, in a way. And she could-d-d control it. It was a chamber of flesh, and body parts and ... and—”

“And,” Daniel interrupted, “is connected to the sites where I found the sacrificed.” He nodded toward the wall past them, his light now shining there.

“Yeah!” Learning things was exciting. It sent a jolt of joy and energy through her, to see they were making progress in their goal. Happy worker bee syndrome. “The chamber Elen uses ... it was ... it was gross.”

Her sire raised a brow, before shining the light around at the foot-deep blood pool that filled the basement. “Clearly.”

---

~~Eric~~

Eric stomped out of the building, through the hole in the wall he’d made. A part of him was sad about that, something about a Masquerade he should have been paying more attention to, or worrying about more. A larger part of him wanted to beat this bastard into the ground. A massive part of him could barely think as bloodlust poured over him, and demanded he fight, demanded he hunt, demanded he do what animals did. Assert dominance.

Caleb got up quickly, but Eric was already running forward. A run, proper, full, all out run. Every step was a smashing weight into the black earth, and he grinned as he felt each step tear up the hard ground behind him. It felt good. It felt so damn good to be out in the open, and let his warmed up body swing. He’d yet to do this in this Gauru form, and god damn it, it felt amazing.

Eric crashed into the man, and a metal cage on four, round legs on the side of the black path crumpled underneath Caleb's weight as Eric drove his fellow Uratha into it. Glass shattered and went everywhere. Caleb didn't let it stop him. As the two met eyes, Caleb roared up at him, and slashed out at his chest, despite Eric pinning him to the metal cage by his shoulders. Eric didn't think he'd have to dodge claws, but the new Beast in him knew better. He jumped back, and dove back in, trying to pounce after the escape, like Caleb had done to him a minute before.

Caleb jumped. Eric slammed into the bent metal, claws shredding through it like dried leaves in the Fall. As he ripped his claws free, the bastard landed on him, and started clawing at his back. A set of teeth came down for Eric's neck, but he threw his weight back, driving his talons further into the black earth as he used his strength to send Caleb flying back off of him. His rival weighed many hundreds of pounds, but that was nothing for Eric. In fact...

As Caleb landed, Eric grabbed the metal cage, one hand underneath and one on its rear, and he sank his claws into the cold, hard material. With a little leverage and grip, he anchored his talons into man's black earth, and threw the cage at Caleb.

"Eric! Eric, stop!" Jessy said. "Holy shit, you guys can't—"

The heavy, hard object crashed upon his rival, and pinned him. Within seconds, Caleb ripped the metal cage in half, sending shards and bits of its strange guts about the hard black they walked upon. The undead watching gasped, and stood, staring, no longer fighting. Nine undead in total, watching the two Uratha rip the man-made world apart in their Luna-given lust.

Fine by him.

He stomped after Caleb, and his fellow wolf met him between the tall human structures. They crashed against each other, and started to bite and tear. There was a reason for this, some reason they were fighting, some sort of preparation, or ritual, or test. But it was a blur, background noise in his mind. All that mattered at the moment, was beating his rival, beating him into the hard, black earth of the human den.

Caleb charged at him, and Eric met his charge, roars deafening the watching undead. But his rival was smart, and fast, ducking underneath Eric and dodging to the side to avoid his claws. Caleb was slightly bigger than Eric, but he was Irakka. The sneaky wolf lived and breathed shadows, and that meant he had a weakness in direct confrontation. Eric was Cahalith, seeker of glory. He wanted to face his threat head on, and he reveled in the blood, both of theirs, as it painted the dark, hard earth.

He turned, and roared. Not the same roars as before, the normal sound of beasts trading instinct and aggression, but something else, something from the spirit side of him. He'd done it a minute before, in the human structure, and it had startled Caleb. Doing it again did the same, bringing Caleb to a sudden halt, enough time for Eric to charge him. But Caleb got down onto all fours, and sprinted around Eric, a burst of speed from four sets of claws helping the creature circle around him and go for the hamstrings.

Teeth tore into his calf, and Eric screamed, guttural and alien in his throat. Caleb didn't let go, and with four sets of claws sunk into the black earth, he had the leverage to pull the weight out from under Eric. He was not gentle. Fangs ripped into Eric's leg, ripped out muscle, ripped out skin, and the beast's thrashing forced his leg to bend sharply and way too far. Crack. His shin broke, and Eric shrieked again as he started clawing at his rival. Bleed. Bleed! Die!

"Get off him!" A woman's voice, human voice. Undead voice? Someone ran over to them, spikes jutting out of their shoulders, their knees, their hands. Massive claws, and a face he didn't recognize. They dashed in, and started clawing at his rival, drawing far more blood from Caleb than Eric would have expected.

Someone was interfering in his duel.

Caleb didn't let go of Eric's leg, but he was no longer thrashing. He was trying to see what was going on, who it was that was clawing into him, and that was enough time for Eric to realign his knee over the bone. He roared in a mix of agony and rage as his body mended itself, spirit and flesh sewing muscle and bone together in seconds. It was enough for him to turn, jump down on the beast, and begin tearing. Caleb was caught off guard, and for the moment, stunned.

The intruder continued to interfere, stabbing spikes into Caleb again and again, until his blood coated his side where she'd punctured him. Eric reached out for her, and wrapped her hardened, spiky body in his grip. So light, he was easily able to lift her, and hold her in his one hand, wrapping her waist almost entirely between finger and thumb.

“Eric! Wait, it's me! Jessy!”

He stared at the creature. Spikes, and leathery hard skin. Jessy? His mate? He breathed deep, and the subtle Kindred scent of her hit him harder, enough to jolt his insides. Yes, he knew this person. This was his mate, in her strange battle armor some of these undead could use. He—

Everyone froze as a tenth undead stepped around a distant corner. Caleb let go of Eric, and Eric stopped clawing at him with his other hand. The two of them stood up, and stared past the nine undead watching, to the newcomer.

A man walked forward, white, a bald head, with some metal attached to ear and nostril. The watching undead parted, and gave the man room. They were shivering.

“Boss,” the black man with the teeth and claws, Jonah, said. “We, uh, we got—”

“Shut the fuck up, Mister LeBrun.”

“ ... yes, Mister MacDonald. Apologies.”

The bald man, MacDonald, looked to the other undead, and snarled at one of them in particular. “Joe. You start this?”

Joe backed off, but he kept his chest high; trying to be intimidating. A pointless gesture. Eric could feel the presence of this new undead, and how greater it was compared to the tiny Joe creature.

“Just a scuffle, put Jessy in her place.”

“And this?” MacDonald yelled, gesturing to Eric, and his rival.

“Sire, it’s not ... um, not what it looks like.” Jessy squirmed in his hand, but Eric did not let her go. The presence of this new undead had shocked him, Caleb, and everyone into a moment of peace. Eric could faintly remember the creature’s name, too. Michael. One of the leaders of the Invictus pack. The words meant little to him anymore, but this brute of a human-looking creature was powerful.

“Put her down,” he said.

Growling, Eric and Caleb both gnashed their teeth at Michael. This man with the metal on his face wanted to take away his mate, like a father wolf, unhappy with another for advancing on their pup. But Eric was no juvenile. This spiky creature in his hand was his mate, and he’d earned that right. She wished to mate with him, and he with her. No one was going to stop that.

Eric took a step back, turning around, and set Jessy a ways away on the black earth, far from the inevitable fight.

“Um, Eric?” Jessy said, the spikes and hard skin on her body disappearing. Back into her regular form, he leaned down and offered her a long, gentle lick along her neck. Soft, compared to him. Small. The smell of her was subtle, but he knew it wouldn't be later, when she pretended to be alive, like these undead creatures did. He'd breathe in her scent then, take her in, and mount her. He couldn't wait to hear her mewls when he'd force himself into her tiny body, and feel her lust soak him.

But not until he dealt with her annoying father.

He turned back again to face Michael, and started a slow march toward the man. Another duel. But this undead creature was no Uratha, and Eric still had plenty of strength left to bite and tear. His rival could wait.

“Holy shit. Eric, you can't—”

Eric snapped his head around and growled at his mate, rumbling deep and loud in his throat. Gulping, she put up her hands, and took a few steps back. He'd defend her from her father wolf, claim her for his own, and if that meant hurting this Michael creature, so be it.

His rival was looking at the undead creature as well, growling, rumbling, and pacing. But he wasn't going to join in. No, Eric was going to have to break the undead, before he could return to his proper duel with Caleb. It wouldn't take long. He took another step toward Michael, and roared with all his rage and hunger, until his voice rolled over the black earth, the hard dens of the humans, and throughout the night. A proper Cahalith roar, one the other auspices could not match. It was enough to make Michael draw back his head, and wipe a finger across his nose.

“Boss!” Eric's mate called out. “Uh, I don't ... this wasn't supposed to happen, you know? And ... I don't think Eric's listening anymore. Caleb?” She looked over to his rival. “Caleb? ... ok, um, we have a problem.”

Caleb had readied himself, biting at the air and growling quietly, pacing, but not interfering. Whatever it was Jessy was asking of him, Caleb did not indulge.

“I’ll knock some sense into them,” Michael said, “and then you’re going to have to explain how the fuck this happened.” The undead gestured to the Uratha, the hole in the hard surface of the human dens, and the torn asunder metal cage.

“... careful Boss, the guys are fucking crazy in this form.”

The undead snarled and marched forward, adjusting the neck of whatever human fabric he was wearing on his chest, and sighing as he did. “Yeah, I know. Got some thralls combing the area to make sure there’s no one around to see any of this.”

The world of came a stop, and everyone froze, as the man’s skin began to churn. Like a bubbling ocean, Michael’s skin opened, revealing flashes of dark, unnatural blood within his carcass that hugged his insides. As more of him twisted and bubbled, he grew in size, adding a head’s height to him. Like his daughter, Michael started to grow spikes and hardened skin; these Gangrel corpses could change their bodies in strange ways. Taller again, the undead grew, and the spikes that emerged from his body were immense, and grotesque. His fingers grew claws, and the claws were hooked. His human fabrics began to disappear, and Eric stared as inhuman mouths appeared on the man’s skin, swallowing the fabric.

Michael took a step forward, and as he did, an arm fell off, fading into ash. A giant arm of monstrous size grew in its place, growing out of him with the speed of wind, and the size of an elephant’s leg. Eric took a step back as the undead creature leaned onto one side, weighed by the giant arm, and it only got worse as more spikes grew from it. Michael now walked on two legs and the one hand, each step causing the gargantuan arm to hit the black earth. Upon his back, wings began to grow, bat wings.

It got worse yet again. As Michael grew closer, his legs thickened, and talons erupted from his ape feet, far larger than Eric's. This lopsided, grotesque monstrosity charged at him, bellowing a cry of gargled rage Eric had never heard before, in his dreams or life. It was not natural.

But, if this was the creature Eric had to fight for the right to be with his mate, possess her, own her, then so be it. He roared in return, and met charge with charge.

Michael's wings grew in size, filling the space between human dens, fifteen wolves wide, and he flapped them a single time to send him up into the air, over Eric. Wind crashed against Eric, blinding him with dirt and dust, before the strange undead fell upon him.

Heavy. The corpse man had been maybe a quarter of Eric's weight, before he started to change. But now, he was far heavier. As if the undead had eaten a mountain of rocks, Eric struggled to deal with the weight of the monster on his back, and he felt, and heard, the crack of his bones. Michael's one giant arm clawed at Eric's back, and ripped into his fur, shredding his skin and flesh, while pinning him under its grotesque, unreal weight.

"The might of the werewolf, defeated so easily." Through the mess of his gnarled mouth, twisted fangs, and crooked jaw, the colossal creature hissed down at him. His one normal-sized arm was covered in spikes, and he used it to stab Eric again, and again, and again, each earning shouts of pain from the pinned werewolf. Each was white fire into Eric's body, earning roars mixed with whimpers and yelps. "Be happy I'm not Jacob, or you'd be dead."

Eric roared into the black earth, and tried to get up, but the corpse used his giant arm and pushed Eric's snout into the hard surface. Crunch. Teeth broke inward, and so did some bone.

"You're not selling yourself very well here, Eric. Jessy insists you're useful. So far all I see is a mindless dog that I can easily defeat in combat. You should—”

Eric twisted, and drove his elbow up into the monstrosity’s face. He didn’t know why, didn’t know where the idea came from, but he knew to do it. Something inside him told him to, told him to use the elbow, when he couldn’t get the leverage to use his claws. And, it was a delightful sensation, to feel the man’s face crack against the bone.

Michael the abomination rolled off of him from the forced momentum, before coming back to his feet. A disgusting creature. It was something that would have crawled out of the earth, out of the tunnels humans had dug, out of the mounds of dead that humans buried in wooden cages, if a Host from ages past infected the human world, or if a Magath of flesh and destruction and corrupted animal had come for vengeance. It was horrific, and repulsive. It should die.

Eric got up, took a step toward him, and collapsed onto a knee. He clutched at his side, and whined as blood coated his palm. Not just coat, but gush over. He looked around at the hard black earth beneath him, and another quiet whine escaped him as he noticed the amount of blood. It was his blood.

Dizziness hit him, and he planted a hand to the ground as he struggled to keep from collapsing. How many times did this beast stab him in only a few seconds? It must have been dozens. How many bones did he break? Again, dozens. In the haze of pain and midst of blood loss, Eric fought to keep the darkness in his mind from taking over. He would sleep if he gave in. He would die.

All this, for a duel for a female. He looked over to his mate, and froze. She was staring at him, eyes wide, hand up to her mouth, covering it. Shocked. Scared. Worried. He didn’t want her shocked, or scared, or worried.

Michael charged him again, ripping Eric’s attention back to him. The black earth tore up underneath the abomination’s enormous talons, and his wings tucked in to his misshapen back of spikes and flesh nodules. His massive arm crashed into the ground with each step, shaking the earth. Once the monster was close, he reached out with the giant arm, and wrapped it around Eric's throat.

The trapped mouse bites the cat.

Eric's neck was long enough he could twist his snout downward, and start biting at the creature's wrist; unimaginable pain filled him for using his broken snout, but he had to. The hand and wrist were fat with rippling, leathery skin, and Eric couldn't get the angle needed to get a proper bite, but something was better than nothing. It was enough to earn pause from Michael, and a few seconds pause was enough for Eric to feel a little of his strength return. He started kicking at the monster's chest with his feet, but not the kicks his human half would have used. These were raking, clawing kicks, each dragging his talons down Michael's chest.

The monster tried to stop him with his smaller arm, but it wasn't large or strong enough to block Eric's giant feet. And when Michael tried to let go of Eric's neck, to use his larger, titan arm, Eric held on with both of his, sinking his claws into it.

"Let go!" Michael the abomination raised his disgusting arm of pulsating flesh tumors, spikes, thorns, and overwhelming muscle and mass, and slammed it down against the street. The extra mouths on Michael's body screamed, and the few extra on his grotesque arm shouted frustration, as the monster crushed Eric.

The black earth splintered around him, and the echoes of snapping bones filled his ears. His bones. His insides. Eric coughed up a fountain of blood over his teeth, snout, and neck, precious life flowing onto the black ground, soaking him.

"Wait! Wait, fuck me, wait!" Jessy's voice. The tiny woman ran over to him, and got down on her knees beside him. She set her hands on his chest, and sighed relief. “Thank god, he’s still breathing. Boss! What the fuck, man. You didn’t need to do that.”

The monster stood over him, flapped his enormous wings, and with his smaller arm, touched the many deep gashes on his chest. Some of them had broken through the extra mouths there, and the undead winced as he touched their split lips and tongues.

“He fought well. I can see why you like him, and—”

Shadow erupted behind Michael. Eric forced his head up enough to see what it was, but he felt it, and heard it first. Caleb appeared from the shadows, and dove at Michael’s spine, all four sets of claws out to catch his weight as he landed upon the monstrosity’s back. Michael roared, as did the extra mouths, some of them shrieking, some of them screaming, as he started to thrash around, but Caleb was behind his wings and not easily reached.

“Shit! Shit shit shit shit.” Jessy jumped up over Eric, got under his head, hooked her arms under his arms, and tried to pull him. His torso was far too large, too wide, for her to get a good grip, but she managed to spread her arms, and get them underneath his armpits enough for a very poor drag away from the renewed action.

Why was his rival helping him? Did he still want his mate for himself? No, wait, did Caleb ever want his mate? There’d been another reason for the fight. A test.

Thoughts ripped their way out of the swirling chaos of his mind, and back into the light of consciousness. Breathe! Fucking breathe, force it in, use it to press it down, ice against the fire hot rage and animal hunger within. Deep breaths, each a splash of cold water on his face.

“... Jessy,” he said, coughing up blood onto his long tongue. It dripped from his many teeth and across his enormous chest. Healing, but not fast enough to get him up on his feet any time soon. Some animal inside him told him he wasn't going to die from the wounds, but the same animal was screaming at him to worry about the elder vampire that turned into some sort of eldritch nightmare.

He'd seen Jessie do some crazy shit, but apparently, elder Gangrels could take it to a new level. Michael looked like he belonged in a John Carpenter film set in Antarctica.

“Eric, your brain working yet?”

“It ... it is.”

“Fucking christ, you dumbass. You went full feral on me.” She dragged him a few more feet away, before collapsing onto her butt, and his colossal head and neck fell onto her chest and stomach, shoulders pinning her legs. “Can't believe you attacked Michael. Dude's centuries old.”

“ ... I ... stupid.”

“I can see that.” She pat his chest and ran her fingers through his fur where it was thicker around his neck. “He fucked you up bad. Think you'll live?”

“I ... will. Need time.”

“Michael wasn't going to kill you, but he's going to kill Caleb if the fucker doesn't stop.”

Eric getting lost to the animal hunger and overwhelming presence of the Uratha spirit inside him was understandable, he supposed, given his youth and how new this was to him. Even more understandable, considering Caleb had baited him into this, and then Michael showed up to make things worse. An excuse. He needed to be in control in this form, no matter what.

He turned his head, and growled at the watching vampires. Joe and three of his companions, along with Jonah and Hella were watching Caleb tear at Michael's back. Debby and Kathy stood in the hole in the office building Eric had created using Caleb's body. It was a blur in Eric's mind. Punching a giant hole in a warehouse repurposed as an office building was not a good idea.

Michael probably showed up to stop the squabbling, and he found two werewolves fighting out in the open street, destroying property. Big Masquerade violations. Shit.

Chapter 85

~~Eric~~

He stared, wide-eyed, and frozen. With Jessy behind him, sitting underneath his head, it was propped up enough he could see. His thoughts were clear enough to understand what was happening now, the wolf Beast in his guts beaten and stabbed into submission by the monstrosity now fighting Caleb. How quickly Michael had beaten him, rendered him nothing more than a bleeding welp. Embarrassing.

He wanted to think it was because he'd been fighting vampires and a werewolf before Michael intervened, but he knew better. The man's ungodly weight had crushed him, and whatever he'd been stabbing him with had done more than simply stab a few times. His insides were on fire. His insides were mulch. He'd been defeated in a battle of pure brawn, and quickly at that.

Elder vampires were a breed of their own.

Caleb leaped backward, off of Michael's back, and flipped once before landing on all fours. The abomination turned to face the werewolf, but Caleb vanished into the shadow around one of the buildings. Irraka and their damn sneaky maneuvers.

"How dare you," Michael said. Some of the mouths on his body whispered raspy noises, echoing his deep, rumbling, garbled voice. "Which wolf are you?"

The shadows responded, "Caleb." At least Caleb was still in his right mind. Names had lost all meaning, when the wolf took over Eric.

Christ, he'd nearly attacked Jessy when she tried to defy him by moving away from where he'd set her. Like, an angry animal, frustrated with his mate for defying him. No wonder Caleb wanted to test him and see if he was stable when he left the wolf take him over.

The elder growled. "You think the Invictus are just going to accept this?" It annoyed Eric how the eldritch monstrosity managed to articulate well, while Eric and Caleb struggled to speak English in their transformed state; sentences longer than five words were a nightmare.

"You attacked ... kin ... first." Wherever Caleb was, he wasn't letting his presence be felt or found, voice echoing about randomly. Nice of him to refer to Eric as kin. Either Eric had passed his test, or Caleb was being a nice guy for the hell of it, which seemed unlikely.

The winged freak snarled, and began to stomp over to Eric, each step compounded by how the one massive arm crashed into the street with ridiculous weight. Uratha were heavy enough the claws on their feet often dug into the surface they stood on, when they needed an anchor. Michael was crushing the asphalt with pure weight; he had to be heavier than an elephant. No wonder Eric's body cracked and crumbled when Michael had flown up, and landed on him. Oh god, the man had flown with all that weight? Those wings were insane. This monster's power was immense, and Eric could only stare and watch, lying on the ground, mangled body bleeding everywhere, and head lying in Jessy's lap.

And yet, Caleb was taking him on. The Irraka did a drive by, taking advantage of Michael's approach toward Eric, and bit at the monster's ankle. Uratha teeth ripped through the thickened, armored skin, and blood gushed everywhere, splattering over the black street as Michael roared. He turned around and slammed his enormous arm down, cracking the street and leaving an imprint in the asphalt, but missing the speedy Uratha.

“Your kin was rampaging,” Michael said, again resuming his walk toward Eric. “Lost control.”

“No,” the shadow said, “not completely. Impressive. Respect him.”

Michael laughed, and came in closer, looming over Eric and Jessy. He had a smirk on his fucked up, almost bat-like face; looked really fucked up with the massive teeth poking out, up, and down from his lips.

“He’s young. I can forgive him some stupid decisions considering his circumstance. But know this, Eric Tanverson: I spare your life because you’re useful to the Invictus.”

Eric was very tempted to say ‘fuck you’, but even in his Gauru form, he was still a bleeding, broken mess. He could have been sandwiched in a car crash and be less beaten up than this behemoth had done to him in seconds. And the fucker who just beat his ass signed his checks.

Underestimating the enemy was never a good idea, and Caleb was making sure to not, judging by his guerrilla tactics. Probably learned from Eric’s mistake.

“Boss,” Jessy said, her hand stroking Eric’s furry mane on his neck, “give the guy a break. We were fighting off a bunch of Carthians, and—”

Caleb leaped from shadows. Everyone froze, and Eric’s lungs stopped working, as the werewolf, a blur of dark speed, bolted for Michael’s exposed spine.

The sound of a loud crack forced Eric to start breathing again, and he gasped as Caleb flew in the other direction. Without a moment’s hesitation, Michael turned around, and began walking after the werewolf, as Caleb rolled and crashed into a nearby wall, denting it, bits of concrete raining about. Something twisted and wormed left and right behind Michael, fast, snake-like. A fucking tail. Not a normal tail though, like you'd find on a reptile or mammal. No, the fucker had a giant scorpion tail sticking out from his tail bone, something he'd grown in the seconds between Caleb's attacks.

How the fuck.

By the time Caleb had regained enough awareness to prepare for any sort of movement, Michael was in front of him. He stabbed his tail over his shoulder at the beast's stomach, much like a scorpion would. Caleb howled, and slid up the wall as Michael lifted him, enormous tail slowly raising the wounded werewolf, poison stinger sunk into the man's stomach. Higher, and higher, until Caleb's long body was dangling, feet hanging a full six feet above the sidewalk, back pinned to the building wall.

"And you," Michael said. "The only reason I don't kill you, is because we strive for good relations with the Uratha. Avery's pack is useful, to a point. But fighting other Uratha in the streets, risking the Masquerade? A single mile closer to South Side and I would consider this a severe Masquerade violation."

Caleb, growling and twitching, tried to lift his arms; no such luck. Maybe Michael's stinger had some sort of poison. It'd have to be a ridiculously strong venom to work on a werewolf, but Eric doubted Caleb was so injured that his limbs weren't working from the impact alone.

"As for the rest of you!" As Michael gestured to the many watching Kindred, he whipped his tail to the side. Caleb went flying once again, landed on the street not far from Eric, and rolled over several times before coming to a halt against Eric's side. "Squabbles between covenants are on hold, until the hunters are found and exterminated. Do not think I do not realize you instigated this, Joe Turner. Tones will hear about this, and you will be punished."

Madam Herrington, Eric Tanverson, and this beast here,” he gestured to Caleb, “are at fault as well. They shall be reprimanded.”

Sighing, the elder vampire shrugged out his arms, his wings, his tail, and everything began to fade away. The extra mouths on his skin began to spit back out the suit he'd been wearing, and it slowly enveloped his skin as he shrank. The giant mutant arm fell off, literally, as did the wings and tail; all turned to ash in seconds. A proper arm regrew where the giant one fell from, and the various bits of spikes, extra mouths, and hardened skin either faded or withdrew back into his body, before his suit pulled over it once again. It was like watching floating fabric drift outward from a body of flesh and blood, poke out over the surface, and cover grotesque, cancerous flesh beneath it.

And then there was only Michael MacDonald, tall, strong man in a suit, shaved head, and a single chain connecting nostril to ear. He growled at the watching Kindred, and they all visibly cowered. The aura of the elder was absurd, disgusting, a blood leech corpse letting his power rise to an overt display Eric had never expected. Jessy had said the man was over two centuries old in Kindred years, and in that amount of time, a vampire could gain and master absurd powers. He believed it now. An elder Gangrel was fucking freaky.

Eric and Caleb both began to return to their human form, threat gone. It was painful, and Eric doubted he'd be walking much, once he was back in human form. He was right. As his clothes reemerged, and his weight returned to normal, he looked up at Jessy, and tried to sit up. Holy shit pain, but not overwhelming. He managed, with a little bit of Jessy's help, and she smiled at him as she helped bring him to standing.

Joe came over to them, eying Michael closely with every step, before he reached down, and provided the same courtesy to Caleb. “Lucky Garry isn't here,” he said under his breath at Jessy.

She rolled her eyes, and started walking, making sure to keep Eric's arm draped over her shoulders. "Fuck you, Joe."

"Herrington," Michael said, staring at her, glaring daggers. "Enough."

"Yes sire." She forced her eyes away from him, and started walking faster, keeping Eric up. "Come on, let's get you out of here."

"... sorry," he said, once they had some distance between them and the group of Kindred. "I kind of fucked things up. Got carried away."

"Nah, you were pushed into it by that Caleb fucker, and Joe. And besides, seeing you run through a fucking wall, and fight another werewolf? Holy fuck, I am soaking my panties."

He laughed, and regretted it immediately. Christ, what the fuck had Michael done to him? It was like he'd been stabbed with silver, not regular spikes. Broken bones were put back together, but tender; they weren't the cause of the extreme pain. It was the unreal, serrated damage of Michael's spikes that had hurt him so much.

"No you're not. I'd smell it."

"Well, later, when I've got the Blush going."

"What about ... that red building, the spirit told us about?"

"Jonah, Hella, and I will drive back, once we drop you off at your place." She laughed, and leaned her head in toward his, pressing the top of it against his neck and chin. "Don't try and fight any elder vampires in the future, ya? I'd be really fucking sad if you died."

He turned his head enough to give her a small kiss on the forehead. "Me too."

---

---

~~Jack~~

His mom wasn't doing much better. Almost as pale as Mary, and face sunken in a bit, and with a big tube coming out of her mouth, she looked like she was in a sci-fi horror movie. If he took out the tube, she'd probably start coughing and sputtering up black ooze, unplugged from her induced coma by the evil corporation that was selling her body to an alien species. The fantasy was preferable to the reality.

Sighing, Jack looked at his mom, and watched her broken, withered body try and breathe. The machine kept her going, life support, and she'd almost certainly die if he took her off of it. The doctors had found brain damage, and didn't know if she'd ever wake up.

He stood at the foot of the bed, and listened to the quiet clop clop of doctors and nurses walking by. He had to Dominate a few of them, to let him in, and to get an update on her condition. No change, of course. A sick, twisted fate, her life paralyzed by this strange moment. God was laughing at him, holding him in limbo at this horrible point. If she woke up, things would be different. If she died, things would be different. Damien would probably say God was testing him. Well, Jack was, at best, agnostic, and didn't give a shit about any deity trying to teach him a lesson.

The bar on the bed frame was still dented with his grip. They'd fix it at some point, he was sure, but for the moment, it was a nice reminder that he had to control his temper. He was a vampire, and the Beast was in his guts, telling him to claw and tear and rip and shred a hundred times more than it ever had before. Looking at his half dead mother, more than looking at his dead sister, was bringing his rage up to the surface, demanding he scream and roar. At least with Mary, there was a sense of finality, but the limbo his mom was trapped in was triggering anxiety mixed with anger to the point he could feel vitae building up, despite no effort on his part to call it.

The Beast was calling it. Antoinette had said his Beast was unusually strong, and he was letting it get to the surface more than he should have been. Great.

A vampire's strength was directly related to their Beast, he knew that much. It was the piece of them that was inhuman, mixing and mingling with their human body and soul. An animal, a monster, that gave them their strength, their inhuman senses, their strange ability to speak to animals, transform into them, or manipulate the minds of kine. The closer he grew to his, the closer it got to the surface of his mind, and the more he didn't like it. More than that, the louder his inner monster grew, the more it didn't feel like anyone else's Beast, the more it felt strange, and angry. He wanted to ask Viktor about it, and now he couldn't.

Julias kept his Beast well under control, holding it deep inside, far away from the surface. Jack pieced that together on his own, watching his sire work, seeing how the man reacted to negative stimulus; a master of holding his inhuman side at bay, under control, contained. Either his sire was lucky, or had spent dedicated years of effort training himself.

“But me, Mom? I don't know. It could be me, or just the circumstances I keep finding myself in.” He squeezed on the metal bar, and his fingers slid into the dent grooves. “I regret Viktor's death. Julias doesn't seem to have the same bite, the same inner ... fury. Maybe he just saw it in Viktor, and did his best to avoid it. Maybe.” He squeezed the metal a little harder, and closed his eyes as he felt it threaten to bend more. Sighing, he relented his grip, and moved over to sit beside her again.

“Julias is great. Amazing teacher. He even fit the father figure bill for me, to some extent. I learned how to think from him, how to be smart ... too smart.” He forced down the lump in his throat that threatened to rise, the memories of his conversation with his sister coming up. “You said he looked like a loan shark, remember? That was funny.”

Samantha did not stir. Her eyes didn’t flicker underneath her eyelids. Her fingers remained still, and pale, sitting on the hospital-green bed sheet. Her lungs moved, but only because a machine was making them. Half alive, like him, in a way.

“I said goodbye to Mary. She didn’t have much to say, but I figured it was important. It was weird, doing all the talking while she listened. Big switcharoo, compared to the past.” He reached out, and began to stroke his mom’s hair. Short brown hair, gentle curves and waves, less messed up than they were the first night he saw her in the hospital, but still not as bouncy as they were when he saw her through the window. “Not sure about you though, Mom. I ... I could say goodbye, I suppose. That could mean leaving you here, in a coma, but you’ll probably die eventually. I could take you off life support now, and that’ll kill you. Or, I could ask someone to sire you ... or I could sire you.” He shivered, and shook his head. “No, I can’t. Sorry I mentioned it. I’m barely holding on by a thread here, and if I did something like that, I know ... I know I’ll be as good as dead. Draugr, they call them. Mindless vampires who’ve given into their Beast completely.

“Someone else could sire you, though. Julias probably could, but I don’t want to put that strain on him so soon after siring me. My partners, Jess and Damien, they could. Neither of them have sired, and you’d be their first. What do you think? As a Gangrel, you’d be really in tune with your Beast, and that primal edge would be at your fingertips. And as a Mekhet, you’d be sneaky as hell. Sneaky and fast. And they got that Auspex thing that lets them see into things, into people, items, places, more than other people can. Scary stuff, right? Either of those interest you?”

His mom said nothing, and he sighed as he took her closer hand into both of his. He rubbed her fingers and knuckles, hoping against hope she might squeeze. No such luck, but he kept trying anyway.

“There’s Nosferatu. I ... I wouldn’t wish that on anyone, though. Not everyone gets off as lightly as Jacob or Triss.” He shivered as he pictured his mom looking like Maria. Fuck, that’d be horrific. “You could end up with eyes all over your face, or an extra arm growing out of your butt.

“Then, of course, there’s Antoinette, and the Daeva. You’d be sexy, I can guarantee that. Sexy ... and obsessed.” He leaned in, put his elbows on his knees, and put his chin on the bed next to his mom’s hand. “Daeva obsess over different things. Material things, art, music, romance ... sex.” Laughing, his shoulders shook with his chuckles, and he looked up the blanket toward his still mother. “I really shouldn’t be talking to you about my sex life, huh? Not really a normal topic for a mother-son conversation. But maybe it should be.

“Antoinette is my lover, and the love of my life. She’s smart, wise, confident, super rich, and has a massive sex drive that’s eternal.” He checked her face; no response. “Yeah, I know, don’t freak out. I went from being a loner nerd, to somewhat of a playboy, I suppose. Antoinette has two ghouls, girls, and ... yeah. That sound like something that might interest you? I mean, igniting your love life again, having one, making one. Certainly doable. Hell, you could bang a half dozen strangers every night if you wanted, as a Daeva.” He sat up and slouched forward, with elbows on the blankets again. “I know you were trying to get back into the dating world. That made me happy. The last thing I wanted was for you to linger, and get buried by remorse, you know? Throw me in a box in a ditch; what do I care, I’m dead. The living shouldn’t sit around lamenting the dead, wasting money on them, except for maybe a party to celebrate their life. Just the one party, to help move on.”

Groaning, he shifted the chair closer to her head, and set a hand on her shoulder. “I suppose that’s not the same. You didn’t know I was dead, just missing. I’ve been missing for almost two years. No closure, not really.” He gave her shoulder a little shake. No response, of course. “So, what do you think? Being a Kindred ain’t so bad. You get to start a new life, and it’s damn freeing, you know? Everything from your old life, gone, all the chains and weights removed. Clean slate.

“Except, that’s ... that’s the problem, isn’t it? For someone like me, that wasn’t too hard. For someone like you, it ... it could ... could be tough.” Another shake for her shoulder. No response. “But it’s better than dying, right? The Beast isn’t so bad. It hungers, and you have to feed it regularly, but you don’t have to kill anyone.” That earned a twitch, from him, and he grit his teeth as he leaned back in his chair, folding his arms across his chest. “You don’t have to, but it could happen. It happened to me, once, by accident. I handled it well, at the time. Not so well, I suppose, as the months went by. Mrs. Pavala. Her empty stare still haunts me, and ... and knowing you, it’d be worse, if it happened to you. It’d eat you up until you crumbled, killing an innocent person. But I wouldn’t let that happen.

“Julias says it was unusual that I frenzied that first night, especially since he gave me some blood. Cold blood from a fridge, but still, it was something, and should have been enough to stop a fledgling like me from full frenzying like that.” He looked down at his chest, the suit and tie, and clutched a hand to his sternum, fingers digging into bone. “This thing inside me is fucking ravenous, and I haven’t done nearly as good a job as Julias pushing it down. From day one, it was doing its damndest to get out. It’s strong. People have noticed that I’m unusual, for better or worse. Kindred younger than me, and some older, are afraid of me. I ... I don’t understand. Viktor was a monster, but I don’t know how much of it was him, and how much of it was our bloodline. And Julias—”

“Julias got lucky, very early on.”

Jack jerked his head toward the door. His sire stood there, hand in pocket while the other eased the door open silently. With quiet steps, Julias leaned back against the door, closing it, and offered Jack a small smile.

“Julias?”

“Not long after I was embraced, I visited my wife. We started to argue, and I hit her. Not a slap, either. I hit her hard enough to nearly break bone. Had to take her to the hospital. I vanished that night, and never saw her again.”

Jack stared at the man, and gulped. “You?”

“Me.”

“Hit your wife.”

“Yeap.”

“ ... why?”

“All these years, I assumed it was because I was a colossal asshole. And I’m sure that was part of it. But, after seeing what became of Viktor, and seeing ... what’s happening to you, I’m starting to wonder if our bloodline really is cursed.” Julias pulled up a chair, and sat across from him, looking at him over his mother.

“Cursed...”

“Maybe cursed is the wrong word. Viktor was strong, always was. So was I. I thought Viktor returned from his long torpor twisted, but ... I wouldn’t be surprised if the man had been a horrible, twisted soul before, and just did a better job hiding it before his torpor. And me, I felt that anger in me when I hit my wife, how it seared my soul, and I ... I pushed every bit of that anger deep down into my guts. Hated myself, for a century, until I met a girl like Triss.”

Jack stared at him for a while, but laughed once the cliché reality of his words sank in.

“For the love of a woman, right?”

“Exactly.”

Jack laughed again, and pat his arm on his mom’s shoulder as he smiled at Julias. “I don’t have much context. First relationship of my life is proving to be a keeper.”

“First relationship I’ve had in forever is proving to be a keeper, too.”

“Sometimes I wonder about marriage. A paper contract seems so ... meaningless, compared to ... well, everything about our lives.”

“Yeah, it does. But fuck me, I was going to ask her anyway, Jack.”

That was a bit surprising. “Think Triss’ll say yes?”

He nodded, and offered him a small grin. “Jen and I have been trading secrets, with Triss as a spectator. Personal stuff. I’m going to use the fifth and final secret as a marriage proposal.”

“Sounds disgustingly romantic.”

“Very. Triss will hate it, and love it.”

Jack smiled at the man. To know Julias had struggled with extreme rage was comforting, in a way. If the great and mighty, and sorrowful Julias, could quell his rage, maybe Jack could, too. Then again, Julias hadn’t gone through the same sort of pain Jack had. His Hell had been different.

The two chuckled for a little while, before they both looked back to Samantha.

“I’d sire her, Jack, if you asked.”

“I can’t ask that.”

“I can handle it.”

“Maybe.” Maybe not. If Julias did have a Beast as fucked up, twisted, and angry as Jack’s, siring another childe so soon could bring it to the surface. “I don’t want to put that on you.”

“You could sire her, but ... no, it’d be a bad idea.”

“Agreed.”

Sighing, Julias looked up at the machine showing her vitals. “Natasha wrestled with this.”

“... she did?” He hadn’t thought about that.

“Yeah. Her mother died of illness, brought on by her extreme depression over her daughter’s disappearance. Not long after, her father killed himself.”

“I ... I don’t understand. Why didn’t she embrace them, or ask someone to?”

“Many reasons. She didn’t have the same friends you did, or clout. And at the time, embracing was off limits except by special circumstance.” The man sighed, and leaned in toward Jack, over his mother’s waist. “And, even if she could have, she’d have hesitated.”

“Kindred life can be rough.”

“Yes, it can. Natasha’s life in the Ordo Dracul terrified her. She left, joined the Invictus, and lived inside numbers and books as she coped with how scary her new life was. I'm not exactly friends with the sheriff, but the few times I saw Daniel during those first few years after her embrace, he looked ... especially stone-like. I didn't know why at the time, since his embracing a child was a secret."

"And getting hit by that fear is a very real possibility with Mom."

"Yes, it is."

"But it's better than her dying."

"Is it?"

Jack glared at his sire, and leaned in as well, only a foot remaining between their faces. "You think it'd be better if she died?"

"That's not what I said. I can't make this decision for you. Personally, being Kindred has been a roller coaster of ups and downs, with greater highs and lows than I could get when alive. But your mom is going to be starting from a very, very low low. It could ruin her. It could save her, give her a new lease on a broken life." The man didn't pull away, staying close, and matching Jack's gaze.

They stared at each other for a little while, in the eyes, without blinking. No malice or frustration. Julias wanted Jack to see what was going on in his mind without saying it, and Jack did his best to see.

Give her a chance, Jack.

"... I ... I think I'll ask someone to sire her."

Julias smiled at him, offered a quick wink, and leaned back in his chair. "Whatever happens, she'll get the best welcome possible. I mean come on, her kid's one of the Right Hands of the Invictus, and a prodigy. She'll be treated with respect."

Prodigy, heh. Julias knew how to inflate his ego, that was for sure.

“Except she won’t be of our bloodline. She’ll be ... someone else’s.”

“Yeah, she will.” Instead of the frown Jack expected, Julias’s smile remained. It was a good thing she wasn’t of their bloodline, if this insidious Beast in their guts was genuine. It’d be years before Jack was in a position to sire, and Julias probably wouldn’t want to for years, or decades. Plenty of time for them to figure out if this problem was fixable, manageable, or ignorable.

“Julias, I ... I just wanted you to know, for all the shit that keeps coming my way, our way, I don’t regret what happened.”

“You don’t think it’d have been better if I could have sired you on your couch, after a conversation and some preparation?”

“Heh, maybe if you got me drunk, first. But I see what you mean. Siring me while I was bleeding to death must have been a tough decision.”

“You’re making the same decision as we speak.”

“I ... I guess I am.” And it was a damn tough one. “And if I knew then what I know now, I would have wanted you to embrace me.” He’d never have met Antoinette if Julias hadn’t.

The two of them nodded and leaned back in their chairs, each folding their arms across their chests and suits. Decision made, then.

“I assume you’re going to ask Antoinette?”

Ok, decision part A made, part B pending.

“I think so. But imagining Mom with a Daeva’s ... quirks, is difficult. She’s an airhead.”

“An airhead, or maybe she just doesn’t overthink everything. She lets the small things roll off, and focuses on the big things. Maybe she lets her emotions guide her a little more than she should, but then, being logical isn’t always a good thing. Humans and vampires alike have this nasty requirement of needing to listen to their emotions in order to be happy, Jack, and a silly airhead has figured that out intuitively. In a way, they’re a genius.”

They both chuckled. It was half true, and they knew it.

“I wonder about Damien,” Jack said. “Fiona reminds me of Mom. I wonder if she’ll help put a dent in Damien’s mind. Dude has a wall the size of Everest between him and the joy literally throwing itself at him.”

“Damien and the sheriff are similar. No one’s cracked Daniel’s shell, except for Natasha, and even then it’s only a little. I have no idea if Fiona will be able to get through Damien’s thick skull, considering he’s had half a century to build it.”

“Half a century. God damn. Really makes all my whining sound so juvenile.”

Julias shook his head, sighing. “No, it doesn’t. The burden you’re carrying is unusual, Jack. I trust you to carry it, but don’t underestimate its weight.”

Nodding, Jack reached out, and stroked his mom’s forehead. “I’m ... excited, to talk to her again. Fucking terrified of telling her Mary’s dead, but excited to show her I’m alive. Hell, I’m even excited to tell her she gets to live for forever now. Excited and so damn terrified.”

“I look forward to speaking to her again, as well. And, Antoinette will get to speak to the mother of her lover.”

Well, shit. Jack hadn't even thought about that. Was that a good thing, or a bad thing? She'd tell Antoinette about how dirty he used to let his room get, or that one time when he was a boy and he had food poisoning and—yeah, bad thing, all bad.

---

---

~~Damien~~

They sat there for a while, and listened to distant echoes of combat. Matthew's roars, and the crack of gunfire, were far enough Damien had to assume they were a near mile off. By the time the sound reached them, it was warped and a shell of its former self, which gave the three vampires and monster enough quiet to sit, recover, and chat. Chatting was, perhaps, the wrong word. Groaning was a better one.

"I am so sore," Vicky said.

Damien grumbled and looked her way. He was sitting, but only because Fiona had managed to drag him over to the tunnel wall, a good fifty feet away from the crumbled ceiling. Above where the trap had been set, was mangled earth, steel bars, and shattered concrete, threatening to fall at the edges of the hole. Fiona had spent some time hooking webbing to the hole, but without supporting arches or pillars, it was a band-aid at best, not safe to stay under.

Vicky was right to complain, he supposed. She wasn't right to keep glaring at him.

"You pushed me on top of Parker."

"I made a tactical decision. You had the best chance of surviving being crushed, compared to Parker." He gestured with his still working arm to the Daeva beside her. "Unless you would have preferred Parker be crushed."

“I, for one, am happy for Mister Burksen’s valiant, and heroic efforts to save my life.” Parker nodded, as if a king bestowing praise to his knight.

“You would be.” Vicky gestured to her ripped suit, and the many places where concrete had torn through her skin. Like all Kindred, her insides were dry and withered, a corpse, but as a seasoned Ventrue with developed Resilience, fatal damage had been resisted. Dark, thick Kindred blood peeked out from her wounds only long enough to seal it over with hardened, dry skin, before it began healing the wound proper from the inside.

He was envious. His ankle still wasn’t functional, but at least he wasn’t in utter agony anymore. Only extreme agony.

He lifted his broken hand, and rotated it. Familiar white fire danced up the ruined limb, and blotted out his mind, until he let the useless limb go limp on the tunnel floor once again. Don’t move, just focus on healing. If the hunters came back, or worse, new hunters attacked them from the other side, Damien wouldn’t be able to do shit.

Vicky and Parker were capable of walking now, but only barely. Parker’s injuries weren’t as bad as Vicky’s, but, like Damien, he simply wasn’t resilient enough to manage thousands of pounds of rubble falling on his body, even if most of it hit the Ventrue on top of him. And Vicky had been extraordinarily lucky, dealing with less debris than Damien had. Apparently, the worst of it had fallen on Damien, as if someone was punishing him for trying to be heroic. Divine comedy.

Fiona was wounded, but nothing more than scrapes and bruises. Her leg was bleeding, and it wasn’t healing with the gusto of an Uratha. And it smelled like blood. Damien, Vicky, and Parker all glanced at the girl’s wound, and Fiona, bless her soul, was oblivious to everyone's gaze. She sat beside Damien, pat his leg in a place where it wasn't cut open, and smiled at him.

"Damien was fast! Never seen a laddie move so fast," she said.

"He was an assassin," Parker said. "Comes with the job description."

"Assassin? Ah, yer talking about that ... Lucas business."

Damien glared at the man. He'd yet to tell Fiona about the specifics of his time with Lucas, of the darker parts of it, and it was not a conversation to be having in the current circumstance.

Vicky laughed. "Parker is only envious. His strength is considerable, and he uses Majesty to seduce kine regularly. But he is slow, for a Daeva."

Parker rolled his eyes, but didn't deny it. If anything, the man smiled, ran a finger through his shoulder-length blonde hair, and gave Vicky a small shove of the shoulder. Friendship. Damien watched, and sure enough, Vicky didn't snarl or growl or frown like an annoyed person might. Rather, she half grinned, half smirked, and returned it. Perhaps there was more to their relationship than simple partners in business. It was endearing, a little.

"Fiona," Damien said, "what environment do you need, to be able to get back to your lair?"

"A dark tunnel works, to gie to my chamber in the jungle. Some bars and clubs could take us to the blood Dolareido chamber. And—"

Vicky raised a hand. "Blood Dolareido?"

"One of the nightmares." Damien wanted to continue, explain, but he thought better of it. If Fiona wanted to go into more detail, she could, but she'd already shared many details of her life with the Kindred, and details of how Begotten worked in general. She was too trusting. “If we need a dark tunnel to travel into your jungle lair, we could arrange it, knock out some lights.”

“Ye dinnae need to do that. There’s lots of tunnels down ‘ere that dinnae have light.”

“I’m less concerned about being helpful, Fiona, and more concerned about having another escape avenue, if hunters rush us tonight. We’re in no shape to defend ourselves, especially since our front liner ran off.” And, from the stories he’d heard, a werewolf on the rampage was not something any of them wanted to be near.

“Oh, I gie it.” She tapped a finger to her chin as she looked up, thinking. “I—”

Everyone snapped their heads down the tunnel as footsteps managed to overcome the sound of their hushed voices. The vampires brought up their guns, and Fiona got up, ready to do whatever it is she’d do in a gunfight. But as the footsteps grew louder and closer, Damien sighed and waved a dismissing hand.

“Matthew,” Damien said, loud enough the others knew they were in the clear. “Catch any of them?”

“No.” Groaning, much like the Kindred, Matthew stepped around the distant curve of the tunnel, and came their way. He looked like hell. The four of them each offered their own small gasps or frowns as the big guy came into view, their eyes roaming the trailing streaks of blood that coated him.

Like gasoline on a bonfire, the hunger in Damien’s stomach exploded, and he stared, wide-eyed, at the copious amount of blood on the man’s body. Some of it was still dripping. He didn’t have any holes in his clothes, but the clothes vanished during the transformation, meaning he’d been torn up in his werewolf form then.

Matt managed to reach them, before he groaned louder, and sat down on some rubble a few feet away. Sitting became slouch, and he slid down until his butt was on the dirty floor, with his back to the debris. Exhausted, panting, Matt let his head roll back and dangle.

“Ye awright?” Fiona said.

“I’ll live. Fucking wiped, though. Some silver hit me, and so did a few dozen bullets besides. And some grenades.”

Parker whistled. “Don’t forget getting crushed.”

The Uratha laughed before he nodded toward Damien. “You look like you got the worst of it. Think you’ll heal?”

“I need time, and blood.” He put his pistol away, and used the one good hand to gesture to his ankle. “I can heal enough to move, but that’s it.” And the longer he went, the more he could feel the hunger grow. It wanted out. It wanted to defend itself, repair, get ready for the hunt, and most of all, it wanted to jump Matthew and drink the man’s life essence until he was a dry husk.

“I’d help you out,” he said, “but I’m fucking wiped, dizzy, low on blood and in desperate need of RNR.”

Sighing, he nodded, as did his fellow vampires. They were hungry too, no doubt, but they’d suffered neither the damage nor had they exerted themselves in that moment like Damien had. They were hungry, but he was growing voracious.

He bit down, clenched his jaw, and nodded. “Are we safe?”

“I think so. I chased them to the upper level of the tunnels, and they got out through a manhole. Don’t think they were expecting to run into a Rahu down here.”

“Rahu?” Vicky said.

“One of the Uratha auspices.” Matthew made a vague, weak attempt at flexing, but he barely managed to lift his arms. They dropped, thudding against his legs and the rubble. “Linebackers. Takes a lot to bring me down.”

Parker laughed, and choked on a following cough. “Like a host of bullets, knives, grenades, and silver.”

“Ok, so maybe they were expecting Uratha, but they didn’t bring enough manpower to take me in a straight fight. They probably expected the rubble to take us out.”

“It nearly did!” Fiona said, throwing up her hands.

“Yeah, I guess it nearly did,” Matt said, a small smile sneaking onto his lips as he looked at Damien. “You, are fast as fuck. It was a blur, but I saw you move, man.”

Damien tried to return the smile, but it was hard to find any sense of joy and accomplishment. Pain, hunger, it was spoiling everything.

“Aye, he was.” Fiona leaned in, and nudged her head against Damien’s shoulder, before looking to the rest of the group. “We’re in nae shape to fight. We should go home.”

“Agreed,” they said.

With lots of pained grumbles, all of them got up. As Damien did, Matthew offered him a shoulder, and Damien took it as Fiona got down on a knee beside him. In seconds, she wrapped his ankle in webbing. After a dozen or so circles of her hands around it, it was encased in a brace with the sturdiness of a cast. Thank God, he wouldn’t roll it by accident, and he could put a little weight on it.

The walk back was a slow one. With every minute, Damien could feel his wounds heal, at least to the point they were becoming functional. He dare not put too much weight on his bad ankle, but he could tell it was repaired enough to function again, if he absolutely had to use it. Same for his wrist. A snap of the fingers would probably shatter the joint, and many other parts of his body in his current state, but at least bones were put back together, and his skin was healed over. Fiona didn't know how close to death he'd become, and he aimed to keep it that way. A younger Kindred would have been nothing but ash under a pile of rubble.

A door took them back to the higher level of tunnels, and Parker locked the door behind them. From there, it was a twenty minute walk to the nearest subway platform, and each step sent throbbing hunger up into Damien's skull. Fiona and Matthew were bleeding, and both were helping him walk. The proximity made smelling their blood easy, and he gulped on a dry throat as he tried to ignore the hunger.

Ever since Lucas's failed coup, Damien's secrecy was over, and he could feed as other Kindred did, without having to hide in stealth and shadow. Before, when every night was spent skulking, and every near encounter meant his potential death, he'd gone many nights starving. He'd barely passed his fledgling year before the Purge, and spent years terrified of suffering the fate of his fellow brothers and sisters of the church. A lot of hungry nights, riding the edge of frenzy, as he huddled in a ball, cold and scared in the tunnels, or abandoned basements.

He wasn't used to that creeping hunger anymore, and present circumstance was rectifying his forgetful memory.

"I'll head back to HQ and update the council," Vicky said. "Unless you feel you have to, Mister Right Hand Burksen."

She was trying to be funny. It wasn't, not at the moment. Her words grated on him, and he glared at her, but didn't let the rising fury lead to anything more. If he'd been Invictus, and not a Right Hand purely through Maria's recommendation, he might have felt more comfortable giving into his annoyance and yelling at her.

"Probably a good idea," he said. "I'll—"

"I'll take care of Damien," Fiona said. "I'll make sure he gits something to eat."

Damien raised a brow down at the small monster, but Vicky, Parker, and Matthew nodded, and walked up the stairs to the locked door that opened up into the Invictus center of South Side. All Kindred had keys for the tunnels, and Vicky didn't hesitate to lock the door behind her.

Leaving him with Fiona, alone, and starving.

"I can tell yer hungry," she said.

"I ... I said it, earlier."

"Nae what I meant. I mean, yer very hungry. Yer very very, very, very hungry."

He frowned for a moment, but her bright smile punched through it. "You're right. Sorry if I've been staring at your—"

"I can see it, in your Beast."

"You can?"

"Mmhhh. I can see ye, the real ye, or the ye inside ye, ye ken? And ye're hungry."

He couldn't help but smile at her accent, and the balance it held with American city dwellers. "I am. I really ... really am. Been a long time since I've been this hungry."

"Then ask."

“Ask?”

“Ask, to feed, on me. If ye’re this hungry, it cannae wait, right?”

“ ... right.”

Beaming at him, she nudged her forehead into his shoulder, and slipped under his arm so he could lean on her. “I dinnae ken what will happen if ye drink from a ... a monster, but, ye could find out?” Giggling, she set him down on the subway platform edge, legs dangling off at the knee. A hazard, if a subway train came by, but they were long decommissioned, and it was sort of nice to sit there and ignore the faded yellow line on the concrete they were supposed to stand behind. “Here.” She leaned in toward him, and turned her head, exposing her neck.

“You sure?” He stared at her neck. Her beautiful, soft, pale neck. Her shirt was cut a bit low, and her brown leather jacket was opened a couple buttons, so her neck and smattering of freckles around her collar were visible.

“I am. But, ye have to tell me about yer past.”

“My past?”

“Aye! Vicky called ye an assassin.”

“That...” He winced and looked away. “I’m not an assassin, it’s just ... It’s about Lucas, and what ... I essentially was, that last night.”

“Whatever it is, it’s made ye ‘fraid of everything.”

“Everything?”

“Aye.” Sighing, she looked down and kicked her feet out a few times, her boots bouncing against the concrete as they came back down with gravity. “At first, I thought I liked Eric. I’m a silly lass, and I like my lads all broken and sad.” Her sigh vanished, replaced with giggles. “But, Eric is different. He’s ... older.”

“I’m over twice his age.”

“I dinnae think ye are!” She reached out, and ran her fingers along the shaved smooth half of his head, before running them into the hair on the other side. “Ye act like ye’ve got a terrible secret, something ye’re afraid to share. But ye dinnae act old.”

“I ... I was embraced when I was your age. Kindred don’t really age, in more ways than the obvious. The mind, the personality, are sort of static.” Torpor aside. He’d been a loner and a troubled, problematic boy when Lucas found him, and gave him a chance.

“I see. That explains why some vampires are so silly, like Jessy.” Nodding, she slipped a hand up his back, and onto his neck, to help guide him down to face her. Her fingers felt wonderful. “Ye ignored me, when I was flirting with Eric.”

“I didn’t ignore you, I was—”

“Ignored.” She frowned, blew up her cheeks a bit, and kicked the platform. An adorable temper tantrum, sort of. “I was trying to make ye jealous.”

“ ... mission successful.”

Her chipmunk frown evaporated, replaced with a radiant smile and more giggles. “Eric is definitely a sexy man, but he’s an old man on the inside, in a good way. Ye’re different. Ye’re ... emo.”

Ugh, not this again. “Jessy told me the same thing.”

“It might be the hair.”

“It was the end of the sixties. Everyone was experimenting with their hair.” That earned another laugh from her, and he smiled at her as the fire of his pain faded into background noise. “I can only regrow my hair to how it was when I was embraced, and that’s this.” He pointed to it, how one side of it was shaved smooth, and the other side dangled with dark hair almost reaching his shoulder. It wasn’t perfectly shaved in half, with enough hair to cover the top of his head, but there was no hiding the very unique hairstyle, and how it left most of the skin of the left side of his head exposed.

“I see lasses these days with locks like those. Fashion models and what have ye.”

His turn to frown. “Thanks.”

Giggling like a kid’s toy he’d wound up and let go, she reached out, hooked her hand over his shoulder, and ran her fingers through the hair. “I like it, but it is very emo on a lad like ye, with yer dark hair and pale skin.”

“You have pale skin.”

“I’m a ginger! Nae a fair comparison.” All laughs and giggles, she used her exploring fingers to guide him to face her. “Ye’re hurt and ye need blood ... Taste me. We can talk more, later.”

He wanted to argue. It wasn’t that he was in denial of what he was, like a fledgling vampire. He’d long accepted he was a vampire, and he’d long accepted it was normal and encouraged for vampires to feed. He’d killed, with sword, gun, and fang. But he’d never, ever fed on someone that he held in high regard; or in this case, knew he was attracted to. It was a line he’d yet to cross, one that Lucas would have told him to not, or he’d fall into the bad habits of someone like the Prince.

He could still hear the man’s voice, lecturing him, preaching, explaining the folly. Haunted by the ghosts of his past, like Fiona said.

If he truly was emo, he must have been wearing it on his face, for both Jessy and Fiona to notice. Others too, likely. It wasn't like he wore mascara, or black lipstick, or covered half his face with his hair, so something more innate must have been giving that impression.

“How ... how are you so happy, all the time?”

“I dinnae spend half a century forced to hide in sewers, for one.” Giggling again, she slipped her hand behind his head, and forced him toward her neck. “Taste me.” She was far too nice to him. Subtly, she'd hinted that he had baggage, but hadn't used the dreaded word. Too kind.

He breathed in the smell of her. There was no getting around that she was alive, and he wasn't. It made the difference between them all too apparent, and appealing. He was an undead, and he had a corpse's desire to fill itself with the living essence of another. Every time he saw her, every time she smiled at him, a piece of him knew he wanted to sink his fangs into her, and sink more than that into her.

And he did. God help him, he did. His good arm was closer, and he used it to hook her further shoulder, pull her to him, and hold her still as he leaned in the final few inches, and sank his fangs into her beautiful, silky, shivering neck. But she grew still, once his fangs pierced her skin, and the pleasure of the Kiss flowed into her.

He almost jerked his head away, as the foreign taste flooded his mouth. What in the Lord's name was that taste? It was ... it was ... he didn't know. Kine blood was warm, and so was this, but kine blood tasted warm, a flavor wholly unique to a vampire's taste buds, the flavor of life, sweet and delicious. If that was in Fiona's blood, it was buried underneath something cold, and a strange mix of sweet and ... sour? No, not sour, but something he couldn't identify that made him tremble.

Faint memories trickled up through his mind, summoned by the flavor. He'd tasted something similar, when he was kine. An alcoholic drink of some kind, maybe? He groaned into Fiona's neck, and let more of his need surface. The Beast didn't mind this strange new flavor, despite how powerful it was. It latched onto Fiona's neck, and sucked harder, as an afterkick slammed into Damien's mind. A cold, sweet, sour ... hard liquor. They were words he barely understood anymore, with how long it'd been since he could eat normal food. But whatever it was in the horror's body, whatever it was that affected Fiona's blood, whatever it was about the nightmare creature that existed parallel to her human half, he could taste it.

He was drinking a nightmare.

Fiona moaned. Damien forced his eyes open, and pulled away, to the rage and dismay of the hungry thing inside him. He'd only managed a couple gulps of her blood, and he licked his lips as he savored the strange, powerful flavor.

"Wow," Fiona said. She reached up, and touched her neck where his fangs left her bleeding. "I ... I'm bleeding." She blushed, and her pale skin almost glowed red.

"Sorry. Let me..." He leaned back in, and gave the punctures a couple licks. They healed over in seconds.

Moaning, Fiona nudged her neck toward his tongue. "I ... I'm ... sleepy." Giggling again, she turned more to face him. "That didnae last long!"

"I didn't take much." He gulped down saliva. The blood coursing through him ignited the Blush of Life, and he found himself staring all the harder at the busty redhead. More specifically, he was staring at her breasts, and how her panting made them rise and fall.

“It didnae taste good?”

“It tasted great.” And Longinus himself would have struggled to find a more empowering source of blood. He felt energized, invigorated, and he wanted more. “Very different.”

“It ... it felt good.” She shivered, and raised a hand to wipe her brow. “Oh, I’m feeling a little dizzy. Dizzy and ... um ... tingly.”

“The Kiss can do that. I only took a little, but you should still get some rest, be in bed.” And let me into that bed. He forced down the thoughts, but they sprang right back up. For all his practice at keeping his thoughts under control, the taste of her blood was still fresh on his tongue, and her blood was coursing through his veins, forcing him to feel alive. He wanted more. He needed more.

He was staring at her neck, her cleavage, her flushed skin, everything. When she turned to face him more, he didn’t try and rip away his gaze, like he normally would. He knew he couldn’t even if he tried.

Upon noticing his blatant staring, she smiled up at him, and started undoing the final buttons of her jacket.

“Um, what’re you—”

She slid out of the jacket, and Damien stared as she made sure to emphasize the size of her bust as she did so. Once she set it aside on the old subway platform, she slid further up onto the stage, turned to face him more, and pulled up her shirt so its hem rested above her bra. And, laughing and squeaking, she slid her bra up over her breasts.

Damien gulped thrice, as her heavy, pale breasts fell against her ribs, and rippled with the gentle impact. They were huge, and they were swollen. He knew it was normal for a Kiss, when done slowly and gently, to be arousing for kine; and anyone alive, apparently. But, he'd never partaken of its effects himself, never even took the time to admire its effects. This was the first time he'd really taken a moment to appreciate what the Kiss could do to a willing participant. Her pink nipples were large, swollen to points, and they stood out from her heavy breasts, demanding to be touched.

More giggles. She reached out for him, took his good hand, and set it against her breast. He froze as the softness filled his hand, overwhelmed it, and her hard nipple pressed into his wrist. Heavy, and warm, and mesmerizing.

“Um, Fiona, I—”

“Ye Kissed me! And now, ye should kiss me.” She nodded, blushing, but steeled with resolve, confidence, and the tipsy euphoria of a Kiss cut short. “And ... and massage my tits, at the same time. Gently! I'm aw sensitive and tingly.”

He gulped again, and the sensation of saliva sliding down his throat shocked him. The Blush of Life was not something he normally indulged, but it was coursing through his veins now, and he didn't want it to stop. His dead heart beat faster, and his member pressed against his suit pants, as he cupped the heavy weight of the tiny redhead's large breast. He turned his hand a little, began to slowly run his thumb in circles around her puffy areola, and he let out a quiet groan, as his touch earned a tremble from the beautiful creature.

“See,” she said, and she pulled on his head to guide him back to her, “another thing I like about ye over other lads, is ye're my wounded soldier.”

“Wounded soldier?” he said, gulping yet again as he came in closer, close enough their noses touched.

Grinning, she fluttered her eyelashes at him, drawing his gaze into her golden eyes, before she leaned in, and sneaked a kiss on his lips. He froze, and stared at her as she kissed him. Soft, with a hint moisture, and enough metaphorical heat to melt him.

“Aye. It took a wee while to figure out what I wanted, but what I want ... is someone like ye. Ye stupid dobber. The wounded soldier, with a wee bit of emo mixed in.” Rolling her eyes, she leaned in again, and resumed the kiss. And this time, he had time to return it. He sank into it, closed his eyes, and focused on the feeling of her warmth against him, the weighty softness of her breast in his palm, and the heat of her breath on him.

Wounded soldier? He didn't get it, but, he could ask about it later. All that mattered now was the arousal pumping through him, and how the powerful kick of her blood had been.

He pulled back for a second. “I ... I um...”

“Aye?”

“You didn't have to ... take your breasts out.”

She rolled her eyes again, and leaned back into his lips, making sure they brushed against his as she talked. “Jessy told me I'd need to treat ye like a blind fool.” Her one hand continued to drift behind his head, and her other slid under his fondling hand. Moaning, blatantly at that, she pressed his hand against her breast harder, so it conformed against his fingers and palm, softness filling in between his digits. Wow.

“I ... can't say I blame her.”

“I threw myself at ye and ye didnae respond before. Now, I hope the message is clear.”

“ ... it is.”

“Then, do a lass a favor, and help me out.” Her hand on his took his wrist, and started to slide it down her body. Once it got to her jeans, she undid the button and zipper, and guided his fingers under her underwear.

Smooth, soft flesh awaited him. He groaned as his fingers pressed against her soft mons, and again, when she pushed them further down, and they found her folds. Wet. Warm.

“You want—”

“I want ye to play with me, touch me, until I cum on yer fingers, while ye Kiss me.” She tilted her head, exposed her neck again, and grinned at him through the corner of her eye. “Coz it felt amazing.” Blushing, quivering, the little redhead grinned at him. Slut City had had quite an effect on her, and he most definitely did not mind.

He shivered, and despite himself, growled, a hungry growl. He was still hungry, and he did want more of her strange, powerful, unusual, and enticing blood. And, he wanted to keep touching her, feel her, get inside her. He wanted everything.

He leaned back in, set his fangs to her neck, and sank them into the soft skin. Immediately, the little redhead trembled, and spread her legs. As her monster blood oozed into his mouth, warm and intoxicating, but almost too flavorful to handle, his fingers began to caress the lips of her sex, and the small nub of flesh at the top.

“There!” she said, whimpering. “There, ye found it. So just ... be gentle ... and keep ... rubbing it ... with wet fingers.”

Gulping down her blood, and growling into her neck all the while, he did as she said. He lowered his fingers more, and sank them into her, finding more wetness. Her insides were both soft and tight, and he almost froze at the sensation of her wet sex clenching down on his digits. With his fingers coated in her juices, he resumed massaging her clitoris.

“I thought maybe ... ye wouldnae know ... mmmm.” She almost fell away from him, since they were sitting beside each other, legs still dangling off the platform. But, despite how she was obviously struggling to not give into the euphoric bliss and relaxation of the Kiss and fall over, her arm on the back of his neck managed to get a grip on his further hip. He couldn't see what her other hand was doing, but he could see her elbow over her shoulder, and guessed she was massaging her breast, since he no longer was.

He knew plenty about sex, both from the strange friends of his life before his embrace, but also, it was Dolareido. No matter how much he'd tried to avoid the topic, fifty years of hiding inside Slut City had bestowed him with some basics. And, no matter how much every reflex he'd developed was telling him he might be crossing some sort of line with Fiona, the Beast in him knew better. The girl wanted it. He wanted it.

Just give in.

He test flexed his broken hand. It hurt, but it was working again, and every moment of the Begotten's concoction of life and nightmare energy entering his being, was another piece of his body rebuilt and functional. Drinking her was healing him faster than drinking a kine would have, and that was important to know. More important, was how good it felt, how good she felt, how amazing the mewls and whimpers she made were, and how he wanted more.

He pulled his teeth away, and she whimpered at him, her eyes fluttering, tired and pleasure laden. With his other hand functional again, he used both to pull her further up onto the platform. The poor creature, trembling and quivering, managed some more giggles as she lay on the dirty concrete. This wasn't exactly a sexy place, or remotely clean place to do be doing something like this, but it didn't matter anymore. He needed more, and he was going to have it.

He stared down at the small redhead, and knelt beside her. She was in that exhausted, sleepy-but-blissful state a good Kiss could put someone into, a pleasure coma, and it made her look amazing. With her jean fly open, her shirt and bra up to expose her breasts, and her arms limp on the floor around her, she looked delicious. A helpless, trembling, dripping wet meal. He needed more. More.

He traced his wet fingers over her breasts, and he growled as he felt the softness fill his palm. Her breathing pressed them into his hand, and she mewled as he offered her nipple a squeeze, before his hand slid down her stomach, and under her white panties. As his fingers found her sex once again, the touch immediately causing her to quiver, he leaned in over her, and resumed the Kiss for the third time. More.

“D-Damien ... I didnae ken ye could be so ... Ye—nnn!” Her hips lifted, and her legs spread, as he slid his fingers into her squeezing slit. Soaking wet, hot, taut around his two fingers, and heavenly. He pressed his fingers up into her, toward her belly, and probed up in a rhythm, in an instinctive, primal beat, as he drove the busty, little creature trapped in his fangs, to orgasm. A new coat of juices soaked his fingers, and her insides clenched down hard enough to force his hand to hold still. He did, for a moment, before he started fingering her again, not waiting for her to recover, and earning panting whines from her as he pumped her insides.

A part of him knew this wasn't him, that he was stepping far outside his comfort zone. Kine used alcohol to help them overcome their fears and inhibitions, liquid courage, and he couldn't help but feel the same was happening to him. Tasting her, having this beautiful woman's dark, strange blood inside him, lit a curious lust inside him that wasn't settled yet. More.

With his bad hand holding his weight, palm to the subway platform, he was free to keep his teeth deep in the helpless woman's neck, as his fingers filled her. He fingered her harder, hard enough to make her ass bounce lightly, and he growled into her neck as he took more.

“Damien, ye ... ye're ... taking ... too...” The poor creature came over his fingers again, and as her the pleasure coursed through her, her heart sped up. He knew it would. “St ... op...” It was borderline instinct, to bury her in pleasure, use it to make her blood flow, and drink it down. It filled him, sent buzzing pleasure into his fingertips, made him dizzy on the strange high as the alien taste overwhelmed him. Most of all, it felt freeing, natural, to drive this beautiful woman to bliss as he drained her, and—

His phone rang.

He sat up with a jolt, and practically threw himself away from her. Landing on his ass, he stared at the small woman, her beautiful pale skin sweating a little, and her breasts heaving as she struggled to catch her breath. Facing her lying body from side on, he stared at how her long, frizzy red hair sat upon the concrete, and how her heavy breasts pulled to the sides of her ribs with their natural weight. She was panting, and trembling, pleasure and exhaustion blatant on her face.

She turned her head enough to look at him, and he could see she struggled to keep her eyes open. Smiling. The beautiful creature was smiling.

He wasn't. He'd taken a lot of blood from her. A lot lot. He'd fed on plenty of kine, and he knew how much to take to leave them drained but alive; less than what he'd taken from her. She was alive, thank God, and she'd probably heal considering she was a Begotten. But that didn't change that he'd taken it too far.

He looked down at his body as his phone rang again. His erection pressed against his pants, and he grit his teeth as he glared at it.

"You ... you ok, Fiona?"

"Mmhmhm," she said in a deep haze. "I ... didnae think ye'd ... be..." She shivered again, and tried to lift her hands to press them on her legs. Best she managed was a light touch before they collapsed at her side.

"I'm sorry, Fiona. I ... took way too much, and ... and..." He gulped and looked at his good hand. Her juices had coated his fingers and palm, and he could smell sexual need, hers and his own; though, hers were in far greater supply at that particular point. "I have to answer this."

She blinked at him, and tried to sit up again. Surprisingly, she managed, and she got her weight onto her elbows as she blinked at him. "Ye do?" Sitting up like that, it made her breasts half squash to her ribs, and half weigh down with their size. He stared at them for a second longer than intended, and shook the thoughts out of his head.

"Yeah, it's Maria. She wouldn't call unless it was important." He looked up and around. The signal must have been able to reach them from here, where the subway platform sat directly underneath the streets. "I ... uh ... here." He forced himself in closer to Fiona, did his best to not stare at her breasts and stomach, and leaned in. He hesitated, afraid to get in too close, before he pushed through it and offered her neck a couple licks. The puncture wounds healed over, and he got away from her with a jump and hop.

"Da ... mien?" she said.

“I ... I have to go.” He reached into his pocket, did his best to adjust his erection, and pulled out his phone as he looked around. “Have ... have to go. Can ... c-can you, umm ... do you need me to...”

Fiona groaned, and pulled her bra and shirt back down. For a second, he thought she might have been recovering quickly, but instead she fell back again, and let out some weak giggles. They didn't sound like her usual giggles though, almost as if they were annoyed.

“It's happening again.”

“Again?” he said.

“Nevermind, dinnae worry about it. Go on, talk to yer boss.”

“You'll ... be fine?”

While still lying down, she reached down for her pants and did up her fly. “I can get home from the tunnels no problem. I need a change of pants, though.”

“Um ... I ... y-yeah. I'll ... yeah.” He ran away. There was no other way to think about it. Not even fancy ways of dressing it up, like tactical retreat or strategic withdrawal, could hide how much of an asshole and coward he was in that moment. But, he had to. For reasons.

Once he was topside and on the Dolareido sidewalks, he answered the phone.

“Mister Burksen. You took your sweet time answering.”

“S-Sorry, Madam Turio, I was preoccupied.” He'd almost drained Fiona into a coma, or maybe even killed her. What happened? How had every bit of control he'd mastered in fifty years of his second life evaporated?

“I received a rather poor summary of the situation from Mister White, and I understand you are gravely injured.”

He looked down at his bad hand. Now that the immediate high of Fiona, her blood, and her naked skin, was settling, the pain of broken bones and torn muscle returned. His hip hurt, his ankle was barely holding together in its web cast, and his busted hand was almost paralyzed with dysfunction. But he was in far better shape than he was before he Kissed Fiona.

“I’m ... injured, yes. But Fiona was kind enough to let me feed from her, and I’ve managed to heal enough to function.”

“You fed from a Begotten?”

“ ... yes.” And it was great. It was amazing. It felt like he’d been drinking something naughty and wrong; not in the sinful sense or religious sense, but in some other way he couldn’t put his finger on. Whatever it was about her blood, it was delicious, but overwhelming, and within moments of having it inside him, he’d become blood drunk.

“I understand that feeding from Uratha provides blood of most potent effect. Was the Begotten’s blood similar?”

“I’m ... I am not sure, Madam Turio. I believe it was.” He squirmed, and forced his body to turn off the Blush of Life. It’d only been a minute since he fed, and he’d fed a lot. Turning off the Blush took time, and he used angles to keep his erection from public view.

Thoughts of Fiona’s body didn’t make it any easier. Her heavy breasts had been so soft, and her tiny stature and red hair were terribly appealing. He wanted to go back down into the locked subway platform, and finish what he’d started. The giggles she made, the way her breasts jiggled with her motions, the way she beamed at him, the way she’d invited his touch, it all seared desire into his soul. God, he wanted to go back down there, get inside her, feel her walls of flesh squeeze on—

“Mister Burksen?”

“Ah, uh ... sorry, Madam Turio, I believe there was interference.”

“I said, come meet me at the Grand Cathedral. I wish to discuss recent developments.”

“About Begotten blood?”

“No, about your partner, Mister Terry.”

“ ... oh.”

---

He sighed as he stood at the entrance of the Grand Cathedral. Walking up its stairs, grandiose and imposing, did not strike him with fear; he'd been worried it might have. His sexual act with Fiona still sat in the front of his mind, getting in the way of every thought, every attempt he made to center himself and prepare mind, body, and soul, for the journey into God's building. It wasn't the sinful nature of the act that was bothering him, as God's laws were for kine, not the monsters that preyed upon them. It was how ... debased he'd become in that moment. A mindless savage, concerned only with sex and sustenance. He—

His phone beeped with a message. He'd yet to step into Maria's den, so he'd yet to set it to airplane mode. Sighing, he checked it quick, and groaned as he realized it was Fiona.

~ Damien, you ran away! Big scaredy cat. Come find me when you can, so we can continue. ~

That pulled a smile from him. She was conscious, not comatose from the Kiss, despite that she should have been. He should have trusted that a Begotten would heal quickly, or at least quicker than kine. Even better was that she wasn't angry with him; at least not overtly so.

His smile turned into shock, as he looked at the picture she sent. With her shirt and bra pulled up, jacket on but open, she held her phone away from her in one hand in classic selfie position, while her other hand blatantly squeezed one of her breasts. The heavy shape of it, and how its teardrop weight was more ample along its underside, meant her nipple stuck outward naturally, as the soft mass filled her palm. Nipple between finger and thumb, she was pinching it lightly, as she smiled at the camera.

He gulped, and put the phone away. Fiona was beautiful, there was no doubt about that. She wasn't thin, but not fat or chubby either, just enough fat on her to give her skin a softness that demanded to be touched. Combined with her enormous breasts and curvy legs, he knew he'd be helpless to resist her the moment she decided to get flirtatious with him. He just, hadn't expected it to ever come, and especially not so aggressively.

This was Jessy's fault. Reminder to self: confront Jessy later. Confront her about what? That the beautiful woman he was drawn to was attempting to seduce him, likely because of Jessy's influence? Or that he was disturbed by his own sudden aggression. Fiona didn't seem to mind, but she didn't realize how close to death she'd come.

If he told Jack, he knew the boy would tell him to not play to a cliché, and not hold Fiona at bay in some self-defeating attempt to protect her from himself. In the moment, he could understand the cliché, but thinking about it, he could also tell it was simply him being afraid of the strange impulse Kissing her had brought.

He'd talk to her about it. Yes, talk to her. Just talk. No more Kissing, only, perhaps, some kissing.

Unless she wanted a Kiss again. And given how adventurous she was, she probably would.

He gulped and shook his head. How easily temptation defeated a hardened mind.

Sighing, he stepped forward, stopped, checked the picture of Fiona's breasts once again, licked his lips, and again put it away before he stepped into the church. Candles were lit, and, to Damien's surprise, Vivienne Maiorie sat in one of the pews, along with Amanda Pol. They were chatting, and as he came closer, he saw they had the Book of Longinus, the summarized version, with them.

"Miss Maiorie, Miss Pol," he said.

"Mister Burksen," they said in unison.

"I ... was unaware you were interested in the teachings of Longinus, Miss Pol."

She shrugged, but nodded as she turned a page. "Just a little. Maiorie is the more interested one."

He offered Vivienne a smile. Vivienne Maiorie was Natasha's childe, and while the two had never managed to reconcile the gap that had grown between them, he could see the ex-Right Hand's influence on her. Vivienne would go far, given time to grow. The short time she'd spent with Lucas and the Lancea et Sanctum agreed.

"Madam Turio mentioned the Cathedral was open for those who wished to speak of the Testament of Longinus, and perhaps pursue an interest in the Lancea et Sanctum," Vivienne said.

He smiled at that. Maria had been making progress with the Prince then; or was doing this in secret. It was innocent enough, to simply talk about their religion and covenant. Hopefully the Prince would not mind.

“While I can’t excuse the behavior of my sire,” he said, “feel free to ask me questions about Longinus, whenever you wish. Except, perhaps, right now.” Smiling, his old bishop reflexes returning, he nodded toward the dark end of the cathedral where the pipe organ sat, and around behind it, a wooden door. “Madam Turio wishes to speak to me.” He nodded, and each offered a return nod, almost a bow, before they returned to their talk of Longinus. He wanted to join them, but he needed to speak with Maria.

He found the wooden door by the pipe organ, with the crucifix upon its face, and forced it open. It was thick enough that even the explosives the hunters seemed to have in spades would struggle to break it. Past it, a stairway awaited him, and he descended into the darkness.

The first few times he’d been down the stairway, he needed light, but he’d been through it enough times now that he could navigate it with only subtle, almost invisible dashes of ambient light that filled it. When he reached the tunnel though, there was plenty of light by Kindred standards, and he smiled as he admired the gigantic, concrete channel. Braziers hung on the walls of the massive tunnel, covered in spikes, and dangling from chains. They were lit, Maria no doubt having sent her ghouls to light them in preparation of his arrival.

Upon reaching a gate of thick metal bars covered in spikes, a ghoul on the other side opened it to let him in, before resealing the gate with some sort of electronic lock that kept a thick bar of some metal upon the gate’s entrance. The second gate offered the same protection, and so did the third, each with a ghoul, and each ghoul wearing a suit that hid their body armor and guns.

Some Kindred wondered why the elders didn't handle the troubles Dolareido faced on their own, when they were often capable of doing so. The myriad of gates blocking his path explained why rather succinctly. Elders were paranoid, and justly so. Lucas had told him of the games elders played, forever looking for ways to kill each other so they could claim dominion of their chosen city. A single mistake, a single exposed flank, a single moment of complacency, and an elder was liable to perish to another, or to a courageous — or stupid — ancilla. Even in Dolareido, where the covenants, other than the Second Estate, lived in a more-or-less peaceful coexistence, the elders could not let their guard down. For all the Prince's power, Lucas had defeated her with a combination of speed and leverage, and the other elders could be defeated in the same manner.

Plus, they really did spend all night, every night, devouring mountains of information, and making decisions that managed complicated networks of thralls, money, subterfuge, deceit, and everything related. He did not envy them and their mastery of the Danse Macabre.

Once he was past the many gates, the enormous tunnel of concrete opened up into a massive room, a dome, with hanging drapes on the walls. The drapes showed imagery of history, swords and crusades, the Crucifixion, Longinus stabbing Jesus on the cross with a spear, and many other images of such moments. Braziers hung from chains in this room as well, candles within the braziers managed by her primary ghoul Matthias. Hunched back, mangled face, Damien could only assume he'd worked as a bell ringer in a cathedral for a twisted archdeacon in a previous life.

He walked to the back of the room, where a grand piano sat, with a coffin nearby, upright and ready to hold an old-fashioned vampire looking to sleep for the day. Maria sat at the piano, and was playing some classical music. He did not ask what it was. Maria knew how to play every piece of classical music he'd ever heard, and a hundred score more of pieces he hadn't. At a certain point, asking was pointless.

“Do your lessons go well, Mister Burksen?” she said.

“Lessons? I—oh, the piano. Yes, Madam Turio.”

Nodding, she got up, and motioned for him to sit. He did, and began to play the piece she'd been asking him to play. Beethoven's Fur Elise was, compared to the works of Chopin Maria seemed to love, easy. But it was difficult for him, to command his fingers to dance in such a flowing rhythm, and he could not play it at full speed. Even harder, with his hand only partly repaired. He could play it though, and that earned a smile from his teacher.

“Good.” With a nod, she took the seat back, apparently satisfied. “I wanted to ask of Mister Terry, and I believe you know why.” Without skipping a beat, she started playing as she talked. Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata, third movement, a far faster and heftier piece than the more known first movement. She played it as easily as one might walk.

“His attitude, since his sister's death, and mother's assault.”

“Indeed. You of all people know that Mister Terry is unusually strong for a Kindred his age. What does your Auspex see in him?”

That almost earned a twitch from him. If she ever learned it was Jack who killed Lucas, it would not end well for the boy. But, of course, Maria assumed he was using Auspex on his fellow Kindred to see if he could spy potential threats in their Beastly auras. He was, of course, doing just that, regularly.

“Mister Terry himself seems a devoted soul to the Invictus, and to his companions. He himself is also ... painfully honest, with himself and others. I—”

“That is not what I asked, Burksen.” Skipping the honorific meant she wasn’t interested in dancing around the topic.

“If ... when I evaluate him as a vampire, I do notice that there’s an edge to him, something sharp and dangerous. Whatever it is, it is not on the surface, where I can see it.” And, it no doubt played a role in the young man’s ability to dominate Damien’s mind, in that particular incident. He recognized the same edge in Julias, but the man never let it surface, whereas Jack had, multiple times.

Viktor had let that edge surface, but at the time, Damien had only ever looked at the man from a distance, from well behind Lucas, and he hadn’t been old enough recognize the signs, or use Auspex to sense the true, animal deadliness in him.

“Indeed. And today, he did something he’s never done.”

Uh oh. “What was that?”

“He abandoned his mission, and left his sweeper team, in an apparent fit of frustration.”

“He—” Damien stopped himself, and raised a brow. Jack was an analytical, cynical sort, but he didn’t throw temper tantrums, especially not the sort that would interfere with work, and above all, work that affected others. “He is stressed.”

“Do you know what Viktor Honors did when he was stressed, Burksen?” She didn’t bother waiting for his response. “He indulged his baser desires, and killed, or destroyed, or tortured, or...” Sighing, she stopped playing, and frowned at him. “Keep an eye on him, Burksen. Honors never let MacDonald or I close enough to help him, and after his torpor, he kept even his childe Mire at a great distance.”

“I fear Terry may do the same, as these hunters now seem determined to ruin his second life.”

“Indeed. Watch him, Damien, and watch him closely. I trust you to do what is needed if the need ever arises.”

That, was dangerously close to a kill order. Assassin, indeed.

Chapter 86

~~Antoinette~~

Deep within her tower, she sat at a table with an array of laptops, tablets, and artifacts. The resonance circle sat empty, and she had her chandelier to a normal white light. The necklace that had summoned the odd spirit of secrets sat in front of her, and she stared at it as she folded her arms across her chest.

Should she tell Avery of her concern with Maria? No. Avery would overreact. Besides, there was no tangible proof. But the werewolf was bound to find out sooner or later, as she grew increasingly involved in the affairs of the vampires.

Sighing, she pulled her hair over her shoulder onto her chest, and combed it. There was a missing piece in this madness, in her city, and she was determined to find it. Daniel had spent how many nights now, searching? Drifting through the city with the highest skill Auspex could provide, he was nothing more than a wisp of shadow, a dream, moving through the walls and streets. His hunt had no goal, nothing obvious. He was as likely to discover a random ancient city beneath Dolareido, as he was to determine the secret forces planning something unknown.

Was this unseen force using the hunters as cover? The hunters had become the focus of everyone, and rightly so. If they continued unabated, they would eventually strike gold, and ruin the delicate balance Antoinette had crafted. She did not mind if they killed Azamel, but not if it meant damage to her city.

She did not wish for Fiona to suffer, either. The silly girl was a ray of sunshine, and now that Antoinette had met her on multiple occasions, she was happy the tiny monster had come to her city. She followed the rules, and had only acted against them in ignorance, originally.

Chuckling at memories of the girl, Antoinette shrugged and looked at her laptop. The video feed had four pictures, one for each corner. One was of Samantha Terry, and the feed showed Julias and Jack sitting by her bed. Good. Those two had a tenuous relationship as of late, the sort all childer and sires eventually felt, as their natures clashed. The curse of Kindred, with their instincts forever pushing for solitude, while their human half demanded socialization to some degree. But, those two were not the typical Kindred, or men for that matter. They did not let ego dictate their decisions, usually.

Perhaps Jack would ask her to sire his mother. The more she thought about it, the more she felt she would, and that it would be a beneficial, and enjoyable change to her own life. To have a childe was an experience she had long forgotten, except that her previous was not only a male, a young male, but also her lover. This one would be a mature woman, and according to Jack, she was not the analytical sort.

What would that be like? Forever her conversations with Tony had been mental battles, each trying to outwit the other. Love faded, replaced with resentment, paranoia, and with time, hatred. With someone like Samantha, where Antoinette was the clear intellectual superior, would she feel superior in more problematic ways to her new childe? She had known Kindred to sometimes sire those they considered easily enslaved; after all, a Kindred did not sire to pass on the generation of their blood, like breeding humans. Kindred sired to increase the strength of their dominion. There were even stories of Kindred who sired, raised their childe, and then devoured them, draining their blood, and their soul.

She shivered. Diablerie was a vile act, and she was glad it had rarely reared its ugly head in her life. No, she was kinder than the average sire, let alone one capable of Diablerie. She would treat Samantha with respect, and with the wisdom she had gained in the centuries since Tony's embrace. And, it would be nice to have a female companion who was of an age. Ashley and Julee were wonderful, but young, and she was never sure if siring them would be a good choice.

Jack was young. But, was he? The boy had similar attributes to an old man, a strange concoction of intellect, hope, and cynicism. It was terribly appealing.

She sighed as she watched the two men talk over Samantha's body. This potential childe was the mother of her lover. That was a strange situation to be in, but not unheard of for Kindred. Indeed, many Kindred abandoned all pretext of romantic norms, and many engaged in sexual webs more complicated than any soap opera dared dream. It was not unheard of for Kindred to embrace their biological children once of age, leading to parent siring child, who sired their child, who sired their child. There were almost laughably intricate romantic triangles between Kindred that included parent, grandparent, child, and grandchild, fighting for the affections of the same man or woman.

But, while such complications were normal in Antoinette's world, they would novel and shocking in Samantha's. The woman would be Antoinette's childe, while Antoinette made love to her son, took care of him, pampered him, and, in a way, replaced Samantha as the woman in his life. There would be a wall between her and her new childe, and it would take great effort to overcome.

If she decided to sire her at all. Perhaps she should tell the boy to let his mother go? No, that would be cruel. Life was worth fighting for, even a second life. But that did not mean another Kindred could not take Jack's mother for their own, and not her. The issue was that Kindred groomed potential childer before the embrace, and no one knew this woman except for Jack.

Sighing, she looked to the other camera feeds. There were three cameras set up, high on building tops and pointed at the hospital. Some of her thralls sat upon them, perched on roofs, watching the city streets from above; so were Invictus thralls, she was sure. They had to be careful to not step on each other's toes, but at least they all had the same idea: there was a chance hunters would come to the hospital.

And what if they did? What could they possibly hope to achieve from that? Surely they were not willing to risk their lives and the lives of kine in a hospital, in some mindless bid to assassinate a visiting Kindred. That did not mean they did not have some other trick up their sleeve, though.

Her phone buzzed, and she sighed yet again as she picked it up. First she was interrupted from her research by her own thoughts, and now she was to be interrupted by another's. She was tempted to not answer, but if someone was calling her on this number, it was important.

Ah, Natasha. She answered it, and forced down the frustration building in her chest. "Miss Vola, my dear. Are you well?"

"Y-Yes, Prince."

"It was most startling, receiving your message." Only some thirty minutes ago, Natasha had sent the distress message, warning the Prince and the sheriff of her immediate danger. For the GPS on her phone to vanish shortly after had been worrying indeed.

"Sorry, P-Prince. We had to investigate immed-d-diatly, for fear we might miss the opportunity."

Antoinette nodded, phone to her ear. "Do not apologize for your tactical decisions, Natasha."

“B-But I ... w-we could have wasted time, if I made a mistake. And w-w-w—”

“Vola, my dear, you must understand. Even should your decision lead to wasted effort, or disastrous result, if you made it through steps of correct, logical reasoning, then you made the correct decision. It is always possible, that should you make zero mistakes and perform perfectly, you will still fail in your endeavor. Such is life. Do not take on guilt that is not yours to bear.” Natasha had to learn to stop blaming herself for things. She internalized her negativity, and the neurotic behavior was a shackle around her ankle.

“Yes, Prince. I ... I understand.” Antoinette could almost see Natasha squirm on the phone. “W-We found hunters.”

“I see. Then I am doubly glad you sent the message. Was Daniel of use?”

“Um ... n-no, not really. He showed up once we were ... spit out.”

“Spit out?”

“We found Elen, and she w-was ... d-d-doing things, in a hidden chamber, and it was ... was—”

“Come to the tower, Natasha. This is important.” Antoinette reached out, closed her laptop with the video feed, and left the research room. Her attempts to pierce the veil could wait. Hunters were the priority.

---

---

~~Beatrice~~

Mission successful. Sort of? They learned something damn important about the hunters, but that knowledge seemed like such a small thing, compared to how awesome it would have been to kill some hunters, capture Elen, and maybe free that Begotten from her control; assuming it was mind control. So much potential success, and it'd all been right there in front of them. They followed a hunch, followed their instincts, and tracked down the hunters to what must have been a sort of jumping point they used for their weird ... flesh ... chamber ... thing.

She groaned as she raised her head so the falling hot water fell on her face. Soaked in blood as she was, it had dried out a fair bit by the time she and her fellow witches had broken into a private indoor swimming pool. The pool wasn't close by, but they all desperately needed a shower after the insanity of what just happened, so they made the effort. They'd collected some of the blood into a jar, in case they could use it later, but for now, time to get it the fuck off.

“I wished Natasha joined us,” Jen said.

“Well, I'm sure she's got better gigs to shower in than here.” Triss motioned to the barely lit shower room of the swimming pool. Taupe tiling, large, with mirrors and counters; all around pretty decent, but it probably had nothing on the showers in the Elysium Tower.

The two of them stood naked under the falling water, a showerhead for each, and the two of them let out small groans and moans as they felt the blood wash away. A bit of it had gotten into her mouth, and it tasted very human. That was fucked up. How the fuck could a room of flesh, tortured and cut and spread and split and tied and punctured flesh, with arms and faces growing out of its walls, be human?

“Yeah but, I wouldn't mind getting a peek at her.”

Triss rolled her eyes. “Jen, really?”

“What? She's got this teeny tiny little body, but still has feminine curves, except it's all petite, and ... she's beautiful.” Jen sighed and turned under the shower, running her fingers through her hair as she did. “And you heard her. She’s got those two boys doing things to her nigh every night, and you just know they’re both fucking her at the same time.”

“You make it sound naughty. You were getting DP’d on the regular before you jumped into my bed, Jen.” Laughing, Triss looked over and watched the blood slide off Jen’s skin, disappearing into the drain. Hot damn, Jennifer had a body.

She must have noticed her gaze, cause Jen smiled at her, and started to make more a show of rubbing her body down. Around and around, she moved her fingers around her large breasts, circled her nipples, and slid them down to her smooth slit to begin rubbing it free of the mess.

“The fuck do you think you’re doing?”

“Trying to arouse you, obviously.” With a few chuckles, she looked up into the falling water, ran her fingers through her hair, and raised her elbows as she did, emphasizing the hourglass figure, tight waist, flat stomach, the big tits, everything. A model pose for an adult photoshoot, no doubt. The brown eyes and almost alabaster skin combined with her shoulder-length black hair always did remind Triss a little of herself, though Triss had darker skin, more muscle definition, and much smaller tits. Still, they looked similar, and seeing herself bathing rather erotically, a bustier version of herself without the crocodile teeth, was hot.

“Well that makes you a bitch. I’m dating Julias, not you.”

“You wound me!” She feigned offense, bringing a hand to her sternum to clutch at her heart. “And besides, I’m not trying to ... you know, damage that. Buuuuut...” Licking her luscious lips, the damn Ventrue walked up to her, and slid under the falling water that Triss had been claiming as her own before. “You know Julias doesn’t mind if we get a little physical. I can kiss you, right?” She leaned in close, and did just that. Of course she leaned in her body too, so her breasts pressed to Triss's, a bit lower with their size and weight, nipples grazing under hers.

Rolling her eyes again, Triss put her hands on Jen's hips, and returned the kiss. "We're not fucking unless Julias is around."

"I know, sad as that makes me."

"Well I know I'd be pretty pissed if you fucked him when I wasn't there."

"Yes, but he's your boyfriend. The gender dynamic is different."

"That's sexist."

It was Jen's turn to roll her eyes. "Come now, no it isn't. Do you really think Julias would feel jealous, if I licked you all up right now? Because I know I'd make sure, and you'd make sure, to not only explain to him what I did to you in great detail, but to do a repeat performance for him." Jen took Triss's hips in return, and pressed their bodies a bit closer together, hips to hips, breasts to breasts, and she swayed side to side in a dance-like motion. "I won't, of course. But I thought you should know, I very much want to do all sorts of things to you right now."

"I've noticed." It was very hard to not be convinced by her. And Triss had to admit, there was a little logic to it. She knew she'd be right fucking jealous if Jen fucked Julias without her. But, would Julias feel that way if Beatrice and Jennifer fucked?

Her gut said yes, he would. Even if the two of them could bury the man in sexual favors to 'make up' for their wanton sex drives, it didn't feel right. She supposed Jen would be right, and it'd be fine to fuck without him, if she and Julias weren't romantic with each other, but something about the emotional connection made the physical act of sex carry more weight, and meaning. That was something Jennifer just didn't get. The girl didn't crave romantic connection like other people did. While there wasn't anything wrong with that, it did mean Triss had to keep the girl's sex drive on a leash, which probably only turned Jen on more. Julias had given her the freedom to fuck her ghouls whenever she wanted, but she hadn't been. She'd been saving up all her sexual desires, her salacious and carnal nature, all her sexual hunger, for Triss and Julias.

She trusted Jen. The girl had proven to be a great friend, and trustworthy. But damn, seeing her strut her stuff all the damn time, constantly trying to seduce Triss, was mouth-watering; once she Blushed, at least. Hell, the way she was rubbing their bodies together right now was enough to have Triss struggling to keep her voice under control, and not moan. The moment they got back to Julias's, she was going to fuck his brains out, and Jen's.

“You were like a superhero.”

“I ... what?”

“Tonight, in that flesh room. The boys getting aggressive like that, I expected that. But you ran in there and didn't hesitate. Bullets flying, screams and gunfire, in an alien room of fleshly nightmares, you faced it, fought it, without indecision or delay.”

“What? Fuck yeah I hesitated. Felt like I froze for an eternity.”

Jen shook her head. “Try one second, from behind cover where no one noticed.”

Shrugging, Triss leaned in and set another kiss on Jen, this time on her neck. Ok, maybe a little teasing, to get them all tingly when they saw Julias tonight.

“Well, you were too young to be on that trip, but you stuck your head out anyway,” Triss said.

“I barely managed to get a grip on that hunter’s mind.”

“But you did, and saved our asses.”

Jen smiled at that, and if Triss didn’t know any better, it looked like the girl was feeling shy about it. Surprising, that Jen knew that emotion at all.

“So,” Jen said. “I’m thinking tonight, we fuck Julias in the shower.”

“You ever fuck pussy in the shower?”

“I don’t have a penis, and neither do you.”

Triss shrugged. “I’ve heard horror stories about how nasty it can be, from the positions, to how the water washes away the juices so it’s all ... rubbery.”

“They have water-resistant lubricant these days.”

“Ah, right, yeah. I’ve used them, too.” Triss sighed with the memory. That was a good time. “I was sitting in the tub with Julias, one of those old school tubs. We’d found a couple outside, two kine, man and woman, and he used Dominate to turn them into temporary thralls, right? We used them as our servants for the night, and it was ... was the first time Julias showed me what it was like to be a pampered princess. I sat on his dick, and—”

“Anal, I imagine.”

“Excuse me for enjoying it!” She shoved Jen away, and got back to wiping her body down. Always teasing her about the anal thing. Some women liked anal! Fucking hell. “So I was sitting on him, leaning back in the tub, facing him, and I relaxed there while the two kine massaged me and fingered me. Felt like a god damn queen, being pampered like that.”

Jen didn't stay on her side of the shower for long. Licking her lips, she came back over, slipped behind Triss, smooshed her big tits to her back, and hugged her from behind. Her hands found Triss's breasts, and she cupped them, fingers crossing over her nipples, and she fiddled with the nipple piercings between her knuckles.

“Let's do that then. I'll play the role of servant, and do things to you while you sit on your lover boy.”

“We already do that, all the time.” She squirmed, and Jen held on. Her hands continued to massage Triss's body, fingers tracing around her nipples, before they slid lower to run along the subtle lines of Triss's abs. It made her tingly, very tingly, especially when Jen's fingers slid lower, and started to gently press and tease the softness of her smooth mons. The snake tattoo's tail started there, right over the clitoris, and Jen's fingers stopped there as well, a hair's breadth away from the pierced clit hood. If Triss Blushed Life, her clit would be screaming with need, swollen, and demanding to be touched. But she didn't Blush, and Jen didn't touch. Oh how her friend liked to walk that line.

“How about this time, I—hey!” She snapped her head up to the shower room entrance, and glared as Aaron and Othello walked in. “Assholes. This is the girl's shower room!”

Othello, Triss had seen naked plenty of times; more than. She'd seen him fuck his beautiful ghoul dozens of times by this point, and usually in the ass, so there'd been a hypnotic appeal to it. So she'd watched, more than once. Hell one time she'd given instructions like a porn director. That'd been a fun night. She hadn't expected to see him walk into their shower naked, though.

Othello was a hunk, no two ways about it. The tan skin, big and strong body, dreadlocks, very fashion model. Aaron, on the other hand, she'd never seen naked. With his clothes on, he seemed like a normal dude, average height, average build, pale skin. Nude, was another story. The fucker was mother fucking ripped, like a god damn Olympian ninja, a lean and athletic build that would have put most accomplished elite to shame. She hadn't noticed it because he lacked bulk, girth, but god damn.

And like Othello, Aaron kept his pubic hair shaved off too, like most in Dolareido. Without the Blush going, both of them looked like they had small dicks, but she knew better than to judge a book by its cover. Kindred without the Blush always looked a bit emaciated, anyway.

Wait. Triss was standing there, naked, with Jen's hands roaming all over her. The boys had never seen her naked. She should probably feel shy about all this.

Eh, not really. She'd been fucking Julias and including thralls semi-regularly in their bedroom, for months now. Put Jen on top of that, and then seeing all the shit that went down at the Circle's den, she'd become thoroughly robbed of all shyness and shame. So she let her eyes linger a bit, and she didn't cover herself up, either.

"Nice tats," Othello said, offering an eye wiggle as his eyes roamed up from her sex to her breasts, where the snake bit into one nipple. "Everything's pierced."

"The fuck you dumbasses doing in here?" she said.

Aaron shrugged, and came in closer. He turned on one of the showerheads, and started washing. It was true the boys still looked bloody, so they hadn't showered yet.

"Honestly?" Aaron said. "We said we wanted to stay close, and this is close. Considering how dangerous shit is, and considering your guard is down right now, we should group up. But, I think we both just wanted to see some tits and ass."

Triss and Jen both laughed. Ok, points for honesty.

“Othello gets ass every night,” Jen said, peeking over Triss’s shoulder at them. “And you both have seen me, and my insides getting filled on the regular.” If Triss had no shame, then by comparison, Jen was some sort of shame black hole, sucking it into a vortex where it was promptly destroyed. “But Aaron, I’ve never seen you fuck anyone. Hell, I don’t know anything about your sex life.”

The man shrugged as he ran his hands up and down his lean muscles. Much as Aaron always had a calm demeanor, mature, wise, cold, Triss noticed him sneak the two women a few glances, especially when Jen started massaging Triss’s breasts again. And Triss let her. Hey, it was just a bit of fun, showing off. The fact none of the Circle gave a shit about her crocodile cheeks, her snake eyes, or her claw-like fingernails, was awesome. The fact they were all comfortable as fuck with nudity, was also awesome.

“You never asked.”

“Are you serious?” Jen let go, and stepped around Triss to lean against the shower wall with her shoulder so she could look at Aaron, arms folded under her breasts. “All I had to do is ask?”

“Yeah.”

“... alright, what’s your favorite kink?”

Right to the good stuff, as expected. The girl could be so suave, verbose, and poetic when she wanted to be, but sometimes she was just a god damn slut. Triss loved her for that. Julias did, too. The dichotomy of her personality was like a really good spice on food; or she assumed it was. Christ, how long had it been since she’d eaten spicy food? Over twenty fucking years, Jesus.

“Kink?”

“You know, kink, like, do you prefer vaginal or anal, do you really get off from blowjobs or face fucking, or maybe you want to fuck some tits?” To emphasize, she jumped in place a few times, small jumps that made her breasts bounce.

Triss couldn't help but laugh. Jacob had told her stories about witches of the Circle that made sacrifices, performed rituals, and otherwise did some pretty nasty stuff, and did it naked, in the middle of the woods; often during an orgy. Nudity meant nothing to witches.

Aaron shrugged, and pressed his hands to the wall, head down, so the water ran down his neck and back. “I like doing whatever she wants. Usually it's pretty gentle. A lot of spooning, some missionary.”

Jennifer groaned in pain and stopped bouncing. “Aaron, you don't understand. Women like a man with desire, with passion, and they like it when he expresses it with aggression.”

The man lifted his head, and slowly raised a brow, just a little, enough to give that classic Aaron look, the ‘I'm not sure if you're right, and even if you are, I'm not sure I care' look. The man lacked passion, that was for sure. But he had the calm and collected thing down, and some women dug that, Triss figured.

“Not every woman wants to be choked and fucked hard, Jennifer.”

Jennifer looked at him, squinted an eye, and gestured to Othello. “Othello, how often do you get your fingers around your ghoul Madison's neck when you fuck her.”

“Almost every time.” The big guy nodded, shrugged, and started washing himself as well, across the room from them under another showerhead. Triss took a little longer than she probably should have watching the guy, but damn he had a body, with an ass of steel. And, like he said, he had a habit of using his hands, big strong hands, wrapping one around Madison's neck, and holding her down as he fucked her ass. It was powerful imagery that scratched an itch in Triss's mind just the right way.

Triss licked her lips as she let a memory of Julius doing just that to her drift through her mind. The man got pretty aggressive with her sometimes, held her down, pounded her hard, and didn't stop until she was a mess. And she had to admit, those were the times she probably came the hardest. Jennifer had a point.

But Aaron just shrugged, and lowered his head again, letting the water fall down over his face. "Think the Prince is like that with that kid?"

"Touché," Jennifer said. "Based on how we see them interact, I'm guessing she plays the dominatrix a bit. He's probably spent many nights as bottom, watching her dance on him."

Othello laughed. "Maybe. I'm guessing he's spent most nights with his dick between her tits."

They all chuckled. This was classic locker room talk, dirty and ridiculous, with a mix of feminine and masculine vibes stirred in. This was fun. Horribly juvenile and stupid, but fun.

"I think," Triss said, coming up behind Jen, and hugging her in the same way Jen had hugged her before, "we should try that with you and Superman." She leaned in closer, pressing her piercings into Jen's back as she clutched her tight, hands cupping her breasts.

"Which part, the dancing or tit fucking?" Jen turned her head enough to give Triss access to her neck, and Triss responded appropriately, kissing the woman's skin as she massaged her body. She was very tempted to get on her knees, and stick her tongue inside Jen's pussy right here and now; and the idea of having the boys watch her lick Jen to an orgasm or two was exciting, too. But she didn't. Self-control, dumbass, exercise some self-control.

“Both.”

Jen laughed, and pressed her ass back into Triss, earning a lingering gaze from the two boys. “Deal.”

---

---

~~Julias~~

He reached over and set his hand on Samantha’s forehead, sighed, and lowered it back to the sheets. “You going to be alright, Jack?”

“Dunno.”

“Good answer.”

Jack laughed and shrugged. “I mean, what else is there to do?”

“Go talk to Antoinette.”

“Right now?”

“Right now,” Julias said. Jack reached for his pocket, but Julias shook his head. “In person. Go talk to her tonight. Hell, tell you her you want to do it tomorrow night, dusk.”

“Dusk?” His jaw dropped, and it took a few seconds before he realized. Wide eyed, he looked at his mother, before his gaze steeled. The Jack face, the face he made when he was determined to do something and finally realized it. “... yes. I’ll ask her to do it tomorrow, the moment we wake up. That’ll give Mom the night to acclimate. Docs say she’s stable for now. Shouldn’t be an issue to wait one more day.”

Nodding, Julias got up, and Jack joined him. He was tempted to suggest Jack get this done tonight, but rushing an embrace, even in this situation, was a bad idea. It was an important part of a Kindred's life, both the giver and receiver, and with only an hour of night left, now was not the time.

Thoughts of Tony clawed their way into his head, and he grimaced. Antoinette would be thinking of her old childe, no doubt, when deliberating this, and that could mean she'd change her mind. Tony, he was sure, was her greatest mistake; or at least that's probably how she thought about him. Creating a new childe was not to be taken lightly, and she knew that most of all.

"So, what does it feel like to embrace someone?" Jack said. The two of them began the walk toward the elevator, and dismissed any curious nurses with small mental suggestions, gentle uses of Dominate. The kid had a talent for it, that was for sure.

"Feels like putting a piece of yourself into someone."

"I can't really visualize what that feels like."

Julias shrugged as he hit the elevator button. "It feels like, you're taking a part of you that resonates, and sharing it with someone. Not just sharing, giving, infecting. It feels a little ... wrong, but also, meaningful."

"Resonate?"

"Like when you read a good story or watch a good movie, or listen to a great song, it resonates with you, sticks with you. You feel it in your guts, your heart, everything."

The kid nodded, and stepped onto the elevator. No one else was using it, and he noticed Jack sigh with relaxation. He hated being stuck in an elevator with strangers, probably.

"I know that resonating feeling, yeah."

“So, when I embraced you, a lot of that kind of ... got muffled. More Beastly desires surfaced for a while.” That same night, he’d gotten into a fight with Rebecca, and had nearly beaten her to death. At the time, he’d almost found it fun.

“That sounds horrible.”

“The worst of it passed quickly. You’re my first childe, and I have a lot of ... the part of me, us, that keeps us from giving into the Beast. There are horror stories of younger Kindred, desperate to hold onto who they loved in the first life, embracing a bunch of people. Young Kindred can resist their Beast just fine, usually, maybe even more easily than older Kindred, but a young vamp who doesn’t know better can find themselves ruined by over-draining themselves of that special part of them.”

“Draugr.”

“Correct.”

“Ever had to kill one?” Jack asked.

“Yes.”

“Tell me about one of them.”

Julias raised a brow at the boy as the elevator opened up into the ground floor hall. More people down here, more nurses, less doctors, and some civilians going by. He lowered his voice.

“Different situation. A woman, a fledgling, decided to go homicidal.”

Jack stopped and raised a brow, before leaning in. “What?”

“She killed a whole bunch of people she felt wronged her, in her first life.”

“Wronged her?”

“Some of them deserved it. Most of them didn’t.”

“Fuuuuck. So killing people can do it, too?”

This was a tricky topic. His childe was asking him heavy questions about the Beast, and the soul, about whatever it was that separated humans, and vampires, from other animals; if anything truly did. He brought Jack to the cafeteria, and they sat down by the window so they could look out toward the parking lot.

“It’s not about killing. It’s about you, as an individual, a sentient entity, having things about you that are worth holding onto. They’re the sort of things an expert in torture would try and break, if they wanted to mindfuck you. If you were a courageous leader who cared deeply for his soldiers, an enemy who captured you would try and break that part of you, make you turn on your fellow soldiers, make you turn on your commitments and convictions.”

Jack’s eyebrows raised in understanding, before he lowered them as he looked down at the table. “And you damaged yours, for me?”

“It was just temporary. I feel fine these days, and I could sire your mother if the situation demanded. Hell, I want to. But I know better than to let how I feel be the basis of making the decision.”

Jack nodded again, and rubbed his chin with finger and thumb. If there was anything Julias could trust his childe with, it was being logical and being willing to set his emotions about something aside. Usually. Maybe he shouldn’t trust him with that anymore, considering present circumstances.

“That brings me to a point,” Julias continued. “You left your sweeper team tonight.”

“ ... Yes.”

“And you didn’t bring an escort with you, violating the buddy system.”

“Yes.”

“Want to explain?”

“I—” Rage built in the boy’s face, hardening it, furrowing his brow as he glared down at the table. “Athalia pissed me off.”

Julias didn’t need to explain that that wasn’t a good enough reason to behave as he did. Again, he could trust Jack to understand that there would be ramifications for him letting his emotions force a poor decision out of him. Later, he would punish the boy, and Jack would nod and accept it without argument. For now, energy was better spent trying to get to the root of this problem.

“How?”

“She’s determined to reconcile with her daughter.”

“Isn’t that understandable? It’s her daughter.”

Jack raised his eyes, and glared at Julias. That was a surprise. The kid didn’t break eye contact or look down or anything. He stared Julias straight in the eyes, before finally closing them and shaking his head.

“There’s no communicating with these hunters, Julias. You haven’t looked them in the eye like I have. There’s no truce to be made here, no compromise, nothing. The only way we end this threat is if we force the hunters out, or kill them all.” The boy opened his eyes again, but to look out to the parking lot, and stare at the mostly empty space. The lights shone bright, far away enough from the brighter areas of South Side that the streetlights weren’t washed out by casinos or strip clubs.

“I don’t disagree.”

“But ... hearing her, that fucking ... asshole of a woman, try and argue that maybe there could be? Because it’s her daughter? Selfish.”

Ouch. Julias leaned back, and followed Jack’s gaze out to the parking lot. It was a beautiful night, not a cloud in the sky, so a hint of star managed to show through despite Dolareido’s nightlife filling the sky with its own light. It didn’t fit the atmosphere at all. But then, Dolareido always did its own thing, went its own way.

“Can you blame her?”

“I know what you’re going to say, Julias. She is being selfish, but we all are. This circumstance with Mom is similar, in that I want to save her so she doesn’t die, like Athalia does her daughter. I get it. I fucking get it, but...” His fingers pressed into the table, and Julias felt a little vibration through it. The boy was visibly trembling with rage, if only barely. Deep down in his guts, the kid was boiling. “That daughter killed my sister, nearly killed my mother, has killed and assaulted Kindred, and ... and...”

“Tortured you.”

Jack’s shaking faded away, and he managed a glance at Julias before looking out the window again. The rage subsided, and Julias could see the creeping, cold, uncomfortable ache in the boy’s face. Fear.

“I ... can’t be afraid. I have to deal with these hunters, and—”

“Jack, everyone’s afraid. The only people who aren’t afraid are psychopaths.”

“I know, and I get it. But I’m a key part of the Masquerade now. Like it or not, I can’t let fear stop me from doing my job.”

Sighing, Julias shook his head. This kid was going to tear himself apart in the same way Julias used to. If only he could do this, if only he could do that, if only he had complete control of every facet of his life. If only he was omnipotent, and could fix all the aspects of his world, for himself and everyone he cared about. Hell, even strangers on the street, he'd fix their problems, if he had the power. Jack would do the same.

“You're not even two years embraced, Jack. Cut yourself some slack. You're young. Very young.”

“I know.”

“Do you want me to move the Right Hand title? Isabella would love it.”

“... would she make a good one?”

“Heh, no. She spends all her time with her actors and actresses, helping them learn. Ever see one of their plays? They're quite good, and show a lot of skin.” As per custom in Dolareido, whatever was done in Slut City had to be done with less clothing than the norm.

“If she won't make a good Right Hand, then no, don't give it to her. The council gave it to me for a reason. And I know I fucked up tonight. But, it was that, or...” He grit his teeth and snarled down at the table, quietly. “I don't know why Azamel paired her with me.”

“It was probably Athalia's request.”

“You think?”

Julias nodded. “You're only the second vampire she's ever trusted.”

That hit something in the kid, wiping his snarl away and making his eyes droop. “I don't deserve it, not anymore, not when it comes to this.”

“Maybe. Maybe not. The only other vampire she’s ever trusted was Daniel, and that was a forced situation. I think this peacekeeper gig you’ve picked up is going to stick, and the Begotten and Uratha are going to continue coming to you, when trying to smooth out issues that involve the others. In this circumstance, Azamel, and even Athalia, may trust you to do what is best, even if that means killing Angela.”

“Imagining keeping up that peacekeeper role, with Athalia at the forefront of the Begotten, after killing her daughter ... is hard.”

Julias nodded once again, and leaned in as he put his elbows on the table. Enough with the depressing crap. The kid needed to think of the future, not brood over the shit in his lap.

“What’re you going to do, when your mom wakes up?”

“Wakes up? Oh, from ... the embrace.” He rubbed his buzzed head, and looked around at the empty cafeteria. Not completely empty, with a few people sitting around on the other side, chatting with each other. “I don’t know. Probably apologize for being so distant with her before I was embraced. And probably apologize for ... you know ... getting Mary killed.”

Oh boy, that idea backfired quick.

“You know it’s not your fault.”

“I know, I know. But something inside my head doesn’t give a shit about the logical explanation, and is content to blame the fuck out of me.”

“Ah, yes, that part. I am all too familiar.” They chuckled. Finally, a little relief from the depression the kid was feeling. “I meant, once the horrible part is over. After explaining to her that Mary’s dead, and you're alive, comes explaining to her everything about her new life, explaining—”

“I assumed whoever sired her would do a lot of that, honestly.” Aha, finally got the kid thinking about a future that didn't suck, and wasn't filled with pain. A small smile sneaked its way onto his face, and he looked at the table again as his mind wandered. “You don't think?”

“I think whoever does will want to include you. Assuming Antoinette, you'll be there to greet your mother in her new world. You'll make it easier for her to accept, and once the painful parts are over, I'm sure the Prince will encourage you to help your mother integrate.”

“She'd be a dragon, though.”

“The dragons are the most secretive organization on the planet. Samantha isn't working her way up that ladder any time soon. No, Antoinette will ease her in at the most basic level, and won't give her any sensitive information for many years. That means, there'd be no covenant issues including you in helping her new child be comfortable in her new life. Help her hunt. Help her find a new place to live. Help her go shopping.”

Both of them frowned and shook their heads at that, as if tasting something rotten. Shopping trips, hours spent doing nothing but looking in windows, comparing items, no thanks.

“That does sound ... I mean it sounds fun, but like I told you, Mom and I were never that close.” It pained Jack to say that, Julias could see. It ate away at him. Family remorse.

“A strange thing happens to people when they get to your age, Jack. Either they grow even further apart from their families, and commit to being separated, or they get pulled back to them. You saw that with your sister.”

“You think I’ll reconnect with her?” he said. “It could go the other way, and make things worse than they were.” His eyes drifted back to the parking lot, as did Julias’s, and the two of them watched some humans come and go. Watching people move in and out of a hospital had a sobering effect, with how somber many expressions were. Much as people came to a hospital to be healed, the default mood for those that came to one was sadness. It gave the building a heavy atmosphere, not unlike a graveyard.

“I have no idea what’ll happen, but—”

The lights in the parking lot went out. A split second later, the lights in the hospital went out. Ok, now it really felt like a graveyard.

Everything went quiet, and Kindred hearing cut through the silence to hear the panicked gasps of the kine around them. Jack and Julias stared at the window, and watched as power continued to go out from buildings across the street. In this section of South Side, office buildings were everywhere, with lights already off, but there were plenty of apartment buildings as well. Their lights flicked off in the same second that the hospital’s had, like a wave of darkness that crashed over the city as if a monsoon of blackness had suddenly attacked.

A gentle whirr continued in the background, something normally covered by the sound of life in Dolareido, and its consistent activity. The whirr picked up, becoming a hum, and the lights of the hospital turned back on, in low light mode.

The power was out, and the hospital’s generators took over seamlessly.

There was no boom of an explosion, no boom of thunder, no warning of a planned blackout, nothing. The power was out, randomly. And there was no way it was random.

Julias got up, motioned for the Jack to do the same, and started walking toward the cafeteria exit. He had a pistol and knife hidden inside his suit jacket, and he knew Jack had the same. There was an issue with drawing them, though: it was a hospital, and a gunfight would be a problem; hell, even a knife fight would be a problem. Even if no kine were injured, a fight inside a hospital was not something the Invictus or the Prince could hide from the media.

He pulled out his phone. If—“... my phone ... has no signal,” he said, and he turned to look at Jack as he held it up.

The kid did the same, and groaned before putting it away. “Cell tower down?”

“No, that wouldn’t be it. They’re jamming it somehow.”

“Jamming? Can people even do that?”

The two of them looked at each other, and shrugged. Technology was a bitch, and even youngsters like Jack didn’t know everything about it.

“Excuse me?” One of the humans got up from their chair to join them, a nurse, woman, young and innocent looking. The sort of girl to play an extra in a movie, and get killed off by stray gunfire. “Are your phones working?”

“No signal,” Jack said. “Hospital have Wi-Fi?”

“Yes, but that’s down, too.” She held out her phone, showing how her usual Wi-Fi network signal showed no bars. “But, that’s weird. The hospital’s generator keeps everything running, Wi-Fi included.”

Jack shrugged, and Julias grimaced as he poked his head out of the door. The cafeteria had a door connected to the main hall, and the main hall went from one end of the front of the hospital to the other end. The lobby sat in front of the hall, and connected to the parking lot that spanned the front of the building, a room large enough to handle dozens of patients. The lobby was out of view from his current position, and as he poked his head out down the hall, he could only see the large doors that lead from the main hall into it.

Crisis mode. Everything had just gone horribly wrong, and they had to act fast. What to do, what to do. If the hunters knocked out the power, that was one thing. Knocking out the power for a whole city block, or more, and putting out some sort of jammer on both cell signals but also Wi-Fi, was extreme to say the least. Plan, assume the worst case scenario, and deescalate when more information was found. He had to assume they were making an attack on the hospital, to come for Jack's mother, and for whoever was here. They would be willing to get violent, even with humans around, and mow down innocents to kill vampires, if their assault on Jack's family was any sort of precedent. If they were willing to brutally murder Jack's sister, they were willing to do anything.

No amount of training, preparation, or equipment, could have prepared the Kindred for hunters willing to use humans as shields, or willing to butcher them. It made no sense. And it wasn't like Kindred considered the humans as hostages or vital targets to be saved; there were millions of them in Dolareido, more than enough to keep all the Kindred well fed. What could the hunters hope to accomplish using humans in this war?

That meant they wouldn't use the humans as hostages, unless they were humans Kindred like Jack considered important, like his mother. The only possible reason they had to come to the hospital then, was to catch Jack and any other Kindred, and potentially use his mother to force the encounter. It wasn't like they knew she'd survive the stabbing, otherwise they'd have probably attacked last night.

Think. It was a stroke of luck Samantha survived; Angela had tried to kill them both, not spare one in hopes this situation would occur. It hadn't even been forty-eight hours since her assault either, so the hunters had to discover she survived, was sent to this hospital, and then plan this attack in that time. How much could they accomplish in that amount of time? Considering what Angela and Jeremiah had proven capable of, probably quite a lot.

“Hey, what are you doing?” a voice called out from the hallway ahead. Julias frowned, and pulled his head back, as the doors of the lobby opened. One of the nurses slammed into the hallway wall, clutching her chest and shoulder, and she slid down onto her ass, as a group of hunters stepped into the hallway.

Julias pulled back, and motioned for Jack to the same. Backs to the wall inside the cafeteria, so no one inside the main hallway could see them, Julias looked around with snapping eyes. Windows. Leave?

“Out the window?” Jack said, eyes wide as he looked up at him, reading his mind. There was fear there, in his gaze, and not because hunters were likely here to kill or capture him. Fear, because his mother was the tool they were going to use to make it happen.

“No. We can't risk it. If they knocked out the power to an entire area, then they've made a move to take advantage of that. There's probably hunters out there, waiting for one of us to go outside.”

“I thought w—” Jack looked at the human in the room. Her eyes were flicking between them like they were crazy, and slow realization was dawning on her.

Julias looked into her eyes, and grabbed her mind. A panicked soul was easy to manipulate, and he took advantage of the rising worry in her. Eye contact.

She broke immediately.

“Hide.”

Nodding, expression flat and cold, the human walked over to the cafeteria counter, climbed over it, and disappeared. The other human in the cafeteria stared at them, and what the nurse did, before he scampered off to join her. The one cafeteria staff on hand managing the night shift, an older man with a hair net, didn't hide. At least, until Julias pulled out his pistol. The man stepped back from behind his counter, and vanished into a room beyond.

The phone landline would be down, no doubt, with how ridiculously thorough these hunters were being. No one was making any communication about the situation in the hospital any time soon. Nearby phone booth? Even if Jack or Julias could go outside without risk of being sniped by awaiting hunters, Dolareido didn't have phone booths anymore.

“I thought we had thralls stationed around the hospital?” Jack said. “And I know Antoinette does.”

“We do, and she does, but only a few. You know protecting your mother wasn't a priority, Jack.”

“I know.” He might know, but the boy's eyes still twitched with rage. “I ... know. Those thralls should be enough, though, right?”

“Maybe. Maybe they're dead. Maybe they couldn't check every face in the area. We still have a thrall in the hospital, and she's trained. She'll make her way to your mother and establish a defense.”

“We have a thrall in the hospital?”

“One of the orderlies. She—”

Both vampires almost jumped out of their skin, as a sharp rapping started on the window not far from them.

“I—Scully! Mulder!” Keeping his voice a whisper, but almost shouting nonetheless, Jack walked over to the window without ever leaving the wall his back was pressed to. He was smart enough to get low once he reached the glass, using the building wall as cover, and the two birds flew in to sit on his shoulders once he crouched and opened the window. “Report!”

The two birds made some click sounds and some quiet caws, and Jack mirrored it. Julias scanned the room again to make sure no one could see, because using Animalism to talk to animals was a Masquerade violation, albeit a small one. Talking to birds was one thing, talking to birds in the middle of this situation, and asking them to report, was enough to draw suspicion.

It was impressive that the kid had managed to tame two crows. Momentarily controlling an animal wasn't too difficult; mental possession of an animal was far harder, and required preparation, but he was sure Jack could pull it off. Taming animals in such a way, on the other hand, took months and months, if not years of diligent practice. He'd managed it in weeks, with a fine mastery of Animalism's subtler techniques.

“They say the people on the roofs can't see anything in the dark.”

“The thralls have night vision goggles.”

Jack shrugged. “Night vision sucks.”

“True enough.” It wasn't like the snipers set about would be able to identify hunters that didn't want to be identified; they didn't have photographs of the hunters to work with, just descriptions. And disguising oneself was easy. “Their phones work?”

After a few more clicks and croons, Jack shook his head. “Based on what Scully and Mulder are saying, probably not. Looks like the thralls are fidgeting with their equipment to try and get it working, but can't.”

“Then whatever it is blocking our phones has some range.” And none of the thralls had access to an easy landline. “We’re in a race against the clock, Jack. Send the crows out for help.”

“Right, right. Good plan. Mulder, get to the Invictus.” He looked to the bird on his right and started making some more clicks and croons. “And Scully, go the Elysium Tower.”

Julias figured the Prince and the Invictus were well aware of the power outage now. But the power was out for the block, and more blocks besides if he guessed right. Figuring out what was going on in that chaos was going to take them a few minutes, and whatever it was the hunters were here to do, they planned to do it quickly. Minutes were precious; which meant sending Jack’s crows to get help was borderline pointless, but maybe it’d help. Hell, maybe the sheriff would show up and save them all.

Fat chance.

The birds left, and Jack closed the window. Sighing and looking down at the floor, he reached into his suit jacket, and pulled out his own pistol.

“I hope they don’t get shot,” he said, glancing back to the window a couple times as the flickering wings vanished into the night.

“Ever try to shoot a black bird in a blackout?”

“Good point.” That perked the kid up, and he lifted his head as he put his back to the wall, next to Julias, beside the exit of the cafeteria. “Plan?”

“There’s lots of ways out of the hospital, but the hunters know what we look like, in detail. They’ll shoot us on sight.” He supposed they could steal someone else’s clothes, but that’d take precious minutes they didn’t have. And he knew they wouldn’t be leaving Jack’s mother behind anyway.

“I don’t suppose you secretly know how to use Cloak of Night discipline, Julias?”

“Not well enough for a situation like this.” Best he could manage was avoiding having people notice him, and even then it only worked on kine not looking for him.

“Isabella knows it well, and she isn’t Mekhet or Nos.”

“Isabella is a talented woman. Maybe I should have made her a Right Hand.”

Jack chuckled. Good to see his spirits were up. Hell, if anything, the kid looked like he was getting excited, now that the first rush of fear had passed. Probably fantasizing about an opportunity to kill Angela. Not so good, if the kid’s head wasn’t on straight, like tonight with his sweeper team.

“We’re ... going to save Mom, right?”

“That’s the plan.”

“K, good. Cause, I know that’s not a priority.”

“She’s deemed a future childe. We’ll give her the same courtesy we’d give any potential.” Which, he supposed, wasn’t all that much. Kindred cared about themselves first, their childe second, covenant third. Other people’s potential childer ranked pretty low on the list. “Well, I will, at any rate.”

“Thanks.”

“But we’re probably surrounded, and sunrise is in an hour. The hunters are going to do everything they can to kill us. That’s their primary objective. Killed or captured, either way you’re dead. We need to remember that your mother is their tool, not their objective.” He checked the slide on his pistol, before inching his head back out the cafeteria entrance. The hunters were gone, but the hallway had started to fill with nurses, doctors, orderlies, janitors, everyone that kept a hospital running.

“Who was that?”

“I don’t know. Terrorists?”

“Why would terrorists attack a hospital? This hospital?”

“I don’t know. I—”

“There’s a bunch of them! Six I think.”

“Did they say what they wanted?”

“Just to know where the emergency ward was.”

“Someone call the police!”

“The phones are down! Everything is down!”

“But the backup generators are working.”

“The machines are on but there’s some kind of interference blocking the internet and phone reception. I can’t call anyone!”

Eventually, an older doctor showed up, and she barked orders at the gathering in the hall. Get back to work. Person A check the electrical room. Person B double check that the systems were functioning correctly on all floors. Person C drive to the nearby sister hospital and see if their phones were working. Person D and E, drive to the nearest police station. On and on, she addressed each doctor, each nurse by name, each janitor and orderly by name, told them exactly where to go, and what to do.

“And everyone stay out of their way. No one be a hero. Let the police handle this.”

“But—”

“Doctor Thompson, if you so much as look in their direction, I will have you shaving pubic hair for the next year. Shut the hell up, and do what I told you to.”

It really wasn't a meeting to be having in a hallway, but that's where the crowd grew, and the chief physician handled it. Julias was tempted to go up to her and get involved, use her somehow, but it was a losing scenario. They didn't have time to manage the chaos of involving the humans, and until the police arrived, all they'd do is get in the way. Worse, the hunters would kill them.

That thought struck him with anger, and he glowered as he pulled his head back into the cafeteria. What the fuck happened to these bastards to drive them to this point? Killing innocent humans? Twisted.

“What's the plan?” Jack said.

“We get to your mother, and handle the situation.”

“Handle?”

“Kill any hunter we come across. No mercy, no questions.”

Jack nodded, and checked the slide on his pistol as well. “You know Angela is here. She'll turn this place into kindling if things don't go her way.”

“I'm hoping mass murder of innocents is beyond what she's willing to do. Hopefully her anger toward you driving her to homicide was not the norm for her.”

“... me too.” With a long sigh, Jack pushed off the wall. “Ok, we need to get upstairs. Take the stairs?”

“Maybe. They might see that coming. If they find your mother before we get to her, they might sit and wait for you, and cover possible entrances.” Or just kill her and leave, in hopes of driving Jack into a rampage they could take advantage of.

“Then we need to get to her before they do. We can do that by the stairs faster.”

“Assuming they aren’t also taking the stairs,” Julias said.

“How many fire escapes could this hospital have?”

“A lot. It’s a hospital, Jack. It’s a big building with a lot of people. It’ll have fire escapes, and emergency fire escapes.”

They both looked at each other. Emergency fire escape, for patients. That would be the best way to get to her asap.

They nodded, and put their pistols away as they walked out into the hall.

“Um, excuse me sir,” one of the nurses said. “I’m sorry but we’re closing the cafeteria, due to the power outage. Please head on home.”

Julias met the woman’s gaze with his own, and offered a gentle smile. “Where’s the fire escape used for patients, doctors, and emergency staff.” And, like the others, their minds broke with only the slightest nudge. He was good at Dominate, outstanding at it, a testament to his bloodline. Molding her mind like clay came as easy as breathing once did Julias, as it would to Jack when he grew older, far easier than it came to most Ventrue. It kept his vitae reserves in plentiful supply, and he had a feeling he’d need them.

“Um, follow the red line to the back of the hospital. We have a fire escape in the back reserved for staff use, and it has tools to handle emergency evacuations of patients.”

“Thanks. Now forget you ever saw me.”

“Yes sir.” With a nod, she went along her way, and disappeared into one of the rooms.

The two Ventrue nodded at each other, and started for the back of the hospital.

“You know Triss is going to kill you, Julias,” his childe said, “sticking your neck out like this.”

“I can say the same thing about you and Antoinette.” If anything, Antoinette would be even more pissed. Jack was young, and his second life was proving to be a roller coaster. He was also the first person Antoinette had ever loved since Tony, far as he knew. If Jack got hurt, or worse, she was going to tear Julias in half, literally.

---

---

~~Jack~~

He looked at his pistol, as Julias looked at his, and the both of them sighed as they put them away again. If they walked around carrying, in a hospital where everyone could see them, it'd cause havoc. Skilled as they were at Dominate, Julias above all, it wasn't a skill meant for mass manipulation. If they wanted to get dozens of people eating out of their hand, they'd have to be sired Daeva. Not that the raging fans enthralled by Daeva were exactly reliable, with the same love, obsession, and fragility of any diehard fan.

They walked quickly. Jogging and running wouldn't help much when they didn't know exactly where they were going yet, ultimately following some painted lines on a hospital floor, and hoping they stumbled onto the door the nurse told them about. They should have asked her to show them. Julias probably wanted her out of harm's way before she got caught in the crossfire. He was too kind to these kine.

The thought cut through his building rage like a blowtorch. Too kind to the humans? Well, they were in his way. If it weren't for them, he'd pull out his pistol, march up into the emergency ward, and kill any fucker that looked suspicious. Shoot first, ask questions later. If someone died so he could save his mother, so be it.

And that thought stuck out from the others. Julias had a reflex to try and spare the humans, and Jack didn't. When had that happened? He knew when it'd happened: every night since becoming Kindred, small changes to how his mind worked, how he felt about things, how he thought about humans and vampires.

He shook his head, and searched for better thoughts. Yes, you're angry, and being angry can turn you and anyone into a major asshole. People committed some of the most horrible crimes as actions of rage and passion. Give yourself a break, and let it go. You have faith in humanity, humankind, and you don't think they're just sheep to be fed on. You don't. You don't.

They found the fire escape, and started up. It wasn't being used, which was good. The elevators had their own power generators, he supposed, fancy a hospital as this was. Safe to use in a blackout. The best care in the city, and the hospital he'd have moved his mother to, if she hadn't been brought here anyway.

Hospitals had security, supposedly. Where were they? The chief physician had told them to keep people safe, and not interfere with the terrorists. Understandable, he supposed, considering if six hunters had shown up, they'd have made it pretty clear pretty quick, that they weren't to be fucked with. Julias and Jack had hid in the cafeteria while the hunters had moved on, so they didn't know where they were. They could be around the corner, could be in the fire escape stairs above them, or below, or waiting when they opened the door.

Julias pulled out his pistol again, thinking the same thoughts, and Jack mirrored him, no longer having to worry about kine eyes in the empty fire escape. If this were any other situation, the only realistic response would be to hide and wait for support. No kine was worth risking the lives of Kindred over. In fact, the Invictus were likely to punish them for being this stupid, taking on hunters that had proved far more capable than hunters had any right to be. Two Ventrue, formidable, but one of them barely a neonate, and the other far too important to die in a stupid mission like this, were going to face off against half a dozen hunters that had a frustrating habit of nearly killing Jack. They should have found a hiding spot, waited for back up, and secured their own lives.

But, they weren't going to let his mother die. They were going to risk their lives to try and save his mother. Julias hadn't even hesitated. The man was too damn nice. Beatrice was lucky.

The emergency ward wasn't very high up. A couple floors up, and Julias poked his head out the door into the hall. God, it'd be great if they had Natasha with them, or Beatrice, or Damien. Anyone who was good at the Cloak of Night. It wasn't a blood clan unique discipline, it was just that Nosferatu and Mekhet were naturals at it. Jack doubted he'd ever be able to learn it, and Julias had a hundred years under his belt and couldn't use it well.

The lights were soft and gentle. Everything looked subtle, with the ambient light from the weak backup power providing only enough energy to keep things running at minimum. It was good for Kindred, who could see perfectly in low light, and it made Jack feel a little better. Darkness, shadows, his instincts told him to use them, prowl through them, attack from them. But then again, there was light, enough for humans to work by, and more than enough for hunters to shoot at humanoid silhouettes with.

Don't get overconfident. A mistake here meant a world of hurt. His mom could die, or he could die. Worse, he could be captured, and Angela would make sure to not repeat the same mistakes. She'd cut out his eyes, nail him to the floor with giant spikes, and torture him with fire, acid, and ... and ... He shook out his head, and swallowed down his anger. The anger was caused by his fear, and he'd never forget what Yoda said about fear.

It was chaos in the emergency ward, a strange sort of mayhem. Nurses and doctors and orderlies, but also people in work clothes he didn't recognize. Tradesmen or something, electricians maybe. Everyone was running around, making noise, yelling. Far more panic than an hour ago when he'd been up here.

“Who were they?”

“I don't know!”

“Danna says stay out of their way.”

“What if they hurt the patients?”

“Why would they do that? Who the fuck would attack a hospital?”

“I don't know. Just, stay out of their way.”

“Where'd they go?”

“East Wing.”

“Why?”

“The hell if I know. Danna says someone has already gone to get the police, but with this blackout and all the phones down, we're ... we're at their mercy. Just stay out of their way.”

A lot of hustle and bustle, people trying to manage emergency checks on all the patients, considering the circumstance. It was impressive none of them were running away. He supposed you had to care about your patients, if you wanted to be a doctor; more so even, if you wanted to be a nurse. The sort of job people got if they cared, and that meant they wouldn't leave the patients to suffer whatever fate awaited them alone.

It meant a lot of bodies, standing around, creating noise, panic, and a lot of eyes looking around for a reason for the insanity. It meant Julias and Jack would have trouble moving around without being mobbed by panicking kine. They could Dominate them, but Dominating hordes of kine would be exhausting. If only they had a Daeva to herd them.

A person in dark blue pants and work shirt, black work boots, and a belt with dangling keys walked by, and Julias reached out to grab him.

“Hey what the fu—”

“Silence,” Julias said, closing the door behind them so they were standing in the fire escape stairway. A little eye contact and the man broke instantly. Damn, Jack's sire was good. Even in the best circumstance, it took Jack a few seconds of eye contact to establish the connection, find the mind behind the person's eyes, and grab it.

The tall man blinked, and stared at him, but said nothing.

“Take us to the East Wing. Can you do that?”

“... yes sir.” With a slow nod, the man reached for the door, but Julias grabbed his wrist.

“First, how many are there.”

“How many, sir?”

“Of the ... terrorists.” They'd heard six, but no harm in being thorough.

“I didn’t see them. It’s chaos up here. Everyone’s running around, trying to check up on the patients, get answers from security or the chief.”

“Where is security?”

“Downstairs. Not equipped to handle something like this. Power going out is bad. Phones and internet out is worse. A bunch of people with guns showing up, on top of that? No one knows what to do, what’s going on, and we’re running around like headless chickens. If shit—”

Julias put up a hand and shook his head. “We get it. Stay out of the way, and hide if things get ugly.”

“Yes sir.” The man nodded, devoted to Julias like the vampire was his lieutenant. Julias probably rewrote one of his memories to make him think something like that. A subtle, hidden suggestion, to turn the man into a committed soul, instead of a mindless automaton.

“You’re taking us because we need you to tell anyone who gets in our way that we’re with the company, doing an emergency check on some equipment since we were in the neighborhood.”

Vague, with a hint of authority and Good Samaritan. Combined with their suits, it’d be enough to get anyone out of their way. The man nodded, and soon the three of them were out in the hall.

People were running around, some literally, barking orders and others listening, or questioning loudly. Others were running away from something, and Jack knew what: the East Wing, where his mother slept. The hunters were there already, and no doubt checking each room looking for her, and for them. If one of the nurses or doctors had told them what room Samantha Terry slept in, they’d be there already.

It'd only been five, maybe six minutes since the power went out and the hunters showed up, but it felt like an eternity. The hunters moved fast, knowing full well Dolareido was a city controlled by vampires, and any attempt they made to do anything had to be done quickly. But, how did they expect to get out? The Prince and the Invictus would put two and two together soon enough, and notify the thralls somehow. He'd sent Scully and Mulder for help, and he wasn't the only vampire in the city using animals for communication and surveillance. This was a doomed effort, liable to get the hunters trapped and killed, all for the sake of punishing him.

No, there had to be something else. The hunters wanted him, or Eric, because they'd seen Azamel, knew about her, her place, her defenses. The two of them held valuable information, and were brand new paranormals, too, what the hunters probably considered weak and easy targets. Their mistake. But even so, they wanted the information, and they weren't going to suicide for it. They had a plan to get out.

The gentleman they'd turned into their comrade for the night guided them down the hall. They'd both been down this hall before, to see his mother, and they knew the way. But with the lower light, and the chaos of people scampering around, everything took on an edge. Every corner, every gurney, every counter, every door, all held the possibility a hunter would pop out and blanket the hallway with gunfire; or worse, actual fire. The hunters knew the vampires died to fire easier than dry paper, and they wouldn't hesitate to use it in a tight hallway, Angela especially.

He shivered as the memory of the prison bubbled up. The hallway of fire, the waves of rats, the smell of burning fur and flesh, the screams of the hunter that'd been eaten alive, the sweltering heat. Kindred had a natural pyrophobia, and his experience with the hunters only made it worse. Thankfully no Kindred would judge him for avoiding fire, when all of them avoided it. The elders in particular, never touched it, and let their thralls and ghouls manage their love of candles and braziers.

He had to believe the hunters wouldn't be so psychotic as to go on a murdering spree in a hospital with wayward pyrotechnics. They wanted him, his knowledge, his personal experience with Azamel, and this was a maneuver to get it. Maybe Angela had convinced her fellow hunters that attacking his mother and sister was a necessary evil, to get the Kindred to make a move they could exploit. If his mom hadn't lived, he'd probably be raging through the city right now, screaming and crying and looking for hunters in such an overt manner, that they'd capture him easily. A pissed off enemy was an easily manipulated enemy.

The enslaved kine had to explain that they were here to help on several occasions. It wasn't like Jack and Julias hadn't Dominated these doctors before so they could see his mother unhindered, but those suggestions lasted the night; they could last longer, but no reason to waste the vitae doing so. So it was efficient to use this one man to get them past the onslaught of panicked people wondering about the two guys in suits.

They got to the East Wing without issue. The wing, like the other wings, was a loop, two entrance doorways, with rooms on both the inside and outside wall. His mother was in one of the outside rooms toward the end of the wing, which meant it wouldn't be the first room the hunters would check; if they didn't already know which room she was in. Considering the pace Jack and Julias were moving at, the hunters would probably be arriving at it soon, and that made Jack anxious. Go faster, go faster.

The East Wing hallways were empty, and the entrance to them had nurses and others running past, trying to do what nurses were supposed to do, but they were avoiding the hall. They'd seen the strangers enter it no doubt, and the strangers would have made a show of their guns to scare away the people. It was in the hunters' benefit, he supposed, to scare away everyone. Anyone who stuck around was a possible thrall, and they'd shoot them. Which meant, once Jack and Julias entered the hall, any hunter who spotted them was liable to shoot on sight, without taking the time to recognize them.

For all the hunters knew, no Kindred were even in the hospital, so maybe they weren't expecting anyone to show up. Or did they know Jack had been in here? Did they follow him after he left his sweeper team? Fuck, if they had, and his mom died because of this, he was going to crumble. And then kill them all.

"Who're they?" one of the doctors asked, an older man, standing at the wing's entrance.

"With the company, checking out some equipment to make sure things are working."

"You ... can't go in there. Those people, they had guns, and they weren't playing around. We ... we have to say out of their way."

"Derek, look, these two men here are—"

"I said you're not going in there." The doctor got in front of the wing, glared up at Julias, and glared down at Jack. "They could kill some of the patients. We have to save as many people as possible, even if that means letting these ... terrorists, do what they want."

It must have been a tough pill to swallow. The man wanted to help these people, but by trying to stop the hunters, all he'd accomplish would be getting more people hurt. Being brave, being heroic, it got people killed and usually not much more.

It was common advice for people that were under risk of being captured, that they should do everything they could to not antagonize their capturer, while still holding secret the relevant information. As much as the movies liked to make a thing out of being badass, and spitting in the face of your torturer, reality was far less kind to such stupidity. It didn't take much to break a man, and anyone who knew a thing or two about the nerve endings in teeth could make the most hardened veteran spill their guts.

Julias put up a hand, and drew the chief's eyes to his. There was a snap of urgency to the movement, and Jack fidgeted in place. No time. They didn't have time. Get out of the way now, before his mom died. And if she died because of this delay, he'd—

No. Stop it. Get a grip, calm down, and understand the situation. This was good. Julias was being logical, and handling the situation in a way that'd have the least fallout. If Jack and Julias started waving their guns around, it might have started a riot or stampede, or worse.

“Mister Bronson,” Julias said, glancing at the doctor's name tag, “keep everyone away from the East Wing, and make sure no one comes to inspect the area when gunfire starts. The patients will not be harmed.”

“I ... I will ... keep everyone away from the East Wing.”

“Right now.”

“Right now. Ok people! Let's get out of here! Come on, everyone into the break room. Equipment's working and no one's coding.” The doctor began waving his hands, and the cluster of people started to move in the guided direction. If it were the middle of the day, there'd be twice as many people, and it'd be hell to manage. But Julias found the right people, and manipulated them in the right way, to get a chaotic situation under control, and he probably could have even if there'd been a riot with twice the people. Decision-making finesse.

That was the regal side of Ventrue. To stand there in the face of a horde, and make decisions that garnered the best outcome, with all the pressures of the world and a thousand voices screaming at you. Viktor and Julias had that air to them, and both would look perfectly at home on thrones.

“Alright, you get out of here too,” Julias said to the first enslaved man.

The kine nodded, and ran back to the hallway where they’d found him, back into the throngs of chaos. Jack and Julias both readied their pistols, and began the slow crawl into the hall, before his sire turned his head, smirked, and flicked several switches on the wall in the main room where the two hall entrances connected. The hallway went dark, lit only by the small amount of light in each patient’s room, and what came from the staff area behind them.

It was a strange situation. The hospital staff wanted to go into the hallway, but were under orders to stay out of the way of the thugs who showed up with guns. Jack looked over his shoulder, and grimaced as he found the staff watching the two of them enter the darkness. They looked terrified, but not for themselves, for the patients. They sighed, downtrodden, and walked away, disappearing into their staff rooms, looking into the black hallway where the insanity was occurring. He half expected one of them to run up to him and try and stop his intrusion, in some mindless attempt to stop a stranger from entering a secure ward. One of them might try and play hero, run into the inevitable fight between the hunters and him, and they’d get themselves killed, like an idiot.

Put yourself in their shoes, Jack. You haven’t been doing that much lately, with anyone, trying to think what you’d do in their situation. You used to try and do that a lot, but since Angela hurt you, you’ve considered everyone an enemy.

Every reflex he had screamed at him to ignore the quiet little voice in his head, but apparently it had a point to make, and it started knocking on his skull louder.

You haven't tried putting yourself into the shoes of these hunters, either. They have motivations, and they're good ones. Killing monsters? Saving people from enslavement? From the fangs of literal undead? Who wouldn't consider that a good motivation? Maybe, if you could just talk to them, they might—

No. The hunters had lost every right they had to be considered anything more than meat to be butchered. If he got his hands on them, he'd put them on hooks and let them dangle until they bled to death, skin ripping and muscle tearing.

He shook out his head again, and kept walking into the darkness. His mind was grasping at straws, trying to find ways to make him back out of this kill-kill attitude. Something in him was telling him these kine weren't important, just blood bags to be drained. Something in him was telling him his mother was to be protected, because she was a potential child of the night, and the other kine were not important. Something in his guts was telling him the hunters were not only just as worthless as other kine, beneath respect, but that they were revolting, and deserved to be wiped out. Exterminated. The world should be cleansed of them, so he would be allowed to live eternal with his army of thralls, ghouls, and his territory, filled with sheep to feed on.

He shook his head again, harder, enough to draw Julias's eyes. Shrugging, Jack held his pistol up, and motioned for him to go first, which earned an eye roll from the man. But, Julias knew, just as Julias knew Jack knew, that Julias had to be the one to go first. The man could soak a bullet better than him, as long as one didn't blow his brain to smithereens.

The hallway grew silent as the group of hospital workers behind them began to disperse. Hiding themselves in their break rooms and whatnot, their voices, footsteps, and breathing became a quiet hum in the background, allowing Jack to focus his hearing on the darkness before him. The emergency ward, where everyone was in critical condition and under constant monitoring, was quiet. He didn't know if it had sub sections, if there was something below 'critical emergency' where they'd move his mother if she stabilized, but it hadn't even been forty-eight hours since she'd been stabbed, so here she stayed. Other kine in other rooms with similar problems were sleeping, dying, recovering, and were likely all asleep, coma or drug induced. The ward was silent as fuck, the distant background noise fading into nothingness as he focused on the hallway.

What was that line? Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death? A dark hallway, with rooms on its sides, many with dying patients, fit that description better than he'd like.

Chapter 87

~~Damien~~

He looked at the picture again, then put the phone away. Gulping, he pulled the phone out again, and looked at the picture. She was so beautiful, and fun, and joyful, and overwhelmingly sexual. The frizzy red hair, bouncy and big, her soft face and pale skin, her golden eyes, it was all gorgeous. Of course, she knew she had large breasts, and in classic Dolareido fashion, had no issue using them to get what she wanted; in this case, him. Lucky him.

He was damn glad she left her cozy little town, and came to Slut City. Apparently she was a city girl to the bone, despite where she grew up, and came to Dolareido to both feed her horror, but also indulge her more human desires. The internet had corrupted her. He was glad it did. He shouldn't have been, but he was.

He stared at how she cupped one of her breasts, grip gently milking, and how its heavier bottom half filled and overflowed her hand. The pink, large nipple, milky white skin, and—

“Mister Burksen?”

He snapped his head up, and Maria raised a brow as she met his gaze. He must have had a strange look on his face, with the way she showed confusion on hers.

“Uh, yes, Madam Turio?” Putting the phone away, he looked down at the table, the computer it held, and the books beside it. Old books, written by various people throughout history. They were in English, but old English was difficult to read, with dead words, a lack of words, strange symbols, and a host of nuance that he didn't get. But it was his job to try and digitize the old world into the new world.

Lucas would have balked at that. Recording the words of Sanctified Kindred on a computer? Madness. A true sin against the Lord himself. If they continued, the wrath of God would rain upon them, and the ten plagues of Egypt would destroy them. Locusts would scour the land, and people's skin would blister with boils.

The man's words had enraptured Damien, at the time. His impressive control of voice was moving, enthralling, and the man moved Damien to action in his name, and His name, like guiding a fish with a shiny, shimmering hook.

The memory was bitter, now.

“You look distracted.”

“Ah, I am sorry, Madam Turio. My personal life has thrown some twists my way.” Nodding, grimacing, he tried to focus on the task at hand. The Invictus lived in the new world more than the other covenants, at least in Dolareido. They digitized things, recorded them, as long as specific words weren't used. ‘Kindred’ and ‘Masquerade’ were no-go words, or any obvious use of ‘vampire’ that would implicate their kind. Talk of paranormal content was to be adjusted, and works that could not be adjusted were to be marked for storage. The journal of a powerful Ventrue discussing how his long age had allowed him to chronicle the growth of a society, could be adjusted and digitized. The almost prophetic words of a vampire infected with Malkavia, that the vampire had been sane — or insane — enough to write down, were too dangerous and problematic to alter. Such words were invaluable though, and were to be stored, left as paper books only, and placed inside a vault.

“Personal life?” She smiled, and Damien froze. Maria never smiled. “Do tell.”

Do tell. She cut through the ‘personal life’ barrier with as much tact as a nuke, and now he was left helpless to deny her, unless he upset her. More so, he couldn't lie, lest she eventually find out and punish him.

He hoped he hadn't traded Lucas for Maria. The two were similar in a way, and of the faith. There was a definite possibility that both of them had similar dispositions, and Lucas's hidden totalitarian motivations could exist within her as well. Lucas also considered the personal lives of his flock to be his business, as the Lancea et Sanctum and the Sanctified devoted every part of themselves to the faith. Was Maria pursuing more knowledge about him in pursuit of that, or was she simply being curious ... forcefully?

In either regard, she was an elder, his boss, and was the building block he'd use to rebirth the Lancea et Sanctum in Dolareido. He had to appease her.

"I ... seem to have entered a ... relationship, I think, with Fiona."

"Oh." A hint of anger crossed her face, before vanishing. She was reading her tablet, and was delving into some old, forgotten words of languages few could read. Secret scriptures from the Lancea et Sanctum's storage, stories of dead worlds, letters long beyond mosts ability to decipher. "Tell me more."

"Are ... are you sure?"

"Of course. Why wouldn't I be?"

Because probably the only man to ever love you is dead, and it no doubt weighed on you like no pain anyone could ever understand?

"We're just younglings, going through ... juvenile feelings. I didn't think that'd interest you."

"It does."

“... very well.” Ok, how to talk about this. “Fiona is ... a silly girl, and—”

“Woman, Damien. She’s a woman. She may be a young woman, but a woman nonetheless.”

“Woman. She seems to be attracted to ... tormented types.” Far as Damien could tell, Eric was a bitter man, though for far different reasons.

Maria chuckled, and turned the page. “Ah yes, that sort. Many young women are. Such a motif has been known for many for centuries. Bram Stoker’s Dracula painted the vampire as a tormented soul, broken by his pain, and overwhelmed with passion for his obsession. Or Erik in the Phantom of the Opera. A man with drive, with grit and determination, moved to commit heinous acts in the name of his obsession.”

“And ... women are attracted to this?”

“Women are attracted to powerful men, Damien. Many mistake this for simple things like money, or status, and while there is truth to that, it is also proxy to the personality trait that is so alluring. The ability to play an instrument is an example. Yes, there is attraction to the status that comes with someone being a musician. But, a man proving he has the grit and determination to master — or at least learn — a skill that most cannot, is alluring. A man in uniform garners similar reactions for similar reasons; not only is his life in order, but he has shown he can pursue something to completion, and bear fruit. A man who is not passive, but active, determined to acquire what he wants, and has the mental fortitude to push through barriers to acquire it, is beguiling to any woman.”

He stroked his chin as he looked at Maria. She didn’t lift her head, eyes still on her tablet, but he doubted she was reading it. Doubtless her mind was on her relationship with Lucas now, and that made every word he said now dangerous.

“I hadn’t thought of it like that. I just assumed women ... uh...”

“Desire money, and drama?”

“Well, yes, that.”

The corpse woman chuckled, and scrolled to another page. “There is that, as well,” she said. His turn to chuckle. Maria, making a joke. This was progress in their strange relationship. “It is the combination of that grit in personality, and the darkness that comes with tormented characters, the drama, that is enthralling to young women like Fiona. In older women, they find the dark, tormented characters juvenile. Erik compared to Raoul, in Phantom of the Opera, for example. The tormented soul versus the stable man? With maturity comes understanding that the drama of a dark, brooding man, is not healthy, and a relationship with such a soul is doomed to failure.”

He sighed at that, and sat up straight, looking at Maria with more obvious body language. “Then what hope is there for any Kindred?” Vampires, overwhelmingly so, were tormented to some degree or another, ripped in two by the struggle of their human side, and their new Beastly side.

“Touché.” That got her. She nodded, and set the tablet down on her table as she turned her chair to look at him. “But we have an advantage. We live for centuries, and while our minds may be trapped, unchanging, wisdom can still be learned. Perhaps a dark, tormented soul can also be stable and reliable? Julias is an example of such a man. He has grown considerably in the century I’ve known him, but still, he is a tormented man.”

“He seems a lot happier now that he has Beatrice. But, also weighed down with his new responsibilities.”

“And yet, he not only bears his burdens, but engages Miss Damor in both emotional and sexual gratification. He is a rare breed.”

Damien nodded. If there was a Kindred in Dolareido people could consider a success story, it was Julias Mire. The great Viktor Honors, replaced by his rising childe and prodigy Julias Mire, who had sired a childe fit to someday replace him, the star Jack Terry. And like Honors, Mire had a dark side, something that used to torment him from his past.

“What about Mister Terry?” His relationship with Antoinette didn’t fit Maria’s descriptions, as far as he could tell.

“I did not think of Mister Terry as a tormented soul, young as he is, with as boring a first life he had.”

If only she knew how untrue that was. The kid was plenty tormented, by Viktor’s ghost, by Angela’s face, by his kills, by his first life’s mistakes, by many things. Like sire like childe, Jack would go through pains similar to Julias, and his torment had only just begun, if it took Julias a century to overcome his pain.

Better to not tarnish the boy’s image for Maria, though. Damien smiled and nodded. “I meant, in regards to the dynamic between him and the Prince.” If Maria was willing to educate him on more aspects of romance and whatnot, he’d take her up on her offer. Zero personal experience was a terrifying problem to have; fear of the unknown was universal.

Not that the corpse woman was going to have an unbiased view on romance, women, men, or anything in that realm, but her wisdom was valuable nonetheless.

“The Prince is unique, but there are women who prefer their men to be less ... rigid, in their pursuits. If the man is happy to let the woman drive, so to speak, and the woman has the desire to be the one driving, then there is no issue. Jack does not feel the need to press his desires on others, unlike most men, and Antoinette does not feel a need to try and minimize conflict, unlike most women.

She is content to be the..." The elder set the tablet down, raised her hands, and air quoted. "The 'man' in the relationship."

Damien choked, doing his best to suppress the laughter that struggled to free itself. Seeing the small corpse woman, her cracked pale skin, her ancient white dress, her long black hair that forever had some knots and twists to it, seeing her air quote was too much. And it earned a small smile from her in return.

"But," she continued, "make no mistake. If Mister Terry did not possess a drive, a will, to pursue the things he considered important to him, he would hold no attraction to the Prince. Such weak, flaccid men, with no drive of their own, are nothing more than children, to be spoon fed and protected, not be drawn to sexually."

That made sense, he supposed. While Jack and Antoinette's relationship was a bit unique, and the elder vampire was the 'man' in that relationship, dare he use the word, Jack did not lack drive. He was simply comfortable, and perhaps happier, to let Antoinette be the dominant one. But, what did dominant entail? The term seemed antiquated, in a modern context. Perhaps it wasn't though, and he, spending fifty years living under rocks, simply didn't understand how the gender dynamics applied in the new world.

"I—" He jerked in place as Maria's phone began to ring. Someone had to be daring to call Maria an hour before sunrise, when she had already retired to her chamber for the oncoming day.

She answered it, offering a quiet snarl as she did. "This better be important. It ... I see. Are—oh. Then ... yes, we must take care of this immediately. Send every thrall in the area to either the hospital, or to investigate the possible causes of the power loss. We do not have long." She put down the phone, stood up, and turned to him. "Damien, a messenger crow has arrived at the Invictus headquarters. Eight minutes before that, a massive blackout struck South Side, and three city blocks are without power. The South Center Hospital is within the center.”

“The hunters are attacking the hospital.”

“Yes, in all likelihood. The crow was sent by Mister Terry. We have attempted to contact our thralls in the area, but none of them are responding. And since Mister Terry has not called us himself, I can only assume the hunters have somehow blocked cell reception, and other digital communication methods as well.”

Oh no. Oh shit. After what the hunters accomplished in the tunnels tonight, he could only assume they’d managed to use similar methods to disrupt power and communications on such a large scale. He’d told Maria about the barriers the hunters had used already, but none of that information had been circulated yet, having only told her half an hour ago. There was only an hour until sunrise, and they hadn’t expected anything to happen in the single hour he’d been at the Cathedral. Mistake.

“What do Mister MacDonald and Mister Mire say?”

“MacDonald is currently in North Side, punishing some Uratha and Kindred for being uppity. Mire is with Terry, at the hospital, most likely.”

“That ... is a problem.” The night had gone from bad to worse in a very small amount of time. The high of his time with Fiona, the thrill of her body, the joy in the picture she’d sent him, all gone in a flash as he realized hunters were attacking the hospital, likely in a bid to either kill Jack’s mother, or capture the boy who sat with her. If they went during the night, now, it had to be because of Jack’s presence, and Mire being there made it all the more problematic. If one of the Invictus council was captured, the fallout would be catastrophic.

“I am calling MacDonald now, and we will see what can be done, but with so short a time before sunrise, I am hesitant to send Kindred.” Maria stood up and began pacing, phone to her ear. “But...” Her eyes fell for a second before looking to him.

Damien nodded, got up, tested his busted, wrapped ankle, tested his aching hand, and found them functional. He grabbed his sword, one of the pistols Maria kept in her personal chamber, and started for the gate.

---

---

~~Julias~~

The dark hall awaited them. The patient’s rooms leaked light from under their doors and small, vertical windows, but most of them provided only the small light of the low-light mode, or the small amount of light from the machinery within. It meant the hallway was pretty damn dark from end to end and around the turn. The switches he flicked where the hallway looped and connected to, the main room where elevator opened up to and where the staff rooms were, had turned all the hallway’s lights off in the East Wing. Perfect for vampires.

Lights in the distance flickered, moving with the telltale snap speed of flashlights. There they were. Julias moved forward slowly, staying half crouched, gun down and held in both hands. The moment one of the hunters poked their head out, he’d shoot. No, wait, it might not be a hunter. He had to at least put half a second into identifying the target first. If they had a gun, that put the chances it was one of the hunters up to ninety-nine percent. If they didn’t have a gun, who the fuck were they and what were they doing in the East Wing? Maybe a nurse or orderly hadn’t heard about the raid, found an emergency flashlight after the lights in the hallway went out, and were walking around inspecting the patients.

He kept his shoulder to the wall, and whenever he came to a door, he used the indent it provided to create some cover. Maybe three inches deep into the wall wasn't exactly enough cover for a gunfight, but it was something. And if it did turn into a gunfight, he could open the door and step into the room. With a patient room opposite of him, Jack did the same thing, and small as he was, he could fit a lot better into the three inch groove. But would the kid know to not shoot until they at least confirmed it was the hunters? It might have been Miss Jez Tummer, the thrall orderly.

They moved quickly. Into a doorway slot, then the next one, then the next one, always prepared to swing it open if they needed to dive in. Samantha was at the end of the hall, and based on how the flashlight was moving, the hunters were coming toward it, having entered the U-shaped hallway from the other entrance. They would run into each other, face to face eventually, and when that happened the bullets were going to fly.

“How long?” a voice said, a woman. A glance Jack's way showed the boy tense horribly, and his gun hand trembled for a few seconds before it steeled itself. Angela's voice, then.

“Two minutes,” another said.

“You have one.”

“Why ask if you already know the limit. The fuck is this, Star Trek?” The man's voice sparked some rage from Jack as well, but nothing nearly as visceral. It wasn't Jeremiah, then.

“Just get to it. They're coming.”

“We don't know who's coming. Could just be—”

“Someone turned off the lights. Who the fuck else would do that except for them? They're coming.”

Sounded like Angela knew Jack and Julias were in the building, then. They must have decided to raid the hospital at night, knowing that, and because of that. Cocky mother fuckers.

“Think the woman will get through the portal alive?”

“Machine’s working her lungs. We can do that ourselves with a manual ventilator.”

“Ever rip a ventilator out of a person before?”

“No. Worst case scenario, she dies, and we continue with the original plan. Now shut up and get this done.” The click of someone checking the slide on their pistol echoed through the quiet hall. Angela was just around the corner, and from the sounds of it, she’d already found Samantha. Shit.

He had to act, and act quickly. Jack no doubt heard the woman’s words, and if Julias guessed right, the kid was going to respond in the next five seconds. The hunters were doing something, something involving a portal and Jack’s mother. That wasn’t enough information to act on, but they had to act anyway.

So, Julias nodded to Jack, and the boy nodded in return. Now or never.

Jack slid up to the end of hall, back to the wall, and he didn’t poke his head out or expose himself. He waited, and Julias moved forward along with him, still on the outside wall of the hall. If Jack stuck his head out first, Julias would be in a weird position where he’d have to use the inside wall, the corner Jack was using, for cover, while he was still on the outside wall. It’d be better to use the door at the end of the hall, where the hall turned on the end of the U shape.

He nodded to Jack, pointed to himself, the door at the end, and waited for kid’s return nod. Jack confirmed, and readied himself, gun up, waiting, and Julias readied a dash. He was going to be both a distraction, and the following fire when the hunters left themselves open to Jack's attack.

What a fun way to spend a night with his childe, murdering people.

Time came to a near standstill, everything slowing down, as Kindred reflexes kicked into overdrive. Human adrenaline had nothing on the power of vitae, and while Julias was no Mekhet or Daeva, he could use Celerity enough to manage some speed and inhuman reflexes. He drove his weight forward, and came down on the side of his leg and hip, a sliding kick aimed for the door. Facing the hunters, he scanned the group of them as best he could in the fraction of a second it took him to reach the door, foot smashing into it, momentum driving his torso back upward, and hand slamming the handle down and open so the door swung open with the momentum.

Six hunters, in the hallway, and the door to Samantha's room was open. One of them had an assault rifle, one of them had a shotgun, the rest had pistols, and while one of them was down on their knees by the floor, Angela stood over him, pistol in right hand, and her fake eye glinting with reflections of the flashlights.

The thrall Jez was on her knees, hair held by Angela's free hand, and she looked battered, beaten. One of her arms was broken, and she looked almost unconscious, dazed and listing. Fucking assholes.

The hunters managed to look his way as he slammed open the door, only for Jack to poke his head around the corner, crouched, and begin to unload his weapon. If there was ever any hope for this to not escalate, Jack crushed it. But the kid saw the opening, six hunters standing around, and Julias had already told Jack they were going to kill them. It was how he expected this to go, but, seeing his childe not hesitate, not flinch, not even say a word, just unload bullets at the humans, with every intent of killing them then and there, was a painful thing to see.

The bullets crashed into the air with a loud crunch, and fell to the floor. Jack reloaded his next magazine and sank every bullet he could at the standing hunters, taking less than a second to reload, and only two more to empty the gun once again. And again, each bullet slammed into the air in front of the kneeling hunter. The hunter's eyes were wide, blatant shock painted there, and he breathed deep a sigh of relief as he put away a small, black bag.

A trail of black soot ran across the floor from wall to wall, a line that separated the two Kindred and the seven humans. The bullets fell on that line, beside it, on the side closer to the vampires.

“Holy shit,” the man said, standing up. A small man, for a hunter, with a shag of red hair, and a scar across his cheek. “A second sooner and we’d be splattered.”

Laughing, Angela came over to the black line, dragging the thrall behind her. Jez didn't struggle, and if she wasn't unconscious before, she was drifting into it now.

“Jack,” she said, “how nice to see you again.”

Growling, Jack kept his back to the corner, and stuck his head out for longer than was safe. The hunters didn't take the opportunity to shoot at him; the barrier was likely blocking them as well. Julius stuck his head out from the room he hid within, and stood up as he realized his hunch was correct. But he wasn't willing to bet his life on it yet, and he kept most of his body inside the room he'd opened. The room was empty thankfully, sparing him having to worry about a patient, unconscious or otherwise.

“Angela,” Jack said, the venom in his voice palpable.

“And you are Julias Mire, childe of Viktor Honors the murderer.” And, like Jack, the venom in her voice could fill a swimming pool. “I’ve met a few hunters that have tried to take a shot at him, you know.”

Ah yes, the history of his sire coming to light, bringing all the pain expected with it. Wonderful.

“Considering the things I’ve heard, you’re the monster in the room, Angela.” He nodded past her, toward the woman she was dragging.

“I’m not going to waste my sympathy on a thrall, vampire.”

Why? The Vinculum wasn’t permanent, and neither was vitae addiction. If they threw a thrall into a cell for a few months, or a year at most, both could likely be broken. He almost told her that, but giving the hunters new tools they could use to kill Kindred was not a good idea, even if it could possibly endear them to the hunters a bit more.

“You killed my sister,” Jack said through clenched teeth.

“What? I didn’t touch your sister, or your mother.” She nodded toward the door. “I heard about it on the news, same as you did, I imagine. I’m taking advantage of an opportunity someone else created.”

Julias ground his teeth, as did Jack. She was lying. He’d been playing poker for too many decades to not recognize a bluff, a confident one, but a bluff nonetheless.

Did she know they wouldn’t believe her? Probably, which meant she wasn’t lying for them, she was lying for her troupe, to keep them in the dark about her activities. A possible opportunity, a way to show these hunters their leader wasn’t the beacon of trust they probably thought of her as, if they were willing to go to war, and fight for her.

Take advantage of it later, handle the immediate situation now. There was black soot on the floor, and it was probably erecting some sort of magical barrier, invisible but hard as stone. If any sweeper team ran into something like this, he didn't get to hear about it, having left to go find Jack before the reports were circulated. And knowing his luck, or rather, Jack's luck as of late, that probably did happen.

"Assuming," Julias said, "that you didn't kill Mary or hurt Samantha"—an evil glare from Jack forced a pause from him—"what are you doing here, and with Samantha?"

"I thought that would be obvious. We're taking her, and either she'll tell us a way to force Jack to tell us what we want to know, ooohrrrr..." She laughed, and reached out to press her gun hand against the invisible barrier. A lot of trust for an invisible wall. "Jack comes with us now, and tells us what we want to know about Azamel."

"All this for a Begotten," Julias said, sighing as he stuck his head out a little more. At this point it was pretty clear that the invisible barrier wasn't going to burst any time soon. "Azamel hasn't hurt a soul since she's been here."

"She's brought villages, towns, and cities to ruin, vampire. She'll do it to this one, too, given time. Millions of innocent people here, and they'll die because you continue to house a monster."

This time, she wasn't lying. Julias blinked, and managed a quick glance at Jack to see what his reaction was, but the boy was too busy oozing rage from every pore to notice Julias anymore.

"Has my mom told you yet?" Angela said, grinning at Jack like a hungry hyena. "She tell you what her boss did to mine?"

“ ... Azamel told me.”

“From the mouth of the bitch herself. That’s just the tip of the iceberg, fuckwit. She’s ruined many lives, destroyed so many homes. And I bet you’ve seen her, the real her, the fucking monstrosity she is. You have the god damn nerve to defend her? A fucking twisted, evil re-imagining of a god? You’re all monsters.”

“Angela,” the hunter with the red hair said, “it’s time.”

“Finally. Let’s get this over with.” Angela put her pistol into the holster on her hip, pulled out a knife, and with all the grace of a butcher, slit Jez’s throat.

Julias stood up straight, stepped out of the patient room, and walked up to the barrier. Pistol in hand, he reached out with his other, and pressed fingers against the odd surface. He glared at Angela, met her one good eye with his, and then looked down at the corpse of Jez lying on the cold surface floor of the hospital hall. Angela had cut deep, two inches into the poor woman’s throat. In her dazed state, Jez probably hadn’t even felt it, just faded away in five seconds as all the blood of her body poured out of her.

The other hunters winced. Angela didn’t. She put the knife in her other hand, and redrew her pistol into her right. She didn’t back away from Julias; if anything, she came in closer, and glared up at him.

“We’re going to kill all of you if we have to,” she said. “Or, help us kill Azamel, and you vamps get to live. Viktor’s dead, so Tony’s, so the worst of your kind are off the list. We didn’t come here for vamps from Slut City, we came here to kill a true horror, a monster you can’t possibly understand. We can compromise. Tell us what we want to know about Azamel, help us kill her, and we’ll move on.”

A lie. She smiled when she lied. Subtle, a fidget of the corner of her mouth where she tried to suppress the desire to smile, but it was there. People often had issues suppressing those muscles when they bluffed, especially if they got a thrill out of it. This psychopath of a woman was that sort. She got off on lying, and on being a menace. One look in her eyes, glass one included, was enough to tell him plenty about her, about how she felt about vampires, and how she would get off on seeing them all burn.

She wasn't a hunter. Hunters often married their job, and many even took it into the pleasure realm, enjoying killing monsters, but there was something else in this woman's eyes, something insane, something inhuman.

"You killed her." He nodded down at Jez's body.

"I did. A thrall's a thrall, another of your devoted servants. And we need blood." She nodded toward the redhead. "Get to it, Bill."

Bill sighed, nodded, and pulled out a small paintbrush. Squatting down by the wall opposite of Samantha's open door, he dabbed the paintbrush into the blood around his feet, and started painting on the wall.

"Angela, you should get away from them," Bill said, as he began to paint a circle on the wall. "Ventrue, right? You—"

"I'll be fine, Bill." The woman glared at Julias, stared him straight in the eyes, and licked her lips, the hunger for violence blatant on her face. "No Ventrue is dominating my mind. No Daeva or Nos or whateverthefuck who tries is going to get anywhere. Not me." Like a striking snake, she brought up her blade and stabbed it at his face. His eyes went wide, and every reflex he had demanded he move out of the way. He almost did, before the blade crashed against the barrier, tip slamming into it as if she'd just stabbed rock. "Made you flinch."

"... my childe is right. You are a deranged, sad woman, with a mountain of woes." And she was right, that he couldn't dominate her, not with a simple glance at least. Something in her was blocking him, a wall between him and her, and it wasn't the physical barrier.

He looked to the other kine, but they were smart enough to avoid eye contact with him. If they saw his eyes, the path was open to him, the eyes a window to the soul. He didn't need to be able to see their eyes, as the Beast reached out from his own; as long as they could see his eyes, he could find their minds, and break them. They kept their eyes away, trusting in the barrier to keep them alive, so they didn't have to keep their attention on him. A lot of faith in a bit of black dust.

“I am what my mother made me.”

“Way my childe tells it, your mother left you in an orphanage.”

“Not before she let a little of her monster side feed on me.” She dragged the knife through the air, grinding it against the barrier, and snarled at him like an angry tiger. “You know what that's like? To have your own blood use you for food?”

Julias looked to Jack, without hiding the glance. Let them see he was curious about this, it invited more conversation. The more they talked, the more time he had to figure out a way through this barrier. But the boy looked confused. The details of Angela and Athalia's relationship when they were still a family was not known to him.

“You knew my sire, or stories of him at least,” Julias said. “Viktor was a violent, deranged man, toward the end.”

“Heh, Viktor ever torture you?”

“Nothing so direct. Has Athalia ever tortured you?”

“Not directly. But, she’s a twisted creature, as any Begotten is. She feeds on destruction and ruin, and the fear that comes with it. One time, when she was so hungry she couldn’t control herself, she destroyed my doll house. Cried afterwards, both of us. Pretty stupid, sad little story, right?”

That painted a full image. A young girl, impressionable, still open to ideas like Santa Claus and the Tooth Fairy, exposed to the horrific nature of her young, unstable, monster parent. Begotten had insatiable hungers, and he could only imagine the trauma it’d cause someone so young. She’d never be able to sleep comfortably, never able to feel at home, never able to feel truly loved, if her mother was a monster forever fighting her hungers.

“It is a sad tale, Angela, and I sympathize, I truly do.”

“What? Fuck you, vampire, you don’t—”

“But it’s nothing I haven’t heard. I’m sure most hunters have suffered equally horribly pasts, and so too have us paranormals. The Uratha, the Kindred, and the Begotten, go through worse, and many of them are not only less violent than a psychopath like you, but many strive to save as many lives as they can. You don’t get to use your mother’s treatment of you as an excuse for your actions.”

She sneered, and looked over her shoulder to Bill. The man’s painting was complex, but it was clear that it was some sort of occult circle he was drawing on the wall. If it had to be done in blood, then it couldn’t be good; reason enough to stop them, let alone saving Samantha, and taking the opportunity to stop the hunters permanently.

“Your childe killed several hunters. Your wolf friends killed several hunters as well, or nearly; Elen managed to save them.”

He raised a brow. She was willing to talk about Elen. Maybe some information could be gathered? Jack said she had a habit of talking, and hadn't learned the important skill of saying less than she knew. Children had that habit.

The more he looked this twisted woman in the eye, the more it was becoming clear she was exactly that, a child. Athalia had abandoned her, with good cause, and the whole situation had created this revolting example of a human. The guilt Athalia must have felt, every day, especially now that Angela had killed Jack's sister, was immense. It explained her anger, classic redirection.

And Jack probably knew it, too, though he probably wasn't admitting it to himself. Easier for him to think of Athalia as a burden, and Angela as nothing more than an enemy at the moment. He couldn't blame him. Killing her would have been easier if he didn't know this much about her. No one minded killing a faceless enemy. It was always harder to kill a person, someone with a family, with a past, with a voice of their own.

"Elen can resurrect people?"

"Elen can do some pretty amazing things. But I'm not going to tell you." She shrugged, not realizing she just told him that no, she couldn't resurrect people, but she could do some magical stuff otherwise. The woman would be a horrible poker player. "I look forward to what she tells me about Jack, when she starts digging through Samantha's brain."

He snarled, while Jack outright growled, and the boy approached the barrier. His eyes were wide, and glaring, animal fury blatant and overwhelming his gaze. His free hand reached out to press on the barrier, with his gun hand clenched at his side, still pointed at the hunters.

"You're not touching my mother."

"Sorry, kid. You got information we need. Come with us, and we'll spare your mother. But you're not going to do that, are you? Too selfish to—”

Jack slammed his hand against the barrier, hard, hard enough to make his arm bounce off it, and for his body to push back five feet across the floor, shoes literally sliding with him. If he'd punched a person, he'd have broken their bones. The crack of the impact was enough to make the hunters jerk, and for Angela to flinch; Julias suppressed the urge to make the obvious retort.

“You can lie to your hunters, about what you're doing, and why. But I know what you're doing, you fucking, disgusting bitch.” He walked back up to the barrier again, and again pressed his free hand against it, fingers spread at eye level. His voice dropped, a whisper, only he, Julias, and Angela could hear. “If you touch my mother, I'm going to rip off your fingers, one at a time, and your toes, and let you bleed out as I slowly cut your stomach open with a thousand small cuts.”

Angela glared at the kid, and Jack returned it. There was more here than simple hate, there was something greater. Something inhuman was in them, both of them, aching to dance in the blood of the other. Julias held his gaze on his childe for a little longer than he needed to, but it was hard to look away from Jack, once the honest introvert, with a smart mind and analytical nature, being filled with so much bloodlust.

That said, seeing this vile woman standing there, lying to them, lying to her hunters, cutting open Jez's throat like she was a sheep, and ready to sacrifice Samantha to Elen for whatever strange ritual she had planned, was infuriating. He couldn't deny the rage was building inside him as well, and he glared at the woman, keeping his vision on her real eye, as he let the anger boil over. This woman had ruined his childe, poisoned him, driven him to insane depths of hate and wrath, and was going out of her way to ruin his life. What could she possibly get from Samantha's mind that would be of use to her, except leverage over Jack?

Everything about this screamed vendetta. She wanted to hurt Jack. Using him to get information about Azamel seemed ridiculous at this point, with all the other targets she could be going after. With the resources she was spending on this hospital attack, and the lives she was risking, this had clearly become a sunken cost, and there was no way she was unaware of that. Were the others? Was Jeremiah? Something was off. The hunters didn't know what sort of woman Angela was.

“Almost done here,” Bill said.

“Good. Zak, get the woman.”

“Get her? I don't know how to remove a ventilator.”

“I know how, sort of,” Bill said. With a groan, he reached up, and finished the occult circle he was drawing. A star, an inverted pentagram, some symbols Julias didn't recognize, all arranged in a specific pattern. “I'll help Zak. Olivia, you can open the gate now.”

“Finally.” Another hunter walked up to the circle, and placed a hand against its center. Bill disappeared into Samantha's room, and Zak went with him. Four hunters in the hall, one preoccupied with the circle, while Angela continued to stand at the barrier, glaring at Jack like she was trying to fillet his soul.

Julias had to stop this. Samantha was going to die, either by what was bound to be a haphazard removal of her ventilator and insertion of a manual, portable one, or by what was going to come next. Jessy's report had described what Elen was going to do to Eric, cut into him, and learn things from him whether he wanted to tell her or not. She had some way of getting information with her magic, and could probably do more things besides, considering what Angela said. Either way, he had to stop her, for Jack's sake.

He set his free hand on the barrier, open fingers like Jack, and stared into Angela's eye.

“What’re you gonna do, Mister Mire? You can’t cross this barrier, and you can’t break my mind. Throw your weapons away, lie down on your stomachs, put your hands behind your head, and we’ll take Jack, instead of her. Otherwise, Samantha comes with us, and we’ll get some tasty info about Jack from her.” Lies on top of lies. She’d take Jack alright, after she executed Julias.

“Fuck you,” Jack said. “You’re just doing this to hurt me.”

“I’m doing this to force your hand. Surrender, and we don’t harm her.”

“She’s innocent.”

“Yes, she is. But she’s half dead, unlikely to recover, and I won’t let that life go to waste. You—” Her voice stopped, and her body went rigid, before her arms started to go limp at her sides. Gulping, she stared at Julias, and her head tilted slightly to one side.

Julias grinned.

“Boss?” one of the hunters said. The hunter had to be careful to not look at Julias, or he’d catch the hunter’s mind and break it in seconds. They couldn’t see what was happening then, not clearly, not with their eyes facing in other directions, as Julias and Jack did nothing but stand there, not drawing any attention to themselves.

Angela did nothing either. She stood there, eyes wide, stuck on Julias’s, and he managed a small smile as he reached out with everything he had, every ounce of vitae, every bit of blood, every bit of will he could muster. He slammed his mind into hers, and made her tremble. He slammed it into her again, hard enough to make her head sway back slightly. He crashed against it, against this strange barrier in her mind, the wall of hate and anger and inhuman determination.

For a moment, he remembered the heroes in ancient tales. Many heroes from mythology were psychopaths, capable of great feats, while obsessed with themselves or their goals. How many of them were twisted, convinced of their immortality, or gladly committed war crimes in pursuit of glory? Legends upon legends of the greatest the human race had to offer, and many of those stories described what could only be called a lunatic, someone driven in ways no sane mind could understand.

That's what it felt like, crashing his will against this woman. This maniac was barely human, but she was human still. That meant, for all her boasting, all her will, all her determination, she was limited by what she was. He took that part of her, the human part, and squeezed on it, found the foundation of the wall she'd built, and hammered his will on it. It was like trying to break through rock with his teeth, but he did it again, and again, until he felt his insides begin to vibrate.

"Break ... upon ... me," he said through clenched teeth. No one could hear him except him, and the woman trapped in his mental grip. His voice echoed in her mind like a cannon; he could hear her thoughts, except that they were buried underneath the thunderous echo of his own, crashing upon her will. She would break, he gave her no choice. The howling winds and roaring explosions of his resolve, his thoughts, his words, slammed into the pillars of her psyche again, and again, and soon her trembling shakes were in sync with his hammering Domination.

And he broke down her gates with all the subtlety of a battering ram. This was how Viktor broke minds, and how the man had originally taught him to. Human minds were ants to be crushed, nothing more, according to his sire. They had no Beast, nothing in them that protected them from the overwhelming, alien power of the monster inside Kindred, or Uratha, or Begotten, or whatever else crept around in the dark. Humans had nothing like that. And this Angela, despite her strange mental state, despite the oddity of her, her personality, her everything, was human.

He crushed her, and grabbed her mind.

“Break the line.”

“Yes...” With a slow nod, Angela set her foot against the black line of soot, and nudged it open.

---

---

~~Antoinette~~

“Flesh magic?” she said.

“Y-Yeah. I ... I can’t think of any other w-w-way to p-put it. It was flesh. The walls, the floor, the ... the b-b-bones, it was all flesh, and other ... things you find inside a person.”

Antoinette frowned and leaned back in her seat. Natasha was down with her in their primary experimentation room, chandelier above, empty summoning and resonance circle behind them. The details of her encounter could wait for tomorrow night, but tomorrow night was likely to be filled with talk of Samantha Terry. It was better to learn of this now, and she could ruminate upon the information while handling her new childe.

A small piece of her bubbled with excitement over the prospect of a new childe. How many years had it been since she tired Tony? She could not recall the date, but it must have been over two centuries. To have a new childe, a woman of maturity nonetheless, someone she could both teach, but also indulge in conversations her ghouls could not appreciate, was exciting indeed. And above all, it would make her love happy.

Tiny smiles sneaked their way onto her face mid conversation. She would consider siring Ashley and Julee in the future, but the two were still content to simply enjoy the freedom she gave them: immortality, sex, money, education, fashion, and anything their whimsical hearts desired. And she was content to enjoy their glee by proxy. With Samantha it would be different. Everything would be different.

She forced her mind back to the topic at hand, as unsavory as it was. “What you describe can only be the creation of magic.”

“M-M-Magic is ... I’d ... I w-wish there was a more scientific explanation.”

“As do I.” That was one of the goals of the Ordo Dracul, to discover, document, and understand the mysterious workings of the universe. To lump the unexplainable under the title ‘magic’ was doing a disservice to her order, and the universe at large. But, that did not change that some acts were so alien and obtuse, that they defied any explanation she had available, her or her order. A room made of flesh, a living, breathing, pulsating room with ribs, and dangling chains with bodies hooked upon them, was magical, and abhorrent.

“For now,” she continued, “we will call it magic, flesh magic if you will, until we discover how the witch Elen is performing these acts. Is she communicating with an entity from another realm? Perhaps there is a wavelength of energy she has learned to sense that we have not, and she manipulates it. There are humans that can see colors that others cannot.”

“That ... that um, d-doesn’t sound ... comparable.” Natasha squirmed in her seat, and fidgeted with one of the tablets Antoinette had provided, scrolling through texts relevant to the topic. There were not many, but there were some, talks of strange magics that revolved around the manipulation of living flesh. Living was the key to it, as far as the texts suggested. It was not magic that could be performed on the dead or undead, but only those with living, breathing bodies, and souls within; or bodies who had died within the past few minutes. If Elen was performing this magic, and that was indeed what seemed to be happening, that was her limitation.

The report the Invictus had shared with her said that, while Elen was going to perform her magic upon Eric, she was not going to do so to Jack; they had resorted to torture with her beloved. Eric was alive, while Jack was undead. A pattern, perhaps, proving that Elen was bound by that rule.

“No, I suppose it does not.” With a long sigh, Antoinette leaned back in her chair and looked up at the dangling chandelier. It produced a white light, but she could change its color to allow her tablets, and the complicated software and delicate lenses they used, to view the usually invisible substance ephemera. Such discoveries were a step toward understanding the madness others called magic, and that she too, was forced to call magic in the meantime. Frustrating.

She could still remember when Lucas had summoned a literal bolt of lightning, and struck her with it. But it had not burned her. It had suppressed her powers, locked her vitae to her insides, blocked her from using it to extend her will outside of her. It had nearly spelled her doom.

“What interests me more than this flesh chamber,” Antoinette said, “is what you have discovered about the Begotten. If Elen was indeed controlling him through something she was carving on his back, which Daniel’s discoveries of her sacrifice rituals suggests is quite within the realm of possibilities, then that is an opportunity.”

“We could free him!” Tash sat upright a little straighter, a hint of resolve crossing her young face as she nodded.

“Oui, perhaps we could. That would be invaluable, and likely turn this strange war we have found ourselves in, deep in our favor.”

“That would b-be so great. And ... and...”

“Mmm?”

“He was ... very p-pretty.”

Antoinette laughed, and shook her head. “Little Vola, you already have two strapping men in your bed every night.”

“N-No! Not for me. Just, he was v-very pretty. I bet he’d ... you know, f-fit in Dolareido.”

“Ah, he had that look, did he?”

“Well, he was shirtless!” She threw up her hands, as if that justified her apparent inability to not think of the man through a sexual lens. “He, umm, Aaron said-d that he looked and sound Romanian. He had blue eyes, and short b-black hair, buzzed, like Jack’s. Normal height, and ... athletic.”

Ah, athletic. Perhaps it was her long friendship with Jessy Herrington that had sparked the girl’s interest in masculine physiques. Or Antoinette had simply underestimated the size of the small woman’s sex drive before she got to know her, underestimating her and her almost cliché — but terribly cute — desire to be small in the arms of her large, powerful, deadly lovers.

Except they were not lovers, not yet. Plenty of sex to be had, but as far as Natasha had mentioned, it had not entered the territory of love yet. Would it? Antoinette feared for her, as a woman being shared by two men was a difficult thing to manage, when love entered the equation. But if she could make it work, all the power to her.

“Perhaps he can be rescued. Perhaps not. If this shaman has managed to ensnare a Begotten, true monsters, beings of literal nightmares, understand that saving him may not be possible. And, sad as it is, if the circumstance arises, we must prioritize the lives of our Kindred over his.”

“B-But we’ll try, right?”

Smiling, Antoinette nodded again. “We will try.” The tactical advantage alone warranted the attempt, let alone freeing a fellow paranormal from the hunter psychopaths.

“Any idea ab-b-bout this?” Tash said, with a gesture to the small jar of blood on the counter.

Antoinette scooped it up. Tilting it from side to side revealed no abnormalities; it looked like normal human blood. Kindred blood was darker, thicker, and it acted with a will of its own, determined to keep the host healthy and in one piece. This was not that. This was a jar of thick, red water that moved with gravity and the laws of liquids, nothing more.

“I presume, once this is analyzed, we will find the blood of many humans. I also presume it will also show signs of rot, now that it has been removed from its body.”

“That chamber w-was a ... b-b-body?”

“Based on what you described, I can only assume it was some sort of body. It had skin and flesh of its own, and a sentience, displayed in the reaction of those faces on the wall. I can only surmise that Elen has either created or discovered this entity. I ... would not be surprised, if this old woman has created it, through decades of effort, and the murder of others.” If murder was the correct word. Perhaps she had merged them, combined them, like some sort of alien entity found in a science fiction fantasy. “Based on the drawings Daniel has collected, and now our understanding of her powers, at least in relation to flesh, and what she tried to do to Eric, we must assume that she works powers in regards to flesh. She not only treats it as a mechanic treats a vehicle, but she treats it like she were a whisperer, someone who can speak to what others cannot.”

“B-Because she ... she said ... things about...”

“Assuming the reports of your friend Herrington, Eric, and Clara are decently accurate, then this Elen shaman has discovered something truly mysterious about the power of flesh. I wish to know more, as will Jacob.”

“W ... Will you tell him stuff y-you learn, if we capture her first?”

“That is a good question, Miss Vola. Will I tell Jacob.” The question deserved pondering, and she sat there for a minute, looking down at the table as she tapped her finger upon it. “I imagine not, honestly. The man cannot be trusted.”

“B-B-But ... he’s your old friend.” As much as she was arguing in the man’s favor, Vola’s face betrayed her views of him. She did not like the old Nosferatu.

“Jacob has not been a true friend in ... I suppose that is not correct, or fair of me.” She tapped a finger against her chin, and smiled at Vola. “He aided me, in creating the wild goose chase that Tony and Viktor pursued, which led to their demise.”

Natasha’s jaw dropped as she pieced together the implications of that. Antoinette had arranged for Tony and Viktor to clash, and Jacob had joined her in that pursuit. Two elders had conspired to kill two other elders in the city, and had done so without ever giving up their identities. The Danse Macabre could be deadly, and she could play it like no other.

“You’re ... a d-d-dangerous woman, Prince.”

“Oui, c’est vrai.” She nodded, acknowledging the fact. No harm in letting the small Mekhet offer her ego some gentle strokes. “I—”

Her phone rang. Sighing, Antoinette picked it up. Daniel's ring. He would not call without good reason, same as his childe. "Yes Daniel, what is it?"

"Ann, one of Jack's crows showed up."

"That is peculiar."

"And there's a massive blackout in the city. A few blocks are without power, and that includes South Center Hospital."

Antoinette growled into the phone, and clenched on it. It took will to not shatter it to pieces. "Then we go."

"There's only an hour till sunrise, Annie."

"That is more than enough time to dismember whoever is responsible." She got up and started marching out the door. "I assume communications are down?"

Natasha hopped up, and looked around in a panic, grabbing her sword and pistol quickly before jogging to catch up to the Prince.

"Yes," Daniel said.

"Then you will find and fix this issue, and slaughter any hunters you find. I will go to the hospital."

"We should send some thralls to—"

"I am going, Daniel. I have been hands-off in this affair long enough. These vermin think they can exploit my love and his youth by attacking his mother. I am going to tear them apart, limb by limb."

---

---

~~Jack~~

Jack could feel his sire smashing his will against Angela's, and it was awe inspiring. Dominate was normally a subtle skill, and not a Masquerade violation due to how impossible it was to see. Unless a Mekhet was using Auspex to spy on the paranormal activity, Dominate was a hidden talent that seemed like nothing more than a man speaking convincing words.

This wasn't subtle. Jack could feel this. Jack could almost hear this. There was the thud thud of Angela's heartbeat, and in the dead silence, he was sure he could hear something crashing in rhythm with it. Julias's mind was slamming into her, battering against her, smashing through her mental gates, and from this close, Jack could feel the waves of the Kindred energy pour out of him. This was a side of Julias he'd never seen. Always his sire was about subtle decisions, spending energy where it was best served, never ridiculous expenditures. This was not that. This was like that time Viktor had summoned an army of rats, to allow the three of them to storm Tony's position, a surreal display of insanity.

"Break the line," his sire said.

Angela twitched, the eyelid over her glass eye fidgeting. Even now, as the century-old Kindred destroyed her defenses and grabbed her mind, she resisted. The will this woman could muster was nuts, something no human should have been able to do. Werewolves, vampires, monsters, and probably other things Jack had yet to see, they could stand up in a fight like this, be a part of it, instead of a simple sack of meat as kine always were. Angela had no right to be able to resist them like she was. But, despite whatever it was that blocked Jack, Julias broke through it, and Angela moved her foot just enough, to push a small gap into the black powder at her feet.

The barrier Jack had his hand against fell away. From this close, he had the warning about what was happening, and he let a smile sneak onto his lips, as his hand fell to his side. His pistol hand brought up the gun, pointed it at Angela's face, and fired. No hesitation this time, no mistakes. Execute her, be done with it, and dance in the river of her blood once his mom was safe.

Except, the bullet didn't land. Angela's body fell like a sack of rocks, hitting the ground hard as a blur of movement tackled her legs from behind, bullet cutting through her forehead but not penetrating. Julias, Angela, and one of the hunters rolled over each other in a mess of limbs and grunts. Jack was soon included in the mess, as the diving hunter half spun with their tackle, legs out to the side, and slamming into Jack's legs.

He wouldn't let this happen, not again. As he fell, he caught his weight onto open hand, the rest of his weight rolling onto his elbow and side. He pointed the gun at the mess of bodies, and started firing.

Some bullets hit Julias. He knew it'd happen, and he fired anyway. He saw where his sire's head was, though, and as long as he didn't turn the man's skull into splatter art, Julias would be fine. Other bullets slammed into the mess of limbs, most hitting the hunter that had tackled them, and hitting what Jack guessed was kevlar underneath his jacket. Damn it.

The whole situation lasted three seconds. By then, the other hunters had responded. Jack was forced to turn around, and roll to the side, putting the original wall corner he'd used as cover between him and the hunters. A good thing, because Bill and Zak both came out of his mother's room, guns blazing, unloading a flurry of bullets into the wall corner Jack was hiding behind. At least Olivia stayed at the circle Bill had painted. Her hand was pressed to its center, and there was a gentle, amber glow on her fingers. He'd love to shoot her and stop whatever it was she was doing, but bullets smashed into the wall corner, shredding it, and forcing Jack back into hiding.

The hunter on the other side of the hall, standing by his own line of black powder, ran their way, and started unloading his shotgun.

This one came closer, and closer, unloading shell after shell at Jack, until he came around the corner to join him. Pure aggression. This hunter had balls, using the suppressing spray of his shotgun — sawed off, evidently — to pin Jack back until he had to retreat to one of the doors behind him. Jack threw the door open, and ducked in around the door frame, before poking his head out enough to start firing at the incoming asshole.

A quick glance past the shotgun wielder, showed Julias in the corner of the hall, wrestling with Angela. It didn't last long. Even a Ventrue was a lot stronger than a human physically, especially if they were ancilla, and especially if the human had been shot. The bastards were wearing bulletproof vests, but there was still blood, some of Jack's bullets having hit their limbs. Angela was bleeding from the head, but now also from the arm, and the hunter who tackled them was bleeding from the leg. Julias stood up, and despite the hole in his stomach and leg that Jack put there, the man held both kine by the throat, one for each hand; must have dropped his pistol in the mess. Their legs dangled, and Angela slammed her foot up to kick him in the crotch.

He was a Ventrue though. Only the Gangrel matched their Resilience, and Angela's reflex probably didn't take that account. Julias barely reacted, and glared at the two humans in his grip.

"You. Kill them." Julias nodded toward the man in his hand, and dropped him.

The kine collapsed, his leg almost gushing blood from the impact. But once he was down, he pulled out his pistol, and started firing. First, at the kine with the shotgun approaching Jack. In the chaos, the hunter put every bullet into the hunter's back; headshots would have been better, but he was probably aiming for center of mass, or resisting Julias's snappy mind control as best he could. It was enough to send the man with the shotgun onto his face, though.

And that was enough for Jack to shoot the man in the skull when he landed.

There was a flash moment, a single instance of time, and it stood out with a white background, scarring Jack's eyes. The moment the bullet slammed into the man's skull, and the splatter of blood and brain matter rained over the hospital floor around him, the world froze. It was for a moment, a single moment, but it was long enough for Jack to notice it, and long enough to hear the growling chuckle that came with it.

His growl. His chuckle. It didn't sound like him.

Julias still held Angela, and she was his shield between him and the three hunters still outside his mother's room. But, even as he held her, an animal snarl escaping him, he squeezed the woman's throat harder, eyes glancing between her and the other hunters. The hunter at his feet and under his control broke the momentary standoff, turning to face the other hunters, and he started firing. Jack couldn't see the other hunters from his new position, himself halfway in a patient's room and down the hall toward where he'd originally come from, but he could hear them. They must have been hiding in his mom's room, out of the dominated hunter's line of sight.

"Put her down!"

"No," Julias said, looking over the struggling, squirming woman's shoulder, as he squeezed on her neck. Yes, break it, crush it. Angela held his wrist with both her hands, her gun on the floor, and her arm bleeding more as she fought against him. His Dominate hadn't lasted long on her, but it didn't need to. Jack could see her neck begin to buckle, and he licked his lips as the woman's frantic struggles grew more panicked, her face turning red in the darkness.

And then everything started to glow amber. As if a portal to hell had suddenly opened up, the orange light filled the hall, and Jack had to raise an arm to cover his eyes for a moment. Julias stared ahead into the hall, and Jack stepped over the corpse of the hunter he'd executed to put his shoulder to the corner he'd been using as cover again. Bullet casings were everywhere, and the white of the wall had been torn apart by metal shrapnel, exposing the building steel underneath. The amber glow grew, and Jack stuck his head out, ready to pull it back to avoid getting shot.

The wall, opposite of his mother's room, the one the hunter had painted on, had opened.

Jack blinked, staring at where the hunter had drawn the blood circle. He'd recognized the circle from the ritual sites Daniel had showed him, but he didn't know their significance. Significance now explained. The circle was open, and an orange light flowed out of it, pouring over the hall, and the room his mother was in. And suddenly, everything smelled thick of blood, far more than it had. What the fuck was going on?

A man stepped out, someone of average height, dark hair buzzed short like Jack's, shirtless, wearing jeans and combat boots. He smelled of blood, too. For a second, Jack could see the man's muscular back as he stepped out of the portal from Hell, and he squinted to see the strange circle drawn between his shoulder blades. It was a similar circle to the one that'd been painted on the wall, and it looked like it was carved into his flesh.

The man turned to face Julias and Jack, and raised the corner of his lip in a snarl. He leaned forward slightly, put a foot behind him, and readied a sprint. As he did, a subtle, black silhouette filled the air around him, and Jack felt every muscle in his body clench, as he recognized four giant arms, and four colossal wings.

Oh shit.

The beast charged forward, and as he did, his boots tore the floor apart. Jack had seen the werewolves do that, using their talons to anchor their weight, so they could propel themselves. This man was doing the same thing, except it was the strange silhouette of the colossal, four-armed gargoyle tearing the floor apart. And as he came in close to Julias, he threw his weight to the side, one of the wing silhouettes, a shadowy mist lit by the amber of the portal, flapped to force the Begotten toward a wall.

Julias tried to compensate, turn to face the monster, but Angela fought him, bringing up both her feet and driving them into his chest. Julias still didn't let go of her, but it threw off his balance, and he couldn't keep his hostage between him and the monster. With a quiet, cold ruthlessness, Sándor jumped, bounced a foot off the wall, got around Angela, and smashed his weight into Julias.

The hospital wall didn't appreciate it. It cracked, bits of white falling away like brick, and where the Begotten drove his hands into Julias's shoulders and into the wall, it was dented. Angela fell, and scampered to take away the gun of the hunter Julias had dominated. The two of them started to roll, trailing blood and firing the gun wildly.

Angela was strong, even with only one uninjured arm. While her gun, and Julias's gun had scattered around on the floor in the earlier mayhem, she managed to grab onto the wild, flailing gun hand of the dominated hunter, and she pointed it at Jack.

The sensation of metal tearing through his flesh was not a pleasant one. He thought he'd get used to it, with how often it was becoming a part of his life. But, as much as he thought maybe he could handle pain, the way a bullet tears through the flesh with such unbridled enthusiasm, was not a pain he could ever prepare himself for. One bullet hit his leg, another hit his guts, and another hit his chest. His body hit the wall, back planted to it, and two more bullets slammed into his ribs. When another hit his gun arm, crashing into the bone, he dropped the pistol, and his body fell back, back sliding down the wall as his feet gave out. He tried to get up, but another bullet crashed into him, ripping up his legs, and putting that idea on hold with a silent wave of agony.

How? How did this happen? One moment, Jack and Julias were kicking ass, ready to put these six hunters in their place. Hell, one of them lay beside Jack, a big hole in his skull where Jack had executed him. There'd been a sick satisfaction in that, in the cold and brutally efficient act of putting a bullet in his head when he was down, taking advantage of the opportunity Julias's Dominated hunter had created. But now, Jack looked down at the many holes that peppered his body, made by bullets that had ripped through his muscle and bone, scattered some ashes to the hospital floor, and left him broken. Angela didn't stop firing at him, until the pistol clicked, empty.

Angela drove her elbow into the side of the Dominated man's skull, and the hunter went unconscious. With the Dominated hunter down, and Jack momentarily incapacitated, Angela got up, and joined Sándor, kicking at the man while the Begotten rammed his fists into Julias's sides.

“Zak! Bill! Get Raymond back through the gateway now! Elen might be able to do something for him.”

Two of the hunters ran around the corner Jack was sitting against, and grabbed the man Jack executed. Do something for him? Unless Elen could sew the bits of his brain back together, she shouldn't be able to do a thing for him. Could she?

He managed a glare up at the hunters as they ran past, but they were very, very good at avoiding his eyes. They'd learned from their mistakes in the past, and had training in this exact, specific niche of combat with vampires: avoiding looking them in the eyes. Just a glance, just a peek his way, and he'd reach out and break them, but of course he wasn't that lucky.

He tried to move his gun arm. Grab the pistol, grab it, grab the pistol. He growled as the pain tore through him, and vitae flowed over the bones, forcing them back into place. Move, move your hand, grab the pistol. You have to do something or you're dead. If you don't do something, don't fix this, you're dead, your sire's dead, and your mother's dead. Move!

He managed to look to his sire, but Julias was busy. Angela was in there with the Begotten, and the two of them were fighting him hand to hand. Angela didn't manage much with her bleeding arm and head, and upon second look, Jack could see his bullet had hit her in the bone of bicep; partly out of commission then, at least until it was fixed up, probably by Elen. But that didn't stop her from trying, kicking at Julias's side and forcing Jack's sire to block with his arm, while the Begotten pounded on him.

Sándor was strong. Sándor was ridiculously strong. Jack hadn't seen such a display of sheer, brute strength since the werewolves had fought against that spider monster in tunnels, or maybe when Antoinette had torn apart over a dozen Kindred with her bare hands. The stomach-turning crunch of bones breaking, the thud of flesh rippling under explosive impact, the way the body moved off the floor half an inch with each upward punch — or in this case, several inches — was nauseating. Jack stared as the smaller man, probably fifty pounds lighter than Julias, beat him into a pulp.

Julias took it, a small grin on his lips as he blocked as many punches as he could. He glanced Angela's way, and the woman froze.

“Kill the Begotten.”

Whatever wall she had in her mind to keep vampires from getting their fingers into her brain, it must have been damaged, because she turned on the shirtless man beside her instantly, and tackled him. Sándor fell over, caught off guard and a slave to physics; he wasn't as big a guy as Julias. And Julias sealed the deal by driving his fist down at the man's face when Angela caught his side, forcing him onto his knees. Angela pulled a knife out from behind her with her good hand, and threw herself onto the Begotten's back, stabbing wildly, sending blood everywhere. The Begotten only grunted as his blood painted the walls, and rolled underneath her, bringing her down with him.

As Sándor and Angela rolled around on the floor, Jack stared at the pistol beside him. Forcing down the bubbling scream that threatened to make his head explode as pain flooded him, he twisted over, and reached for it with his offhand. Get it, get the pistol, and shoot everyone, riddle them with holes. Time was running out, and if things kept going the way they were, either the hunters would kill him, or sunrise would.

Julias looked down the hall, where the circle had been drawn, where the amber light was bathing the area in the colors of a crimson sunrise, where Jack's mother's room was, and he froze. His eyes went wide for a moment, before the room erupted with an unending sea of thunder and metal. The flashing white of a thousand small explosions lit the hallway like the fourth of July, if someone had been unlucky enough to accidentally light all the fireworks at once, at their feet.

Jack did his best to ignore the hail of gunfire, half his focus on getting his gun arm working again, other half trying its best to twist itself so he could grab the pistol with his bad hand. He got his fingers on it, and pointed at the rolling Begotten and Angela, but the rain of gunfire rattled his brain, and he snapped his head to the side as a chunk of the wall corner he was sitting against exploded. His back was to the corner, wall blocking him from being caught in the gunfire, and with Angela and Sándor on the floor, there was no reason that the few hunters still on their feet, and whoever came out of the hole in the wall, couldn't unleash hell at anything higher than three feet.

Julias, already with dents in his body and some twisted, mangled bends to one of his wrists, didn't try and dodge. He just stared at whatever Hell awaited him, and managed a small grin, as the bullets started to rip him apart.

Jack froze, and stared at his sire. Sándor threw his head down and covered his ears with his hands, and Angela, perhaps brought out of her enslavement by the Begotten's punch, or maybe the explosion of metal death, did the same. She broke her enslavement in seconds before, and had done so again. She was insane.

Julias was insane, too. As dozens of bullets ripped into him, Jack stared on, paralyzed, unable to look away as the small shards of metal opened him up. And yet, the man remained standing. Kindred blood filled the wounds, pulled withered skin and muscle over them, and hid the damage as best it could.

For a moment, Jack was reminded of when Viktor lost a chunk of his skull to a sniper bullet. It'd taken some of his brain with him, but the man had managed to regrow it in minutes; a staggering, impressive regenerative display he now only expected from transformed Uratha, but not Kindred, not even elders. And yet as the metal ripped into Julias, Jack found the same thing happening.

It was more than that. The bullets hit his skin, and many didn't penetrate. Some flattened against his hardening body, falling to the side. Others cut through his suit and skin, but were pushed aside by the writhing mass of dark Kindred blood within. Others went through him, slamming into the wall behind him, and the holes in his flesh filled in within seconds.

It was worse when some hit his face. The sight of teeth getting ripped from his mouth, a cheek tearing open, and a chunk of his upper skull getting exposed, made Jack's stomach turn. His sire's combed-back blonde hair was ripped into a mess of torn bits, with his scalp getting hammered with at least a dozen bullets, one penetrating his sire's skull, above the eye, and causing him to stagger. He didn't fall.

Jack managed to stick his head around the corner enough to see what was going on. The four other hunters in Angela's troupe were there, and so were four more. While the four that joined them had pistols, three of them were unloading their bullets at Julias, the fourth stood behind a wheelchair. Elen, the old sack of bones, ready to succumb to extreme age and frailty, watched the fireworks from a safe ways back. The other black line of powder was behind her, keeping her back safe while she watched the onslaught, six hunters unleashing Armageddon on Julias, one small piece at a time.

Jack ducked his head back in, and brought up his gun. Still not the good hand, and that arm was struggling to work as well, considering a fair amount of metal was now lodged inside him. But if Julias could stand there, and take a couple hundred bullets in five seconds, and not fall, the least Jack could do was shoot at the fucking bitch at his feet.

Angela managed to crawl Jack's way, and throw herself at him, tripping over herself as she did. It didn't need to be a graceful tackle. A stumbling mess of shoulders and limbs was more than enough to crash into Jack before he could get the pistol straight. He held onto the gun this time, squeezing the grip as hard as he could, and he struggled underneath the shoulder of the woman. Work, body, work, mend. Fix the bones, reattach the tendons, get the muscles to bare functioning minimum. Let him kill this woman before she ruined everything.

She turned so she was facing him, on top of him, and the sheer manic rage he found in her one good eye was almost enough to shock him. Being controlled by Julias, twice, must have triggered something in her. This was the Angela he saw when she was on him last time, in the street, when Eric and Beatrice had run them over. If both her arms worked, he wouldn't have been surprised if she'd tried to strangle him, pointless as it was.

But her arm didn't work, and neither did his. The best she could manage was hammer punches down on his face with her good hand, and a weak grab on his throat with her bad one. He blocked them with his forearm, before swinging the gun hand against the side of her head, sending her falling over. The two of them were out of the way of the gunfire, and with Julias pinned to the wall under a constant incoming rain of death, Jack was on his own.

At least, that's what he hoped for. In all the chaos, the darkness, the pyrotechnics of muzzle flashes and bullet ricochets, Jack rolled onto Angela, and started beating his gun down on her. Break her face in. Use the grip, smash her teeth in, break her nose, break her eye, smash her skull in until it's pulp. And when she's almost dead, when she's struggling to breathe, when she's gargling on her blood, Kiss her, and drink her until she's a withered corpse.

Each blow he rained down, she managed to block, same as he had her. The difference was, he was a vampire, and she was just a stupid human. He was stronger than her. Break her. Rip her in half. Ruin her. Tear—

Two hands found him, lifted him off the floor, and smashed him into the wall. His skull cracked against it, and for a brief moment, he knew Sándor had crawled out from under the gunfire, and got him when his guard was down. Stupid, stupid Jack.

Jack fell onto his back, dazed, hot misery exploding outward from his dented skull. His eyes barely worked, but he looked up at the bleeding, shirtless man, and met his gaze. The monster had blue eyes, and they looked a little sad. He'd seen similar eyes, in Angela actually, when he was about to shoot her in the beast's nightmare.

The silhouette of the monster gargoyle filled the hallway, and Sándor raised his boot. He was going to die, skull crushed under the boot of a man he turned his back to, a monster at that. And of all the ways to die, this seemed to be the most empty, most pointless, most unsatisfying of them all.

The gunfire stopped, and Sándor turned around. Julias walked his way, and Jack's jaw dropped as he stared at his sire.

The man was missing half his flesh. The suit had torn to shreds, exposing an arm, half of his torso, and his pants were no better off, one leg half exposed below the knee, the other half exposed above it. Some of his sire's bones were visible. Jack winced, staring, eyes locked onto how he could see a lot of the bone of one leg, and one arm. And as Julias took another step toward Sándor, Jack was reminded of a scene from Terminator, where his skin was being shot off, but it didn't stop the machine.

Blood coursed over Julias's body, thick Kindred blood, and it filled in the gaps where muscle was gone, and filled in for tendons and ligaments, keeping his kneecap where it should be, and allowing his wrist to work.

His sire held up his hand, pulled it back, and drove it into Sándor's face, enough heft and vitae behind it to send the man half spinning through the air before he landed.

“Get the fuck off my childe.”

Chapter 88

~~Julias~~

Everything had fallen apart in a matter of seconds. When it was just the six hunters, he and his childe could have handled the situation easily. Even Angela, for all her absurd might and endurance, was only human. Six humans? He could have handled this himself.

Having to work quickly, break through Angela's defenses, deal with a magical barrier, and save Samantha, threw a wrench into what would have otherwise been simple. Unless the hunters managed to nail him with a shotgun or Molotov, he could shrug off the bullets easily enough. It wasn't like they'd use a grenade or a high caliber sniper rifle inside a hospital. Hell, even the guy with the assault rifle wasn't too bad to deal with; a bullet going through him instead of tearing him up was less damaging to a vampire.

But, he hadn't predicted running into the Begotten, Sándor. A colossal mistake. He knew the nightmare horrors couldn't use their full ability outside of the nightmare realm, so he'd been confident that, even if he came across the monster, he could handle him with Jack's help. Another mistake. Whoever this man was, whatever cosmic entity of fear and terror had merged with him, it had given the beast incredible vigor. Julias was as likely to win a battle of strength against this brute, as he was against Maria or Michael.

Using Angela against the Begotten had been the best he could manage, but once the two of them were down and fighting each other, there'd been nothing to stop the remaining hunters, and the four new ones, from unleashing Hell upon him. Shit.

Julias froze, staring, glaring, as the wall of bullets smashed into him, tore into him, ripped his suit apart, hacked through skin and muscle, and cracked bone. Most of the hunters didn't use armor piercing rounds; they wanted maximum torn flesh, and used hollow-point rounds instead. He growled as he felt the metal shred him, until he could do nothing but stand there, pinned to the wall by the momentum of dozens of bullets hitting him.

He knew bone had become exposed. Bone, muscle, some old organs, random parts of his body giving way under the sudden onslaught. His left arm screamed in agony, as did his left leg, as bullets ripped them open. He tried to look down, but couldn't, as a bullet crashed against his skull, his Kindred bone and its hollow-point nature the only thing keeping it from sinking into his brain and knocking him unconscious.

Going into torpor wasn't an option. He had to save Jack. A quick glance at the kid showed that, in the chaos, blood, bullets, and spraying bits of wall, Jack had managed to win his struggle against Angela, despite the dozen bullets he'd taken. His success was rewarded by a Begotten grabbing him from behind, ready to break him in half.

No. Julias would not allow that. Whatever it took, whatever happened, he would not let them capture, or kill, his childe.

He looked back to the six hunters shooting at him, and held up a hand. First, defense. He summoned the vitae in his core, summoned the Beast with it, and brought it to the surface. The monster within, dormant, contained, he let rise like a dragon disturbed from slumber. The growling monster rushed up to his skin, and it howled through the bullet holes in his body, through the clenched teeth of the ancilla Ventrue, and flooded his frame with Kindred blood. Literally. The running, living liquid washed over Julias's body, and where skin, tendon, and muscle had been ripped apart by the hail of metal, his blood pulled double duty, protecting, and forcing it to move. He was a Kindred, and a Ventrue. He didn't need muscles to move, only his will.

As the bullets crashed into the crimson liquid, they broke upon it like sand thrown against a wall. What bits of metal managed to pierce the flowing waves of blood coursing over him, did not reach the Kindred underneath. He was impervious to their weapons, while his vitae lasted. He had to be done with this quickly, before the inevitable.

The hunters had done a good job of avoiding his eyes before, but once they'd turned him into a target for their shooting gallery, they had no choice but to look at him. With all the muzzle flashes, and three hunters holding a flashlight directly at him, the darkness did not hide his gaze; they had no choice but to be able to see his eyes.

He grinned through the flowing waves of crimson, and reached out with his mind.

“Kill your comrades.”

To ask anyone to do something wholly against their nature was difficult. To ask a hunter to do so was extremely difficult. To do it to three of them at once, almost impossible. To do it, while they were shooting him, while he summoned up the blood barrier? Viktor would have been proud of him.

The three closer hunters immediately turned on their partners, and Hell broke loose. The other three were quick on the draw, and immediately grappled with their friends, grabbing their guns and taking them out of the equation. They'd had training for this sort of thing, then. But, three on three, meant that no more hunters were free to shoot at him. And Elen could do nothing but watch from her chair, glaring and angry, as the six hunters became a free-for-all mess of punches and kicks.

He looked beside him, and winced as the Begotten slammed Jack's head into the wall. A splatter of Kindred blood soaked the surface, before burning away with tiny flames, as the boy fell down, rolling onto his back. Jack had managed to knock Angela around a little, hurt her, leaving her bruised and probably concussed, but the Begotten was mostly fine. Angela, only moments before, had stabbed him several times under Julias's Dominate, cutting through the skin and muscle around the man's shoulders, and for all Sándor's power, it didn't seem like extreme regeneration was one of them.

With a small grin on his lips that he just couldn't seem to get rid of, Julias walked up behind the Begotten, and when the monster turned around, likely tipped off by the ceasing gunfire, Julias drove his fist into the man's face. It wasn't like a Ventrue couldn't tap into strength and Kindred Vigor with extreme effect, it was just far harder for them than Nos or Daeva. And, letting his Beast come to the surface like a tidal wave, was hitting him with power he hadn't felt in decades. With the extra vitae sunk into it, he summoned enough strength to punch a hole through a brick wall, and he put that force into Sándor's face.

“Get the fuck off my childe.”

Earlier, a glance at Sándor's eyes had made it obvious breaking his mind would be difficult, and take time. So he resorted to brute strength, like Triss would. He didn't have the vitae to waste doing that, inefficient as hell for a Ventrue, but he had to put the Begotten out of commission, now. The coursing blood flowed over him, drained him to near starving, but got his body working, kept it working, and would protect him; it was now or never. Jack was staring at him, and considering the amount of bone and withered muscle Julias was showing, he no doubt looked like a fucking monstrosity. He'd yet to enter one of the nightmares to see what the nightmare monsters looked like, but he'd read the reports, and Julias probably didn't look too far off right now.

The hunters he'd broken wouldn't stay under his control for long. Sharp blows to the head, or a few minutes of freedom, would eventually release them from the very weak control he'd put them under. But a few minutes was enough time to beat this fucking asshole into oblivion.

He reached down, one of his arms showing the bones of his forearm, knuckles, and some fingers. It was enough to make Sándor open his eyes in what Julias could only guess was fear. Making a literal nightmare horror afraid of him? Yes, that stroked a Ventrue's ego just fine. He rewarded the man by grabbing his shoulders, picking him up, and throwing him into the other wall, hard. Before the man could fall, the Ventrue shoulder checked him, driving his weight into the smaller man's chest hard enough to earn a spray of blood from his mouth.

The only thing that kept this from being a horrible Masquerade violation, was that the hallway was unlit, and they were fighting at the end of it, so its length managed to blanket some of the insanity in darkness. A quick glance showed none of the nurses or anyone had left their staff rooms, but the fight had only been going on for a minute. Someone was bound to show up sooner or later, take a picture, or try and get involved. The list of reasons to deal with this in the next thirty seconds was growing.

As Sándor started to fall, back flat to the wall, Julias drove his knee upward, catching the man's head as it drifted forward, and smashed the man's mouth and nose. The crunch of broken cartilage and breaking teeth was satisfying. The thud of his skull hitting the wall from the hit, and the crack it left in the hard white surface, was even more satisfying. Blood flowed over Julias's knee, and Sándor went limp, body falling forward until it hit the hospital floor with a wet crunch from his face.

Julias smirked as he walked over to Jack, reached down, winked at him, and picked up Angela. Break her neck this time, quickly now.

A memory tickled him, one of Rebecca, smashing his head in with a hammer, and leaving him for dead in a burning building. She'd caught him off guard then, hadn't given him the time to build up to something like this. And, at the time, his child hadn't been in danger. Jack was in danger now, and there was no way in hell Julias was going to—

He fell to a knee, and let go of the one-eyed woman before he'd even had a chance to squeeze. She stumbled back, landing on her ass beside Jack, and she froze as she stared up at him as well. The blood that coated him, protected him, started to fade, and he growled as he felt his insides run dry. Doing so much, so quickly, brought the world into a blurry haze, and ripped the strength out of him. The Beast in him, the creature he normally kept deep down in its cave, roared in frustration, as it ran hungry.

He looked beside him at the Begotten. Groaning and growling as well, Sándor pushed himself up onto his hands, and then struggled to get up, blood flowing out of his mouth and nose as one of his hands pressed to the wall. And get up, he did. Angela's face bled in a similar mess, beaten in by Jack, and while she may have been mentally ready to get back up and fight him, her body disagreed with her. Her attempts to get up failed, and she vomited onto the floor, the concussion and blood loss mixing into a powerful concoction of misery for her. She was out of the fight, for a few minutes, at least. Sándor was another matter entirely.

Julias tried to stand up. His body didn't listen. The Beast in him raged and shrieked, but for all its fury, Julias's body was broken and empty. No more vitae to draw upon, no more blood, no more strength, no more anything. The flowing dark crimson that covered his bones and forced his body to work, despite missing a myriad of muscle and tendons, ceased. Only the withered ligaments kept his bony arm and leg from falling apart entirely

Jack was struggling to get back up. After a blow like that, anyone his age would have been in torpor, and out of the fight until a day's sleep. Not Jack. The kid's dented head was healing over right before Julias's eyes, same as it would for him, and Viktor; not as fast, but far faster than a vampire his age should have been able to.

But then, that was Jack being Jack. He'd make it through this, somehow, even if Julias didn't. The kid always did.

Julias tried to stand up again, and he bit back the desire to scream as pain flooded him. Exposed insides, bones, withered organs, and worse, drops of Kindred blood fell to the floor around him, lifeless, useless to him. Get up. Get the fuck up. He grit his teeth, and bit down another scream, as he forced himself up to his feet.

As blood flowed down Sándor's face, he looked down at Angela and Jack, the two of them a mess of blood and wounds. Another, short-lived hint of sadness crossed his face, and he bit his lip, before he looked over to Julias. There it was again, something that crossed his eyes, something heavy, something Julias recognized from his own mirror. A moment later it was gone, and the monster walked toward him.

"Sand," Angela said, gargling, coughing up more blood and puke, before she managed to get herself onto a palm and elbow. "Kill ... Mire ... Capture Jack."

The monster nodded, and walked up to Julias. Apology was written into his eyes, but he said nothing. The short man grabbed Julias by the shirt, and drew back his other fist. The silhouette of the gargoyle monster filled the hallway, and the array of claws it sported on one of its hands aimed themselves at Julias's face.

Julias managed to catch Jack's panicked eyes, and he offered his childe a small smile. You'll get out of this, kid. One way or another, you'll get out of this. I'll make sure of it.

Julias found the last bit of him, the final ounces of whatever strength he had left, scraping the bottom of the barrel for whatever remained in his corpse body, the tiny shred that kept him out of torpor. It was enough, just barely, to twist his body, and let the monster's momentum roll with him, as Julias grabbed his shoulder with a hand. Hard to bodyslam a man who wasn't wearing a shirt, but he managed, grabbing the wrist of the punching arm with his other hand, and throwing the Begotten over him into the floor.

He dropped his weight straight down with his knee, down onto Sándor's chest, and made sure to put some momentum into it, jumping a few inches so he could put all of his weight into the knee. Crunch. Sándor coughed up blood again, a lot of it, before rolling onto his side, clutching his chest as he went fetal.

Julias, unable to get back up after that, managed to turn and face Jack while on his knees, his back to the hallway corner where the hunters were fighting each other.

"Jack," he said. "Get out of here."

"What?" Good, the kid was capable of talking. If he could talk, he could think, and could act. The world was nothing but a blur to Julias at this point, and the aching hunger in his gut was loud enough to tell him he was empty, and drifting into torpor. That was fine.

"Get out of here. Run."

"Fuck that! I'm not leaving you, or Mom."

"If my guess is right, someone from the Invictus will be here soon, or the dragons. They'll get you out of here." The Beast within Julias roared at the top of its lungs, demanding he get up and fight. Sorry Mr. Beast, would if I could.

"I'm not—"

“Jack.” He sighed, and offered his childe a gentle smile. “You can’t save her if you’re dead.”

“I—”

“Jack.” Julias shook his head, before he glanced Angela’s way. The woman was drifting in and out of consciousness, struggling against her blood loss and her damaged head. “The hunters I’ve Dominated, might be another minute. We don’t have time to debate. They want you alive. Use that, and get out of here.” He could hear them struggling in the back, fists hitting flesh, and an old woman’s sharp barks of orders.

“We’re not doing this,” the kid said. “We’re not doing this last stand bullshit. You’re—” Angela’s groans drew his gaze as well, and Jack reached out for the gun beside him, likely with a desire to shoot her. But his skull was still a half-ruined mess, and his attempts to grab the pistol forced him to roll onto his side, screaming in pain.

Sándor groaned as well, and Julias looked over his shoulder to make sure the man was still down. He was; not that Julias could do anything if he wasn’t. Julias couldn’t move. His body was paralyzed. Every inch of him refused to move as he knelt there, arms limp at his sides. Torpor was moments away. He doubted its heavy embrace would find him before the hunters managed to either escape his Dominate, or knocked out the ones who had been brainwashed.

“Jack.” Julias tried to lift his arms again, purely out of habit. They weren’t budging. Using his body in a fist fight, driving it to such an extreme, had damaged it greatly. Pile on the hundreds of bullets, and his empty vitae reserves, it was like trying to move a mountain. He was done, no matter how much his Beast might roar and fight to say otherwise.

“Julias, please ... don’t...”

“Sorry Jack. I ... I pushed myself a bit hard, here.” He got cocky; Ventrue do that from time to time, and it was a harsh way to teach his childe this lesson. Julias found his head collapsing forward, the weight of it too much to bear. His back slumped, and he fought against gravity to stay kneeling. “Tell her, for me.”

“Tell ... tell Mom what?”

Julias managed something like a laugh, though it was more of a whispered chuckle as his lungs refused to cooperate. “Tell ... Triss ... everything...”

Jack got his head up, his weight on his side, but he managed to get a palm underneath him so he could force himself into a half sit, half lay. When he finally looked Julias’s way, his eyes were wide, and a mix of anger and terror was in them; anger because of the hunters, and terror, because his sire was going to die. Poor kid.

“Please Julias! Don’t ... do—”

Footsteps silenced his childe. Julias tried to turn his head around to look at them, but he couldn’t. Everything was going dark, and torpor crept up his spine, demanding he sleep. Only a mouthful of fresh human blood would stave off torpor now, and unless one of the hunters was feeling generous, they wouldn’t give it to him.

“K ... Kill him,” Angela said, coughing up another wad of blood, her bruising neck straining. “Kill Mire.”

Julias managed a smile. It’d be in the hunter’s favor to capture him, but Angela wasn’t the sharpest tool in the shed. Good, this was better.

As his eyelids grew too heavy to keep from falling, he managed one more smile for Jack, before his eyes closed. As he heard the boots of a hunter come up behind him, he let his mind drift to Triss.

God, she was going to be mad, him being a reckless idiot like this. Hopefully Jennifer could comfort her. He pitied whoever the messenger was; it'd probably be Jack, too. Poor kid again.

Triss. Her smile, beautiful, and the way it sat between two sets of crocodile teeth always gave him a thrill. Her snake eyes, even more beautiful. Her touch, her embrace, the feel of her body, the way she laughed when she thought she was winning, and the way she got obstinate and juvenile when she didn't. The way she was super playful when she was happy and comfortable, like a cat. The sound of her purrs. Th—

---

---

~~Jack~~

Bang. Bang. Bang.

“Julias!”

The hunter sank a bullet into the back of his sire's skull, and a mess of gore exploded outward, scattering and turning into sparks and embers, before becoming dust. The first bullet sent Julias onto his stomach, and the next two were done as the man became nothing more than a still corpse. Executed, like Jack had done to a hunter only moments before.

Jack stared on, mouth open, jaw hanging, as his sire faded. The man, half skeleton at that point, had held a smile, and gave Jack what could only be described as a loving look, before the telltale flames of a dead Kindred took him. His suit, his skin, his muscles, organs, bones, all of it, turned into ash as it vanished into an almost gentle puff of smoke and flame. In the darkness of the hallway, it was a soft light, something that lit the faces of everyone watching, enough for Jack to see them.

The hunters did not look happy. Some of them looked a bit sad, if he was reading them right. Did they not want this? Sándor was out of commission, the brutal, ridiculously strong monster beaten by a Ventrue. Angela lay on the floor not far from Jack, trying to sit up, trying to see what had happened, but managing only the dry heaves of extreme nausea and pain.

As the small mound of ash that was once Julias spread over the dark hallway floor, Jack looked passed it, to Elen and her hunters, and found something different on her. She looked happy. Satisfied.

All Jack felt, was fury. Blinding, white fury. It coursed up through him, made pain disappear, and sent vitae pouring through his limbs. Thick Kindred blood engulfed his wounds, filled them, rendered them moot, as his vampire body demanded he moved, as the Beast demanded he moved. He needed to be able to move to kill them all, and he was going to kill them all.

Julias had been smiling. His sire had spent his last moments trying to save Jack's life, and died doing so. He'd spent his last moments smiling at him, in that typical 'this is alright, don't worry about it' sort of way. His last god damn fucking moments, and he did his usual 'you got this' smile.

Jack's insides wrenched, vitae mixing and coursing, while his muscles wanted him to vomit again, and again, and again. It wouldn't happen. All he could feel was every muscle in his body flexing, the memory of his sire's eyes, his smile, his ashes, hitting every nerve in his frame like fire.

Don't be dead, please don't be dead. God, please, please don't ... don't be...

The pile of ashes before him mocked him, a testament to yet another thing that was Jack's fault. Another thing he couldn't fix.

He squeezed his fists until his arms shook, and forced himself up, even as the world swayed before him. Kill them. Kill them. Kill them all.

“Stay down,” Elen said, her stupid old granny voice weak and pathetic.

He ignored her. Get up. Get the fuck up. Get up, kill them all. Ignore the pain, ignore the spinning world, ignore the wounds. Let it flow, let the blood flow, theirs and yours.

Stand up, he did. He demanded it, forced it, didn't care if his body was willing to do it or not. Vitae surged through him, Kindred blood fueling his will. Stand up. Stand up, and kill them. Kill—

White. Complete, total, all consuming, all encompassing white.

He froze and looked around at the white that surrounded him. It was the same white that had flashed in his vision when he executed that hunter. Endless white, as if God had decided to hit the reset button on the universe, but forgotten to turn off the light. There was no feeling or weight to it; might as well have been walking on floating clouds with the color depth of white plastic.

Without the hunters around him, without the smell of blood, without the pain of his wounds, his fury diminished, and his mind started working again. Where were the hunters, the blood, pain, and wounds?

“Oh ... kay...” What the fuck. He reached down and pressed on the floor, but his brain registered no feeling to it. Looking down did show that he was naked though. Naked, and without the wounds that Angela had dealt to him tonight.

Angela. He squeezed his knuckles as he remembered how many times she'd shot him tonight alone. A dozen? And those bullets really fucked him up, tore him apart. A bullet that went straight through was barely a wound to a Kindred, but a hollow-point round that tore up flesh and got lodged in the body, was a lot deadlier. Sándor smashing his head into a wall hard enough to crack the bone, had scrambled his circuits so bad, he hadn't been able to move. All those wounds had ceased to exist.

He sighed. Was he dead? He supposed it didn't matter, since Beatrice was going to kill him anyway. He was tempted to let her. She was going to blame him for Julias's death, in a moment of rage and grief, and she was going to cut into him. He'd let her. She'd say that he died trying to save a fucking kine, a human, someone Jack should have left behind long ago. He'd agree.

Maria and Michael? They'd punish him. Leaving his sweeper team early had no doubt earned some sort of punishment, but that spiraling into this, into his sire dying, was beyond horrible. They might execute him, as a warning tale to all other Kindred to always obey orders. Jessy and Damien would protest, but it's not like they could stop the two elders.

The white world he found himself in gave him a moment of peace, at least. The fury that bubbled through him, threatening to blister and boil his skin and insides, lessened, now that he was out of the scene. Without Angela's face to stare at, the heat in his guts lowered enough that he found himself fending off the rising need to cry.

Mary was dead, and now Julias was dead. Sighing, Jack clutched at his naked chest, and fell down, ass hitting the strange white surface, hard enough to elicit pain but finding none. He sat there, staring down between his knees at the white oblivion, and let the misery rise. His emotions were raw, and no matter how much he looked for his trusty logic switch, he couldn't find it. His earlier run-in with Mary had left his guts exposed, soul shredded, and nothing he could do now could hide its bleeding surface. Sadness, agony, regret, guilt, it all washed over him, digging at him with a knife in his guts.

Jack rolled up into a ball, and lay on his side. Julias was dead. Dead. His sire was dead. His friend was dead. Oh god. Oh fucking god.

After a minute of paralyzing agony, movement forced his eyes open, and he sat up with a jolt. He stared, eyes analyzing the strange, floating shadow that stood before him, and he gulped down on nothing.

If there was one way he was going to die, it'd be to a shadow monster on the plains of oblivion.

The monster creature stood over him, a flowing wave of mist, shadow, darkness, and wings. Onyx poured over itself, and from within the churning waves of its black smoke, he could see other things, too: claws, feathers, some red eyes that belonged on a snake, a beak ... with teeth, many things. It was like he was staring at an amalgamation of beasts, of the sort of creatures Kindred identified with. Crow, snake, fox, wolf, rat, pieces of those things were all there, inside this flowing mass of darkness that stood six feet tall.

It was a Beast. He knew it, somehow. Some part of him knew.

He was looking at his Beast.

The chains, though, he didn't understand those. Chains wrapped the shadowy creature, with enormous locks of rusted iron dangling from around its body. How could chains remain hooked around something that looked like it was made of smoke and shadow? Metaphor. It was a metaphor for being bound.

"... are you ... my Beast?" Might as well ask.

The monstrosity said nothing. It probably wasn't capable of it. But, despite the communication barrier, several of the flowing heads blinked their red eyes at him before disappearing into the murk of its body. One of them nodded.

“Am I ... dead?”

The monster shook its heads.

“Then, I don’t understand. What’s going on? Where am I? I—this is in my head, isn’t it? This is one of those ‘life flashes before your eyes’ sort of things, right?”

The monster nodded.

“And ... you summoned me, for this heart to heart? I suppose you’d want to have one, if I got us both killed.” With a sigh and groan, Jack forced himself back up onto his feet. “I really hate you, you know that? First person I ever killed was an innocent woman, and that’s on you.”

A blurry, shadowy image of her face appeared in the air, covered in blood, like some sort of holographic projection his mind decided to torture him with. His mind, or the Beast. Not the face of her on the news, either, but the face Jack was most intimate with, the dead Mrs. Pavala, the one he’d found when he’d awoken from his frenzy, with puncture marks in her neck.

“Yeah, her. Fuck you, you fucking ... monster.” Insulting it for its bloodlust made as much sense as insulting any animal for chasing a meal.

The image changed, to Julias, his final moments as a juggernaut of unstoppable ... protection. There was no rage on his face, just a cocky smile, and a concern for Jack written in his eyes, in a way only Jack would recognize.

Before Jack could say anything to this fucking abomination tormenting him, the image changed again. This time, he didn’t recognize it, and he stared, curious, at the two people. Julias, and Viktor. The clothes suggested sometime around World War I, and based on the positions of the two men, it looked like Viktor was draining Julias of his blood; and not by Julias's choice.

The image was more than the two men. Somehow, the Beast extended the scene, filling it, showing Jack the environment, the lighting, the smell, the sounds, despite it being a frozen moment. The beast also took the courtesy of giving Jack back his clothes and shoes whilst setting the scene, how nice of it.

Julias's mansion, or rather, Viktor's mansion, at the time, now surrounded them ... There was more though. Within Viktor, on him, around him, the shadowy waves of a Beast floated, normally invisible. And as the elder vampire killed Julias, preparing him for the embrace, the darkness of Viktor's Beast moved into the corpse, infecting, duplicating.

When Viktor set his bloodied wrist to Julias's mouth in the next frozen moment, and forced a heavy drop of the thick, dark liquid into Julias's mouth, the shadowy creature inside Jack's sire awoke.

There were chains. Jack walked around the two figures, frozen in time, and listened to the classical music playing in the background, as he watched a Beast be born within Julias. The shadowy creature inside Viktor had chains, just like the Beast floating next to Jack. And the new one, awakening inside the corpse that was Julias, had them as well. Dark, rusty things, that circled around and around the black cloud, sealed with massive stained locks, and a few dangling giant balls of metal.

"The ... the chains, they don't seem ... right. Do other Kindred have chains around them?"

The Beast shook its heads, somehow. Images of Kindred Jack knew appeared, Damien and Jessy and Natasha, Antoinette and others. Their Beasts were blurry, and lacked detail. Made sense, Jack supposed. If this Beast was showing him his family tree, it might have more detail to draw on, like a genetic memory. It was the only way it could show him something he'd never seen, Julias being sired. However it was doing what it was doing, his Beast knew the utmost detail of what came before it, but didn't seem to be able to show him much about other people.

There were only the swirling masses of shadow in the other Kindred, claws and talons, wings and beaks, and tails. No chains or locks or rope. The Beast was showing him what was hidden, secret. Jack knew. He didn't know how he knew, but he knew.

The Beasts in the others were contained within the Kindred, but they weren't chained, bound, limited. The prison that wrapped Jack's Beast, and Viktor's, and Julias's, wasn't normal.

Before Jack could inquire about how his inner monster was able to see other Beasts, the myriad of Kindred shown to him vanished, as did Julias, Viktor, and the mansion. The white world grew hazy for a moment, before shapes grew solid, and the familiar comfort of streets, walls, and windows surrounded him. He didn't recognize the place though, except that it was night, and it was outside. He was on a thin street, and a glance down showed the road was cobblestone, not asphalt or anything like that.

There weren't any people outside, and the street lamps weren't lit. Lit being the operative word. Wherever he was, it was a period of time before electric street lamps, but street lamps nonetheless.

Beside him, between two buildings of warped wood and bent stone, was Viktor. He didn't look anything like the Viktor Jack remembered. His long hair was disheveled, a mess around his torn and dirty clothes. Very old, very dirty clothes. This must have been over three hundred years ago. A tall woman was hugging him too tight for a normal hug, and Jack stared as the curvaceous woman sank her fangs into his grandsire's neck.

This was the moment Viktor was embraced.

Jack stepped in closer, and blinked as he realized the woman, a blonde with pale skin, and legs almost as long as Antoinette's, had her thighs spread. Viktor was having sex with her. Man, if people knew this was the circumstance Viktor was in when he was sired, poor and fucking a whore, it'd have damaged his image greatly. The woman was beautiful though, and Jack stared a little harder than he should have at how her white rags around her legs were spread, and chest pulled down, exposing one of her large breasts.

This woman was a vampire, though, and from the feel Jack was getting from her, she was no fledgling. She had some decades on her. Centuries. This elder, this woman, who seemed perfectly content to play the role of nothing more than a 1600s prostitute, was killing Viktor, mid sex, so she could embrace him.

“Who ... is she?”

The Beast did not respond. Of course it didn't. It didn't seem to be able to use words, and everything it showed Jack was a combination of the five senses, scents and sounds, taste and touch, and things to see. Jack could feel the air of the night, wherever they were, and he could hear the clop clop of shoes and hooves against the cobblestone, despite how everything was a single frozen moment of time. He could hear Viktor's quiet moans, and her moans matching his, despite how tightly her lips were sealed on his neck. She was enjoying herself.

“Did they know each other before this? I find it hard to believe she'd sire him if she just ran into him, randomly, and offered a quick fuck in a dark alley.”

Sure enough, the image changed. It cut to an earlier time, maybe a few years earlier; he could only tell because Viktor looked younger. Younger, and far better off. He wore a pretty fancy suit fitting the time period, and was sitting at a table with other people and fancy utensils. The woman was there again, but judging from where she was sitting and where her eyes were glancing, she was with another man. Not a vampire though. A ghoul, maybe? The only Beast at the table was her, and like the Beast taking Jack on this ridiculous journey through the past, the chains still wrapped her.

So Viktor had been well off in life, and the vampire woman, likely having some games with her nightlife, was involved somehow. At this point in history, it wasn't like she had to worry about technology. She could probably dress up as a prostitute whenever she wanted, or pretend to be a luxurious, rich woman whenever she wanted. Whatever this stranger was doing, she was drawing the eyes of multiple men, and one woman, at the table. She wasn't a Daeva, she was a Ventrue, and it was through sheer confidence and allure, that she'd captured everyone's attention.

The Beast inside her struggled, fighting against its chains, but the woman only smiled.

The image of the inside of the large establishment vanished, and so did the characters within. Wiped away like sand, the white oblivion that surrounded him appeared for a second, before it disappeared again as another image overlaid it.

Jack gulped, and stared at the sight of three naked women, writhing on a bed. A man sat in a chair beside them, but whoever he was, he looked thoroughly drained. He was dead, naked, body completely still on a very hard looking wooden chair. The signs of a Kiss victim were blatant, along with what looked like the liquid remains of a very, very good time on his crotch.

There was a man behind him, too, standing behind the chair, blending into the shadows. A Mekhet or Nosferatu using Cloak of Night, maybe? Whoever he was, he had a Beast, though no chains bound its form. He wore black robes that hid him from head to toe, and Jack could only just barely make out an expression on his face from within the hood: disappointment. His eyes were cast upon the bed, on the three women writhing on it.

Jack looked back to the women on the ancient-looking bed. He guessed it was a feather mattress, and some fur blankets, all on a bed frame that looked like it was made of the same sort of carved, curvy wood the chair was made of. He looked up and around, and frowned as he analyzed the walls of logs, and a nearby stove made of stones. Was that safe? Didn't stones crack and break when hot enough?

Knowledge of antiquated technology aside, he could only guess he was maybe a couple centuries before the moment Viktor had been sired. Not long after the Medieval Ages then, if he was guessing right. That alone made what he was looking at pretty unique. Three women, naked, rubbing each other all over.

The woman in the middle was human, and she was being Kissed, the long deep Kiss that'd eventually kill her. It was the woman who had sired Viktor. Her legs were spread, and Jack could see the sexual juices between her thighs, a mix of a man's, and her own, as the two women fingered her. Both women were draining her, and it was obvious the woman in the center, his great grandsire, was having the time of her life as she was brought closer and closer to death.

Then, one of the women beside her, a pale, short woman with long black hair, set her wrist to the woman's mouth. A Beast awoke inside the woman between the vampires, like someone tossing fire onto a dry parchment. The black, twisting abomination awoke within her, and grew within moments. Only the chains that surrounded it kept it from overwhelming her.

Jack stood beside the bed, and stared down at the naked women responsible for the siring. While her friend was a tall, curvy woman, red hair with freckles, it was the brunette that was Jack's great, great grandsire. She looked young, too young to be in a threesome. Looks were deceiving though, and upon inspection, he had to admit she looked older than Natasha; which wasn't a fair comparison he supposed, since Natasha looked far younger than she was. And of course, Jack looked younger than his age, too.

Age aside, he took a moment to analyze her. A bit over five feet, with some curve to her for a small woman, more muscle and health than he expected anyone from this time period to have. She'd been groomed for her embrace, then, as the dead and soon-to-be undead woman between her and her vampire friend must have been.

And the brunette's Beast struggled against its chains as well. Whatever these chains were that other Kindred didn't seem to have, they went back a long, long way into Jack's family history.

"I don't understand. Why are you showing me all of this? ... and how? Last I checked, I'm currently about to get captured by Angela and a bunch of hunters. I don't have time for this soap opera! None of this helps me." Or did he have time? Speed of the mind. Speed of thought. Speed of the subconscious. It was the only possible explanation.

The image changed again, and suddenly they were in the streets of what he could only guess was some old city in Europe. Jack's history sucked, and his geography sucked too, but considering how old it all looked, and how horrible it smelled, it had to be the medieval ages now. The darkness hid many details, and damn it was quiet. This was an age when people actually slept during the night, when they hid in their homes from wolves and crusaders alike.

"Holy fuck. How far back can you remember?" he said to the hovering, smoky mass beside him. "How far back can ... I remember? Fuck, will I even remember any of this, when I snap back to reality?" No, he imagined he wouldn't. Maybe a haze, like a dream. Whatever was happening to him wasn't normal, and it wasn't something any other Kindred had ever spoken of. Torpor dreams could be strange and vivid, but this was something else.

The Beast said nothing, but it showed him everything. It looked up with some of its heads, and Jack followed its gaze up to see the moon, half hidden in clouds. There weren't any street lamps anymore, nothing lit. There were a couple people moving around with lanterns held in hand, always in pairs, and they had rags held up to their face. Yeah, it smelled horrible, nasty horrible, and the rats were everywhere.

Jack froze, and slowly turned around in a circle. Rats. The rats were everywhere. Crows sat upon the sloped roofs of the old buildings, stone and wood, and they cawed into the night air, as the rats scurried along the walls. It wasn't them that smelled, it was the shit, and the bodies.

A body sat in the street beside him, on his side and clutching his stomach. Dead. Dead for days actually, considering how sunken the skin was, and how some rats were gnawing on his toes through worn shoes. Another body was beside him, a woman, and they were thrown over each other like they knew each other. Family, maybe. There was no way any city would leave corpses in the streets like this. They stank horribly, and since the smell was mixed with shit from an ancient and horrible plumbing system, Jack didn't have to work very hard to figure out what time period he was in.

This was during the Black Plague. What in the actual fuck.

“Ok, I'm guessing you're showing me our bloodline. And so far, it seems like our bloodline is Julias, to Viktor, to another elder vampire, to another elder vampire.” A short chain of people, very powerful people, forged over centuries. He turned to face the hovering Beast beside him, and glared at it. It simply hovered there, chains dangling and clinking, before it moved to a window.

And then Jack was inside the building. A house from this era wasn't exactly clean or luxurious living. The houses were decently large, two floors, with glass windows that were difficult to see through. The Beast took him upstairs, and he followed, expecting creaks and groans from the wood, but finding none. It wasn't real, just a moment in time, and nothing Jack did would affect it. He couldn't change the past; assuming this was the past, and not some sort of pre-death hallucination.

The woman, the small one with the black hair, his great, great grandsire, was kneeling in front of another vampire, a man, someone dressed in the garb of the church. Lancea et Sanctum? Whatever was happening, it wasn't good for her. She was on her knees, a drawn circle surrounding her, and various objects peppered the floor. A crucifix, complete with Jesus, and other things sat around the circle: a spear, a necklace with a cross, and other objects Jack didn't recognize. The vampire standing in front of her was chanting something in Latin, and reading from a book that was definitely not the Bible. Testament of Longinus, maybe?

The chains, the invisible, circling, encompassing, stifling chains on the woman's Beast, weren't present. No, wait, yes they were, just half invisible. They were coming out of the circle, out of the floor, out of the objects the priest had laid around. Not priest, bishop, a member of the Sanctified probably. Only in the moment of this freeze frame, was her Beast bound by the chains. Jack's ancestor screamed and shrieked, pounded her hands against the air, but could not escape whatever sort of binding circle the bishop had created. It was like that barrier Jack dealt with tonight, the ones the hunters made with some black powder. Magic? Theban Sorcery, like what Lucas had used against the Prince?

The bishop was doing something to Jack's ancient predecessor, binding her Beast, limiting it. Why? Why not just kill her, if he wanted to stop her.

Wait. This was the man who was watching the threesome, the one with disappointment on his face, the guy standing behind the dead dude on the chair. What sort of insanity was going on? Who were these people? This ... this must have been like the madness in Dolareido, the strange relationships between ancient Kindred, manipulating each other. The Danse Macabre. There was no way his Beast would be able to explain to him the complicated relationships he was seeing unfold before him.

With a swipe of one of its shadowy limbs, the Beast wiped away the image, and replaced it with something new. Same city, same stench of dead, same scurrying of rats in the dark, and fluttering of crow wings against the cloudy moonlight. Dozens of shadows, dozens of moving bodies, dozens of tiny eyes in the obsidian death of the night.

No, not the same. There were far more rats, and far more crows. The two animals, denizens of cities as much as any kine or Kindred, overflowed the streets, poured down alleys, and scurried up the warped, aging wooden walls of homes. No living walked the street, not this late, and what should have been silence, was a constant white noise of rat claws on rock, and rat squeaks. The hundreds of crows that sat upon building roofs made no noise, except for some occasional wing flutters and caws. White noise, a lot of it, to the point it was overwhelming.

Jack stared at the mountain before him, something very out of place in the road. Ten feet high, the mound covered the street completely, and spread out onto all the streets that connected to what Jack guessed was some sort of town center. The mountain didn't belong there. Neither did the woman sitting atop it. But there she sat on a simple three-leg wooden stool, a big grin on her face, and her manic eyes staring down at the havoc she'd wrought.

The mountain, was made out of bodies. At least a hundred bodies, piled onto each other, bleeding, rotting, and providing a feast for the rats. The little creatures gnawed and chewed at the flesh of the dead, and the woman upon them smiled down at her flock. Blood soaked her face, moonlight catching it enough for Jack to see her. She was wearing loose rags and trousers, and a hat, something a farmer would have worn. Dressed like that, she looked like nothing more than a simple tradesman, her curves hidden by the rags.

She held a sickle in one hand, bloody, dripping, and she held the severed head of a corpse in her other.

Jack gulped as he stared up at her. While the scene was frozen, he could hear her chuckling, and feel the bloodlust flow from her, down over the corpses, and onto the rats and crows. Her army. They scurried around her, moving yet not moving within the frozen memory. A crow perched on her shoulder, and another perched on her hat, a human finger in its beak.

This was the brunette from before, the small woman, his great great grandsire. A serial killer.

No chains bound her Beast, and the more Jack stared, the more she didn't feel like a Kindred. Her Beast was huge, an enormous creature that mixed into the shadows of the streets, the windows, the sky, everything. So titanic and colossal, a gate to Hell must have opened up, to let such a creature out onto the plains of human existence. Free. The Beast within this monster was free to rampage and roam, slaughter and bathe in blood, and indulge every base desire it had. The Black Plague itself couldn't have been its doing, but that didn't mean the woman and her Beast half didn't take advantage.

She was a monster, a bloodthirsty monster upon her throne of corpses, and the rats and crows obeyed her.

"I ... I don't understand. She's ... she's a Ventrue, right?" He looked to his Beast, and frowned at the chains that bound it. Bound as it was, his Beast was the same size, shape, and moved in the same way the other Beasts it'd shown him had, of other Kindred not in Jack's bloodline. Another glance to the short woman sitting atop the bodies showed that hers was different. It was more than just its size, it was how it moved, lifting into the air and burying the area in its invisible shadow.

This was a massive Masquerade violation. No Kindred who saw this would let her live. There was no way out of it, no way to explain the situation that didn't involve 'dark creature of the night' in the response. She must have been a menace, and any Kindred who found her would kill her to keep their kind secret. Did the Masquerade even exist in this age? It had to, in some form or another. Maybe it didn't go by that name, but no vampire wants to get caught, or have their food source be enlightened on how to deal with their hunters.

He looked down at the bodies, and the rats that poured over them. The little creatures came out of holes between the limbs, and some holes in the bodies themselves. They were getting fat on the carcasses. Chittering, scampering, they moved with the same one-minded swarming motion that the rats he'd once summoned had. This use of Animalism was awe inspiring, and Jack couldn't help but take a step onto a corpse, and then another, as he stared at his great, great grandsire. Closer he came, closer, ignoring the way the rotting flesh felt under his feet. It didn't respond to him, not really, being a memory and all that, but his Beast was content to make sure he felt it against his shoes. The texture of flesh, some old, some new, coagulating blood, bones, he felt it all through his soles.

At the top of the small mountain, he squatted down beside the stool and the woman who sat on it, and he stared at her eyes. No remorse there, no regret, nothing to suggest compassion for the damage she'd done, or for the damage she was helping magnify. The Black Plague had killed tens of millions, maybe even over a hundred million people in its time. Any vampire with an agenda would have found it easy to take advantage of the carnage, and thrive, immune to disease as they were.

But this woman didn't look like she had an agenda. She looked like she was enjoying herself, with her army of rats and crows. A queen on her throne, a queen of mayhem and destruction. In a city, rats and crows were everywhere, and would come as a natural choice to any Kindred looking to use Animalism. But to use it on this scale, and to pile up bodies like this? No Kindred would do that, and an elder would have struggled to create this mess. This woman looked like she'd been enjoying her midnight stroll, and had randomly decided to summon an army of animals while she slaughtered a hundred people, for fun.

Fuck, she looked like a psychopath.

“So this is what ... what she was like, before someone chained her other half down?” He looked down the bodies to his Beast, and it stood at the base of the corpse pile, a pale shade of the enormous silhouette of wings, claws, beaks, fangs, snouts, eyes, and feathers his great, great grandsire's Beast displayed. “But, she's not like other Kindred. What happened? What—”

It all vanished. In a blur of black and red, shadow and blood, the images turned into mist, and the textures, the sounds, the horrible smell, it all went away. Jack was left standing on the endless white oblivion, same as before, and his Beast, still wrapped in its chains, was now level with him, hovering beside him.

By this point, Jack knew to just wait, but his mind drifted to where he was a minute before this insanity occurred. He was in a hallway, with Angela, Elen, Sándor, a bunch of hunters, and the ashes of his sire, and friend. He was going to die, the moment this alien entity stopped this journey through his ancestral past. It all felt so pointless, and yet, he wanted to know.

The white oblivion vanished, and darkness replaced it. Jack spun around, looking for his guide on this horrible 'A Christmas Carol' rip-off. It was there, hovering beside him, chains still occasionally making their clink clink sounds, and it did not waver, as the world around them descended into the depths. Down, and down, the world sank, and the familiar darkness of earth and its swallowing mouths enveloped them. Tunnels.

Deeper, and deeper, and deeper, down slopes of rock, down landslides of bat shit, down fungus and moss, down wet bones, down a spiral chasm of blanketing weight and cold humidity. Down, and down, into the awaiting arms of the center of the Earth. Each foot down was like a step into a graveyard plot. He could feel the dead above him, thousands, millions, billions. Ages upon ages of dead inside rock and dirt, inside petrified bones and trees, inside amber, inside the darkness that surrounded him.

A tiny fire was the only thing that separated the endless darkness, from the small woman. She wore some rags, dirty trousers and a ripped up shirt; must have not been too far removed from the time period Jack was just in then, by the looks of them. A decade, a century, or two? Hard to tell this far back in time. And upon closer inspection, he realized this woman, crouched and alone at the bottom of this pit, was his great, great grandsire again. She looked battered, but like any Kindred, she didn't bruise.

She was Kindred, and surprisingly, her Beast looked normal. No longer was it the giant, swirling mass of death and shadow, but something far more subdued, and sneaky. That was the normal essence of Kindred, to be subtle, manipulative, to hide in darkness and strike from it. The colossal Beast he'd seen in this woman when its chains were off was not that. But now, it had no chains, and it wasn't the titan he saw on the mountain of bodies and rats. It was normal; for a ghostly, inhuman presence.

There were circles on the ground, etched in with stone, the humidity and wet rock of the earth reflecting the small fire. In the center of the circle was his ancestor, and beside her was another vampire, someone who looked an awful lot like her. Way too much like her. Jack blinked down at the vampire, a stake through her shirt, straight into her heart, keeping her paralyzed.

His ancestor held up her hands, as if awaiting rain to fall onto her palms. Why? There was nothing down here. It had to be some sort of cave, the end of one, at the end of some sort of spiraling network of natural tunnels. No living thing existed down here except for insects and whatnot, so it wasn't like a Kindred could do much down here. Hide, sure, but without a regular source of human blood, living down here wasn't an option.

But he looked up to where his ancestor was looking, and froze. The flicker of her small fire was enough for Kindred eyes to see in the dark, but as he looked the crucified mayhem up and down, he wished it wasn't. Total, blinding darkness, would have been better than seeing this.

Only now did he notice the tree of black, and the bodies tied to it, hooked to it, split apart and spread along it. Once his brain registered what he was looking at, the rest of his senses kicked in. It was almost complete silence this deep in the Earth, and the only sound was the crackling of the small fire. It was cold, so far down, and wet. It was the smell that hit him, similar to the smell of the streets of the city he'd been in, but different. There weren't as many bodies, but there was no breeze down here, no fresh air of any kind to cycle out the smell of rot, blood, and shit.

Why was there a tree down here? How the fuck did a tree grow down here? It was dead, but it was big, no leaves but solid branches that had no trouble holding up the remains of what must have been thirteen bodies. Jack stepped closer to it, and eyed the symbols carved into the black bark. He didn't recognize any of them. None looked like the symbols Elen seemed to use, or the symbols the bishop had used, further in the future when he bound this woman's Beast.

Jack turned back to look at his ancestor. The image changed, jumping forward in time, and his ancestor now Kissed the paralyzed vampire. Sister, mother, daughter, he couldn't tell except that the resemblance was obvious. And that made the sight all the more horrific, as his ancestor sucked down the blood of another Kindred. Vitae addiction, and the Vinculum, were two of the three fears that stopped a vampire from feeding on another, but neither meant anything to someone who performed Diablerie.

And it was Diablerie. Jack stared, hands locked at his sides, as the image shifted forward again, and his ancestor was left holding not her relative, but a pile of ash in each palm. She had drained the relative of every shred of their blood and vitae, to the point it killed them. And if legend and myth were to be believed, his ancestor had absorbed more than her blood, but a piece of her soul. No one who performed Diablerie had to worry about suffering the Vinculum for their victim.

It sounded ridiculous, the idea of absorbing, devouring, destroying a soul, but he was looking right at it. His ancestor glowed with a new energy, almost like a new life, and it made Jack's insides freeze. It only grew worse as the woman got up, carried the ashes of her kill to the tree, and rubbed the ashes into the bark.

And when she did, the tree woke up. Flowing waves of black mist, lit only by the flickering flame, poured out of the tree, and fell upon the woman. The living shadow leaked out of the eyes, mouths, and nostrils of the corpses on the branches and trunk, some of them new, some of them old, some of them nothing but skeletons. It oozed from them, heavy, and fell upon the vampire, flowing over her, and coating her.

The air grew colder, and stiller than death, as his ancestor fell to her knees, and screamed. The sound was an explosion against the silent walls of the cave, and Jack almost jumped back as the image shifted forward again. The scream echoed for an eternity, crashing against the walls with nothing to deaden it. As the sound smashed into him again and again, Jack couldn't tear his eyes away from the small, pale woman with dark hair, and how the Beast inside her began to grow, and grow, and grow.

The little fire she'd built, a tiny thing of twigs surrounded by small rocks, struggled against the rising tide of obsidian mist. The lack of wind was the only thing keeping it alive, as the heavy fog descended from the tree, onto the woman, and the ashes of her kill. It swirled around her, crashed into her, and tore through her with far more inertia than mist had any right to use. It threw her to the ground, and bore into her, entering her without creating wounds, but as the flash-freeze images moved forward, each a second apart, he could tell she felt like it was shredding her apart. And when the mist started to pour into her through her eyes, she fell to her knees, and screamed up at the darkness above her, the tree, and the things on its branches.

As the Beast within her morphed and grew into a colossal titan of morphing shapes and shadows, something new appeared. Jack stared from her, to the tree of the dead, and he blinked at the silhouettes that appeared there. There'd only been dead bodies before, but now, there were flickers of black caught by the fire. Feathers? He peered harder, squinting, trying to make out what it was that now perched on the branches. Not crows.

Whatever it was, there was more than one. Their eyes opened, and began to reflect the fire light, glowing amber in the darkness; the eye glow was brighter than the tiny fire warranted. There were feathers, and wings, hugged tight to oval bodies, that sat upon claws, bird claws. Owls? What the fuck. Why were a bunch of black owls down here in this Hell pit, far below any source of life?

The owls, bodies as much misty shadow as the fog that penetrated and mutated his ancestor, looked down at her, and if owls were capable of showing a satisfied expression, it'd look like that.

The image and memory shattered as Jack's other half quaked, body of rippling shadows and evolving animal parts practically falling over; if such a hovering mass of darkness and limbs could technically fall. The darkness of the cave vanished, along with the dead tree, the corpses tied to it, the owls that sat upon it, and the ancestor. All that was left was the endless, white oblivion, the staging area for this fucked up conversation between Jack and his other half.

“So ... so that's it? Like, almost a thousand fucking years ago, my great great grandsire committed Diablerie, and ... and made the sacrifice to ... to ... a bunch of owls, and that gave her Beast great power? And then some Sanctified person chained it up?”

His Beast hovered back up to its full height, standing maybe six feet tall, chains clinking against each other as it came back to its full strength. Except, full strength wasn't really full, because it was bound.

“The reason you've been fucking with me, been ruining my life, is because of some ancient fucking ritual? Something that happened almost a thousand years ago, is haunting me?” He stomped toward the abomination, and tried to look it in the eye, but it had too many eyes, and they disappeared and reappeared in a constant, unending sea of shadow.

He was getting sick of shadows.

“That isn't fair! I didn't do this? This isn't my fault? This thing is ... is...” He fell back on his ass, and sat there, staring down at the white below him. Naked as he was, he felt exposed. Well, considering this was all happening in his head, it was tough to get more exposed than that. He was sick of the metaphors, too.

Another image appeared, and the Beast floated aside to make room for it. It was his ancestor again, his great great grandsire, the psychopath, and she was out in the woods. Her Beast was bound in chains, size shrunk to that of a normal Kindred; this was happening after that bishop had done his ritual on her. She was wearing old rags, and definitely looked worse off than she did than when she was sitting on a mountain of bodies. Hell, she looked like she was mid frenzy, a crazed look in her eyes.

Suspicions confirmed. The next freeze frame, his ancestor fell out of a tree on an unsuspecting woman walking by, and she drank her to death. Good god, what happened in the decades between these moments Jack got to see? How could this woman go from the horrible crimes of Diablerie, to the almost royal position of sitting atop the carnage of the Black Death, to this? By the looks of her, he had to assume this happened before she sired the blonde woman, if this was some sort of ancestral memory his Beast was taking him through.

Images overlapped, and Jack squinted as he tried to understand what he was seeing. It was her, on top of her, transposed, as if he was seeing her inner self. This new image was of her naked, and she had a big hammer in her hand. With the hammer, she smashed the locks and chains of her Beast. Slam. Crack. Slam. None of them broke.

The images started coming faster, and faster. Jack stood up, and braced himself against the onslaught of information. Her again, his ancestor, when she sired the blonde woman. Again, her, naked like he was now, and smashing a hammer against the chains containing her Beast. Then again, this time a new image, showing the blonde woman, his great grandsire, summoning a pack of wolves. Jack forced down the urge to vomit, as the next image showed the wolves flooding over a small village, killing the denizens within. All of them. And with her as well, he could see her inner self, hammering against the chains that bound her Beast. The next image, was of her siring Viktor. Again, he could see her hammering against her chains, to no avail.

The next image was of Viktor, engaging in some sort of torture of someone bound to a chair. The man was wearing a nice Victorian suit, and there was a candle nearby, giving Jack some idea of the time period, as he watched his grandsire murder a kine. Again, Jack could see the man's inner self, hammering against the chains of his Beast, getting nowhere. The image changed again, to when Viktor sired Julias, and the hammering of his chains continued.

The next image froze Jack to the guts. Julias, punching a woman. Based on the suit and her dress, it had to be sometime around World War I, so Julias was a fresh vampire. This was his wife, then. This was when he'd hit her, and spent the next century feeling guilty about it. And it showed in the man's inner self, a naked Julias, who took a single swing at his chains with a hammer, before he looked at the hammer, and threw it away.

The next, Jack saw coming. He didn't want to see this, but there was no way he couldn't look. Knowledge was bitter sweet, and no matter what it was, he was drawn to it, had to have it, even if it meant being sick. The sight of himself, dying in Julias's arms on a rooftop, bleeding out from stab wounds and the Kiss, was more than enough to accomplish that.

Jack took a step back, and held his guts, as he watched himself die. He watched the chained Beast inside Julias deposit a piece of itself into Jack, and sure enough, the alien creature grew inside him as well. Julias's inner self took a swing at the chains of his Beast too, trying to free it from the chains that bound it, but at least he swung with less enthusiasm than his ancestors. He was more than happy to keep the infernal creature inside him bound and limited.

Wait. Julias had said siring another robbed a Kindred of a piece of their humanity. That was the clue, the key. That was what was happening in each of the scenes, these memories that had been stored from Beast to Beast to Beast. Each time, it was when a Kindred was doing something that cost them a piece of themselves, struggling against their Beastly urges.

He knew what was going to come next, then. He wished he didn't.

The Beast beside him snarled, and drew forth the image of Mrs. Pavala. Him, killing her, draining her when he was in a frenzy. And there Jack was, hammering away at his chain, oblivious, not realizing what he was doing. Then there was when Viktor had cut him in half, down the face to the crotch, getting his blade an inch deep through his whole body. Holy fuck, Jack may as well have been a zombie after a wound like that, and the only reason he wasn't dead, was because he ignored the pain, pushed it down, and found a way to make himself move.

Slam. Within the frozen image, memory-Jack slammed the hammer down on the locks and chains of his Beast. Tapping into that animal will, was a part of how he'd dragged his ruined body across that floor, to kill Viktor and Tony.

Another image came. When Jack had reached out, grabbed Damien's mind, the mind of a far more powerful — if troubled — Kindred, and Dominated it. Slam.

It was when Angela made her appearance, that the images came at him rapid fire. When she stabbed him, cut into him, and when Jeremiah had as well. Slam. Slam. Slam. When Jack had broken through the spell of the handcuffs, Dominated those hunters, and had them cut off his hands so he could escape. Slam. Slam. Slam. But the locks refused to break.

It was when the image showed him summoning the rats at the prison, that Jack took a step back, and almost screamed. Memory-Jack wasn't using a big hammer anymore, it was using a fucking sledgehammer, a massive one, meant to be used by two hundred-plus pound men, breaking rocks. And memory-Jack smashed it against the locks of his Beast with as much strength as a Kindred could provide. Boom. Boom.

Then, when Jack fought Angela inside the nightmare, tried to kill her, failed to kill her. Boom. Boom. More strikes. Heavier. Faster. When Jack found out his mother was in the hospital, dying, and his sister was dead. Boom. Then, when Jack fought Angela in the hospital. Boom. Boom.

Then, when he watched his sire die. The sledgehammer grew bigger, darker, to the point it was the size of Jack's body. And somehow, seeing Julias die, had been enough to make memory-Jack lift that fucking thing, and bring it down. Kaboom. Kaboom.

And now, the enormous sledgehammer was in Jack's hands. He looked down at it, at its sudden appearance, and he gasped. So heavy he could barely move it, left alone lift it.

The images disappeared, morphing into nothing but black sand that faded away. Dust in the wind. But the Beast wasn't done with him yet. As the sand flowed off into eternity, a few scattering remnants swirled together, and formed Julias at his last moments. A man, on his knees, half skeleton at this point, and a warm smile on his face as he looked at his incapacitated child.

The small smile meant a million things.

I'm proud of you, Jack. You'll get through this. These hunters won't stop you. You kidding me, Jack? After the shit you've done, you'll take care of these punks.

Tell her for me, Jack. Tell her I love her, and she should move on; after an appropriate amount of grieving time, of course. Don't push her, Jack. She'll close in to herself, hide in her catacomb again, hate the world, and you should let her do that, for a little while. Give her some time to mourn, and then, give her a push, would you?

Tears filled Jack's eyes. His inner self was content to hit him with all the agony and misery that came with watching Julias die. He clutched his gut with one free hand, and leaned forward, letting the weight of the sledgehammer in the other prevent him from falling on his face. Tears fell onto the white endlessness, and they were red.

“Oh fuck you. Crying blood tears? Give me a break.” He raised a hand to wipe them away, and laughed at the streak of red across his arm. Funny, they weren't actually blurring his vision red, but red they were. The Kindred metaphor was nauseating. “Is there even any time for ... for anything? We've been in here for a while.”

A window appeared before him, two, in the shape of eyes. Yeap, that made sense, if this was all happening in his head. And, predictably, through the windows and their onyx borders, he could see the hallway of the hospital. Blood was everywhere, Angela's, Sándor's, Jez's flowing from around the corner, and now ashes coated a large portion of the hallway floor. It was dark, hallway lights off, and only the flashlights of some hunters, some light from the patient rooms, and the light from the primary room where the hall connected, provided any illumination. Considering the hospital was in low light mode, the flashlights were the primary source of light, and that wasn't exactly a lot.

Elen sat in the back, a hunter holding her wheelchair's push handles. She had a grin on her face, and her fingers were netted together, indexes tapping each other. If she'd started mumbling 'excellent', it would have been fitting.

Angela sat against one wall, and Sándor lay on the floor, thoroughly beaten and destroyed. If Angela had been a normal human, she'd have gone fetal, too. But somehow, the fucking demon woman had mustered up enough strength and will to get her hands under her, and start pushing herself up.

Angela. Her words had sealed Julias's fate. Things could have gone differently, maybe, but she'd decided to order his death, instead of capturing him. Stupid. She did it to hurt Jack. Reasons piled on reasons, to do whatever he could, to get revenge.

"I guess we're just frozen in this moment, so I can sit on the precipice of this god awful decision, until the end of time." Sighing, he looked to the bound Beast beside him. "I don't want to die. And I'm not going to give some courageous speech about needing to save the people I love. Honestly? I really don't want to die. I want to keep living, spend a century or two or three in Antoinette's arms. I want to save my mom, too, and give her another chance at life.

"And I want revenge. I want to kill that bitch, Angela. I want to kill that bastard Jeremiah. I want to kill that fucking traitor Begotten. I want to kill the old woman Elen. I want to kill the hunters, at least the ones that knew what their bosses were up to." He tried to lift the hammer. Holy fuck it was heavy. "But, I won't become a Draugr to do it. I won't just become a mindless host for a stupid Beast with nothing but an impulse to feed."

The Beast pulsed for a few seconds, before it brought up the image of the mountain of corpses again. His great, great grandsire sat upon it, on her stool, and she looked happy. Psychopath happy, but happy. She also looked immensely powerful, and not at all mindless. Draugr were supposed to be nothing more than animals, and this woman looked like a queen, bathing in her power.

What would that mean for him? The fuck did any of it mean? He didn't know what the symbols meant, when his ancestor had performed Diablerie; hell he barely knew a thing about Diablerie, secret and taboo as it was. He didn't know anything about the black, dead tree. He didn't know a thing about the dark, shadowy owls on its branches either. Trying to wrap his mind around the hundreds of years of history, of the Danse Macabre, of political machinations, deceptions, and apparently, the curses and magic that led to his present circumstance, was impossible.

All he knew was, the only chance he had at surviving the present circumstance, was with the help of this fucker, wrapped in chains.

“We save Mom, right? Much as I want to kill Angela and the others, the priority here is saving Mom.”

The Beast nodded, as much as it could, a few heads — rat, wolf, crow, owl — emerging from its billowing mass to oblige him.

Sighing, Jack looked down at the sledgehammer. It took two hands to lift it, and more than that. It took will. It took effort. It took hate. He summoned up his rage, his fury, grimaced as he glared at the dark, wooden handle, and took a deep breath as he forced his determination into his grip.

He wouldn't die here. He refused to die here. Come what may, he'd survive this, and he'd make sure the hunters wouldn't. He'd make his own mountain of bodies, and summon the crows and rats to feast on their corpses. He'd drink their blood, and dance in a river of flowing crimson.

He'd kill them all.

With a heavy grunt, he lifted the sledgehammer, glared at the Beast, its chains, and slammed the enormous weight down against the rusty metal. Kaboom, the endless white oblivion around him trembled, rippling under the impact. One of the locks, already withered and damaged by memory-Jack's previous attempts, shattered. The next lock did the same. Kaboom. With each lock, the Beast before him grew, and grew, and grew, as the white wasteland shuddered in an earthquake. A swirling wind of black fog fell upon them both, circling them, enveloping them in a tornado Jack could not see past.

It felt hungry. It felt angry. It felt frustrated that its territory had been violated. It felt disturbed that the kine before it weren't bowing, begging for their lives. The swirling black closed in on him tighter, and the Beast before him grew larger, and larger, until its mass overshadowed Jack completely.

In the future, there would be a struggle between him and this creature, a fight over his body and mind. It happened before, and to all Kindred, and it'd be a hundred times harder for him now.

That didn't matter. Saving his mom, and revenge, saving his own life, they were all that mattered. Jack frowned up at his other half, and brought the hammer down. Kaboom.

Sorry, Antoinette.

~~Damien~~

He shouldn't have been doing this, and Maria knew it. The sun would be up in less than an hour, and Damien was injured. The only reason he'd agreed to Maria's request was because Fiona's blood had managed to heal him considerably, and her spider webbing cast on his leg functioned surprisingly well. And, of course, he agreed because it was Maria, and he couldn't say no to her. If he did, he'd risk the Lancea et Sanctum, or his life.

It was a beautiful night, though. Without a cloud in the sky, the blackout allowed the stars and moon to shine through over the district. It didn't fit the dread he felt in his guts, but there was no denying the beauty of the night sky when the city's lights were off. He'd lived in Dolareido for over seventy years, fifty of them as a vampire, and had watched the city embrace almost every vise. With each one, the amount of lights the city kept on during the night grew, until the stars were practically a faded memory.

He jumped up onto a roof overlooking the hospital, and walked up to the thrall standing there.

“Report,” he said, and the thrall jumped, almost squeaking with surprise.

“Um, sir Burksen, sir! All communications are down, and—”

“What’s going on in the hospital.”

“Sir.” The man, dressed in a black trench coat not unlike Damien’s, pulled out some very large binoculars, night vision equipped most likely, and resumed scanning the hospital. “Mister Terry entered the hospital some time ago, and Mister Mire entered not long after. Not long after the black out, six people wearing coats entered the hospital together. They got out of their car after the blackout, making a report impossible. And even if we could have, six people exiting a car is common at a hospital. Lot of families visiting.”

“Then how do you know these were the hunters?”

“Timing, and the way they walked. Most people walk toward a hospital slowly, like they’re afraid of it. These six walked toward it with a purpose.”

Sighing, Damien walked up to the roof edge, and held out his hand. The thrall gave him the binoculars without question.

“See anyone else suspicious out here?” Damien scanned the hospital. The night-vision annoyed his eyes, and he flicked it off. Kindred vision was almost as good anyway.

“No sir. We suspect snipers, but there’s just no way to be sure.”

It’d have taken a large team, and weeks of planning, to make a surrounded location like a hospital in the center of a key district in a large city, even remotely safe against snipers. But, sniping was difficult, very difficult, and that was their only saving grace in this communication darkness.

“Hear anything?”

“There’s been some gunfire in the hospital, a lot of it, but it’s died down.”

Frowning, Damien looked down at the thrall’s equipment. A sniper rifle for the trained marksmen, and some other standard provisions: food, communications equipment, and such. He didn’t have any sort of directional microphone that would let him hear specifics, if one of those things even existed. Perhaps Damien should inquire with the Invictus?

“Gunfire. See any muzzle flashes in the windows?”

“No sir. But I only have the West and Front wall covered from here. And most of the windows are patients’ rooms.”

“I—” Damien froze as the familiar sound of gunfire sounded off from the hospital. “East Wing.” Kindred hearing to the rescue. “Stay here. If you see those six hunters, any of them, come out of the hospital, and they’re not being held captive by a Kindred, shoot them.”

“Yes sir.”

Ah, the joys of a thrall. Nigh mindless obedience. No need to argue with the person, or try and assert dominance like with a Kindred.

Nodding, Damien stepped up onto the edge of the roof, and looked below. From his perch, he was facing the front of the hospital, and scanned one more time with the binoculars for anything out of the ordinary.

A quiet hum started, a white noise that rose above the unnoticeable threshold, and grabbed his attention. He handed the man back his binoculars, and raised a brow as he looked at him. Was the thrall humming? No.

He looked up, and felt his body turn to stone, as the stars started to flicker out of existence. First one, then another, then back into existence, then gone again. Then dozens, then hundreds. And as the stars hid away into the black, the growing noise grew louder, and sharper.

The flap of wings, and the telltale caw of crows, became a choir. A flock so vast it blocked out the sky, and so loud, it would have shook the heavens.

Death had come on wings.

Chapter 89

~~Jack~~

He started to get up.

“Stop!” one of the hunters said. “Stop, or we’ll keep shooting until you can’t get up.”

He continued to get up, a small grin on his lips. This was going to be fun. This was going to be so much damn fun.

“Shoot him,” Elen said, voice cold and hard. “Don’t kill him if you can help it.” Well, nice to know they still wanted him alive. It’d make this slaughterfest all the easier.

The bullets began. Just like with Julias, it was like staring into fireworks, all going off at once in the dark hallway, complete with the ear-splitting cracks.

The bullets crashed against his suit, tore through it, and slammed into his skin; but they didn’t penetrate. Hollow-point rounds were great at tearing flesh, but the Beast laughed as it hardened Jack’s body. Useless, weak, pathetic metal. The fools didn’t understand the only threat to him now, was fire, and they didn’t bring fire. Perhaps they feared damaging the hospital? Their loss.

As the bullets crashed into him, and fell to the hospital floor, he smiled more, exposing his teeth and fangs. Tilting his head, he glared at Angela, stared, and her eyes widened as she realized he was mobile. Somewhere in all the chaos, the barely conscious woman managed to find one of the dropped pistols. She brought up the gun, and fired it at him, but the telltale sound of click click announced the empty clip. Her jaw dropped. Wonderful. Perfect. Let her soak in her fear. Let her roast in it for that moment, before he ripped her asunder.

As the bullets continued to slam into him, his body began to regenerate. The metal lodged into him from earlier fell out of him, joining the mess of metal of other bullets falling to the floor. The flesh within mended. Bones reformed and sealed. Muscle sewed itself back together. Skin knitted over the holes. Easy.

The conversation he'd had with his Beast was a blurry, fading thing, like a dream. He vaguely recalled that he knew it'd be like that, that whatever he'd done, whatever had happened, he wouldn't remember the details. He remembered her, though. He remembered the short brunette woman, sitting on her mountain of bodies. He remembered the smile on her lips, the sickle in her hand, the farmer's hat on her head. He remembered the crows that sat on her shoulders and hat, and on the rooftops. He remembered the thousands of rats that scurried around her, between her feet and the feet of her stool, and through the bodies they gnawed on. He remembered the Beast that existed within her, and its titanic, overwhelming size.

That was him now.

His smile faded for a moment, as once the gunfire settled, Jack looked down at the ashes of his sire. Julias. Dead. His sire was dead. He'd died with a smile on his face, but that didn't change that they'd murdered him, killed him, destroyed his life and silenced his voice.

How dare they. How. Fucking. Dare they.

He raised his eyes again, and found the hunters staring, jaws dropped, confusion and dismay carved into their faces; they hadn't expected a vampire to suddenly be immune to bullets. The fear on their faces, the sweet, delicious sight of their terror, almost made selling his soul worth it.

Jack raised a wrist to his mouth, bit into it, and tore a chunk of his flesh out. The hunters gasped and backed away; maybe they'd seen something like this before. He doubted it.

Two hunters approached quickly, grabbed Angela and Sándor, and dragged them into the darkness with the other hunters. Their companions reloaded their guns, and pointed them at Jack, but didn't fire. They would soon, once they realized what he was doing, but he knew, and they knew, it wouldn't help them.

Jack swung his arm down at the floor, and splattered it with Kindred blood. A drop of will imbued into the flowing crimson kept it from burning into ash, and would keep it around for several minutes. And as the vitae set into the hospital floor, near the ashes of his dead sire, Jack could feel the pulsing wave of its power, his power. God, so much power, sweet, delicious, intoxicating power.

These kine couldn't see it, smell it, or hear it. They couldn't feel it. Jack felt it, and any Kindred in the area would. Any Kindred within a mile would. Each pulse a wave, each a thundering explosion, silent, unfelt, but blatant to any paranormal, he was sure. Others would know. That was fine, let them know. Let them witness his resurrection.

Five seconds after he spilled his blood, and created his summoning beacon, he smiled as he felt the call reach his flock. The room Julias had first used as cover had its door open, and as the fluttering noise in the background grew louder, one of the hunters turned to look in its direction. The noise grew louder, and louder, more fluttering, the sound of movement of small things in such number, it became a white noise; far too loud for white noise. Louder, and louder, and from all directions.

The cawing began. At first, just one, but one was the trigger that announced the flood. As if a host of angels — real angels, the ones in the bible, the freaky ones with extra mouths and eyes — had descended from the heavens to speak the word of God himself, a shrieking sound crashed against the hospital walls. The hunters jumped, spinning around and pointing their guns at patient rooms, and the two hallways, seeking the cause.

The banging began. Birds slammed into the windows, hard, hard enough to break beak and bone, hard enough to die. That was fine. His army would die for him; that's what armies were for, dying, in heaps and droves for their lord. Him.

The banging grew louder in only a few seconds, until it sounded like gunfire itself. Sturdy windows.

The hunter with the assault rifle moved forward, pointed at Jack, and started firing. Apparently this one had decided to spare their ammunition, likely having put some of it into Julias earlier, but not wasting any others until now. These bullets were not hollow-point. These bullets were meant to pierce. The only reason holes didn't punch through the hospital wall or floor, where the hunter had shot Julias, was because the hospital was built to survive a hurricane.

Jack smirked, and raised an arm, the injured limb already healed over from earlier wounds. The pieces of metal slammed into him, each hitting him with far more force than could ever be explained as anything but 'getting shot by a rifle'. The punch a proper assault rifle could give, combined with the pointed tip of the bullet, meant each bullet hit him with enough force to pierce through metal.

But they didn't pierce him. The vitae in him hardened his body, a mix of malleability and durability preventing the bullets from penetrating his skin. Metal slammed into him, and broke upon him, water against the shore. The hunter with the rifle stopped shooting, and Jack could see his jaw drop. Yes. Cower. Let the fear roll through you. Delicious.

Jack took a step forward, chuckling as he did. He felt good. He felt amazing. He felt hungry.

“You,” Jack said to the man with the rifle. “Come here, and kneel.”

Without hesitation, he came forward. Fool should have looked away before Jack could make eye contact, but fear had paralyzed him. His mind broke like tissue paper under water. One of the hunters reached out to stop him, but after a moment, she thought better of it. She turned around, grabbed Elen’s chair, and started wheeling the woman away.

She didn’t get far. The windows of the open patient rooms erupted, including Jack’s mother’s. An explosive force complete with an ear-splitting bang. Jack almost started to dance to the tune as more windows shattered under the impact of his servants. As the glass smashed inward, all the hunters turned to face the two open doors behind them, except the hunter under Jack’s Dominate. The man with the rifle continued forward, came up to Jack, and fell onto his knees.

As if to announce the man’s imminent demise, the hallway flooded with darkness. Loud, squawking, flapping darkness. The hunters threw their hands up over their heads, and tried to protect themselves from the onslaught, but the crows were unending. More of them poured in through the windows, and soon, patient rooms began to open. Crows were smart, very smart, and the only thing that stopped them from opening door levers was their absurdly small mass. That wasn’t a problem when there were hundreds of them working together.

“Stop their escape. Kill them all,” he said to his flock, “except for the Begotten. Capture the Begotten.” Traitors didn’t deserve death. Traitors deserved an eternity in the ninth circle of hell, in the frozen grip of Lucifer himself, or his maw, depending. Jack would recreate that Hell for this Begotten, while he still breathed. Heh, poor Judas.

Hundreds of crows became thousands. The swirling mass of endless black poured over anything and everything, like locusts, blanketing the walls, the floor, the doors, everything in fluttering obsidian.

Jack laughed as he held his hands out, and two familiar crows joined him. “Scully. Mulder. Is help coming?” The screams of the hunters buried his voice, but his voice was ancillary. Animalism was how he communicated with these friends of his, and now, it was easier than ever. As easy as being.

They both cawed a couple times, and clicked several more.

“Good. Unnecessary, but good.” They’d contacted the Invictus and the Ordo Dracul. Antoinette would send someone, probably Daniel, and the Invictus would send someone, probably his fellow Right Hands. What would they say? What would they do? Undoubtedly, there’d be some arguments over the Masquerade, and Jack would have to justify his actions.

No, he wouldn’t have to justify. What could they do to him? Nothing. They could do nothing.

He smiled down at his meal, who knelt patiently, waiting for him. With the crows swirling around him, a wall of flesh and feathers, it meant he was protected from outside interference, and free to begin drinking.

And drink he did. He motioned for his prey to come closer, and the man stood up, crouching enough for Jack to be able to reach his neck. Once he did, Jack grabbed him, hands on his shoulders, and he squeezed hard enough to break bone. This worthless maggot didn’t deserve a pleasurable Kiss. No, this was going to be agony.

The hunter screamed, and Jack laughed, as he sank his fangs into the man’s neck. The murder of crows flowed around him, swarming, swirling, a tornado of beaks and claws that spread out and flowed through the hall. Kill the hunters, kill them all.

The swarm of crows communicated with him using their caws, explaining to him what was happening as they did his bidding. Two of the female hunters went down, swiping and slicing at the birds with their knives, but there were too many. Jack could hear them, but seeing them was difficult; only small flickers of their bodies were visible through the walls of crows. Their screams were a siren's song, and he groaned in joy as he drank down his meal. The birds were pecking their eyes out, ripping their scalps apart, and their clothes could do nothing to stop the hundreds of claws and beaks.

Blood was going to fill the hospital, overflow it, pour through the halls and down its elevators and stairs. Blood was going to drown the patients and staff. Blood was going to paint its walls, counters, doors, everything. Blood would cover the building, by the time he was done warming up.

As Jack refilled his stomach on the blood of the shrieking hunter in his grip, the old thrill of murder tingled along his bones. Fuck, how long had it been since he'd done this, just crushed someone as he drank them? Must have been over six hundred years. God damn it felt good. So good, he pushed his hands together harder, and smiled into the screaming man's neck, as the hunter's shoulders collapsed inward, collar bone breaking, then his ribcage. Like popping a grape.

Blood splashed over Jack's body, as the hunter in his hands broke. Strong as Jack was, he couldn't get his hands to push all the way through, but he was content to get them within a few inches of each other. Flesh, bone, all became mush between his squeezing grip, the hunter's clothes an inadequate shield to keep the blood off of Jack's hands; and it was the only thing that kept the hunter from splitting in literal half.

Grape popped, blood drained, the broken, dry husk of a man was now useless to him. Jack threw him aside, and licked his lips. Yes, god yes, it felt good. It felt so damn good.

Scully and Mulder cawed a few times, and Jack shrugged at them. “I am different.” They clucked a few times more. Apparently, they weren’t entirely sure what to think of him. “Don’t worry. You’re still my favorites.” And they were, of course. That’s how it was supposed to be. Two crows to be his eyes and ears, and he wouldn’t throw those things away without just cause.

He stepped forward over the body, and toward the other two. Ah, two women. Screaming, crying, they died swinging, but it had done nothing. It was a pity he didn’t get to see it, with the amount of his servants he’d summoned, but the aftermath was plenty appealing nonetheless. Bodies torn open, crows biting at their brains through their now empty eye sockets, and much of their skin exposed as his servants pulled and tore it off. Stomachs torn open, intestines pulled out, organs pecked to bits in moments. If he’d had time, he’d have made some necklaces.

The liver was a nutrient powerhouse, and essential food. Had to have that. Brains, eyeballs, heart, kidney, all good, but the liver was the prime meal for his army. Of course, when dealing with thousands, nothing went to waste. He watched with a smile as his army ripped off their skin with their beaks, finishing the job they’d started while the hunters had still been alive moments before. While it’d been shame he didn’t get to see it, see the terror in their eyes as crow beaks punctured them, hearing their screams over the swarm had been delightful.

The swarming mass cawed their frustration, and Jack listened, Animalism the bridge that turned their chaotic squawks into noises he could understand, could interpret into sights and sounds. Several of the hunters had escaped back through the hole in the wall, and they not only took the woman in the wheelchair, but also the damaged one with the glass eye. And, according to the crows, the hole had closed up, and vanished.

“Fuck!” He turned, and punched the wall, hard. Vitae pumped through him, and the Beast within flowed outward freely, pouring into the limb, and causing his fist to sink into the wall. The hospital wall was some sort of concrete painted white, and it cracked and crumbled around his fist. The fucking bitch escaped him again. Again!

After a few moments, his smile returned. No matter, he’d find them again eventually. However it was the hunters were traveling around, it was magical, and it was limited. If it required a sacrifice to paint such a circle and create the portal, that was a limitation he could use to track them. And for all its power to jump from location to location, it seemed like the hunters couldn’t make the portal opening wherever they wanted. They had to manually go to a place first. Which meant the hunters were still somewhere in the city, coming out of a portal, and departing from such a location to head out, and paint more circles.

He blinked at the wall and his fist. The sight of the damaged wall stirred a strange dissonance in his mind. Jack could never punch concrete hard enough to nigh shatter it. Jack could, now, easily. Hell, he felt almost as strong as a proper elder Nos or Daeva now, in pure physical strength.

He squinted at the wall, and drew his hand back to admire the damage he’d done to his skin and bone. It was minor, and healed over quickly, far quicker than Jack normally could. Yes, he was different now, very different, and something about it tickled somewhere in his brain. The conversation he’d had with his Beast was such a blurry thing in his memory, and it was hard to pull out the specific words that’d been said.

It didn’t matter. What mattered was revenge, saving his mom, and everything in between.

More caws in the vortex announced the capture of the Begotten. They'd stopped one of the hunters from dragging him through the portal, pecking and stabbing, until the hunter was forced to abandon the monster.

“Yes, finally. How many fucking times have these bastards sneaked away? Not this time.” Capturing their enforcer wasn't as good as capturing Elen or Angela, or the MIA Jeremiah, but it was still a great step toward that goal. Now, time to collect the prize.

Jack stopped, and tilted his head to the side. In one of the patient rooms ahead of him, were two people, and the caws of his army announced both their arrival, and who they were. Antoinette, and Damien.

Jack held out his hands, and opened them, palms out. The crows went silent, and many of them flowed out the windows of the nearby half dozen patient rooms with open doors. Outside, he could feel their presence, feel their claws perch atop roof edges and power lines, feel their beady eyes scanning the darkness for any suspicious movement. A few caws from outdoors announced that the hospital exterior was clear.

Time to collect the prize, and talk to the Misses, then.

---

---

~~Antoinette~~

Blackout. It was a true blackout. Such power outages were rare in her city, where electricity was the lifeblood of its pulsing heart, and for power to cease was enough to elicit panic from many.

Such panic was a problem. The fire department was out in full swing, driving the streets, looking for the problem as best they could; no doubt their equipment was hampered by whatever spell the hunters had cast, forcing them to do things manually. Hospitals had backup generators to keep their patients alive and maintained, but for many night organizations, no electricity was paralyzing, and it left customers out on the streets, flooding the large sidewalks, and bringing traffic to a standstill.

The South Center Hospital, on the other hand, looked deserted. It was stupid of her to approach the hospital directly from the front, but it was also the fastest method. Time was of the essence, and she was not about to risk the Masquerade by jumping onto the building's side and charging in through a window. Admittedly, there were better routes she could have taken into the hospital, but she did not have the mind to plan that out. It had been a literal eight minutes since Jack's crow had arrived at her tower, and she had jumped rooftops to get to the hospital as quickly as she had.

Gunfire. She looked up at the building, and toward the East Wing. Too difficult to isolate the noise to the exact floor or room, but there was no doubt it was happening near Samantha Terry. There was no time. Go. Now.

She did not enter. She was about to, but a growing noise drew her eyes and ears, until she was forced to look upward. The stars were quite visible in the district, with all the lights out, and nothing protected Dolareido from the heavenly gaze of the stars above. It made her feel exposed. She had spent so long building this city, and with each decade that went by, the amount of light the city produced increased. For the roofs, the walls, and the windows, to be dark or only lit with gentle light, elicited a strange feeling, as if she were afraid of the dark.

No. This darkness, as alien as it was to her these days, was not what sent chills up her spine. The silence it brought with it did not upset her either. These were where Kindred were their most comfortable, between walls and shadows. And, as much as she originally thought so, it was not a fear for Jack that had her body trembling. She was not human, and she did not have adrenaline to trigger such a response. Vitae did surge through her, though, and it was in fear, but she did not know why.

Her mouth parted, and she stared up at the sky, as crows descended upon the hospital. Their wings hid the sky, and their growing noise became unimaginable. Not so loud as to damage her ears, but overwhelming nonetheless, heightened by the eerie silence of the district moments before. Cawing, the squawking bird noise that crows made, distinct, unique, wholly recognized as a sound of death and impending doom. It was all she could hear, as the sky became a moving tapestry of shadow and feathers.

It was as if a demonic entity had sliced open the sky, spilled its obsidian, endless blood over the stars, and from it, an army of black birds came to reap the souls of her city.

She was stunned. She tried to move, tried to tell herself to ignore the birds, and enter the hospital, but the sight was horrific and beautiful. The squawking birds numbered in the thousands, and the volume of their calls only grew as they came closer, and closer. As they began to lower themselves onto the hospital, Antoinette gasped, staring, as dozens of the birds matched speeds, and smashed their beaks into the windows.

Many of the birds died, and each that did hit the glass with such force, that even staring up from the parking lot, many feet away, it sounded like a gunshot to her ears. She flinched, something she rarely did anymore, as more birds destroyed themselves upon the glass, harder, sometimes in pairs, in trios, quartets, and quintets at the same time. They hit the glass hard enough, that the loud crack of their beaks against the windows echoed against the walls of nearby buildings.

It took them maybe twenty seconds, before the windows exploded inward, such was the force of their determination. As a hundred crows fell to their deaths, bodies of fragile bones smashed into pulp against their targets, the glass broke, and thousands of crows flew inward into the patient rooms. Oh no.

Footsteps behind her grabbed her attention; Kindred ears captured the sound as pure reflex, rather than conscious effort, so loud was the army of crows and their kamikaze mission. From the sound and the pace, it was a Kindred.

“Prince,” Damien said.

“Mister Burksen. I assume my love’s other pet found you?”

“Found the Invictus, yes. Madam Turio sent me.”

Antoinette frowned. This boy, a member of the Sanctified by Lucas’s choice, had become Jack’s friend. A frustrating position for Antoinette, who wished for nothing more than for the boy and his accursed religion to disappear. But, the man had proved his worth and reliability. If things continued as they were with Damien and Maria, Antoinette would have no choice but to eventually let them reopen the Lancea et Sanctum in Dolareido in an official capacity. She dreaded the thought, but she could not deny them for forever, lest the covenants feel her rule totalitarian. And that would lead to other troubles.

Even now she danced the Danse Macabre, as the sky parted to unleash its army upon the hospital. Sighing, she turned back to the building.

“Come,” she said.

“ ... uh ... you’re coming, yourself? Are—”

“My sheriff and my student are both hunting down the cause of this power outage, Burksen. I assume Turio sent you because the other Invictus are indisposed. Logic dictates that we work together, and rescue Mister Terry and Mister Mire.” She marched forward for the hospital front door.

“ ... alright. Then, I suggest we scale the building wall, and go in through one of the windows the crows are using.”

She stopped and looked over her shoulder at him. “The sky devours us with endless wings, and you wish to perform yet another violation of the Masquerade? Do you not think kine are awake, and aiming their phones about at this very moment, filming this?”

“I’ll Cloak us.”

“I can tell from the way you move that you are injured.”

“I...” Damien looked down at one of his hands, and the leg she noticed he was keeping his weight off. “I’ve fed enough to Cloak us. My injuries are irrelevant. I’m not going to let them hurt Jack.”

She blinked at the man, and tilted her head to the side slightly. Those were powerful words, and not words she ever expected to hear from Lucas’s child.

Looking at the man could not help but spark memories within her. This young man, just old enough to be ancilla, had cut off one of her arms and legs. He had stormed her home with weapons and zealots, and the two of them had shared barbed words. He had played his hand, exposed what he thought of her, what Lucas thought of her, and had sent his companions to their demise in order to defeat her.

And he had failed, because of Jack. To see them become friends in the months that followed would forever be the rarest of social interactions and changes of personality she had ever seen in another. That did not change that the sight of the man sparked anger in her, and she was not comfortable with letting a man who had taken a sword to her, help her. For all her power, even she was vulnerable to a swift hand with intent to betray, and stab her in the back if she lowered her guard. Though, considering his injuries, she was the one helping him.

It was not that she could not use the Cloak of Night herself, but it was certainly not a discipline with which she had had much practice. Daniel offered to spend the time and teach her, but instead, she focused on the abilities that came naturally to Daeva, and her pursuits in the Coils of the Ordo Dracul. To her utmost annoyance, Damien's suggestion was the better approach.

“Very well.” It took effort to keep the venom out of her voice. But now was not the time for such juvenile frustration; healthy paranoia, perhaps, but not childish antics.

The boy nodded, and summoned up his Cloak of Night. It was a subtle, hidden thing, for a Kindred to tap into their vitae, and encapsulate themselves, or others, in the aura of the Cloak. Humans watching would first have found their eyes sliding off the two Kindred, in such a way that did not garner attention. And then, as the full effect of a true Cloak of Night arrived, total invisibility followed.

The boy was powerful, to be able to encapsulate both her and himself in his Cloak, to the degree of total invisibility. Natasha could as well, but then, Natasha was a talented woman, and the Prince trusted her to handle herself with Daniel, despite how exhausted little Vola was after her return tonight. A talented Mekhet was a dangerous thing.

The two of them ran over to the hospital East Wing, from the outside, and looked up at the windows the crows were pouring in through. Such recklessness. Such insanity. Did Jack do this, or Julias? Their bloodline was impossible to predict, forever causing mayhem in her city with their surprising bursts of strength and talent. Viktor had ruled the Invictus under such strength, bullying his two fellow councilmen into submission. But Viktor was dead. Who was summoning the crows, and how were they managing such a massive number?

She sighed as she looked down at the dozens of dead crows at her feet. Neither Jack or Julias would be so cruel as to use Animalism, and send so many creatures to their death. But then, when Jack had escaped the hunters' torture, the reports indicated that many rats had died in his escape. Jack would never kill animals like that, never let himself become so drunk on violence and death, that he would kill hundreds of creatures to enact his will. Would he?

“It’ll take me a few seconds to climb up,” Damien said. “If—”

“Come.” She grabbed him, and threw him. The man’s eyes went wide, and he almost let out a yelp, before he managed to close his mouth at the last second. Fool boy was weightless in her grip, and she had no trouble launching him at one of the windows where fewer crows entered. If his Cloak failed, she would have to leave, and enter through the hospital front door instead.

It did not fail. Impressive. She leaped after him, keeping the distance between them small, so he would not have to extend his Cloak too far. Two vampires, dangling off a windowsill, outside a hospital. Très drôle.

How long had it been since she had left her tower, in pursuit of a mission? For decades now, over a century perhaps, she sent her thralls, or Daniel, to enact her will, to force the covenants into line, or to deal with kine who overstepped their limits. Not since the Purge had she truly used her own hands in such a way. She had forgotten the thrill of engaging things with her own fingers, to leave the safety of her tower, and seek out an objective, with purpose. She could not deny there was excitement to it, but any potential joy to be found was lost under the growing fear within her core. What had happened here?

She forced up the window -- better than risking damage on the broken glass -- and rolled into the room. Damien followed, silent and slick. His movements were terribly similar to Daniel, and she struggled to suppress both a smile and frown at the value and threat that represented. For now, she could trust him to watch her back, if only because she was standing and at full strength, while he was not.

The two of them stared down at one of the patients. The machines beside the man continued to beep, and the crows that filled the room avoided him. The ventilator continued, and the sensitive equipment such as the IV feeding into the man's body was untouched. The birds swarmed around the room though, and both vampires were forced to crouch to prevent them from hitting their heads.

The noise was immense. The birds were not trying to be stealthy, despite their seeming attempt to not accidentally kill or contaminate the patient in the room. They had somehow managed to open the door as well. She knew crows were intelligent, but—

As she stepped out of the door, she froze, and Damien froze behind and beside her. The two of them stared out of the hall, at the swirling maelstrom of feathers, and blood. The screaming of kine mixed into the chorus of caws, and Antoinette had to force herself to keep her hands off her ears in an attempt to block out the noise. The blood was everywhere, splattering and scattering across the whirlwind of flapping black shadows.

The hospital lights of patient rooms were low, with the hospital in low light mode on its generators. The lights of the hallway itself were off, and from the room they were entering it from, the two Kindred were looking down the hall toward the center of the hospital. And from there, their eyes were buried in the carnage and mayhem.

A body lay on the floor, and blood was splattered across the floor and walls, painting the white surface endless red. The clothes this person — a hunter, she surmised — wore, were torn to shreds, most of it removed and spread about, but enough of it remained for her to identify them. Birds, hundreds of birds, were tearing into the corpse, ripping flesh through the holes in their clothes with their beaks and reckless abandon. As if piranha had been given wings, the creatures devoured the body with enough mouths, and with such speed, that she could see bits of bone emerge before her eyes. The hunter was a woman, though the defining curves soon disappeared under beak and gore.

If anyone was alive in the madness, she could hear them no longer. The scream she heard a moment before was gone, and another scream, a woman's, rose to a banshee shriek, before it died off as well.

She wanted to move forward, to leave the doorway and enter the madness, find Jack, find Julias, but she could not. If she entered the pandemonium before her, surely the crows, an ocean of violence unhinged, would devour her; or at least, harm her to a degree she refused to underestimate. A whirlwind of claws and beaks was not to be dismissed lightly.

She peered at the flapping darkness, and after a few more seconds, she called out. "Jack? My love?" To get through the noise of the murder, both the act and the group of crows, she had to call loud. It would give away her position to any hunters, but it was worth the risk.

And, as if parting the Red Sea, the crows split apart. While many stayed on the floor, dotting it to the point they were wing to wing, eyes glistening in the flickering shadows, others continued to fly, soaring over along the ceiling, and along the wall. Many birds flew past her and out the window, clearing space, and in the mouths of the birds, was flesh. As the thickness of the sea of feathers lessened, the sight of more corpses drew her eyes. Disgusting, how the birds had shredded the clothes of these hunters, pecked out their flesh, destroyed their faces, tore off skin and chunks of muscle.

Antoinette had seen many forms of torture in her second life, and only a few were able to match the sheer animal brutality this senseless mayhem had brought forth.

Jack, her little Ventrue, stood only fifteen feet away. A crow sat on each shoulder, his pets, and the boy wore a smile. His suit was coated in blood, as was his skin, human blood that drenched him, dripped from his fingers, and flowed down his body. But the mess of gore was not what struck her cold, it was the strange smile on his face. She had never seen him wear such an expression.

“Annie!” the boy said, hands out as if to embrace her arrival, but not her physically. “Good news! Well, good and bad.” Annie? Not once, in the nigh two years she had known this boy, had he ever called her that. “Damien too, sweet.”

“... Jack,” she said. “Where is ... where is Mister Mire?”

“Dead.” Nodding, sighing, he crouched down, and the birds that covered the floor hopped aside, pushing wing to wing so they could reveal a patch of dust and dirt, soaked in blood. “Hunters got him.”

Antoinette could not move, every muscle and tendon in her body frozen. Who was this boy? It was not Jack Terry, her love. The inflection in his voice, the confident and almost sinister gaze, the odd smile, none of it belonged. In the corner of her eye, she could see that Damien felt the same, as the man stepped forward slightly to stand beside her, and he kept his weight on the balls of one foot, ready to sprint forward in an attack.

“I ... I am ... sorry.” Mire was dead? Oh no. If, that was truly what happened. This snake speaking to her could not possibly have been Jack, and now, as she stared at him, every word she heard from him became suspect.

“Yeah, I was pretty bummed. But! Good news. Crows say Mom is fine, they killed two hunters, which makes four total, if Elen can’t revive the one I shot in the head, and I drained and popped one a minute before.” Popped? “And the best news we’ve had in god damn forever, I caught Sándor.”

She squinted for a moment, before she stepped forward. The crows moved aside for her, barely, while they gave her lover plenty of room; slaves, making way for their master.

Sure enough, Sándor the Begotten was there. The man was a mess, bleeding and broken, and she could tell many of his wounds had not been caused by the birds. He was on his back, but she could tell he was bleeding quite profusely from wounds underneath him, as blood leaked onto the floor around him. Someone had broken many of his ribs, if not all of them, and his face was a ruined mess, nose smashed and teeth lost. Every breath the man took was a gargled mess, blood oozing from his parted mouth and broken lips. Someone had thoroughly crushed this man.

Jack, or whoever this snake was, walked up beside her, grinned up at her, and then down at the shirtless man on the floor. “Julias really fucked him up. Never seen a Ventrue punch that hard. But it drained my sire pretty bad, left him defenseless.” Crows sat upon the Begotten’s arms and legs, and a few of them had left scratch marks there, some peck marks as well, but Sándor did not respond. He was close to death, but she doubted the horror inside the man would let him simply bleed out.

If Natasha’s report about this Begotten’s strength was to be believed, and it was, then Julias defeating him in a fist fight would have been horribly costly indeed. Impossible, even, for other Ventrue his age, but Julias was Julias. Was ... Julias. She sighed, looked over Jack's head to the ashes upon the floor, and frowned at the crows stomping over it. Jack, her Jack, would have made sure his summoned crows would have not touched them. Her Jack would not have done any of the things he was doing now.

The crows upon Sándor's body cawed a few times, announcing their presence, and Jack chuckled as he squatted down over his prize.

"Hey, Sand." He looked up at her, and Antoinette struggled to not look away in disgust at the alien creature meeting her gaze. "Angela called him Sand, heh. Sand!" Leaning over the Begotten, he slapped the man's broken face, but found no response. "Damn, unconscious. Well, he ain't going anywhere. Let's check Mom." He pat the man on the chest, used the ruined ribcage to push himself up, and walked toward his mother's room.

And Antoinette followed, closely, as did Damien. She glanced back to him, and found the same fear in his eyes. He did not recognize this boy either. After a quick grimace, she nodded to Damien, acknowledging his fear with her own; and perhaps, warning him that she would soon act.

Jack stepped into his mother's room. She almost stopped him. Did the hunters have some sort of doppelgänger in their employ, or could somehow possess Jack and turn him into this snake before her? That made no sense. It was clear that Jack had done great damage to the hunters this night, thus, it was unlikely the hunters that were responsible for this change in Jack. Jack had always had an unusual, unknown element that people noticed, but this? This was beyond the pale.

The crows perched upon the bed, the chairs, the equipment, everything within his mother's room, but none touched the woman's body. Sensitive equipment was also left alone; crow claws and fragile equipment did not mix.

“They were going to take her,” Jack said as he stepped in closer. “Take her, and Elen was going to do things to her. Probably cut her up, do some shit to her mind or guts, voodoo magic, or whatnot.”

Antoinette sighed, but nodded. “To force your cooperation.”

“Yep. Fuckers. Whatever, she’s fine, and I’ll get them. Kill them, rip them apart, shred them, throw their guts to the birds, my birds.” Nodding to himself, he reached up and stroked the bellies of his two crows upon his shoulders. “The hunters are in the city, and they’re not leaving; Jeremiah won’t, at least, not until he’s killed Azamel. So we have plenty of time to find them and skull-fuck their corpses. I —” As the devil creature leaned over the unconscious body of his mother, his voice came to a sudden stop, and he froze.

“ ... Jack?” Damien said, stepping around to the other side of the bed. “You ok?”

Antoinette, keeping a couple feet between her and the alien entity, looked down at his eyes. They were locked onto the face of his mother. His hands trembled at his sides, and his shoulders matched, quivering, as if the boy were carrying great weights in his empty palms.

She said nothing. Something was happening to Jack, something sinister, something horrible, and in the moment, something told her to watch. Let this unfold.

“I—” Again, his voice cut short, and the boy’s right hand took the bed’s edge with far more strength than required. “I ... I...”

As Jack struggled, Damien slid a hand into his coat. The Mekhet was as suspicious of Jack as she was, and, at least in this, she could trust him to do something to help the boy, even if that meant cutting off his legs to incapacitate him. But Antoinette had no clue what was happening to her love, and if watching him struggle now provided some answers, then she was left with no choice but to observe.

She looked to Samantha. The poor woman looked horrible, but at least she had not been harmed by the influx of crows. Antoinette looked around at the many birds sitting about, and frowned at how some of them gobbled down bits of flesh, while others preened, rubbing at the blood that soaked their feathers. Some of that blood dripped onto floor, and Antoinette glared at the birds. Disease was a true risk for Samantha, and the current situation was a large problem.

Jack put his other hand on the bed, and he stared down at his mother harder, as if trying to penetrate her mind with his. If he did something violent, Antoinette was ready to pounce and stop him. But, he did not. He stood there, a trembling statue, hands locked to the bed while his torso leaned forward enough that he could stare down at his mother.

“Mom?” Jack said at last. “Mom, I ... I ... what...”

And then the boy turned around. For a moment, Antoinette thought he would march out of his mother’s room, but he froze at the doorway, again like a shivering statue. His hands found the door frame, and squeezed. Bits of the metal frame bent under his trembling grip. Jack, even at his strongest and most desperate, could not have dented a metal door frame by squeezing it with his fingertips.

Back again, he turned and walked toward the bed. His face was pained, as if someone was dragging a hot poker through his insides.

“I ... I...”

“Jack, my love, what is happening to you?” She hesitated to ask, fearing his response.

“I won’t ... let it ... Mom, I won’t ... I won’t let it...” He collapsed. As if someone had staked the boy with a proper wooden stake, he collapsed, and slipped into unconsciousness. The two birds upon his shoulders flapped their wings in panic, and flew toward the window.

“Jack!” She caught him before his head hit the floor. The smell of blood was on his lips. If he had fed on one of the hunters, then the boy did not need to enter torpor, especially as he apparently had no visible wounds; bullet holes in his clothes, but no wounds. And only moments before, he had looked healthy, energized, and ready for war. There was no reason for this collapse.

As her love went into torpor, the army crows cawed once, and left. Leaving was not so easy for thousands of birds trapped inside a hallway and several small rooms, and Antoinette stayed low as the birds rose. Their black wings became a whirlwind above her head, and she stared up, teeth clenched as the creatures, as if of one mind, flowed together out through the destroyed window. Damien ducked as well, hands covering his head, until it became clear the birds had no intention of doing anything, except leaving.

The caw noise filled the hall, blocking out the sound of anything else. A glance out the door showed the birds leaving, including the ones perched upon Sándor. With no more guidance from their unconscious master, the birds flowed out of the hospital in a matter of seconds, and what was nothing but endless black feathers, became a hospital hallway. Blood was everywhere. Four corpses decorated the floor, and one of them wore scrubs, or the remains of them. The crows, under her love’s command, had eaten the bodies to the point of nigh skeletons.

“Jack’s ... different,” Damien said, walking out of the room, and grabbing the Begotten once the crows had gone. He dragged him into the room with the three of them, and drew a pistol. Better to keep the prisoner at gun point, even if he was incapacitated.

“Clearly he is different. I—”

“I ... sorry to interrupt, Prince, but ... he’s different. Auspex shows he’s ... he’s uh...” The Mekhet squirmed, looking blatantly uneasy, as he looked back over his shoulder to her, and Jack. “He’s dangerous.” Was the pistol for Jack, and not the Begotten? No, Damien would not do such a thing.

She sighed, and looked down at the boy in her arms. He was different, that much was obvious, and to summon an army of crows in such a manner was a feat elders as old as Antoinette would struggle to accomplish, were Animalism one of her talents. He had not only done so, but it seemed easy for him, with no strain to him at all. That was, until he saw his mother’s face.

A glance toward Samantha showed two crows remained, perched upon the windowsill. His pets, Scully and Mulder, no doubt. They stepped side to side a few times, and bobbed their heads a few times more, likely anxious to investigate their master’s sudden fall.

Antoinette stood up, boy in her arms horizontal, and she leaned down to set a kiss upon his forehead. “Something has happened to him, something I ... I do not know.”

“Jack’s been acting more and more strangely,” Damien said, “since his first run in with Angela. And he’s always been unusually skilled; I just assumed that was his bloodline showing through.”

“Perhaps it was. Perhaps it is...” She set the boy down in one of the chairs, and slid a finger across his forehead. Who was this man who had summoned an army to his aid? This boy in the chair was not Jack. Or perhaps it was, and Jack was the one that, upon seeing the face of his mother, stopped whoever was controlling him. His words had suggested some form of inner struggle.

“What ... what are we going to do?”

“You are going to help me, Mister Burksen.” She got up, stepped over to Samantha, and looked down at the monster on the floor. “My tower has facilities that can contain the Begotten.”

“The Invictus—”

“Are not equipped to secure foes of a paranormal nature. You do not have...” Sighing, she shook her head, glanced over her shoulder back to Jack, and then back to his mother. “Be silent, Damien, and do what I tell you. You will guard the Begotten, and you will guard me, as I do what must be done.” Desperate times called for desperate measures, if she was forced to ask this Sanctified to be her guard.

“... very well.” He did not look happy, and no doubt the Prince’s orders would pose a dilemma for the boy, since he was to report to the Invictus, not help her. Maria could burn, for all Antoinette cared at the moment. “What must be done?”

“If I had known that the hunters would be this aggressive, that Angela would be so petty, as to launch such a grandiose assault on the hospital, I would have done this earlier. But I ... had to deliberate.”

“Siring Jack’s mother?”

“... oui. It is not a decision to be made lightly.”

Damien nodded, eyes drifting between the three unconscious people in the room. “I’ll guard you. I haven’t seen any staff, so I imagine they’re all hiding. And police aren’t going to arrive for some time at that. You’re clear.”

The Mekhet was a touch wordier than Daniel, but he cut to the point in a similar manner. She appreciated the candor. Unlike Daniel, she did not feel comfortable dropping her guard and exposing herself to his sword. But if she tried to remove the ventilator from Samantha to transport her, she could die before Antoinette could get her back to the Elysium tower for a safer embrace.

“You...” Sighing as well, Damien shook his head, eyes lowering. “You don’t need to worry. Things are different now, Prince. You can trust me. I’ll cover Jack and Sándor, and you.”

She stood up straight, and looked at the man. He did the same, meeting her gaze, and unlike her, he lowered his guard. Not the guard of his body, weapon still at hand, but the guard of his gaze. No frown, no smile, no grimace or smirk, no grin or sneer, nothing but an exposed face, that let her peer into his soul. She had peered into countless souls in her long life, and had grown skilled at reading the intentions of any who let their guard down.

The gaze of the Mekhet was a powerful one, and said much. Damien was a troubled young man, torn asunder by his past, by the ghost of Lucas, and by his new life. He was worried for his friend Jack. He was also deathly afraid of her. And, like many Kindred, the man’s life was now defined by regret. She was too harsh, to judge him as she did.

Nodding, she leaned down over Samantha, and stared at her face.

Two days in a coma had not been kind to her; though, she probably looked better than she did the night of the stabbing. She had pale, sunken skin, just like a vampire. Her short hair was cut to the ear, and was supposed curl with waves, but the trauma, the pillow, everything had ruined it.

But she was in good shape, preparing herself for potential mates, perhaps. Bouncing back from the horrible luck that had befallen her, she was a single mother striking back at life.

How would this woman respond to her new awakening, and her new life? No doubt there would be misery, due to the death of her daughter. There would be elation, that her son was alive. There would be shock, that she was now a vampire. To survive the mental damage such mayhem would cause, would be a trial greater than the trial she had only just begun to recover from.

But she deserved a chance.

Antoinette leaned in, moved the tube coming out of the woman's mouth aside slightly, and set her fangs to Samantha's neck.

---

---

~~Natasha~~

Power came back to the city, twenty minutes before sunrise.

“Oh thank g-god,” she said.

“Yes. This was futile.” Daniel nodded, and the two of them stepped out of a local hydro building before climbing up onto the rooftops. “Quickly, back to the tower.”

Their search for the source of the power outage had proved fruitless. The local power facility had emergency staff, but they had been royally confused. Spying on them was the plan, to let them locate the source of the power failure, and Daniel and Natasha would race to the designated location and quickly handle it. But the technicians were dumbfounded, saying the power failure had no source. More dumbfounded, when the power came back on, on its own.

“Um ... w-what is that?” She pointed to the sky. The light from the city lit a blurry, black movement, something vast and flowing across the sky.

Daniel frowned. “A murder.”

“Murder? Oh, c-crows. That ... that is a lot of crows.”

“Yes, yes it is.” Daniel frowning was an unusual sight, but his frown continued as he watched the flock of black birds fly away. Some remained, perching upon roofs and power lines, but that was normal for Dolareido. Rats, crows, cockroaches, and kine. All four were everywhere in the city, but a giant flock like that flying away was not normal.

“I felt something,” she said. “Earlier, I m-mean. I d-d-don’t know what it was, but...”

“Now we know. Someone summoned them.” The sheriff adjusted his glasses, and leapt, before she could ask how on Earth someone could summon an army of crows that big. Even Viktor would have struggled with that, and that man had been a master of Animalism.

On the rooftops, the two Mekhet ran back for the tower. They’d arrive at the tower with maybe fifteen minutes to spare; Mekhet were fast, and sprinting across rooftops wasn’t hard. Still, fifteen minutes before imminent death was enough to get her anxious, and then some.

“Are we going to call the P-Prince?”

“No. The ring or vibration could give her away, if she’s being stealthy, assuming she has not disabled notifications.”

“R-Right, makes sense.” Better to meet back at the tower. Maybe there she’d get some answers about the crows.

She chewed on her lip. A blackout that had knocked out power for several blocks, and blocked out all communication, wired and wireless, in that area? She’d assumed magical from the get go, but hadn’t said anything when the Prince told her to investigate. Maybe she should have.

The two of them walked in through the front doors literal seconds after the Prince.

“P-Prince?” Natasha said.

“Miss Vola, Daniel, I am glad to see you are safe.” The tall woman turned to face them, and Tash froze as she realized another woman was draped across her arms. She froze twice over, when she realized that not only did Damien stand next to her, but Jack was hooked over one shoulder, and Sándor, beaten to a pulp and bleeding profusely, was hooked over the other. Both were soaked in blood, and with Jack, she knew it was not his.

“I ... I um...”

Daniel stepped forward. “Is she embraced?”

“She is. She will likely not awaken until tomorrow night. Daniel, take Sándor, and lock him within Cell 5. Use extreme measures.”

“Extreme ... yes, my Prince.” With a nod, Daniel walked over to Damien, scooped up the bleeding Begotten, and walked toward the back of the lobby where the stairs led down.

“Natasha, join Damien, and help him ... help him...” After grinding her teeth together for a moment, she looked away. “Set Jack within Cell 4 ... and stake him.”

Natasha froze thrice. “W-What? I—”

“Do it! Do not question it.” The bite in the Prince’s words could have broken steel. “And see to it that Damien has a place to sleep. Mister Burksen should not risk his life racing the sun returning home.”

“Y-Yes m-m-ma’am!” Nodding, she stepped up beside Damien, and gestured toward the path Daniel already walked. “Do ... d-do you not need help with ... your ... childe?” Childe. Oh god the Prince had a childe now. So exciting! Super exciting! But Antoinette wasn’t smiling. If anything, she looked angry.

“No, Miss Vola. For today, she will rest next to me, and I will make sure to greet her come sunset. Now, tend to her s—”
Antoinette bit down, as if the word was difficult to articulate. “Tend to her son. Quickly.”

Nodding five times faster than she should have, she took Damien’s free wrist, and pulled him toward the back.

Antoinette followed, but slower. They had ten minutes before sunset, and the Prince probably wanted a few minutes to process what had happened to her, how her life was going to change, and how everything was going to change. Ten minutes was also enough time for her to ask Damien some questions.

Once they were down the stairs, several floors, and had taken a right in the halls of black marble, she felt comfortable enough to open her mouth. Hopefully her sire and boss couldn’t hear her this far away.

“W-What happened?”

“Not sure. We showed up to see the aftermath.”

“Can you ... t-tell me what you think happened?”

“ ... Julias is dead.”

She froze again. This was too many freezings in a single ten minute window. “W-W-What?”

“He died helping Jack defend his mother, most likely.” Damien nodded toward the kid lying across his shoulder. “When we showed up, Jack had ... had somehow summoned at least a few thousand crows. He blocked out the sky. Every rooftop was covered, and they poured into the hospital, breaking in through the windows. He killed three hunters with their help, and captured the Begotten.”

Processing. Processing. Ok, her brain wasn't willing to make sense of everything Damien just told her. Needed more. "Jack ... Jack did ... what?" At least he'd decided to capture Sándor instead of killing him. Lucky. He didn't know Sándor was being controlled by Elen. If Jack was killing hunters, he had no reason to not kill the Begotten as well, except maybe to torture him for information.

"It wasn't Jack."

"I—"

"Jack wasn't Jack." Damien sighed, following her, steps brisk. "Whoever this kid was, it wasn't Jack. He was ... he was ... cruel."

Flashbacks hit Natasha. The alley, when Jack had told her he was struggling with rage issues that defied normal explanation. Oh no.

"M ... multiple p-personalities?"

"He summoned an army of crows, Natasha. More crows than any vampire should be able to summon, not without preparation. And he used them like soldiers, slaughtered three hunters, and when we finally got to them, we found the birds ripping muscle off the bones. He walked over Julias's ashes, let the birds walk over them, and he ... he..." Damien sighed, shook his head, and nodded toward the hall. "Let's hurry."

"O-Ok." Hurry, hurry. Yeap, do that. Get down to Cell 4, and stake the young man so he'd be stuck in torpor until it was removed. "We saw the crows, but I ... I d-didn't know what to think."

The hallway had a few cells, each large and filled with many tools for securing kine. Some of them had people in them, horrible people, violent criminals and the like, people Antoinette considered harmful to her city. Such kine could be kept unconscious using drugs, or not, if she was feeling particularly ... wrathful, toward a rather heinous criminal, left to rot in a cell. They were emergency food. The quality was poor, but come dire situations, even poor quality was ambrosia.

As they entered the hallway, there was a solid metal cabinet on the wall. She dialed in the number on its digital door lock, and opened it. There were a few wooden stakes — if it wasn't wood, it was unreliable at best — along with some other weaponry that would work well against paranormals. A mini flamethrower, a shotgun, some knives and swords, and silver knives too. She grabbed a stake.

The cells with doors along the hall were numbered 1, 2, and 3. The cell at the end of the hall, numbered 4, was different. The door looked thicker, and the number itself was larger. Natasha had never seen its interior, and it did not have a sliding view window to let her do such, unlike the other cells. A digital lock, and a manual lock, were ready and open on cell 4, made of metal she was sure no one was getting through, including Uratha.

She dialed in the code, unhooked the enormous padlock, and pulled open the gigantic metal door. Or rather, tried. Frowning, she set a foot against the wall, and pulled with all her might. It slid open with all the grace of pushing a parked car with the emergency brake on. But, with a little Kindred strength put into it, she managed to get the thing open, and she gawked at the thickness of the door. Godzilla wasn't getting through this thing.

The room was empty. That made sense, she supposed, if it was meant to be some sort of multipurpose room they could store particularly dangerous people in. If there'd been a chair, a monster would have little trouble turning it into a weapon.

Cell 5 was on the next floor, beneath her. It was Antoinette's cell for securing the most dangerous and magical entities; and she'd never used it before, according to the Prince. Sándor deserved it. How could she keep a Begotten under control? Antoinette probably had more tricks up her sleeve than Natasha knew about, if she was willing to share the resonance circle with her so early into her new life as a young dragon. There may have been rooms deep in the tower, filled with dark secrets that Natasha was happier not knowing about.

But for now, a big, empty room of metal to hold a big baddie would do fine. Hopefully. She lay Jack on the ground with Damien's help, and stared at the young man for movement as she did. None. For whatever reason, he was out cold, but better to paralyze him than risk his awakening. Damien held out a hand, and she gave him the stake.

Stab. Damien didn't bother to open the man's suit; it was a blood-soaked, hole-ridden mess anyway. Jack's body flopped once, limbs flailing out a little from the impact, as Damien sank the wooden object into his heart. Puncturing the organ wasn't as easy as it sounded, considering you had to get through the ribs and muscle protecting it. She was glad Damien did it.

"Julias ... is dead? And A-Angela—"

"Escaped. Again."

Natasha, sighing loudly, got up, and motioned for Damien to follow. Once he was outside in the hall with her, the two of them closed the enormous door, and she locked it, both locks. No one was getting in or out. It'd be terrifying to wake up in a room like that, but Jack was staked, and no vampire, even an elder, was going to wake up from that situation.

"She k-k-keeps getting away!"

"Some sort of circle had been painted on the wall. Maybe—"

"Oh ... oh no. I ran into that w-with the witches, tonight. It ... the hunters, they use some sort of..." She threw up her hands. "Long story! I'll t-t-tell you at dusk."

Mirroring her sigh, Damien nodded, and looked around with wary eyes. "I really wish I could get back to my place before sunrise."

"And I w-wish I could see my b-b-boyfriends before sunrise too, but I can't. So we have to deal." She guided the surly Mekhet down the hall, and into the main room where the stairway connected and descended, massive walls of marble showing dragon statues, and where hallways showed peeks of far more enjoyable rooms. Not everything in the tower was a cell; she hoped Damien realized that.

"I can still remember the first time I met you," he said. "A tiny little thing, fast, shot me when my guard was down."

She raised a brow as she looked over her shoulder at him. That was a strange direction to take the conversation.

"I ... I—"

"Now, you're a dragon, going on missions with the sheriff of the city. And you have two boyfriends." With a tiny smile that almost didn't exist, he held up two fingers and showed them to her. "Two. Werewolves at that."

She blinked at him. "I ... I g-guess I changed. Why are you—"

"I've changed too, haven't I?" Smile destroyed. He looked around at the walls, and despite how the rooms they passed were far more appealing than cells, with living rooms with couches, fancy lighting, paintings and the like, he still looked nervous. More than once, he glanced over his shoulder, checking the stairs and hallway behind him.

"Y-Yes, of course."

“The Prince doesn’t seem to think so. Half the time I was with her tonight, I expected her to rip off my head, literally.”

“She...” Tash looked down, and juggled the thoughts for a while as she guided Damien to a guest room. It was a small room, a bed and nothing more. A great bed though, and the room locked from the inside, with a normal door lever lock, and an actual barricade bar. A guest room meant for vampires. “She’s old, D-Damien, very old. Give her time.”

“We’re old, too.”

She laughed at that as she stood in the doorway. It died away, as the night’s events weighed on her. “You know it’s n-not the same.”

“No, I suppose it isn’t.” Damien looked around at the room, before he turned to face her, hands reaching for the door. “Julias is dead, Natasha, killed by hunters. Jack has gone The Shining on us, and yet the Prince is still looking at me like I’m the threat.”

“I’ll ... I’ll t-talk to her.”

His small smile returned, partly. “Thanks.”

She left, and he closed the door behind her. Only once she heard the sound of metal clicking, did she let her head drop, and her hands find her shoulders, hugging herself.

Julias was dead. Mister Mire. Her friend, companion, a man she could always rely on to be fair, straight, honorable, and dependable. A man who’d helped her so many times when she was in the Invictus, lent her a hand countless times. He was dead.

She found her bed, curled up on it, and buried her face in her hands. Sobs crept up through her body, up her spine, into her lungs, and into her core. Before she knew it, they were in her neck, and up into her head where she could no longer stop them. She cried, dry sobs she hid in her palms. No, not Julias. No. No no no.

Oh god, what would she tell Jessy? Oh god oh god, what would ... what would Triss do? And Maria and Michael, they'd be beyond upset. And ... and ... oh god.

She pulled her knees up to her chest, and shook with the trembling clenches of crying, until sunrise came.

---

---

~~Antoinette~~

The last thing Antoinette did, before setting Samantha on the bed next to her, was send Beatrice a message. 'Come to the tower, the moment the sun sets. Immediately.' That was not a conversation she looked forward to having.

But, it would be some time before Beatrice arrived tomorrow night. In the mean time, she had other problems to deal with. Problems, but also, a great delight.

---

As sunset arrived, announcing the next night, she slowly sat up from her bed. She had long learned how to manage the surge of the nightly awakening with grace, and she used the wave to propel herself to action. Within seconds, she was out of bed, and adjusting her clothes. She had changed into a clean suit, before settling for the day, as Kindred did not move during their daily torpor. Her suit was immaculate. She, on the other hand, was nervous. It was not a feeling she was accustomed to.

She smiled down at Samantha, and waited. Put aside the grief and misery, bury it, and focus on the moment. Julias did not die. Jack is not waiting in a cell for you, with a stake in his heart. He had not performed a massive Masquerade violation. A monster is not in your deepest, darkest prison, waiting to be interrogated. None of that existed. All that existed, was this moment.

Samantha opened her eyes.

“Bonjour,” Antoinette said, voice as soft as she could manage.

The woman was still dressed in the hospital gown; it was better this way, so Antoinette could add some evidence to the testimony she was doubtless going to give in this conversation.

“I ... I ... w-where...” The woman was only an inch shorter than Jack, but Jack was a small fellow, so his mother was perhaps an inch or two shorter than the average woman. She was thin and lean, like her son, but with the hips and legs that came with age and motherhood. Her hair was brown, with some curves and waves weaved into it, damaged by the trauma of the past two days.

She looked to Antoinette, and the vampire froze. Those eyes. Those green eyes. Jack’s eyes, on a soft face. They went wide as she stared at her, and looked her up and down a few times. Antoinette’s great height, red eyes, and long white hair caught her off guard, as expected. So Antoinette waited, giving the woman several seconds more, before continuing.

“Samantha Terry. What is the last thing you remember?”

“I ... god, I ... I ... oh god.” She brought her knees up to her chest, hugged them, and set her chin upon them. “My little ... my little girl ... oh god.”

Then Angela killed Mary first. A disgusting, cruel, heartless woman, to make a mother watch her daughter die. No parent should ever have to see their child die. Ever.

Poor Athalia.

Sighing, Antoinette walked over to her cabinet and desk against the black marble wall, took the chair, and pulled it over to the bed to sit. “I am sorry, Miss Terry, but your daughter is gone.”

The woman trembled, and continued to hide her forehead against her arm, the rest of her face hidden behind her knees. It was several minutes before the quivering woman found her voice.

“Everyone’s gone,” she said, voice breaking with the rise of sorrow. “All gone. I ... I can’t ... I...”

Antoinette reached out, and set a hand on the woman’s shoulder. “You are not alone, Miss Terry. I—”

“My family is dead!” she screamed, lifting her face and glaring up at her. The softness of her visage was stricken, destroyed. “I don’t even know you. Don’t give me that shit. I—”

“Samantha.” With a slow, gentle sigh, Antoinette pulled her hand back, and offered her grieving child a small smile. “I was not referring to myself.”

“W-What? I ... I don’t understand.”

To guide this woman’s fragile mind would be difficult. Antoinette considered carefully, before speaking. “You and your daughter were assaulted two days ago.”

“Two days? But ... but I remember ... I remember being stabbed, again and again and—” She lowered her legs, and pulled up her hospital gown, with no concern that Antoinette could see her bare genitals for the act. Unlike Jack, who’d been stabbed literal moments before Julius sired him, Samantha’s stomach wounds had healed as part of her embrace. “God, I’m so pale. And ... and ... oh god, I—”

“Your world has been changed, Samantha Terry. I changed it. And I changed it without your consent. For that, I must apologize and ask for your forgiveness. But, explanations can wait. For now, I need your help.”

The small woman stared at her, confused and paralyzed. There was anger there, wanting to lash out, but it took only a moment to see that this Samantha creature was too gentle to explode with rage or fury. No, this woman would curl into a ball, pull her sorrow inward, and wither away, if given the chance. A soft, delicate woman, hardened by her life but still a tender, loving creature. She did not have the drive that Antoinette would have looked for in a potential childe, but then, perhaps that was for the best.

“M-My help? Y ... You mean, to help catch the ... the woman that ... k-killed...” Her whole body started trembling again, and she started to curl up once more.

Antoinette could not have that. She reached out, and grabbed the woman’s wrist.

“No. We know very well who killed your daughter, and have been hunting her and her group for some time. You and your daughter are unfortunate victims of her war.”

The small woman stared at Antoinette, obviously wanting to pull her arm back, but refusing to. Timid. Docile. It would take time to help this woman overcome her natural, accommodating attitude.

“Then I ... I don’t understand what I can do.”

“Come with me. All your questions will be answered, and you will be fed, once you have done for me this one task.”

Samantha’s eyes widened at the mention of ‘fed’. A new Kindred, a fresh fledgling, would no doubt be starving, in need of blood, and soon. But some stored blood would suffice, and the woman would not need it immediately. She was not Jack, and not of his bloodline. Her Beast would not send her into a frenzy on her first night so swiftly.

Antoinette felt her eye twitch as the thought ran across her mind. Jack's Beast. The boy had gone into a frenzy on his first night, despite Julias sharing with him his stored blood. It should not have happened. The boy's inner monster was strong, and fought to free itself with far more enthusiasm than a young vampire's Beast should have. Was it related to the madness of last night? When a Beast took over the mind of a Kindred, completely took over, the result was a Draugr, a mindless animal concerned only with its hunger. What had taken over Jack, or replaced Jack, or manipulated Jack, was not mindless. It was cruel, filled with malice, and disturbing joviality.

She brought a hand up to her chest, and clutched at it through her blouse. Her Jack, infected, changed, altered. No, do not think about it. Think about your childe for now. Help her first. And maybe, just maybe, she can help you.

Gulping, and coughing on her dry throat, Samantha turned to face the side of the bed.

"I feel ... f-feel ... strange, and..."

"You will feel many strange things, Samantha. Your life has been altered, in more ways than you can imagine."

"B ... Because of ... this ... Angela woman?"

"In a manner of speaking." Antoinette walked over to her wardrobe, retrieved a robe of solid white, and offered it to her new childe. "I know ... I know that misery and anguish overwhelm you, Miss Terry. Your world has been destroyed, for a third time. As if the Fates themselves conspired against you, happenstance and atrocious luck have ruined your life and killed those you cared for most. But, if you will set your misery aside for a moment, and listen to me, I promise you not all is lost.”

Samantha slowly slid her legs off the bed, remained seated, and looked between the robe and Antoinette. If she knew how to Blush Life, she probably would have, purely to let tears flow as waterfalls. In Antoinette’s many years of unlife, she had seen true grief countless times, soul crushing torment, and Samantha dripped of it.

“My ... m-my...” Her head dropped, and her shoulders shook. “You ... you’ll ... you’ll get her?”

“We will capture Angela and her group, and we will crucify her. Literally.” With a nod, Antoinette took initiative, and threw the robe around Samantha’s shoulders. The poor woman would go comatose, or slip into shock, if Antoinette let her. “Come. Not all is lost for you, Samantha.” With that, she reached out, and set a hand on her childe’s.

“Not all...” Clearly lost to her confusion, helpless and disoriented, she took her hand. Progress.

Slowly, gently, Antoinette pulled the woman up to standing. Petite as she was, the robe dragged on the black marble floor, and Antoinette smiled at that. There was some Jack in her, in her quiet mannerisms, her shy glances, her careful steps. She reminded her of the first time she had met Jack, a small boy at a ball full of vampires. There had been a strength in him at the time, and in his mother now, it only needed to be drawn forth.

“I am Antoinette, and for now, I am your host.”

“An ... toinette.” Clutching the robe around her at the neck with one hand, the other still in Antoinette’s grip, she followed along as best she could. Antoinette did not pull her too hard, but hard enough to force her to take steps. If she dallied, the poor woman was bound to collapse with depression.

Once she arrived at the main stairway, that connected to the center room and various halls, she went up a couple floors, and made sure to both give Samantha a moment to admire the dragon statues and carvings, but also hurry her along. The marvels of her tower were many, and she looked forward to sharing them with her new child. The extravagances of fortune and time were hers to have, and while they could not cure the agony she undoubtedly felt, they could alleviate the pain a little.

Jack, on the other hand, she could aid quite a bit.

She guided the woman down the hall, past the metal doors that were obviously cell doors, and when Samantha stopped to stare at the closed window slits, Antoinette pulled her along.

“I ... are—”

“These prisons are not for you. Do not fret, little Terry.” She could not help but smile at herself for the phrase. “But, there is someone within one of these cells, that you need to see.”

“ ... it’s ... you ... you said you’re still looking for her.”

“And we are. This is someone you will wish to see.”

“You can’t bring back my daughter, Miss ... Antoinette. You can’t bring back my family. There’s no one I—” She went silent as she stared at the enormous metal door. Shaking, she stood there, watching, eyes wide as Antoinette set the number for the digital padlock, and used her key to unlock the manual one. Each lock was made of metal thick enough to give a blowtorch pause, were they made of normal metals, and she did not use normal metals. Security was paramount.

The door was thick, two feet thick, and made of reinforced material similar to the locks. It was also as heavy as a vehicle. No one was getting into, or out of this room, if she put them in there.

Samantha gasped as Antoinette pulled it open, without too much trouble at that. She gasped again, as the hallway light entered the metal square room, and lit a body.

“Someone’s d-d-dead ... in there!”

Antoinette looked over her shoulder, offered the oblivious woman another smile, and stepped into the room. “Be calm, Samantha. And come with me. Not everything is as it seems.”

“I ... but, I ... I—” Her body went rigid, frozen to ice, once Antoinette sat on her knees on the floor, and lifted the boy half onto her lap. “Jack!” The world exploded upon her face. Her eyes lit up with wonder, and fell with the weight of turmoil, as she saw the stake sticking out of the boy’s chest. “Oh god! Oh god, oh god oh god oh god oh go—”

“Samantha Terry,” Antoinette said, putting some bite into her voice to cut through the woman’s oncoming shock. “Come here, kneel beside your son, and observe.”

It must have been Hell for the poor mother. To wake up from a coma with new sensations in her undead body was confusing; sensations lost, as well. Her memories were a bundled mess, and the loudest, most pronounced, were of her daughter’s death, the final member of her family. She had awoken in a stranger’s home, and was at the mercy of their whim, a whim she knew nothing about. Dressed in a hospital gown and a robe, she had walked down a hall of obvious cells, and now, in a dark room undoubtedly meant to contain and imprison anything imaginable, she found the body of her son with a stake through his heart.

“Wh—”

“Now.” She did not wish to be cruel, or to destroy her new childe. But this had to be done. She could not simply sit by and let her childe come to terms with the changes of her life, when Antoinette needed her help. Seeing Jack rise from the dead would demonstrate the life of a Kindred to her, and perhaps fill her with joy that one of her children was alive. And maybe, if everything aligned perfectly, Samantha's face would do what it did for Jack last night, and settle his demons.

She did not have the time to let her new childe collapse upon herself.

Gulping, panicking, trembling, Samantha came over to her, and knelt beside her son, across from Antoinette. "He's ... he's ... You found him? He ... he disappeared, two years ago, and ... did this Angela woman have something to do with it? Oh god ... oh god oh god."

Antoinette shook her head, and yanked the stake from her lover's chest. Samantha let out a cry, short, weak, and she reached out to set her hands onto the chest of her son. As whimpers built within her, and spilled from her in tired sobs, she managed to frown up at Antoinette.

"How could you? He—"

Antoinette nodded down toward Jack. "Watch the wound."

"What? You—"

"Watch the wound, Samantha." Again, she raised her voice, and cut through the small woman's rising panic. She could not let her succumb, not yet, not until after this moment.

It would all be for naught, if Jack did not awaken. It would all be for naught, if the insidious monster she met last night was what waited for her. Please, Jack. So much had been lost already. She could not lose you, too.

Samantha gasped, a noise no louder than a mouse, as the wound on Jack's chest began to close; and it closed quickly. "Oh my god. What's happening? What's happening? I don't—"

Antoinette raised a hand, offered her childe a warm smile, and nodded down at Jack. Sure enough, it healed over, the currents of Kindred blood within showing themselves for a moment before the pale skin of the boy's chest hid them. He healed fast, faster than a Ventrue his age should have been able to. She had grown to expect much of Jack's abilities, but purely in his conscious efforts. How quickly he healed during torpor, on the other hand, was purely a function of his natural Kindred strength, and it was quite impressive.

What dark Beast lurked within her little Ventrue, that had grown to such heights under her very nose?

The stars aligned. She had not known if Jack would awaken, considering his unexpected torpor at the hospital. That would have only added to Samantha's confusion and misery. But sure enough, once the hole healed over, Jack's eyes opened. The hallway light exposed his beautiful, green eyes.

He was not used to waking up on a metal floor, and he blinked several times as he stared up at the Prince. "... Antoinette?"

The tension in Antoinette's chest vanished. She had not realized it was there, a slow creeping that had sneaked into her core, tightened all the muscles there, and constricted her depths. But the sight of her lover's eyes, his eyes, Jack's eyes, and the blatant honesty he carried within them, genuine sincerity without the layers of lies and deception most carried, washed away her anxiety.

Purely through her gaze, she could tell Samantha was similar in a way, a genuine, sincere sort, if perhaps without Jack's eye for analysis, or his delightful old-man cynicism.

And once Jack shifted his eyes to Samantha, it was fireworks. Antoinette leaned back a little, giving enough space for the two to react to each other without her interference, even as Jack's back lay along her thighs. The two stared at each other, blinking, confusion on both their faces. Jack's broke first, understanding coming through, and he offered his mother a small smile.

“ ... hi ... Mom.”

“Jack! Oh god, Jack!” The world vanished for Samantha Terry. In the moment, there was only her, and her son, her long lost son. She grabbed him, yanked him off Antoinette's lap, and crushed him in her embrace.

Antoinette smiled as she watched them, and let the joy pour. Her childe, a sweet, innocent woman, did not hold back. She wailed, and her motherly — if small — voice echoed in the metal chamber. Poor Jack was going to break in half with how hard she clutched him, and while the boy let his arms go limp at first, with a few moments to collect himself, he returned her hug. The two merged into each other, clutching, trembling, until Antoinette felt an urge to cry flutter up her chest.

How long had it been since she had felt such a feeling? An eternity. She clutched the scene with her eyes almost as hard Samantha clutched her son with her arms. No words could describe the expression on her face, except for, perhaps, painful rapture.

Chapter 90

~~Jack~~

Thank god. Thank. Fucking. God.

He breathed in the smell of her, and chuckled between his sobs. She was undead, like him, but he could still smell a bit of her, the old her, the living her, the person he grew up with, the person who raised him. Memories crashed into him, him sitting on the couch with her watching movies, waiting at the table while she cooked, reading a book on the couch while she decorated the Christmas tree with Mary. Her. It was her.

“Mom,” he said, his eyes buried in her neck. When was the last time he did this, hugged her while he cried? When Dad died, just once. After that, he’d drawn into himself, and hugging became a thing of the past. So many years, so many fucking years, he’d built up those walls, kept himself safe from feeling anything, especially where family was concerned.

Waking up to see her eyes blinking down at him, shattered those walls.

“Jack! Oh god, Jack.”

They hugged each other for a good couple minutes. It wasn’t until Antoinette shifted her legs a bit that Jack remembered she was there.

“M-Mom ... I ... how much—”

“She knows nothing, my little Ventrue.” The Prince reached out, and pat his shoulder, drawing his head out of the neck of his mother. “And, while I loath to end this moment, we should explain to Samantha the realities of the situation.”

The situation. Oh fucking god, the situation. Jack pushed away, slowly, gently, and had to fight against his mother’s squeezing arms a bit to do so. But after he tapped her on the shoulder a few times, she released him, and he smiled at her as he forced himself to stand.

“You were dead!” His mother jumped up with him, and set a hand on his shoulder, squeezing it as if he was a ghost.

“Sort of? I know I disappeared two years ago, and—”

“No, Jack, just now. You were dead! There was a ... a stick in your chest.”

Jack raised a brow, and looked down at the floor, then to Antoinette. A wooden stake was in her hand.

The realities of the situation, she’d said. In that moment, he thought she meant purely about telling his mom about her new life as a vampire; and she probably did also mean that. But she also meant a private conversation had to happen, about what he did.

The soft, heavenly, simple memories of his first life, when he was young, living with his mother, disappeared under murky waters. The hard, cruel, complex memories of his second life sucker punched him, and he grimaced as he looked at Antoinette. Julias, dead. Angela and Elen escaped, once again, for the last fucking time. Sándor was captured, and Antoinette probably had him locked up.

All of that faded into background noise, as he dug through the chaos of the event, and found the horrendous truth buried within. Something inside him had summoned an army of crows, and had slaughtered several hunters. Something inside him, something twisted and fucked up, had practically danced upon the blood and corpses. Something inside him, lurking beneath the surface, had lost its grip on Jack when he saw his mom in bed, and disappeared into him. It was still there.

And Antoinette knew it hadn't been him. She knew it, Damien knew it, and to be careful, they staked him. Ouch.

"I..." He looked at Antoinette, and waited. This whole situation was paralyzing, and he didn't know where to begin.

"Samantha, you have been brought into our world at a rather chaotic time. I can only offer my deepest apologies for how expedient we must be, but I cannot ease you into this." The Prince met their gazes, steady, strong, a pillar for Samantha to rely on. "Two years ago, Jack was stabbed and killed by an enemy of his friend Julias Mire. Julias resurrected him, in the same way ... that I have resurrected you."

"Res ... surrected?" Mom said.

Nodding, Jack winced as he looked down, and noticed his mom was still wearing her hospital gown under the robe. "Yeah. Look at me, Mom. Look at her. Pale as fuck, and ... well, check yourself for a pulse." It was how it sank in for him, seeing himself in the mirror, and then checking for a pulse. Something about seeing the difference of yourself, and the lack of a heartbeat, shattered any willful ignorance.

His mom did just that. She blinked at him as she felt her wrist, then her other wrist, then her neck, and then her chest. "I ... I don't ... have a pulse."

"None of us do," Jack said. "I—" He stopped, and looked to his love. "Sorry, I'm sort of just taking over the conversation."

"It is understandable. I am a stranger to her, while Julias was ... was not a stranger to you." The weight of her voice hit him, and his head lowered again.

His mom, fighting through her dry sobs, set a hand on his shoulder, and squeezed. “Julias is dead? I remember him, and ... he ... he was a business man, wasn’t he?”

“He was a vampire, Mom. We ... we all are.”

The grip she had on his shoulder loosened, and she started to sway. He caught her, kept her standing, and offered a weak smile as he pat her on the shoulder. Ok, that was a bit much for her, but like Antoinette said, no time to ease her into this.

“Vampires? You mean ... like ... T-Twilight?”

He groaned, so did Antoinette, until he couldn’t help but laugh. “No, not like Twilight. More like Dracula.”

“That movie with Gary Oldman and Keanu Reeves?”

“Yep.” Close enough. Nodding, he helped guide his mom toward the door, following after Antoinette once she started to leave. Keep talking, explain things to her, it was better than thinking about Julias, or letting her think about Mary. “Well, I meant the book, but, yeah. We’re vampires. That’s what happened to me. Another vampire who hated Julias tried to kill me, and Julias had to turn me, so that I didn’t permanently die. It all happened so fast, that ... that I had to disappear.”

“So you’ve been ... like this, for two years? Alive, or ... or ... whatever you are now?”

“Yep.”

“But ... but ... you could have told me! You could have come back, told your mother you were still alive!” She wasn’t getting it. He was just saying words to her, and they weren’t sinking in. Vampire was a little too fantasy for her to accept, while seeing her son still alive was something her mind could latch onto.

“He could not,” Antoinette said. “It is a secret society, Samantha Terry. Your son was pulled into a hidden world, with no say in the matter.”

Samantha’s head fell, and she dragged a little behind, trying to process everything happening to her. It was a lot to wake up to.

Worse, was that Antoinette kept glancing Jack’s way, and he could see grains of suspicion there. Warranted. He could remember what he did in the hallway, could remember referring to her as ‘Annie’, and remember how callous he’d been at the time about Julias’s death, and Sándor, and the bodies. He could remember how different he’d been, how good it felt to be free, how natural it felt to be that cruel.

He’d been a different person, but not. He’d had his memories, knew who he was, but he’d been someone else at the same time. God. Fucking god. Fucking shit fucking god shit fuck, oh god.

No, focus. Multiple personalities can wait. First, he had to help his mom adjust to her new life; and be happy that she was alive! Or rather, undead. Be happy! Be happy that ... that Julias’s sacrifice wasn’t in vain.

“We’re vampires, Mom. Julias was my sire, and ... and he died, saving you, just last night. Saving you from that woman who stabbed Mary. Or, I mean, I’ve been assuming it was Angela.”

“Glass eye?” she said.

“Yeah, that’s her.” So she had been lying to her fellow hunters, then. They didn’t know Angela was doing the shit she was doing. She was manipulating them. “She went to the hospital where you were in a coma. She was going to kidnap you, so she could get to me, force me to tell her information. We stopped her. Antoinette here turned you, embraced you, same as Julias did for me.”

His poor mom. She didn't know how to process a wave of information like this. Hell, she thought The Matrix was confusing. He loved her, but she wasn't the sharpest tool in the shed, and she showed that as her eyes drifted down, with a small frown of mental exertion. He had to dumb it down for her.

"Vampires have a secret society, and that society is at war, Mom. You and Mary got caught in the middle. And I ... I ... couldn't let you die."

That got through to her. She lifted her eyes, and she looked like she was about to burst into tears, caught somewhere between a big smile and sobs.

"And ... M-Mary?"

"... dead."

"B-But—"

"Dead, Mom. No one could ... could ... save her." He reached back behind him, and held his hand open.

Slowly, with a shaking palm, his mom reached out, and took it, as they started up the stairs. "I can't cry! I ... I can't cry. Why—"

"You're a vampire now. Things are different. And don't worry, we'll explain everything. For now, you—"

"You should feed." Antoinette looked over her shoulder down at them, before they finally finished with the stairs and entered the lobby. Into the elevator they went. "I have stored blood that will tide you over."

Jack frowned at that. It certainly didn't tide him over on his first night. But then, last night pretty much proved that his inner monster was a whole different Beast than anyone expected. Fucking lovely.

“Blood?” Mom said. “I ... what?”

Jack couldn't help but chuckle again, and once his mom was settled in the elevator with them, he pointed at her hand. The rest of her was covered in Antoinette's robe, but he could see her hands at least.

“You have no pulse.”

“I know, but—”

“You're pale, mom. You can't cry. And I bet you're hungry.”

“I know! I know, but ... but ... it's all so...”

Jack opened his mouth, pulled back his cheek with a finger, and with a little will, caused his canines to grow into fangs. Samantha gasped and stepped back, before coming closer and looking intently, until he closed his mouth.

“It all sounds like a fantasy, I know. But...” He pulled up his shirt, and showed where the stab scars were, earning another gasp from her. “I'm not lying. I was stabbed, was dying, and Julias”—he couldn't keep the flinch off his face that time—“sired me, turned me, moments later, to save my life. I ... I asked Antoinette to do the same for you.”

The lights were turning on in her head, each causing his mom's eyes to grow wider. She lifted her head after a time, up to the white-haired Prince, and gulped—and coughed in result. Dry gulps were hard to get used to.

“Th ... thank ... you.”

“You are welcome, my childe.”

“Child?”

“Childe, with an E at the end,” Jack said. “She’s your sire. You’re her childe. It ... it’s not a normal relationship, and it’s very unusual to be made this way. Julias got to know me for years, right? Groomed me, prepared me, though he didn’t tell me why. I asked Antoinette to embrace a stranger. It’s ... yeah, unusual circumstances”

His mom continued to look up at Antoinette, and after a while, drew up a smile. “I’m sorry, I ... it’s all so ... I’m so...”

“Give it time, Samantha Terry. We have asked you to accept more in fifteen minutes, than most must accept in a lifetime.” After a nod, the elevator dinged, and Antoinette stepped out. She opened the first, large office double door, and Samantha gasped in awe as she was introduced to just one of Antoinette’s offices. There, Daniel was waiting, and he had a bottle of red at the table, along with glasses. In the back of the room, the curtain was pulled aside, showing the giant glass window, and the city skyline lit up with lights.

The man looked at Jack, adjusted his glasses, and watched him, like a sniper watches a potential target. Antoinette must have told him. Shit.

“My love and I have fed recently, Samantha. Please, help yourself to as much as you wish.”

“Um ... thanks.” Samantha walked around the glass table in the center of the room, and sat down. Her hands were shaking as she took a glass. They didn’t stop as Daniel filled it with red, and her eyes stared at the thick liquid. “Um ... uh ... s-so, this is your, uh, boyfriend?” she said, nodding to Daniel. “Hello, Mister... ?”

Antoinette raised a brow, looking to Daniel, then to Jack, then to Samantha. After a moment, she groaned, and set a couple fingers against her forehead. “Merde.”

“You’re going to make her head explode, with too many revelations at once, my Prince,” Jack said, unable to stop a smile sneaking through. Of all the shit, of all the horrible shit that was burying him, and the Prince by relation, there was something delightfully funny about her accidentally revealing that he was Antoinette’s lover.

His mom looked at Jack, caught the smile, and her eyes went wider than any time before. She looked to Antoinette, then back to him, and completed the circuit twenty times, before she downed the glass of blood without attempting to taste it.

“I need ... alcohol...”

“Sorry,” Jack said, sitting down next to his mom, and patting her on the shoulder. “Sorry for ... for a lot of things. Sorry I couldn’t tell you about any of this. Sorry that ... that our night war spilled over, and got ... Mary killed. Sorry that I couldn’t tell you I’ve been dating the Prince of Dolareido for over a year.” He nodded to Antoinette, eyes still on his mom. “Sorry, but you can’t drink alcohol either. Only blood.”

His mom stared down at the empty glass in her hand. “Are ... are you sure? I think now would be the perfect time to become an alcoholic.”

“Agreed. But, yeah, no alcohol, unless you want to vomit it up.”

Sighing, she took the bottle Daniel had set on the massive glass table, and poured herself more. Apparently, she liked it, or at least, liked the way it felt in her stomach. “S-So, um ... uh ... the Prince?”

Antoinette sat down at the head of the table, and leaned back in her luxurious chair as she combed her white hair over her chest with her fingers. “A gender neutral title, specific to Kindred. Vampires. This is my city, Samantha Terry, and I must apologize yet again. I have failed to keep the peace, to deal with invaders, to expunge the filth, and that has led to this situation. Ideally, you would have lived your life, blissfully unaware—”

“Blissful?” Mom set her glass down, and glared at Antoinette, sparing only a second for Daniel. “My son disappeared. Both of the most important men in my life were dead. I was ... I ... was...”

Silence fell on the room, and Jack, without realizing, put his hand on his mom’s wrist. With a squeeze for her shaking limb, he scooted his chair in a little closer.

“It’s the way it is, Mom. The way it has to be. Lot of vamps go through this problem, abandoning their families. We have to keep it secret, this night life. We’re undead.” Ok, his mom was his mom, and trying to explain to her things like the machinations of ancient elders, the harsh intentions of hunters, and the possible extinction of their race if they became known worldwide, was too much for now. Keep it simple, keep it succinct.”If ... if we became public, the sort of people who killed Mary, would be here in droves with pitchforks and torches. Worse, shotguns and flamethrowers. They’d hunt us down.”

“But ... b-but I thought vampires were the bad guys? I mean, I know it’s not that simple in Twilight, but ... but that’s just a story...”

Jack winced and looked to Antoinette, only to find her gesturing to him. This was a prime opportunity for her to learn about his mother through observation, while at the same time, let him handle tough questions. Smart. Evil of her, but smart.

“We can be. We’re usually somewhere in the gray, Mom. Yeah, we drink blood, but we don’t have to kill anyone. And Antoinette has pushed hard for Dolareido to be a peaceful city, compared to others.”

“Vampires ... are in other cities?”

He nodded, and poured his mom another glass of blood. She was going through it quickly, which was a good sign. “Basically every city. There’s hundreds of Kindred in Dolareido. It’s a society, with its own rules, its own history, its own ... political parties, and its own enemies.”

“And ... and ... I’m ... in that society now?”

“Sort of. You’re a fledgling, brand new. Just do what Antoinette tells you, and everything will be fine. You’ve got the most powerful Kindred in the city as your sire.”

“ ... and ... apparently, she’s your girlfriend?”

He winced, and scratched his buzzed hair. “She is. We love each other, quite a bit.”

His mom squinted at him, trying to read him in that way she always used to, making no effort to hide her attempts to decipher his face. Her gaze turned to Antoinette again after a while, and she spent a little more time looking at her, at how she looked, at the seat she was in, the office she owned, the window she owned, and the man in the trench coat.

“Who ... who’s he?”

“This is Daniel, my sheriff,” Antoinette said.

“Sheriff?”

“Yes, my childe. As my little Vent—as Jack has explained, this is my city. When matters must be handled with force, Daniel is my right hand.”

Mom shrank, and took another gulp of her drink. At least she was getting lost in other things, and not getting stuck on the whole ‘drinking blood’ hurdle a lot of vampires struggled to get over. She might hit it later, especially when she had to feed on an actual person, but for now, this was good.

“I ... I don’t have any say in this, do I?”

Sighing, Jack sat up straight, and withdrew his hand. “Not really, no. I asked Antoinette to sire you, to save your life. You were dying in that bed.” The unspoken choice was obvious of course. Kill herself. He dared not say it. His mom had to be volatile at the moment; a stiff breeze would shatter her. She wasn’t grieving over Mary, because she didn’t have time. Hell, he wasn’t grieving over Julias, because he didn’t have time.

Samantha reached out, and took his hand. She put it back on the table, held it, and managed to smile at him as she, again, gulped down some more blood with her shaking hand. “I’m sorry Jack. I’m just ... struggling to wrap my mind around all this.”

“You have all the time in the world now. You’re immortal.”

“Immortal?”

“One the perks. Antoinette and Daniel are both centuries old.”

Samantha raised her eyes at that; then again, she’d been raising her eyes at everything, and he could tell it was starting to lose meaning for her. “I ... I need to ... to stop ... and think...”

Antoinette smiled at her new childe, nodding, and motioned to Daniel. “Daniel, please go with Jack, and check the prisoner. Keep an eye on him.” A small glance Jack’s way added the double meaning. ‘Him’ meant both Sándor, and Jack. Yeah, that was understandable. “Jack my dear, I know you must report to the Invictus as soon as possible, but please spare a moment for Beatrice. I have invited her to the tower, and I imagine she will arrive within the next thirty minutes.”

Oh fuck. Oh fucking god. He lowered his head, and with heavy shoulders, forced himself to stand.

Beatrice. Her name crashed into him, broke him open, spilled his guts, and left him defenseless. Julias was dead, and he had to tell her. Julias was dead, and he had to tell the Invictus. Julias was dead, and the closest thing he had to a father, was gone.

When the rage rose up within him, this time, it didn't come as a faceless wave. It came up, and it was obvious something else came with it, was pushing it, driving it, forcing it to bubble up through him. His Beast was out of the box, off its leash, and for some fucking reason, it came with its own personality.

Let's go hunting, Jack. Let me drive, and I'll rip the hunters apart. I can find them them. I can find them, and we can rip them into pieces. You don't know how good it feels, to feast until you overflow. We can find that Angela bitch, rape her until she cries, stab her, rip her open, fuck her while we drain her and—

He shook his head, hard, hard enough to hurt his neck. What in the ever living fuck?

When he opened his eyes, Daniel had unfolded his arms from his chest, and one looked ready to reach over his shoulder. He kept a sword back there, a very long sword, hidden inside the trench coat, and he was prepared to use it on him.

They didn't trust him. No, that wasn't true. They trusted him a lot, actually. They trusted him more than they should have, considering his behavior when Antoinette and Damien had found him. Seeing his mom had shattered its hold on him, like ice water to the face and spine. That was why Antoinette had brought her when waking him up, so he'd wake to her face. It was a good idea. It wasn't a good idea to trust Jack with talking to Sándor; but then, Daniel could kill him instantly if he started acting out, or at least stab him with a stake. Maybe.

If Jack was Antoinette, and a Kindred he knew had done what he did, summoned an army of crows, and had a personality shift, he'd have them locked up, hung them up, blindfolded them, and staked them, until he knew what was happening. Christ, the crows. That was a massive Masquerade violation, and it'd take a lot of media manipulation to pass that off as something natural or explainable. The Invictus were going to have his head for that.

He really hoped Scully and Mulder were fine. Would they even still trust him, after seeing what he did?

Daniel came forward, and walked past him before motioning for him to follow. He did, unable to look the man in the eyes. A flicker of the man's gaze said it all: Daniel was more than ready to kill him, and if anything, the man looked offended that Jack had put him in this position. Daniel cared about Antoinette above all, with the only exception being his childe. Jack was now an unknown factor, who spent every night in her bed. If he did anything to make Daniel think he was dangerous, the best he could hope for was a stake to the heart.

“Damien and Natasha are waiting for us, Jack.”

“They are? I—oh, Mom?” He looked over his shoulder back at the two women. A moment of worry was on Antoinette's face, and he caught it; an arrow to the fucking heart, and not a nice, pink one in the shape of a heart. Antoinette was worried about him, very worried, and she was putting that conversation on hold so she could handle her new childe, and everything else. “Stay with Antoinette. She's your sire, and she'll be taking care of you.”

“You’re going?” She almost jumped out of her chair, until Jack motioned for her to sit.

“I sleep here basically every day, and spend a lot of my time here. I’ll see you all the time, ok? I might leave the tower sometime tonight, but I’ll explain the situation to my bosses, and I’ll be back.”

“Oh ... ok ... p-please, come back?”

And his heart shattered. The Beast inside him, demanding he be angry, growling and roaring and looking to unleash its hate toward Angela, went quiet. That strange voice in his head vanished. The sight of his mom’s face, half panicked with the thought of losing the son she’d just got back, when the rest of her life was in ruin, buried the Beast and the rage it rode. Remember that face, Jack.

“I will. Don’t worry.” With a nod, he stepped out of the office, and joined Daniel in the elevator.

“Something happened to you,” the sheriff said. Oh boy, a conversation with the sheriff, when no one else was around. This was bound to end well.

“Yeah. Something ... did.”

“You know what?”

“Kind of? It’s ... it’s a blur. Trying to remember a dream.” Sighing, he put both his hands against the elevator door, and felt the vibrations of its descent. “Something’s inside me, and it isn’t supposed to be there. It’s ... it’s something, from the past, something that’s been in my bloodline for centuries, I guess. Some ... something ... something fucked up.” Something with a voice of its own.

Daniel stared at him, face as still and expressionless as stone, before he adjusted his glasses. “Does it mean us harm?”

“No. It means the hunters harm.”

“I see.” That seemed to alleviate Daniel’s concern a bit. “Is this something you can control, or should we stake you?” Thank god Daniel didn’t give two shits about being gentle with Jack. Antoinette might have wanted to avoid the hard questions, but the sheriff didn’t hesitate.

“I can feel it, something underneath my skin, lurking, hungry.”

“Sounds like the Beast all Kindred deal with.”

“Yeah, except ... except, now, it doesn’t feel like some mindless animal, you know? Now it feels ... feels like ... like something else.” Like something intelligent. Being hunted by an animal was a scary thing. Being hunted by an intelligent entity, on the other hand, was fucking terrifying. Made him feel like he was a helpless kine, in the middle of the woods, in the dark, being hunted by a monster that knew his name.

The elevator opened, and Damien and Natasha stood there, waiting. Damien took one glance at him, and sighed relief. Natasha, on the other hand, ran up to him, and hugged him.

“Jack!” She buried her face in his chest, and squeezed him. “Jack, oh god, I’m so sorry. I ... I...”

He blinked down at the tiny woman. This was new, and he wasn’t sure—

Jack, you’re doing it again. A horrible death haunts you, and you close yourself off. Don’t do that. Don’t go backward.

Sighing, he closed his eyes, and hugged her back, before opening them again and looking to Damien. “Thanks, for helping the Prince.”

“We ran into each other,” he said, shrugging. “And you ... you didn’t need our help.”

“Yes, I did.” He shook his head, and pat Natasha’s back a couple times. She was content to keep hugging him, which seemed very uncharacteristic of her, considering she was just as antisocial as he was. Then again, she’d changed, too. “If you guys hadn’t shown up, I don’t know if ... if I’d ... have snapped back.”

Natasha lifted her head and blinked up at him. “What?”

Sighing again, Jack explained what he could to the three Mekhets. He left out the detail that he’d chosen to let this Beast out, that he decided to do it, and decided to let it off the leash. He also left out the detail that, apparently, it could whisper to him now. Everything else, he explained in as much detail as he could. The attack on the hospital, Julias’s last stand, Jack’s blurry dream, his cursed ancestor, and how Jack defeated the hunters.

“It’s g-good you didn’t kill Sándor,” Natasha said, nodding and smiling as she stepped away from him, though he could see the weight behind it. Better to focus on their prisoner, than Julias’s death, she probably thought. “We think he’s b-b-being controlled, by Elen.” She squirmed a bit when she looked at him, and her eyes fell. She knew about his rage issues, and when he returned her gaze, the glance was enough for her to realize the two issues were connected; likely connected.

Jack drew his head back. “Really? Controlled?”

“Mhmm. There’s s-s-something carved into his back, b-by Elen. And ... he’s ... he’s like a zombie, when t-talking to her.”

That definitely sounded like brainwash behavior. Daniel nodded, and began the walk down the stairs to the lower depths of the tower, where Antoinette kept her prisoners.

“Damien,” Jack said. “Did—”

“I’ve already sent a message to Maria and Jessy. They know about the hunter attack, and ... your sire’s death.” His eyes fell as he said it, but only for a moment. He knew better than to stew in the pain of it, or rather, to let Jack stew in it. “They also know you killed three hunters, and that you captured their Begotten enforcer. They ... also know about the crows.”

Jack winced. Masquerade violation, and a massive one. The fact he’d dealt the hunters a massive blow, and that he was the only Kindred who’d managed to do so ever, let alone thrice, meant he was valuable to the Invictus. That was probably the only thing that kept them from tying him to a rooftop and leaving him there for sunrise, for that degree of violation. It was the sort of violation that’d hit the media, and there’d be no other way to spin it than ‘swarm of crows attack hospital’. It was the sort of media that went viral, and in this day and age, that meant within twenty-four hours of its occurrence, hunters around the world would read about it. Fuck, they’d get to see it on camera footage.

Damien told them, because it was bound to come out eventually anyway. Hell, the thralls probably reported it during the daily reports they prepped for dusk. Still, it was painful knowing his friend had told them, and not let him do it, no matter how justifiable it was.

“Mom’s upstairs with Antoinette now. It’s ... it’s pretty rough. She looks like she’s ready to break down.”

“B-But she was happy to see you, right?” Tash said.

“Yeah, overjoyed. But then I had to tell her about Mary, and that she’s a vampire, and ... it’s a lot. I want to get back up there, be with her, help walk her through this.”

“Trust in the Prince.” Daniel guided the three of them down the hall, not bothering to look back as he spoke. “She can handle your mother’s situation.”

The hallway had a cell at the end of it, but unlike the cell they’d kept Jack in, no other cells lined the hallway. It was also a deeper level of the tower, one Jack had been discouraged from exploring. What sort of secrets did the dragons keep down here? What sort of strange experiments did they perform behind closed doors. Antoinette had made it clear in the past that, while she considered Dolareido her city, and enforced her policies, her role in the Ordo Dracul had nothing to do with it.

Other elders, Jack had learned from her, spent their wealth and power fighting to maintain power. They fought the other covenants, and they fought invaders, like hunters. Antoinette had created a different sort of city, a peaceful one, where she could pursue her dragon interests without having to devote her effort to wars or dictatorship. In retrospect, that was backfiring. No vamp in the city was prepared for this hunter threat, and even if they had been, these hunters were absurdly organized, skilled, and informed.

But the vampires would win. After what happened last night, Jack would make sure they’d win, even if he had to let out his inner monster. No way was he letting Angela, or Elen, or even Jeremiah get out of this city alive.

Yeah, that’s what I like to hear. Find them, kill them. Have fun while you’re doing it, too. Angela’s a pretty thing, and I bet she’d scream and scream as we slowly rip out her entrails.

Jack grit his teeth, and ignored the voice; or tried to. He knew it wasn’t him, and it was fucking sick and twisted. Ignore it.

Daniel pulled open the door. Like Jack’s cell door, it was absurdly thick, capable of withstanding a nuke, or at least the punches of any paranormal. But once inside, the similarities ended.

Natasha and Jack gasped, Damien frowned, and Daniel stood as the statue he always was. The room, lit only by the hallway light, took a second to reveal its secrets, but Kindred eyes adjusted eventually. The walls were metal, the same sort of metal the door was made of, ceiling and floor included. Upon the floor was some sort of painting, or carving, or ... engraving. Carved into the metal, was a circle, and a circle around that, and a circle around that. A seven-pointed star cut across the circle, and stars sat within their points, then symbols he didn't recognize, except that they looked mathematical. Patterns upon patterns.

The symbols and signs Elen used were less mathematical, and more blatant in their occult nature. Hearts, skulls, bones, things like that. Whatever the Prince had set up here, was very different. If there'd been a Fibonacci sequence on the floor, it'd have fit in perfectly.

Sándor knelt in the middle. Both his arms were out to his side, pulled out and raised higher than his shoulders. Metal cuffs wrapped his wrists, and chains connected the cuffs to high points on the walls, refusing to let his hands fall. His head hung forward, and a small pool of blood sat around his knees. A black bandage circled his head and covered his eyes. He was breathing, but it was easy to see each breath was labored.

Rage stirred inside Jack, and the voice came with it again, a whispering, dark voice in the back of his brain.

Rip his arm off, Jack. That'll make him talk. Better yet, you remember that book, 1984? Summon some rats, and have some fun. All sorts of interesting ways you can torture people with rats.

Jack shook his head again, and forced the voice down and out of his thoughts as best he could. He couldn't embrace it, couldn't let the rage well up anymore, couldn't feed the furnace. Not now, not yet. But later, when Angela was in his sights.

Daniel stepped around behind the man, and gestured to his back. “This symbol has been carved into his back, as Natasha described in her report.”

“Report?” Jack said.

“I r-ran into Sándor, and Elen, and some hunters ... not even an hour b-before ... you...”

Wincing, Jack walked around behind the Begotten, and looked at his back. Sure enough, there was a symbol carved there, a circle with an upside-down pentagram, and various things cut into the corners, predictable things, like a realistic heart, and a skull. “Did they use some sort of portal?”

“Yeah! And, it ... it took us int-to some sort of ... flesh chamber.”

A flesh chamber. Ok, that needed a little more explanation, but it could wait. Throw it in the ‘Elen’s crazy magic’ category for now.

“That’s what Angela did then. She opened a portal, using a sacrifice; killed one of our thralls to use her blood for the symbols. Sándor and Elen came out, and ... that’s what turned the tide,” Jack said. Natasha’s eyes went wide, but before she could say anything, Jack shook his head and raised a hand. “You know it’s not your fault, Tash. No one knew how they were getting around.”

She sighed but nodded. “We ... we d-do, now. I have a report f-for ... for the Invictus, to give you, or D-Damien, before you go.”

Damien nodded, but his eyes were locked on the Begotten. “Is he awake?”

Daniel reached around the Begotten’s face, and flicked him in the nose. As the man groaned, Tash squirmed, shifting her weight back and forth on her heels and toes. Yeah, flicking a man in his broken nose was a painful way to test if they were awake. A groan was all that it pulled from him though.

“He can’t do some trick,” Jack said, “and slip into a nightmare chamber from here?”

“No. This symbol creates a barrier between our world and the Shadow realm.” Daniel came around, and squatted down in front of the Begotten. If he was awake, he was either refusing to talk, or Julias’s last moments had been damaging enough to leave the monster borderline comatose; probably both. “We’ve discovered it causes interference for things that ... attempt to cross realms, not just the Shadow realm. It should work on him.”

That didn’t sound terribly reliable, but since Sándor was still here, either it was good enough, or the Begotten couldn’t escape in his current situation anyway. Fiona had said they couldn’t simply go ‘poof’ and arrive in their nightmare chambers, certain prerequisites were required.

Jack squatted down beside the sheriff. A bit presumptuous of him, acting like he was going to be a part of this on even ground, like two detectives interrogating a suspect. But, Daniel had brought him. In fact, Daniel nodded to Jack, and waited. Considering the last thing Sándor got to experience was a swarm of crows killing his comrades, maybe Jack could strike a little fear into the fear monster.

“Sándor,” Jack said. “We know you’re awake. We know you can hear us.”

The man continued to dangle, body wanting to fall but unable to with how his hands were out and strung up by the chains. If he was being controlled, and Tash seemed adamant that he was, then he wasn’t a traitor. Hell, he was a victim, someone they should try and save.

“Damien, try cutting through the symbol on his back.”

Without protest or hesitation, Damien walked behind the prisoner, drew his small sword, and deftly cut across Sándor’s back. It earned another groan from the man, and a few shudders, but otherwise did nothing. Yeah, it figured. It’d have been great if that was all it took to break the spell holding the man, but then, it’d probably have broken easily in the past. However the symbol worked, it was more than skin deep.

Tash came around to stand beside Damien. Frowning, she leaned down and looked at the symbol carved between the prisoner’s shoulder blades. “Elen said that she ... she had to carve this m-m-multiple times. Said he healed from it t-too quickly.”

Jack leaned in close, and gently pushed the man’s head up by his forehead. His hair was buzzed short, like Jack’s, and he had a build of lean, solid muscle, also like Jack. A lot of physical similarities, though Sándor was of average height, and probably had forty pounds of bone and solid muscle on Jack. It was hard to tell anything else about him without eye contact.

“Can I take off the bandage?”

Daniel adjusted his glasses, looked at him, then at the man in chains. “If I think the monster is going to escape somehow, I will cut off his head.”

“How strong are the chains?”

“Neither Antoinette or Jacob would be able to break them.”

Jack, Damien, and Natasha all whistled at the same time. Those were strong chains.

With a wince, Jack reached out, and undid the man’s bandage, exposing his eyes. They were closed, and remained closed. Sighing, Jack pushed his head up by his forehead with one hand, and slid open one of his eyes with a thumb.

This fucker was the reason Julias was dead. If he hadn't had shown up randomly through a fucking Hell portal in a god damn wall, Julias would still be alive. It took every ounce of will Jack had, to not picture his sire on his knees, not picture the warm smile he had before a hunter shot him in the back of the fucking head at Angela's command. He frowned, squeezed his eyes shut, pushed the images down, and looked into the Begotten's eye.

"He's conscious," Jack said. "His horror won't let him die from these wounds. Though, from what I know, he won't be able to heal from them, not easily, until he gets back into his lair. I'm guessing he's not talking because of Tash's theory."

"What's the plan, then?" Damien said.

With a deep, useless breath, Jack put both hands on the man's face, holding his head up while also holding his eyelids up using his thumbs. A quiet growl rumbled in Jack's throat, as he forced the Begotten to look him in the eye, and he smashed his will into the man's mind.

Cold. Something ice cold stood between Jack and the creature's thoughts, like a gate of frozen metal. Touching it with his will sent pain back into Jack, the sort of shock pain jumping into ice cold water caused. And normally, that'd be enough to make Jack back off; who didn't scamper out of water when it was so cold, it made every nerve in your body feel like it was on fire? Tonight, it might as well have been a cool shower. He threw his will against it again, and again, and again, each slam hitting Jack in his guts, and sending more of that cold fire up his spine, but he didn't stop.

Something inside the Begotten growled from within his thoughts. In Jack's mind, in the connection he made with the nightmare incarnate, he could feel something stir beyond the icy gate, and it rumbled its frustration. It didn't like that Jack was trying to break through. Jack didn't care. He slammed his will against the gate again, and the monster beyond, hidden in the endless depths of mental chaos and undefinable darkness, snarled. But, through the bars, he could see — or feel — the horror awaiting him. A nightmare, a beast, a titanic gargoyle lurked beyond the gate, and it was ready to defend itself against anyone who managed to break through the strange barrier. Beating it, defeating this man's will, his very essence, would be difficult.

It didn't matter, ultimately. A strange, red circle flashed in Jack's eyes, and he stopped. The symbols on the circle, inside and around it, were familiar. One of Elen's circles. He let go of the Begotten's head, and fell back, body shaking, muscles clenching.

“You o-ok?” Tash said.

“Yeah, yeah I'm fine.” Jack stood up, and stared down at the limp man. “He's guarded, by more than just his own nightmare horror thing. Elen's circle is blocking me. I can't get at his mind, let alone break it. Maybe ... maybe Julias could have.”

Come on, Jack. Let me out. Let me do it. You think I can't smash through a fucking ward? I'll rip his mind to bits.

Jack gulped, and blinked several times, as he digested that. Ok ... maybe he could talk to ... it.

You'll destroy him. He doesn't deserve to be turned into an invalid.

Yes he does. He's been captured and turned into a fucking robot, serving his masters, hunters. Any paranormal who fucks up that bad deserves to die.

Jack growled and shook his head hard, earning some glances from the others. Talking to himself was natural, and he'd been doing it since long before he was a vampire. But when himself starting talking back, especially when not prompted, that was unacceptable. A back and forth between his inner self? Christ, it was so cliché. Doctor Jekyll, meet Mister Hyde.

He didn't tell the others his Beast came with a voice now, and he wasn't going to. He'd told them enough. This was his burden, and he could manage it. And, much as he hated to admit it, he needed this monster lurking underneath his skin. Once Angela, Jeremiah, and Elen were dead, he could tell the others, and let them lock him away; or dissect his brain, or whatever they'd do.

“What do we do then?” Damien said.

Jack shrugged as he looked down at the prisoner. “The Prince would have a better chance of breaking him than any Ventrue currently ... alive, in the city.” There were never that many Ventrue in Dolareido, and they lost the greatest of them last night. “Her Majesty discipline might do it. Even if it can't, she's gotta have a plan, right?”

“If she doesn't,” Daniel said, “she will have one soon. We didn't expect to capture the Begotten alive.”

Nodding, Jack circled the Begotten a couple times, looking for details he may have missed. “Last night's encounter set them back a lot.”

“Us too,” Damien said.

Jack winced, but nodded. “Yeah ... us too.” Stop it. Don't think about it. Think about it later. “We have to lick our wounds, and so do they. Gives us some time to see if maybe we can get through to the Begotten, or figure out a plan.”

“Agreed.” Damien turned for the door, but glanced back to look at the prisoner. “We should probably get him drink and food. He's not a vampire. His body will starve.”

“Agreed.” Jack retied the bandage around the monster’s eyes, and looked to Daniel for confirmation. The elder nodded, and the four of them left the room.

What a waste of time. If they couldn’t get through to Sándor, either with Disciplines or words, he wouldn’t be of use. Torture was unlikely to work, considering who and what he was, and from how the man was basically a zombie.

“Elen said she had t-to redraw the symbol, after he healed it,” Tash said. “M-Maybe if we wait, he’ll ... he’ll b-b-break free on his own?”

Jack nodded, and once Daniel began leading them again, the four of them started up the stairs back to the lobby. Maybe Sándor would heal and eventually be free of his magical binding, if that was the case. It was hard to believe any sort of curse could be permanent, when used on something as powerful as a Begotten; Jack’s certainly wasn’t permanent. And this Sándor, he was brutally strong. If Jack and Julias had faced him in the nightmare, it wouldn’t have been a fight at all. And—shit.

The Fates hated Jack. They despised him. As if discovering his new life with Antoinette had pissed them off, and now he was doomed to suffer eternally, everything conspiring against him. Maybe they’d summoned Angela, to destroy him, break him, ruin him. Whatever happened, his life was becoming one unending string of bullshit, perfectly timed to bring the worst possible pain. His torture, his mother’s assault, Mary’s death, Julias’s death, it was a string of Hell. And it never stopped.

As he stepped out of the stairway, and up into the fancy, massive lobby of the Elysium Tower, someone came up from around the front desk. Jack knew who it was, even before his eyes recognized her. Half because Antoinette said she was coming, half because he knew the Fates wanted to make sure he suffered until the end of time.

---

---

~~Antoinette~~

Standing by her window, hands behind her, she watched Beatrice approach her tower. The woman knew what floor to come to, and Antoinette suspected the Nosferatu would be suspicious of the meeting. She had not talked to her lover, Julias, and would be looking for him, or awaiting his response to her messages to him. Antoinette would have to explain the reality, and she did not look forward to hurting her so. She still trusted the woman, all fire and energy, to reach Jacob, and pull her old friend back from his dark agendas. But after tonight, that would, perhaps, be a lost hope.

Hopefully, with a touch of luck, Jack would be able to handle the situation better than her. She did not want to bury the boy in yet more pain, but Beatrice deserved to hear this from him. And, she needed to know, how this new Jack would respond.

Samantha stood beside the Prince, the small creature sipping from her glass, robe still wrapped around her. She gasped once or twice as she stared over the city landscape, its colorful horizon of lights and lit signs, and the desert that lay beyond.

“I still can’t really believe it.”

“You saw the condition of your son’s suit, Samantha.”

“I ... I didn’t ... I didn’t really, honestly.”

Antoinette chuckled at that, and looked down at her new childe. “It was filled with gunshot wounds, Samantha. Last night, your son, and his sire, fought perhaps eight hunters, to save your life.”

“Hunters?”

“I ... I suppose Jack will be better equipped to explain the circumstances in terms you can understand. Media, television and video, I have not remained enlightened as to modern storytelling.”

“Modern ... storytelling?”

“I am very old, Samantha Terry. I moved to a quaint little village hundreds of years ago, and I grew it into the Dolareido you see today. As your son explained, we are immortal.”

The glass in her hands began to tremble, and Antoinette reached out to set her hand underneath it. Touching its bottom was enough to awaken her childe from her shock, and regain her grip on the glass.

“It really is your city?”

“Indeed.”

“And ... and I’m ... your childe?”

“Indeed.” Antoinette waved a dismissing hand. “For now, you need only concern yourself with becoming comfortable with your new existence. Your old life is gone, and ... and while nothing can undo the horrible pains inflicted upon you, or return to you that which has been stolen, you must understand that you have been reborn. You are now a creature of the night, Samantha Terry, and now you are to begin your second life.”

“Second life...” The small woman took a sip, before stepping closer to the glass, and looking down at the garden maze far below. “My old life ended only an hour ago, for me, miss ... I’m sorry, you never told me your last name.”

“A thing lost to the annals of time.”

“You lost your last name?”

“If I contacted my order, or if I searched through decrepit journals from my past, I am sure I could recover it, but it is not necessary, or desired.” She turned, and walked back to the glass table. Sitting down upon her large chair, she motioned for Samantha to join her once again. “My second life began many centuries ago, Samantha. My last name is an artifact from ancient days that no longer have meaning to me.”

“B-But, your family, I—”

Antoinette shook her head, and leaned back in her chair again, pulling her hair over her shoulder to begin combing it. “Unfortunately, one of the negatives of our long lives, is that our memory fades, and is suspect. That which occurred over a hundred years ago has faded somewhat. Two hundred years, is quite blurry. Three hundred years, I have only the faintest, drifting images. Before that, it is ... gone.”

Samantha stared at her, eyes wide and wider still. The poor woman’s eyes were going to slip free of her skull if she continued.

“And ... s-someone like you ... is Jack’s ... love?”

Of course, the mother could not help but wonder about the woman dating her son.

“Your son is an amazing man, Samantha Terry. He has affected this city, influenced it and its denizens of the night, and made great strides in many facets, including his political power, financial security, and abilities as a vampire.”

Jack’s mother frowned, and looked down at the drink in her hand. “And that’s why you love him?”

Ah, she was concerned about the sort of woman Antoinette was underneath the skin, concerned for her son. It was terribly cute, and the Prince smiled at her new childe.

“No. I love your son because I have met few, in my many years of unlife, that have his conviction, his commitment to honesty with himself and others, and yet, he somehow remains sensitive and sincere. I can always trust your son to be genuine, Samantha. We Kindred, we have an instinct to deceive and to manipulate, and yet your son resists this urge.” She sighed, and let her head lean back onto the spine of her chair, as she smiled. “He is a diamond in the rough, Samantha. You raised a wonderful man.”

“Diamond ... I...” The fledgling found a smile, a real smile buried underneath her misery, and it sneaked its way onto her lips as she took another sip of her drink. “I always told him, growing up, that he needed to be honest, with himself and everyone else. His dad, he ... he taught him how to think, before he died. Challenged him, you know? When Jack would ask ‘Why’s the sky blue?’, he’d say ‘Dunno, why is the sky blue? See if you can find out.’ And Jack would stay up late on the computer, rotting his eyes and brain, but sure enough, the next day, he’d give James a big explanation about something scientific, and ... and ... and Mary would roll her eyes. Call him a nerd.” Her shoulders began to shake, and she set the glass down on the table before she dropped it. “I can’t believe she’s gone.”

Antoinette reached out, poured herself a glass of blood, and took a sip as she leaned back in her chair once more. “There is no misery greater, than a parent losing their child.”

“I ... I didn’t think ... I didn’t think I’d have to face it again. At least this time, there’s closure. M-Mary is ... is gone.”

“And your son Jack, is alive.” After another sip, Antoinette offered her child her gaze. Let her peer into her soul, and she her in return. For Antoinette, it was as if looking upon an icy desert of pain. For Samantha, hopefully, there was stability and honesty found in Antoinette’s eyes. “There will be plenty of time to grieve, Samantha, but for now, I must explain to you the role you play in your new life.”

“D ... do I get a say in this?” She looked down at her drink, a hint of fear in her eyes.

“No. Well ... I suppose that is not true. You will always have the choice to end your own life, if you so desire.”

She snapped her head up and blinked at her, as if it were the most absurd suggestion she had ever heard. Bien.

“I wouldn’t ... I ... I couldn’t ... now that Jack...” Now that Jack was alive, she would not consider it.

“Then you are my childe, and for now, I am responsible for you.”

“How long does that last for?”

“For the first year or two of your life, you are considered a fledgling, and your sire is held accountable for your actions. After, once you have proven capable of survival and respecting the Masquerade, you are a neonate, until you are about fifty years old, in Kindred years. Your covenant will be your guide in those years. Generally, from fifty to about one hundred and fifty years old, you are ancilla, and you will be a key figure within your covenant, trusted with difficult tasks, and important decisions. After, you are what we consider an elder, and you will be a key figure within whatever city you reside, respected and feared by all.” She chuckled as she watched Samantha reel with the massive numbers. “Though, by the time you reach such an age, I suspect many of us will be within spaceships, and will have to discover new ways to approach our nightlife.”

She downed her drink, and poured herself another. “Good god ... Masquerade?”

“The veil of secrecy we Kindred hold dear. If you announce the existence of vampires publicly to humans, which we call kine, you will be killed. If you perform an act that would draw the suspicion of the kine, you will be punished.” Before her childe could begin inevitable panic, Antoinette smiled and shook her head. “Do not fret. I will guide you.”

“H ... how many vampires are in Dolareido?”

“Less than three hundred, at the moment. I have allowed siring to recommence, to repopulate.”

“Three hundred, and you run the city? You, alone? But there are millions of people in Dolareido.”

Antoinette leaned toward her childe, and grinned. “You are a creature of the night now, little Terry. You will grow into powers you can not even begin to comprehend.” She held up a hand, open palm, four fingers and thumb spread outward. “There are primarily five types of Kindred, childe, and since you are my childe, you share in my bloodclan. We are Daeva.”

“Daeva?”

“Mmm, oui.” She increased the sensuality of her words, her expressions, and took another sip of her drink. “Of two of the many shared disciplines, we are naturals: strength, and speed.”

“Like ... those superhero movies?”

“Quite. All Kindred share in common disciplines, and all bloodclans find they are naturals at two of them. Speed, strength, resilience, the ability to cloak ourselves from sight, and the ability to talk to, summon, and control animals.”

“ ... I ... I can't even...”

This was delightful. As much as the poor woman had to manage the greatest moment of chaos in her life, misery and joy mixing, it was pleasing to see the wonder and surprise on her face. Antoinette had not taken the time to explain to a fresh vampire the enchanting aspects of their Kindred species, in many, many years.

“Bloodclans also have unique abilities. We, the Daeva, can bend the minds of others, into adoration.”

“Adoration?”

“The Nosferatu can haunt the minds of others with nightmares, and make them feel fear. Gangrel can transform into hideous beasts, and alter their bodies in many ways. Mekhet can see into the truth of people, events, and objects, even so far as seeing glimpses of the past. Ventrue, like your son, can break the minds of others, and turn them into obedient servants. Particularly skilled Ventrue can wipe memories, change them, manipulate them. While you and I, Samantha Terry, can drown ourselves in sin and pleasure with but a flick of our wrist and wink of the eye. I could, within a single month, teach you to turn any kine you wish into an adoring fan for the night, someone who would do whatever you wished of them. Anything.”

“You m-mean ... s-s-s-s—”

“You are a vampire, Samantha. You feed on humans, and while that may sound horrible, I assure you it need not be. We call it the Kiss, and it is exquisite. It is more pleasurable than sex, and there is nothing to stop you from indulging in both, at the same time. For Daeva, this is particularly effortless, as we can use the discipline Majesty to turn any kine into a dotting, enraptured admirer.” With a playful wink, she took another sip of her drink. “And, if you take your time, build the moment, and let your hunger emerge as a creature of lust, rather than aggression, the Kiss becomes overwhelmingly blissful for the kine. Many, if not most of the Kindred in my city enjoy feeding during sex, and indulge in total freedom in their pursuits of pleasure.”

“Oh ... god ... W-Wait, I’m not blushing! I should be blushing.” The woman pat her cheeks, likely seeking the heat that did not come.

Antoinette chuckled again, and nodded. “You will learn how to, as we call it, Blush Life, and with a smattering of will and energy, force your body to behave as it once did, before you were turned.”

She continued, and took delicate moments to explain to her childe the nuances of a Kindred’s life. The Blush of Life, feeding, torpor, and avoiding fire and sunlight. Required knowledge, before she dared let Samantha out of her sight.

Beatrice did not come to meet her, doubtless having run into Jack, or the three Mekhet. Sorrow gripped Antoinette, pulling at her, demanding she give it her attention. She refused. Julias’s death, and Beatrice’s inevitable misery, were not as important as preparing her new childe for her second life, her requiem.

And once the Nosferatu learned of her lover’s death, God have mercy on the fool who stumbled onto her path tonight.

---

---

~~Beatrice~~

She did not like this.

Walking up to the Elysium Tower never felt good, but that was normal for any Nosferatu. The tower represented peace, and younger Kindred hung around in the gardens, free from any covenant disputes. A no-violence zone. If Kindred wanted to show up, talk, get to know each other, this was where they’d do it. Nosferatu didn’t show up, because they were ugly as fuck, and that startled other young Kindred. So they hung out by themselves for the first few years of their embrace, and longer, hiding in sewers and whatnot until they were strong enough to Cloak themselves easily.

Times were different. She was different. She was a witch now, Jacob's student, and that put her on Antoinette's radar in a way she didn't necessarily like. She'd helped Jack when dealing with that strange spider monster in the sewers, so she had that to put her in Antoinette's favor, at least. Antoinette had also asked her to actually do her a favor, for Jacob, so there was that, too. And now she was dating one of the Invictus council, putting her on everyone's radar, which was probably what this call was about. The fuck did Julias do now?

She'd sent him a message before going to sleep yesterday, since he wasn't at the mansion. Still no reply. Strange. Ugh, did the man piss off the Prince somehow? Or lose his phone. Julias wasn't the type to forget his phone, or lose it, but who knew.

"Let me know how it goes," Jen said. She moved over to a bench, and sat nearby some other Kindred. The chance of hunters coming to Elysium was none, but still, the buddy system wasn't going away until the hunters were gone. Vamps had to stick together.

Nodding, Triss walked up the stairs. Once through the front door, she frowned at the thrall behind the front desk. A fat guy, bald, and he offered her a small wave.

"Miss Damar? Hey, come on in. You're expected."

"... thanks." She didn't bother Cloaking to hide herself from him, but it'd never be easy, revealing her mutations to a kine. The fat man did a double take once he noticed her cheeks, or lack there of, and the crocodile teeth that sat where cheeks were supposed to be, but quickly went back to his computer — and donuts — once he saw that she saw.

God damn, the tower was a fancy thing. The Invictus tower was all black marble, but the Elysium Tower was black marble with white veins, fucking everywhere. It was gorgeous, and imposing. And—oh, Jack and crew. Four Kindred came up from the stairs in the back of the big lobby, and turned to face her, Jack at the forefront. Tash, Damien, and Daniel followed him, probably the three most powerful Mekhet in the city. Scary.

She met Jack's eyes, and froze.

The boy stood there, and while she could see he struggled with it, he was forcing himself to look at her. The other three couldn't, avoiding her gaze, as if catching her snake eyes would set them on fire. Even Daniel, the fucking statue, had picked something else to look at, rather than meet her eyes.

“Natasha, come with me,” Daniel said. “Thralls have been at the hospital all day, Invictus and ours, and we should join them. The Invictus council have sent Vicky Goldman and Bruce Vanna, and we should oversee the results.”

Vicky and Bruce were Ventrue, and if they were going somewhere, with the sheriff too, then they were handling a cleanup. Ventrue would use their Dominate to control the situation, rewrite some kine memories, and deal with fallout. But, like with Eric's first transformation, if it was a serious situation, Julias was the Ventrue they'd send.

She was paralyzed. She couldn't move. Her feet were stuck to the floor, and her arms hung at her sides, limp, chains tying them to the Earth. As the two Mekhets walked past her, they continued to avoid her eyes, and Tash looked like she carried a weight on her back.

“I'm heading to the Invictus HQ,” Damien said. As he walked past Jack, he looked over his shoulder, and Beatrice could see the grimace in the muscles of his jaw. “Michael and Maria will need a more thorough report.” He didn’t wait for Jack’s response, leaving, gaze on the floor.

The kid nodded, but didn’t take his eyes off hers, even as Damien walked past her, leaving the two of them alone. They both stood there, looking at each other, and listened to the footsteps on the hard floor. A minute went by, and then another. Jack swallowed hard, several times, a habit he couldn’t seem to break, and it made his discomfort obvious. More than discomfort. The kid was oozing agony from every pore, to the point he might as well have bled black.

Oh fuck. Please god, please, don’t let it be that. Anything, fucking anything other than what she could see in the kid’s eyes.

“ ... Triss,” the kid said, and the waver in his voice broke through her ribs and ripped out her heart with a splatter of gore and and anguish. “I—”

“How?”

“What?”

“How did it happen?” No dancing around it, avoiding it, going into denial about it. Get it out of the way. Rip the bandaid off, even if it took all her skin with it.

“I...” Finally, the kid broke, and his eyes fell. His shoulders trembled for a moment, and she could see he was fighting off the urge to cry. “I was at the hospital, visiting Mary and Mom. He came to see me, and then hunters showed up, with Angela. Then Elen and Sándor showed up using some sort of portal, and it ruined ... ruined everything. They were ... going to take Mom, and ... and use her to ... get to me.” His fingers squeezed, tightening into fists as the kid forced down the shaking until it was gone. “We stopped them. Killed three hunters, maybe four, and even captured Sándor. But ... but Julias ... he...”

“Died doing a valiant last stand, right?”

“Yeah ... yeah.”

“And your mom?”

Jack lifted his eyes, and dug through the cesspit of misery he was swimming through, to find a small smile for her. “He saved her. She’s upstairs, with Antoinette, sire and childe.”

She nodded, and let her eyes drop. Yeah, that sounded like Julias, sacrificing himself to save someone else. His childe’s mom? Definitely a Julias move.

Julias was dead.

She felt her long tongue press against the top of her mouth, and her throat constrict. Julias was dead. The words meant nothing at first, even as she ran them through her head several times. Julias was dead. Just three words that bounced off of her, as if spoken in an unknown language. Julias. Was. Dead.

As seconds slowly trickled by, meaning came to the words, context creeping in, no matter how much she didn’t want it to. Julias was dead, which meant, the man who first showed her her disfigurement wasn’t the problem she thought it was, was gone. The man who held her tight, hugged her, made her feel safe, was gone. The man who made her laugh, took her out to feed on kine, danced with her, was gone. The man who didn’t mind her kinks, enjoyed and embraced them, inviting her friend into their bed, was gone. The man who pampered her, made her feel like a princess, and laughed when she acted like a spoiled one, was gone. The man who loved her, was gone.

Her white knight, her Superman, was dead.

Jack gasped as she threw herself at him. Her claws found his shoulders, and she sank them into flesh as she grabbed him, crashing his back to elevator door behind him. She picked him up, pinning him to the door, and glared at him, as the cold tremors started to work through her. Rage. She'd managed to skip right over denial then, like she wanted to. Yeap, sounded like her, sprinting out of the gate and then tripping a moment later.

“You!” She bashed the man against the elevator door, slamming him into it several times. “He died helping you!” She squeezed harder, and stared into the man’s eyes as pain hit him. “He died because of you!” She knew she lost control. Deep down, past the icy pain that now coursed through her, she knew this wasn’t fair. Didn’t care, didn’t matter. Pain. Rage. She had to get it out, had to before she exploded.

Footsteps forced her head to look over her shoulder, and the fat guard came closer, a pistol in his hands.

“Ma’am, put down Mister Terry, before I—”

“It’s ok, Chunk,” Jack said, shaking his head at the thrall. “Go back to your desk, and pretend you didn’t see anything.”

“Um, are you sure Mister Terry? She—”

“Go, Chunk. Now.”

The thrall frowned, but put his pistol away, and walked back to his desk. Good. If he’d fired, Triss knew she’d have ripped the tubby fucker into bits.

She glared back up at Jack as her tremors grew. Her whole body was shaking, and her fingers tightened around his shoulders, claws getting through his suit. And—

His suit. Holy shit, his suit. He was covered in holes, and dried blood. He must have been shot a couple dozen times, and from the amount of blood on him, he must have been swimming in death.

This kid. This fucking, god damn kid. Ruin followed him wherever he went. Julias almost died that night when Rebecca fought him helping Tony, and Triss saved him. Twice! Viktor and Tony died around Jack in that confrontation. Then Lucas, and a host of other young Kindred. A hunt for a spider monster turned into two, randomly, and it'd gone ballistic trying to kill Jack. Then Angela and the hunters, not even in the city for him, were now suddenly trying to destroy his life.

The kid was cursed.

She lowered him, and stopped squeezing, letting her claws slip free of his flesh. But looking into his eyes soon proved too much, the honest green opening his soul to her. Pain. Christ, the kid was in pain, and she was blaming him, hurting him. Fuck. Fuck fuck fuck. Blame someone! She had to blame someone, anyone.

This wasn't happening. This couldn't be happening.

Her head fell, dangling in front of her, and her clutching hands shook Jack lightly. Strength vanished. An icy cold blanket, heavy, painful, covered her from head to toe, and pulled her down toward the floor. No matter how hard she tried, she couldn't find strength anymore, and her palms slid down Jack's arms. Soon, her knees met the floor, and her hands continued to slide down Jack's legs, until they fell to the floor as well. She tried to lift her head again, and she managed a few inches, enough to look up at Jack. Mistake. The kid, helpless to his own god damn honesty, met her eyes, and she crumbled.

He was broken. He was destroyed. But he was carrying on, despite it. She couldn't.

“He ... he can't be dead,” she said, voice choking against rising sobs. “He can't be! I ... I need him ... I ... I can't ... please, I can't ... I can't!” Back to denial, then.

“He's dead.” The wasteland of death and ice that surrounded them both, broke apart under the crashing weight of his words. And beneath it, all that awaited her, was a freezing cold, dark, endless abyss.

“Don't say that!”

“He's ... he's gone, Triss.”

“He's not gone! I need him! He can't be gone. No! He's not! He's not! He's—”

“Gone ... he ... he's gone.” Jack's back pressed to the elevator door, and he started to slide down it. Soon he was sitting on the floor, legs apart, her between them. “He's dead.”

“He's not dead! No! He'll ... he ... he had a plan, right? He'll—”

“He's gone! He's ... he's gone, Triss. He's dead, and ... and I couldn't save him...”

Her whole body trembled, no matter how much she tried to stop it. “He's not! He's not ... not...” She reached out, grabbed his ruined suit, and tried to shake him. She might as well have been trying to shake a mountain. “I can't ... I can't...”

His hands found hers, and his gentle grip wrapped her wrists. “He's gone ... he's dead, Triss. He's dead, and ... and ... it's my fault.”

Again, his words cut through her body like he wielded a sword. The hurt ran deep, into her guts, into her fucking bones, until it buried every inch of her. There was no escaping it. Even if she curled up and covered herself, protected herself, it wouldn't help. It was coming at her from the inside.

She forced herself to look at the small man sitting on the floor with her, and managed to find enough strength to glare. His fault. He said it. He took responsibility. It was his fault! His fault Superman was dead. His fault. His fault. His fault. She tried to shake him, tried to use her claws, tried to do something, but nothing worked. Her body was broken, strength gone. She was broken.

The rage began to fade.

“It's not,” she managed to say, after a few weeping minutes of quiet. “You know it's not. You damn well know it's not, Jack. That fucking idiot just couldn't help himself. And ... and I knew it'd happen, too. I knew it'd happen. I fucking knew it'd happen eventually.” And she hated herself for it, for letting her walls down, for letting him get close, closer than anyone ever. Stupid. How could she be so stupid, to fall in love with someone like that?

Jack let go of her wrists, and the two of them sat quiet, until they stopped trembling.

“Triss ... Julias, he ... he wanted me to tell you—”

“He was going to make some sort of grand, sweeping, romantic gesture, wasn't he?”

He blinked at her. “Yeah...”

“I knew it. Fucker was ... was smiling way too much, when he looked at me.”

“He wanted to marry you. Said he was ... going to use the last secret, some sort of bet, to tell you?”

She choked as a sob and laugh fought to come out at the same time. “Of course he fucking did. The stupid bastard. I—” She almost made a joke about her wearing a white dress or something, but the thought came with an image, of her and Julias, cuddling in bed, wedding dress hanging on the wall. They’d be together, forever.

And now that was gone. Everything she loved about him, everything she loved, was gone.

She got up, and walked away. She half expected Jack to say something, but a quick glance over her shoulder showed he was forcing himself back up onto his feet, and watching her leave. He looked broken and ruined, and she knew she looked the same. But he got up, and was ready to push forward. Something came out of all this misery for him: capturing a key enemy figure, and saving his mom. No way the kid was going to let this break him totally, when his mother probably balanced on the edge of a psychological knife as was. There was a good side to Julias’s death for him, something that made his sacrifice worth it.

There was nothing for her.

Once she was outside, Jennifer caught her eyes, and ran over to her.

“Triss?”

Beatrice managed to look her friend in the eyes, before her head fell, and she almost started wailing, screaming, crying, and destroying. But a quick glance around showed there were watching Kindred, young neonates, eyes wide and taking in both her disturbed expression, and Jennifer’s rather revealing, mostly open suit jacket.

“He ... he’s ... Julias, he’s...”

“Oh ... oh god ... I—”

“Not here. Not ... not here.” She started walking, and wrapped the two of them in a Cloak of Night. No interruptions, from anyone, would be tolerated. She needed to get out, away, needed to go where she could cry, and rage.

Jennifer managed a small squeak, before following after her.

---

The catacombs beneath South Hill Cemetery. Three Kings Cemetery got all the attention, but South Hill was still a great place for any vampire who was looking to be sneaky. She'd spent many years in it, scaring off punks who wanted to fuck with it, break in and do graffiti and whatnot. The Prince built the city, and had made sure to slip in some classic cemeteries when she did, because hey, old vampires be old.

Triss managed a small smile as she stepped down into her old hideout. Coffins on the walls in shelves cut out of the stone, everything covered in dust and dirt, and a few skulls and other bones sat out in artistic-yet-totally-not-manually-placed spots. For any Kindred who wanted to be alone, and reflect on their second life, their requiem, this was the perfect place.

“Triss,” Jen said, following her down into the darkness, “you ... you're sure?”

“Jack was sure. Saw it in his eyes. Kid was rocked, absolutely fucking wrecked. Julias is ... is...” As she tried to get the word out, she collapsed. Weight slammed down against her, drove her knees into the stone floor of the catacomb, and her claws raked against it. “Oh god ... no ... I ... I can't...”

Jen came over to her and reached out, but Triss slapped her hand away. “Triss, please, you—”

“He's dead, Jennifer! He's dead! The ... the ... the man ... the only man I ... He's fucking ... fucking ... d ... d...” In the depths of the Earth in the catacomb, in the darkness and stone, in the presence of dozens of corpses, she let go of what small shred of composure she'd managed to hold onto. Her wails came out, and she slammed her hands against the stone floor again, and again, and again.

Jennifer said nothing. Good. Much as Triss loved her, and even wanted her here, she didn't want to be soothed, didn't want to be placated, didn't want to have someone tell her it was going to be ok. It was not going to be ok. It was all ruined, all destroyed, gone, fucking gone.

Triss got up, and walked up to one of the coffins. She grabbed it, ripped out the massive hunk of wood, and shattered it against a nearby wall. The corpse within was nothing but bone and a very old suit, and they shattered along with the shards of wood. Jen raised an arm to stop the flying splinters from hitting her, doing her best to block them in the dark, as Triss walked up to another coffin. Needed to do something, needed to destroy, to break, needed to let out some rage before she killed every kine within a mile.

Jen's eyes were wide, and her mouth parted. It was almost enough to give Triss pause, but she didn't. She marched over to another coffin, sank her claws into it, and whipped it out. A few hundred pounds of heavy, thick, solid wood, plus corpse, and she threw it across the stone room hard enough that it exploded as it collided with a wall. A sob worked up through her, forced her throat to clench tight, and made each heave her lungs forced get stuck. All she managed were growling sobs, grunts and grumbles mixing into her crying, as she let out another scream. She walked over to another coffin, and started to tear into it, claws slicing against the stone around it, scratching, but her claws couldn't break stone. The wood, on the other hand, was helpless, and she ripped the thick, heavy thing into bits in seconds.

Dead. He was dead. He'd never hold her again, never smile at her again, never fuck her, never kiss her, never pamper her, never tease her, never play with her, never beat her at poker, never cuddle with her, never—

“This is where you first met Julias, right?” Jen said, ready to duck if she needed to.

Triss stopped her rampage long enough to look Jen’s away. With a long, weary sigh, she set her hands down on the shelf edge, and her head dangled in front of her, between her shoulders.

“Not ... not exactly, but it’s where we first talked. He’d ... he almost died in a fire, knocked into torpor by Rebecca. I saved him, brought him here, and fed him some criminal fuckwad.” Chuckles managed to break through her quieting sobs. “He ... he showed ... interest, in me. It was the first time I’d ever felt ... wanted by someone, since my embrace.”

“You know—”

“Yeah, I know, I really overestimated how badly Kindred reacted to Nosferatu. But he was still ... he ... it wasn’t just about attraction. He ... he ... made me feel ... different, and...” She slowly turned around, and sat down, back to the wall behind her, knees up to her chest. “He was so stupid. I called him a tragedy freak, someone who got off on the drama. He ... called me out on my own bullshit, later, and ... and...”

Jen came over, and sat down next to her, an inch between them. She emulated her sitting position too, wrapping her arms around her legs. “I can’t believe he’s gone.”

Triss draped an arm across her knees, and let her forehead rest on it, as her sobs became wails once again. It wasn’t a sound she was familiar with. Crying, sure, what girl didn’t cry every now and then? But this wailing sound, this banshee cry, she’d never made it before in her whole life. It filled the catacomb, echoed through it, and anyone in the cemetery was going to think some fucking ghost was haunting it.

“ ... Angela,” she said, forcing some words out between her cries. If she’d been Blushing Life, tears and snot would have been dripping off her chin. “Jack says she ... attacked the hospital to get to his mom, so they ... could manipulate him.”

“Really?”

“Yeah. Elen showed up ... with Sándor, using that portal we went through. Or another one like it, I guess.”

“Oh ... oh god. If we had—”

“We didn’t know, and we ... we didn’t...” Every part of her wanted to blame herself, and Jen, and Aaron and Othello and Natasha and Antoinette and Jacob and Garry and Daniel and Maria and Michael and who the fuck else, for her Superman’s death. Above all, she wanted to blame Jack. But that was a road down stupidity lane, and she couldn’t let herself go there, no matter how much she wanted to. “Jack captured Sándor.”

“Jack did?”

“Yeah, he ... he did ... somehow.” Her crying sobs started to settle, and with a few more minutes, she got herself under control. Quiet whimpers refused to die, but for now, that was fine. “I—”

“Now, why on Earth, would a pretty lady like yourself, be makin’ such a fuss?” the darkness said in a Southern drawl.

Chapter 91

~~Beatrice~~

The two vampires jumped up and spun around, looking around in the dark. That voice. She recognized that voice. What the fuck, why was it here? Both of them pulled out their phones and started shining them around, but the catacomb was empty.

“You ... you can’t be here,” she said. “No one’s ... no one’s been sacrificed.” Jen stepped in closer to her, and pressed her shoulder to hers, enough for Triss to feel her friend trembling. While Triss was still shaking because her world had been destroyed, Jen was shaking because she was scared. Black Blood, without Jacob nearby? Shit. Fucking shit.

Black mist began to drip from the stones above, and out of the coffin Triss had destroyed. It fell over the stones, the bones she’d scattered everywhere, and the rocks and dirt. Oh fuck, oh fucking fuck. She backed away, and tried to move toward the exit, spine to the stone shelves behind her, and free hand taking Jen’s, but the dripping black began to fall over the exit and its stairs. More of it came down, and more, until it dripped down over the stairs like heavy mist on a cold lake come morning.

The bones started to move.

“The sacrifice is useful for summoning me, little missy. But, you think I can’t come and go as I please, where I please, talk with who I please?” With quiet little clacks, the bones rolled, hitting the stone floor with soft bounces that echoed, now that Triss and Jen had gone silent. Shattered bones came back together, bits of white dust, and splintered shards found each other to reform. An arm with its hand and fingers still attached started to drag itself across the floor, and she almost laughed at how ridiculous it looked, before she remembered why it was doing that.

Jen shook her head, eyes wide as she watched the skeletons put themselves back together. “W-What do you want?”

“Why, to talk, like I said.” He — err, it — was using that damn Southern accent again, complete with a drawl, but she couldn’t focus on it, as if it was coming from around them.

“Jacob isn’t here. Go talk to him.” Triss took a step toward the exit again, but stepped back, as two skeletons began to form from the hundreds of bones. They sat on the stairs, and they moved like people moved, complete with shrugs, and giving each other some buddy pats on the back. One of them took off its jaw bone, looked at it, and traded it with the other, who nodded in agreement.

Did Jacob get his stupid sense of humor from Black Blood, or the other way around?

“And I will, young lady, I will. But I want to talk to you first, before Malachi does.” One of the skeletons took off its head, and set it on its lap. The voice continued to come from all around the two Kindred, despite how the spirit was obviously drawing their attention the two puppets. “I could hear your screams, you know, on the other side.”

“What? How?”

“This is my city, young lady. I have ears everywhere, and eyes, too. Besides, the little vampire boy did something truly wondrous, and every spirit on my side of the curtain noticed.”

She blinked, and did her best to not stare too hard at the skull sitting on the skeleton’s leg; it wasn’t doing the talking. The voice came from the black mist that dripped around them, that filled the small cracks and dents in the stone floor, that leaked out of the coffins around them. Any second now, every skeleton was going to climb out of their coffins, and do a fucking dance from some bad old Western, sexy burlesque movie scene.

“B-Black Blood,” Jen said, “I ... I mean, we really don’t have permission to be talking with you, without Ja—Malachi around.”

“We’re just talkin’, sweet pea,” the alien god said. It must have had a library in its head of annoying pet names for women. “Besides, ain’t nothing I’m gonna say, you can’t say to him later.” While one skeleton pat the skull still perched upon its leg, the other slapped its own knee, as if excited. Triss wouldn’t have been surprised if the skeleton thought it was at a shindig.

“... fine,” Triss said. She forced down the rising vitae in her body, readying her for fight or flight, and lowered her phone. The light stayed on though, in case the fucker decided to get uppity. “What do you know?”

“That your world has been destroyed.”

The words cut her down, and she almost fell with them. The fucker, the god damn fucking alien creature, knew what words to use to sucker punch her. It knew exactly what it was talking about.

“You know...”

“Julias Mire, is dead, yes. Though I only saw the aftermath, as his childe called an unholy reckoning upon his attackers. A beautiful sight, seeing the boy get revenge. Well, not quite, seeing as how the bitch and her old shaman vamoosed. Still, he caught the nightmare creature, killed at least three other hunters, and he awakened a creature the likes of which I’ve never seen.”

She raised an eyebrow, and looked around more in a futile attempt to find the source of the voice. “Awakened?”

“You’ll have to ask him yourself, little lady. But, what he did, hoo-wee, felt that storm brewing throughout the whole damn city.” One skeleton slapped his knee again. “I’m fixin’ to learn what he did, but that’s not why I’m here. I came here, to talk to you, Beatrice.”

“Why?”

“I reckon now you and Malachi share something in common. And I’ll tell you, same thing I told him.” Silence followed, as if the thing was pondering. Maybe it was. What sort of things did a fucking god ponder? “That fancy blood magic, Crúac, that you witches like to use, it can do more than you think. Jacob’s only let you touch the surface, because he knows how deep the rabbit hole goes.” Naturally, it was going to make an Alice in Wonderland reference. Or the Matrix.

She stood up straighter, and stared at the two skeletons on the stairs, her snakes eyes growing wider. “How deep does it go?”

“Deep.” The voice rolled with bass, causing some pebbles around Triss’s feet to vibrate and move. “Very deep. Deep until all you can find, is shadow. Cold, unending shadow. Ain’t nothin’ down there for living folk, but an undead creature like a vampire? Just maybe you can make some use of the oblivion beneath us all.” It laughed. “You want to find the person responsible for your lover’s death? Fixin’ to kill em, get revenge?”

“Of course.” No point in beating around that bush. Of course she fucking wanted revenge.

“Triss,” Jen said, “you ... you shouldn’t...”

No, she shouldn’t. This reeked of ‘sell your soul for a chance to see Wanda again’. And for the first time in her whole damn fucking life, and second life, she understood why Al took that bargain.

“I’m not making any deals with—”

The darkness chuckled, the deep voice taking on multiple layers, filled with rumbling bass that caused some of the unused bones to rattle on the stone. “Bless your heart, girl. I don’t mean to trick you. Putting all the cards on the table. Anything I say, will be straight. You want to get revenge? You want to find this woman what killed your man?”

“ ... fuck, yes, I do. Christ, I want to, I really ... I ... I have to. I have to find her, them, all of them. I have to ... I...” The pain came for her again. She hugged herself, clutched her arms in her palms, forearms across her chest, and she started to shake. Her back pressed to the stone behind her, and she struggled to not collapse again. She’d collapsed twice tonight, and she’d hate herself if she went for a third.

“Then let this idea percolate in your mind for a week or two, vampire. Think about how much pain you can endure. Then, think about how much blood you’re willing to spill, yours, and your sacrifices’. If you’re willing to drown the streets in red, well then, I think you might just have what it takes.” A pretty blatant hint that, whatever rabbit hole she’d be going down, murder would be involved, lots of it.

“I’ve killed before.” Scumbags that deserved it, but still.

Again, the darkness laughed, and a mix of its alien voice and Southern accent filled the small catacomb.

“That you have, little missy. I can see it on you, dripping off you, the color of murder, of a killer.” Another chuckle, but it was the words he used that sent a painful shiver up her spine. “That’s good. Takes a real predator to be a witch, Beatrice. And, if you really want to do the things ancient witches could do, the things Jacob can do, you gotta be willing to swim in blood, and death.”

“I—”

“I said think about it, kid. You’re in no shape to make any decisions now. In a couple weeks, when you’re not as mad as a wet hen, talk to Malachi about it. Tell him I said I’m on board.”

“This...” She looked over at Jen, and frowned. Her friend looked worried, very worried, but considering the direction the conversation was going, that made sense. Sighing, Triss pat her friend’s fingers where they sat on her shoulder. “This is about Minerva, isn’t it?”

“Poor Minerva, cut down by dogs, just cause she wanted to punch a hole through the Gauntlet.”

“She ... she what?” Holy shit.

“Now don’t go telling anyone I told you,” the ancient colossal god entity said, “but Minerva was trying to build a bridge in the barrier that separates us spirits from you physical types. Avery didn’t much appreciate that, seeing as her whole reason for existing is to stop spirits and flesh from intermingling, right?”

Ok, whoa, key information. She set aside her life destroying, overwhelming misery for a few seconds — it’d still be there when she came back to it — and focused on the insanity Black Blood just dumped on her.

“Sounds like she didn’t succeed.” The only spirit she’d ever really dealt with was Black Blood, but from what she knew, the other side was filled with all sorts of random crap personified. Letting people come and go, and letting spirits come and go between the wall that separated the physical reality she knew, and an entirely new reality she knew fuck all about, sounded unsafe. Much as Triss was curious about the other side, Jack had seen it, and had mentioned how fucking scary and dangerous it was. Hell, her only experience with it was some oozing black god thing of death and power, and a giant spider monster that’d killed a fucking werewolf.

“No, our poor Minerva did not succeed. She thought there was ... I’ve said too much, honestly. Crossed a line. This is Malachi’s story to tell, not mine.” Unless Triss was hallucinating, that sounded like regret in Black Blood’s voice. Was it even capable of that feeling? “I digress. The point of this tale, this conversation, is simple little vampire. You’ve a talent, and if you’re willing to swim in death and blood, revenge is within your reach. Maybe more.”

More? The fuck did more mean? She stared at the floor for a moment, before leaning her head toward Jen, who leaned in as well, letting her head touch hers.

“I’ll think about it.”

“Good answer.” The black mist began to fade, and the two skeletons at the stairway collapsed into broken shards and white dust.

“Hey, wait! Did ... did Jacob ever ... try and ... revive Minerva? Use Crúac to resurrect her, or something?”

The Black Mist let out a long sigh, and continued to fade. “He did, little missy, that he did.”

“So he failed.” A tiny, shining little spot of hope, in the endless obsidian, destroyed.

“He did. But that don’t mean it can’t be done, vampire. Or that we don’t know how.”

She stood up straight and pushed away from the wall. “Wait! What the fuck does that mean!? ... Black Blood?” Silence. The black mist was gone, and the heavy weight she felt like she was drowning in left with it.

Jen gasped, and stepped over to the pile of bones. A nudge of her foot suggested they were no longer possessed, but it wasn’t exactly enough to settle Triss's nerves, or Jen's. "I never really wanted to know, if Jacob had ever tried something like ... resurrection." She used her foot, and started scooping bones away from the stairs like she had a broom. "You know, you just know, something like that would be horrible, Triss. I mean, considering how horrible Crúac is normally, can you imagine what you'd have to do to actually revive someone?"

Beatrice stared down at the floor, and then her claws, her sharp, Nosferatu claws. "Yeah ... yeah."

"Triss, please. Don't—"

"Black Blood said give it some time, right? That's what I'll do. But I want to know, Jen. I want to know if it's possible, and what I'd have to do."

"Jacob hasn't done it! And I doubt that man has any barriers left he won't cross."

"Maybe ... maybe..." Then again, maybe not.

---

---

~~Jack~~

He went back into the elevator, and hit one of the higher numbers. With no one else in the elevator this time, he was free to step back, and let his back press to the wall. He could get through this. Julias's death wouldn't break him. He had a job to do, and until it was done, he couldn't let the man's death bring him down.

Let me take control, and you won't have to worry about that.

Jack scowled. You don't get a say. Since when could you talk?

You released me.

I ... broke your chains, so you could help me kill these hunters and save my mother.

And revenge, don't forget revenge.

So, are you a voice inside my head? Did I awake a new personality? Or did I summon some ancient entity into me? Or, was that—

Ha, no. The curse gives me a voice, Jack, but I'm you.

You're me?

You're no more separate from your Beast than the Begotten are separate from their horrors. I'm inside you, a part of you. Like you thought earlier, Jekyll meet Hyde.

You're ... my Beast?

Not entirely accurate, but good enough for conversation. I'm inside you, a part of you, and together, we're going to have some fun.

Fun. Like the woman in my dream, sitting on top of a mountain of dead? The fun of a psychotic murderer?

I recalled the sounds, sights, smells, taste, and touch for you. Was it not a thrilling display? The First, sitting atop a pile of corpses, all her kills, while her army both defended, and sought out new prey for her? Glorious days.

Jack groaned, and rubbed his hands on his face. If he had to pick between becoming a mindless god of destruction like he originally thought might happen, or having some jackass whispering in his head, he'd have picked the former.

Don't worry Jack. We're in this together, you and me. I gain nothing by fucking you over.

But you are going to try and recreate the carnage of those memories, of the ... First.

I won't have to try. When the time comes, you'll ask me to.

Fucking wonderful.

Isn't it? And don't worry, I already see where your thoughts are headed. I'm just going to shut up now, and let you do your thing. Won't interfere with your life.

How nice of you, if I can even trust a word you're saying.

Heh. When the blood starts to fly, I'll be there, Jack, and I won't idly sit by.

And then he, or it, was gone. Jack could feel it, could feel the dark predator leave, feel it curl up and go to sleep in its den. He could feel the massive presence, the overwhelming power of it, the giant creature of shadow and claws, of fangs and beaks and talons and feathers, go to sleep. With it, it took the anger, the bubbling rage, the overflowing, scalding heat and fury that had been tearing Jack from the inside out, and silenced them.

For the first time in months, Jack didn't feel rage boiling up through his guts. Thank god.

The voice didn't sound like it was some sort of angry psychopath, but there was no denying that's what it felt like. It spoke with a smooth copy of Jack's inner voice, confident, insidious, and didn't sound angry at all. But fuck, it felt angry. Or maybe angry wasn't the word? It felt ... it felt like an animal, a hungry animal that expressed itself the way some animals do: violence, aggression, killing and hunting and slaughtering anything that violated its territory.

Maybe that's what it meant, by saying it wasn't accurate to call it his Beast. Whatever this thing was, its voice didn't match the staggering ferocity and intensity that came with it.

He managed a small, weak smile. It was a bit of a relief, knowing that the mind-altering rage he'd been feeling for months now wasn't his. Or at least, not entirely his.

As the elevator doors opened, he rubbed his hands on his face again, and tried to get his bearings. Everything had changed, everything. And, as much as it was horrible that his sister was dead, and Julias was dead, and now there was a fucking voice inside his head, it wasn't all bad. One of those not-bad things was waiting for him in the office room he was approaching. It was up to him to make sure that not-bad thing, continued to be a not-bad thing. He had to be someone his mom could lean on, could rely on, could connect with, could come to when she wanted to talk about Mary, and someone she could hold when she wanted to cry.

He could be those things, right? Yes, he could. He was getting a second chance to fix this, and he was going to take it.

He knocked on the door.

"Come in," his lover called.

He opened the door, looking down a bit as he did. Wow, holy shit his suit. Triss had been staring at it, but Jack didn't realize how fucked up he looked until now. He was a fucking mess, suit riddled with holes and dried blood.

"Did you only realize now, my love?" Antoinette said, smiling at him as she sipped a glass of blood. His mom sat beside her, and her face lit up when she saw him, smile cutting through the misery etched into her face.

“Yeah. Haven’t had two seconds to think.” He came over, sat down, and smiled at his mom. “How you doing?”

“I’m ... I’m better than I was when I woke up.” The woman looked so meek, timid, scared, and he slid his chair in closer so he could sit within inches of her. He was fine sitting further, but he knew she wouldn’t be. Reason enough.

“I was explaining to your mother the basics of her new life, little Ventrue. She now knows of the bloodclans, of the Masquerade, of the threat of fire and sun, and of the Kiss.”

The Kiss. Jack managed a glance at his mom, and she managed a glance at him, before things got awkward quick. Yep, their conversation had gone to sex, because it often did when the Kiss was involved, especially in Dolareido.

He’d prefer an awkward conversation with his mom about sex, than the conversation he just had downstairs with Triss.

“I met Beatrice a moment ago,” he said. “It ... it went about as well as can be expected.” With a wince and groan, he showed his shoulders, leaning each forward in turn so both woman saw the new puncture marks. His mom didn’t get it, but the Prince did.

Antoinette nodded, but she held his gaze, something close to a smile on her face as she looked at him. She looked relieved. It couldn’t have been about the conversation with Triss, not from the expression he saw on her face. No, she was relieved that he, him, the Jack she knew, the guy that couldn’t help but throw himself onto pain and suffering like a grenade, was still there. He was glad, too. Really, really, really fucking glad.

Maybe letting his Beast out from whatever chains had been placed upon it, would be nothing but a good thing? Ha, yeah right.

“Beatrice,” Antoinette said to his mom, “was Julias’s lover, and is your son’s friend.”

“Oh. That’s ... horrible for her. I know what that’s like.” That she did. “So ... w-what now?”

“You are my priority for tonight, Samantha, and for several nights. I am fortuitous, in that my sheriff and his childe can handle many of my immediate priorities. Though I will have to take time to deal with our prisoner, it will not affect our time together.” She raised a hand, cutting off Samantha before she could say something. “You will have plenty of time to spend with your son, but I imagine Madam Turio, or Mister MacDonald, will be calling him soon.”

“Yeah. Damien went to talk to them, but there’s no chance they won’t want my follow up, tonight at that.” He leaned back in his chair and groaned, holding his forehead up with a few fingers. “They’re not going to be happy with me.”

“B-But you’ll ... you’re...” His poor mom. She was worried about him, wanted him to stay, and couldn’t wrap her mind around that he’d somehow become so involved in some sort of secret society. That he’d become a major figure in said society, must have seemed impossible to her.

He wasn’t about to tell his mother what he’d told the others, that he’d awoken some sort of empowered entity inside him. He only told the others because there was no way to keep it secret, what with the army of crows, and that Damien and Antoinette had seen him. He’d have told Julias in good faith, and even Antoinette; they’d have kept it to themselves, for a while at least. But with no way to avoid having Maria and Michael interrogating him, it was simply not possible for him to keep his change a secret. But the fact it could talk to him, he could keep to himself. For now.

“I’m pretty high up in the Invictus ranks, Mom. Invictus being my covenant, my ... political group, sort of. Lot of responsibilities. But hey, I make a six figure salary now.” That got an eyebrow raise, and even a hint of a smile. Of course she’d be happy he was doing well. She’d throw herself under a bus if she thought it’d get him a raise at a fast food joint. “And Antoinette is beyond rich.” That earned more eyebrow raises, bigger ones. His mom’s first thought was probably that it was great Jack was potentially marrying into money, not that she’d suddenly have access to fortunes as well. It was going to blow her mind, once she realized she’d be able to buy anything she wanted.

Antoinette laughed, a deeper, heartier sound Jack hadn’t expected. “True. And that brings us to the first barrier to your new life, Samantha.”

“Barrier?”

“Oui. You are a vampire now, Samantha, and now bound by the Masquerade. Abandoning the life once you had, is your first barrier. Your home, your job, friends, family, these are to be left behind.”

“Oh...” Sighing, she shrugged and looked down at her glass. “That’s not so bad. I ... I never made many friends, after James died. My job hasn’t felt very important or satisfying anymore. And after Jack disappeared, the ... the highlight of my day ... the only reason I had to stay in that life ... was Mary.”

The breaking point. No matter how many new things they threw at her, eventually the painful reality of last night was going to crash into her psyche again.

She set her glass down on the table, and started to cry. The sound of her sobs ripped through Jack like a chainsaw, and he set his arm around her, over both her shoulders. His mom couldn’t look up, but he knew what sort of face she’d be wearing, the face he’d seen through the window when spying on her, after his disappearance. Wrecked. Mortified. Devastated.

For now, he did nothing but sit with her, hug her, and wait. The Invictus could wait, too.

---

---

~~Damien~~

He gave his more, in-depth, detailed report as best he could, to Michael and Maria. They weren't satisfied. If anything, they looked like he didn't believe him. He didn't blame them. Julias dying, and Jack having unleashed some sort of ancient curse, in the same night, was a lot to take in.

While they waited for Jessy and Jack to arrive, they confirmed what Damien said about the crows, and the lack of Julias Mire's presence confirmed his death as well. The two council members looked confused, unsure, and that was a look Damien had never seen on their faces.

A couple hours later, all three Right Hands stood before the two remaining council members, within their main meeting room.

Jessy's jaw dropped. "Julias is..."

"Mister Mire ... perished, last night." Maria, standing beside the table, had her side to the three Right Hands who stood in a row at the table's end. She was looking down, arms folded across her chest, while the big screen along the wall showed footage of the hospital. The corner showed live footage, while the main feed showed a recording she'd grabbed off the internet. Crows, thousands of crows, were swirling around the hospital, above it too, like some sort of concentrated hurricane.

"I don't understand. How? And, what's that? Who ... the fuck did that?" The Gangrel pointed at the screen. A hint of envy, perhaps, over the insane display of Animalism that she wouldn't be able to manage for centuries.

The two elders looked to Jack, and waited. With a quiet sigh, Jack scratched his buzzed head, and looked to Jessy.

“I was visiting my mother in the hospital, after leaving my sweeper team ... early.” He looked to the two elders, probably awaiting warning of punishment. They said nothing, yet. “Julias came, to warn me about that sort of behavior, but also, to just ... help me, help with my situation. Then a massive blackout happened, wiped out power for several blocks, and blocked all communications. The hunters must have been using some sort of spell; no way to do all that, in a specific area, with tech, far as I know.”

“Holy shit.” Jessy shook her head, several times, jaw dropping once again.

Jack nodded. “Angela showed up, with a small group of hunters. She wanted to capture my m—Samantha Terry, to try and force my hand. I ... I don’t think she’s telling her hunters the truth. I think she’s motivated by revenge at this point, and she used my mom as a lie to get hunters to help her.”

Damien had only one short interaction with Angela, from a distance, and it’d been enough for him to see the woman was not quite sane. If the woman was actually deceiving her fellow hunters, that was a possible avenue of action. It also meant the woman was a maniac, and predicting or manipulating a psychopath wasn’t exactly easy.

“My sire and I went to stop them. We were succeeding, but, using one of our thrall’s blood, they drew a symbol on a wall, and created some sort of portal. Natasha Vola has explained to me that it’s some sort of tunnel to a ... flesh chamber? Something like a Begotten’s nightmare chamber, something used by their shaman Elen. The hunters are using it to move around, we think.”

The two elders nodded. Damien had explained this to them already, but Jack offered details he and they didn't know. It was painting a more detailed image, and not one anyone was glad to hear about.

“Elen, Sándor, and several more hunters came out of the portal, and ... and we lost the fight.” The kid couldn't help it anymore, and his eyes fell. His hands clenched, struggling to keep his sorrow suppressed, but everyone could see it.

“Council,” Damien said, “I saw Mister Terry moments after the fight. The evidence upon his person, his attire, was clear. He tried his hardest to—”

Michael raised a hand. While Maria was a little further away, Michael stood at the end of the table with the Right Hands, sitting back against its edge, arms folded across his chest. He did not look happy.

“He looks fine now, Mister Burksen.” It was true. Jack had no wounds, and a Ventrue his age shouldn't have been able to heal from the gunshot wounds he'd suffered in a single night, not that many. He'd also changed into a clean suit.

“That ... leads me to my second point,” Jack continued. “In the fight, something ... happened to me.”

Maria looked his way, expression blank. “Something the hunters did?”

The small Ventrue shook his head. “No, this was ... something ... something in my bloodline.” That got some raised eyebrows from the two elders. “I saw glimpses of it, something connected to me, Mister Mire, Mister Honors ... and ... Kindred before. Something infected my great great grandsire, a long time ago, something I don't understand. Owls. Shadowy owls.” Again, the two elders looked surprised, and Damien did as well. Jack had mentioned the dream and the curse, but he hadn't said owls specifically.

“... the Strix have touched you,” Maria said. “Or rather, your ancestor.”

“Strix?” the three Right Hands said together.

Groaning, Michael pushed away from the table, and stepped past the Right Hands. They didn't turn around, standing at attention. Michael paced left and right behind them, slow steps, along with some occasional, quiet grunts, as he contemplated. All in all, it was making Damien very nervous, seeing the two elders react this way. They'd been surprised when Damien had explained Jack was to blame for the crows, before this meeting, but now they looked hesitant, almost afraid.

“No one knows for sure what they are. They are dangerous, and they will haunt you, and ruin you, if you become the focus of their attentions,” Michael said at last. “If you see these owls of shadow, any of you, run. Do not interact with them. Do not speak to them. Escape, and report.”

Damien gulped, and saw his fellow Right Hands do the same.

“So, you have awakened this curse, Mister Terry?” Maria said.

“I ... the circumstance did. Whatever it was the ... Strix ... did, was sealed away by a Sanctified centuries ago. And, I guess, over the centuries and across multiple childer, the seal weakened.” Sighing, Jack forced his head up, and looked to the Nosferatu ghost woman with as much calm composure as he could muster. “I'm confident it's why — at least partly why — my sire and Mister Honors were unusually skilled Ventrue, and why I've managed the things I have; the curse was able to exude its power, despite being sealed. It ... it awoke, fully, during the raid on the hospital. It violated the Masquerade.”

A Sanctified, like Damien, had done something to seal away the monster inside Jack. It sounded like a fantasy, but after all the things that'd happened in the past couple years, fantasy was quickly become the normal. If Lucas could summon a bolt of magic lightning, then sealing away a strange curse seemed plenty possible.

"It?" Michael said, still pacing behind them.

"It ... it can influence me. I suppose it's more accurate to say, I violated the Masquerade while under its influence."

Damien grit his teeth. He wanted to counter that, say that it wasn't entirely true, and defend Jack. The kid hadn't been under its influence, he'd been an entirely different person, possessed even. Damien hadn't explained it like that though to the council, keeping it vague, hoping Jack would fill in the details. That detail wasn't exactly what he expected to hear, but he said nothing. If Jack felt comfortable misdirecting the Invictus council, he must have had a good reason.

"This is an extreme circumstance," Maria said, turning her gaze back to the screen. The video was obviously taken by someone's phone, and while it didn't do a good job of capturing the insanity in the darkness, lacking detail, it was still obvious that there were crows everywhere, swarming in Biblical proportions.

"I agree, Madam Turio, and I expect to be punished for this transgression."

The Nosferatu stood up, marched over to Jack, and stared at him, her small stature meeting him an inch or two below his. Jack winced when she leaned in, literal inches from his face, and his eyes looked down.

"Look at me, Jack."

Everyone in the room went rigid. First name. Uh oh.

Jack sighed, heavy, weary, and raised his gaze to hers. The corpse woman, dressed in her usual white, frowned at him for the first few moments, but the frown faded after a while. She set a hand on his shoulder, and copied his sigh as she pat it a couple times.

“How stupid do you think we are, Jack?”

“ ... I ... what?”

“Michael and I, we are not Viktor. We are not so stupid as to think all situations are solved through fear or domination.” Shaking her head, she stepped back, and set her butt to the table behind her, resting her hands against it as well. “Would you prefer we adopt a ridiculous stereotype, and rule as ruthless tyrants? You’re a smart man, Jack. You should know how self defeating it is to dole punishment without concern for the details, the specifics, or to expect the absurd from our members. Your situation was extreme, by any measure. The death of Julias alone would have, at least to some extent, justified your measures of self defense, despite the Masquerade violation; a minor reprimand at most.

“But, the fact you know of the Strix, have seen Striges in this dream of yours, and suspect them of tampering with your lineage? Foolish would not begin to describe us, if we simply punished you.” She managed a weak smile, and Damien found his eyes falling to the floor as well. Maria showing any weakness, even in a smile, was odd. It hurt to see it on her. “How did he die?”

“My ... my sire died, single-handedly defeating Angela and a half dozen hunters with his mind, and Sándor in a fist fight. I didn’t capture the Begotten, Julias did. I was just there to claim credit when ... when my ... curse, had had enough.” Jack took a deep, useless breath, and Damien flinched as he recognized the wavering sound. His friend was fighting back the desire to cry. “Angela had the opportunity to attempt capture, but she ordered hunters to execute him instead.”

“Harsh as that was,” Michael said, coming around them to lean against the table beside Maria, “it may have been in our favor. If Mire had been captured, it could have been disastrous. Angela is proving to be an unpredictable, but unstable enemy. It will be her downfall.”

Jessy threw up her hands. “I can’t believe he’s fucking dead. I got Damien’s message, and I ... I thought maybe...”

The small Ventrue looked to the woman at his side, managed a slow nod, and his head fell again. Groaning, Michael reached out and hit his childe upside the head with his palm, but it didn’t have any of the force he would normally put into it.

“In the past two years,” the elder Gangrel said, “our city has been upturned. I think we have all realized, for some time, that this little Ventrue before us is largely responsible.” Damien and Jessy both leaned forward a bit to look at the small man between them. Naturally, Jack squirmed. Michael did not realize how correct he was.

With a small smile, Maria shook her head. “We are not blaming you, Jack. Change is inevitable, but we did not expect it to happen so abruptly. Not since the Purge has anything this extreme happened within the city.”

“Viktor Honors was the most skilled Ventrue we have ever worked with,” Michael said, “but he was falling deeper into madness, paranoia, and cruel lusts with each decade. Mire was ... Julias was a surprise for us. We expected him to fall in his sire’s footsteps, but he proved to be exactly what the city needed. He was reliable, trustworthy, and not heartless like his sire. We promoted him to the council, eager to see him replace the man we were glad to see perish.”

Maria looked to her partner, shared a nod, and looked back to the three Right Hands. “We saw unusual skill in Julias, and Jack has managed to surpass even that, relative to his age. If this is entirely due to this strange curse that haunts your bloodline, we do not know. What we do know, is Julias is gone. The damage to the Invictus is immense. The damage to the city, and to us, for his passing, is also immense.”

Michael returned her nod. “As such, Mister Terry will keep his position as Right Hand. Madam Turio and I will handle Julias’s responsibilities, until such time a third can be appointed to the council; though that will be decades from now.”

Damien almost thought they were going to promote Jack to the council. It’d fit right in with the lunacy that happened nonstop in Dolareido these days. Thankfully there was a limit to the insanity Dolareido was willing to accept.

“In the mean time,” Maria said, “you three have only the one objective. Defeat the hunters. Use Madam Vola’s report of their means of transportation, and hunt them down. Everything else is secondary, and meaningless by comparison. This talk of Azamel, and her ulterior motives, is to be set aside. Talk of Avery, and whatever she’s doing in the Shadow realm, is to be set aside. Talk of Garry, and his attempts to push into our half of South Side with his manipulation of Terra Den, is to be set aside.

“We will be in contact with the Prince about the capture of the Begotten. And, Mister Terry?” She looked at the kid again, face softening into something that didn’t match her cracked corpse face. “I expect you to be at the forefront of that matter. Your capture of the monster is perhaps, our first real step toward defeating the hunters. And considering your relationship with the Prince, and your role as intermediary with the other paranormals, you are best suited to be intermediary in this matter as well.”

Jack nodded, and straightened up his shoulders a bit. “Will do, Madam Turio.”

“And Mister Terry,” Michael said, offering a gentle smile that Damien was sure the man probably hadn’t made in decades, “we understand that the Prince has embraced your mother?”

“My ... my mother, yes. I—”

Maria put up a hand. “Take a week off, and recover, Mister Terry. Learn about this curse, learn how it will affect you, and report to us anything else you can learn about it. But also, take this time to deal with the death of your sire, and help your mother come to terms with her new existence, and the death of her daughter. We are not so cruel as to expect you to trudge through this world of pain and misery, without time to recuperate, and the aid of others.

“And be careful upon your return, Mister Terry. For the time being, we expect you to focus on understanding your current situation, more than dealing with the hunters. You are useless to us if we cannot trust you, and if you feel the need to take more time to handle your unique situation, do so. While we will not punish you for the Masquerade violation, that only applies to this circumstance,” the elder Nosferatu said. “It cannot happen again. Do we make ourselves understood?”

“Yes Madam Turio.” Jack shifted in place a little, and struggled to keep eye contact with the corpse woman. Damien couldn’t blame him. Her eyes carried a hint of something more than the kindness she’d shown seconds before. They were threatening, but also sad.

Her poker face was unbeatable. Damien was practically staring at her, running the conversation he’d had with her last night through his head, and she hadn’t even glanced at him. Watch him closely Damien, she’d told him, just the night before. She’d put it on his shoulders to kill Jack if the kid ever crossed a line, and considering what happened last night, it might as well have been prophetic. If he turned into another Viktor, especially with this absurd power, Damien would have no choice.

Lord help him if it came to that. The Prince would tear the city apart on a man hunt if she discovered it was Damien who killed her lover. And if she learned it was Maria's order, she'd tear the Invictus to shreds with her bare hands. And, Damien did not want to kill his friend. Worst case scenario, on top of another worst case scenario. Could things get any worse? He dared not say such a tempting question out loud.

"And don't think I've forgotten about Eric," Michael said, looking straight at Jessy.

"Sire, we were goaded into that fight by the Carthians."

"You say that as if it matters."

"Sire! It was two on one, and that Caleb werewolf felt like he had to ... to put Eric through a test, I guess, to make sure Eric could be trusted to stay under control."

"With good reason, based on what happened after I arrived."

Damien and Jack both raised eyebrows, and looked at Jessy. It was her turn to squirm.

"He ... it ... he was under control, until Caleb pushed it really far."

"A hole in the Golden Arch Industries office complex wall! Damage to several nearby vehicles, and to the street and sidewalks. Only a fool wouldn't notice the claw shapes everywhere. The damage I created, that I was required to create, is not identifiable, at least."

Jessy sighed, and looked down. Seeing her feel guilty about something was a strange sight, and Damien flicked his gaze between her and her sire.

"What ... do you wish to do, sire?"

Sighing, Michael shook his head, like a parent disappointed in an actual child. “You are partly responsible for Eric’s behavior, as his self-appointed liaison. You will be pulling patrol duty around South Side until Mister Terry returns to us, and Eric will join you. You will both do this in addition to your current duties. Mister Terry, I do expect you to speak with Avery about this, sooner rather than later.”

“Yes Mister MacDonald,” Jack said. “I imagine Avery is already cooking up a punishment for Caleb, if it’s true he’s partly responsible for this.”

“Very well. Dismissed.” Michael nodded, and walked over to the screen to begin his observations, tablet in hand likely filled with thrall reports.

The three Right Hands stepped out of the room, and took the elevator back down to the lobby of the Invictus HQ. They were silent in the elevator, and Damien struggled to find something to say.

“Holy shit, Julias is gone,” Jessy said. Apparently, getting punished by Michael didn’t faze her much. It’d probably happened semi routinely, considering Jessy, and Gangrels in general.

“Yeah...” Jack sighed, and his head slumped a little again. “Not even twenty-four hours later, and everyone’s just ... pushing past it.”

She pat the kid’s shoulder a couple times before leaning against the elevator wall. “Never seen Maria or Michael get that soft with someone before. Julias’s death must have really fucked them up, emotionally.”

Damien nodded. “It’s true. I’ve never seen either of them express any emotion freely, except for maybe frustration.” Not entirely true. Maria had been willing to let a little of herself come through her shell, when in her private quarters with Damien. But he wasn’t about to tarnish her image, and spread word that she was softer than she let on.

“Y-Yeah.” Jack lifted his head, but he might as well have had an anchor tied around his neck.

Jessy touched his shoulder again, but this time she squeezed it, gently, and turned him slightly to look to her. “You going to be ok? You’ve been through fucking hell, Jack. Like .. like ... fucking god damn.”

“I’ll be ... not fine, but I’ll make it.”

“We should call Tash,” she said, “get together, have a night out, trade memories.” Nodding, she gave him a tiny shake, before letting him go. Thankfully, the Gangrel knew when to stop before she crossed a line. “I’d say we should ask Beatrice if she wants to come, but...”

Jack shook his head. “She won’t come. She might attack you for even suggesting it. I told her earlier tonight, and it ... it didn’t go well.”

“Damn, you had to tell her? Jesus christ, Jack.”

Damien winced at that. The three Mekhets had abandoned Jack to that responsibility, but it would have been worse for Beatrice if they’d stuck around.

“Let’s wait a few days, Jessy,” Damien said, “before we try dragging Jack anywhere.”

“Yeah, I getcha.” She nodded, and stepped out of the elevator as the doors opened. “Anyone else get hurt at the hospital?”

“I don’t think so,” Jack said.

“Good. Eric’s dad is there, and those two have a typical love hate relationship going on.” Groaning, she stopped halfway through the lobby, and hooked her hands behind her head as she looked up. “Still can’t believe he’s gone. God damn fucker was ... was...”

“We can talk about it later, when we get together.” Jack managed to offer her a small smile as he passed her, and he pat her on the shoulder. Returning the favor, Damien supposed.

“Yeah, then.” She snapped her fingers, gave herself a slap in the head, and started toward the exit. “Until then, I’m going to bury myself in blood and sex.”

Damien rolled his eyes. “Seriously?”

“Hey, fuck you. We all grieve in our own way.”

That didn’t sound like grieving. That sounded like avoiding grieving. Damien barely knew Julias, and felt little need to grieve for his passing, but even he felt a bit cold for something like sex. Not that he was one to have any opinion on it.

Except, maybe he was? He resisted the urge to look at the picture Fiona sent him, but he’d text her later, and see if, or rather, when she wanted to go on their next date. Be aggressive, or at least confident, Maria said.

Still, it’d only been a day since Jessy’s old friend had died. He didn’t understand her, and he’d never understand her.

Jack and Damien followed Jessy out of the building. A few caws drew Damien’s eyes up, and he moved his hand closer to his suit jacket where he kept a small sword hidden. No swarm descended upon him, and as only two pairs of wings flew down, Damien lowered his hand back to his hip. But the moment earned a glance from Jack, and the hurt on his face was obvious. No hiding now that Damien was a little scared of Jack and his crows.

“Mulder, Scully, I am damn glad to see you two.” Jack wiped the hurt away with a smile, and nudged cheeks into each bird once they perched on his shoulders. “What happened after I passed out?” This close to the Invictus HQ, still under the shadow of its front doors, no kine were close enough to hear them, though a couple did stop to notice the guy with crows on his shoulders. Expected, considering what happened last night was now circulating the internet; and a guy with crows on his shoulders was an unusual sight, regardless. If anyone took a picture of Jack now, they wouldn’t get a good shot of his face, thanks to the Beast.

Jack nodded as the two birds cawed, clicked, and crooned. “Thanks, for sticking around. And if ... if I do something like that again, you have my permission to hide, and ignore my summons, ok? I ... I don’t think I can be trusted, when I’m like that. Lot of crows died. I’d hate for you two to be a part of that.” They cawed a few more times. “ ... ok, if you really think so.” With a nod, the two birds flew off, but didn’t go far, landing on rooftop edges above.

“Still having trouble understanding this,” Jessy said, standing at the top of the stairs that led to the street sidewalk. “I mean, I know you’re a skilled mother fucker, Jack, like Julias ... was. But what you’re describing is ... it’s pretty nuts, you know?”

“You’re telling me.” Shoulders heavy, movements sluggish, he started walking down the stairs, and the other Right Hands joined him after a second. “I’m just trying to roll with it as best I can for now. It explains a lot of things, and lets me put them aside while I focus on other things.”

“Like your mom?” she said.

“Yeah. And Triss.”

“Triss?”

“I need to talk to her. Not now, like I said, but sooner rather than later. She ... she...” Shrugging, he looked up at the sky, and slipped past the kine on the sidewalk without so much as a glance at them. “I feel responsible.”

Damien shook his head. “You know—”

“No, I know. I know, logically, that my sire’s death is not my fault. Emotionally is a different matter, and Beatrice is probably feeling the same thing. She knows it’s not my fault, but she won’t feel that way. The only way to get over that hurdle and help her, is to talk to her.”

“She’s got Jen,” Jessy said, “and the other witches. You don’t need to ... to do a Julias, and bear the burden yourself, you know.”

Try as he might, Damien couldn’t help but smile at that. That was an elegant way to frame the dilemma for Jack, that he hadn’t expected to come from Jessy. He really didn’t understand her, especially when she proved she wasn’t as dumb or callous as he figured she was.

“You’re right. I know you’re right. I ... I’ll wait, and see what happens.”

Hiding inside holes in the city, curled up in misery, Damien was familiar with these sensations. He was not familiar with the overwhelming emotional destruction of your intimate lover dying. For him, it’d been about hiding, about avoiding. It wasn’t the same, not by a mile, and he could only feel distant empathy for Beatrice and her situation.

He shook his head a little, trying to dislodge the thought. Part of him wanted to go to her, talk to her, soothe her, and it wasn’t a natural feeling. He barely knew Beatrice. No, the desire to go to her was just the residual effects of the Vinculum. They weren’t friends.

They'd had maybe two conversations in the year since Damien's return.

Making connections with his fellow Kindred was difficult, and so far the only connection he'd made was with Jack. Maria seemed to be following suit, and he wasn't sure how he felt about that.

"I'm off," Jessy said, waving. "Cell's on. Call me if shit goes insane."

"Seeing Eric?" Jack said.

"Yeah. Michael beat his ass hard, cause we got into this big scuffle with the Carthians, and Caleb, one of the wolves, and ... I'll explain it later. Cya." She offered them a flick of her fingers over her head as she turned her back to them, and walked off.

Damien and Jack stood there, watched her leave, and sighed.

"She's got life figured out," Jack said, "in a way I don't think we ever will."

"Probably." With a shrug, Damien started down the sidewalk, and Jack followed, occasionally glancing up to check on his two crows watching them from overhead. "I ... I had a rather ... intense moment with Fiona, last night."

Jack quick-stepped up to his side, and walked in tandem with him. "Oh?"

"Sorry, if it seems selfish or badly timed, but—"

"Damien, my sire is dead, my sister is dead, and my mom's at the Elysium tower right now, probably crying her eyes out over the shit storm that's happened to her. I've awakened some sort of curse, and I can ... feel it ... lurking, hunting, except now instead of it being the Beast we know, it's something massive and hungry, and angry and fucking twisted.” With a groan, he ran his fingers over his buzzed head, scratching. “The last thing I want to do, for the next ten minutes as I head back, is think about that stuff. You’re getting somewhere with Fiona? Hit me.”

As usual, Jack managed to hit his personal struggles with a degree of clarity of brutal honesty Damien never found in others. It was impressive, but if the kid never gave himself a break, it’d be his undoing eventually.

“Very well. I ... was injured last night, badly, in an ambush by hunters. Fiona offered me her blood, and I ... tasted it.”

Jack raised a brow. “How’d that taste?”

“Like ... as if someone had created an alcohol for Kindred. It was a powerful flavor, and the effect was equally as powerful. Before I knew it, I was ... on her, touching her, as I Kissed her. It was ... frightening.”

“Frightening?”

“I became aggressive. I pinned her, and ... did some things to her...”

That earned both of his eyebrows raising. “How’d she react?”

“She ... she uh...” Damien scratched the top of his head, in hopes it’d soothe him as it apparently did for Jack. No such luck. “She enjoyed it ... a lot...”

Jack laughed and shook his head. “Well, I don’t know about the whole Begotten blood thing, maybe making you into an aggressive drunk. You seem fine now? And it seems like Fiona wants to be manhandled a bit.” He raised his fingers, air-quoting ‘man’.

“Manhandled. I ... am not sure how to do that.”

“Antoinette is usually the one manhandling me, so I’m not the best person to get advice from. But with Ashley and Julee, they really enjoy it when someone else takes charge. Hell, Julee likes being choked, like, a lot.”

It was sometimes easy to forget that the small Ventrue regularly engaged in sex with not only the Prince of Dolareido, but her duo of lithe, beautiful ghouls.

“And you think Fiona will be ... into that?” It was hard to imagine cute, tiny Fiona, wanting to be handled roughly.

“I think you should ask her. Or, you know, do whatever you did last time, and see what she tells you?” Shrugging, he ducked left and right around kine, flowing easily through the masses of suits. “It’s a good problem to have.”

“Oh?”

“When you know the girl wants you, but you don’t know what to do. There’s electricity, and it burns, but it draws you in anyway. Before you know it, you’re in each other’s arms, drowning in a delightful heat you didn’t know you needed.”

Damien looked back to the sidewalk, the kine they walked past, and digested that. It was a poetic way to put Damien’s inexperience with women.

“Jessy confuses me,” Damien said.

“Oh?”

“She ... seems to enjoy such aggression, but Fiona is nothing like her.”

“Yeah, no denying that. I think Jessy treats sex like a sport, more than something to get intimate about.” He laughed, shrugging again.

“She knows what she likes, and she’s not afraid to go after it. Eric’s a lucky guy. I wonder if he gets to see an intimate side I’ve never seen of her before.”

---

---

~~Eric~~

“Holy shit,” he said. “And ... and everyone else at the hospital?”

Jessy shrugged and sat down on his couch before putting her elbows up on its back. “Your dad’s fine, I’m sure. Hunters only killed one person working there, an orderly named Jez.”

“And the crows?”

“Shit load of crows died. Jack’s probably feeling guilty as shit for that.”

Eric frowned. “I meant the people at the hospital. Lot of sick people, compromised immune systems, like my father.”

“No crows came near your father, and the clean up crew know what they’re doing. So do the doctors.” Sighing, she slid her arms off the couch back, put her elbows on her knees, and slouched. From confident to not, in seconds. “But the news is out there, about the crow attack. My bosses were understanding of Jack’s position, but that doesn’t change that we have to deal with the fallout.”

“The crow attack on the hospital?”

“Guaranteed that headline is already circulating the internet. No chance in hell it isn’t going to attract attention.”

Nodding, he joined her on the couch. Once he turned a little to face her, she pushed herself into him, shoulder and head pressing to his chest. A meow announced Kat’s interest, and she jumped up onto Jessy's lap, only to mirror the vampire's motion, except into her and not him. Might as well have been two cats on his couch.

"What's that mean for you?" He slipped his arm behind her, half hugging, half rubbing her back. Seemed like the boyfriend thing to do, and she seemed to appreciate it as she nuzzled half her face into his chest against his white t-shirt.

"Means more hunters, probably. Probably nothing like the hunters we got, cause they're fucking insane. But, it means nights of only worrying about tussling with Carthians like last night will be a thing of the past."

"I'm surprised that, considering shit like this happens, shit like the stuff I did, and now Jack, and whoever's done whatever in the decades since the invention of the internet, that the world doesn't already know about vampires."

She chuckled, didn't lift her head, and pushed into him a little harder. He fell onto his back on the couch, his head on its arm, and pulled up a leg onto the couch, the other dangling off, so Jessy could lie on his stomach. Kat had no trouble adapting, climbing up Jessy's chest and settling on her back once Jessy was settled on him.

"You'd be surprised how easy it is to keep this sort of shit under wraps, Eric."

"Say what?"

"Most kine are adamant that paranormal shit doesn't exist. I mean hell, how long were you pestered by your new, inhuman urges, before you genuinely considered you weren't human?"

"That's ... not really the same, I think. It was happening to me, randomly." One of his arms dangled off the couch along with his leg, but his arm closer to the couch's back slid down Jessy's side, and found the small of her back. He traced lines into it, slipping his fingers underneath her suit blouse so he could caress her skin.

“True, but still, paranormal shit happens everywhere, all the time. We’re good at hiding it, but with the invention of cameras and the digital world, there’s fuckloads of decent sightings online. Everyone calls bullshit. There are hunters out there working day and night to try and prove we exist, but the world just refuses to listen. Then Kindred do some cleanup, directly or indirectly, call shenanigans somehow, manipulate someone, and entire websites are marked as nutjob conspiracy theories.”

He nodded and sighed, looking up at the ceiling of his new, fancy place. “I see your point. The last thing the world wants is to deal with a whole new kind of horror. It’s a scary enough place without things like us.”

“Yeah, true that.”

“ ... so...”

“So?” She lifted her head and frowned at him. “That sounds like inbound heavy talk.”

“Well, I mean—”

“No. No heavy talk. My friend is dead, my other friend’s all kinds of fucked up, and more shit is going to end up on our doorstep. I don’t want heavy. I want to curl up on my boyfriend’s chest, listen to his heart beat — because it does unlike mine — and forget about heavy shit.” She slammed her forehead down on his sternum, hard enough to earn a groan from him, before she set her cheek down on his chest again. “Maybe ... maybe later. Much later.”

Nodding, he raised his other arm, set his fingers along her neck, and gently combed them through the back of her hair. Instant, quiet moans from the undead vampire.

“How’s your dad?” she said.

“Thought you didn’t want to do heavy talk?”

“My heavy. Not your heavy.”

He chuckled. Well, his heavy wasn’t nearly as heavy as her heavy, right now. “I tried to pay him a visit yesterday, after the whole crow thing, but a bunch of officials had the hospital blocked off.”

“Yeah, load of Invictus thralls with different groups and shit, managing cleanup. Then tonight, I know my bosses sent some vamps more equipped to do damage control, Ventrue and whatnot.”

“Hope I can see my dad again soon.”

She chuckled again, and drew some lines in his side with a fingertip. “You will, I’m sure. Maybe this will scare him into taking better care of his fat ass.”

Wow. He almost wanted to get angry at her for being so callous about his dad’s stupidity. Almost. Jessy was Jessy, and she was just saying what she’d be thinking otherwise; and what he was thinking, too.

“What do you think I should do?” he said.

“About your dad?”

“Yeah.”

“Fuck, I dunno.” She turned her head so she could rest her chin on his sternum, with no mercy for how uncomfortable it was to have hard bone pressing on his chest. “You make enough money you can just leave him in there, can’t you?”

“Maybe? I’m not sure. He’s taking up a hospital spot, and I think they can argue that at this point, he should just be moved to a retirement home with the facilities to take care of him.” Which, admittedly, would be cheaper.

“Sounds like a good idea to me. That’s what’s happening, right? He’s too old and stubborn to change his mind about things, and too unhealthy to be anything but retired. You have more than enough money to put him into some expensive home, and we can make sure he’s well taken care of.” She waggled her eyebrows. “Sponge baths from sexy topless nurses and all.”

He shuddered. “Why would you put that image in my head?”

“Because I am evil.” She put her cheek back to his chest, and resumed nuzzling, both her hands pressing into his sides and chest in random, massaging motions, like a kneading cat. “Ok, no more heavy talk about your dad. That’s officially crossed the line into too heavy territory, for now.”

“Ok. What do you want to talk about? How about ... that building, that spirit I found pointed you to?”

“We took a peek after I got you home. Big symbol drawn on the wall, but it was all black and burned up and shit. Leftovers, I guess. Turns out the hunters are using some portals to get around.”

“Portals?” He raised a brow. “You say that like it’s normal.”

“After what you saw Michael do last night, I figured you’d be past the ‘oh god is this really reality’ crap.”

“Good point.”

“I have a better topic,” she said. “Caleb.” Eric grumbled, and Jessy laughed as she pat his chest. “Aww, getting all manly and grumbly just because I mentioned his name?”

“He tried to prove I couldn’t control myself.” For entirely good reasons, but still.

“Well, you did go a bit psycho, you know. Got all possessive of me and shit, and tried to fight Michael.”

He lifted his head so he could frown at the girl on his lap, but she was grinning at him. Teasing. He rolled his eyes and set his head back down.

“I guess I did.”

“And hey, don’t get me wrong, I’m into it. But you and Caleb really fucked shit up.”

“ ... you’re trying to build up to a hammer drop, aren’t you?”

She sighed, nodded, and groaned. “We have to pull patrol duty for a week or two. On top of our normal shit.”

“Fuck, that does suck. No free time.”

“Yeah.”

“I’m injured. Can’t I pull some sort of injury card?”

She laughed and pat his chest again. “You seem healed to me. You damn wolves heal so fast.”

“True, but your boss doesn’t know that. And not completely healed I’ll have you know. Something about Caleb’s claws and teeth really fucked me up. And ... and that thing your boss changed into, fucked me up pretty bad too.”

“Michael’s transformations are fucking nuts. Dude’s so fucking old, he transforms into shit that I’m pretty sure is the source of a lot of scary folklore. He uses it once every thirty years or so. You should feel proud.”

“Heh, maybe. Proud, and bruised.”

Laughing, she stroked her cheek against his shirt, and tucked her hands in between his arms and chest in a half hug. “We’ll be together for it, so, that’s good, right?”

“Very good.”

“Good.” She lifted her head long enough to smile at him, and stayed there for a moment. Weight crept into her gaze, and she sighed as she continued to look at him. He met her gaze, tilting his head to the side slightly so it rolled along the couch arm.

He almost said something, asked her why she was looking at him like that. But he didn’t. He’d learned from his mistakes in the past, learned to not ruin something, not put his foot in it, or in his mouth. Just shut up, and let her come out of her shell on her own.

He’d known women like her in the past, tough women, women who were very outgoing, lively, loud, and acted like they wore their emotions on their sleeve. They didn’t. There was something soft inside, something they guarded closely, something hidden behind the wall of extroversion, of energy, of exaggerated action. Best thing he could do, if she was finally not being that person for a second? Shut up, and listen.

Another sigh escaped her, and she put her cheek back on his sternum.

“You ... you’re not going anywhere, right?”

Multiple ways to take that question. Leaving the city. Leaving her. Dying. It didn’t really matter which she meant, and she probably meant all of them.

“Didn’t plan on it.”

“Good. Good.” She nodded as she kept her cheek to his chest, and her hands against his sides tightened a little. “Jack mentioned Beatrice, and how she’s taking Julias’s death. I can .. I can’t imagine the pain she’s in.”

“Me neither.” He knew she wanted to talk about it, but he wasn’t going to say that. No, just, sit and listen.

“I saw those two, Julias and Beatrice at a ball, and they ... they fit together so well, like puzzle pieces. And now he’s gone, and ... fuck, she must feel like her whole world’s ended.” Jessy slid in toward the back of the couch, and snuggled into his side. Kat, bless her soul, hopped up onto the couch back, giving Jessy the freedom to press her body into Eric’s as she slid higher, into the nook of his arm.

His arm around her found a nice groove, a half hug, elbow bent so his hand could rest on her shoulder. This was the girl who’d seduced him at a night club, and had sex with him while simultaneously seducing Fiona. She’d had orgies nearly every night before he came along, far as he knew. The night scene, fucking in a crowd under pulsing lights to the beat, was her life. Lying on a couch, snuggling, talking, those were things she wasn’t familiar with. New territory for the deadly vampire.

So he said nothing, and stroked her shoulder as she worked up the courage to keep talking. This felt nice. Being someone else’s shoulder? New territory for him, too. His wife had never really opened up to him on that emotional level, and in hindsight, he had to wonder if she even had the emotional depth to do so. Had he? He’d had the emotional maturity of a self-involved kid then, convinced a relationship should be nothing but sex and laughter and booze and good times. He’d avoided ‘heavy’ conversations, and so had his wife.

Not this time. And, much as Jessy said she didn’t want to talk about heavy, he knew she did.

“Tash is probably crying right now,” she said, “to Art and Matt. I can just picture it, little Tash, sniffing, trying to explain what happened. She might get through five words, before bursting into tears—well, not tears, not without the Blush. But she’ll be crying, and hugging them, and she’ll be inconsolable. They’ll pet her, pat her head and stuff, and ... yeah.”

Eric lifted his hand from the arm she was snuggled into, and set it on her head. Instant murr of satisfaction, and she rubbed her cheek against his chest a little harder.

“She was really attached to Julias, you know? She first came to us, all spooked up and scared and shit, and we didn’t really know the details about her sire at the time. Apparently she’d gotten super spooked by her time with the Ordo Dracul, but yeah, we didn’t know that. Lot of us thought she was just this tiny wimp. Like, so tiny, right? And even more timid than your typical Mekhet. But Julias, he...” Jessy shuddered a little, and squeezed on him a little harder. “He didn’t care, didn’t feel a need to condescend or manipulate in typical Invictus fashion. In meetings and gatherings, she was Miss Vola, and no one gave her the time of day. But Julias took her off to the side, and explained things, since she had no sire that we knew of. To him, she was Tash, not a title with a fucking respect quota to meet.”

Her shudders returned, and didn’t stop, tiny things that rippled through her, earning some quiet sobs. He kept his touch soft, lightly stroking her scalp and combing her hair with his fingers.

“Sounds like he was a nice guy.”

“He ... he was my friend. I could always trust Julias, you know? Even when he replaced his fucking lunatic sire, I could always trust him. I used to go to Bloodlust with him, and sometimes we’d find some kine to hook up with, play wingman for each other. When we had to get into tussles with the Carthians, he always had my back, even when he disagreed with me when I was ... a little more aggressive than I should have been.” Her squeezing arms only grew tighter, and her sobs continued, mixed with whimpers. “And ... and ... and now he’s ... he’s...”

Eric said nothing. He held Jessy, held her close, and let her cry. First time in his life he’d ever held someone like this. And, self-involved as it was, he had to admit, it was a peculiar feeling for him. The raw emotion, the thoughts laid bare, the utter vulnerability. She was so defenseless. A single word, a good jab, an insult, a passive-aggressive remark would be all he’d need to break her and leave her a ruin of tears and betrayal.

All he wanted to do was hold her, and see if maybe, just maybe, he could ease her pain a little by hugging her. It seemed like such a small thing, such a little thing, but he couldn’t imagine doing anything else.

---

---

~~Natasha~~

“Julias is ... he’s ... he ... d-d ... died...”

She threw herself at the closest one: Matt. She grabbed his waist, buried her face in his chest, and started crying. No, not crying. Crying wasn’t a strong enough word for the pain tearing through her, making her shake and her muscles clench uncontrollably. Bawling. Maybe bawling was better.

Matt froze. Good. Don’t move. Let her squeak into his chest for a bit.

“What?” Art said, stepping around Matt, and squatting down beside her. She wasn’t so short that he had to squat, putting his head lower than hers, but she appreciated it anyway. Whimpering like a pathetic little girl, she threw her arms around his neck, and buried her face there as well.

The three of them were standing in the garden outside the Elysium Tower. Apparently they'd come to talk to her, and were too old fashioned to send a text. Or maybe they'd just wanted to surprise her.

"Sheriff?" Matt said. "What happened? We knew something happened at the hospital, but no one's filled Avery in on the details yet."

She managed to lift her face from Art's neck long enough to look behind her, to see Daniel standing by the stairs.

"Jack will fill Avery in ... but perhaps not immediately," Daniel said. "I will explain some, in the mean time."

Natasha didn't listen, but some of her sire's words managed to penetrate her sobs. He mentioned the hunter attack on the hospital, and that Jack and Julias were caught in it. He mentioned Julias's death. He mentioned the clean up the thralls were handling, and the Ventrues Vicky and Bruce, too.

By the time Tash and Daniel had gotten to the hospital, it was already the next night, and the thralls had cleaned up the major issues; namely, all the dead crows, and the human corpses. A quarantine was put in place, and every patient in that wing was declared potentially contaminated by the birds. Hospital staff would have to wear protective gear when treating them.

He also mentioned they'd captured the Begotten Sándor. That got some affirming grunts from the two werewolves.

Tash tried to keep her voice down, she really did. She didn't want to be making so much noise, especially outside the tower where some other vamps were nearby. The younger Kindred hid in the shadows, afraid to come out in the presence of the sheriff, werewolves, and an ex-Right Hand. But they were there, she could sense them, see some of them, and it was royally embarrassing considering the noises she was making.

She forced down her sobs, grit her teeth, and let go of Art's neck. The heartbreak in his eyes almost shattered her, but she gulped down the need to weep, and took a step back. Weeping could come when they were in private.

"I'll ... I'll explain more details to them, sire," she said. "Were you t-two coming to ... visit for the night?"

"Yeah," Matt said, offering Daniel a salute before coming over to join her and Art. "And ... yeah, I guess we should talk inside?"

Nodding, she started the walk into the lobby, with Matthew and Arturo close behind. She felt silly and dumb, for breaking down the moment she saw them, especially out in the open where everyone could see her. How did Isabella and her group feel when Barry died? And others, who'd been a part of Lucas's uprising, their deaths must have affected some Kindred they'd known. How many of them burst into tears in the open? Probably none.

But Julias was ... Julias.

Matt and Art said nothing as she guided them down to her room. Jack was probably back from his visit to the Invictus; no way he'd stay gone for long, with his mom here and Sándor as well. She—oh, right, Jessy! She pulled out her phone, and sent Jessy a text.

~You ok?~

~I guess. Just lying here with Eric, being a bitch and crying.~

Jessy crying. Jessy didn't cry. If she was crying, that meant a lot, and Tash struggled to not burst into more sobs as she read the message. Thank god Jessy had no problems being honest, once the truth smacked her in the face.

~I just got back from checking in with the cleanup crew with Daniel. It ... it was pretty insane, how much damage the hunters did. And how much damage Jack did.~

~He told us about the weird curse thing. Fucking nuts.~

Ah, that was good. If Jack was being open and honest about this strange change that'd happened to him, Tash could talk about it; with one of his fellow Right Hands at least.

~I ... I still can't believe he's gone.~

~We're going to have to go out, maybe in a few days, have a send-off party or something.~

~I ... think I can do that.~

~K, I'm going to go back to sobbing.~

~Me too. Bye.~

She put her phone away, and forced down the rising urge to sob again. Not now, not yet.

Once she was downstairs, deep in the underground floors of the tower, and in her temporary bedroom, she motioned for the two boys to enter. So many times she'd done this, always with either the intent or knowledge it'd end in sex. It'd become a ritual almost, her two werewolves joining her, following her into this room, and it sparked a couple memories of her with her legs spread out, her tiny body vanishing between theirs.

The happy thought lasted two seconds, before the thought of Julias dying slammed into her. His tall body and broad shoulders, similar to her boyfriends', his combed-back short blonde hair, his confident smile, the way he filled out a suit, it'd all made him seem so imposing the first time she ever saw him. He—

“He was ... he w-w-was ... the first Invictus to ... t-to be nice to me.” She sat down on the edge of her bed, and looked down. She didn’t need to ask, as Matt and Art came to join her, each sitting on either side of her. “He t-taught me about life in the Invictus, and ... and ... he helped me so much...”

Matt set a hand on her back, and rubbed, while Art leaned forward to put his elbows on his knees. With a sigh, he looked at her, offered her a weak smile, a knowing smile, and waited.

“I ... I hadn’t t-talked to him much, since coming back to the Ordo Dracul. I ... w-we were supposed to talk again, and ... I wanted to! I ... I wanted to, b-but it just ... never happened.” She buried her face in her hands. “And now I can’t!”

The sobs started again. She didn’t bother trying to suppress them anymore, now that she had walls around her, and she trusted the Prince’s construction to be basically sound proof. The only people who’d get to hear her be a big baby, were Matt and Art, and she didn’t mind that at all. Jessy later too, doubtlessly, but for now, just her boyfriends and the black marble walls.

Matt continued to rub her back, and Art pat her knee a couple times, offering her some more sad smiles, before he looked to the wall.

“Is ... this your first friend, to die?” Art said.

“Y ... Yes.” She turned a bit in toward Matt, and nuzzled her cheek into his chest. He returned the favor, sliding in a bit closer so their legs were pressed to each other, and she could disappear into the nook of his hugging arm. “D-Dolareido, it ... it’s been so peaceful here, you know? Ever since the Purge, w-we haven’t had ... things like this happen. And I was embraced around then. M-My ... fifty years have been quiet, for the m-most part. Viktor, Tony, G-Garry, they got into fights all the time, and a Kindred d-died every now and then, but it was rare. Now ... so many people have died, and ... and Julias, he ... he was invincible. N-No one was surprised he got to be in the council so young.”

Viktor Honors, Julias Mire, and Jack Terry. All three had been unusually strong relative to their age, and now there was an explanation. She didn't like the explanation, because now Jack was possibly in danger, threatened by something none of them understood. The Prince was probably digging through ancient texts none of them had ever seen or heard of, looking for possible explanations.

“It's been different for us,” Art said. “Tijuana was ... it was rough. We lost people.” He groaned and ran a hand over his head, before scratching the back of his neck. “Sorry, I made that sound like Julias's death was ... yeah, my bad. What I meant was, we know how you feel. Stephanie wasn't the only family we've lost.”

Stephanie. Tash frowned and looked down. She'd completely forgotten about her. The poor woman had died to a monster in the Dolareido sewers, cut down, while Natasha and her boyfriends had been stuck behind a wall of debris and collapsed tunnel.

“Um, how's Mason d-d-doing?” Her sobs quieted down a bit, and she pushed herself off of Matt's chest. Two seconds later, she put her cheek back to his chest again, and stayed there. After last night, crying on her bed, alone, she wasn't doing that again.

“Stephanie's death still tears him up, I say,” Art said. “You know guys, bottling up their emotions, being all stoic and shit, never really getting over problems. Mason's like that. But, at least this Tilly girl and him are getting along.”

Matt nodded, hugging Tash a little closer, and rubbing her further arm with his hugging hand. “Trying to survive emotional pain like that, without someone to lean on, is rough. Art and I have our pack, our family. When John died eight years ago, it was hard on all of us, and we...” He leaned in over Tash, and set his chin on her head as he squeezed her. “I’m sorry you have to go through something like that.”

Art got up, and started to walk around her room in a slow pace. “Julias died saving his childe, right?”

She nodded. “Y-Yeah, he did. He ... he um, he ... he’s the r-reason Jack’s alive, and that we c-captured Sándor. He ... he went down ... fighting.”

“It was a good death,” Art said. He came up to her, squatted down, and pat her knee. “I know that isn’t any consolation, not now, but it will be.”

She couldn’t see how. But, much as she was older than Matthew or Arturo, they’d been living rough lives for decades, while she’d spent the past fifty years more or less cozy, in comparison. Tussles with the Carthians, and trying to keep her ruthless bosses happy, was the worst she’d had to deal with. Art and Matt were used to this sort of horribleness.

She managed a smile for Art, a weak one, but it was something. She let go of Matt, reached out, and hugged Art, putting a kiss on his lips and cheek as she did.

“I feel so bad for B-Beatrice, too. Julias was her ... her...”

“They had something special,” Art said, smiling at her.

It wasn’t the usual smile Art gave her, playful and teasing. And it wasn’t the smile he’d given to her just moments before, sad and knowing. It was a strange smile, almost shy, but inviting. Like, a literal invite, an invitation. She blinked at him, and looked up at the big man holding her. Matt gave the same smile.

Something special.

She burst into sobs again, but despite herself, a small smile managed to sneak through, as she hugged the two men. The three of them curled up on her bed, her in the middle, and she cried onto their shoulders as they lay there with her. She tried to tell a few stories about Julias, but each attempt ended quickly, with more sobs, and she gave up after a while. Better to just lie there, and enjoy Matt and Art's company, as dawn approached.

Chapter 92

~~Jack~~

Once Jack got back, his mom seemed to have gotten past what was probably a couple solid hours of crying. She'd be miserable, for months, but time healed all wounds and all that crap, so he knew to be patient. Antoinette would know, too.

His mom threw her arms around him when he walked back in, and he had to calm her down. A few pats on her back and some encouraging words did the trick. When he got her back into her seat, he and Antoinette sat down, and spent the rest of the night calmly explaining to her what life would be like as a vampire. They explained the five common blood clans, the five covenants, and the current state of the covenants in Dolareido. They explained some rules, like how Elysium was a no-feeding, no-violence zone, and how the Carthians and Invictus split South Side evenly for feeding.

They explained the Masquerade, and did their best to explain the Danse Macabre, but Jack could see his mom struggled with the idea that vampires were all paranoid, deceitful, manipulative bastards, looking to gain as much power as they could in their immortal lives. He knew Antoinette had already explained some of the physiology basics, but Jack knew they should again. He explained feeding, blood, vitae, avoiding fire and sunlight, torpor and the daily sleep, and the Blush of Life.

And they'd have to explain it again, no doubt. And that was fine. She had all the time in the world now, now that she was safe. In the Elysium Tower, she could learn in safety, and she could grieve in privacy.

Antoinette and Jack ended their lesson with an hour to spare, took her to one of the big, fancy bedrooms Antoinette kept free — for no reason Jack could understand — and helped her settle down.

“You’ll ... be here when I wake up?” she said.

“Well I’ll be on the floor below you, but yeah, in the building.” He smiled down at her, sat on the bed with her, and pat her on the leg. “There’s hundreds of feet of marble, earth, and metal between us and anyone who wants to get into the tower. You...” He looked over his shoulder to Antoinette.

“C’est vrai. Rest, Samantha, and take all the time you need. As your son has said, he has been given time away from his duties, and I am sure he will spend them aiding you with your new life.” The tall Daeva nodded at her childe from over his head, smiling, and Jack mirrored it as he looked back at his mom.

“Oh ... ok ... ok...” She gulped, coughed, and looked around. “All this for me?” A big bed, white silk sheets, big open space, a desk with a mirror and an assortment of makeup kits and whatnot, and a wardrobe filled with robes that would never fit his mom.

Antoinette laughed, before letting the somber weight the night held settle her voice. “All this and far more, Samantha. Now please, rest, and mourn if you feel the need. Tomorrow night, you will have time to spend with your son, and time to grieve. Perhaps, given a few days time, we can go shopping for you?”

“Shopping?”

“For clothes, my dear.”

“Oh ... b-but, I have clothes, at home, and—” She stopped, frowned down at the blankets underneath her, and sighed. “Right, new clothes, new me. That ... that sounds doable, maybe.”

“Alright,” Jack said, “we’re off.”

“You two ... sleep in the same bed?”

Jack winced, but nodded. “Yeah. We love each other, Mom. A lot.”

Nodding, she sighed as she looked down again, and twisted the blankets with her hands. “Can ... can you tell me about that, too? Your relationship? N-Not now, but later? I ... I can’t believe you found a woman, you know? And—”

Jack put up his hands, surrendering. “I’ll tell you everything.”

“G ... Good.” She nodded, but once Jack got up, she snapped her hand out and grabbed his wrist. No words, but she looked at him with the saddest doe eyes he had ever seen on her.

He sat back down, wrapped his arms around her, and stayed there for a minute. “I’m right here, ok? I’m right here and I’m not going anywhere.”

She squeezed him tight, tighter than she probably realized she was doing. Vampire strength was a thing, and it came naturally to Daeva; any harder and she was going to hurt him. But he pat her back, stroked it, and squeezed her in return until she started to settle. Years, so many years, since he’d hugged her like this. When his dad died, it’d never occurred to him that she was looking for someone to lean on, that she needed some support. He was a kid, and she was the parent. Parents were supposed to be self-sufficient, bastions of stability.

Holy fuck, how stupid he’d been.

“Promise?” she said.

“Promise.” He leaned back from her, found her pinky finger, and hooked it with his own. Like old times.

She nodded, let him go, and slowly scooted further back on the bed. She was still in the robe and hospital gown, and Jack doubted she even realized. That'd change, as the insanity of her new life resolved, and she began to process.

“You will sleep all day,” Antoinette said. “Torpor will keep you deep in slumber. Once dusk arrives and you awaken, Jack and I will come for you.” With a bow, the Prince turned and left, and Jack followed after her, offering his mom a small wave as he did. She returned it, smiling at him, and watching him go until he stepped outside her room, and closed her door.

And then he opened it again and stuck his head through. “Oh, this locks. See this big metal bar here? It'd take a freight train collision to break it. Lock it once we're gone.”

“W-Why?”

“Because shit happens. Kindred lesson 101, be paranoid. This way, you'll be secure, and you can sleep knowing no one's going to interfere with your daily rest.”

“Oh. Ok.” Nodding, she got up and came to the door. Before he closed it, he gave her the small wave again, and she returned it, just like he used to when going to bed when he was a kid.

He fell in beside Antoinette, and followed her back to their room. The enormous vault door, and walls easily ten feet thick, meant it was the most difficult room to break into; by conventional means anyway. Could someone like Sándor bust in here? He doubted it, based on what Fiona told him, but the monsters were difficult to predict, or understand. Maybe Sándor would pull a movie monster move, and break out of the cell with some bullshit ability? The sheriff was confident he was trapped, but still.

He closed the vault door behind him, and watched Antoinette as she slipped out of her suit. No sexual display, no flirting or flaunting, no tossing of her hair, no exaggerated swaying of the hips, nothing. She set her clothes aside by the wardrobe at her desk against the wall, reached in, and plucked out a robe. Wrapped in white, she sat down on the bed, upon its foot edge, and watched him.

Sighing, he stripped down to his boxers, and sat beside her. “ ... hey.”

“My love.” She slipped her arm around him, and he reciprocated, sliding in closer until their legs touched, and he could hook his arm around her waist.

They had a bit of time before sunrise, time to sit there, and talk about things. Except he didn't want to talk about things. He didn't want to talk about Julias, or the curse. He wanted to bottle it all up, sit on it, and brood. So, by this point, he knew he should talk about them. You can only make the same mistake so many times before you have to learn from it.

“Julias is dead,” he said. “I ... Beatrice and I, we both sort of ... it got pretty heavy for a bit there. We both cried.”

“That ... is saddening, my love, but healthy.”

“Let it out, mourn, grieve, all that?”

“As cliché as it must sound, it is quite true, mon amour.” She rubbed his back a little, and leaned down to put a kiss on his head.

He sighed, nodded, and leaned into her, putting his cheek against the nook of her shoulder and chest. “After that conversation with Triss, I ... I feel so drained, tired. Wrecked.” He looked up at his lover, before hiding his eyes against her robe. “Julias is dead, and I ... I ... just want to forget.”

“You cannot forget.”

“I know, I know. But, fuck, I looked into his eyes when he died, Antoinette. I saw them, and ... and...”

“I have ... had known Julias Mire for far longer than you, my love. If I knew him as well as I believe, then I can only imagine he felt joy, that he could not only spend his last moments with you, but saving your second life.”

“Yeap. That’s exactly what happened. He had that cocky, happy smile on, and ... and ... he died with it on.” Slow, Jack, take it slow. Work through it. “He had a few last words, encouragement for me, and ... things he wanted said to Triss, things I managed to say before she left, earlier tonight. The whole scene at the hospital was ... it was ... fuck, if it’d been anyone else, they’d have either raged or cried at the end. Not Julias. He accepted it, and ... and I knew he was thinking about Triss, right till the end, and...”

Fuck it. He held her tighter, and let some sobs come up. He didn’t want to cry anymore; honestly, he was getting sick of it. Cried over Mary, then the next night, cried over Julias with Beatrice. Now, same night, crying again. He was emotionally exhausted.

A minute later, the sobs passed, and he pulled his head away from Antoinette’s robe.

“Sorry,” he said, “for ... not wanting to spend the rest of the night sputtering sobs, I guess? I’m just too tired.”

She nodded, and pet his head a few times before she scooted back further onto the bed. “Come, lie with me. I wish to hold you.”

And there was that. In all the chaos and insanity, he’d almost forgotten about this part, about how, while Julias died and left Triss alone, he’d also almost died, and almost left Antoinette alone. Selfish of him, to forget that. And, kind of selfish of Julias, to leave Beatrice like he did. Selfish and selfless.

Jack slid into bed with her, and curled up, facing away, knowing she'd definitely want to be the big spoon tonight. She was a foot taller than him, so the big spoon came naturally to her, but they didn't always go that way. This time, he knew she'd want to, because he fucked up, almost died, and ... and put her through what Beatrice was going through.

Sure enough, she pulled the blanket up to their shoulders, turned to face him, and pulled him into her. She pressed her body to his back, held him close, and set her cheek against the back of his head.

“Sorry,” he said.

“For?”

“Almost dying. Almost ... yeah.”

“It ... would have been devastating, I cannot lie.” She sighed, a knowing sigh. “There are many things we should speak of.” She was too smart. All the thoughts he'd taken a day to process, to realize, she'd probably thought of immediately. Julius's death, Jack's curse, his Masquerade violation, Sándor's capture, his mom's embrace, and the fallout of everything related to those five things, she'd probably made a list of in her head and gone through them and the hundreds of connected variables already. Him, he was still struggling with accepting the five things as reality, let alone calculating possible outcomes from the fallout.

“I think I can talk now,” he said.

“Bien. What did the Invictus bestow upon you as punishment for violating the Masquerade?”

He managed a small chuckle. “Nothing. They're ... they're pretty broken up about Julius, too. And they understood the extenuating circumstances. I have to take time trying to figure out this curse, before I'm allowed to return to work.”

“Then Maria and Michael have grown wiser, since they arrived in my city so many decades ago.” She squeezed him a little harder for a moment, and kissed his ear once. “The circumstances were extreme, and the loss, far worse. They know better than to damage a valuable asset, or harm a dear ally, such as yourself.”

“A tactical decision, then.”

“No.” She squeezed yet again, and nudged her cheek against his head. “Well, perhaps. They are Invictus, after all. But I believe they are not the soulless manipulators they pass themselves off to be. They care about the Invictus, and its Kindred.”

“It’s hard to imagine Maria being emotional about things. And Michael, I expect would sooner throw a punch.” His turn to sigh. “But that’s not really what you want to talk about, is it?”

“No, I suppose it is not.”

His sigh turned into a groan, but he knew it was coming. “The curse, the thing, I assume Daniel filled you in on what I told him?”

“Oui, but ... I must hear it from you.”

Yeah, that was understandable. He really, fucking really didn’t want to, but it was the least he could do.

“Maria and Michael said it was the Strix, when I described the dream.” That earned a hard freeze from her, and her grip on him tightened. “Striges, or whatever. They ... infected me, or my ancestor, a woman, my great great grandsire. A Sanctified sealed it away, locked the curse behind some sort of spell. And over the centuries, it wore away, and I managed to break it. I ... I guess I’d been trying to break it ever since Angela first hurt me.” He turned around, and faced her. Her eyes were wider, staring at him as if he might turn into ash in her hands. “Don’t look at me like that.”

“I ... I am sorry, my love, but—”

“I’m still me, Antoinette. The thing, it’s there, but it’s ... it’s no different than the Beast we all deal with.” Not true. Now it could speak to him. Now, it had desires that extended beyond the typical hunger and animal aggression of a mindless beast. Now, it wanted revenge, with the sick joy of a psychotic killer. “Ok, it’s not the same. It’s different, but it’s not different in that it’s not me, but a separate thing, same as your Beast. It’s hungry, and angry, and it’s...” He closed his eyes and pushed in closer, setting his forehead to her sternum. “It’s fucking terrifying, but it also helped me, saved my life, captured Sándor, killed three hunters, and...”

The elder Daeva shivered for a moment, and clutched him tighter still, almost hurting him as she squeezed.

“I ... am frightened, my love. Of all the possibilities, I had not thought something as grandiose, or horrible, could be lurking within you.”

He wrapped his arm around her, the other underneath him on the bed, and he held her close as well.

“It seems ... unreal, doesn’t it? People dying, that feels real, like a hard punch to the gut. But this ... thing ... it doesn’t feel real. Feels more like a fairy tale, something out of a book.”

“It was quite real, my love. The crows, the blood and carnage, the ... personality ... that emerged.” More shivers worked through her, and she loosened her grip on him enough so she could lean back and look down at him. “The weight of death, murder, family, bullets and knives, money and blood, we contend with these every day. They are easy for us to understand, to grasp, and combat. But we are also creatures of the night, of fantasy and nightmares. The fantastical, and the horrific, we must also concern ourselves with. As easy as it may be to dismiss this curse as ... less real, than the death of your sister or sire, I urge you to reconsider. I have dealt with entities beyond our understanding before, and ... and the wake of destruction they can leave, is far too real.”

He nodded, and she leaned back in to hold him tight against her. She was right, of course. Julias and Mary’s death felt like serrated blades in his gut. Memories of Angela, and the way she and Jeremiah had tortured him, felt like hot pokers being dragged down his spine. This curse, lurking in his heart, waiting to pounce, was almost too insane to believe.

But it was real, and it wasn’t going away.

~~Damien~~

“Hey Damien!”

Damien got up from his seat on the roof, and walked over to the fire escape on the side of the building. He held out his hand, and Fiona took it, pulling herself up and joining him.

“Hey.”

“What’re we doing up ‘ere?”

“Wanted to update you, in private.”

She raised a brow, and wandered around the rooftop, hands behind the small of her back against her brown, leather jacket. “Update? So ... not a date?”

He couldn’t help but laugh. How had he not seen that coming? He really was a dumbass, as Jessy said.

“Update tonight, date another night?” he said. There was maybe ninety minutes before sunrise, and he wouldn’t waste them on a date, even if he really, really wanted to.

“Ugh, fine!” She bounced over to him and beamed up at him. “What happened? No one’s told us anything, but we ken something’s going on.”

Sighing, he nodded toward the building edge. He sat down, legs dangling off, and she joined him, sitting beside him. It was a twenty-story building, and beside them was a giant, bright neon sign that read ‘Dips and Curves’. A hotel, and brothel. Men — and some women — came to stay the night, usually with a partner they brought, but sometimes they acquired a partner at the hotel itself. It had a strip club, a bar, a supposedly reputable buffet, and many other amenities that made Damien laugh thinking about them.

Lucas would have hated it, how the building encouraged a casual view of sins. Compared with the shit getting shoveled Damien’s way these past few months, it seemed too petty a concern.

“Julias is dead.”

“Julias, Jack’s sire?”

“Yeah.”

“I ... how?”

“Angela and her group attacked the hospital last night, to try and capture Jack’s mother. Jack was there, with Julias. They saved her, fought off the hunters, killed a few of them, and even captured Sándor, but Julias died in the fight.” Three sentences to summarize what must have been an utterly horrific experience for his friend. Three sentences didn’t do it justice.

“The crows!” Fiona pat him on the leg, several times, each basically a slap, an exclamation point for her waves of surprise. “I saw on the news! And it’s aw over the internet.”

Wincing, he nodded, and looked down at the tiny woman beside him. "That was Jack."

"... really? Wee Jack?"

"Yeah, really. He awoke some sort of curse inside him, far as he can tell, something ancient and a part of his bloodline. It ... snapped, when Julius died, broke free, and Jack summoned an army of crows." Damien shivered as he remembered the sky, the thousands upon thousands of crows that descended from above, and the hundred or more that had killed themselves in order to break a few windows. "It was terrifying, and awe-inspiring. I thought, for a moment, that perhaps I was witnessing a biblical event, something out of the Old Testament."

"I was in my lair, sleeping, recovering from yer Kiss." She managed a smile for him when she said Kiss, but it faded quickly. "Jack, he ... he must be feeling horrible. What happened to his maw?"

"The Prince turned her, and brought her back to the tower."

"Yay!" Fiona bounced in place a few times, butt hitting the rooftop edge. "Oh, oh, so she's Daeva now! I bet she'll be fun ... once ... she gets over her wee one dying."

"I think it'll be a little while before we can see Samantha. A little while longer, before she feels comfortable enough to ... socialize, with other paranormals. I suggest being a little more ... um..."

"What?" Her smile returned, and quickly became a mischievous grin, with a hint of 'I dare you to insult me'.

"Less aggressive with her, than you are with others."

Her grin only grew wider. Wham. She threw herself at him, a full on tackle; impressive, considering she was sitting down. But she managed to get some weight into it, and it was enough to send him onto his back.

“I am nah aggressive!” she said, even as she crawled onto him, and straddled his waist. His legs were still dangling off the building edge, and it was a far enough drop to give any Kindred pause. If Fiona fell, would she survive, die instantly, or swing away like Spider-Man?

Of course that’s where his mind went, not to the fact the beautiful woman was straddling him, and grinning down at him. An ingrained reflex, to always look for the negatives, when a positive was set on his lap.

“I ... I uh ... um ... I—”

Groaning, she rolled her eyes, leaned down, and kissed him. “I’m glad yer fine,” she said without ever lifting her lips, half burying the words.

“I—” Ok, talking wasn’t going to work. In fact, she seemed quite insistent on not letting him talk. The gorgeous little woman pressed herself down on him, squashed her jacket and breasts to his suit jacket and chest, and her hands found his. She guided them, set them on her hips, and smiled into her kiss as she continued.

She knew how to kiss. He didn’t. He felt wholly inadequate to be a part of this exchange. But, God, it felt nice. Her lips were so warm, and soft, and—

“Ye were injured!” she said, pulling her head off of him at last. “In the tunnel, ye were injured, but ye still went to help Jack?”

“Maria wanted me to. And ... I mean, yeah. He’s my friend.”

Fiona squealed, and started kissing him again. “So brave!” Giggling unendingly, she rubbed her nose on his a few times, and made sure to push her chest down on his, so there was no question about the feminine softness hidden in her jacket. “Did ye like my picture?”

“I ... haven’t been able to stop looking at it.”

He almost gasped as the fiery redhead blushed, deeply at that.

“Sorry if I’m being aw ... ye know ... slutty.” With more giggles, she stood up, and helped pull him to standing. “I can’t help it! I get aw ... tingly, when things gie scary.”

“Fear junkie,” he said, managing to put a touch of sarcasm on his inflection. It wasn’t easy, bantering like this, but she definitely made it easier. She made everything feel easier, even as he felt a hundred walls throw themselves up in his brain, trying to stop him from just giving into the joy, the giggles, the fun.

“Well I am a creature of nightmares!”

“Does Vrall get tingles from being scared?”

“No. She’s different.” Shaking her head, Fiona took his hand, and walked him toward the fire escape. “Come on, let’s go have fun!” Fun came with some very blatant eyebrow wiggling.

And, as much as it would have been so easy to simply follow her, let her pull him along into a journey of what was bound to be endless sexual fun, he resisted. He planted his feet, and she came to a stop, despite her continuous attempts to pull. He didn’t invite her up here for sex, or a date, or any of that. He invited her up here because he was worried about her, and he wanted to make sure she knew what was happening.

There was no greater killjoy in his life, than himself.

“Fiona.”

“What? Come on.”

“Fiona, I ... want to talk.”

She frowned at him. “Why?”

“Why?” He gave a small tug, and she had to come back onto the middle of the roof to not fall over. “Because you don’t seem to want to.”

“I dinnae understand.”

“We nearly died in that tunnel, Fiona. Julias died that same night. Jack’s got some sort of curse doing only Lord knows what. Hunters are everywhere. And ... and I nearly killed you.” Much as he knew his words carried weight, they didn’t seem to land. They bounced off the tiny redhead, as if she were impervious to all the worries in the world. Considering how quickly she recovered from getting drained of half her blood, maybe she was.

“And?”

“ ... and? Come on Fiona, I’m worried you’re not—”

“Nae taking things seriously? Dinnae ken what’s going on?” Her smile faded, replaced with a far more serious frown than he’d ever seen on her. Uh oh.

“I—”

“Damien! Ye dinnae ... ye’re the one that doesnae understand. Ye vampires are so concerned with tomorrow, ye never enjoy today.”

Well, that was true. That was very true, he supposed, and he was one of the worst offenders. Fifty years hiding in sewers could do that to a man. It was paranoia well deserved, though, even if it meant interrupting what obviously could have been a very enjoyable night.

“But I—”

“No! Shut up!” She stomped her foot, and Damien took a step back. “Ye’re dumb!”

“I ... I’m afraid I have to agree. I am pretty dumb, and—”

“No! No no no no no!” She stomped around a few more times, before she marched up to him, and punched him in the shoulder. “Ye’re supposed to protect me!”

“I ... what?”

“I’m the princess! Ye’re supposed to protect me, and be both sexy and caring, but also dark and scary and mysterious. Ye’re supposed to scoop me up, guard me from this horrible world, and fuck me as you do!”

Wow. Ok, confused did not begin to describe his state of mind. “I don’t know if I’m the guy to—”

She grabbed his hands, and started pulling again, but this time she started pulling him toward the rooftop entrance, a locked door. “I’ll have ye know, I think about those things, about the hunters, and Jeremiah, and how Angela is hurting my friends, and how the Prince and the others dinnae really want us here, and all sorts of stuff!” A spidery silhouette erupted from around her back, and Damien flinched as the eight limbs of shadow slammed into the door, piercing the metal. A moment later, she yanked it open, and it banged against the rooftop entrance protrusion.

“I ... I don’t think it was locked.”

“Shh!” She glared at him, but didn’t let go of his hand, as she dragged him down into the hotel. The roof entrance showed a stairway, one that led down to another door. A passage used by staff only, probably. A light flickered, not doing the best job lighting the rarely used stairway. “This will work.”

“Fiona, I—”

She snapped her hand out, and again the silhouette of the spider woman appeared around her. How their monster abilities worked outside the nightmare realm, he didn’t understand. It wasn’t like she was carrying around her horror half in a physical sense; otherwise Sándor would have weighed several tons, at least, and carrying him out of the hospital would have been impossible for him. But, they were able to summon up their physical forms in a limited, specific sense, like Fiona stabbing with her spider legs momentarily. What other strange things could they do? Sándor had penetrated Eric’s dreams once, attacked him there, turned it into a nightmare. If the gargyle horror could do it there, could the man tied up in the Prince’s cell do it as well?

Fiona’s snap shattered the light bulb overhead, and drowned them in darkness. “Close the door behind ye.”

He did, and regretted it. Complete, total, one-hundred percent darkness. Kindred eyes were good, but not that good.

“Damien,” she said, “ye Kindred are all stupid dobbers! Do ye nae ever consider the moment? Ye’re all so concerned with the future, ye never enjoy the present.”

“It’s hard to enjoy the present when you know the future is going to get you killed, Fiona.”

“Pfft.” She snorted, and pulled him down the stairs. Without light to go by, she went slow, but still faster than he’d like, and he almost stumbled down the hard stairs multiple times. “Why dinnae ye do it for me?”

“What?” he said to the darkness.

“Do it for me? Ye’re so focused on the future, but ye never see the things in front of ye. It’s like ye’re afraid of ... of being happy for once, ye ken?”

“I—” He froze as he felt his boot land on something soft. The air turned humid, hot, and it blanketed him in sweltering heat; no concern or real discomfort to a vampire, but it was startling nonetheless. Still pitch black, but now he could feel mud start to overwhelm his boots, branches hit his suit, and moisture soak through into his clothes. He knew where they were.

“You’re always so worried about the future,” she said, except her voice had changed. No longer was she the cute little redhead, but something else instead. “And it’s more than that. You always observe, never participate. You’re always on the outside, Damien, watching. It’s as if, you never consider that maybe, you could have a piece of what others are having, as if the pleasures others find in each other, is not something you’re ... allowed to have.”

“I ... guess I got used to that. Fifty years of hiding is a long time. And ... and when I was finally done, it all sort of fell apart.”

“But it’s not like that anymore. You don’t have to be so paranoid that everything you touch is going to fall apart. Especially me.”

“You say that so easily, but—” And then he was upside down.

Only now, as he dangled upside down and was lifted higher, did some light manage to pierce through the canopy above them. What light found him confirmed his suspicions, and he gasped as he watched the branches, leaves, vines, and moisture droplets of the jungle pass by. There were creatures as well, the sort you’d expect to find in a jungle, though attempts to see them proved borderline futile. And considering it was a jungle of darkness, he doubted he wanted to. Centipedes were probably the least frightening thing this jungle held within its endless shadows.

Higher, and higher they went, until the floor was gone, and only branches remained, giant and layered with dark vines. The moonlight punctured the canopy better up here, but the trees were tall and taller still, burying him in shadow, with only several beams of moonlight able to reach him. Enough to see by, enough to look around, and realize he wasn't moving up anymore.

He was stuck, not upside down anymore, but still stuck. In a spider web. Stuck in a spiderweb. The human reflex in him demanded he panic and struggle. The Kindred reflex in him told him to vanish, disappear, find a shadow to hide in. Neither were of much use in this situation, and he grit down on his teeth as he told both sets of instincts to shut up.

“Damien Damien Damien,” the spider monster said, hidden in the shadows that blanketed the forest. “So concerned with everything, all the time, and refusing to embrace the comforts given to you. I’ve known people like you Damien, hundreds and hundreds of years ago. A wounded soldier, wounded in the mind, unable to accept that, perhaps, they could be happy, if they just lowered their guard for a moment.” She chuckled, the alien voice rippling along the enormous trees. “I can fix that.”

Squirming accomplished nothing. The webbing was thick, strong, and he didn't have the easy strength of a Nosferatu or Daeva to fuel his efforts.

“Fiona, you—”

The spider woman descended from the trees, and he froze as he stared up at her. Up this high, the canopy was open enough to expose the two moons, providing just enough light for him to see a few feet into the dark night. He was glad he could. As much as Fiona in her human form was terribly attractive, in her horror form, the true form of her monster half, she was beautiful, exotic, and terrifying.

The long, thin spider legs that emerged from her back were smooth, and the texture of them looked almost like metal, matching their dark tint. She pressed their sharp tips against the thread, and climbed down it with more delicate, precise skill than any real spider could manage. Her humanoid body hovered before him, held up by the eight legs, and she smiled down at him as she descended upon him.

She had no eyes; a stark difference to the many eyes real spiders had. Instead of eyes, smooth, dark horns curled up and back from where eyes would have been, and they joined the myriad of enormous horns that decorated her head like a grand crown. No hair. Beneath the almost-black horns, her skin was of similar color, dark steel, and her small nose, pointed chin, and tiny lips gave both figurative and literal sharpness to her gorgeous face. Her slender neck joined to a very human torso, a long white dress of spider silk hiding her huge breasts, but there were plenty of holes in it, and it was tight enough that he could see the inhumanly tiny waist sitting above her wide hips, and curvy butt.

Her legs were human shaped, but instead of ankles or feet, her shins were twice as long as a human's, and came to sharp points, like her eight spider legs. She had hands, but instead of four fingers and a thumb, she had two fingers and thumb, each a large claw that matched the rest of her blades.

Vrallar'trakla of the Eight Blade Arach. He didn't know what that title was about, except that it was appropriate.

“ ... Fiona,” he said, and he tried to pull his head back a little. No such luck. He was thoroughly trapped. “What are you—”

“I’m not letting you run away this time. You are trapped, vampire, and I will make you feel pleasure, and joy, no matter how much you wish to hide from it.” Her eight spider legs took to different corners of the enormous web, keeping her humanoid center stable as she hovered, and came in closer to him, and closer, until she was only inches from his face. “I’ve seen your looks, your eyes, when I’ve been in this body around you. You like it.”

Her voice was far more smooth and natural than it had been the first time he met the monster, but he could still hear the hisses and rasps. He gulped, and tried to keep his eyes on hers. Not having her own eyes made eye contact difficult. It grew especially difficult when she leaned in closer, until she pressed her breasts into his chest, and set her lips on his neck.

Any concern her spider body had hard skin vanished, as her massive, soft breasts squished against his suit jacket. Good God.

“It’s ... it’s very attractive, in a unique way.”

“Isn’t it?” Laughing, her deeper, huskier voice showing through, she kissed his neck, and set her clawed hands onto his shoulders as she came in closer still. Her pelvis pressed to his, and he squirmed as he felt her lovely thighs against his pants.

“Fiona, I—”

One of her hand’s claws pressed to his lips, and she shook her head as she smiled at him. “Damien, listen. Fiona wants you to Kiss her again, drink more of her blood; except next time, she wants you to be inside her when you do.”

“Fiona does...” Right, Fiona was Vrall and Vrall was Fiona. It was a strange way to think, but it wasn’t like they were two different people. Just, two different bodies, with different personalities to go with. “I almost killed you.”

“No you didn’t.” Laughing, the beautiful monster put a kiss on his jaw, and nudged her cheek into his. “You drained her, quite a bit, but she was fine. It was strange, seeing you being so aggressive, giving into your Beast like that. Fiona ... loved it. Fiona wants that desperately, to feel your hands hold her down as you drink her. She wants to squeeze on your cock and soak you in her cum as you devour her. She wants her dark, dangerous man, delirious with hunger, to pin her down and take her.”

He blinked, a dozen times. This was starting to sound very similar to Jack’s advice. “She ... does?”

“Yes, she does. She wants to sit down with you, talk about your past that you refuse to talk about, and she wants to tell you about her life. She wants to order in pizza, and watch a romcom with you.” It almost made Damien laugh, hearing the ancient spider monster say ‘romcom’ in her scary, hissing voice. “She then wants you to take her hand, kiss her, and then pin her down and Kiss her, as you fuck her into a coma.” The monster laughed, and offered him a small shrug as she leaned away. “Not a literal coma, but there is no doubt that the Beast you unleashed in that moment was ... stronger than expected. Perhaps it was the blood?”

“Maybe. It was unusual, the taste of her blood.”

“But pleasant?”

“ ... very.”

She nodded, smiling, and leaned in again. He couldn’t move, but that was fine, he was ok with letting the spider monster kiss him; mostly ok. Eyes closed, moment frozen, he managed a small smile as her small lips opened, and he felt the hint of her long fangs within. She probably had a venomous bite. Scary. Exhilarating. Maybe he had a fear kink, same as Fiona?

“But, you ran away.”

“I didn’t run away!” he yelled. “I thought I ... thought I might have really hurt you.”

She giggled, and set a kiss on his chin. “You do not raise your voice often.”

“I have learned to be ... reserved, and quiet.” It was the only way to survive all those years.

“Mmmm, that was then. Things are different now.” Shrugging, she hovered away a couple feet, and raised her claws to her shoulders. With slow movements, and a subtle, evil grin, she began to cut through the shoulder straps of the tiny, flimsy dress. “Fiona finds your behavior confusing. I recognize it, though. You are a man that is not used to pleasure, and does not know how to accept it. You flee from it, terrified it might make you happy, and that, eventually, you might lose that happiness.”

“I ... I don’t think...” Was that it? He’d legitimately thought he’d crossed a line with Fiona, thought maybe his Kiss had bordered on an attack, maybe a deadly one. He hadn’t considered that maybe he was just lying to himself, and that he was afraid of being happy. “I —”

His jaw dropped, as the spider lady’s dress fell. Good Lord, her breasts were enormous, and her nipples were black against the dark steel skin, like her lips. The humanoid part of Vrall was of average size for a woman, a little shorter than him, but her waist cut into a size that belonged on a Barbie doll more than a real person. Her thighs were toned and smooth, and her sex was smooth as well, with the same black color of her nipples.

“Fiona does not understand why someone would behave that way. She just chases the things that make her happy without a second thought. I, on the other hand, have existed for thousands of years, and am all too familiar with the self-destructive nature of man.”

“Umm...” Words failed him, eyes too busy staring at the gorgeous body of the monster.

“That is why I have trapped you in my web. There will be no fleeing from me. And”—she leaned in, and pressed her breasts into his suit hard enough he could feel her nipples harden against it —“unlike Fiona, I am at my most content, when my prey is bound and helpless.”

“Prey?” That earned a small squirm from him.

She laughed again, and started to undo the buttons of his suit jacket. “Blush Life for me, vampire.”

“Fio ... Vrall, I—” He shivered as her claws slipped into his pants, and began undoing the fly. “I don’t—”

“Shh.” The busty creature undid the buttons of his shirt with swift precision, and once she exposed his chest to the humid, warm jungle air, she pressed her huge breasts into him. Their softness molded to the hardness of his chest and abs, and Vrall let out a long, quiet moan. “I would ask you to drink me, as you did with Fiona, but I do not think a Kindred’s body can gain sustenance from a true horror.”

“P ... Probably not.” He froze, paralyzed, and tried to keep his eyes open as the monster gently eased her body up and down using her eight spider legs. Soft, warm, silky, he gulped as he looked down, and stared at the huge pillows squashed to his chest.

“Blush.”

“I feel like you’ll drink me if I do.” Irony, for a Kindred to be the one worried about being sucked dry into a withered husk.

“ ... I might, but I guarantee you will enjoy it.” She leaned in to him, and began to kiss his neck, opening her mouth enough for him to feel her fangs. “Blush for me, and I will tell you all the ways Fiona wants you to touch her.”

“But, I thought you were Fiona.”

“I am. But I am Vrall, and right now, Vrall is me, and Fiona is her.”

Give up trying to understand how the Begotten work, Damien, and go with it.

He Blushed Life, and immediately, his shaft began to press on his pants, hard, hard enough it hurt. The spider woman moaned into his neck, and slid her hands down his body. He couldn't see what she was doing, but he could feel her immense finger claws ease his pants down, and his boxers.

“Ooh.” She giggled. Not Fiona's giggle, but Vrall's, a foreign, subtle, scary, from-the-depths-of-forgotten-jungle laugh. Her grip surrounded his length, and squeezed.

“Ah ... h-hey.” Her long claws couldn't curl around his length due to the shape of them, so instead, she used her soft palm to cup his shaft, and grip it with enough strength to make him stir. Someone else's hands were on his penis, and the strangeness of it, and exhilaration, got his heart beating fast enough he could feel it hit his chest and her breasts pressed to them.

“You are more well endowed than your passive nature suggests, vampire. You hope to fit this into Fiona? She is a tiny thing.”

Damien managed a small chuckle, but it was weak. He was too overwhelmed to be chuckling. A spider monster had trapped him in her web and was currently stroking his cock, gently bringing her soft skin back and forth along its underside. Circumcised, he shivered as her palm eased up along the swollen head, before slipping down to the base again. Sensitive as all Hell, the touch made him gulp again, and this time he gulped saliva, fueled by the Blush and craving.

So he was, perhaps, a little more well endowed than statistically common. Her words stroked his ego almost as much as her hand stroked his length, and he blushed red.

“I ... yeah, I do.”

“Then I shall tell you in what ways you could treat Fiona in bed, because Fiona is, and is not Vrall. We have different tastes.” Nodding, Vrall pulled back, and hovered a foot away from him, giving him more than a perfect angle for him to admire her inhuman curves. She reached out, and began to slice his clothes open.

“Wha—hey.”

“The Invictus will buy you new clothes, surely.” Laughing, she sliced apart the shoulders and sleeves, and threw the fabric away, before doing the same to his pants, all with exact precision, and all within mere moments. She’d be an amazing surgeon.

“I know, it’s just ... how am I going to get back home now?”

“We will cross that bridge later.” Nodding again, she grinned as she looked him up and down. “Fiona will love this. She will very much want it.” He almost said something, but she came back in again, and lowered herself down, and down, until her face was eye-level with his shaft. “Vrall wants to ensnare you, Damien. Vrall wants you as you are, bound, helpless, free for me to take my time and enjoy my meal.”

Calling him meal, and prey, was definitely making him nervous. It was also pumping his body full of fake adrenaline fueled by the Blush, and he found himself panting. Tiny bits of fear danced up and down his skin, as he realized he was in a nightmare, and a monster had him trapped in a literal web. When he first met her, he'd stumbled through this jungle, and was taken aback by how much it was a real jungle, smells, humidity, heat, noises, all included. She had corpses dangling about, some from Dolareido, many others far, far older, and Vrall had made it known she was an old creature. Killing a vampire like him, who was tied up and helpless? He knew Fiona liked him, but Vrall was another story. It certainly seemed like the monster liked him, but he wasn't completely convinced yet.

"But Fiona?" Laughing softly, she came in closer, and set her face against the underside of his shaft. She smiled up at him as he felt the angles of her oddly beautiful face nudge along the veins of his girth. "Fiona is a young woman, with the fantasies of many young women who are as nice as her. She wants a strong man, a dangerous man, to take her, and have his way with her."

"I ... I'm not—"

"You are a dangerous creature, Damien. You have the body of an agile warrior, a history worthy of story, the skills of an assassin, and the determination of someone with resolve. Combined with your young face, and your ... movie vampire aesthetics, a modern young woman is bound to fall for you."

"Movie vampire?" Arg, not the emo thing again. "I—"

The eyeless monster giggled once again, quiet, with a few small hisses, and she offered his shaft a slow kiss along its underside. God in Heaven. The beautiful creature looked almost regal with the array of horns on her head, how they curved backward and then out and in like a crown. The fact she didn't have eyes, but more horns coming up and out to join the crown, didn't rob her of her beauty; made her as scary as Lucifer, but didn't rob her.

"She wants you to pin her down, Damien. She wants you to take her, hold her down, and enter her. She wants you to wrap your grip around her throat, and make her squirm as she climaxes on your length. She wants you to bind her, and finger her until she squeals, as you drain her of blood.” With a slow, gentle touch, Vrall brought her face up to the tip of his cock, and offered the swollen head a loving kiss. Immediate sparks ran down his length as he felt the warm, succulent, massaging touch of her lips on his glans. “Hug her, hold her, drain her, and force her to cum until she has almost passed out. And when she is defenseless, exhausted, soaking wet and shaking, she wants you to fuck her, hard. Or soft, depending. As long as she is weak and unable to stop you. A limp woman in your arms, insides trembling, juices flowing, that is what she wants to be.”

“That ... is...” A lot to process. Honestly, he’d almost done all those things, that time in the subway. If things had gone any further, he’d been liable to either Kiss her until death was a real possibility, or he would have spent every bit of energy he drained out of her, fucking her.

“Is this not to your liking?”

“I’m not sure. I ... I...” It wasn’t a part of him he normally ever indulged, the desire to be aggressive, overpower, and penetrate. But, that time in the subway changed that. The sight of her, panting, exhausted, helpless, soaking his fingers in her cum, it’d sent an overpowering desire into his guts to have her, take her, and do things to her.

“Imagine it.” Again, the spider woman kissed the head of his cock, and he groaned louder, above a whisper now, as the pleasure ripples continued to build. “Fiona, sitting in your lap, her hands tied behind her back. She is exhausted, whimpering and mewling, her legs hooked around your waist, and your length buried inside her. She is too tired to do anything, so you grab her hips and force her back and forth, all the while your teeth are sunk into her neck, and letting her blood flow into you. She trembles, squeezing on you, and her juices flow down your cock again, and again, until yours join them.”

As her intoxicating story finished painting a vivid picture he couldn't deny he wanted to taste, she began to suckle on the whole of his length's head. His breath caught in his throat, and he gazed down at the spider monster as she slid his length between her spread lips, back and forth, slow and tight. He could feel her spider fangs, four fangs that curled back in her mouth, so only the flat side of the front of them nudged against his glans. It was her lips that shocked him to stillness. Her kisses had been gentle, but once she'd slipped them over the whole of the sensitive skin, he struggled to manage the sensation.

It had been a long, long time since he'd had an orgasm. Decades. And never, ever, had he experienced the touch of another. The overwhelming sensation shook him to the core, literally, abs squeezing and cock flexing upward in her mouth as he struggled to handle the onslaught of bliss. Wet, warm, soft, and tight. Smaller groans and pants managed to escape him, and his eyes closed as he felt the building heat between his legs.

And then she stopped. He forced in a useless breath, and gazed down at the beautiful woman and her royal crown of horns.

“I ... uh ... wow.”

Vrall chuckled, and gave his cock's head a quick kiss, before she hovered up a little higher. Once her breasts were level with his length, she took his girth into a palm, and guided it onto her right breast. She held it, aimed it forward and pressed it into her soft, dark nipple. Gently, slowly, she massaged her breast with his cock, and he shivered as she acquainted his glans with the texture of her skin, her swollen areola, and the engorged tip.

“Vrall, on the other hand, prefers her men in the opposite situation.”

“S ... Sounds like ... you’re her other half.”

“It does, does it not?” Nodding, enormous crown moving with her, she slid his length down, and pressed it up against the soft, heavy underside of her breast, so the silky weight overflowed it. She rubbed it from side to side, sending more pulses of growing bliss along his length, but not strong enough to bring him to orgasm. The edge of bliss, a pleasure he hadn’t felt in so long, he was almost afraid to experience it again, afraid it wouldn’t live up to the paltry memory.

“I um ... I don’t know if—” Another shudder, and his eyes went wide as he looked down, and he found the spider woman suckling on his glans again.

“You will do as I say for Fiona. She craves it, and you crave it.”

“I do?”

“Oh yes.” Her lips slipped down further, and she set a kiss along the underside of his cock, and another, and another, peppering its whole length with them. “You want to. I remember the animal that awoke in you when you tasted her. I saw it in your eyes. A hint of the Beast rose to the surface, and you embraced it.”

“I—” His eyes closed again as she started to suckle his length’s head again, all of it. It was the sensation of her lips sliding back and forth along the base edge of his glans, at where the bulbous shape connected to his length, that filled him with rising waves of bliss and sensitivity. The monster knew what she was doing, and he was helpless to control the waves of warmth flowing up from underneath his shaft.

His jaw dropped, and he forced himself to keep his eyes open — half successful — so he could watch the beautiful creature suckle, as he came into her mouth. Her suckling grew softer, slower, and he sighed relief as she kept the pleasure from crossing into painful.

Each flex of his insides sent a wave bliss up through his cock, and a gush of warm fluid came with it, landing on the tongue teasing his girth.

The pleasure was staggering. Small grunts escaped him as his insides flexed, lungs crushed by muscles as he struggled to handle the waves of pleasure. She continued to suckle, easing her lips back and forth again and again, slow, tight, milking him of his cum, and gulping it down with quiet moans. The vibrations of her voice on the sensitive skin was euphoric, and his eyes eventually closed as he melted into her suckling kiss.

Eventually, she relented. He managed to open his eyes again, and he stared at the spider woman as she grinned up at him.

“Your first?” she said.

“Y ... Yeah.”

“The first time you have cum at the hands of another, and it is a monster’s lips.” Laughing, Vrall hovered higher, enough so her breasts nudged against his thighs. With a lick of her lips, she pushed her body into him closer, enough so his cock rested between her breasts, and she stayed there, grinning up at him. “Still aroused?”

“I ... I...” He blinked, gulping, panting, and continued to stare at the sight of his length sitting along her sternum. His testicles pressed to her tiny stomach, and when she pushed her shoulders and biceps forward, it pushed her breasts forward, squashing the mounds to his inner thighs and pelvis, and burying much of his length between them. The softness of them molding around his shaft felt heavenly, and relaxing, compared to the extreme stimulus of lips on his glans, and he managed a small, exhausted smile, as he gazed down at the sight.

Her shoulders were moving slightly, and had been before, he only just realized. And looking at her now, he could see why. She was masturbating, one of her claw hands underneath her doing something he couldn't see, but it was obvious now that he was looking. Of course, he was bound to a web, and could only look down, not actually give into his cravings and maybe help her out. Despite himself, despite trying to hold still, he inched his hips forward, and sighed bliss as he felt her breasts fight to keep his body and cock where they were.

“I will take that as a yes.” Her shoulder moved faster, and her breasts began to jiggle lightly, ripples working through them and into his pelvis. Her mouth parted, exposing her spider fangs, and quiet, girlish moans mixed into the sounds of the jungle, as she played with herself. He did not know how long she'd been masturbating before, but it must have been a little while, as her body started to move faster rather quickly. She was already on the edge.

Over the edge. She shuddered, made a few hiss-filled groans, and pressed her breasts harder into him, smiling up at him as she trembled. He felt it, felt her quivers through her body, and how they caused her squashed breasts to jiggle and bounce where they were pinned to him.

After a few moments, she let out her own long sigh, and hovered upward again until she was eye level with him. One of her claw hands reached down, took his cock, and guided it toward her own sex, a smooth, hairless pelvis that looked basically human, except for the dark metal color. Her sex's lips sat beneath, and she smiled at him as she slid herself in closer, and pressed his glans against the folds.

Soaked. Wet warmth enveloped his cock's tip once again, except this time it wasn't from her mouth. It was soft along her folds, between her thighs, and she eased herself back and forth a couple inches, enough for his cock to slip along the almost dripping lips.

Her cum coated him in moments, and he shivered as he struggled to keep from thrusting his hips forward.

“Fiona wants to be taken, and protected. Beauty and the Beast.” Nodding her head of horns, Vrall angled her hips back a little to aim her sex more toward him, and began to push toward him. His engorged glans pressed to her hot, clenching slit, and Damien froze again as the soft, hot skin of her insides began to spread around his cock. Soft, but tight. Very, very tight.

With a hearty chuckle, the creature lowered herself down onto him, inch by inch, and she leaned back as she did. Her hands took his shoulders, and she licked her fangs as slowly but surely, she devoured him, sheathing every inch he had into her depths, until she was pressed snug and firm to his pelvis. She leaned back far enough she was almost horizontal, and he could feel the upward angle of his cock press toward her belly button. And, with how she leaned back, her breasts flattened and spread against her chest.

Tight. Extremely tight. He clenched on his jaw and flexed his core as he felt her insides squeeze, and he let out a quick pant or two as she squeezed harder still. He had not expected it to feel like this, not at all. No wonder every man in Dolareido did everything they could, to have sex as often as humanly or inhumanly possible.

“But I am the Beast this night, and you are bound, helpless.” She let go of his shoulders, but her many spider legs emerging from her back remained attached to the spider web. They moved with precision, subtle and silent, and he stared at how they adjusted on the web, some reaching out far, others staying close, to keep her snug to his body as she held herself horizontal as if lying on a table, and then down a little further. Leaning back and down as she was, it drove his cock upward toward her belly harder, and he shivered as she clenched again. Hot juices dripped down onto his testicles, mixing with the humidity of the jungle, and he gulped as he looked down to see her tiny slit spread wide and taut around his girth.

The head of his length was pressing against her depths, and Fi—Vrall moaned as she pushed herself in toward him harder, causing his length to fill her, and for his glans to rub against the furthest reaches within her. Good Lord. The sparks of bliss that her insides sent down the sensitive skin were enough to make him gulp.

“How does it feel?” the spider said. Before he could answer, eyes locked onto her spread sex and her extreme hourglass figure, she lifted her two human legs, and set them on his shoulders, the blade-like points coming up past his head and his ears.

“I ... it...” No words could describe the combination of stimulus. The tightness of her depths, the heat and wetness that combined into a massaging grip that worked every inch of his length, it reignited the sensitivity and bliss her mouth had minutes before.

She used her spider legs to ease herself away a few inches, and pull her back in with a soft impact, making the webbing shake, all while keeping her two human-ish legs up and on his shoulders. Back and forth, each stroke a slow motion, and she timed her squeezing muscles with them. Rolling waves of pleasure flowed down through his length, and he found his whole body flexing in surprise at the overwhelming sensation of the friction of her insides on his cock’s tip.

The fact he got to watch her body as she slid back and forth in the air, heavy breasts jiggling up and down on her chest with each thrust, was making it excruciatingly difficult to keep his pleasure under control. And as the almost painful, delicious minutes went by, the spider made it a thousand times harder, as she started to squeeze all the more. Her movements came to a halt, and she kept herself balls deep, as her hands roamed her body. She raised herself a little so she was horizontal again, and she smiled up at him as she squeezed her breasts, causing them to spill over her long, sharp blade-like fingers, as she quivered. Her insides gripped him in random spasms, milking, massaging, leaking her juices onto him until a couple drips fell from his testicles, onto the awaiting dark jungle beneath.

“It has been so long,” she said, sighing with long, heavy breaths, each causing her breasts to rise and fall, “since I have felt another inside me.” With a quiet chuckle that almost disappeared into the sounds of the jungle, she sat up further and further as she hooked her legs around his hips. Her hands took his shoulders again, and she came in close, doing her best to keep him fully sheathed inside her as she brought her face in to his, and pressed her breasts to his chest. “These may be firsts for you, Damien, but for Vrall, these are ancient pleasures I once bathed in.”

“B ... Bathed ... in?” He struggled to breathe. He was on the edge of orgasm, and he could still feel hers, her insides trembling around him, clenching in spurts, and her panting body pressing her breasts tight to his hard chest. Air was unnecessary for a Kindred, but the Blush of Life looked for it anyway, and the few panting sounds he didn’t manage to suppress earned smiles from the regal creature sitting on his cock.

“Memories, faded, buried in time from centuries of sleeping in the nightmare. I was once worshiped by the people of the jungle. They feared the spider, and sacrificed to me. Some did more than worship.” Sighing, she set her lips to his, but only just, skin grazing along his chin and cheek. So close, his eyes were left looking at the enormous horns that came straight up from her face before curling back; it was almost like a mask, hiding where eyes should have been. “I enjoyed those nights. I hope you have enjoyed this one.”

Even as she said it, she nudged her lips into his, and ground her hips forward, rubbing her clitoris into his pelvis as she clenched on him. She’d become so much more eloquent since he first met the monster, as if she was becoming more and more used to Dolareido. Still a bit of that Portuguese-ish accent coming through, making him wonder how much Vrall adapted to her other half's environment.

His wandering mind came back to the moment as he felt his cum start to build up once again. Trying to think about anything — and normally he never stopped thinking — was impossible, as the spider creature clenched her depths on his cock, and began to milk him. The sweet, blissful friction of her slit, dripping around him as its depths massaged his length and glans, was euphoric. No words, no thoughts, only pleasure, as the spider woman started to work herself faster.

He was helpless to do anything but stand there, arms and legs out, held by the web. It was sort of freeing, not being able to do anything, but he did try to thrust a bit. The webbing was flexible enough that he could drive his hips forward, and the small whimpers he earned from Vrall were intoxicating. It was a sound he'd heard women make before, in his nightly hunts, but never one he'd ever heard from so close, or one he'd helped a girl make. And it felt so very different, when he could hear it from so close, be part of her, indulge in her moans as he thrust into her a little harder.

He came, and slowed down his thrusts. She didn't. As he felt his fluids pour into her, each clench of his muscles spurting thick warmth up through his length, Vrall continued to grind herself against him, squeezing hard enough to make him wince. Orgasm turned his glans sensitive, and her thrusts were almost painful, as she milked every last drop of him into her awaiting body.

She stopped once she started shivering, and hugged him. Her face disappeared into the nook of his neck, forcing his head to lean over to make room for her horns. The moans and pants the spider monster made were amazing, and he closed his eyes as he relished the feel of her insides squeezing, shivering, and the feel of her heart beating against his chest. The feel of her breasts, massive and overflowing, and the feel of her thighs, squeezing around his hips, was a euphoric mix of softness, and power.

“Now,” the spider monster said, turning her head, and then kissing his earlobe, “I want you, Damien, to understand. I have seen many men who refused to embrace comforts when they came their way, for many reasons. Take it from someone much older and wiser than you, that that is foolhardy. Enjoy what pleasures you can find in this world, vampire. They are few.”

“R-Right. I ... I think I ... can see your point.”

“Good.” With another pleasing sigh, she floated away from him, and hovered about three feet out from his body while her eight spider legs remained attached to the web. She reached down, scooped up between her legs, and traced a line of white up her tiny waist, and then up onto one of her heavy breasts. “While I do expect you to take Fiona to bed, and fuck her regularly, Damien, I also expect to find you back here in my web frequently as well. Understood?”

“Um, understood.” He was dating two women. How had that thought never occurred to him?

---

---

~~Beatrice~~

Everyone was waiting for her.

Sighing, groaning, she got up from crawling through the tiny cave entrance, and stood before the witches of the Circle of the Crone. Jen came up behind her and stood with her. She'd stayed with her, when Triss had decided to not return to the cave after learning about Julias. But this was the next night, and she had to report back. The cave was also the only truly safe place she had anymore, now that she couldn't stay in Julias's bunker. Last night, she'd risked sleeping in a dark little corner in the tomb, and Jen had stuck with her.

Stupid girl. Triss was lucky to have her.

Othello and Aaron both approached, but Triss held up a hand, halting them from fifty feet away.

“Not looking to talk, guys. Besides, you’d suck at it.”

That managed to lighten the heavy weight blanketing them all, at least a bit, and the two men smiled a little, nodded, and backed off. Jacob stood by the sacrifice bowl further back, between it and the hundreds of bones that decorated the wall of stone behind him. Dressed in his black robes and white eye bandage, he looked like his usual, imposing self.

Except, he wasn’t smiling his usual jackass smile. He wasn’t shifting around like a restless child annoyed with the world for being too slow, like usual. He wasn’t in his weird half imposing, half inviting postures, and he wasn’t chuckling, or making any sound. All her boss did, was stand there, and look at her. His expression wasn’t cold, but it wasn’t playful or teasing like usual either. It wasn’t anything. It was just there.

She walked up to him, put her hands on the disgusting sacrificial bowl’s edges, and looked at him. Four feet separated them, and the fucker didn’t flinch once. Hell, he could have been a statue; not like vampires needed to breathe.

“You heard?” she said.

“I did,” he said.

“You know what I’m going to ask for.”

“I do.”

“ ... I don't plan to ask, not yet.”

A small smile broke through on his lips, but it faded just as quickly. “Smart.”

“Black Blood paid me a visit.”

“Did he now?” Not a break in his tone or a flinch in his expression. Either he knew, or expected.

“It, Jacob. It's an it.”

“It identifies as a he, Triss. Don't judge.”

Rolling her eyes, she couldn't stop herself from chuckling at that. God damn it, she didn't want to laugh right now. “It ... he...” She looked down at the bowl. Empty. Her fingers squeezed on the metal, avoiding the bone of the skulls and whatnot that were part of its shape. Don't break the bowl, the bowl did nothing to you. “He thinks I should ... think ... about things.”

“Sound advice.”

“ ... can we talk? In private?” She looked over her shoulder to Jen. “You ok with that?”

“Yeah, it's fine. I'll catch the boys up.” Jen nodded her head toward Aaron and Othello, and the three of them disappeared into one of the alcoves carved in the cave wall. Some of the ghouls drifting around came with her, following the Ventrue with intent to obey her orders. They were trustworthy, according to Jacob, and Triss had grown used to their presence in the many months she'd spent in the cave.

But she didn't want them around when talking with Jacob, not about this.

Jacob nodded, and the two of them took a side tunnel into a winding path. Eventually they came to his room, though Triss knew he slept elsewhere. She couldn't blame him. Elders had earned their paranoia, surviving for centuries by trusting no one, not even their closest servants. After last night, she thought about asking him for tips. If nightmares were going to haunt her daily torpor for the rest of her life, the least she could do for herself was ensure she did it someplace safe.

Jacob pulled the hanging fur aside, and the two of them sat down on the floor on his many furs. She didn't visit his room very much, not since the hunters had made an appearance. If she had to stay someplace for the day, someplace safe, her and Jen could just stay at Julius's. But that was the past, and she had to adapt. Don't think about Julius, think about the future. Think about revenge.

She looked around the walls of Jacob's alcove. There were bones on the walls, hanging masks, and furs from animals she didn't know. She'd described one of the masks to Jack once, and he assured her it was from a video game. Apparently, a playful imp stole it from a merchant who had a bunch of masks, and put it on. Unknown to the imp, the mask was possessed with some sort of evil god or entity thing, and it took over the imp to use him as a conduit for destruction.

She told him no fucking way it was from a video game. The fuck would Jacob be doing with a fucking cosplay prop? Surely everything in the room was authentic. The bones, the voodoo bags, the carvings, it made the room look like some sort of occult shop, and there was no way the five-hundred-year-old vampire would stand for anything less than authentic. She hoped. It was Jacob, and he was a joker, a trickster, and an all-around maniac. Maybe it was all silly fake shit?

"Black Blood visited you?" he said.

“Yeah. He ... he wanted to present ... options.”

Jacob reached up, grabbed one of the masks, and put it on. Holding it by the chin, he kept it against his face, and started talking in a Southern accent.

“You sure you want to make deals with the devil, pretty lady?” The mask was solid black, covered in bark or something, and she had to admit, if Black Blood ever needed to wear a mask, it’d be a pretty good option.

She slapped the mask off his face and out of his hand. “Not in the mood for laughing, Jacob.”

“Then it’s the perfect time for laughter, isn’t it?” He put the mask back, sighed, and looked at her. With his knees apart, legs crossed, he almost looked like he was meditating, considering he was wearing a robe. “Black Blood is free to do what he wants, and if he came to you, he sees an opportunity. Plus, he’s going to be drawn to you.”

“Drawn?”

“Black Blood is old, older than me. He’s absorbed the disgusting waves of murder and death in Dolareido, since long before the Prince and I showed up.”

“So ... he’s a murder spirit?”

The Nosferatu shook his head. “Spirits are everywhere, and they’ve been fucking with shit for as long as Earth has existed, Beatrice. They’ve shaped our side of the curtain, and we’ve shaped theirs. If they live long enough, they get big, and complicated, and weird. Black Blood may have been a murder spirit at some point, but he’s absorbed things, merged with things, eaten things, and ... he is Dolareido.”

She frowned. Ok, either Jacob didn't really understand the nature of his friend, or he did, and Triss was struggling to grasp the sheer scope of Jacob's explanation.

"Ok, assuming Black Blood, this grotesque monstrosity that's been helping you help me learn Crúac, really is the spirit incarnation of our city, that means our city is based on murder?"

Jacob laughed as he nodded, and he reached over to grab one of his books, one of the creepy ones she was half sure was bound in human skin. "Probably crawled up out of the ground as a spirit of death, not murder, and the area was ripe with death. Maybe some sort of clan war? Maybe the natives fought off invaders. Something happened here, before the Colonial period." After flipping through a few pages, he motioned for her to come sit next to him. She did, putting her back to the wall and knees up to her chest, with only a couple inches between them so she could look at the book.

Someone had drawn stones, a big circle of stones. And they'd drawn bones, lots, and lots, and lots of bones. The stones weren't natural, but carved, big and square and sticking out of the ground. Skeletons were tied to them. Remnants of clothes were drawn, but the artist wasn't the best; shitty parchment and a drawing that must have been six hundred years old didn't make for accurate depictions. But she could feel the death coming off the page just by looking at it.

"Where'd you get this?"

"Early colonials traded for information about this place. A flood must have come through or something, destroyed the site, but the natives remembered it; probably told ghost stories about it. The natives tried to warn the colonials off. They didn't listen." Triss hadn't signed up for story time, but she knew better than to interrupt Jacob. And besides, it was relevant, if she was going to do business with the devil. "So the colonials started up a tiny village.

Lot of convicts sent from across the drink. Far as I can find out, once they got the homes built, people started getting underhanded. Murdering each other for resources, for pussy, for whatever. Must have been at each other's throats for two or three hundred years, lying, stealing, killing. Black Blood was there for that, so he tells me, when he was nothing more than a tiny, creeping ink stain, looking to hide from hungry spirits on the other side. He seeped into the cracks in the Earth, into the walls of their homes, and he watched, and ... partook.

“That’s when the Prince and I showed up with the Sheriff, and Viktor. We took over, and turned that shitty little village into the utopia you live in today. Black Blood was there, watching, absorbing, learning.”

“Spirits can do that?”

“When they get as old and intricate as him, yeah, apparently they can. He’s part death, part shadow, part environment, part ... so many things.”

She frowned at Jacob, and shook her head. “How can Dolareido and this thing be so intertwined, if Black Blood is a death ... shadow ... spirit thing?”

“He’s not. The fuck did I just say? He’s grown well beyond that. All the dark, twisted, weird, sexual, loving, deadly parts of Dolareido, Black Blood has absorbed in some way. Simon called him a Magath, whatever that is.”

“Simon, right, the Uratha Avery used to go with.”

“Fuck those dogs.” Jacob ground his teeth, and flipped to the next page. It was written in some language she didn’t recognize, so no reading. The pictures were good enough, and this page had a picture of some woods, with some skeletons tied to them as well. Christ, Dolareido might as well have been built on unholy ground or something. If she went digging outside in the canyon, she'd probably find legions of dead.

"I wanted to talk about Black Blood, and Crúac, and ... and..."

"My attempts to resurrect Minerva."

She froze, and slowly moved her eyes from the page of the old book, to the Nosferatu elder sitting next to her. As if he hadn't said anything, he flipped the book to the next page. A cliff, overlooking the ocean. Nowhere near Dolareido then. Whoever this traveler was, they must have been important, for Jacob to want their book. Maybe they'd been a vampire.

"So you did try."

"I did. Even learned how." He flipped the page. Woods, and some tipis sitting about, with people sleeping around them. No, wait, not sleeping, dead. Fucking horrible. "I expect you'll want to jump for joy, knowing that."

"Minerva's still dead, so ... whatever it is, I can't believe I could do it if you couldn't." She wanted to believe, fuck did she want to believe, but she wasn't stupid. "Black Blood says I should wait a couple weeks, so I can calm down before I do anything stupid."

"Good advice." The next page. Some very spooky trees, with a few owls perched on the branches. Dark, shadowy owls. "And if you're looking for me to tell you how to resurrect Mire, I—"

"Don't ... please don't say no. Please?" She collapsed back against the wall, head falling forward to dangle. "I'll wait. Two weeks or something, before I ask. Ok? Please." She couldn't keep the begging sound out of her voice. It made her sound pathetic, and she didn't care. If Jacob decided to tease her, rub her misery in her face, that was fine, she didn't care. All that mattered was—

“Beatrice, look at me.”

She froze, again, before slowly lifting her head enough. As she did, Jacob raised a hand, and pulled his bandage down around his neck. Eye contact. The man’s empty eye sockets stared straight at her, and she did her best to meet them. She had snake eyes, but Jacob’s lack of eyes was a thousand times scarier, especially considering his eyelids looked like they’d been removed by a serrated spoon.

He looked sad. The ancient, deadly vampire, looked sad. It hit her in the stomach, and a harsh sob worked up through her before she could stop it. The following sobs were quieter, and she managed to keep them from exploding out of her; doubtless they’d have summoned Jen if she let them out at full volume. No, enough crying. But meeting the old man’s face, and how his fucked up deformity didn’t stop him from showing some real, genuine emotion, was just too fucking hard to deal with. Her gaze fell back to the floor.

“I hate this,” she said. “This ... this wasn’t ... wasn’t supposed to happen.”

Jacob turned back to the book, closed it, and kept his scary gaze on its dark, stained cover. “It never is. And unlike those fuckers out there, or everyone else, none of those assholes know what it’s like, to have love taken from you like that. I know. I know what it’s like to find someone who connects with you, emotionally, physically, and intellectually. I know what it’s like as a Nos, to ... fuck, I’m just wasting my breath, aren’t I?” He laughed, quiet and heavy, and shook his head. “My words can’t—”

“No ... no, tell me. I want to know.” She sniffed, and pulled her knees up to her chest tighter so she could hug them. “You’re right. How many of them know what it’s like, to be a Nos, find love, and then have their love fucking killed? Murdered? It ... it...” She squeezed her legs harder. “It’s burning me up. It’s in my bones. It’s in my fucking chest, and I want to reach inside and tear it out, and I can't. I can feel myself ready to frenzy, even though I've fed. I ca ... ca ... can't handle this, Jacob. I can't! I can't I—”

Touch stopped her cold. Jacob set his hand on her shoulder, but still looking down. Maybe he caught on that she couldn't handle looking him in the eyes right now, not when he looked sad as well.

“Minerva was ... something like Julias. She looked for the best in people, without being naive. And, she wasn't afraid of me. Well, maybe a little afraid, but she didn't let it stop her. We grew to know each other because of her courage and insistence. She was ... intelligent, far more intelligent than she had any right to be. The Prince and I both included her in our more specific experiments, as we both tested the waters of the spirit world.”

Oh, wow, real knowledge about Minerva. Holy shit.

“You and the Prince?”

“You think Annie and I are enemies?”

“It ... does seem that way, a little.”

Jacob laughed. “I guess it does. But, we both have an ... academic interest, in the Shadow Realm. So did Minerva. I let her in on a few secrets, so did Antoinette, and before we knew it, she was performing her own experiments. She learned about Black Blood, and other spirits. She became convinced that ... that things could change.”

“Things?”

“This.” He gestured around him, to the wall covered in bones and masks, to the shelves carved into the stone that held dolls and small bags filled with only god knew what, and several books as old as dirt. “Other things, too. Vampires, sucking on veins, fighting each other over sheep. Werewolves, slaughtering spirits or the possessed. Monsters, bound to their hungers no vampire could hope to understand. She thought she could change the world, find missing pieces of the puzzle, fix things. Spirits, ghosts, dreams, death, life, the afterlife? She dug deep into learning all she could about those things, and tried hard to find ways to bridge the gaps between them.”

Beatrice gulped. “I never thought of it like that, that it’s all ... separate. She wanted to bring it together? How?” It sounded too crazy to be real, but at the moment, crazy was better than reality.

With a dark chuckle, Jacob nodded, and licked his teeth. “I’ll show you.”

Chapter 93

~~Natasha~~

She stood there in front of Sándor, frowning, arms folded across her chest, and chewed on the inside of her cheek. Antoinette stood beside her. A thrall was busy cleaning of the prisoner's body; it was a human body after all, and it did things human bodies did. Pooping, peeing, all the nasty realities of trying to keep a dangerous person prisoner. The horror stories prisoners of war shared were never fun reads.

“Still unresponsive,” Antoinette said, sighing. “The mark on his back also remains. Whatever Elen meant when she said it healed too quickly, little Vola, it does not appear to be on a time scale useful to us.”

Jack stepped around and looked at the mark, while Daniel stood further back in the room. Natasha's sire was responsible for Sándor, for making sure the man was kept alive, and that each day a thrall cleaned the man's waste while under the sheriff's protection. They were using intravenous nutrition for Sándor as well, since he didn't seem to respond to attempts to feed him. The man was basically a comatose patient, a dangerous comatose patient.

“I might be able to break through into his mind,” Jack said, “if I use you-know-what. I'm pretty sure it would tear Sándor's mind apart though. We could get a little info, maybe a lot of info, but we ... I'd be turning this man into an invalid in the process.”

“I d-d-don't ... like that idea,” Natasha said. “And, t-tactically, it might not be worth it. He m-might not know much, and ... and if we can break him out of whatever's happened t-to him, he'd b-be a valuable ally.”

Antoinette smiled down at her, nodding. Natasha beamed. Thinking in terms of strategy, cold and logical, was a skill Natasha excelled at, when she could separate herself from the reality of her circumstance. Easy to do when playing chess, not so easy to do when making choices that affected people's lives. But it was a skill, learning to think like a strategist in the middle of real chaos. With time, she'd master it, like her boss and sire had.

She doubted she'd ever arrive at a point where she could capture a prisoner, hold them hostage in such painful restraints, and interrogate them, possibly with torture. But there was no doubt in her mind that the Prince and the sheriff had likely done exactly that in their very, very long lifetimes. Maybe in a few centuries, she'd be capable of that too? Scary.

"I agree, my student. Jack, unless circumstances become dire, I would not ask you to take such a risk." Antoinette stepped aside to let her thrall walk past with the soiled cleaning cloths. Far as Tash knew, this particular thrall was basically not leaving the tower until the hunters were gone, for safety reasons. And for all they knew, Sándor might have found a way to affect the thrall's mind without them knowing. "But you missed another reason, Vola."

"Oh?"

The Prince nodded toward the little Ventrue. "We do not understand the curse Jack Terry suffers. It brings power to bear, but I will not risk his life, or threaten my city with its insane aggression and volatility."

"R-Right." It was easy to forget that Jack was carrying some sort of curse inside him, and that it wasn't him that was so strong; or at least not just him. The boy was formidable without the curse, she was sure, but there was no denying his insane spurts of rage and power must have been caused by the curse. If he called upon it, what would happen? Would it devour him? Maybe Jack would fade away over the years, and become someone none of them knew, or wanted to know?

Poor Antoinette. Those fears must be eating away at her all hours of the night.

“Daniel will learn more from the Begotten with time,” the Prince said. “Silence will only bring so much protection, from the eyes of a Mekhet.” With that, she left, and the three of them followed after her, leaving Sándor in the darkness, still bound in chains, still with his eyes covered. It must have been agonizing to be stuck like that, but they couldn’t take any risks.

Once the door was closed behind them, they stopped and faced each other.

“I understand you and old friends are heading off?” Antoinette said to her.

“Yep. W-We’re going to ... spend a little time, remembering Julias.” It was due. She didn’t want to do it, because it was going to be painful, and she was bound to cry her eyes out, but it was due.

“I suspect I will need to take Samantha hunting in a few days. Her Beast will be content with stored blood for only so long.”

“Should I come with?” Jack said.

“Non. Leave this to her sire, my love. There is an art to feeding that is ... specific, to women, and Daeva especially.”

Natasha smiled at that. If there was anyone that could teach Samantha how to hunt for a mark with the seductive tools of a Kindred, and a woman, it was Antoinette. She was in good hands. Not that Tash had gotten to spend much time with Samantha in the few days since her arrival, meeting her only a few times. She seemed nice though, maybe too nice.

It was hard to think of Samantha as anything other than a broken woman, a mourning mother, a widow, and a terrified fledgling. Antoinette could see more, no doubt, and Tash trusted her judgment. If Tash guessed right, Samantha would soon find herself buried in male kine. It wasn't a topic Tash could broach with Jack right there, but Samantha was a very attractive woman, cute, and carried some of that older woman sexiness.

"Specific to women?" Jack said, before cringing and throwing his hands up around his head. "Oh god, you just put images in my head. Why? Why would you do that?"

Antoinette laughed, walked over to the small man, and kissed him on the forehead. "My love, surely you knew this would happen. Samantha is Daeva, and you know my views on sexuality. I fully intend to help your mother embrace her ... inner goddess, as the fledglings say these modern days."

Tash choked on a laugh. Inner goddess, oh god.

---

Natasha, Jessy, and Jack all walked into Jack's apartment together. It looked like Julias's old apartment, fancy and sleek, cold colors, steel and black and stuff. Jack called it his American Psycho apartment. It'd changed since her last visit too. He had paintings on the walls, more of them, and new ones too. He definitely had a thing for Gothic motifs, and also some macabre stuff like skulls and bones, but he also had some rather sexy looking ... ghosts? Pale women in corsets who were partly see-through. A few sexy witches. A few sexy ... reaper things, too.

"Dude. Hot." Jessy walked up to one of the paintings, where a woman with a skull for a head wore an open black robe, showing off a body of similar proportions to Antoinette; absurdly massive breasts that would have spelled eternal back pain for any breathing entity. "Antoinette see you put this stuff up? I mean, I like, but I'm getting some cheesy sexist nerd vibes."

Laughing, Jack sat down on his couch and shrugged. “She’s the one that gave me the idea.”

“I suppose she’d encourage you to put sexy things up, considering who she is.”

“And,” Jack added, “she’s big into fashion, including costumes. I’ve seen her wear some stuff that makes these pictures look tame.”

“Daaamn.” With a chuckle, Jessy sat down next to him, while Tash sat across from them on the other couch, a glass table between them.

“The Prince does wear ... uh ... extremely r-revealing things. And d-d-does ... extremely revealing ... things.” Natasha nodded, doing her best to say those things without changing her tone, or letting Jack notice her fidgeting gaze. Fail. He noticed her glance, she noticed his, and she shrank into the couch.

“Dude, you banging the Prince out in the open where Tash can see?” Jessy bounced on the couch a few times, before holding up her hand. “High five.”

With a groan, Jack acknowledged and acquiesced her request, hard enough for a slap sound too.

“The Prince is one of the most romantic people I know,” he said, “but her views on sex are less romantic. She thinks of it more like performance art, an expression of beauty and grace, and skill. I’m sure Tash has seen me naked, doing things to her, and her me, on several occasions by now.”

Jessy blinked, before slowly sliding her gaze to Tash with a big, evil grin. “So Tash has seen you naked.”

“Probably. Probably more.”

“You seen her naked?”

“What? No.” He raised a brow as he looked Tash’s way, managing a isn’t-Jessy-a-bitch eyeroll, before smiling. “She keeps her sexual exploits private.”

“I d-do!” she said, glaring at Jessy.

Of course, her friend didn’t get the hint, or more likely, chose to ignore it.

“You should have seen the things Tash did to my ghouls when—”

“N-No! No no, no no no, no t-talking about that.” Tash buried her hands in her face for a few seconds, did her best to regain some composure, and set them back down again. “Aren’t we here to ... to t-talk about Julias?”

“Honestly?” Jack said. “Julias would prefer we talk about each other, and goof around, and laugh, and ... and be happy, you know? Last thing he’d want is for us to cry over him.”

“Well I d-did cry!” she said.

Jessy held up her hand. “Me too.”

“Yeah, me too.” Sighing, Jack got up, walked around a counter-top, and stepped into his kitchen. A moment later he returned with some glasses and a bottle of blood. “I felt it when he died. Like, not just emotionally, but physically. Felt an ache I couldn’t explain.”

“Sire childe connection,” Jessy said, “supposedly. I ... my sire’s still alive. So’s Tash’s, so I guess we wouldn’t know. But you hear it from other vamps, that you can tell if your sire is still alive, or at least when they die. And vice versa.”

Nodding, Tash took a glass, and Jack filled it. “I can’t imagine w-what you’re going through, Jack. It ... it makes me feel like I should try and ... t-talk to Vivi more.”

Jack shook his head. “You won’t be able to rebuild that bridge forcefully, Tash. I’d tell her you want to talk more, and let her come to you. It might take years, or decades; hell it might never happen. But Vivienne isn’t much older than me, and my gut would tell me to back off if Mom had suddenly started trying to be buddy buddy with me. It ... it took a crisis to mend that connection.”

“Is it mended?” Jessy said.

“I think so. Mom’s spent most of her nights crying, and I’ve sat with her a few times, held her, just ... been there for her. We’ve talked about memories, cried over Mary, and I let her lean on me when she broke down several more times. Poor woman has been through fucking hell, and—”

The Gangrel shook her head. “Jack, you’ve been through hell too. Who you leaning on?”

“Antoinette’s been there for me, don’t worry. I’ve leaned and cried on her shoulder a bit too. Though I can tell she’s a little ... nervous, I guess? She saw me, when I was ... not me, at the hospital.”

“Can ... can you t-tell us m-m-more, about it?” Natasha said.

“Rumors are spreading like wildfire.” Jessy scooped up her glass, downed the contents, and poured herself another. So much for letting the host handle that. Her rudeness was a welcomed familiarity at the moment, though. “Everyone’s heard about the cursed Ventrue. I hear whispers and shit from the fledglings, neonates, hell even the ancilla, about Jack the cursed Ventrue who summoned an army of crows, an army of rats, survived the hunters thrice, and even survived Tony, Viktor, and Lucas.”

Tash flinched, and looked to Jack. Jack's eyes were downcast, staring into his drink as he sipped at it.

"I killed Lucas, Jessy," he said. Holy shit. Tash froze, eyes flicking between the two of them. "I killed Viktor and Tony, too. Though, that was mostly luck. Managed to set the building on fire, and caught them in it. Lucas though? I possessed Damien, Dominated him, and I cut his sire's head off."

Wow. Wow. Um. Wow. Silence fell, and Natasha and Jessy looked between each other and the small man. How had such a young Kindred been involved in so much? Lucas's death was already a massive deal, but to know two other elders died at his hands, was insane.

"You fucking with me?" Jessy said, putting her glass down and staring at him.

"No."

"Jesus fucking christ, Jack. Why you telling me now?"

"Because I ... I don't trust myself, not completely, not anymore. I need you two to know what happened. People are right to whisper about me. I'm dangerous, and ... fuck, that sounds dumb, doesn't it?" He chuckled, a heavy, dark sound, and took a sip of his drink. "You know what I'm going to ask for."

Snarling, Jessy downed her glass again, got up, and started pacing. "You want Tash and me to keep an eye on you, maybe take you down if shit goes horrible."

"... yeah." He shook his head again, but didn't look at the Gangrel, or Natasha. "Damien was with the Prince when they found me at the hospital, and I can remember it clearly, how he was ready to pull his blade on me. I want you two to be ready to do the same."

“We ... w-w-we’re not going t-to kill you, Jack,” Tash said.

“And I’m not so depressed as to hope you do, Tash. Capture if you can, you know? I know there’s a ritual out there that can reveal this curse, and if it takes a hundred years for someone to find it, that’s fine. Just stake me until someone’s got it ready. But I need someone to be ready to do that.”

“Stake you?” Jessy said. “Easy. Dealing with Maria if she finds out about Lucas? Not so easy.”

The boy nodded some more, and walked over to the window. He pulled open the curtain, and stared out over the city heights, the colorful lights striking the glass in his hand. From the back, in his suit, Tash could practically see Julias’s silhouette over the boy. How many times had Julias stared out his huge window at the city, glass of blood in his hand? She’d seen him do it hundreds of times, and who knows how many times he’d done it in private, contemplating, worrying.

“Maybe I shouldn’t have said anything.”

Groaning, Jessy joined him, and put her jeans and ass against the window. “Course you shouldn’t have. Ugh, I hate knowing things I don’t want to know. How am I supposed to talk to Maria now?”

“Maria ... m-might ... might forgive you, Jack.” Maybe. Based on Tash’s conversation with her, it was clear the woman was trying to get over some emotional issues involving Lucas. “Have you t-talked to Damien about it?”

“Yes and no. I’ve mostly been hoping the secret would fade and die with the years. Long time ago, Jacob insisted Maria and Michael would kill me, if they knew Viktor and Tony died at my hands. But, after the last meeting I had with them ... I don’t think they would. They trust me now, as much as an elder can trust any subordinate. Except now this curse thing changes everything, and ... ugh.” He rubbed his buzzed head in that way that he did, walked back over to the table in front of Tash, and poured himself another glass. “I’m sorry, I’ve ruined this night. We were supposed to talk about Julias, and—”

“Nah, you ain’t ruined shit.” Jessy came back over, flopped on the couch, and smiled out at the window, curtain still pulled aside so they could admire the city lights. “Kinda put a damper on things, with all this curse worrying, but I’ll bring it back. Tash has seen you naked, and I’ve seen Tash naked, but—”

Jack put a hand on Jessy’s mouth. “No. Bad Gangrel.”

Snorting on a surprise laugh, Natasha started coughing as she struggled to not spill her drink. “How about ... w-when did you meet Julias?”

“That is a very boring story, actually. I met Julias when I was doing an internship with a law firm.” That made sense, she supposed. Jack was a logical person, like her. Unlike her, he was surprisingly good at talking, when he needed to be. “I called out some people older than me about some holes in their contracts. Julias was there. Must have been doing something for Xnomina. He overheard, and I guess he was impressed that I was willing to argue with people fifteen years my senior.” The boy smiled to himself, nodded, and leaned back on the couch. “He involved me in negotiating some contracts, for some random business deals between subsidiaries. I didn’t realize it at the time, but he was analyzing me.”

“Well,” Jessy said, “kid your age working smart shit like law work, arguing with people much older than you? Sounds like Ventrue material.” She poured herself another glass, half of the bottle gone already and mostly to her, before she raised a hand. A story was coming to her, no doubt. “I was in the Invictus from day one, cause of Michael. But I was just a brawler, with no direction or anything. Fighting and fucking was all I knew.”

“Julias help you?” Jack said.

“You mean, help me come into the fold? Nah, I handled that shit on my own. Once we got to know each other, we started going to bars together, playing wingman for each other.” She leaned back on the couch, and let her head hang over the back. “I tried to get into his pants a few times, but it never went anywhere. He made it clear he didn’t want to ruin our friendship. Which pissed me off, but it was the right call, in the end.”

Laughing quietly, Tash sipped and leaned back as well. “Julias really ... b-brought out the b-best in people. Helped p-p-people grow.”

“That he did,” Jack said. “Beatrice would agree, more than anyone. I almost invited her, but ... yeah, that wouldn’t go well.”

“Yeah,” Jessy said. “Fuck, I feel so bad for her. Real good thing they had going, and it’s gone, and—” Tash sniffed, and sobbed. “Aw Tash, I’m sorry.”

“No, n-no, it’s ok. It’s ... fine. It’s hard to imagine my second life without him, but B-Beatrice, she...”

Jack leaned forward, and set his elbows on his knees. “She’ll probably do everything she can to get revenge. I’ve been aching to kill Angela, and while it’s a relief to know the strange rage issues I was having were because of this curse ... hopefully, Beatrice is probably aching to kill Angela even more than I ever did. She’s ... she’ll ... she’ll be sinking deep into that Crúac shit, talking to Jacob and stuff.”

“When Minerva died,” Jessy said, “everyone assumed Jacob was doing everything in his power to revive her. He disappeared for months at a time. We had a string of kine disappearances. There was creepy weather and other crap. Rumors about some weird ghost things — probably Black Blood — were going around, too.”

Tash remembered those. There was a night where a bunch of rats flowed up from the sewers. Another night, it snowed, in late Spring. Dolareido rarely even had snow in the dead of winter. Another night, for a whole month, it was super super windy, and the city swore there were voices on the wind. People eventually figured it was just the unusual wind speed hitting the buildings at just the right way to howl.

“P-Poor Jacob,” she said. “Minerva is still d-dead though.”

“Jacob once asked me to see if Avery would tell me why she killed Minerva, like, get specifics. She won’t give them. It must be eating Jacob up. And I’m sure my sire’s death is eating Beatrice up, too. She ... she’s going to do something.”

Everyone nodded. Yeah, she was. Beatrice probably felt like she had nothing left to lose anymore, after losing Julias, and to someone like a witch, that was an invitation to go down a dark path.

Memories of a ripped-open body dangling on a hook over a giant, sacrificial bowl flitted through Tash’s mind.

“D ... d-do you think she’ll ... I don’t know. I found her, with Jacob and Jennifer once,” Natasha said. “Matt, Art, and I, w-we found them ... d-doing things, in one of Jacob’s lairs. Scary things. I ... I wouldn’t be surprised if Beatrice crossed some lines, t-to ... to try and get Julias back.”

Jack shook his head. “If Minerva’s dead, then what hope does Beatrice have?”

“No fucking idea,” Jessy said, “but yeah, I agree, Triss is the sort of girl who would do some dangerous shit, to get him back.”

“Then, keep an eye on her,” Jack said. “Keep an eye on her, and me, and Jacob, and ... Maria, I guess.”

“Her too?” Grumbling, Jessy folded her arms on her chest and squirmed on the couch. “Because she might find out you killed Lucas?”

“N-No,” Tash said. “Because there’s ... a p-possibility she’s trying to revive him.”

The Gangrel threw her hands up. “No one’s been revived! Any of you know anyone, or know anyone who knows anyone, who’s ever even heard of a successful resurrection? Why’re we suddenly concerned about this?”

“A feeling in my guts,” Jack said. “Something’s going to happen. I ... I can’t say more. I don’t want to involve you two in things you don’t need to be involved in. But something’s going on in the city, something bigger than the hunters. It might have something to do with Jacob, or Maria, I don’t know, but ... keep an eye open, ok?”

Something else? Natasha looked at the small man, and he met her gaze. There wasn’t only confidence in his gaze, but an awareness, knowledge, a look of wisdom and intelligence that no man his age should have carried. It was frightening.

“ ... ok.”

~~Antoinette~~

The first seven nights since her embrace, Samantha spent alone, other than visits from her child. Jack and Antoinette both knew to give her her space, and while she enjoyed and embraced her son’s company, there were many moments where she wanted to be alone. Through the laptop Antoinette gave her, the woman was able to watch the news, monitor the changing of life now that hers was gone, and indulge her misery. A part of the grieving process, to be sure. Antoinette had a thrall monitor the laptop, to make sure her new childe did not attempt to contact anyone; a gross violation of privacy, but a necessary one for now.

Samantha did not attempt to contact anyone. As Antoinette predicted, she found videos of her two children, school events and such, and spent several days weeping over the imagery. Some of that time she spent with Jack, and while she attempted to spend time with Antoinette as well, the elder kept interactions with her childe moderately short. It was better to let Samantha grieve on her own for now, and with Jack's shoulder to lean on, not her own.

But after seven nights, Samantha was ready to take her first steps in her new life. Or rather, Antoinette recognized the signs of her Beast's hunger, no longer satisfied with bottled, cooled blood. It wanted to hunt, and to sink its teeth into living flesh. Antoinette had no choice but to oblige it, lest Samantha suffer a frenzy, and that was the last thing the poor woman needed to suffer at the moment.

"You ... know my measurements?" she said, eyes wide as she gazed upon the clothes before her.

"Oui."

"But I never gave them to you."

"I have indulged in fashion since before you grandmother was born, Samantha. I could accurately guess your weight, if you wish for me to prove my skill."

"Um ... n-no thanks." She smiled as she said it though, the first smile the woman had made over a humorous comment.

The two of them stood in her primary fashion room, where rows upon rows upon rows of clothing were to be found. Antoinette stored much here, fashions from ages past, fashions from ages only to recently meet the runway, and fashions that stood the test of time. Clothes were held for Natasha as well, though Antoinette had yet to truly indulge her fashion vice with the little Mekhet.

“Come, explore. I have purchased eighty-seven different ensembles you may try. Skilled as I am, doubtless only a third of them will fit properly, but we can have them tailored to adjust.” Nodding, she held out a hand to her little Daeva on her stool.

Samantha gulped, reached out, and took her hand. Slowly, with delicate precision, Antoinette pulled her along into the sea of coat racks, wardrobes, and vanity sets. Hundreds of thousands of American dollars, spent on something as meaningless as fabric; a true indulgent sin for any Daeva.

At the moment, Antoinette was dressed in one of her robes, black, with plenty of skin showing. She often wore such clothes for the enjoyment of it, or to drive her little lover wild, but tonight it served a different purpose: sparking Samantha’s interest in fashion. It was an enjoyable tool, fashion, to prepare oneself for the hunt.

Samantha wore a white robe, with no skin showing. It was thick, fluffy, and comfortable, perfect for someone tending to a wounded soul.

The small woman looked Antoinette up and down several times as she sat on a stool. She had yet to see this side of her sire, and was no doubt surprised at Antoinette’s rather tall physique being on display. Combined with her white hair and red eyes, it made the elder’s unusual body all the more blatant.

“You’re so beautiful,” she said.

Antoinette smiled at the small woman. “Why thank you my childe. Though I hope you realize, you are quite the attractive little creature yourself.”

“I don’t ... I don’t know. Really?”

“You were preparing yourself for the hunt before the madness occurred, were you not? For a man? Your son noticed that you had lost weight, and were taking better care of yourself.”

She sat up straight, eyes widening, trapped in disbelief. “He noticed?”

“I would have hesitated to sire you, Samantha, if you had not done so. An eternity is a terribly long time to spend with a body you do not like. Trust me, you have done well, and any man — or woman — will be delighted to slip between your thighs.”

“A-Antoinette! I ... I haven’t thought about things like that in a long time. At least, not so brazenly!”

Antoinette chuckled, and motioned for the woman to one of the racks of clothes, filled with outfits for her new child. “One of the few joys of your second life, Samantha, is your ability to indulge and enjoy sex in ways you could not before. Pregnancy and diseases are things of the past. So too are societal judgments. If you wish to fornicate only rarely, that is your choice, but you and I both know sex is most entertaining, and addicting. And in our night society, many Kindred, of whatever sex or gender best describes them, indulge in sexual delights beyond imagining.” Maybe a little more context, something a little more tactile? “I have two ghouls, young women, that I both feed from, and share with your son, both for food, and for when we are in the mood to indulge our sexual cravings.”

She brought her hands up to her cheeks, as if trying to hide the blush that did not come, eyes widening to the extreme. This woman was quite sincere, genuine, and delightful, to the point of almost being drôle. It did earn a chuckle, and a giggle, from the Prince.

“My son ... I...”

“I am sorry if that was too much, my childe. But, I felt it necessary to paint the reality thick with color for you. If you wished to bring three men back to a nest for the night, strangers, lonely widows, virgin youths, or dangerous wanderers, no Kindred would think less of you for it.” Antoinette fished through the clothes, and withdrew a dress meant for a night club. A black skirt of latex, only barely long enough to cover the buttocks, and a top that was nothing more than a glorified bikini top with a few extra straps, but triangle fronts that would barely cover the nipples.

“I can’t wear that! It ... it doesn’t even have underwear!”

“You could wear a thong with it, if you desired, but many of the garments here are meant to be worn without. Sex is much easier to have, if all you need to do is lift your skirt, or slip it aside.” She withdrew another outfit, a long skirt black dress, a classic that any woman should own. The skirt was split up past the thigh and hip, and the dress’s front had small, loose traps that would do a poor job of hiding the breasts.

“Prince! Maybe we should ... look for something a little ... more tame, for my first night out?”

Antoinette sighed, drawing out the sound in a very deliberate way, emphasizing her disappointment. A game, of course, only meant to tease her new childe. While her heart broke for the pain Samantha was dealing with, setting that misery aside and focusing on the pleasures her new life offered her was proving all sorts of fun for her sire.

“You are Daeva, Samantha Terry, free to indulge and feed your ego and your vices. You are beautiful, and can bend mine to your whim with only a few words.” Nodding, she set the black dress upon the childe’s shoulder. “Did you shave as I recommended?”

“Yes.” She squirmed a little, reached down, and rubbed at her ankle under the hem of the robe. “I mean, I know ‘shaved’ is in-fashion these days,” she said, air quoting ‘shaved’ with the same mannerism as her son, “but it looks a little strange on me. I’m old and—”

“Do not be ridiculous. I sired you at a ripe age, Samantha. Men everywhere will refer to you ... as a ... milf, dare I use such a ridiculous term. A woman such as yourself, dressed in clothes obviously meant to lure hungry eyes, only to reveal smooth skin to wandering fingers? You will not need to use a Kindred discipline to seduce your target. They will throw themselves at you eagerly.”

The poor woman squirmed with every word, and Antoinette chuckled once again. Oh what fun her new childe was.

“Do all Kindred use sex, when hunting for food?”

“At one time or another. While all Kindred, save for the Nosferatu, can openly use sex when hunting, we are the only bloodclan that can persuade kine with such an obvious bias. The Ventrue can use Dominate, to bend and break the minds of kine, and the more skilled, subtle Ventrue could use it to invite kine into their bed.” Julias was such a man, but she dared not utter his name. Mentioning him could send Samantha spiraling, perhaps reminding her of Julias’s sacrifice to save her, or of her daughter’s death. Tonight was to be a night of joy, not pain. “But Daeva can use Majesty, and twist kine around our fingers.”

“I’m not sure I feel comfortable doing that.”

Antoinette nodded, and began fishing for other clothing options for her childe. “You are a Kindred, but a fledgling, and not far separated from your first life. You will struggle with that separation for the rest of your second life. It is our curse, to struggle between our Humanity, and the Beast that now lurks within you.” Nodding, she tossed her childe a couple more ensembles, some more conservative, some less so. “But make no mistake, you are a vampire now, Samantha. Humans are beneath you, on the food chain.”

“I ... I’ll ... try and remember that.”

“See that you do. It would be horrible if you perished, because you refused to feed.” Sighing, Antoinette sat down beside her childe upon another cushioned stool, and set a hand on her shoulder. “Especially considering how much work I have put into my city, turning it into a haven for our kind.”

“You mean, so that we can feed so openly?”

“Oui.”

“I ... I’m afraid, sire. Feeding, the Kiss? It sounds so ... overwhelming. Last week I was going to go shopping for toilet paper!”

Antoinette laughed, got up, and started looking for apparel for herself for tonight. “Once your fangs pierce their skin, it will come naturally to you, childe. Your target will melt into pleasure and relaxation. Their muscles will release, their body will go limp, and pleasure will course through both of your forms.” Antoinette grinned as she moved aside some clothes along the rail. Ah, a dress with terribly flimsy straps and front, meant to be worn with tape to hold it in place on the breasts. A bit much to wear in front of her childe on her first hunt. “If done during sex, it will guarantee an orgasm for the both of you.”

“I d-don’t think I’ll be ... sleeping with anyone.” The small woman held out the first dress Antoinette had passed her, and she looked it up and down with a curious gaze.

“And that is perfectly alright, Samantha. Do whatever you wish. Whichever kine you feast upon will be rendered catatonic in bliss, and then with exhaustion, as you drain them. And as long as you do not drink until the blood runs dry, they will survive.”

Samantha continued to examine the dress, and spent more than a minute gawking at how little its top was meant to cover. “You’re not worried about getting into ... I don’t know, dangerous situations? I hear horror stories about women, getting ... you know ... if they put themselves in bad positions...”

“You overestimate such dangers. The majority of men are courteous and civil, if perhaps a bit persistent, once intrigued.” She plucked a dress from the rack. Perhaps this one? “And you are a Kindred now, Samantha. Any Kindred is far stronger than kine. As a Daeva, you are especially strong, and will have little trouble breaking even the strongest kine with one hand.”

“You say that, but I can’t imagine—”

Antoinette reached over to one of the cushioned stools beside her, set a hand atop it, and broke off one of its thick, wooden legs, with all the effort of breaking a toothpick. As her childe’s eyes went wide, she handed the wooden leg to her. It was several inches thick, and well beyond the ability of a woman her size to break.

“Take this, and break it in half.”

“ ... really?”

“Oui. It will be easy, little Daeva. The strength of the Kindred, vitae, you will feel it coursing through you as you set your mind and heart to a task. Try.”

Her childe, with eyes wide in disbelief, took the hard stick in her hand. She frowned at it, and Antoinette struggled to not giggle at how terribly adorable it was. Samantha was as cute as a button, and her timid nature only increased how positively joyful it made their interactions. Better yet, was the surprised squeak that Samantha made, when the wooden leg broke in half with a loud crack.

“Oh my god!”

“Your body is durable, your strength great, and you have tools to hunt, either with seduction, or through force. You are a predator, Samantha. And tonight, you will be able to have any man or woman of your choosing.”

She gulped, coughed on her dry throat, and took a peek at the more revealing dress Antoinette gave her. “Oh god, if Jack saw me wearing this.”

Antoinette giggled, stood up, and resumed digging through her endless clothes in pursuit of something appropriate. “Jack has seen hundreds of women wear far less, at this point.”

“My boy, sleeping around?”

“No, but as I said, sleeping around is not a concern in our society, Samantha. Do not judge others, and they will not judge you. Besides, what I meant was, in our night life, clothes are often risqué, as are the acts Kindred perform when feeding. No doubt you will see many kine at Bloodlust tonight, wearing less than either of us, and likely engaged in sexual acts.”

Samantha looked at the broken wood in her hands, took a long sigh, set it aside, and got up. “I ... I need to change, don't I? I mean, my mind, how I think about things.”

“Yes, but much of what I ask will come naturally to you, Samantha.”

“I don't know if I can change that much. I ... I haven't been with anyone since James. That's a long time! And ... and I was working up to ... getting back into sex. Trying to build my confidence.” She walked over to one of the vanity mirrors, and held the first dress Antoinette had given her in front of her. “And now you’re telling me I can use it as a tool for hunting, that I can indulge in it whenever I want, as much as I want, with whomever I want, and that I’ll ... I’ll be ... fine?”

“You are a deadly predator now, my childe. Be confident. Rest assured, dealing with kine will be easy, once you are familiar.” Antoinette nodded, came up behind Samantha, and set her hands on her shoulders. A tiny woman, several inches shorter than Ashley or Julee, but with a larger derrière, thicker thighs, and larger breasts. Motherhood, and then a year returning to health and fitness, had crafted her a beautiful little physique, thin but curvy, a small waist accented by the developed bust and buttocks. Hourglass. It was a build Antoinette knew many men and women craved to have in their bed, and one she knew some women were paradoxically self-conscious about. Samantha would grow confidence with Antoinette’s help, and learn to use her body as a tool for hunting; and a tool for pleasure, if she desired.

“Are you sure we should go out ... tonight? D-Don’t you have, um, a prisoner to deal with?”

“Your son, my student, and my sheriff are handling the interrogation of the monster, Samantha. For now, you are my priority, and teaching a childe to feed is a task all sires must perform.” She pat the woman on the shoulder, before she turned and stepped over to her own vanity mirror. Without hesitation, she slid out of her robe, and held one of the dresses against her naked body. A peek over her shoulder showed that Samantha had looked to her, and a little eye contact earned a squeak from the small woman.

“You’re so ... so beautiful! And tall!”

“Merci, little Daeva. Though, I assume my great height, unusual curves, and white hair, are a product of experimentations I must have performed upon myself, centuries ago.” A part of her thought she should have, perhaps, felt shame over that. A much larger part of her knew to accept that past, and move on.

“Assume?”

Nodding, Antoinette took another dress into her hands. Yes, this one would do. A silver dress, open back, with plunging cleavage to the navel, and front straps that would only barely cover her breasts. A necklace would be required, to offset the extreme cleavage. The skirt was split up each thigh, reaching far above the hip, with a small string upon each split to keep it tight about the waist. The skirt would reach low on her calf, so extravagant shoes would have to go with, of course.

The flimsy, loose, dangling front would mean she would have to be careful with each step, to prevent her breasts from becoming exposed. That was part of the fun, after all, teasing wandering eyes with the fair chance she would display her bust. She would not; centuries of wearing different forms of clothing of varying degrees of comfort had long molded her into an expert of flaunting, without fault.

“I explained it upon your first night with us. After centuries, Kindred as old as I struggle with memories of ages past. I can faintly remember beginning experiments with my order long ago.”

“The Ordo Dracul? I ... I’m still not sure what your covenant does.”

“Experimenting with what makes us Kindred, seeking to discover the secrets of our species, and other hidden gems of knowledge within the endless dark.” Antoinette slid the dress over her head, and let it fall upon her body. After tying the little strings upon its left and right to her waist, ensuring it was snug to her flat stomach, she adjusted the front over her breasts, before turning and joining her childe. “My unusual body has been an ... interesting dilemma, for me. Most men find me far too imposing to engage of their own volition. Your son, I engaged on my own.”

“Really? Why?”

“Simple curiosity at first. He was obviously out of his element, attempting to hunt in Bloodlust on his own. But when I invited him to conversation, I found myself surprised at his courage, and the depth of his mind.”

Samantha smiled at the mirror. It was obvious that complimenting her son was the best way to brighten her mood, and Antoinette would use the tactic freely.

“I’m so proud of Jack. I mean, I’m furious that he didn’t tell me he was alive, but what he’s managed to become in just two years? Wow.”

Antoinette’s smile did not falter, but there was no denying the cold stab Samantha’s words wrought. Her beloved Jack had indeed accomplished much in those two years, and the burdens he now bore were unjust, and horrific.

But now was not the time to share such details with his mother. Tonight, she, her childe, and several other women, were going to enjoy themselves.

---

“Oh ... my ... god.” Samantha’s jaw dropped, and she looked around and around, eyes wide as she took in the sights.

A host of people at the bar, and another thirty on the dance floor, swaying, grinding, to the slow, deep, drumming beat. The red light and flickering white strobes made Bloodlust feel as if it were the inside of an actual heart, and everyone within it could not ignore the urge to move to its pulse. As if by instinct, kine succumbed to the beat, entranced, drawn into its allure, and their bodies demanded they act to its desires with dance, touch, and lust.

Antoinette smiled down at her childe. Samantha looked delicious in the black dress, and to her sire's delight, she chose to wear the first one Antoinette had picked for her. It highlighted her round buttocks nicely, and left her beautiful, curvy legs fully exposed. She had chosen to wear a thong underneath, but it looked marvelous where it hooked near her exposed hips. The criss-crossing black straps that ran over her stomach, sides, back, and breasts, left nothing to the imagination. They had also taken the time to play with her hair, emphasizing its brown waves as they reached her mostly bare shoulders.

Ashley and Julee had come as well, wearing simple but colorful short skirts and black tank tops with open backs. The ghouls did not wish to pull eyes away from their master, or their master's new childe tonight. Would there be jealousy between them and Samantha? Antoinette did not know. Perhaps.

Natasha stood beside them as well, and to Antoinette's great joy, was wearing something as equally as revealing as the Prince. Antoinette's long, silver dress was barely more than a few dangling slips of fabric, and it drew many eyes, but it was Natasha that drew more eyes this night. The tiny woman wore a petite black skirt, similar to Samantha's, and small enough that everyone could see the hips of the thong underneath. Better yet, she wore a tube top, a wonderfully tiny tube top that did a poor job of covering her small breasts. The fabric was also slightly see-through in the strobing light, barely, only enough to provide a slim hint of her nipples for onlookers.

The point of the attire was obvious: to announce to onlookers that, despite her tiny stature, she had the curves of a woman, sexual and seductive. Antoinette had picked the attire for her, knowing it would make her terribly uncomfortable, but also knowing it would stroke her ego, once the eyes started to find her. Eyes did, many, and Natasha squirmed as she failed to suppress a smile.

“Come,” Antoinette said to her childe. “I prefer to sit upstairs.”

Samantha, gulping, eyes wide as she looked around at the sights, followed after her. Antoinette walked slow, inviting eyes to stare, and indulging her Daeva ego as many men and women looked at her body. Samantha looked down, but she was smiling as she realized many people were looking at her as well. Good. Five women, all terribly beautiful, sexual, arousing to any viewer, and walking as a group. It was strangely fun, silly and juvenile, but fun.

Samantha stopped as her eyes fell upon a couple in one of the booths, still on the bottom floor. A woman was sitting between two men, a hand rubbing the crotch of one, while she leaned into and kissed the lips of the other. Others were drinking, and exchanging saliva in vast quantities as they kissed each other between gulps. Others were sitting alone, but shivering in obvious bliss, and Samantha gasped as she realized the person, a woman, was being eaten from underneath the booth table.

“I’m in way over my head,” her childe said.

Natasha giggled, and gave the woman a small touch on her arm. “It’s n-not so crazy, once you’ve been around it f-f-for a while. The kine here are happy.”

“B-But, they’re ... they all look so young! And they’re not really preparing for their future, you know? They’re being so juvenile! I mean, how much money does—”

Antoinette looked over her shoulder at her childe, and met her gaze. A small exchange of a soft look was enough to remind Samantha of their earlier conversations. She was no longer a kine, she was Kindred, and she had to learn to think in such terms. To completely separate her mind from her previous modes of thought would be foolhardy, leaving herself open to the Beast and its animal desires. But to chain herself in the impulses she developed as a human, was equally as foolhardy, and that included her motherly tendencies. Many Kindred lost themselves to depression if they refused to embrace at least some of the Beast, and Samantha was at extreme risk to such desolation.

“Right, right. I shouldn’t worry about what they’re doing.” Nodding several times, as if drilling the information past her own mind’s defenses, she started up the stairs after her sire. “It’s hard. I ... I’m too old for—”

“You’re t-too young, if anything,” Natasha said, giggling all the more. To hear the little woman make such a sound lifted a great weight from Antoinette’s shoulders. Natasha took Julias’s death hard, but she also seemed quite overjoyed to have a new companion in the Ordo Dracul. “Given a little t-t-time, I’m sure you’ll be ... d-doing whatever you want, with whoever you want, really.”

Samantha managed a small frown as she kept walking up the stairs. “I don’t even know what that is. It’s been so long since I’ve ... done anything, with anyone.”

“I suggest,” Antoinette said, “that you keep any sexual exploration rather shallow, tonight. It will be your first Kiss, and could be quite overwhelming.”

“So you’re saying, I shouldn’t sleep with ... whoever I ... hunt?”

Antoinette laughed, and motioned to her favorite booth upon the second floor of Bloodlust. It sat further back, in the center of the balcony, and the lighting up above was not as powerful or direct as that below. Darkness reigned on the second floor.

“My childe, if you decided to bask in the touch of a dozen men and women tonight, at once, I would say to enjoy yourself. I only suggest keeping your explorations light, because it will be your first time enjoying the Kiss, and you may find yourself a touch surprised at its impact.” And you are not yet prepared mentally, with such a vast wound still healing. Antoinette slipped into the booth, and Samantha slid in beside her, Natasha taking Samantha’s other side. Julee and Ashley stood behind the booth, to be extra eyes and ears for Antoinette as she relaxed. “There is nothing to fear, no matter what happens, as long as you remember what I told you. Do not kill whoever you Kiss, and lick the wound once you are done to seal it shut.”

“Don’t kill, lick it shut, right right.” Samantha put her hands on the booth table, and looked down at herself. “Wearing something like this, I’m surprised a guy hasn’t tried to jump me yet.”

Antoinette rolled her eyes, and motioned to Natasha.

“D-D-Don’t be so hard on men. If a man g-gets aggressive with you, it’s almost always n-not because he ... he’s going to do something horrible. It’s because m-most women like a confident man.” Natasha gestured to the railing. They couldn’t see the first floor from their booth, but the memory of its sights would no doubt be vivid in Samantha’s memory. “A lot of w-w-women like it when a man gets aggressive, m-make her feel ... helpless. B-B-But not when she isn’t into the guy. It’s ... it’s...”

“It is a difficult balance for men to find, my childe,” Antoinette said. “Timidity is not attractive, but society looks down upon men who are too aggressive.” For the conversation to head into this direction, the social and cultural establishments of gender norms and sexual attraction, was not what Antoinette had expected. But, she was happy to indulge the topic, and happier still, that Natasha was learning from her lessons. “What Natasha and I mean to say, is if a man is being aggressive with you, do not fret. If you have sternly told him to leave you be, and he does not, then you are encouraged to exercise your abilities as a Kindred.”

“My abilities? Oh, you mean hurt him.”

Natasha punched the air, once, with a lightning jab. “Kapow! Or something. Break an arm, or leg, or w-w-what have you. As long as you don’t kill them, then d-do what you want.”

Samantha gulped again and looked to Antoinette. “Really?”

“Oui, as I demonstrated to you earlier, with the stool leg. But, such a measure is rarely required. If a man is being aggressive with you, in all likelihood, it is because he believes you have flirted with him, and he is approaching you in a way he thinks you will enjoy; as dozens of women in this very establishment have proven. In such a circumstance, simply being upfront with him and saying ‘no thank you, I am not interested’ will end his chase. Usually.” Antoinette had long lost interest in being chased. Chasing, she found, was far more appealing. Perhaps it was simply a question of time and Kindred blood that led to such a change in Antoinette. But then, Natasha was not the sort to enjoy chasing, and she was both old and Kindred. No, the little woman definitely enjoyed being chased, and considering her boyfriends were literal incarnations of beasts of the hunt, such a thing was likely a near nightly occurrence for her. Lucky her. Antoinette had not slept with Jack since Julias’s death, and she was not sure when they would again.

She was not sure if she could let her sexuality fully emerge in Jack’s presence anymore, after seeing the alien entity within him emerge. An abhorrent, disgusting thing. The look in its eyes had not been Jack’s, and the idea of such a nasty beast touching her body was not a pleasant one. Worse, the idea of letting her guard down around the monster that had summoned an army of crows, and had slaughtered hunters in such a brutal way, such a ... Viktor way, sent a cold shiver down her spine. Not a shiver of fear, but of revulsion.

She shook her head, and refocused her thoughts. Jack had shown no signs of letting his curse emerge a second time, and she should trust his word that it would not affect him, especially where his relationship with her was concerned. And she did trust him, mostly.

“And,” Antoinette continued, “if you truly wished to, you are allowed to kill kine, Samantha. There is little reason to, and almost always only negatives to gain. But know that, no matter what happens tonight, you are more than capable of managing any kine that comes your way, in any way you see fit. You came with me, and you will leave with me.”

“Guess I won’t be going back to some random stud’s place then?”

Too drôle, and cute. Antoinette could not help but chuckle. “Not until the hunters have been dealt with. While this section of South Side is quite safe, quite is not completely. I—” The Prince cast her glances to the stairs, and smiled as she recognized the vampire coming to join them. “Samantha Terry, meet Jessy Herrington, and Eric Tanverson.” Samantha’s eyes went wide, a reflex that Antoinette found herself drawn to. It was an expression of sincerity, showing Samantha’s soul with blatant honesty, much like her son did. It was precious.

Her childe’s eyes had gone wide from having at least two of her senses overwhelmed. The first was the unmistakable aura Eric gave off. Samantha did not yet know how to understand the strange way the Beast communicated with her, altered her senses, told her things and made her aware of things she had not been before, such as subtle smells, or body language. It was undoubtedly warning her now that Eric was an extremely dangerous animal, and perhaps not a simple kine.

The second reason was Jessy’s clothing. The Gangrel wore a tiny skirt, same as Samantha, but it was her top that had Samantha staring. Jessy’s top could barely be considered more than an elaborate necklace, with many loops of black fabric perhaps an inch thick circling around her neck and over her shoulders, and dangling against her chest. A dozen loops, hanging loosely, and doing an abysmal job of covering her skin. Her breasts hung free, with some black tape drawn in an X across each nipple, hiding them but for a subtle hint of pink at the inner edges.

Jessy and her brazen attitude were such a delight. Her short blonde hair, her muscular physique, and surprisingly large bust, were such a pleasing visual combination of strength and femininity, that Antoinette could not help but be interested in the woman's pursuits. And her pursuits had most definitely become interesting, as knowledge of her rather extreme sexual adventures with her werewolf partner became known.

"You're Samantha? Hot damn, you are gorgeous." Jessy slipped into the booth next to Natasha, before she froze and looked at Antoinette. "Uh, sorry, Prince. Can I—"

"I am here only as observer, Miss Herrington, and aid to my childe on her first hunt. Behave as if I were not here ... to a reasonable point, of course."

Jessy nodded, and Antoinette half expected her to salute. It made Antoinette smile.

"So you're Jack's mom? Yeah, gorgeous! Who convinced you to wear that?"

Samantha shrank in her seat. "Um ... m-my sire."

Lights flashed in Jessy's eyes, and she leaned over the counter, across Natasha's lap toward Samantha. "First hunt? If you're shy, I can lend you one of my boys."

"Boys?" Samantha said, eyes drifting up from the table toward Eric. "I, uh—"

“No no, that’s Eric, my boyfriend. I got four ghouls, dudes, and—yeah, two of them over there.” The Gangrel nodded toward a booth. “And ... that’s Vincent, over there. Looks like he’s getting a blowjob right now, but that just means he’d enjoy a Kiss even more.” Another nod for another nearby booth.

Samantha leaned out enough to follow Jessy’s directions and spot the male ghouls. Her gasps were audible despite the music, earning a laugh from Jessy.

“D-Don’t rush her!” Natasha said. “Samantha, my friend J-Jessy is an asshole.”

“I happen to like that asshole,” Eric said, stepping up with a smile. Jessy burst into laughter, and Eric took a moment, before realizing his double entendre. “You know what I mean.”

“Fuck, we are wiped,” Jessy said. “Boss has me and Eric running the whole damn city up and down, patrolling. And Eric still has to do his shifts, too. Tonight’s the first night we get any free time, once his shift’s done tonight.”

“Um, Eric,” Samantha said, “I ... I um, you seem ... uh...”

“Werewolf,” Eric said, smiling at the woman. He did not sit down. He was wearing the suit the other bouncers wore, a nice balance of classy and fun, no tie, and suit jacket undone. Combined with his dark skin and shaved head, he looked terribly attractive, and Samantha looked him up and down at least twice. Perhaps her Daeva blood was showing through, drawing her gaze into the delicious symmetry of his body.

“Werewolf?” Samantha shivered, and rubbed her arms for a moment before setting them on her lap. “Wow.”

Antoinette struggled to not giggle at the expense of her childe. Jack had warned the Prince of the woman’s infatuation with juvenile romance dramas, including the infamous Twilight series. Talk of vampires and werewolves would fill her mind with fantastical images that were wholly inaccurate. But, for the moment, it was a pleasing delight to let the woman's own imagination fill her thoughts with wonder.

Eric looked at the small woman for a few moments, before he adopted a strange smile. It was not a smile Antoinette was used to seeing on paranormals, but she did recognize it. It was the smile of someone who was going to talk with an older person, a mix of respect, but also understanding that the minds of the older were never quite as quick as the minds of the younger. The man had plenty of practice from dealing with his father, no doubt. Antoinette appreciated it.

“Jessy is right though, you look great. Certainly don't look old enough to be Jack's mom.”

She smiled, and to Antoinette's utter delight, giggled. The woman was helpless to the obviously manipulative words of Eric, kind as they were. Jack's analysis of his mother was correct, that she was a simple-minded woman, with a heart of gold. Antoinette almost felt bad, bringing such a pure woman into a place of decadence, sexuality, and wanton exploration of boundaries. Perhaps she was being too hard on her little childe, throwing her into the deep end and expecting her to swim?

As much as it was true that Samantha was a fresh Kindred, a fledgling only a week old, it was also true that she was the Prince's childe. Much was expected of her, and Antoinette had faith she could fulfill those expectations. While Jack may think much of his success and abilities were due to his curse expressing its power, Antoinette knew better, as did Julias. Jack had a mind capable of great feats, with or without his curse, and the Prince expected to see various aspects of Jack's determination and skill emerge in her new childe.

But for now, she was a naive woman, vulnerable to words. Eric's words had been kind, but Antoinette could foresee others attempting to manipulate her. Jessy would no doubt push the woman into a sexual affair, but that was not necessarily a bad thing. Sex and the Kiss, especially when combined, were wonderfully capable of easing the sorrow of a pained soul, if at least only momentarily.

"You all know Jack?" Samantha said. "It's ... hard to imagine, Jack making so many friends. After James died, he always kept to himself. All his teenage years, he did his own thing, alone."

"Jack's been making waves ever since Julias brought him in," Jessy said. "I mean yeah, he was pretty closed off then, and still is a bit, but he's a force, you know? When shit hits the fan, we can all rely on that little punk." Nodding, Jessy pulled Eric down to sit next to her, before she slid onto his lap sideways, and hooked an arm around his neck. Her free arm played with his suit, tugging at the shirt underneath, and fingers slipping in between buttons to find skin. "Kid even ran a rescue mission. Saved me, Eric, and another wolf named Clara."

"Jack running ... rescue ... missions?" Samantha shivered and set a hand to her neck. "It's ... I suppose it's easier to see him doing that, than being social and making friends. But harder to accept. He must be in danger ... all the time."

The Gangrel nodded, and spoke up before anyone else could. "Our second life isn't without risks, Sam. Your kid has saved a lot of lives." And again, before anyone could say anything, or before poor Samantha could even react to the contentious Gangrel, Jessy slammed both palms down on the table. It made everyone flinch save for Antoinette. How poor Eric could handle such a bundle of unbridled aggression, Antoinette would never know. "But from where I'm sitting"—she laughed at her joke, and punched Eric in the chest—"this night is about you, right? Don't worry about Jack."

Samantha gulped, and looked up at Antoinette.

The Prince smiled down at her childe once more. “As much as the boisterous Gangrel has invited herself into our affairs, she is not wrong. Your son has made unprecedented advancement in skill and position, Samantha. He can take care of himself, better than most. You, on the other hand, are a brand new fledgling, and must learn to do the same.” Complimenting her would work well, but complimenting her son would turn the woman into malleable clay, fully willing to believe and follow whoever it was that applauded her offspring. Antoinette would have to work hard to teach the woman some awareness, and to be wary of forked tongues.

Antoinette did take a moment to offer Jessy a small glare. It said many things, in a fraction of a second of eye contact. Do not push my childe too hard, stupid woman, or I will break you, and your sire will be helpless to do anything but watch.

Jessy gulped in a similar manner to Samantha, and Antoinette smiled. Message sent and received.

“I’m not sure what to do,” Samantha said.

Antoinette tapped her chin a few times. “I think, perhaps, you should take Jessy up on her offer.”

“Say what?” Jessy said, eyebrow raised.

“The first time Jack fed on kine, it was on Ashley. Was it not, my dear?”

“Yeah!” Ashley leaned over the booth from behind, and nodded emphatically. “He was super nervous. But mistress let him Kiss me, right here in this booth actually.” A frown slowly crept onto her face. “Just that, though.”

Antoinette rolled her eyes, and shooed her silly ghoul away. No need to scar the mother's mind with talk of Jack sharing his bed with three women; or rather, no more than Antoinette already had.

Natasha smiled up at the ghoul, before turning her petite smile to Samantha. "If you're n-not comfortable with hunting, with m-meeting a stranger and Kissing them, then Jessy's idea isn't t-t-too bad. I ... d-don't suggest Vincent though." Indeed, Vincent was in the midst of fellatio, and Kindred eyes revealed enough in the dark that Samantha could no doubt see the man was struggling on the edge of bliss.

"So you ... know these men?" Samantha said. "Of course you do, if they're your ghouls. I ... I um ... I can trust them."

Jessy laughed. "As much as any man. They're horny and dumb. Flash a smile and some skin and you can make them do whatever you want. And if they get too uppity, break their arm. My ghouls won't do anything you won't like, though."

That earned a chuckle from Samantha. Two separate Kindred, vastly different, recommending the same course of action separate from each other, was a convincing argument.

"I think ... I mean, I guess I can do that."

"You kidding me?" Jessy said. "You're a Daeva. You could literally break any man in this room in half, even at your age. And you're Kindred, so as long as you don't ... I don't know, tackle someone through a wall, or rip out someone's skull, you're free to do what you want to the kine. You're worrying too much! You can hunt and fuck all you want. You can't get pregnant, you can't get any diseases, and anal is on the menu twenty-four-seven. And especially as a Daeva, a little touch of Majesty, and kine are eating out of your palm, and between your legs." Shrugging, she got up and out from the booth, and motioned for Eric and Natasha to follow.

They did, leaving Samantha's flank and path completely open.

"Just ... walk up to the two of them?"

Jessy nodded. "Sure. Bang them if you want, you got my permission." A sharp glance from Antoinette earned a flinch from the brazen woman. "Or, you know, probably just want to offer one of them a Kiss. All the power is in your hands."

"Power. Right. Power." Nodding, several more times than necessary, Samantha scooted out of the booth seat, stood up, and adjusted her dress. "How do I look?"

"Like the sexy milf young men fantasize about getting seduced by," Jessy said, and she held up her thumb.

"Right. Yeah. Ok." She did not believe Jessy's words, but she would, Antoinette knew it. Samantha was a beautiful woman, and the Prince had made sure to put that beauty on exaggerated display tonight. Jessy's ghouls stood no chance.

Samantha shook out her shoulders a little, and walked over to the booth the two men sat in. They were bordering on intoxicated, from what Antoinette could see, glasses in their hands, and jovial laughs cutting through the music between pulses. Their height and muscularity were impressive, and Antoinette found herself a little surprised Jessy had traded her four men of brawn in, for the bitter ex-husband who was, by all accounts, an average-sized man. The Prince knew Eric was quite muscular underneath his suit, given his history, but with it on, he seemed of normal stature.

But then, he would be anything but average sized, once transformed into his war beast form. Antoinette had almost decided to speak to Jessy on her own, and discourage this reckless indulgence in such a dangerous kink. The other Uratha did not indulge their lust when transformed, as far as she knew, and she did know that they struggled to control themselves when in the Gauru form. As long as Eric did not draw attention to himself, as he did with his first transformation, she did not mind, but it was a risky business.

“Sorry if I’m spoiling shit,” Jessy said to them all. “Kinda just walked in and told your childe what to do, didn’t I?”

Antoinette nodded, and licked a canine. “You did. But your intentions were well placed. Samantha is a .. troubled woman, as you know. She does not realize it, but she is the sort who best thrives on a social environment.” And apparently, that was half destroyed when she lost her husband, and the other half was destroyed when she lost Jack. It was time to heal. “Kind words from a group of friends will help her, more than she knows, more than the words of a mentor can.”

“Social butterfly sort, right?” Nodding, Jessy adjusted her top, made sure to do so in such a way as to draw Eric’s eyes, before she smiled at Antoinette. “Or at least, she probably was.”

“Indeed, but her life has been pain, and misery, long before her embrace. Given time, she will heal, and I believe a large social circle will help her do so.” She tapped a finger on the table, and watched her childe sit with the two men in a distant booth. Samantha looked terribly nervous, sitting with plenty of space between her and the nearest of Jessy’s ghouls. But, there was no denying the lust in the men’s eyes as they looked the small woman up and down, and the hunger in hers as she did the same to them. Instinct would take over eventually.

“Large s-social circle?” Natasha said as she sat back down in the booth. “I c-can’t imagine that healing anyone.”

Jessy and Antoinette both chuckled, and the small woman frowned.

“We could help her?” Julee said, leaning over the booth’s back. “I mean, I know we’re a bit young, but...”

“In the future, perhaps, my pet.” Antoinette nodded, and combed her hair over her shoulder and chest. “Samantha may require a social life Kindred like Natasha do not, but not until she has recovered from her circumstance. If she did not need to hunt, I would have kept her in the tower for several more weeks, to heal.”

Julee nodded, put her elbows on the booth’s back, and set her chin in her palms. “Shame we never got to meet Mary.”

“Careful, pet. Should Samantha hear you, you may send her spiraling into sorrow.”

“Right, right! Sorry.” The ballerina stood at attention again, but it broke quickly as she started talking with Ashley.

“Prince,” Jessy said, “can I speak frankly? About, you know, normal stuff.”

“At Bloodlust, I expect only a fraction of the respect I demand in the rest of the city.”

“How ... much is that fraction?”

Antoinette grinned. “Test the waters, and find out, Herrington.” A challenge for the Gangrel was Antoinette at play, toying with her prey. If Jessy had the mindfulness to gauge and control herself, she would learn how to speak with Antoinette without issue. If she did not, then Antoinette would slap her down with a harsh remark, or a literal slap, if needed. Verbal jousting was a true sport, and one Antoinette enjoyed.

These were strange waters for Antoinette as well, speaking with the neonates and ancilla of the city on such informal ground. Normally they avoided her, until Jack, sweet, curious, honest Jack, had not. She found herself almost excited that, perhaps, she could make new friends; or at least acquaintances to speak with. It had grown lonely in her tower, after Tony's departure, even for an elder such as her.

“Well, I was talking with Tash and Jack a few days ago, and it seems you and Jack are pretty open about expressing your sexual interests with each other.” With a juvenile grin, Jessy slid back into the booth next to Natasha.

“You have been to my balls, young Gangrel. You should know it is my wish to discard the taboo of sex, and uproot the cultural stigma.” She shrugged, and gestured to Jessy's attire. “Though not everyone embraces it as readily as you.”

“Heh, thanks.” She shook her shoulders a few times, causing her delightful breasts to sway and ripple with nipples locked behind the black tape, and for the dress top of black straps to bounce. “I wanted to know about you and Jack. Like ... how does it work in bed? You know, considering—”

“Jack is content to let me lead, usually. Sometimes he is more aggressive and dominant, though such bursts are most often spent on Ashley and Julee,” she said. The two ballerinas giggled, and wiggled their fingers at the grinning Jessy. “Most nights, I guide him, indulge him, and pamper him, usually with my breasts. They are quite sensitive, and I enjoy his touch upon them greatly.”

Her words managed to punctured Jessy's shell, and the Gangrel choked on a small chuckle. Eric, on the other hand, did his best to not look at the Prince, though the man managed to sneak a few glances at her breasts. The dress was quite revealing, after all.

“And Tash gets to see all that?”

“H-Hey! I ... I mean...” Sighing, Tash punched her friend in the shoulder. “Only once or ... t-twice.”

Antoinette rolled her eyes, and looked out to the railing ahead of them, between them and the floor below. “Perhaps, some day, people will make love upon a stage for all to see, and it will be watched by eyes filled with wonder. I wish for such a future.”

“Sounds avant-garde,” Eric said. “I mean ... Dolareido’s halfway there.”

“I d-dunno.” Natasha shook her head, and tapped her index fingers together. “Love is ... b-better when it’s private, isn’t it?”

“Pffft.” Jessy reached out, and plucked on Natasha’s tube top, causing the fabric to fall.

“J-Jessy!” Natasha, squeaking and frowning, pulled her top back up, and again punched the Gangrel in the shoulder. Having her breasts revealed seemed inconsequential to the Prince; Natasha’s clothes were formfitting enough that nothing was left to the imagination anyway. Poor Eric did his best to not look, but Natasha was a terribly cute little creature, and her revealing attire meant the werewolf could see all of her delightful, small body.

“I, for one,” Jessy said, “am feeling terribly left out. You guys just fucking all over the place in that fancy tower?”

“I keep it p-p-private!”

“You do not need to, if you so desired, my student.” Antoinette smiled down at the tiny Mekhet, and Natasha looked back up at her with widening eyes. “I for one, would love to see your small frame trapped between your two wolves.”

Natasha shrank into the booth, frowning all the more. “You’re all p-p-perverts.”

Antoinette blinked, and let her eyes drift away back to the balcony railing. Natasha had just insulted her. How long had it been since someone had insulted her in such a manner? Jacob insulted her on occasion, but the man's words were never sincere, always manipulative, always layered with extra meaning. For her student to insult her with such a genuine, if juvenile, insult was ... wonderful.

Antoinette laughed, a touch louder than she meant to, and it earned looks and raised eyebrows from everyone nearby.

“Perhaps we are.”

~~Eric~~

Understanding women was impossible. Cliché, and a cliché he hadn't really believed, until he met these vampires. One minute his girlfriend was rash and brazen, the next, she was borderline flirting with her old friend; a damn cute old friend, this Natasha woman. Natasha herself seemed shy, but she had two boyfriends that she slept with, at the same time, according to Jessy. And of course, there was Antoinette, who carried a 'mommy dominatrix' sign over her head, and yet, had an edge to her that was hard to place. She was damn smart, and scary.

The confusing part was how they talked about sex. Only Natasha avoided the topic, but even then, it was obvious that the very thought of sex seemed to please her. Maybe it was a Kindred thing, or an age thing? All these women were quite old, older than Samantha, and he could tell they all enjoyed sex quite a bit. He was the youngster, in this group. Even the two young ladies behind the Prince were older than they looked, he knew, having been ghouls for her for some years.

All in all, it made him a little uncomfortable. Not in a bad way, but there was no denying that three sexy-as-hell vampires were sitting in the booth with him, and all of them were quite aware of their sexuality. Even Natasha, in stark contrast to how she acted, had a bit of that ‘mature and sexual self-awareness’ in her eyes. Then there was the fact they were all dressed to kill. Natasha was in a tiny tube top with an itty bitty skirt, and a thong. Antoinette was wearing a silver dress that a stiff breeze could have knocked off of her; any small movement would have slid the front straps off her breasts. He had no idea how she managed to keep them where they were. And his girlfriend was wearing what might have been the remains of a black top, after a lawn mower was done chewing it up. The only thing that kept nipples out of the picture, was the black nipple tape she was using to cover them up.

He was used to seeing a lot of skin. He’d been rich, or at least well off once upon a time, and even a little famous. He went to clubs a lot rowdier than Bloodlust, and had seen some huge sexual displays, but that was rarely from mature women who knew themselves. No, those nights, it’d been young women who liked pretty lights and the drugs that came with them. Young, experimenting, not sure what they wanted, not confident in themselves, and faking that they were. It was a whole different ballgame when dealing with older women, who knew exactly what they wanted.

Eric, sitting on the outside edge of the booth, looked over his shoulder to peek at Samantha. She’d moved in closer on her booth seat, close enough she was almost touching one of Jessy’s ghouls. After a few seconds, she was chuckling, a shy and quiet chuckle, but a chuckle. The ghouls were tipsy, and both were obviously trying to impress Samantha with smooth lines, jokes, and the size of their muscles. And it was working.

“Jack’s mother,” he said, looking back to the rest of them, “is ... really sweet, isn’t she?”

“Yes, she is.” The Prince nodded as she combed her hair down over her chest. “I find myself pleasantly surprised with her. She has been through the greatest Hell, and survives through sheer resilience. Despite that, she remains a soft, delicate woman.”

“Ah, one of those types.” Nodding, he looked back again. Yeap, Samantha was eating up whatever compliments the two ghouls were throwing at her. One of them slid in closer, and she didn’t slide away. Her eyes kept looking to their exposed necks. A young vampire, being driven by hunger, and the need to hunt.

She kind of reminded Eric of Fiona, actually, though Fiona had an aggressive quality to her. Samantha, if she ever recovered from the trauma she’d suffered, would likely have the same smiles and laughs the Scot did.

Samantha could recover, but his dad couldn’t? Fuck, that was frustrating. Maybe—

“You should make a sex tape.”

Everyone turned to look at Jessy.

“Um, what?” Eric said.

“Tash! Sex tape. It’s all the rage these days. We can make one, and she can make one, and we can trade.” She nodded, as if it were the greatest idea ever.

Eric facepalmed, while Natasha grumbled. The Prince just watched and listened, apparently quite content to observe the idiots make fools of themselves.

“I w-won’t!”

“Aw, come on. Really? After all I did for you, this is how you repay me?” Seeing Jessy pout like a kid wanting candy was too hilarious to not laugh at, but the glare Tash gave him shut him up quick; mostly. Some chuckles still managed to sneak through.

“You d-d-didn’t ... do ... me any favors! You just wanted to see me n-naked.”

“I did, and so did the boys. It was fun, wasn’t it? I bet Matt and Arturo are loving the new you.”

“I—”

“Pleeeaaasse? Pretty pretty please? I’ll—ow!” A sharp elbow in the side from Eric cut her off. “Asshole!” She elbowed him back, and she wasn’t so kind about it.

The Prince laughed, and caught his eyes. She knew what he was aiming for, to break Jessy out of her insistent personality loop, without bringing down the mood, and she winked at him. Woman was too damn smart.

“Herrington, while Natasha is far more comfortable with her sexuality than she used to be, in part due to your friendship, I believe you will catch more flies with honey.” Antoinette leaned forward over the table, and smiled at Natasha before eyeing Jessy with an unusual grin. “If you continue to insist, she will not acquiesce, if only to spite you.”

Jessy groaned, stomped her feet a few times, and looked back at Eric. Like a kid whining for candy in a store, to now sullen with defeat, in a matter of seconds. It was too damn cute.

“Let’s dance.”

“What?”

“Dance!” Jessy pushed on him, got him out of the booth, and followed after him. “Come on. I’m gonna show you off for a bit, before we go back to your place for some good fucking. We haven’t had time to fuck in days, and I am so god damn horny, it is killing me.”

“Show me off, or show yourself off?” He gestured to her chest, and how her flimsy top left her rock hard stomach and large breasts on display.

“Mostly the latter, bit of the former?” Shrugging, she took his hand, and started toward the stairs. “Tash! I expect to see some juicy stuff from you later.”

Tash’s frown wavered, a smile fighting to break through, but she persevered. Folding her arms across her chest, she waved at Jessy, and turned to start a conversation with the Prince.

As Jessy guided Eric to the stairway, she made sure to take the other stairway down; it cut closer to Samantha. “Isaac, Chris, Samantha treating you two alright?”

“Yes ma’am,” they said together, like soldiers.

“Me, treating them?” Samantha frowned, until she realized it was a joke, and she smiled as a giggle erupted out of her. “I’ll ... be nice.”

Jessy winked at her. “Don’t be too nice. Chris and Isaac are yours for the night.”

“M ... Mine?”

“Yeap, and they’ll do anything you ask them to.” Eyebrow wiggles followed. “Anything.”

Samantha gulped, but before she could say something, Jessy grabbed Eric’s hand and took her down the stairs.

It was louder on the first floor, and the flashing white light was more obnoxious. But none of that really mattered with Jessy’s hand around his. Everyone around them, the loud music, the lighting, it was all secondary to the joy in something as simple as following the person he was hoping to spend his time with.

They got into the middle of the crowd, and began to sway and bounce to the beat. Jessy instantly melted into it, merging with the music and its sexual rhythm. She put her back to his chest, and moved her shoulders left and right, arms raised and mixing with the crowd around them, the dozens of kine that all flowed with sexual hunger and physical exertion.

She was sad. She was doing a good job of hiding it, but he'd been hanging with her enough to see how quick she was to put on a big smile whenever he caught her eyes. She was sad, and being outgoing and hyper aggressive and sexual was how she kept the sadness from getting to her. Except, he'd held her when she cried. He knew what it felt like to hold the crazy, brash woman to his chest, when she whimpered, and sobbed. He knew what it felt like, to be someone she could lean on when she needed to cry. He wouldn't give that feeling up for the world.

If she wanted to dance, to try and forget her woes, he could be her dance partner too.

Chapter 94

~~Eric~~

“Were you trying to make me jealous the whole night?” he said.

Jessy laughed as she closed his door behind them. Back in his apartment, she reached down, threw off her high heels, literally, and jumped onto the couch. Kat sat upon the couch’s back, and meowed in greeting. Jessy meowed back.

“I am a walking, talking embodiment of hotness, Eric. Last thing I’d ever feel the need to do, is make you jealous. I am God’s gift to you, to make up for your shitty life from before.”

As much as Kat was dumb beyond all reason, she got along better with Jessy than Eric expected; especially if Jessy’s cat from her time as a human no longer liked her after her change, like she said. Maybe after her embrace, Jessy became more cat-like than human, and her pet saw her as a rival? Introducing adult cats and getting them to live together was often a painful, slow process.

With Kat, Eric could get a pet badger, and she’d still try and make friends.

“Can’t disagree.” He walked up to her, and gestured to the ridiculous-but-sexy top she still wore. “But, just because you don’t have to, doesn’t mean you wouldn’t, if you found it fun.”

“True, true.” She gestured for him to sit. Once he did, she turned around and lay on her back, her head on his lap. Groaning, she tilted her head from side to side, stretching. Did vampires need to stretch? They often breathed, and they didn’t need to do that. Probably just old habits, because, at the moment, he could tell she wasn’t alive. Pale skin, thinned, and no heartbeat or natural scents. It’d been a bit of a shocker, being around her when she wasn't Blushing Life, and after his new senses had awakened. His animal instincts told him she was a corpse, but corpses didn't walk and talk and fuck.

"Samantha seems nice," he said.

"Yeah, really nice. And speaking of." She pulled out her phone, and texted someone. A second later, she got a text back, and she smirked at the phone. "She took a small kiss of Isaac. Apparently it was a little surprising for her, and she ended it quickly. Now Chris is trying to convince her to Kiss him too, and now that she's all hot and bothered from the first Kiss, he's pushing for a little touching."

"Aw come on. The woman's been through hell. He shouldn't—"

"Samantha's an adult, dumbass. She can take care of herself. And besides, my boys know to not push it too far." She shrugged, and scrolled on the phone. Holding it up with it pointed down at her, head still on his lap, he couldn't see what she was scrolling through, but whatever it was, was making her smile. "Want to see some more pictures?"

"More pictures? Of—" She turned the phone around and showed him. Clara again, with a weird expression; likely drunk, and maybe high. She was standing in a shower, and two of Jessy's ghouls were eating her out, one from behind, one from the front. Must have been a picture from earlier, since most of those guys were just at Bloodlust.

Jesus, how much pot would it take for an Uratha to get high? What used to get him drunk, didn't, and he'd probably have to drink ten times what he used to to get wasted. An expensive vice to keep.

"God damn Clara is beautiful. I'm happy she's enjoying my boys, with Jack out of the picture. I hope Samantha enjoys them too."

“You know she’s going to kill you, if you keep letting your ghouls take pictures of her. And—” Eric stared at the picture of the naked werewolf. Clara was average height for a woman, maybe a couple inches taller, and she had a lean muscularity similar to Jessy; no wonder the Gangrel found her attractive. Smaller breasts, long black box-braids, and dark tan skin, she was the definition of ‘sporty’, and Eric licked his lips at the sight of her, mouth open in obvious bliss.

“Hey! I’m right here,” Jessy said, and she thumped her head against his leg.

“What, I can’t make you jealous?”

“No. I can dish it out, but I am far too sensitive to take being teased like that.” Nodding, she put the phone away, and smiled up at him. “I am a sensitive snowflake.”

“Uh huh.” Laughing, he set a hand on her head, and started working his fingers through her hair. Instant murrms of joy from the vampire. “So what now?”

“Well I don’t know about you, but I plan on getting laid before sunrise.”

He rolled his eyes. “I mean, with the hunters, and the covenants now that Julias is gone.”

She winced, and lowered her gaze to look at nothing. It wasn’t the nicest thing to talk about, but they hadn’t really, and it was about time they did.

“Jack’s dealt them a huge wound, killing three, maybe four more of them, and capturing their enforcer. Gives us the leeway — we hope — to get more aggressive. Everyone has kill orders if they see a hunter. Sweeps continue, more of them, more often.” Groaning, she sat up, thought better of it, and lay back down. “God I’m tired. This week has been brutal.”

“Heh, yeah.” The two of them had been doing their patrols together, and then he had to either work, or sleep then work. He wasn’t sure what she did for work, secret Invictus stuff probably, and she had to do that when she wasn’t patrolling. Right Hand of the Invictus and whatnot.

“Hey,” she said, looking up at him, eyes pensive. “Make sure you don’t ... you know...”

“Mm?”

“You’re getting dragged into this hunter beef, and ... and after what happened to Jack, I can’t stop thinking about Beatrice and shit. I hate it. Fuck I hate it.”

Oh, right. She was worried he’d die. Not worried about herself, but worried about him.

“I—”

“Like, your dad’s in the hospital, just like Jack’s mom was.”

“I’m not su—”

“Think those hunters won’t use that against you, if they find out? These ones are psychopaths. They’ll burn down a school if they think it’ll kill a vamp, I bet.”

“That’s a bit—”

“This fucking Angela woman, and Jeremiah, they aren’t playing by the rules.” She reached up and hooked a hand on his shoulder, while still lying on the couch and his lap. “They know your face, right? Four of them have seen your human face, and know you go to Bloodlust. No hunter with a brain would show up there, or come this deep into South Side, but these hunters don’t have brains! They’re insane, or at least their boss is.”

He stopped trying to say anything. Better to just smile down at her, and wait for her to get to wherever her train of thought was taking her.

“So ... be careful, you know? Really, really careful. Cause I’m getting attached to you, and I’m ... I’m sad enough, with Julias gone. If you died, I’d ... I’d...”

“Be sad.”

“Yes! Sad. I don’t like feeling sad. Fucking hate it.” She slipped off of him, stood up, and threw off her top. The thing ceased being clothes, and became a bundle of black straps tangled together as it flew through the air, and landed on his kitchen table. Kat chased after it, continuing its evolution from a pile of straps, into cat toy. “So, I ... I want you to make me feel safe, tonight.”

“Don’t transform, then?” He smiled, leaning back on his couch, and watching the ridiculously gorgeous woman stand there in a short skirt, thong, and nipple pasties. Like a skill, she’d gone from sad to horny in seconds.

“What? Fuck that, definitely transform. I want to disappear from the world for a while, beneath my boyfriend’s giant body. Just, hide away inside your shadow.”

He choked on a chuckle. “Sometimes I think you’re only dating me because I can get really big.”

She frowned at him. Uh oh. “Hey, fuck you. I’ll have you know that I happen to like you, you bitter asshole.”

That was unexpected. Unexpected because he was an idiot. She’d just compared them to Julias and Beatrice, and far as he knew, those two had been madly in love. A dangerous step for Jessy, thinking like that. A dangerous step for him, being intrigued by her, and the L word.

Memories of his ex-wife ran through his mind, and he pushed them away. Jessy was not Sheryl. Jessy was basically the antithesis to Sheryl, and that meant something. The last thing this woman was thinking, was a ploy to hook him into a relationship to take his money. That wasn't fair to Sheryl, but then, that's all their relationship had been towards the end.

He tilted his head to the side, and let out a gentle sigh as he smiled. "I like you too. A lot."

"A lot?"

"A lot lot."

She squirmed in place, a smile growing bigger and brighter on her face. "You just want me for my body." As she said it, she hooked her fingers into her skirt, and slid the tiny bit of black fabric off. Wearing nothing but a g-string, she posed for him, weight on one leg and hand on its hip. The fact he'd just said similar to her about her only wanting his body, seemed lost on her; or more likely, she was ignoring the hypocrisy like a playful kid.

"Not true. I'm also into you for the money."

"That's more understandable; I'm rich as fuck. But I'm not a moron. If we get married, we're signing a prenup." She slid out of the thong, revealing her smooth, pale skin, and her shaved sex. A moment later she was Blushing Life, and her skin darkened, becoming tan, and bringing some pink color to the lips between her thighs; the ones on her mouth had lipstick.

"Smart. Wish I'd have done that."

"Yeah well, when you're young and stupid and in love, it's impossible to think someone's only into you because you're rich." She grabbed his hand, pulled him off the couch, and started dragging him toward his bedroom. "And hey, I ain't blaming a girl for being attracted to money. It's such a turn on when a guy can buy a yacht."

"What if I bought one, kidnapped you, and held you captive it on you until you inevitably fell in love with me?"

"Fuck that is so stupid, and dumb, and hot."

They both laughed. He wasn't sure if she was kidding or being serious, but it was true that, given a few more years, he'd be able to buy a very small yacht, or at least a small boat of some kind. On the other hand, Jessy could probably afford a proper one right now, if what he knew about the Invictus, and older Kindred was true.

She jumped onto the bed, spread her legs as she turned to face him, and idly began to gently stroke her clitoris, one leg up on the bed. Licking her lips, she motioned to him with her other hand, and waved her fingers up a bit.

"Transform, and then prove to me you can be sweet, and gentle, and all protective and possessive and stuff."

"Thinking Caleb was right?" That couldn't have been true, if she was willing to do this again. He started taking off his suit, and watched her casually masturbate as he did. Her touch was slow, soft, only enough to start to warm her up. He'd have happily did it for her, but she seemed to have something else in mind.

"Mostly not, but maybe a little. Sometimes, you do get a little scary and weird and animal-like, when transformed." She shivered with the memory, massaging her clitoris faster as she smiled at him. "So, we can consider this training, to help you get better at controlling yourself, at not giving into that animal side. Though ... if you did, and you turned into some hungry animal, aching with a savage need to mate with me, mount and claim me, and fill me? Can't say that doesn't have its appeal either. A beastly, deadly protector, who will guard me and keep me safe, even as he rocks me until I'm bowlegged." Swooning, she started to fan her face with one hand, eyes rolling up with her silly fantasy, even as she continued to tease her clit with her other hand.

In retrospect, it wasn't a silly fantasy. When he did lose control of himself, he seemed to think of her as his mate, someone to protect, and dominate. The idea was very appealing.

He laughed as he slipped out of his pants and boxers, and tossed them aside. Watching the naked woman masturbate on his bed, legs spread and smooth slit on display, with an X in thick black tape still drawn across each nipple, was an invitation for him to pounce her and pound her into the mattress. He'd try and control himself, but she seemed determined to test his limits.

He stood at the edge of the bed, two feet from her, one of her legs dangling off its edge and nearly touching his. This close, he could smile down at her, feel his arousal grow into an erection, and draw her wandering eyes. This close, he could smell her own arousal, spurred by her Blush of Life. This close, he could see her lips part and her tongue lick a canine, as he began to transform.

Embracing the wolf inside him had become far easier than it used to be. Practice, and acceptance, he supposed. Whatever the reason, letting the creature, the Beast as the vampires put it, emerge from the depths of his core, had become a simple, smooth process, relatively speaking. It didn't hurt as much anymore, and he managed to keep a smile as he felt the mass overwhelm him, the muscles explode in size, the fur grow from his skin, and his mouth elongate.

The weight was the biggest difference. He felt heavy, and strong, and massive. He was heavy, strong, and massive. He could run through a wall, could tear through metal, bite through a block of hard wood, or shred the floor with his claws and mass. Power coursed into him, a mixture of flesh and blood and life, and something else, something that he didn't understand, but knew what it was. Spirit. Not the metaphorical kind, but the real kind, the sort on the other side of the Gauntlet.

It filled him with power, and hunger. Filled him with desire. A part of him wanted to rip and tear, break, shred, destroy, hunt and control his territory. But as his eyes looked down, down, way down at the tiny, naked creature on his bed, with her legs spread, another desire replaced the others.

“F-Fuck...” She stared up at him, eyes wide, as he leaned down over her and planted his claws against the bed sheets. “It’s ... it’s um, hard to know if ... if you’re still Eric, when you’re like this, you know?”

He breathed, deep, his chest rising and falling. As long as he breathed deep like Luna taught him, as long as he didn't let the rage in his chest build, he would remain calm. However, the power and desire it brought with it was amazing, and addicting; to Jessy's delight, from the way she was looking him up and down. And when he squatted down a little, so the heavy slab of pink flesh dangling from between his legs rested on her stomach, she groaned openly. It was massive compared to her small waist, and reached past her navel along her abs.

He wanted it inside her, now. Every part of him demanded it.

“W-Wait,” she said. “Let me, uh ... get some lube.”

He growled, low, deep, a rumbling purr in his chest that he could feel through his body and into his claws. She felt it too, and she licked her lips as she shivered. For all her desire, it was clear to see she was afraid; and she liked it.

He stepped back, and his cock fell off of her, heavy and just soft enough it could bend with gravity, but only just. Groaning openly, Jessy slid off the bed, and with quick steps, bounced off to the bathroom. She returned in seconds, and threw herself onto the bed, with a towel. Sitting on the towel, she dangled her legs off the bed, and wasted no time pouring a globe of the liquid onto her palm, before she began rubbing it between her thighs, further down than her slit.

As she did, he stepped in closer once again, burying her in his shadow. He licked his long teeth as he watched the vampire work the lubricant into her ass, while at the same time rubbing her sex and clitoris. An expert at pleasuring herself. Her moans grew, and as he crouched down over her, again planting his claws on the blankets around her, and setting his long shaft along her stomach and wrist, her moans became blatant panting.

As she masturbated, using her palm to rub her sex as her fingers massaged the lube into her ass, her other hand reached up, and slipped her fingers into his mouth. Into was the wrong word, more like, holding onto the jaw, and hooking her fingers between the giant canines along one side.

“You really are, like, fucking ... terrifying.” Her hand slid down his jaw, down his colossal chest, and down onto his abs. Everything had a coating of fur, thicker on his neck, arms, and legs, but thin enough on his chest and abs for the muscle definition to be blatant. She traced them, hypnotized, as she continued to masturbate.

He lowered his head closer, until his titan snout was only inches from her face. “You ... are ... beau ... tiful.” It was a struggle to say words, keep them controlled, and enunciating ‘beautiful’ was borderline impossible.

She stared at him, gulping. When he brought his head in closer again, so his enormous jaw was beside head, over her shoulder, and his large eye was next to hers, she gulped again. Being near her was enough to send her heart racing with its fake heartbeat.

He needed her. Now.

“I ... I am, yeah.” She turned her head to lean in toward his jaw, and she set a kiss on the upper half of his snout, beside his nose. Her head could fit into his mouth if he wanted it to, literally. She smiled at him, making eye contact as her other soaked hand raised from her ass, and slid onto the massive phallus resting on her stomach. Rubbing it, coating it in lubricant and sending tiny waves of bliss down its length, earned a pleased rumble from him, more deep bass filling him, and her.

“I want you,” he said, voice deep, guttural, but quiet, half whisper.

“Course you do.” She grinned at him, but she still shivered, even trembled. And as she squirmed underneath him, she squeezed on his cock, sending a spark of pleasure down its fat, pink flesh, and between his legs. A drop of his precum leaked from the tip, and fell onto her flat stomach, above her navel.

With a gleeful giggle, a very un-Jessy-like sound, she grabbed a pillow, lay back, and put the pillow under her ass. Even with his mind clouded with a mix of animalistic hungers, he knew this human sex position: missionary. Maybe he'd mount her later, pin her down underneath him, do what his body demanded. For now, he'd delight in this strange balance of control and desire, and indulge a more human approach.

He pulled his hips back, and as he crouched down over the tiny creature, he took his cock into one hand, and pressed it against the small, squeezing rose of her ass.

“Fuuuuck that thing is huge,” she said. “Haha, fuck, I sound like a stupid young girl who's watched too much porn, and thinks she knows how to talk to turn guys on.” Laughing, she reached down with both hands, and clutched her thighs from the inside pressing out, holding her legs apart while pressing her breasts together with her biceps. “Who am I kidding. I could talk about physics, and it'd turn a guy on when I'm in this position.”

He managed a chuckle, a breathy and heavy sound, as he licked his chops. The tiny female was practiced with anal sex, and knew how to relax the tight ring of flesh, to let him sink the first couple inches of his slab of pink meat into her. It was tight beyond imagining, and forcing the tip of his length into her, was euphoric. Moaning, she let go of her thighs, but kept her legs spread as far as they could, as she reached up, and pressed her hands against his chest. With him leaning over her, she was hidden underneath him, buried, and his head hung above hers by a couple feet. A small drop of drool fell onto her neck. He was a beast. There was no getting around a little drool.

It didn't bother Jessy. She just laughed, but he could see her eyes stare at his mouth, at the gargantuan snout filled with enormous teeth, and the tongue between them.

“Christ, you are a scary fucker.”

“I ... won't hurt ... you.”

“I—fuuuuuuuuck.” She pressed against his chest a little harder, to no avail, as he began to sink more of his cock into her. Her squeezing ring of lubricated flesh was heavenly, and he rumbled as more pleasure sparks danced along the swollen, sensitive pink skin of his cock. The thick girth stretched her ass apart, and while she tried to relax the muscle, she groaned, leaned her head back, and pressed her hands on his chest a little harder. He continued, sinking in another inch, and another. Slow, Eric, nice and slow. For now.

Eight inches in, her clenching ass found the bulbous shape of the knot of his cock. She groaned louder as she forced herself up onto her elbows, and stared down at her body, her spread ass, and the tiny distension his thick girth was causing along her abs.

“Slow! Holy crap, slow ... slowly,” she said.

“Too much?” he said. With most of him inside her, he let go of his cock, and set the hand down against the blanket beside her. He was free to lean over her more, and truly bury her underneath him so his chest was only a foot above her head, his head past her and now over the blankets instead.

“Fuck no. Just ... go slow, you know? Ready to burst, here.”

He felt it. Her insides were taugth around his girth, fighting him, and he rumbled bliss at the sparks of pleasure it sent down his length until it reached between his legs and heavy, hanging testicles. How Avery and her pack did not indulge this desire, he could not understand. They had enough control to do so, and the hunger for gratification coursing through him was more than for simple hunt and prey. In this form, he wanted to mount and dominate his mate, to the point it was almost overwhelming. The scent of her clenching, leaking slit, dripping juices down her folds and onto his cock where it penetrated the hole beneath, was intoxicating.

He set one hand around her waist, encircling nearly every inch in his colossal grip, while his other hand pressed to the blanket, bed struggling to handle his weight. He leaned in closer, head pointed down at her, and he licked her neck long and slow, as he eased his hips back a few inches, and pressed them back toward her. The thick base of his cock was most definitely not human anatomy, and an animal part of him demanded he force the knot of his thick member between her firm buttocks, past the lubricated, heavenly rings of flesh squeezing on him, and deep into her; but not yet. It'd be another few inches of length, but Jessy seemed to enjoy such deep penetration into her comparatively small body. And so did he.

As he found a gentle pace, each thrust causing the knot of him to reach her opening, but not push into her, causing her large ass to ripple around it, Jessy moaned openly. She pressed one hand down against her abs where each thrust created a small bump, marking how much he was stretching her taut insides and filling her lean waist. Her other hand reached between her thighs, and began to masturbate again, stroking her clitoris and smooth folds. Without a single hair on her legs or sex, his eyes were treated to the open display of trembling muscles and glistening skin, as Jessy groaned.

She slid the hand pressing on her abs upward, up to her chest, played with one of her lightly jiggling breasts for a few moments and the black X that marked it, before she set it behind her head. A makeshift pillow. Smiling up at him, she blew him a kiss, and started to rock her hips in rhythm with him.

“I figured, after how primal and aggressive you were with Caleb, you might let out some of that aggression on me.”

“You want ... faster?” he said.

“Nah. Like this, I can just lay here, enjoy myself, and let the heat build until it boils and I just cream everything.” She took a long, deep breath, purposefully showing off how it caused her heavy breasts to rise, and she began to scoop into her cunt with her masturbating hand. Curling fingers pressed up against various bits inside her, with far more expertise than Eric would ever have, he knew. She was much older than him, after all, and knew her body well.

He kept his thrusts slow, each pressing the knot of his shaft against her clenching, massaging ring of flesh without going past it, while her masturbating hand only grew faster. By the time she was ready to orgasm, she was fingering herself with fervor, almost slapping her fingers up against her insides, and causing her breasts to ripple against her chest. Her scooping fingers didn't slow, and she purred, even growled, as she began to tremble. A copious wave of her juices began to drip down over his cock, soaking his length where it spread her ass apart.

Rumbling, he set both hands onto her hips, and stood up.

“H-Hey!” she said, voice almost a squeak. While her shoulders and upper back remained on the bed, his heightened position caused her ass to raise two feet into the air, his hands keeping her ass snug to his cock. Her breasts hung toward her shoulders and neck, and her eyes opened wide, as he began to force her hips toward him. “Oh fuck.”

He almost laughed at her words. She enjoyed the ridiculous dialogue. He enjoyed how playful she was. But the laughter faded quickly, as he rumbled bliss at the sensation of her drenched ring of flesh squeezing on his cock in spurts, and he began to force the far thicker base of his length into the girl’s ass. With another groan, she managed to relax the clenching muscles, and her once masturbating hand now held onto his wrist, as she began to spread open.

“Fuuuuuuck.” She let out a long whimper, and bit her bottom lip as she stared up at him. The distension along her abs moved higher, and grew thicker, as the angle forced his cock toward her belly, pressing against her insides and sensitive parts. As she grew more comfortable, she hooked both hands behind her head, and relaxed into the bed and his grip, as he stretched her ass taut, until it began to slide over the sensitive flesh of his girth’s knot.

She squeaked as the final few inches of his cock eased into her, and her eyes closed as she melted into the blankets. He, on the other hand, looked down his body to see where her large, firm ass cheeks now pressed to his furry thighs, and the entirety of his cock was inside her. Her insides wrapped every inch of his cock in a tight sleeve of soaked, hot, squeezing flesh, and he struggled to not unleash his need to pound her into the mattress, as waves of bliss rippled down his fat girth.

He pulled away a little, and growled as the pleasure filled him, her squeezing rings of flesh preventing his escape. Her smooth slit, sitting above where he skewered her, clenched on itself, and several droplets of her juices leaked out to flow down onto their connection.

“Going to tear rip my insides open,” she said. He pulled his head back. The last thing he wanted was to hurt her, but she laughed, reached out a hand to pat his stomach where it sat above and between her thighs, and she wrapped her legs around his goliath waist as she put her hand behind her head again. “We used a bunch of lube for a reason. Just don’t pile drive me and I’ll be fine.”

He rumbled as he smiled, and he looked down at the subtle, larger distension along her tight waist under her defined abs; rumble turned into happy growl as he began to thrust back and forth again, and the distension moved with him. She enjoyed being filled to near bursting, a lot, and she mewled again as he pushed back into her, balls deep. The gripping ring of muscle wouldn’t let him leave her now, trapping him inside her, as he gently pumped her depths a couple inches.

It wasn’t long before he began to fill her with his cum. The rolling waves of hot pleasure filled him, rippling outward from his cock and from between his legs, as inner flexes of his muscles caused a hot gush of thick, white fluid to pour into the woman’s body. A small thrust, for another gush. And another, and another. He shivered with the pleasure of it, and gently lowered himself down as satisfied animal instinct let him relax. Lower, and lower, until her ass was on the pillow again. Lower, until he set both hands down against the blankets around his mate, and put his chest a half foot above her own. With his head next to hers, he licked her neck several times, rumbling bliss, and filling her and the bed with the crocodile-like vibrations. Still a few more thrusts, gentle, tender, each earning a few more spurts of his heavy cum, and earning some mewls from his mate.

Jessy reached out, hugged his neck, and kissed the side of his snout. She was shivering. Somewhere along the line, she’d cum again, a small orgasm mixed into his own, dripping her juices down from her slit onto her ass and his cock. And knowing that, set his body on fire.

He turned her over.

“Hey! Thought we were gonna cuddle?”

He laughed again, a heavy, animal sound. With one hand still holding her waist, he turned her over so she was facing down, and he pulled her off the bed, holding her chest in his other hand. He brought her down onto the floor, and got to his knees, all the while keeping his hard cock inside her cum-filled ass; warm, and lubricating, tingling along the swollen girth, and massaged into his skin by her taut depths.

“Doggy? Fucking animal.” She laughed at him, but she pressed her weight onto her palms, and arched her back downward, highlighting the curve of her body and extreme hourglass figure of her wide shoulders and hips compared to her slender waist.

With her on her knees on the floor, he had to spread his own to level with hers, massive and tall as he was. He pressed one hand to the floor beside her, still looming well above her, while his other wrapped the tiny waist she was showing off, and pulled her toward him.

“Fuuck ... fuuuuuuck.” Her clenching ass jiggled as it hit his lower abdomen, and his testicles were soon soaked as they gently slapped against her pussy. He stared down at her arching body, unable to look away from her ass, how the large mounds rippled when they lightly hit his pelvis, and how her ring of muscle clenched tight enough around the base of his cock to prevent the massive knot from leaving. Unless she relaxed her muscle, he was trapped inside her, and she showed no sign of relenting.

He pulled away from her, and he could see some of the pink flesh of his cock fight against the soaked, clenching ring of her ass. It quickly disappeared back into her insides, burying almost a foot of meat in her, and a thick dripping wave of his cum oozed out of her, soaking the connection. It flowed down her slit, thighs, and his testicles, coating it all in his own white cum. And when he thrust forward, her own juices joined the mix along his balls, less thick, clearer, almost washing his heavy, oozing cum away. It was a messy business, having sex in his form, filled with scents, fluids, and pleasure.

He started to pump faster. Still slow, but fast enough that he knew he'd eventually reach orgasm. It'd take a while, but he'd get there. And it was fast enough to earn some groans from the Gangrel beneath him. Each thrust slapped his balls to her slit, and each thrust made the tiny creature tremble. More of her juices coated his testicles, and more, earning a purr from him over the pleasing sensation from its warmth.

While one hand held her waist and hips, the other reached out for her chest, and he pulled her up to him.

“W ... what?” Gasping, groaning, she looked up at him as he pressed her shoulders to his chest, and wrapped his hand around her throat. His fingers were long enough to completely encircle her neck almost twice over, and thick enough that he could only fit two fingers between her jaw and shoulders. He growled down at her as she clutched his wrist with both her hands. Watching her heavy, X-marked breasts jiggle with his thrusts was invigorating, and seeing how his cock pressed against her abs, filling her to bursting, was intoxicating. She reached down with one hand to press against the bulge, the other still holding his wrist, as she gazed up at him, eyes wide as he gently squeezed her throat.

A few harder thrusts earned a few more squeaks, and she reached down to start caressing her folds with her fingers as he fucked her ass. Her eyes closed, and she started to shake as she came again. He didn't stop. Each thrust, gentle and slow, but deep, had her shaking, and he stared down to see drops of her cum land on the floor of his bedroom.

He gently set her back down, and she didn't bother catching her weight with her hands. She set her shoulders and cheek to the floor, and let her arms go limp, as he continued to fuck her. Lying down like she was, her ass was high in the air, her weight on her knees. A perfect position for him to admire how her large ass jiggled with each thrust, rippling as it gently hit his pelvis, before he leaned down over her, and set both hands onto the floor around her.

He fully mounted her, burying her underneath him, hiding the entirety of her beneath his size, as he started to fuck her a little faster. She managed to smile up at him, and even pressed herself up onto her hands again. So small compared to him, he had to spread his knees and lower his chest further, putting his weight onto his hands and elbows both, for her to be able to press her back to his chest. But she did, and she groaned up at him as she pressed her ass toward him, while rubbing her head into the fur of his neck and chest.

The two of them fell into a gentle, consistent rhythm. Each forward thrust was heaven, softly slapping his heavy, soaked testicles against her dripping slit and soaked thighs, before he eventually, slowly pulled back. Delicious friction of her soaked depths on his sensitive skin made each thrust spark pleasure down his length and into his core and thighs. Her clenching ass prevented anything more than the base inch of his cock from escaping, the knot staying snug inside her gripping flesh, but each thrust did let a little of his own cum drip out of her, down her slit, his testicles, and her thighs.

With time, and a few more soaked trembles from Jessy, his second orgasm arrived. Mounting his mate, he rumbled down at her, lowering his head and looking underneath her where the girl, on her hands and knees, was panting. Her jaw hung open, and her tongue almost dangled from her mouth, as she tried to look up at him.

“Fucking ... filling me up...” She shivered blatantly, arms struggling to keep her from collapsing, as she started to cum halfway through his own. As he flooded her depths, heavy, hot, thick cum gushing into her in larger amounts than before, a small thrust earned a deep groan from her. Her arms gave out again, and she lay her chest to the floor as she squirted, a small gush of her cum splashing against his testicles where they rested against her pussy. Another thrust earned the same, and the quiet squelch of very, very wet sex filled the air, as he fucked her. He continued looking underneath him, unable to break his ravenous eyes away from the sight of her spread ass, high in the air and pressed to his pelvis, jiggling and bouncing toward her lower back each time he thrust into her. Gentle slaps, again, and again, and again, as he pumped his cum into her, and enjoyed how each soft impact of his heavy balls against her cunt meant he could feel her slit’s heat, quivering, before a small squirt of her cum coated them again.

“Fu ... ck ... are you ... done yet?” Her words were lost between exhausted moans, and her attempts to get her weight onto her hands failed yet again.

But he wasn’t done. He reached down for her, and scooped her up, holding her waist in one hand, neck in the other. A little force to keep her pinned on his length, and he stood up, taking her with him.

“Eric! Jesus Christ dude. Can ... can you ... give a girl a break?”

He put her over the bed, and squatted down so her torso rested upon it chest down, her legs dangling off the mattress at the hip. Growling down at his mate, he slowly pulled out, earning some girlish squeals from her as her clenching muscles struggled to let go of the knot of his cock. But with a little force, he managed to pull it out, and Jessy’s legs quivered between his own, thighs shaking as the copious amount of cum he’d filled her with flowed back over his cock despite most of the thick, flesh-colored length still inside her.

He forced it back in, slowly, enjoying how his own cum flowed over his length as he sank the thick girth into her awaiting ass. His mate groaned loudly, legs kicking at the floor between his feet, as he eased the knot back into her taut muscles, and pressed forward until the large mounds of her butt were again pressed snug to his pelvis. With her torso lying on the bed, he spread his legs, squatted down low over her, and put his chest down against her back, pinning her into the blankets with his size.

She completely disappeared underneath him.

“W ... Wait ... Eric. I ... need ... a break...”

He ignored his mate’s desperate, quiet pleas, and began to thrust into her. The ring of muscles of her ass ensured the whole of his cock remained inside her, unable to escape, plugging her. If she wanted him to stop, her body disagreed, as her legs kicked at the floor and her squeals returned, higher pitched than he was used to hearing from her. He kept the pace consistent, hard enough to earn grunts from her, gentle enough to keep from hurting her. Each thrust filled her ass completely, his massive length reaching deep into her as the angle forced his cock toward her belly.

A third orgasm would take time to reach, but he wanted it. Demanded it. She was his mate to fuck as he pleased, and she could do nothing but lie there, head and torso pinned to the soft fabric of the human bed, as he took what was his. He thrust into her again, and purred pleasure as he felt her large ass ripple underneath him. He thrust again, and set his hands wide against the blankets, letting his weight simply press down upon her, his chest and stomach holding her down as he felt his testicles slap against her leaking pussy, where it hovered over the edge of the bed. She squirted harder, drenching them, and he sank himself to the hilt and stayed there for a moment to enjoy the gush of her warm juices over the sensitive orbs. She’d never squirted this much before, and the heat of her cum soaking him sent hungry fire through his core.

He could feel her hands press against the bed, desperate to escape him, but he did not relent. Slowly, continuously, he continued to fuck her, each thrust pressing the whole of his weight down on her and onto the softness beneath them. Another gush of her juices flowed over his testicles, and her thighs shook with her clenching muscles. Her squeals and moans quietened, and her arms gave up trying to push her weight anywhere. Her feet no longer kicked at the floor, and she let her legs spread as they went limp; all the better for him to let his testicles slap against her slit as he fucked her.

She came again. And again. And again. Her voice had become nothing but little, weak whimpers, and her body remained limp underneath him. While each orgasm that hit her caused her pussy to drench him, the volume of her squeals decreased as she succumbed to exhaustion. Her muscles continued to clench and spasm around his cock, but without the same enthusiasm of before. She was spent, exhausted. If she'd been human, she wouldn't have been able to cum half as often, or squirt half as much, but his mate was a vampire creature, a beast with far more sexual endurance than any human. There was no need to stop any time soon.

Eventually, maybe ten minutes later, he rumbled a quiet announcement, and filled his chest with the vibrations of his pleased purr as he came again. Her insides were filled with his seed, and her body had long stopped struggling. She'd long gone limp, lying there, pinned under his chest and weight, managing only the occasional squeak as he filled her with another wave of his seed, and another. Keeping her balls deep upon his cock, he worked his thrusts a little harder, enough to feel her large ass bounce against his pelvis, and feel her exhausted muscles clench. Taut insides massaged his length, milking him of his seed, until he knew he'd filled her.

He brought himself up onto his palms again before he knelt upright, and he wrapped a hand around her waist to begin easing himself off of her. She wasn't clenching on his girth anymore, and he was beginning to grow soft. Once he managed to slip the sensitive skin of his cock past her wet ring of muscle, cum flowed out of her, initial gush landing on the floor with a large splash, before the rest oozed down her thighs, thick and white.

He breathed deep, and let the oxygen, and the satisfied sexual need, calm his nerves, until he felt the beast within him settle down. And with it, his transformation faded away.

“You ... you alright?” he said, as he soon as he felt he had lips again.

She lay there, unmoving for several moments, before she started to shiver. With a shaking arm and a trembling hand, Jessy managed to make a fist, before sticking up a thumb.

---

---

~~Jack~~

~Dear diary.~

Jack groaned, and stared at the screen of his laptop. “Dear diary is all I got? Christ, this is harder than I thought.” Minutes crawled by like hours, and he blinked several times as he felt his eyes strain, staring at the words. It passed in moments. Things like a simple muscle strain healed instantly, in his vampire body. Hell, he doubted they happened at all, and it was just his mind making him think he’d strained his eyes.

Those were the sort of thoughts he had often, a couple years ago, when he was just a fresh fledgling. Understanding his new body, his new instincts, trying to wrap his mind around the fact he didn’t have a pulse anymore, all that stuff. Life, or rather, his second life, had been simple back then in comparison to now. Now, he was trying to understand ancient curses, complicated politics of old beasts and monsters, and the thoughts of psychopaths.

Susanna hated the machinations of vampires. When she wanted something, she took it.

Jack froze, and looked left and right in a panic. No one else in the apartment with him. So, just him, going crazy.

You're not going crazy and you know it.

“Don't speak to me.”

You're trying to write down your inner thoughts. You're practically asking for me to speak up.

“You're a curse, a ... thing, from those shadow owls. When we figure out how, we'll seal you back up, and this will end.”

Good luck with that. The Sanctified have forgotten much in the centuries since Susanna's Beast was sealed.

“I won't let you do to Dolareido what Susanna did.” Might as well use her name, since the curse apparently knew it.

Susanna reveled in destruction, Jack, but it was always guided. She didn't mindlessly slaughter villages. She did it mindfully. She killed thousands, and in her mind, they deserved it.

“Did they?”

A complicated question. Susanna had a difficult life, and she blamed many. Most probably didn't deserve to die horrible deaths, but that didn't change that their apathy to her misery left her a cold, broken woman.

Groaning, Jack walked into the kitchen and got himself a glass of blood. “I don't understand. You're a magical curse thing, or whatever. How do you remember things like a name from a completely different person?”

Vague, floating things, memories. The best I can manage is some names, maybe some motivations, times, places. I don't know how I know them, but I know them.

“Naturally.” Rolling his eyes, he stood at his window, laptop behind him on the kitchen counter, and he stared out over the vast city. From here, he could see apartments, most with lights on, and lit from outside as well by the many lit signs. So many people just going about their lives, oblivious to shit like vampires, werewolves, monsters, and whatever else was out there.

You could, too.

“Revel in destruction? No thanks. Not interested.”

Don't be so sure. You think all those pent up feelings, all that rage, that desire to get revenge, think that's all me? I'm not a person, Jack. No soul here. I'm just a tool, giving power, and a voice.

“So ... the desire to skull fuck Angela's corpse?”

A part of you wants to do that. Something deep down inside you, underneath your Humanity, underneath your memories and personality and psyche, underneath your consciousness. A part of you, tiny and lost, wants to swim in her blood.

Ugh, a philosopher. Why did this curse have to be a philosopher?

“I can't deny that. I'm a living creature ... sort of.” He took a sip, and set his free hand against the glass. It left smudges that'd turn to dust soon, but he didn't care anymore. “But I think it's the Beast that really wants to indulge. And you're making it ... bigger. Its cravings, its desires, its nature, you're making it fight to override me.”

I can't deny that. I'm a curse.

Snarky mother fucker.

I'm you. You're snarky.

“Stop reading my mind!”

I'm in your mind. I am you. What don't you get about that? I'm a voice, a tool, a piece grafted onto you and the vampire part of you that you repress. Stop repressing. Let me out. I'll find Angela, and Jeremiah, and kill every hunter we come across.

“I—”

Knock knock.

Oh thank god. If this kept going, he was going to snap and break something. He walked up to his door, and peeked through the peephole. Oh god no, Beatrice.

He opened the door, and met the woman's gaze. Her snake eyes were always a little startling at first, and then the enormous crocodile teeth where her cheeks were, were a lot more startling, but always noticed second. This time, it was the emotion he noticed first, the weight, the sadness, the ruination.

He stepped back, giving her room, and put a few feet between them in case she lunged for him. “Beatrice, hey.”

“Jack.” She didn't hold his gaze for long. After a few uncomfortable seconds, she came in, and sat down on one of his couches. “How you doing?”

How was he doing? Ugh, the question was so forced, he almost wanted to yell at her for it.

“Pretty horrible. You?” He sat down across from her, glass table between them. Hopefully the glass table would survive this encounter; it didn't always.

“Pretty horrible. How's your mother?”

“She's ... she's good. Went hunting tonight, with the Prince.” Grinding his teeth, he looked to the window. Easier to look at the city than look at Triss. “She's still struggling with becoming a vampire, and Mary's death. I don't talk about Julias with her.”

Beatrice flinched with the name. “Why not?”

“Because she'd shatter. Mom is ... strong, in some ways. Not so strong in others. She'd happily suffer decades of pain if it meant helping others, especially me or ... Mary. But knowing that ... that someone died for her? It's eating at her, badly, and I don't think she realizes it.”

“Simple-minded woman?”

“Very.” And there was power, in that simple mindedness. His mom would become something great, he was sure, if she could get past the pit of spikes she currently dangled over. “If you see her ... try and, and um ... be gentle with her, please?”

Her gaze looked to the window as well. Eye contact was going to be a difficult thing from now on, and he didn't look forward to learning if it'd ever be possible again. Fallout from deaths broke a lot of people up. Kid dies, the parents often split. Friend dies, friends thereof often stop hanging out. His sire's death was going to be a wall between him and her for the rest of their existence, and they were immortal. Their existence was going to be a damn long time. Assuming they didn't end up like Julias.

You won't end up like Julias, Jack. You think I'll let us die? Once we find those hunters, I'll spread their entrails on every power line and every rooftop. No need to stop there. The mysterious threat that wrinkly old monster warned us about? We can find it, and—

Shut up shut up. Not now.

“Yeah, of course, I’ll be gentle with her.” The Nos trembled slightly, struggling to not let her sorrow show. She was failing. “But I’m not here to talk about that. Not here to talk about Julias, or any of that shit.”

He raised a brow, but sighed and nodded as realization dawned on him. “You heard about the curse.”

“Yeap. Rumors spread fast in Dolareido.”

Shit. He’d kind of hoped he’d have more time to figure this out, before this conversation had to happen. Too late.

“Alright,” he said. “What do you want to know?”

“Young vamps are saying you’ve been cursed; which I guess you just confirmed.”

“Yeah.”

“They say you summoned an army of crows to the hospital, something only an elder vamp can do.”

“ ... yeah.” On a good night, maybe.

“And, considering what you did at the prison, something is definitely going on with you.” Still she kept her eyes on the window, voice steady, despite the fidgeting, trembling fingers. It was taking a lot out of her, to be here. She looked weak, drained, distracted, and broken. What sort of things had she been doing in the dark, since Julias died? Mourning for sure, but what else?

He almost suggested an exchange of questions and answers. That’d be cruel, though, and Beatrice had never done anything to make him think he couldn’t trust her. Jacob, sure, but not her.

“I’ll tell you what I can.” He got up, and fetched another glass from the fridge. A new bottle, too. They were going to need it. “For a while now, I’ve known there was something wrong with me.”

“What? Wrong?”

“At first, I thought I was just a natural, talented, better than average Kindred for my age, you know? That whole situation with Tony, and Viktor, and then Lucas and Damien. But...” Groaning, he sat down slowly, as if he weighed a thousand pounds and had a bad back. “When Angela captured me, tortured me, something snapped. I let out all this ... aggression, the sort you’d expect a slasher horror movie villain to have, you know? I wanted to kill them, the hunters, Angela, Jeremiah, kill them and dance on their fucking corpses.” Beatrice looked away from the window, back to him, and her eyes were wide. It was the reaction he was expecting, and one he wasn’t looking forward to seeing on more faces, as this topic inevitably came up again in the future. “And I found ... I could. I tapped into something massive, overwhelming, and it ... it made it so easy, to do ... Kindred things.”

“Kindred things?”

“Dominate, Animalism, Resilience, Vigor, it was overpowering how easy it was to just ... unleash them. I summoned hundreds of rats like it was nothing, Dominated hunters like it was nothing, suffered gunshot wounds and walked them off, and ... it was a slaughter.” He poured her some of the cooled blood, and slid her the glass. She took it, but her hands were still a little shaky; not because of Julias anymore, but because of him.

“It gets worse,” he said. “After that, I started feeling ... rage.”

“Rage is normal, Jack, considering—”

“No, I mean, not normal rage, not anger. It was twisted, fucked up, aggression and rage that wasn’t ... it wasn’t right. It was cruel, and filled with malice. It kept ... getting into my thoughts, and ... and ... demanding I give into it.”

She sat up straight, sipped the drink, and stared at him. “So you are cursed.”

“When Julias died, saving me, saving Mom, it snapped something inside me, a hundred times worse than when Angela tortured me. I was ... inside my mind, I guess. White, endless white, and—”

“And you saw something in there, something shadowy, like a black fog. It had claws and teeth and shit inside it, right?”

His jaw dropped, and he leaned in closer. “You’ve been there?”

“A couple times, when learning Crúac rituals.” She downed the glass, and poured herself another. Another similarity between her and Jessy, and it managed to make him smile. “According to Jacob, it happens when you really get in touch with your Beast, sort of ... remove consciousness from the equation. Just you, and the thing that’s been added to you by the embrace.”

“Fucking hell. How did you achieve that? Like, meditation and shit?”

“I fucking wish. No, we have to get tortured, feel pain, zen out by letting pain wash away all thoughts. So, I mean, I guess it’s like meditation, but you go into it with a purpose, to learn something.” She pat her stomach, wincing. “Jacob has ripped into me in ways that’d kill a kine a dozen times over. He teaches me the ritual, then shows me how to ... communicate, I guess, with some sort of ... energy? I don’t know. It’s something the Beast can manipulate, or speak to, I guess? The ritual let’s me tap into whatever it is that makes us Kindred, whatever it is that makes us ... monsters.”

“Monsters...” The information about Crúac was invaluable, and he doubted Jacob would appreciate her sharing it. But she was. She trusted him. And he trusted her.

“It’s easy to forget that sometimes, isn’t it?” she said. “We see these Begotten creatures, and it’s like ‘hey, I know you, from that monster story by Stephen King’ or some such. But we’re just like them, I guess, except...” The sadness dripped off of her, and she didn’t try to hide it anymore. “Julias disliked them, said they were driven by their hungers to a ... yeah, to the point of being a movie monster, the sickening kind.”

“If Julias, or the others saw what we’ve seen—”

“They’d know that we’re just as fucking twisted and revolting on the inside.” She buried her face in her hands, before she started rubbing her shoulders. “So, your Beast, your monster, was in there?”

“Yeah. It showed me the past, too.”

“How the fuck did it do that?”

“No idea. Guess it was like a genetic memory, since it never showed me anything that happened after someone in my bloodline embraced someone. It showed me things from Viktor’s past, but only up till he embraced Julias.” Saying his name over and over was important. They had to get it out of the way, had to accept his death and use his name in conversation. They had to move on, and they had to strategize, make plans, deal with the hunters. Saying his name a lot was inevitable. But god damn it, it hurt every time. “It showed me Viktor’s sire, and her sire, too.”

“Fuck, I can barely remember what I did in my visions. It’s all dreamy, faded, blurry.”

“It’s blurry for me too, but I guess because of this curse, it’s a bit closer to the surface.” He leaned back and stared up at the cold ceiling. “My Beast had chains wrapped around it, tied to it, with heavy blocks and shit holding it down.”

“Mine ... did not. The fuck?”

“It was the curse, being bound by a seal or something.”

She frowned. “A seal? Like...”

“Like a ritual, like magic. A member of the Lancea et Sanctum performed it on my great great grandsire.” Digging up the memory was easier than he’d like.

I’m making it easier for you. It’s a glorious history of violence, carnage, and indulgence.

Shut up shut up.

“Jack?”

“Sorry, stuck in a thought.” He took another sip, trying to pass off the internal conflict. “My great great grandsire, she ... killed another vampire, someone who looked an awful lot like her. Drained her until she turned into ash.”

“Diablerie? Holy shit.”

“And then she ... I mean, I guess it was a sacrifice to ... my bosses called it the Strix?” he said. She raised an eyebrow, confused, and he held up his hands, mirroring her confusion. “Shadowy owl things. That’s all I know, and that seems to be all that they know. Either way, it was the medieval ages, long fucking time ago. But whatever she did, whatever the sacrifice was meant to do, the Strix imbued her with ... with the curse, this thing that’s ... that’s...”

“That wants to rip off Angela’s head.”

“I wish that’s all it wanted to do with her head.” Sighing, he nodded as he met her eyes again. “It’s strong, and it’s violent.”

“Well that’s good, because that’s why I’m here.”

He snarled, earning a blink from her as he stood up, and walked into the kitchen. “You want my help, killing Angela.”

“Yes.” She stood up as well, leaving the glasses and bottle behind as she sat at his counter top. “It’s not like you weren’t going to.”

“I ... I was...” He snapped his head to the side a couple times.

Just point me in their direction, and I’ll paint the streets with their blood.

The twitch put the conversation on a harsh pause, and Triss eyed him closely until he spoke again. “I have to be careful, Triss. This curse thing is real, and it’s ... it’s angry, and hungry.”

“So, what? You’re going to push it on a leash? Take a backseat until the hunters are dead?”

“No!” He slammed both palms on the counter. The Nos didn’t blink, or flinch. She’d expected the outburst. “No, I’m not going to sit back. I need to be careful, but I won’t ... won’t let Angela or Jeremiah get away with this, Triss.”

“Good. Then, when I come to you, I want you to come with me.”

“What?”

“When I come,” she said slower, “I want you to come with me.” Her claws found his hands, and he felt the trembling still working through them. “I’m going to find where these hunters are, Jack, no matter what it takes. When I do, I’m not going to play by whatever rules the covenants have in place. Fuck the Masquerade. Fuck the covenants. We go in, guns blazing. They won't expect a frontal assault like that."

She was right about that. The hunters undoubtedly expected the vampires to be slow, cautious, and calculating. Vampires didn't rush in head first. Vampires didn't stick their necks out when they didn't have to. Hell, what Jack and Julias had done at the hospital, a slow and calculated approach, was fast and reckless by Kindred standards.

"And no rules will stop you?"

"None. If I have to blow up a building, I will."

"And how are you going to find them? With Black Blood's help?"

"I..." She jerked her hands away, wincing as her eyes fell. "I'll do what I have to do."

"Think Julias would want you to—"

"Don't!" Her turn to slam her palms against the counter. "Don't fucking ... don't do that. Julias is dead, and nothing else matters."

Nothing else matters. He smiled as his eyes fell, and he motioned for her to calm down as he set his elbows to the counter.

"Good song."

She blinked at him a few times, but a second later, she laughed, and nodded, leaning down on the counter as well so only a few inches separated their faces. "It is."

"I'll help you, Triss."

"You will?"

“Yeah, I will. Show up, tell me it’s time, and I’ll follow.” God help me. “We have to be careful, Triss. I don’t know what you’re doing with Black Blood, Jacob, or that crazy Crúac shit, but it ... it could all backfire. This curse could do things I don’t want it to do. And you sound like you’re joining the dark side, you know?”

Nodding, she squeezed his hands, and the trembling started to fade. “I don’t plan to sacrifice my soul, Jack. I’m not stupid. Like ... like you were going to say, Julias wouldn’t want that. But I’m not going to sit by when I could do something.”

“If the elders can’t do something, what makes you think we can?”

“They can do something!” She threw up her hands, hopped off the stool, and started pacing around. “I bet Jacob or the Prince or your bosses, or even Garry, could kick their asses in a straight fight.”

“You know that isn’t how it works. If Garry stuck his head out, got himself killed or captured, you know the Invictus would take advantage. And vice versa.”

“Garry wouldn’t—”

“Yes, he would, Triss. If Maria and Michael were killed, Garry would be knocking on Invictus doors within the week. He moved on Terra Den for a reason.”

“You think any of them could get killed or caught?”

“After the shit I saw at the hospital, magical barriers and whatnot? Yes, I do. And Damien told us what they did in the tunnels, capturing him and Matt, with a different kind of circle trap thing. If Matt hadn’t been there, they’d have all been dead.”

They both grumbled. This was the problem with their situation. Elder vampires were strong enough that they could take the hunters in a fight, but even the smallest mistake meant death. As strong as they were, elders had a nasty habit of being particularly weak to fire and sunlight.

“Antoinette came to the hospital, didn’t she?” Triss said, sitting back down as she calmed down.

“Yes, she did. I don’t think she was thinking straight, at the time.”

“Probably not, if you were in danger. If ... if I had known...” Her eyes fell to the counter again, and she gulped as she shook her head. “No, no, I won’t do this. I won’t cry. I won’t—”

“I’m in, Triss. I’m in. And I think I know some other people who will help us.”

Nodding, she raised her head, and forced herself to stop trembling again. “You do? We could piss some people off, our bosses included, doing this, Jack. I mean it.”

He grinned, and sat down beside her at the counter. “I don’t think they’ll mind pissing off our bosses. Tell me how I can help, finding the hunters.

“It ... it could mean sacrificing kine, Jack. I’ll keep it to scum, but —”

“Sounds fine to me.” Shrugging, and ignoring her shocked expression, he glanced at his laptop, and stepped over to it. “Gimme a sec.”

~Dear diary, my best friend died a week ago. Friend isn’t the right word for him. Julias was a second father, and a mentor. Angela killed him. I’m going to kill her, no matter what it takes. The end.~

He closed the laptop, and smiled.

~~Antoinette~~

She was not looking forward to this call.

It was not a question of disliking the caller. All things considered, she was very much looking forward to speaking with Elaine. It was the inevitable topics the conversation would summon that would infuriate her, that she wished to avoid.

With a sigh, she sat upon her throne in her primary meeting room, high within her Elysium Tower, and ran the program upon her laptop. It took much convincing that such a program could be utilized, but only once she had confirmed that the program used every secure measure in existence, did her fellow dragons consider using digital communication. Many of them would have preferred they send mail. Mail, parchment, paper! She rolled her eyes, and waited as the program created a secure connection to Elaine's own computer.

Many elders in the order were old fashioned, despite the goals of Ordo Dracul. While few were as old as her, those in the upper echelons of her order with centuries to their name were simply unwilling to adapt to technology. Antoinette was a black sheep, in that regard. Technology was the future, and if the old fools did not come to terms with that reality, they would be left behind. What would they do in a hundred years, when metal carriages, no longer drawn by horses, pierced the sky? No Kindred had yet to visit space, and none of them knew what would happen in such a circumstance.

At least her order were not as trapped by their old expectations as the Circle of the Crone. If Jacob had his way, technology would be cast aside, and kine and Kindred alike would be living in the woods once more. Metal, concrete, electricity, all would be lost, traded for vine rope, cottages built with wood and mud brick, and scattered villages instead of massive cities. Kine would crouch around fires, worshipping spirits, some real, some not, while Kindred like Jacob preyed upon them, used them in his rituals, and summoned spirits from across the Gauntlet in his mad pursuits.

She sighed, tapping her finger on her desk as she waited for the program to secure the connection. The Ordo Dracul was dedicated to uncovering the secrets of existence, but also to the understanding of change. The fact many of her peers, convinced they studied the world and its changing state of existence, were in fact, unwilling to accept technological advancements, was a point of contention within her covenant. Frustrating.

“Once you cease learning, death is inevitable,” she said with a sigh. Her peers preached of understanding change, but how many of them could see that, within the next two hundred years, space travel would be a very real possibility? Technological advancement grew both in power, and its speed of growth. To say that, in twenty years, the entire world and its Kindred would suddenly be illuminated under a hunting light of technological advancement, was a very real possibility as well. Could they not—

Beep. “Ann, thinking?”

Antoinette looked to the laptop screen, and smiled at the familiar image. “Always.”

Elaine laughed, shaking her head as she leaned in toward her own screen. “Do not think yourself into an early death.”

“If I do not think, who will? Forever I am forced to break molds, and redefine the world for its own betterment, against its own wishes.”

“The other Kogaions think you are mad, if you did not realize. Traditions exist for a reason.”

Antoinette rolled her eyes. “They preach of the pursuit of knowledge, and understanding change, but they treat technology as if it were a fad. Fools.”

Her old friend shrugged, and leaned in closer, so her own computer’s camera focused on her face. For all the Beast’s natural ability to avoid the lens of a camera, it could not avoid it if the vampire leaned in for a closeup.

Elaine was a beautiful woman. Pale skin not unlike Antoinette’s, and tall, with flowing long blonde hair. Thin, busty, beautiful, Elaine would have made a perfect Daeva, one who could use her looks to enslave men and women with but a glance. Unfortunately, she was Ventrue. Were she Daeva, Antoinette would likely have included her in far more of her games, when she was younger. Perhaps she would have included her in whatever experiment it was that Antoinette had performed to give herself her hair and eye color, and her proportions. And perhaps, unlike Antoinette, Elaine would have been intelligent enough to journal the experiment.

“How fairs your city, Sworn of the Dying Light, Architect of Carnal Void, Voivode of Dolareido?”

Antoinette rolled her eyes. Dragon titles were a touch absurd, but she could not deny she valued them; she had earned them, after all. Her order thought it unusual for a Kogaion such as her to pursue her goals not only without the support of other Kindred save for her sheriff, but also in such a peculiar position. She was an oddity, in many respects.

“I am surrounded by imbeciles, old friend. Every night, I argue and push for understanding, cooperation, and awareness. Every night, I struggle to teach these fools that, only through critical thinking, and a pursuit of truth, will we survive the flood of change soon to drown us all.” Sighing, she shook her head as she pulled her hair over her shoulder, onto her chest, and began to comb it with her fingers. “They are far too obsessed with their own squabbles, their own troubles, and their own desires, to face toward the inevitable danger.”

“Give it time, Ann. You’ve made great progress. Most cities with a Kogaion such as yourself still struggle with battles between covenants. The peace you’ve created remains, does it not?”

“It does, if only barely.” She got up, pushed her chair aside so Elaine could see, and she stepped over to her window to gaze out over her city. “Decades upon decades building trust, Elaine. Decades! And still these infants seek reasons to fight each other. Hunters have crawled their way into the cracks of my city, and if I could trust the others, I would organize a full scale search involving each covenant.” The idea sounded wonderful, and practical. In reality, it was naive. “Garry Tones and his infuriating ruffians will jump on the opportunity to attack the Invictus if they overextend their efforts, and Turio and MacDonald will gladly cut off Garry’s head if he sticks it out too far.”

“You could reenact the Purge.”

Antoinette threw Elaine a cold stare, but it lasted for only a moment before she sighed and shook her head. “No. Perhaps if Honors were still alive, I might deem it necessary, and recruit the Carthians to my aid once more. But he is dead.”

Elaine flinched at the mention of Viktor Honors. “I’m sorry, about Tony I mean. I heard he died with Viktor.”

Antoinette and Elaine occasionally went years without speaking to each other, but when they spoke with each other again, it were as if they had spoken only days before. Such was the way with Kindred of their age; kine as well, she supposed.

“I am freed by his death, and he deserved a worse fate.” Nodding, she moved her eyes over the city that sat before her. Hotels, casinos, and buildings of similar entertainment sat a little further away from her tower than buildings of business. They were still close enough that traces of their light cut through her window, and she managed a small smile as their light filled her eyes. It truly was a beautiful city that she had grown, nurtured, molded, and she would be damned before she let hunters, or power hungry Kindred destroy it.

“News of a giant swarm of crows circulates,” Elaine said.

“Yes, that is a problem, a grand one that is half my focus of late.” Should she tell her old friend, an Architect of Terror, about Jack? Surely Elaine’s vast knowledge could help him. She was a powerful dragon, wise, with a bloodied history she had cut her teeth upon, grew from, and overcame. Antoinette trusted Elaine with all but her life, and that was far more than most Kindred were willing to trust others. “The Masquerade has been damaged by something no one could have foreseen.”

“Oh?”

“A ... a curse, has befallen one of the Kindred here. A relic of the ancient past has resurfaced, and has emerged to explosive effect. It has poisoned, contaminated my ... my lover.”

“Your lover?” Elaine leaned in close to her camera, eyes wide with curiosity. Sadness drifted across her, once she walked back through Antoinette’s words in her mind. “Your lover is cursed.”

“He is. But it is under his control ... perhaps.”

“Tell me about him.”

Antoinette laughed, and shrugged. “My city struggles and you wish to talk romance?”

“Naturally.”

The Prince rolled her eyes once more, but her smile only grew. “He is a small man, and quite young. About twenty, when he was embraced, and embraced only two years ago.” Embraced by one of the best men in her city, a dead man. She pushed through the sorrow, and did not let it damage her budding warmth as she thought of Jack.

“That is young, but not unheard of.”

“Jack Terry is his name, and while he may be young physically, he possesses critical thinking, awareness, a hunger for truth, and the soul of a cynical old man.” She laughed, out loud at that, and looked back to her city to let its lights dance across her eyes. “He is sincere, genuine to a fault, and I cannot help myself when I am near him.”

“Typical Daeva.”

“Oui, I cannot deny that. When I near him, I want to hold him, pin him down, bury him, and pamper him. And he bathes in my loving touch, content to let me guide his actions under our sheets.”

Elaine swooned. “I can only imagine what you’re doing to this poor boy. Is he timid?”

“He can be surprisingly aggressive, in matters of the city or his covenant. Come romance, he was once terribly timid, and frightened. But I helped him grow past his shyness, and now I have acquired someone who loves me for who I am.” Put like that, it sounded wonderfully drôle, and cliché. But that was what it was, that her relationship with Jack was delightful and fulfilling, because he enjoyed the way she did things, much as she did with him. Attempting to convey such a deep feeling through words seemed a wholly impossible affair, and she sighed wistfully as she smiled at Elaine over her shoulder.

“I am saddened to hear this curse affects him, then. I ... I had assumed, considering the degree of the incident, that he’d be older.”

“It is the curse. A seal once contained it, and across sires, through the years, it weakened. We can only assume that the death of his sire triggered its destruction.”

“Seal?”

“Yes. My love believes a Sanctified, many centuries ago, sealed the curse away with Theban sorcery. Time, it seems, destroys everything.” Hundreds of years, and spreading across Kindred like a disease. Did Viktor have other childer she did not know of? It was possible. He had come to Dolareido when entering his elder years, and had undoubtedly spent decades before creating empires; or destroying them.

“I am doubly troubled to hear your love’s sire is dead, then.”

“Viktor’s childe was a wonderful man. Of all the Kindred in my city, I felt he understood my goals better than anyone else; except for maybe his childe. Julias Mire died saving my lover’s mother, who is now my childe.”

Elaine’s jaw dropped halfway through Antoinette’s words, and almost hit her desk upon mention of a new childe. “That is a lot to take in, Ann.”

Yes, it was a lot to take in. But there was something else in Elaine’s eyes, a hint of curiosity, of surprise. Something Antoinette had said had surprised Elaine, something more than mention of a new childe, and the woman was not going to say what. At least, not yet. Such was Elaine’s way, sitting on questions to ask them later.

“It has been a busy time, these couple of years.”

“Ok, the hunters and things can wait. You have a new childe?”

“Yes. A small, sweet woman, in her mid forties. She is resilient, and yet soft-hearted. I am intrigued by her, how she remains delicate, and yet has the strength to endure the trials of her past.”

“Trials?”

“Her husband died a decade ago, and her son disappeared two years ago, vanishing from his old life when he became Kindred. And hunters killed her daughter less than two weeks ago.” Nodding toward the city, Antoinette growled and grit her teeth. “Two of the hunters are psychotic, passionate, and vicious. They kill innocents in their pursuits.”

“That ... is unusual.” A creaking noise drew Antoinette’s eyes. Elaine had leaned back in her chair, in much the same way Antoinette did when pondering. “Your childe is a spirited woman, then.”

“Spirited, and naive. I am delighted by her, and terrified for her. I will need to harden her shell, if she is to survive the city. And now that her son has become a vessel for a raging curse, wishing to unleash its malice upon all it deems worthy of its disdain, I do not know what will become of her.”

“You’re in a terribly complicated situation.”

“Indeed.”

“And only you and your delicious sheriff fight to keep the utopia of Dolareido from collapsing?”

Antoinette chuckled and gestured to the window. “Daniel is still single, if you are interested.” With a long sigh, she began to pace, moving from end to end of the massive window as she looked down, arms folded across her chest. “The problem grows worse, Elaine. Azamel has returned. The hunters I spoke of, came in pursuit of her.”

“It sounds like the solution is simple then. Expel Azamel.”

“I would, but not only is the old monster capable of great destruction, I would be doing nothing but foisting problems we all face onto her shoulders alone. These hunters need to be stopped.” Laughing, Antoinette buried her face in one hand. “My troubles do not stop there. Werewolves have come, Avery specifically.”

“Oh no. Simon—”

“Apparently Simon is dead, or at least Avery is no longer in his pack. She has created her own, and they have come to deal with invading spirits.”

“It does sound like you are buried in a maelstrom of troubles.” Elaine tapped her own desk several times, thinking. Antoinette stopped pacing to watch her, and found the woman twirling the end of her hair with a finger, as she always did when trapped in thought. “I wish to visit.”

“Oh? The city has become a turbulent place, Elaine. I cannot promise your safety.”

“The great Antoinette, White-Haired Demon of our order, holding a city alone, cannot promise my safety?”

The teasing was pleasant, and it reminded Antoinette of Natasha’s barb at Bloodlust. Playful and innocent, but with a hint of truth that Antoinette was forced to consider.

“It is true, that my situation is problematic. And—”

“I’m your friend, Ann. Besides, we can catch up on your experiments. I’d love to see how far you’ve come in crossing the Gauntlet. And…” The blonde woman sighed as she leaned back in closer to her camera. “And I wish to speak more of Viktor.”

Antoinette raised a brow, and returned to sit upon her grand chair at her desk. “He is dead, Elaine, destroyed by fire along with my childe Tony. His childe is also dead, and I am lovers with his grandchilde. There is little else to say of him.” Strange for Elaine to be concerned with Viktor. In the past, she showed little interest in him. As far as Antoinette had noticed, her old friend and the brutal Viktor Honors avoided each other whenever they crossed paths.

“Consider it an intellectual curiosity.”

“You will have trouble studying the remains of a dead vampire, Elaine.”

“Perhaps. But as you say, his grandchilde lives, and is your lover.”

Antoinette frowned. That did not sound like an innocent request, despite Elaine’s innocent smile. “Help is welcome, but my lover is not to be experimented on, Architect of Terror.” Her old friend’s willingness to dig deep into matters of the Beast was well known, and was a driving force of their friendship. But, Elaine had also crossed lines in her younger years, to Antoinette’s knowledge. So had she, and the pursuit of forbidden knowledge and lost secrets had been a binding goal between the two of them.

They had both done things they regretted. But that was then, events from centuries before, now only blurry memories and vague descriptions written in tomes, locked away within the libraries of her order.

“I will not experiment on him, Ann. Don’t worry. But I can’t deny this curse is of interest.”

Of greater interest than her friend was letting on, it appeared. A twinkle in her eye, a small lick of her lips, Elaine let the intrigue show, knowing full well Antoinette would see.

“What game are you playing, Elaine?”

“I will be in Dolareido within a month, Ann. Perhaps we can have one of your famous balls, in celebration?”

Antoinette could not help but grin as she rolled her eyes once more. Her old friend was playing with her, teasing her, drawing her in, like a kitten and string.

Naturally, she had to give chase.

Part 7

Chapter 95

~~Jack~~

It'd been two weeks since the incident. Two weeks since the news broadcasted Jack's fuck up with the crows. Two weeks since Julias's death, his mother's embrace, and the capture of Sándor. Two weeks of futile attempts to understand what had happened to him.

He'd stuck with journaling, organizing his thoughts and putting them to words, but it wasn't working out very well. All he could manage to write were succinct paragraphs that were obviously bitter, cynical, and angry. Sometimes he wasn't sure they were his thoughts; considering his borderline multiple personality disorder at the moment, it was reasonable that maybe they weren't. But this was important. If he died, someone was going to be reading these, and knowledge of the curse could save someone's life, or maybe fuel the evolution of a covenant, or ritual, or anything. If leaving behind a few words now and then could help others, or his future self, it was worth doing.

When he got back to his apartment later, he'd give it another shot. He couldn't write down anything that specifically called out vampires or the like, unless he was willing to write it down on paper, in a real journal, so it could be locked away in a vault for safekeeping. Maybe that was the problem? Maybe he was going about this all wrong, using a computer and typing his thoughts, when he could be using a pen? There definitely was something more real about ink and paper.

Heh, maybe he could start using a quill?

It'd been almost a week since Beatrice had come to him, asking for his help. What that help implied, he didn't know yet. He also had no idea how she'd find the hunters; assuming that was her plan, to find them and then ask for his help in killing them. It probably involved Crúac, and some nasty deeds he was happier not knowing the details of yet. Better that he didn't know more, until he needed to.

He looked at Antoinette across the table, and sighed. The noise buried in the pulsing music of Bloodlust, but she noticed it anyway. When her eyes found his, she looked away.

It'd been two weeks since they had sex, as well. It wasn't that he needed sex, at least not constantly, but it was a good indicator that something was wrong, considering Antoinette's sex drive. They had sex almost every night, normally, and it'd been like that since they'd started dating. Before he came along, Antoinette had sex with Ashley and Julee, near every night he assumed. Before them, she had other ghouls. Long before, she had Tony. Before Tony, and probably with Tony, she had orgies with dozens of kine, and probably other vampires here or there. Her history was filled with sexual exploration and delight.

If she didn't want to have sex, it was a flag something was wrong, and it was obvious what that was. Him. The curse.

But the curse didn't seem to care about Antoinette or sex. It wasn't going to do anything to sabotage his relationship, according to what it said. So far it'd been true to its words, or rather, true to its instinct. It wanted to destroy its enemies, control its territory, and feast upon the sheep, all in wanton excess. Love, romance, intimacy, the Beast didn't care for any of that.

Convincing Antoinette of that wasn't going to be so easy. She saw him at the hospital, saw him when he'd changed, and that was going to be a horrible memory for her, haunting her and every interaction they had from here on out. He'd have to fix that. It's what he did, fix things. Supposedly. He wasn't so sure anymore.

“Jessy isn’t here tonight,” his mom said. She was avoiding his eyes too, but for a different reason. The dress she was wearing was worthy of a Dolareido club scene: slutty as hell.

His mom was an attractive woman, no doubt about it, but she didn’t have any of Antoinette’s confidence or flair. Sitting there in a black dress — black was always a safe choice — with her hands on her legs, and shoulders slouching, she looked terribly attractive, but meek. Antoinette had made sure his mom’s brown hair was done, curly and wavy and bouncy, and that she was wearing more make up than she usually did. Black mascara and eyeliner, more than Jack had ever seen her wear, made her eyes pop as it contrasted the pale skin of a vampire. Green eyes, like his, almost glowed when the white light pulsed.

“No, she is not,” Antoinette said. “I am afraid you will have to hunt for prey yourself, this night.”

“Aww.” Pouting, his mom put her hands on the table, and forced herself to look out at the other booths.

Jack smiled as he watched her. He knew all the feelings she felt, the lack of confidence, the uncertainty, and the animal hunger that demanded she overcome those weaknesses. For all the problems the Beast caused, it was a powerful companion that helped Kindred get over the limitations of their kine lives. In a couple years, Jack had developed the mental fortitude of a veteran navy seal; or at least, he suspected. He didn’t want to put that to the test, but there was no denying he could put himself through hell and come out swinging. He’d done it twice now.

And, much as he was struggling with his own Beast, he was happy his mother’s was forcing her to act. It meant she couldn’t brood about Mary all the time. Like it or not, she had to get out and feed, and when a vampire was hungry, they grew bold.

“Mom, don’t hold back cause I’m here.” Jack shrugged as he leaned forward, and smiled at her. “You’re Daeva. Some things are going to come naturally to you, and you should run with them.”

“But ... but in Tw—”

“Less Twilight, more Dracula.”

“Which one?”

He laughed. “You know the one. Gary Oldman. Remember the scene with Drac and Lucy, having sex outside?” She gasped. “Or Harker and Dracula’s three wives?” More gasps. “It’s a part of who you are, now. I won’t judge, and no other vamp will either.”

“That movie didn’t end well for Dracula,” she said.

“True, and it’s a good warning to be careful. Don’t get involved with your prey, unless you’re willing to make a ghoul or thrall, and you won’t be doing that any time soon,” he said. Antoinette nodded, and gestured over her shoulder. Ashley and Julee weren’t there this time, but they often were, and Jack nodded toward his love before looking back at his mom. “All you should do, is find a mark, convince them to lower their guard, and drink. It went well with Jessy’s ghouls, didn’t it?”

“They um ... they...”

“My childe enjoyed their blood immensely,” the Prince said as she leaned forward, mirroring Jack’s sneaky posture. “Their blood and their touch.”

Jack almost winced. Much as he was trying to convince his mom to embrace her vampire nature, she was still his mom. No one likes imagining their mom in the middle of sex; or at least, most don’t.

“Jack, I swear I—”

“Mom, seriously, what about me not judging are you not getting?” Classic Mom. His words just bounced off her, and convincing her of anything would be borderline impossible. It’d always been that way. She liked to say she was too old to learn new tricks, but mid-forties wasn’t that old. It wasn’t old at all to anyone who took care of their health. And she was just a baby in vampire years.

“I ... I guess I’m just—”

“No, you’re not too old to learn a new trick.” Jesus, how quickly the two of them fell into old, predictable patterns. “You’re a brand new Kindred. Throw away everything you used to know, and embrace what we’re telling you. We’ve said it, what, twenty times now? And we’re saying it again, because it’s true. Do what you want, give in, and enjoy your new Kindred body and desires.” He leaned back and smiled, his old cocky smile he used with her when he knew he was correct in an argument. “It’s one of the best things about this new life. Go on, let loose.”

“Letting loose means ordering in some pizza and watching my Friends DVDs.”

He choked on a laugh. Yes, watching a comedy she’d seen a bunch of times, oblivious to the poor resolution, with some pizza, and maybe some soda, was her definition of giving into her more base, carnal desires. She had a lot of work to readjust her expectations.

“Well, you can still enjoy pizza, if you Blush Life and eat some. You’ll be vomiting it up later though, whether you want to or not.”

“Bleh.”

“Yeah. But now you can come to a place like this, and—”

“You like this place? You?” she said, smirking at him. She knew him well, though it wouldn’t take a genius to know he wouldn’t like night clubs and lounges.

“I like the company.” With a grin, he nodded to his lover again. “And, much as I don’t like this sort of atmosphere to hang out, it feels ... feels natural, doesn’t it? The shadows, the crowd, the heat and sweat and blood of prey. If you listen to your instincts Mom, you can walk into that crowd downstairs, dancing and grinding, and you’d know exactly what to do. Exactly who to look at with fluttering eyelashes. Exactly how to move your body to manipulate kine into doing whatever you wanted, wherever you wanted. You’d know exactly how to get them alone, with their guard down, so you can feed.”

And it was true. As his instincts grew, and as he grew more comfortable listening to them, the impulses, desires, and skills of the shadow Beast hiding inside him and all Kindred, it became obvious how to use them. To be a predator, to stalk, hunt, surround, trap, it felt natural. A young woman out of her element in a place like this would be easy to guide into a corner, make her feel trapped, helpless, and a smoldering gaze would have her melting, scared but intrigued. Or a man, drunk and horny, drawn into said dark corner by the helpless woman, who was actually the vampire, hunting with the proven techniques of the angler fish. Not that male and female Kindred always fell into those two roles, but there was no denying they were tried and true approaches.

Hunting would come natural to his mom, too, once she got used to it. And, unfortunately for her, the best way to get used to it, was to experience it.

“I’d know exactly what to do?”

“Indeed,” Antoinette said. “But, as your sire, I will guide you in that general direction, and present the circumstance from which you can learn without threat.”

“Threat?”

The Prince nodded. “Many Kindred are forced to learn in far less controlled circumstances. In other cities, you might find yourself hunting city streets, while gang wars between infantile kine raged around you. Or, in quieter towns, a witch of the Circle might cast you into the woods, and demand you survive on the blood of animals, while forced to build your own shelter against the sun. You would be given no instruction, no aid, and would only be allowed to return after a week.”

Holy shit. Witches did that? Jack knew Jacob would probably do some hardcore shit with a new childe, but he hadn’t expected something like that; assuming she was talking about Jacob.

“That ... um ... I d-don’t think I’d be able to survive that.”

“Few would,” Antoinette said. “Though, such practices are from a time when kine hunted with bow and axe. In the modern day, I suspect a Kindred who wished to put their new childe through a hazing of deadly proportions, would throw them into the sewers, and hunt them with a pistol.”

Samantha’s eyes went wide. “That’s horrible!”

The Prince nodded as her eyes drifted around, looking at nearby booths and the kine they held. “I agree, my childe. Be glad this is my city, and I do not respect barbarism. There will be time to teach you in forms of self defense, rather than hope you can summon such skills in moments of random despair. And until such a time that your life could be in danger, I will not ask you to learn such skills; at least not so quickly. No, I will protect you and guard you, keep you safe, and let you learn the most essential skills of the Kindred first: how to hunt.”

Jack’s mom looked at Antoinette, and so did Jack. This was a side of the Prince he hadn’t expected to see. It was true that Antoinette could be motherly, especially when she wanted to pamper and tease Jack, but this role of teacher, guardian, and nurturer, wasn’t a look he'd ever seen on her. Maybe Tash got to see it, but it was a new look for Jack. Antoinette was looking around like a mother hen, checking for threats and scoping for potential targets for Samantha, and she was doing it in such a subtle way, his mom hadn't noticed it before. She was noticing it now.

The relationship between those two was something Jack didn't think he'd ever be able to fully understand. His mom was a teddy bear, capable of soft love and nothing else. Growing up, the most she'd ever managed to do as a form of punishment, was a hard slap on the back of Jack's hand, followed by a whole ten seconds of yelling. Antoinette on the other hand, was capable of some extreme ruthlessness, to a degree he doubted his mom had yet to even realize, let alone considered the implications of. How did the two of them talk when he wasn't around? What did they talk about? If his mom was an animal, she'd be a panda, and Antoinette would be a tiger; or a dragon. Tigers would hunt pandas if given the chance, while this one was trying to raise a panda cub.

It was adorable, and strange, and wonderful.

"Mom, listen." He rubbed his head a few times before leaning in even closer. "Just go downstairs, sit at a booth or the bar, and wait. And while you wait, flaunt a little." Do everything in your power to ignore the fact that this is your mom, Jack. She's not your mom tonight. She's a Kindred who needs to hunt but doesn't have the confidence. "Flaunt, and if you see someone looking at you, go sit with them. Smile, flirt, be yourself, you know? Just like you were with Jessy's ghouls."

"I ... I didn't really feel like myself with those boys." Squirming and wriggling, Samantha looked down, occasionally glancing her sire's way to see if she had anything to say, or maybe would disagree with Jack. He knew Antoinette wouldn't. He'd learned this from her. "I was being so forward!"

“That’s your Daeva side showing through, and your Kindred confidence. They’re prey, you’re the predator, and you knew it, the moment you sat with them, right?” He ducked his head down a bit so he could get a better look at her down-turned eyes. “Antoinette told me. And Jessy told me, too. You had fun with them, getting all touchy with them when feeding.”

His mom squirmed all the more. “We didn’t ... I mean, I didn’t ... you know...”

Jack rolled his eyes. Getting through to her was going to be tough. To let go, just go with the flow, just let instinct and hunger pilot for a little while, was not something his mom could do; not easily, at least. Jack had never really noticed it when he was younger. And he stopped looking at his family much at all, when his dad died. But now, it was so obvious, it made him want to slap himself for not knowing. His mom had all the classic signs of a young woman with no self confidence, and the typical inward-driven neurotic, negative views of herself. She was the sort of woman who’d stand in front of a mirror, pinch her belly fat, frown because she didn’t fit the idealistic body image view she held, and then eat a box of cookies while watching romcoms.

She had managed to stop eating the cookies, in an effort to get herself back on the market though. There was will there, determination, and if she could bring it to the surface and mix it with her new Kindred instincts, she’d be able to find a little slice of happiness for herself.

“Look at me, Mom. I look good, don’t I?” He sat up straight and gestured to himself, his casual suit, his subtle but solid smile. The Julius smile.

“Of course, dear. You look handsome.”

Oh god. It took some serious effort to not laugh at the classic mom appraisal.

“No, I mean I look good. Confident. Well kept. Fit. Financially secure. I look like someone a woman — or man — would want to talk to.” He tapped a finger on the table, then pointed it at her. “And so do you. You look like a woman, a confident, thin, sexy woman who has her life in order. You look like someone guys will want to talk to.”

That hit home. His mom had probably wanted to rebuild her life, and had framed a lot of her romantic goals around that. That life was gone, but that didn't mean he couldn't frame her new life in the same terms, at least a little. She wasn't a broken widow with nothing going for her. She was a sexy, confident woman who had everything going for her.

Antoinette chuckled as she watched. This was a lesson for her too, on how to deal with his mother. Not that the Prince needed the lesson, but Jack could see she was delighted to see what sort of words worked best on Samantha.

“People will want to talk to me. People ... will want to talk to me.” Nodding, gulping, she pushed down her apprehension, and pushed herself up from the booth. “So I go downstairs, and—”

“Take in your surroundings,” Antoinette said, “look for prey that interests you, and catch their eye. It will be easy.” The Prince touched a lip, exposing a fang as she smiled. “And with a touch of Majesty, my childe, all of this will be rendered simple and effortless, but for the effort to use a Kindred discipline.”

“Um, I don't know if ... if I can use that, like we talked about.”

Antoinette shrugged, and nodded toward the stairs. “You are welcome to not use it. But I do expect to see you at least attempt to Kiss someone tonight, my childe.” This time, the Prince put a little ice in her words, and Jack winced.

Samantha squeaked, and walked down the stairs.

Jack laughed, sat up, and looked at his lover. She met his gaze, and they smiled for a time, before their eyes drifted away. And when they did, icy pain filled his guts. This had to end. He wasn't going to let the relationship die because of this curse.

Nothing else in his life was going to die anymore. Nothing.

---

“Ok, I thought that'd be more awkward. That was actually fun, and funny,” he said as they stepped into the vault bedroom.

“Oui, vraiment. I think my new childe will prove to be a delightful, fun creature, once she moves past her grieving, as she has begun.”

His mom had managed to find someone to Kiss. It hadn't taken her long at all, actually, and when Jack and Antoinette went down to check on her progress, they'd found her trying to help the man she'd put into a temporary coma. A good thing she remembered to lick the wound clean, because she hadn't remembered what gravity did to someone when they went comatose. The poor guy had nearly fallen out of the booth, and she'd had to struggle to keep him from doing so.

The look on her face, of joy from a successful hunt, and panic from having to keep a body from literally falling out onto the floor, had been hilarious.

Laughing with her usual, quiet, sultry little chuckles, Antoinette walked to her side closet, where a hidden palace of clothes awaited her. Jack didn't really bother with a closet; unless he spilled something on his suit, he had no need to change. A trip back to his apartment every few days was perfectly fine for clothes-changing, for a vampire.

But, he did like to watch her prepare for bed. For the past two weeks, he hadn't watched, he'd simply gone to bed, lay down, and waited for dawn, when daily torpor would bring them under. They talked a little, sure, but heavy conversations were handled during the night, and come time for sleep, they simply let sleep come.

They'd arrived at her tower with an hour before dawn though, and that meant Antoinette was likely to read a book while waiting for sunrise. She'd disrobe, put on a nightgown, and lie in bed next to him. Like an old married couple, complete with the lack of sex. Fifteen nights now, including the one where he'd been staked, they hadn't touched each other. To go two nights in a row without sex was unusual for them, let alone fifteen.

He hated this. He was feeling depressed about Mary, and especially about Julias, but that wasn't the whole reason. She was feeling uneasy about the curse, and much as he tried to deny it, so was he.

Sighing, he put his shoulder to the frame of the door to her closet room, and watched her slip off her shoes, still in her dress.

“Do you trust me?”

She stood up straight, now barefoot, and looked up with a slightly raised eyebrow. As she met his gaze, her eyebrow lowered, and her eyes grew heavy with realization.

“I ... I find it difficult to ignore, little Ventrue, that you are not entirely you, anymore.”

“You're telling me.” He tilted his head so it rested against the door opening as well. Door wasn't really the right word, considering it was a hole carved into the fancy black marble. “I can feel it lurking. I mean, every Kindred's Beast lurks, right? And Begotten have their nightmare horror thing, and Uratha have their ... wolfish spirit thing, I guess. But this curse, it's different.”

Antoinette nodded, and turned her back to him as she reached up to slip off the neck of her dress up over her head, to let it fall forward from her.

He came up behind her, and set his hands on her hips, hands stopping her dress from falling down her legs. She must have heard him coming, but she still shivered a little when his fingers found her, and not the good kind of shivers.

“This thing inside me, it’s ... it’s not trying to take me over, or trick me, or trick you. It’s deep down, and under control. You ... you don’t have to worry. It’s not going to attack you, or the city.” It’d attack the hunters, or maybe get a little overzealous in abusing its power, but it didn’t seem to have any desire to harm Kindred.

“It is not me or my city I worry for, my love. It is you. This entity affects you.”

“It ... yeah, it does. But it’s different now. It’s ... its own thing, its own entity. The rage I felt before, the weird, disturbing thoughts, I can feel them, but they’re not mine.” He leaned forward, and pressed his forehead against her naked back, right underneath her neck. So tall. “I’m ... I’m still me.”

She nodded. Standing there, unmoving, she set her hands on his where they sat on her hips, and she caressed his knuckles lightly.

“I am sorry, my love, for keeping you at a distance. That night, where another person’s eyes looked back at me through yours, was ... painful. For a brief moment, I felt as Beatrice does now.”

He flinched. Ouch.

“It’s not going to change me, or take me over, or anything like that. The worst that’ll happen is it makes an appearance when it’s time to fight the hunters. Otherwise, it’s just me.”

“ ... Promise?”

“Promise.” You hear that, monster? You’re just a passenger in this car.

The monster said nothing. He knew it could hear him, his thoughts, but it seemed content to lurk, its desires and urges dormant. And Jack was thankful. Not so much thankful that his Beast seemed to have obtained sentience, or fake it somehow, but thankful that, in the end, all the horrible thoughts he’d been having before weren’t entirely his. It wasn’t him that was going mad with bloodlust and wanton rage every time he thought of Angela, it was the curse creeping around inside him.

Well, maybe some of it was him. Who wouldn’t get overwhelming, royally pissed at the sight of someone who’d basically become their mortal enemy? That, he could accept was him. The desire to rip off her head and dance in the blood squirting from her neck? Thank god, thank fucking god, that wasn’t him.

And he was eager to show his lover that it wasn’t.

“Do you trust me?” he said.

“Of course, mon chéri.”

He smiled, and lifted his head up a bit so he could kiss between her shoulder blades. Instant reaction. She shivered, and this time it was the good kind. Much as Antoinette liked to act like the suave, seductive succubus, she craved sex as much as any young man did; or older woman, heh.

“Want to prove it for me?” He stepped away, hands slipping out from under hers, and off her hips.

She turned around, and exposing her devilish smile, as she stood before him. She was wearing only a thong, a black thong, and it hugged her wide hips hard enough he could see the light pinch it made in her soft skin. Leaning on one leg and hip, she looked him up and down, smile showing through all the more once she met his eyes. It was tough pulling his eyes away from that thong for a moment so he could meet her gaze in return, but it was worth it.

She knew his eyes, and he knew hers. Intimacy, familiarity, comfortable and divine at the same time. The fact she visibly relaxed when looking into his eyes also undid a knot in his stomach that'd been tightening for days. She believed him.

“Very well, my little Ventrue. What would you have of me?”

A devil smile of his own sneaked onto his face, despite his attempts to hide it. He was so bad at poker.

“Sit on the bed with me, and let me do whatever I want to you.”

“Ah, this game. We have played it before, have we not?” She walked past him toward the bed, and as she did, she Blushed Life. So well timed, it sent a fire into him in seconds, and he groaned as he Blushed Life as well. “I submit to your will, oh mighty, regal Ventrue.”

There's nothing in the world like watching a woman walk away; or in this case, walk away and toward the enormous bed in the back center of the room. She knew how to emphasize each step, making her large, shapely ass sway. And the black thong, worn to match the revealing dress she no longer wore, looked perfect against her alabaster skin. As she walked, she raised her hands, elbows up, and ran her fingers back through her hair, showing off her figure. Her breasts were more than large enough that he could see the sides of them from behind, overwhelming her chest and lightly jiggling with her catwalk.

It took a lot of willpower to not sprint after her. Forcing himself to walk, he stared after her, drinking in the sight of large, shapely things, rippling with gravity and her exaggerated, fashion model runway walk. Once she reached the bed, she climbed up and crawled along the black silk sheets, prowling, arching her back down so her breasts swayed underneath her with each forward motion. Once she reached the center of the massive bed, she rolled onto her hip and sat there, legs out to her side, one hand to the sheets to keep her torso up straight, other hand resting on her legs.

He slid out of his suit, and threw his clothes onto the floor, literally. No way he was going to hang them up like she usually insisted; she did hate wrinkles. But he had to have her, now.

“Most unbecoming a Ventrue of the Invictus.”

“Sorry.” But not sorry. He climbed up onto the bed after her, and knelt in front of her, eyes looking her up and down. Fifteen days of no sex might as well have been an eternity. “Sit against some pillows for me?”

Smiling all the more, she grabbed some of the many, large pillows, and set them atop each other, against the headboard. Once done, it'd made a slope of pillows, and she was free to lean back against it, sitting comfortably on her butt, her legs out in front of her on the bed. It made it easy for him to crawl over her legs, reach down for her hips, and begin the hypnotizing journey of sliding the tiny piece of black fabric down her milky skin. She leaned side to side, helping him get the fabric past her large buttocks, and then raised her legs a bit so he could finish the job.

“You said you trust me, right?”

“Oui, mon amour.”

“Alright. Get comfortable for me. Lean back, relax, spread your legs, and play with your nipples.” His words earned a raised brow, but a smile a moment later as she did as he said.

With a relaxed sigh, she snuggled back into the pillows holding her naked body half sitting up. Slowly, she opened her legs, alabaster skin spreading to reveal the pink of her labia, the mound of her mons, and its complete smoothness. As she exposed herself, she set both her hands on her flat stomach, one higher and placed up onto her breasts, so she could begin circling one of her large, pink nipples with her fingertips. It swelled, slowly, but Jack was more than willing to wait a minute or two simply watching her touch herself.

As the busty goddess fell into a hypnotizing rhythm, her pussy clenched a few times; he was kneeling between her thighs, and could see it in close detail between her lips. He scooted his ass and legs back, lay on his stomach, and got up between her thighs. A kiss for the left one. A kiss for the right one. He offered a few suckles, sliding his lips down closer and closer to her sex, as he enjoyed the way her smooth inner thighs felt against his lips and nose. And, taking his sweet time to actually reach her awaiting lips, meant she was getting more and more turned on as she masturbated with her nipples.

This long without sex? Last thing he was going to do was rush it.

Once his kisses tickled along her vulva, only grazing along her lips, she moaned. A quiet, little thing, but her noises were always quiet and controlled. Earning one was a big deal, an indication of her arousal, and a kiss on her pussy proved it. Wet.

He slowly encased the whole of her pussy in his maw, burying it, covering it with his lips and making sure to encompass the top of it deep into his mouth. Like this, it was easy to bury her clitoris with his tongue, and provide it slow, long, massaging licks, without ever having to stop kissing her body.

Antoinette let out a long, pleased sigh, and reached down with her free hand to tease his buzzed hair. "Jack, if you were concerned I did not trust your lips to remember what I like, then you are silly indeed.”

He grinned up at her. “No. I was worried that you ... might not trust me when you’re so vulnerable.”

Before the weight of his words had a chance to damage the sexual heat, he set his lips back onto her body, and resumed massaging her clit, a little harder now. He offered a small groan onto her flesh, causing her to shudder a little, and for her heavy breasts to ripple against her chest.

She closed her eyes, melted into the pillows, and continued to play with herself, fingertips teasing and rubbing her puffy areola, with both hands this time. That’s what he wanted, to see if she’d close her eyes, give into the moment completely, and not let worries get in the way of sex. Fear of damaged intimacy melted away, and he grew a little more forceful, burying her clit with his tongue as he could feel her pussy’s juices begin to leak out of her.

He suckled on the small nub, and pulled a quiet purr from his lover, as one of his hands began to press at her entrance. Fingers slipped between her smooth lips, caressing along them and finding her juices mixing with his saliva, before he pushed a finger against her clenching slit. Her wet, pink flesh spread around the digit, squeezing in spurts as he sank in a knuckle, and another, palm turned upward so he could curl the finger toward him, and toward her belly.

Pressing against her g-spot, while he suckled in and bathed her clitoris with his tongue, was one of Antoinette’s favorite ways to cum. Knowing what pleased her, knowing how to set her body on fire, was a wonderful form of intimacy. Knowing, that when he sank in his second finger, and started probing up against her g-spot in a fucking rhythm as he kissed her clit, she wouldn’t take long to cum, was delightful.

He watched her with hungry eyes, drank in the sight of her teasing and masturbating with her enormous breasts, and smiled against her clit as her breathing quickened, causing her breasts to rise and fall blatantly. It only grew more enchanting when her depths started to clench and squeeze, and he had to fight against her to keep fingering her. She hadn't cum yet, but she would soon. It was the signal to start fingering her faster, and begin pumping his fingers upward harder, while burying her clitoris with his mouth.

She closed her eyes, let her head sink back onto her pillows, and wrapped her hands around the undersides of each breast to keep them snug to her ribs, as she started to orgasm. Her voice disappeared, and her body arched, jutting out her breasts — that still rippled despite her attempts to keep them contained — while her insides squeezed. Muscles clenched like a vise, and juices leaked onto his palm as he forced his fingers up against her g-spot harder.

He lifted his head, and watched her cum. She didn't like having her clit touched when cumming, but her insides were fair game. He continued to pump his hand up and down, hard but not too hard, a decent rhythm that made her body ripple and her pussy leak a few more drops of her hot juices. Only after a few more moments of fingering her through her orgasm, prolonging it, did he stop, keeping his fingers inside her to enjoy the aftershocks, and how each spurred random spasms of her warm, tight insides.

“That was delicious, my love,” she said. Letting go of her breasts, she raised her head, and looked down the valley of her body.

He grinned at her from between her legs, and set his lips back onto her clitoris. Instant clenches, and a surprised gasp. He kept the touch light, and only for a second, knowing she'd be sensitive, but he did keep it there, keeping her on edge. Her eyes widened a little, and she raised her eyebrows as she looked at him and the grin he wasn't able to remove.

He sank his two fingers deeper into her, deeper, into the final knuckle and then some. He pressed them up toward her belly, up against her deepspot, and started pushing.

“Jack, I—”

He pressed harder, and her voice cut off as she clenched. She liked this spot, a lot, a spot way in the back of her depths that he could hit if he curled his fingers up toward her stomach. She'd taught him well, but normally she didn't sit back and let him do things to her. This was a rare opportunity, and he wasn't going to waste it.

He eased his fingers out of her, earning a quiet groan, before he forced in three.

“Jack!” she said, blinking down at him. Another kiss on her clit turned her surprise into a small mewl, and she fell back onto her throne of pillows as he fought to sink in the three fingers against her clenching muscles. Her insides really were like a vise, and he had to fight to get the three of them in to the final knuckles so only his thumb and pinky finger weren't inside her.

After few more gentle kisses on her swollen clitoris, he started pressing up against her insides with the three fingers, stretching her pussy upward in the sweet spot she'd taught him. The result was powerful, and almost painful, with how tight she clenched on his fingers and hand. Once the shock of it had passed, she managed a smile at him despite her trembling, and she hugged her breasts to her body, crossing at the wrist so her hands could tease her swollen nipples of the opposite breast.

He started to pump faster, making her thighs shake around him, and her large ass jiggle against the bed near him. He started to lick her clitoris harder too, never quite going as hard as before, but instead using his tongue to gently massage, while his fingers got rougher, and rougher.

A few minutes later, and his lover was cumming again, and harder. She clamped down, and both her hands grabbed the sheets around her as her body arched, causing her breasts to jiggle and sway against her torso like water as she quivered. Going deadly silent, her eyes closed, and her pussy began to squeeze in random spurts again as pleasure worked up and down her legs; he could see them tremble, and a glance back showed her toes curling.

Before she started to calm from the obvious bliss coursing through her, he crawled in closer between her legs while sitting up without removing his fingers, and putting his knees between her thighs. Now sitting between her legs, he had a much easier time seeing the busty goddess quivering with his fingering, and he gazed at her breasts and how they flowed back and forth along her ribs, dipping to her sides and bouncing about. Hypnotizing.

It only grew more hypnotic when he set his free hand against her lower abdomen, pressed the palm down toward the fingers inside her, and started to finger her again. Hard, like a piston.

“Jack you ... d ... devil...” She managed a short look to him before her head pressed back against her pillows, and her eyes closed.

As her insides squeezed unendingly, fighting to get him to stop, her body arched all the more, pressing her hips toward him as he fingered her hard enough to make her ass bounce against the sheets. Her hands squeezed on the blankets, and her head turned to bury half her face in the pillows as she came again, hips rising to try and match the speed of his fingering. The hand pinning her kept her down, and let him drive his fingers up against her depths with each upward slap of his hand.

The sounds, already a carnal mixture of wet flesh, became utterly salacious as Antoinette started to squirt. A small gush of her fluids splashed over his palm, quickly sent outward in all directions by his pumping hand. The small splashes hit his wrist, arm, his stomach, and both their thighs. Antoinette's cum, coating him, instead of him coating her like usual.

God, that was hot.

He started pumping her harder, and immediately another gush of her cum landed over his palm. And then another. He grinned down at the sight of her tight slit spread taut around three of his fingers, alabaster skin smooth, and pink lips opened wide around his hand. It was all soaked. And he wanted more.

“J ... Jack ... nng!”

He knew she wanted to say something; probably to ask him to stop. Losing control during sex wasn't her usual bag. But she had lost control, and she was cumming so hard she was drenching him. Her body was on fire, and as long as he continued assaulting her, she could do little but cum again as her increased sensitivity left her defenseless. She might be angry—well, not angry, but she'd undoubtedly get revenge on him later for being so rough with her. Until then, he was going to indulge.

He stopped fingering her for a moment, only to start up again when it looked like her orgasm was calming down. Her legs spread, her insides clenched, and her juices flowed out onto his palm as she squirmed, eyes still closed and head against her pillows. Her breasts swayed freely, flowing around and around her chest in circles. Her hips tried to push toward him again, or away from him, and he didn't let her, keeping his other hand pressed hard down against her pelvis. It was too good, to hold and trap the great dragon, the deadly elder Antoinette, in the middle of a forced orgasm. A long, long, very long orgasm.

Only when her hands let go of the sheets around her, going limp, did he stop finger fucking her hard enough to make the bed shake. He eased up, and eventually stopped altogether, smiling down at the sight of her body as it shivered in orgasm, and the way her control had shattered. Her legs continued to quiver, and her torso relaxed with exhaustion against the pillows. She was spent.

He, on the other hand, was dying for release. With a small, animal growl, he eased his body in closer, sneaking his knees under her thighs. Soon he was close enough, and his growl grew as he took his cock in his soaked hand, and set his glans against her trembling folds. Precum was already leaking from the swollen tip, making it easy to peel back the skin and expose the engorged, red head, big enough he felt like it was going to burst.

Easing his shaft into her leaking, quivering pussy, as the exhausted elder vampire continued to tremble, was oddly exhilarating. For sure the ancient, deadly creature was going to do something to him later as punishment for this, but good god, it was too inviting. Seeing her lying there, shaking, breasts rippling gently on her chest, pulled to her sides with their enormous mass and weight, was beautiful. It was a glorious sight, and he drank it in as he pushed his cock into the vise-grip of her slit, fighting against her clenching spasms. Tight enough, if she'd wanted to, she could have squeezed hard enough to prevent entry entirely; or break off his dick. But she was exhausted, and her insides were absolutely soaked. It was almost like she was defenseless to stop him.

He felt like a kid sneaking a cookie from the cookie jar.

He took her hips into his hands, put his weight on his knees, and pulled on her. She managed a tired moan, and opened her eyes long enough to look at him, but they closed again as he pulled her across the blankets and pillows a few inches. As her bountiful ass molded to his thighs, and her pussy swallowed every inch of him, she shivered again, and let her head turn to the side to rest on the pillows as her insides squeezed on him.

He knelt up straight, putting his weight onto both knees and getting his ass in the air, while keeping both hands on his lover's hips. Her butt lifted with him, and her long, flat stomach stuck out as her back arched to keep her shoulders flat to the pillows. If she'd been more aware of what was going on, she'd probably have hooked her thighs around his hips, but her legs dangled limply around him, spread and trembling as the woman clenched on his cock. Each motion was like fireworks of bliss along his aching length.

He held onto her hips nice and tight, pulled his own back, and thrust into her hard enough to make her whole body shake. It managed to pull a short, quiet mewl from the deadly predator, and Jack licked his lips at the sound; it was intoxicating. He thrust into her again, hitting her hard enough, and deep enough, he could feel her large ass jiggle against his thighs. The thrust also made her breasts flow back and forth along her chest even more than before, not unlike hitting a waterbed.

But the best part, was the sizzling heat of her cum coating his length. Another hard thrust, and her juices renewed, a small squirt of her cum enough to drench his cock, and leak down onto his testicles. When she squirted, her insides clenched hard, and he winced as he felt her depths grip his shaft tight enough it was difficult to move. But he managed another thrust, and another, until the heaven of her hot slit massaging and milking his length and ripe glans, had sparks of pleasure dancing down his cock and between his legs.

Part of him told him he should probably slow down. If Antoinette were human, she'd be so exhausted that she probably wouldn't be able to cum anymore, after the piston fingering he'd given her. But she was a vampire, and that meant she could take a lot more. And, seeing her like this, giving into pleasure and trusting him completely? He wanted this, needed this, and didn't want it to stop. He thrust into her again, hard, and again, until he felt the warmth of his cum gush up through his length.

With each wave of his cum, he thrust into her, slamming into her and causing her whole body to shake. Her mewls turned into moans, still quiet and tired, and each was met with a clench of her insides. It was a struggle to manage his own pleasure, to stay on his knees and upright, as each thrust meant her cunt squeezed on the now hypersensitive skin of his cock's head. It also meant each thrust was euphoric, almost painfully so, causing a gush of his warm cum to send sparks down his length as it poured into his lover

Soon both of their fluids were trickling down her ass and thighs, and his testicles. The mostly clear color of hers, mixing with the thick white of his, coated, mixed, and flowed out of Antoinette, and he licked his lips as he watched. He pulled out most of his length, groaned as her dripping slit milked on his length, and groaned again as he slowly slid it back into her, eyes locked on how her soaked pussy squeezed in spurts around his girth.

It almost felt like cheating, with how easy it was to make his lover feel pleasure. Antoinette had spent centuries developing her sexuality, and now that she'd let her guard down, it took little to make the deadly predator cum and cum hard. No wonder she didn't do it often, if she turned into this when she did, a bundle of sensitive nerves he could probably make cum by breathing on her neck. Like this, she was defenseless against him, and could do nothing but lie there on her throne of pillows, on her massive bed, and quiver in pleasure.

And, he needed more.

He used one hand to keep her body pressed to him, ass still in the air with how he was kneeling. His other took her leg, her long, curvy, smooth, delicious, creamy leg, and hooked it over his shoulder, before grabbing her hips again, and using the inside of his arm to keep the leg where it was. He repeated the process with his other hand, and smiled down at the Prince once both her legs were hooked on his shoulders. Her insides grew tighter with the position, and he shivered as her clenching pussy sent more waves of pleasure down his still sensitive glans.

He started thrusting again, hard. Antoinette's eyes opened, and she managed to blink at him as her lips parted. She moaned, a deep, husky sound, and her eyes closed once again as she melted onto her pillows. Her breasts bounced against her chest, mostly rolling toward her shoulders with gravity, and how her back arched upward, her hips in his hands. It created the most beautiful sight he could imagine, demanding he keep thrusting, harder, causing her ass to ripple against his thighs and her whole body to shake with each impact, so he could keep watching her breasts flow back and forth along her chest.

She came again. Instead of writhing or moaning, or thrusting her hips to meet him, or arching her back harder, she simply lay there, and shivered. Her juices trickled down, mixing with his own and soaking the blankets beneath them; it'd turn to the faintest trace of dust eventually, but for now, it was a mess of sex and heat. Something about her being so exhausted that she couldn't even squirm anymore, sent Jack over the edge, and he started pounding into her, causing the enormous bed to shake as he drove his cock into her cum-filled insides. More wet warmth soaked his cock, almost splashing his abdomen as it trickled out over his length, only to get lost in the mess as he thrust into her again, and again, earning more of her fluids.

Seeing her lie there, exhausted and open, quiet moans sneaking out through her parted lips, was too much. He stopped thrusting, and slowly let Antoinette's ass back down onto the blankets. White cum dripped from her clenching slit, almost washed away by her trickling juices and squeezing muscles. But it was her breasts that drew his eyes, and he licked his lips as he crawled over her pelvis and legs, and sat on her stomach.

With her torso still propped up on the pillows, gravity pulled her breasts down toward her stomach, and out along her ribs. He reached down onto both sides of her, scooped her breasts inward, and as he leaned forward so his cock rested along her upper stomach, he buried his cum-soaked length in the softness of her bosom. As much as her insides were a sinful combination of tight muscle and dripping heat, the softness of her breasts enveloping his girth was a guilty pleasure he'd never grow tired of. Her breasts were more than big enough to completely hide his cock, and it wasn't like he had a small one; in fact, he had a normal sized one, which looked pretty large on his small body. It made it all the better, when her massive breasts overflowed his thighs and pelvis, as he began to fuck the valley of alabaster softness.

Antoinette managed to open her eyes again, though she was still blatantly exhausted, and trapped in orgasm aftershocks. A light brush of his thumbs along her hard nipples was enough to make her shiver, and she closed her eyes again as she sank onto the pillows. It was heaven, feeling the supple, heavy mass of her breasts mold snug to his legs and pelvis. A gentle thrust was enough to cause them to ripple against him, jiggling as he pinned them around his length, and overflowed his fingers.

He leaned down, bending his back so he could keep his cock snug between her breasts, and found her lips with his. A crack of her red gaze showed through before she closed her eyes again. It was surprising, that she'd given in this hard. It filled his stomach with butterflies, knowing she was willing to do that, after what had happened. Knowing he could make her cum so hard she practically went into a coma, was also a huge stroke to his ego, one he would look to create again if he could find the opportunity. But for now, take advantage while you can, Jack. Antoinette had gone totally submissive, and he'd be damned if he was going to waste the chance it provided.

He kissed her again, and again. With anyone else, bending his back down this way while doing this would have been impossible, but Antoinette was tall, and her breasts were large enough they reached his pelvis without him having to sit up high on her stomach. He was free to kiss her, and touch her forehead with his, as he started to cum into the softness of her bosom. Instead of the vise grip of hot, milking muscle, the silky texture of her breasts caressed his aching glans tenderly, and invited him to coat her chest in his cum, rather than demanding it. He was more than happy to give into it, and he raised his head so he could look down and admire the sight of his cum flowing up along her sternum, as he fucked her breasts.

He scooted up a little higher, so her breasts outright buried his thighs, and overflowed his pelvis and up onto his abdomen. Cum oozed down her sternum, coating her breasts, even as it poured over their contours underneath her collar, to start dripping down her ribs. The moment the tingling waves settled, his glans stopped being hypersensitive, and his clenching inner muscles calmed down, he started thrusting again. He needed more.

“My love,” Antoinette said, eyes slowly opening to full, “you are ... ravenous, tonight.”

“I can’t help it. Two weeks is way too long.” It wasn’t a biological need; he was a corpse after all, and didn’t experience those urges innately. It was very much a psychological need however, both to enjoy sex, but also to spend more time with skin-on-skin contact with Antoinette. There was something magical about that, skin on skin, touch on touch, something overwhelming and soothing at the same time, about feeling their bodies against each other. He needed more.

The elder vampire, with a quiet, pleasant moan, stopped quivering, and slowly slid her arms up to touch his wrists. Her fingers teased, inching up his arms until they reached his biceps, and she held his arms there, helping press her breasts together for him with her own biceps as she smiled up at him.

“I must apologize for that.”

“No ... apology necessary. It happened. We move on, right?” He tried his best to smile down at her, but he was trapped in carnal need. Autopilot. His hips moved forward in a consistent fucking rhythm, and he stared down at how her breasts, squished between his hands and her arms, kept his cock hidden despite him kneeling straight up. It made everything tighter, and her silky skin squeezed on him, his own cum keeping everything sliding back and forth in heavenly bliss.

“Perhaps. Or, perhaps I was a fool, for not ... for fearing that I could not feel safe with you, like this.” Her legs raised, putting her knees and thighs to his back and butt.

“I’ll never let anything come between us, Antoinette. Ever.” And he meant it. No matter what he did with Beatrice, no matter what crazy shit he’d do to get revenge, no matter how loud or strong his curse grew to be, he’d never let anything get between him and the Prince.

He leaned down again, and set his lips to hers. She returned his kiss, eagerly, and offered him some controlled moans as his thrusting got faster. The Prince moved her chest with him, matching his rhythm, and helping him reach another orgasm in record time.

He lifted his head, and stared down at how her breasts, squashed to his body, were soon painted white in another layer of his cum. Kneeling up gave him more leverage too, and he squeezed her breasts together a little harder, fingers sinking into their softness, until the gentle pressured forced out waves of his white fluid. More joined the mess, until it was overflowing the upper arches of each breast and trickling down along their sides. Each thrust meant the soaked, wet, silky skin of her breasts massaged his length, but also that her breasts jiggled hypnotically, despite the both of them holding them. The sensation of cum-soaked breasts hitting his thighs and abdomen, as he poured his cum into their crevice, was euphoric.

But eventually he was done, and he let go of her breasts, exposing the soaked valley between them. Antoinette spread her arms, letting the two pillows pull to the sides of her chest, before she brought her hands to each of them, and began to massage his cum into her alabaster skin. Good god in heaven.

“I am glad to hear that, my love,” she said, growing still and relaxing onto her pillows once more as she grinned at him. “I would hate to learn Elaine stole you away from me.”

“Who?”

~~Damien~~

He couldn't stop looking at her. She couldn't stop looking at him. It was a good thing he was a corpse, because he knew his hormones would be raging, and he'd be walking around with an erection.

Damien, Fiona, Matthew, Vicky, and Parker, were together once again. The sweeps didn't get to stop just because of the incident with Jack at the hospital; if anything, Julias's death did the opposite. The Invictus were in overdrive now, with every sweeper team running almost every night, and the age bracket having increased to include younger Kindred. It was a bad idea, including younger Kindred who'd only get themselves killed in a confrontation with hunters, especially these hunters. Angela, Jeremiah, and her crew were anything but the usual hunters Damien had been warned of by Lucas, so long ago. These were trained soldiers, professional killers, who lived and breathed teamwork, not a band of disgruntled humans who wanted revenge for a dead family member.

Keeping his mind on the hunters was proving difficult. It didn't matter to Fiona that their lives were in danger, and that, out here in North Side, hunters could be hiding around any corner. Or maybe it did matter, and that was why she kept glancing at him and smiling, and grinning. She was a danger junkie, and being in danger always put her in a bouncy mood.

The two of them slowly drifted further back from the rest of the group, putting maybe fifty feet between them and the team, before Damien fully turned to face Fiona. An alleyway, high walls of two office buildings, and corners cutting off light sources, meant the two of them were in darkness. He liked darkness. So did she. She was darkness, in ways he could never be, and he had to admit, there was an appeal in that dangerous side of her.

There was also an appeal in the less dangerous side of her, the cute little redhead in the jeans and brown leather jacket, with frizzy red hair and freckles. There was appeal in the way she looked up at him with beaming golden brown eyes. There was extreme appeal in how she bit her bottom lip when she did.

And then, there was the appeal in how, when he reached out to touch her, she didn't hesitate to lean into it. He had no idea, no idea at all, how amazing a thing it'd be, to have someone lean into his touch when he wanted to touch them. Power in touch, in skin on skin contact, in the movement toward each other, in eye contact. It was overpowering, mesmerizing, and good Lord, how had he denied himself this for so long?

He set a hand on her neck, another on her hip, and came in closer, pulling her in as he did. She let out a small mewl, pushed up onto the toes of her black boots, and kissed him. Heat, warmth, subtle wetness, he melted into the feel of it as he pressed his lips to hers, and—“Tck!” she said, pushing both hands against his chest, turning her head to the side, and coughing.

“What? What, what did I—”

She laughed and put a finger on his lips. “Sorry! But yer lips are all dry and dusty, cause ye’re nae Blushing Life.”

“Oh. Um, I could—”

“Nae, we cannae stop our jobs, just cause ... we want ... to touch.” Her hands began to roam his body, squeezing and pressing on his arms, before drifting around and slipping around his waist. She was quite literally saying no, while her body was literally saying yes with its body language.

In the past, that’d have been way too confusing a signal. Now, it was only mildly confusing. Progress.

He was wearing a trench coat, thick, black, and heavy. Some called it a duster. Fiona called it sexy. He figured it’d be a reasonable change in fashion, considering it was the same sort of clothes the sheriff wore, and the two of them were similar in more ways than one. Either way, Fiona agreed with the wardrobe adjustment, though she didn’t know it was Maria’s idea. The small woman smiled up at him as her hands drifted around his waist, squeezed and pressed on his abs and back, and kneaded the fabric of his suit underneath.

He returned the favor, unable to stop himself as he gazed down at the fiery creature. His fingers found her back and waist, and while one drifted up to sneak into her hair, earning some more mewls from her, the other slid down, and gently squeezed on the mass of her ass. It was a large ass, curvy, and it filled her jeans to the point of tightness. Fiona had some muscle on her, but not as much as his coworkers. She was soft, thin, but with just enough plumpness to her to make her features supple and inviting.

She also had enormous breasts, matching her hourglass figure perfectly, and he growled down at her as one of his roaming hands found them. Even through her jacket, shirt, and bra, he could feel the softness of them and how they molded to his fingers. Better, was when he placed both hands behind her, one on her ass, and pressed her to his body so he could feel her breasts squash to his chest.

No wonder kine everywhere were addicted to touch, craved it, dreamed of it, wrote about it day and night. Every part of him wanted to hold her, feel her heartbeat, listen to her breathe, and kiss her. Every part of him wanted to grab her, press her to him, and bury his member inside her so he could feel her clenching muscles soak him as he drank her blood until she was limp, exhausted, trembling, and helpless.

They hadn't had sex yet, and it was killing the both of them. The problem was a lack of time. When he was awake, he was working double time, dealing with the hunter threat, and when he wasn't working he was asleep. He had, on average, twelve hours a day, while she had more to work with. And the devil woman had made sure to use that free time to take more pictures of herself, and send them to him to taunt him. At this point, he was intimately familiar with the heavy teardrop shape her breasts made when she was nude, and how delicious her milky white skin looked when squeezed. Lots, and lots of selfies to torment him when he woke up each dusk.

He'd had sex with Vrall, and he looked forward to doing that again as well. Except, now he knew how good sex felt, and it was on his mind all the time. He needed more. God, he needed more. And Fiona was taunting him, teasing him, playing with him, bringing him closer to a bursting point every time he went out on a sweep with her. So evil. Why did evil have to be so delicious?

He leaned down closer, and breathed in the smell of her neck, her flesh, her life and her perfume. “You’re killing me.”

“Ye’re the one killing me! I have Vral’s experience with ye, but nae my own! Vral, she ... she was right, ye ken? About ... the things ... I like...”

He growled into her ear. Never did he picture himself as an aggressive sort, someone who had to act on impulse, masculine instincts, or wanton need. But Fiona flashed her doe eyes at him, bit her bottom lip again, and he shivered as the Kindred inside him demanded he take her. His hands found hers, and slowly tightened his fingers around them, locking them into his grip as he pressed the backs of them against the wall behind her.

She melted. It was like throwing a lit match onto gasoline. The poor woman squirmed for a second, but within moments, she sank against the wall, and blinked her sweet, pure, please-don’t-take-me-I’m-just-an-innocent-girl eyes at him; a total lie but his awakened sex drive didn’t seem to care. Vral had been right. More than right, she’d been dead on. Damien leaned down over her, growled again, and he felt Fiona’s weight struggle against his hands as her legs started to quiver.

“We ... we shouldnae ... nae now ... we have a job to do,” she said, but her voice had fallen into whispers. Her breathing was short, shallow, pants that drew his eyes to her chest and neck.

She was right of course. They had a job to do, hunters to find, and a city to make safe. All of that was background noise to the roaring in his chest, telling him to give into his desires, and drain this woman. Sink his fangs into her, and sink his cock into her, too. She wanted it. He could smell it. He—

“You two, good god.”

Damien snapped his head up, and glared at Vicky. But her voice had been joyful, full of chuckling, and it prevented a barking retort from him. The Ventrue stood down the alleyway where it opened to the street, maybe fifteen feet away, and close enough Damien should have sensed her. He didn't. With every sense pointed at Fiona, tunnel vision was real. Even now, trying to pull back from his need to take the small redhead and sink his fangs into her neck, it was hard to notice other things. Street. Wall. Windows. Shadows. Two other vampires, and a werewolf nearby. Pay attention to your surroundings at all times, like a Mekhet should, instead of the horny teenager you're acting like.

“Hey, ye're ruining a moment!” Fiona said, barking at Vicky but smiling as she did. When Damien pulled away, Fiona pushed away from the wall, straightened her clothes, and stuck her tongue out at the Ventrue.

“You two can fuck later, when the hunters are dead,” Vicky said. “Come on, we still have a lot of work to do tonight.”

Fiona, grumbling, bounced on her feet a few times before stomping down the alley to join Vicky, and Damien followed after. In the past, he'd have walked ahead of her, in some sort of protective instinct he supposed. Now, any opportunity to see her from behind was an opportunity worth taking.

He almost laughed. Back when he was human, he'd had a sex drive, one that demanded he gawk at every woman who passed by. But then he'd also had a limited view of the world, a hyper conservative view colored by his beliefs; naturally, being attracted to everything with two legs and boobs had led to a lot of guilt. No guilt anymore. No, now things were different, he was different, and as far as he could tell, his beliefs more reasonable.

How much of that was Antoinette and her hyper progressive city affecting him, versus simple logical reasoning, he didn't know. It was hard to know, when working in the dark, and until God decided to pay a visit, he had to try and be reasonable about things.

Even more uncertain, how much of that was actually reasonable thinking, versus him being out-of-his-mind horny twenty-four seven, since he'd had a taste of Fiona? People didn't think straight when they were aroused. He assumed that Kindred were different, since without the Blush of Life, arousal was purely mental. Except maybe it wasn't. The Beast didn't operate on the biological, it was a monster, something above and beyond biology, and it certainly seemed like it was making him horny even when he wasn't Blushing Life. Which meant, he wasn't thinking straight, and never would be again as long as Fiona was in his life.

He was okay with that.

He fell in beside Fiona, but this time Vicky and Parker got behind them, while Matt led on. No way for the two of them to lose track and fall back, and conveniently start touching each other again.

Sighing, he looked back at the other two vampires. He was tired, and they were tired. Patrols, every night, all night, were starting to get to them, them more than him. He was used to being on edge all the time, being wound up, being ready for violence. They weren't. A lifetime, a second lifetime, a third lifetime for some of them, spent swaddled in Dolareido's gentle embrace had made them soft. The Carthians fighting the Invictus, Viktor and Tony being menaces, none of them compared to the violence of the Purge, and ultimately, that affair had been done and sealed within months. The Kindred of Dolareido were woefully unprepared for constant threat.

So, he was tired, but he wasn't letting it get to him like they were. What was getting to him was his desperate need to pounce the small redhead beside him and do things to her, and not having time to do so.

Speaking of sex...

“Vicky, Parker, how goes your brothels in Devil’s Corner?” No time wasted on last times, this was important, and first names cut to that truth like cracking ice with a hammer.

That earned a pause from them, until Parker stepped up and started walking beside him. “Why?”

“Jack told me about a trip he and Avery made, to one of your brothels. Found some special, small statues there.”

“Right,” Matt said, still walking ahead of them, hands in his jeans pockets. “Avery said there’s some low scale loci there, resonating on sex and pleasure.”

Vicky and Parker looked between each other like guilty school children. It wasn’t Damien’s job or interest to ask about this, it was something Jack wanted to follow up on, but the kid had enough on his shoulders right now. Least Damien could do for his friend was find out more, since he was out with these two pampered royal babies every night.

“Why didn’t Avery investigate further?” Damien said to the big man.

“Low priority. And despite how dangerous it is, Dolareido seems to deal with the sexual energy well. It dissipates throughout the city without overwhelming it.”

Damien frowned at Parker as he spoke. “What happens if it becomes too much, too concentrated?”

Matt shrugged. “Same thing that happens when any particular energy, aspect, emotion, concept, or entity grows too big for its area. A large spirit comes along, devours, and upsets the balance. A shadow spirit feeding on an area thick with the essence of darkness could grow strong enough to turn off all lights in a city, and eventually strong enough to block out all light. You’ve probably read about myths and legends with things like eclipses happening when they shouldn’t, and things of that nature. Lot of that was probably when some shadow spirits got out of hand.”

That was not a comforting thought. If spirits could feed on a locus, and grow to the point of godly power, that was a legitimate concern. It also made Parker and Vicky’s unchecked actions far more concerning than Damien had originally thought warranted. Learning that the two had been dealing with things that were possibly more dangerous than known had been of little concern to him at first, but as a Right Hand for the Invictus, and now intimately invested in Dolareido’s future, it now did.

“You fucking serious?” Vicky said.

The werewolf nodded again as he stepped around a street corner. “If we saw it happening with those brothels, we’d have taken the locus you own. If you had tried to stop us, we would have killed you.”

Vicky and Parker both stopped, looked at each other, and gulped before running to catch up.

“We didn’t know,” Parker said. “We knew those statue things were special, magical in some way. But ... but, it seems perfectly innocent, doesn’t it? It attracts kine, makes them docile, want to fuck and chill, and otherwise be all-around pleasant. Can’t imagine it getting out of hand.”

Sighing, Matt stopped and looked over his shoulder at the group of them. “Avery once visited Nevada, and found a den filled with sex spirits. Many of them had possessed people, to the point their lives were destroyed. They'd made innocent people abandon friends, family, and spend every dime they had on creating brothels and what have you. Drug abuse was rampant. People with infected track marks were jamming needles into wounds, so they could do anything in their power to increase the pleasure. Orgies filled with STDs and heroin. Women getting pregnant without a thought for the consequences. Men were dragging people into the den and tossing them in. Women were luring people into the den as well, though I believe a few used gunpoint to force the issue. Anyone in the den succumbed to the power of the spirits that infested the area. People were dying." The big man stopped, sniffed deep, looked up at a building, and continued on. "Avery interfered, and we had to kill more people, and spirits, to undo the damage."

Fiona whistled. "Aye, that sounds like trouble."

"But Avery says the spirits here are cooperating, keeping things moderate," Matt said.

"Is that normal?" Damien said.

"No, it isn't. Spirits do everything they can to get stronger, and they do that by expanding their influence, devouring other spirits if it fits their nature, merging or consuming, and they play politics. Sometimes, if they grow big enough, strong and smart enough, they play games you can't even begin to wrap your mind around."

That was a lot of information, and Matt was sharing it freely. Either he was beginning to trust him and the other vampires, or Natasha was convincing him to. In any case, information was power, and Damien picked up each bit like it was gold. He'd share it with Jack, and possibly Maria.

"Any idea why they're playing nice?"

"That," the enormous werewolf said with a grin, "I can't tell you."

Hm, Matt seemed like a big dumb guy, but he wasn't. Jolly giant, perhaps, but not stupid.

"Where did ye get them?" Fiona said, looking to Vicky and Parker.

"Get what?" Parker said.

"The statues! Damien said ye had a statue at the brothel?"

The two vampires squirmed a little. It was a question Damien had planned to get to, but Fiona beat him to the punch. He'd also planned to be a bit more manipulative about it, find a way to ask the question without leaving them an avenue to back out of it, and hopefully minimize the possibility they'd lie.

"I'd rather not say," Vicky said with a nod.

Naturally. With a sigh, Damien turned and faced the two vampires, right hand reaching behind his neck to rest his palm against the back collar of his trench coat. The hilt of his sword was there hidden inside the coat, his new sword, his much longer sword. They knew what it meant.

Parker glared at him, but he took a step back, too. "Damien, we don't have to tell if we—"

"Madam Vicky Goldman, Mister Parker White, I want to know, where you got those statues." He kept his hand where it was, and his other hand remained at his side, unmoving but ready to snatch up his hidden pistol if he had to. "So does my fellow Right Hand, Mister Terry. Don't upset me."

He didn't like being aggressive like this, but he knew he was good at it. Lucas had a hard, aggressive side most Mekhet didn't, and Damien knew it; and he'd learned it was a powerful tool. He'd used it many times when dealing with kine, and it almost always ended in the desired result: intimidation to the point his target acquiesced.

With Kindred, he wasn't sure. Now was as good a time as any to test it, he supposed.

Vicky stood beside Parker, glaring at him, some teeth exposed as she growled. "The fuck is this? Thought we were out here looking for hunters, and now you're grilling us about what we do in our own time?"

He kept his hand where it was. "It is, but two of the Right Hands would like to know. It's important, more than you realize."

And that was true. Things were happening in Dolareido, and he, Jack, and Fiona now that she knew about the unknown threat, needed to know about random things that could turn into leads. Why two Invictus had powerful objects in their possession, magical in some way or another, was a question worth learning the answer to. The reason he had his hand on his sword, was because the two vampires were being unusually resistant to answering that question.

No, it wasn't just that he wanted to know the answer. Vicky and Parker, and other Kindred in the Invictus, didn't respect him as a Right Hand, didn't view him as a member of the Invictus. That was true, he wasn't Invictus. But if members of the covenant weren't willing to respect him as a Right Hand, it was going to be a problem. They didn't know him, what he was capable of, and it was about time he showed them.

Parker looked to Matthew. "Gonna let him just threaten us like this?"

The werewolf put his hands up and backed away. "I'd love to ask him to stop, but I have clear orders from Avery. Let vamps do what vamps do, as long as it doesn't interfere with our original job."

And for Uratha, that job was dealing with spirits. Kindred on Kindred violence was not Avery's concern, it was his concern. It was tempting, to try and convince Matthew that, since the statues in their possession were capable of summoning spirits, that it did concern him, and he should help Damien get information. But Matt made it clear that the statues weren't causing issues. And Fiona was neither Kindred nor Uratha; better she stay out of this.

“Just tell me where you got the statues,” Damien said.

“No,” the two vampires said at once.

Well, at least they were honest enough to not lie to him.

How quickly things grew violent between Kindred. For all Dolareido boasted of its peaceful interactions between vampires, it was only skin deep. Kindred were monsters, predators, hungry, with a set of instincts that demanded they distrust each other. The moment it stopped being a pleasant, cooperative effort between them, vampires turned on each other like angry cats. Tensions tightened even further, until they snapped like guitar strings, or bridge support lines. It was like that in many cities. Vampires could be working alongside each other one moment, and at each other's throats the next, when they felt threatened or got in each other's way.

The First Estate and Second Estate, the Invictus and Lancea et Sanctum respectively, often held some sort of truce in other cities, but not always. Tonight was a perfect example of how such a truce could go wrong.

When things grew too violent for the Prince's liking, she had exterminated the Lancea et Sanctum. The only thing that stopped the Carthians and Invictus from going at each other with intent to kill, was Antoinette and her iron fist. If anyone stepped out of line, she'd kill them, naturally. Unfortunately for Vicky and Parker, that line was pretty easy to not cross if you kept your head. Antoinette had grown quite forgiving and soft since Lucas's death, and more so since Jack came into her life. Unless someone came up and slapped her, she'd likely forgive transgressions. She'd be livid, undoubtedly, if Damien killed these two, but he doubted she'd care too much if he cut off their arms. They'd grow back, after all, in a week, or two, or twenty.

“Final warning,” he said, “tell me where you got the statues.” No longer a question of simple knowledge, now it was a question of respect. He'd prefer it wasn't, but the Invictus operated on respect, on power, and superiority and position and image. If he wanted to function among them, he had to play by their rules. If he really wanted to get pompous, he could challenge them to a duel, but that might not work, considering two on one.

He glared between the two of them, and licked a canine.

“No,” they said together.

And the next moment, Parker had his sword stabbing through his chest, into his heart, and out through his back.

His eyes widened, looked down at the enormous sword piercing his torso, before his eyes closed and he collapsed into torpor. The sword would keep him paralyzed for a little while, more than enough time for him to deal with Vicky. Daeva were fast and strong, and in a frontal confrontation, that could make for a problem. Damien was sure he was faster, but if he had to deal with a Daeva and a Ventrue at the same time, it wouldn't be efficient.

Hesitation is defeat. He understood that. These two didn't.

He turned his eyes to Vicky, and found fear there. That was ... thrilling. He was used to kine being afraid, when he took the time to strike fear into their hearts, and scare them back into the awaiting arms of the Lord. That'd been strangely thrilling as well, stroking an animal instinct that satisfied a need to be intimidating. But to see fear in a fellow predator's eyes was a special treat, and he licked a canine again as he approached her, leaving his sword behind, and pulling a large knife from inside his coat.

“Do not mistake my quiet nature for weakness, Vicky. I am a Right Hand for a reason. Do you know of the more powerful of Auspex’s abilities? Its capacity to learn secrets from its target?” he said. She glared at him, eyes wide, mixing fear and rage, trapping her with indecision. She knew. “Answer my question, before I—”

“Jacob, ok? Christ, we traded with Jacob to get them.”

Chapter 96

~~Beatrice~~

She curled up under her pile of blankets, and clutched Jennifer tight.

It was quiet in the cave. Jacob and the boys were out, doing things, looking for hunters or something. She didn't really care right now. Every part of her ached, felt drained, and demanded sleep. Deep diving into Crúac was exhausting, demanding, and beyond difficult. But that wasn't the whole reason she felt like shit, and she knew it. Every part of her couldn't imagine doing anything but staying in bed, and letting the world crumble around her.

Of course, Jennifer wouldn't let her do that. Like that annoying friend that refuses to let you die, Jennifer hounded her and demanded she not succumb to the blatant depression she was suffering. Like, right now, Triss had planned to just lie in her alcove, and mope, but Jennifer had slipped under the covers with her, wearing nothing at all. Triss was only wearing a tank top and some boy shorts, and they did little to block the feel of Jen's skin.

Triss held her close, the big spoon, and she set her cheek against the back of Jen's head.

"Hey," Triss said.

"Hey. How did your visit to Jack's go?"

Right, she hadn't talked to Jen about that yet. Too busy being sad, and crying in dark corners.

"It was ... it went well. He agreed, but I ... I could tell that ... that this curse thing is real." She'd felt it, when in the kid's presence. He was stronger. He was deadlier. He'd gone from sweet, innocent little Jack, naive and untainted, to a predator. A seemingly corrupted predator, given the nature of the curse.

She didn't understand it, and didn't need to understand it. Jack was willing to help her, and he seemed confident he could handle anything she threw at him. More to the point, he was willing to kill Angela, no matter what. They both saw eye to eye on that.

That was where things got blurry, ethically. She never considered herself to be a particularly horrible person, even at her worst when she killed kine; they'd deserved it, and she didn't lose any sleep over them. Hunting down asshole humans and drinking them dead had been a good way to burn off steam, and it wasn't a problem as long as she kept killings rare, and cleaned up evidence. Dolareido's crime rate remained moderately low, despite it being the perfect nesting ground for the lowlifes of the world, because of Kindred like her. Low crime rate, casinos, theater, strip clubs, and everything in between, meant a lot of kine were always visiting or moving in, and food was always at a surplus for Kindred. Everybody won, a symbiotic relationship.

Slaughtering kine because she needed blood for rituals, was a grayer area. How many had she killed in the past week? Six. Drug dealers and abusers, people that didn't necessarily deserve death, but it didn't matter. She had a goal, and it required blood. People would keep dying until she met that goal, until she found Angela, until she killed every hunter in the fucking city.

Even if she had to burn the whole thing to the ground.

Tonight was her first break from practicing Crúac with Jacob since Julias's death. Her mind needed a break. They'd been trying to do something unusual, and something even Jacob himself warned her might not be possible: invent a ritual that could track down hunters. The problem was that, not only were they struggling to figure out a way to get the ritual to hunt hunters specifically, but Crúac rituals were as mysterious and obscure as trying to talk to God. God had a habit of not responding, so learning whether the Crone, or whatever strange alien entities or forces that existed in the universe, were even listening to them, was difficult.

That's where Black Blood came in. It—

Jen's hands, hidden underneath the many blankets, slid around until they found Triss's, and guided them along her body. One hand slid down to set Triss's fingers along Jen's thighs, while the other slipped Triss's fingers around one of Jen's breasts. The woman's body was smooth and curvy, and Triss traced her fingers along her friend's skin, sighing as she did. Soft, and delightful. The big tits and large ass were model material, and Jen did ever enjoy rubbing them against her.

It was obvious her friend was trying to get her mind off Julias, and onto something less depressing. Jen's body and sex drive were definitely less depressing, and Triss managed a weak chuckle as she gently squeezed the woman's large tit until it overflowed her fingers.

It was more than just sex. Jen knew that Triss had begun associating sex and Julias, with having Jen around as well. Rubbing her big ass against her, making her grope her breasts, it did feel like being in Julias's company again, if only a little. If a big guy had climbed under the blankets with them, wrapped his arms around her from behind, while Triss felt Jen up, it'd have been the same world she'd lost over two weeks ago.

She stopped, and put her hands back where they were. Still holding and squeezing the naked, beautiful woman to her, but no fondling, no groping, no fingering. Jen got the point pretty quick, and relaxed into the blankets while Triss held her.

“You don’t need me to have sex, Jen,” she said. “You have two ghouls, who I am sure are itching to fuck you. How long has it been since you’ve slept with them?”

“A long time ago.” Groaning, she turned around and faced her, keeping the mountain of blankets pulled up to her shoulders. “Since ... you know.” Since Julias first invited her into his bed with Triss. For all Jen’s talk about not being interested in romance, she’d displayed a lot of the signs of someone who’d been romantically interested.

Sighing, Triss squeezed her friend tighter, and buried her face in her neck. “I miss him. So damn much.”

“I know. I was just—”

“I know. It’s ... it’s ok.” She kissed Jen’s neck a couple times, before settling her head back down against her pillow. The past two weeks had been nothing but crying. Crying, and experimenting with Crúac when Jacob said to, that’d been her life for now and probably would be for some time.

The Beast in her disagreed. It was sad its mate was gone, but the Beasts were loners by nature. Relationships were not something it understood, especially long-term ones. The Beast told her to get out there, kill her enemies, reestablish her territory, defend her food supply, blah blah blah. Annoying as it was, she appreciated its candor, she supposed. It was the only part of her that wasn’t screaming in rage and agony every second of the night.

Two years. Two fucking years she’d spent in that man’s arms, and now, she didn’t know what to do with herself.

Not true. She knew what to do next. Revenge. It was her only guiding light, the only thing she could trust. Once it was done, what next? The idea of going on with her second life without Julias felt pointless and hollow. All she wanted to do was climb onto his body, get between his arms, and disappear. Nothing else existed, nothing else mattered when she was there, just the way she felt safe, and loved, and happy, and complete, and...

God fucking damn it. She sobbed a couple times, and hid her face in Jen's neck. Her friend held her, squeezed her in return, and said nothing. The cave was empty tonight save for them. No one to hear her cry.

---

---

~~Jack~~

Dusk arrived, and with it, new goals. He was going to talk to Beatrice today, and show his mom his apartment, and see Azamel. Or at least, that was the plan. Right now, his brain was having trouble picturing anything past the immediate moment, and what Antoinette was doing to him.

He gulped, melted into the bed, and watched Antoinette as she settled on the bed perpendicular to him, her torso draped across his thighs. She set her weight onto an elbow on the other side of his legs, got comfortable with her side pressing down on his upper thighs, and set her breasts around his shaft so it was sticking up between the two pillows. It was absolute bliss, feeling the weight of her breasts around his cock, how the soft skin and supple mounds molded to its shape, and how she smiled at him like a satisfied cat, as she watched him merge with the blankets and mattress.

“An old friend of mine will be visiting soon, my love,” she said. “Do be careful with her.”

“I, uh ... wait, what?” He blinked down at the Prince, but she only grinned at him as she got comfortable. “Oh, right, Elaine. You haven't told me anything about her yet. Figured I'd wait before asking.”

His shaft, still between her breasts, and getting squashed by the sideways angle she was lying on him with, fought to escape the tight confines. With a guiding finger, she pushed it back toward her sternum, trapping it between the two mountains. She set her temple against the hand of the arm with the elbow to the mattress on the other side of his hips, while her other casually teased over her nipples, circling and stroking their swelling, pink areolas. Her touching herself meant no stimulus for him, just a heavenly blanket of breasts around his length while they talked. That was fine. Hell, it was perfect. It gave him a little more self control, more mental capacity to simply watch the amazing sight, instead of immediately giving into sexual need.

It'd been weeks since they had a conversation like this, exchanging information about their day and whatnot, during the middle of sex. Apparently, she wanted to make it known that these sorts of talks would be happening regularly again. Awesome.

“Elaine is a fellow dragon and upstanding member of the Ordo Dracul. She will be visiting my city soon, and she means to speak with you.”

“With me?”

“Oui.” Still with her head resting lazily against the fist of one arm, keeping it propped up, her other hand reached down her own body, down her flat stomach and pale skin, to disappear between her thighs. Her body started to move, slow and subtle motions, a gentle rhythm that drew his eyes. She was masturbating, while she talked, instead of pleasuring him. All he could do was lie there, and watch the goddess play with herself, with his cock sticking up from between her two breasts sitting on his abdomen.

A teasing game. Probably punishment for him taking control a couple nights ago. As far as punishments went, he was entirely ok with this one. She wasn't against binding him with shackles and chains, complete with a leash, if the past was any indication.

“What does she want with me?”

“You are an intellectual curiosity to her. She will likely seek to learn all she can of your curse.”

“Ah.” That made sense. If the Ordo Dracul were dedicated to uncovering the secrets of the world, particularly those that directly involved Kindred, then he should have seen this coming. Antoinette was supposedly one of the highest ranked in her order supposedly, and no doubt other members of her order would be interested in something like a childe-jumping curse.

“Though,” Antoinette said as she lifted her higher leg, exposing her smooth skin and sex's lips, “I suspect once she sees you, she will try for more.”

“More?”

“Mmmm, oui.” Her fingers between her thighs, now visible, played with her clitoris in massaging waves. He recognized the motion; she wanted to cum quickly. She probably had plans as well, and didn't have time to spend all day fucking. He wanted to. God, every part of him wanted to forget about the world, forget about all the horrible shit, and spend his time in his lover's bed every night instead. So much better to do that, than to deal with hunters and Azamel and only God knew what else.

“You mean, secret stuff about the Invictus, or—”

“Nothing of that sort. But, I am sure she will attempt to seduce you.”

He raised a brow at that. “She's ... your friend, though?”

Antoinette laughed, a husky chuckle. “I have known Elaine for centuries, my love, and she is quite an attractive woman. There has been occasion where we have shared a bed.” Her red eyes stayed on him, smiling as she sank a finger in between her slit’s lips. “Though, it has never been romantic, purely sexual. She shares my interest in the skill of sex, the art of it, and has joined me in exploring its pleasures on several occasions. I suspect she will attempt to do so again, once she sees you.”

“I ... I uh, I see.” Ok, this was dangerous territory. Antoinette made it clear that sex was almost like performance art for her, but she also made it clear that she did not want them sleeping with other people; except for inviting her ghouls into their bed. And he was more than happy with that relationship, elated even. Sex between them was special, and sleeping around would taint that. But, from the mischievous smile she was giving him, as she masturbated, while his cock lightly moved around between her shifting breasts, it was obvious she was purposefully planting thoughts in his head. “What sort of exploring have you two done?”

Her smile widened for a moment, and she made a long sigh as she sank two fingers into her slit, leg still raised at the hip so he could see. Masturbating for her was a skill she’d mastered well beyond what any horny teenage boy could.

“I told you of my ghouls, so long ago, in a castle I once owned?”

“Y-Yeah.” The story of the orgies, and Antoinette getting drenched in cum while women licked it off her, stuck in his mind a little more than the individual ghouls herself, but yeah he remembered.

“Elaine has joined me on such adventures. Some, she initiated herself.”

“I ... I see.” His cock twitched between her breasts, and she laughed, openly. He didn’t need to say that the image of Antoinette with another woman was appealing, his dick said it for him.

“She has shown great interest in Daniel, and has tried to seduce the man on many occasions. But he forever ignores her; which, naturally, both infuriates and entices her.”

The idea of the sheriff hooking up with anyone was honestly strange to imagine. Jack figured he was one of those Kindred that was content to get all their pleasure from the Kiss, hunting and feeding, as some Kindred did. No need for sex or other artifacts of their first lives. But then, what did he know? It was often the quietest people who had the biggest kinks, and sex drives to go with.

“So, this woman, you think she’ll try and seduce me?”

“Oui.” Even as she nodded, she took her hand from her pussy, and set its fingertips down between her breasts where the glans of his cock was sticking out. Wet warmth coated the head of his cock, as she teased the tip with her juices that practically dripped from her fingers. Instant sparks of pleasure.

“W-What does she look like?”

“A tall woman, though not quite as tall as me. Thin and strong, with a touch of softness to her, like your Prince. And, her bust is très large.” She grinned at him, and slowly eased her chest forward an inch, causing her breasts to roll and press against his abdomen as she buried his member. When his jaw dropped and a groan escaped him, she chuckled again, leaned back, and slid her fingers back down between her own legs. “Large, and quite soft, my love.”

He groaned again, and let his eyes roll up as he pictured Antoinette, massaging, kneading, rubbing, and fondling someone else’s large breasts. A small part of him nagged at him, poked him in the back of his brain, and complained he was being a typical man. A much larger part announced its desires clearly: breasts, yes breasts, more breasts, all the breasts. Another set of legs in the bed? Perfect, as long as it meant more breasts.

He'd feel guilty, if Antoinette didn't seem to also delight in indulging him such fantasies. She was a sex goddess that had harnessed the power of everything sexual, and she loved to tease him with it.

Maybe she was doing this to make him feel better about Julias? Maybe—stop, stop thinking about Julias. You can deal with that mountain of pain and misery later. For now, just enjoy the fact that your lover is as amazing, and horny, as she is.

“I will do my best to resist her charms.”

She chuckled, but cut herself off short. After a few shudders, and a single deep breath, she withdrew her fingers from her sex once again, and set them back onto the tip of his cock where it poked out from between the two alabaster pillows. Wetter, hotter. God damn.

“To invite another Kindred into our bed is not something I had expected to consider,” she said. “You are mine, little Ventrue, and while to share you with my pets is a pleasant indulgence, sharing you with another Kindred felt ... as if, it may perhaps damage our intimacy.”

“A legitimate concern.” And one Julias and Triss probably ha—stop, stop it.

“But, Elaine is Elaine. I have known her for longer than Dolareido has existed. I trust her, and...” She leaned down, and planted a kiss on the head of his cock. Pleasure poured down through his length, and he flexed it, causing it to pull toward his stomach from between her breasts. Her wet fingers kept it where it was, a few of them teasing up and down one side of his glans, while her lips set kisses on the other. “And, I do believe, she will find your charms quite irresistible.”

“My charms?” he managed to say, but as she started kissing and suckling on the swollen head of his length, the pleasure waves began to build. A drop of precum announced his pleasure, and she stopped kissing, using only her fingers to tease and tickle his cock as she smiled at him.

“Oh yes, my love. I have no doubt she will be interested in you, and I believe, you would enjoy setting your length between both sets of our breasts, at the same time. Non?” She kept her head down so her kisses could resume. The only way she managed the position while keeping his shaft between her breasts, was because of how absurdly large they were, flopped forward and almost pancaked against his pelvis and abs.

“I ... I um...” God she was a cruel woman. A cruel, evil, horrible, awesome woman.

“I do not know for certain if she will attempt to join our bed, but there is a strong possibility. I felt I should warn you, and give permission to invite her to join us, if the conversation went in such a direction. And, of course, only if you are interested.”

Before he could respond, she encased the whole of his cock’s tip in her mouth, and began to milk him, squeezing her suckling lips tight and drawing them up, from the base of the bulbous head to the tip. The sparks of pleasure were immediate and massive, flowing down his length in between his legs, and telling his insides to let out the growing pool of heat building there. A hard flex of his inner muscles caused a gush of his cum to splash onto her tongue, and Antoinette smiled up at him while keeping his shaft in her mouth, suckling the engorged tip almost painfully, and licking the underside with a loving tongue, as he flooded her mouth with his cum.

“I ... will ... m-make sure to ... to say something if she ... suggests it.” It was almost enough to white his mind, the extreme sensation of being suckled and licked during orgasm. She knew just how hard to go, how tight, how fast, keeping everything bordering on too much without ever crossing over. It left him destroyed, helpless but to lie there and squirm as the pleasure waves coursed through his length and out from between his legs.

Evidently satisfied, she lifted her head, swallowed, licked her lips, and grinned at him. “That said, do be careful with her, my love. She is a calculating, dangerous woman, and she has her own agendas.”

“I see.” Typical elder then. No surprise there. And if she was Antoinette’s friend, than she was probably smart and deadly to a degree words didn’t do justice.

As Antoinette pulled away and started getting dressed, he forced himself to sit up. He didn’t want to. He wanted to lie back down and spend more time with Antoinette. Fuck going back to work. Fuck going out there and dealing with Angela, and getting revenge. Fuck that noise, as Jessy would say. Just let him stay in bed, chat with Antoinette about stories, music, history, politics, maybe invite her ghouls over for some foursomes, and ultimately do nothing productive.

He couldn’t let himself do that. Just like when he was first changed, first became a vampire, it was important he didn’t let himself stop doing things. To sit idle and contemplate was a recipe for depression, and a downward spiral into mourning sadness that’d rip him in half, like it was probably doing to Triss over, and over, and over.

That was probably half the reason Antoinette had put the idea of him in bed with her and Elaine, to keep his mind on something far more appealing. And it was definitely appealing. The idea of him, lying down, while two women with huge breasts buried his dick in four pillows of erotic, heavy softness? It was hard to think of a more juvenile male fantasy, and damn, it was an awesome one.

Groaning at himself for being too damn smart for his own good, he jumped out of bed and started getting dressed. Watching Antoinette get dressed was always a joy, and he made sure to do plenty of that. Black bra that struggled to handle her breasts, black panties that were borderline a thong, gray business skirt, blouse, and suit jacket. Black shoes too, of course. Antoinette did love to wear black.

“So, she’s an elder, like you?” Obviously, from her earlier comment about how long they’d known each other.

“Indeed. She has served the Ordo for many centuries. Unfortunately, as many of us realized far too late, we did not journal our lives with the detail we now wish we did.” Ugh, journaling. “But she had written enough that we know she has, indeed, served our order as long as I have.”

The idea of forgetting their previous lives due to age and torpor, was a scary idea. It gave him a reason to journal things, sure, but it was still damn hard to wrap his mind around that wall. If he hit four or five hundred years of age, would he forget how he felt now, staring at Antoinette and struggling to not jump her, because of how amazing her ass looked as she slid her skirt on over it? Would he forget what it felt like the first time he talked to her, the dangerous dragon sitting in Bloodlust?

Those were things worth writing about, and worth writing about on actual paper. Digital revolutions could mean files might get lost or deleted, but paper was forever, if it got laminated or something, and locked inside a vault. Mental note: when you get back to your apartment, look into a better way to journal things.

“My pets,” she said, “have never seen Elaine. But they know of her, and will undoubtedly wish to partake, lost in the stories of my past that I have shared with them.”

He couldn’t blame them. Just one story about her past, and Jack had a newfound respect for his lover’s immeasurable sex drive and sexual interest.

“Wait, four women, one man? Are you telling me that’s a possibility?”

“Oui.”

He winced as he looked down, buttoning his shirt. “I mean, uh, I’m only one guy. And—”

“I am sure that you will be more than capable of handling it, little Ventrue. Especially if you feed and feed deeply, non?” Laughing, she sat down at her nearby desk, and started making adjustments to her make up. “You are taking your mother to see your apartment today, are you not?”

“Yeah. I think she still has trouble believing that I’m financially well off. I could almost hear her writing desperate cheques in some sort of attempt to help me with money, because she hasn’t heard from me for two years. Gotta help her son, right?” They both chuckled. His mom was adorable. “After that, I thought maybe we’d talk about ... about visiting Mary’s grave, once she’s buried. And her own grave.”

“Ah yes, the sight of one’s own grave will forever be a powerful, final seal, on one’s past.”

He raised a brow. “You’ve seen your grave?”

“If I have, I ... I cannot remember. And it is likely that no such grave exists.”

He frowned as he came up behind her, grabbed a brush, and started going through her hair. “If you’re as old as you think you are, then ... yeah, I guess. Who knows.” The feel of her hair was always pleasant, and he leaned in to smell it a little as he brushed it. It was silly, but hey, if she continued to use shampoo that smelled nice, he could not be blamed for smelling it.

“Be careful, Jack. Your mother may react strongly to such a situation.”

“Do ... you want to come?” He leaned in over her shoulder, set his chin on it, and kissed her ear, watching her reflection in the mirror. “It won’t happen for weeks yet, but when Mom and I do go to see Mary’s grave, and her grave, her sire should be with her, right?”

“That ... is true, my love. I admit, I had thought you would have preferred to perform such a powerful ceremony in private with your mother.”

“It will be in private, with you.” He set the brush aside, kissed her again, whispered, “I love you,” and headed for the door.

“I love you,” she said, smiling at him, before turning to the mirror.

---

He breathed deep as he looked around his apartment. The breathing habit would never die, no matter how useless it was. Within a moment, his body always realized the breath did little, provided no soothing oxygen, no comfort, no energy, no nothing. But, at least scratching his head still provided some of that soothing sensation; permanently even, because it’d be forever buzzed until the end of time.

“You’ll rub your head raw,” his mom said.

He laughed, and stepped aside so she could follow him in. “You know that isn’t true, at least not anymore.”

“I ... I guess that’s true, isn’t it?” As she stepped in and slid out of her new, fluffy white coat Antoinette got her, she dropped her jaw. “This place is so ... expensive!” She still didn’t understand that she too could afford a place like this, being the childe of Antoinette. Hell, she was wearing a very nice suit, charcoal with pants.

“I can afford it. Easily.”

“B-Because of the Prince?” She slipped off her shoes and started walking around, running her fingers along the white walls, black couches, glass table, the steel kitchen appliances, and she looked up the small stairs that led to the small second floor that held the master bedroom. The second floor only took up half the apartment, so the living room had a high ceiling, and an enormous window.

“Nope.” He followed after, waiting for her to stick her nose somewhere he didn’t want her to; which wasn’t really anywhere, he supposed. As long as she didn’t go through his laptop, she was free to poke her nose wherever she wanted. A big change from the past, hiding in his bedroom and considering everything within to be his private property.

The enormous TV sat against the wall over one couch, and his mom laughed as she finally sat down, and motioned to it. “Didn’t you used to say that proper viewing height was blah blah blah lower than this?”

He sat down beside her, on the couch in the center of the living room, and grabbed the remote off the glass table. With a press of a button, the TV began to lower, until it was, indeed, at a proper viewing height, the upper hemisphere of the screen level with the eyes. How anyone could watch a TV not at the correct viewing height, he could never understand.

“Other couch is in the way,” he said, “but I can just slide it out of the way when I need to.” The huge living room had more than enough space.

“Wow.” She blinked at the technological display, before turning her eyes to the blackout curtains that blocked the window. “And, still using those thick curtains? You ... you probably shouldn’t let the sun in, should you?”

He laughed again. This was too cute. He got up and pulled the curtain aside, exposing the lights and tops of the buildings of Dolareido. They were pretty damn high up, and it was the most expensive district in the whole city. People went all out like it was Vegas here. There were glass pools connected to the sides of apartments. Some apartments took up the entire floor of the building they were in. Many of them kept the windows open, as if hoping other people would notice how much money they had. A few others kept them open because they had some blatant exhibitionist kinks. More than a few women enjoyed standing around on their balconies wearing bikinis, or night gowns that were partly open. A few of them, straight up enjoyed fucking on their balconies, or masturbating for what was probably a webcam they had setup nearby. Thankfully none of that was on display tonight. Lucky.

“You—” His phone rang. “Ugh, hold on. Might be my bosses.”

“Ok dear.” With a nod, his mom got up and walked over to the window. Much as she was used to being surrounded by fancy living arrangements and technology, thanks to the Prince, she didn’t spend much time high up in the tower. There was no substitute for seeing a city at night like Dolareido, from up high, regularly.

He pulled out his phone, and grimaced. A message from Damien.

~Jack, I followed up on the statue issue with Vicky and Parker. They insist that they traded with Jacob for them.~

Oh for fuck’s sake. Why, why was it always Jacob?

~What’d they trade with?~ No point in asking why or how Jacob had acquired special artifacts like that; he wouldn’t have told the two entrepreneurs. Fucker probably had millions of dollars stashed away in various bank accounts, that he likely never felt the need to spend. The Circle didn’t care for possessions.

~That Jacob was allowed to move freely through the area, unreported, and use the brothels to keep an eye open for potential targets.~

Targets? What sort of targets did Jacob need? Jack shuddered as he considered, frowning and pacing. Jacob was a sneaky man, who had doubtlessly set up multiple gimmicks and tools in the city for him to acquire the things he'd need, when he wanted them. Crúac was blood magic, and he knew Kindred could use their blood to use it, but apparently, you could get really nasty if you used human sacrifices. And the easiest people to take for sacrifices, were the lowlifes who lived in Devil's Corner.

That was what Beatrice meant, when she came to him, talked to him about being ready to do shit. Sacrificing kine like sheep was something he was sure she'd do, for revenge. And Jacob made it easy for her to acquire shit like that, with how many fingers he had everywhere.

~How'd you get them to tell you?~

~Stabbed Parker, and threatened to use Auspex on Vicky's mind.~

~Auspex can do that?~

~It can. If needed, it can be used to gleam hidden information people are hiding, by emulating their thoughts.~

That ... was a terrifying prospect, especially the word 'emulate'. No wonder elders were so scared of other elder Mekhet; no secret was safe.

~Can you do that?~

~No idea. Maybe.~

Jack laughed, and buried his face in his free hand. Good god, the man had bluffed. It was hard to imagine cold, efficient, reserved Damien bluffing, but if it worked, it worked.

~Thanks for the update. Hope you didn't make an enemy.~

~Vicky and Parker are upset, but I'm confident I can handle them.~

Smirking, Jack put the phone away, and stepped back to join his mother.

"It's a nice place!" she said. "But..." The frown was unmistakable, her annoyed-with-something-silly frown, and she gestured to some of the paintings. The borderline erotic Gothic paintings.

"Hey, I'm just riding the vibe, as the kids say. And I'll have you know, it was your sire's idea that I indulge in a little nude art."

"Nude art ... with skulls?" Sighing, she walked over to one of the paintings, of a woman in a black cloak. The cloak was silk, thin enough that it left nothing to the imagination, and billowing in the wind while also hiding the woman's face. The woman was holding a scythe, and while the hood hid her face, there was a sliver of it showing through, hinting at a skull, rather than skin and flesh.

He laughed. Trying to justify his aesthetic choices to his mother was just one of those conversations every man had to have eventually.

"Yeap. I like them, and so does Antoinette. Your sire is a fashion fanatic, so you know, like, academically. She knows fashion from different ages, different cultures, and different sources." He wasn't about to detail his sexual encounters with Antoinette when she'd dressed up as an evil sorceress, but he was sure the Prince would eventually teach her childe the ways of fashion mastery. She'd probably stick to modern fashion, but Jack wouldn't be surprised if, in a few years, he'd catch his mom wearing a black swan getup at a ball. "Come on, I'll get you a drink and—"

Knock knock.

Oh god damn it. Sighing, he motioned to his cupboards and the fridge for his mom, before checking the peephole on his door. Before he reached the wood, he ground his teeth and prepared for a fight, tightening hands into fists. Someone dangerous was on the other side of that door, someone strong. And it was obvious who that'd be.

Jacob stood there, wearing an immaculate gray suit that looked like it belonged on an Invictus member, expensive and fancy. You needed confidence to pull off a suit like that, and Jacob had it in spades, his big cocky grin on full display. He was wearing a bandage over his eyes, gray and pristine like his suit, and he had a cane in his hand. The fucker probably pretended to be blind on the way here. He had no eyes! He should have been blind. How he managed to see, Jack still had no idea.

Of course the bastard knew Jack was at the door, and he leaned in close to the peephole so Jack could only see his nose, and a hint of his smile.

"Mom, uh ... the leader of the Circle of the Crone is here."

"W-What!?" She threw her hands up and started running them through her hair, in some desperate attempt to fix it; it'd already been done up before she left, and looked great.

Antoinette and him had already warned her about Jacob, and the Circle of the Crone. She was familiar with all the basics of Kindred life, and Dolareido's covenant situation. It was probably a good thing Antoinette had spared her the details of what happened to the Lancea et Sanctum, but that'd probably come up later. For now, her knowledge of the covenants was good enough Jack could trust her to not slip up royally. Hopefully.

“Just ... let me do the talking.” With a groan, he swung open the door, stood up straight, and glared at the man. “Jacob.”

“Clarice! I haven’t seen you in ages.” His jackass smile remained, but when he noticed his mother, he toned it down a little

“I imagine there’s a lot of Kindred you haven’t seen in ages. You spend all your time by yourself.” A frown made the hidden meaning a little more obvious: I know you’re up to something.

“Not true. Beatrice has been learning much from me lately ... May I come in?”

Before Jack could snap a retort, his mother came up behind him, and hit him in the back of the shoulder with a slap.

“I am so sorry, Mister Jacob! I—” She froze for a moment as she looked at the man’s bandaged eyes. “I uh, I thought I raised a more polite boy than this.”

Jack ground his teeth into powder, but after considering slamming the door for a second or two, he stepped back and let the man in.

The bastard walked in, smiled at him, and looked at his mother. “You must be Jack’s mother, Samantha Terry. I’ve heard so much about you!”

“You ... you have?” She raised a brow, blinking, and looking between Jack and the elder.

“Of course! We Kindred all do our best to leave our past behind, but I have heard your name spoken before the terrible incident, Samantha Terry.” Either he was lying, or the man knew more than he should have. Probably the latter. Jacob looked his mom up and down for a moment, a quick glance that Jack only noticed by the slight tilt of his head. Ok, the old man was just taking in his mom, memorizing the look of her. He was most definitely not admiring her physique, nope.

“You know my son? But, you called him Clarice.”

“A joke between old friends.” Grinning like a jackass, Jacob threw his arm around Jack’s shoulders, and give him a half hug that reeked of familiarity the two most definitely did not have. “Your son’s made a lot of waves,” Jacob said as he lowered his arm, “and we’ve run into each other several times. If it weren’t for him, a lot of troubles thrown our way these past couple years would have been far worse.”

Jack’s mom’s face brightened. God damn it. It would have been so much better if she listened to her instincts, and not let herself get too close to Jacob, physically and mentally. The elder was too good at manipulating people, and his mom too oblivious. After this conversation, Jack would have a hell of a time convincing her that she couldn’t trust him. ‘Oh he seemed perfectly fine, Jack! Don’t be so cynical.’ Ugh.

“I’ve ... heard good things about my son, about the work he’s done, since he disappeared two years ago.”

“All true! I assure you. And, I am quite sorry about your daughter, Miss Terry. And you, your sire, Jack. Terrible times. I will do everything I can to help find the perpetrators.” From elated and borderline flirtatious, to sincere and sympathetic in seconds. Not overacting, but not downplaying either, he dripped of genuine honesty as he lamented with them. It was bullshit. Jack did his best to suppress his frown, but there was no stopping him from glaring at the man.

His mother, on the other hand, sighed and nodded, eyes pointing down as she struggled with the words. “It ... it’s...”

“I’m sorry. I shouldn’t have said anything.” Nodding, Jacob held out a hand for Samantha’s. Blinking, she took it, and the mother fucker lifted it, and put a kiss on it. Not a big one, but the gentle sort, a brush of lips on knuckles. Smooth, too smooth. “And I shouldn’t have shown up unannounced.”

Jack’s mom, obviously trying to keep her cool like a fan girl in front of her idol, smiled a big smile at having her knuckles kissed. “It’s ... it’s alright.”

It wasn’t alright. This was his apartment, and his mom was speaking for him. Ugh. Bringing his mom back into his life wasn’t going to be all sunshine and rainbows, he supposed. There’d be some old shit getting in the way, routines they’d both fall into when dealing with each other. Those habits made it difficult to think or act instead of react, and that went double for someone like his mother.

He looked at his mother and studied her for a moment. She was nervous. Who wouldn’t be? Jacob had to be one of the most powerful vampires in the world. Being near him felt like being in the wake of a hurricane, including the difficulty breathing. The Beast in her was trembling in fear, made obvious by the way her fingers fidgeted, and the way her eyes couldn’t look at the Nosferatu for longer than a second.

“If you don’t mind, Miss Terry, I’d like to speak to your son for a moment. Covenant business and what have you.” Naturally, the bastard smiled at Jack’s mother, a big, warm, pleasant smile that looked absolutely perfect. It made Jack want to punch him. Stop flirting with my mother, you asshole.

“Oh! I’m sorry. I’ll, um—”

“Don’t worry,” Jacob said, “we’ll just step outside. I’ll cover us in a discipline, and no one will hear us or see us.” With a nod, Jacob opened the front door again, and waited for him, his cooperation assumed.

Part of him wanted to not cooperate. Part of him knew that, if he really wanted to, fucking really wanted to, he could take Jacob in a fight. Probably. The curse whispered to him in more than words, but sensations and instincts as well. The Beast, with its newly inflated ego and arsenal, no longer looked at Jacob as some ancient, godly entity to be feared. It look at him as a threat, sure, but a competitor, someone it could fight to secure resources.

No, don’t fall to hubris, stupid Ventrue. It’s not you that can take Jacob in a fight, if you even can. It’s the curse, doing its thing to you and your Beast. Remember, the ancient sacrifice your great great grandsire did, to a bunch of shadowy owl things? It’s fucked up, twisted, evil, and horrible and—since when did you believe in the concept of evil? Last I checked, you were a believer of moral relativism, Jack. Good and evil don’t exist, and right and wrong are defined by the times, cultures, socially agreed upon rules, and what have you.

That wasn’t entirely true. He believed in the concepts of caring and resentment, polar opposites that lead to non-zero sums of outcome. If more people cared, the world would be a better, happier place. If more people were resentful, it devolved into destruction with no goal but to cause strife. But those concepts were far cries from larger-than-life, borderline metaphysical concepts like good and evil.

He was a scientist at heart. Everything was about data, facts, logical reasoning, pragmatic conclusions, with no room for bias or fallacies. But, try as he might, the idea of sacrificing a family member for power grated on him in a way he could only describe as evil. Worse, was doing it with Diablerie, something his Beast looked upon with as much fear, and intrigue, as Eve likely did when she ate of the apple in the Garden of Eden.

Heh, if Damien were here, he'd probably be proud of him for the reference.

He nodded, and followed Jacob out. His apartment had a pre-room area where the elevator connected to, since his apartment took up half the floor. It provided a little privacy, but not nearly as much as the blanket of Obfuscation Jacob dropped on them. It tingled, and Jack's dead, pale skin erupted in weird, momentary goosebumps.

"What do you want, Jacob?"

"You have been thrust upon strange circumstances, Jack," the old bastard said, smirking as he looked out one of the small windows in the pre-room. "I can feel it, you know, this curse thing everyone's talking about, now that you've let it out."

"It's not out! It's ... contained. And I knew I couldn't hide it. That's why I didn't try." Jack folded his arms across his chest and glared at him. "Is that why you're here? To talk about the curse?"

"Well honestly, I wanted to see your mother."

That stunned him, and he blinked a few times. "Um, why?"

"The mother of Jack Terry, the kid who's destroyed everything? Of course I'd want to see her."

"I haven't destroyed everything." It came out a growl between clenched teeth, but Jacob just laughed.

"Sure you haven't." Mid laugh, Jacob walked up to his door and put a hand against it. "Whether directly or indirectly, you've upset the balance of everything, more than anyone ever has, in my city. And it all started, with killing Tony and Viktor.”

Jack snarled at the man, and clenched his hands into fists at his side until he felt his fingers stabbing into his palms. “You—”

“And your mother seems sweet. Very sweet. How could someone like you, come from someone like her?”

“Don’t assume you know everything about me, Jacob, and maybe you’ll realize there’s a reason I came from someone like her.”

“Ah, touché. I would be a fool to assume I know everything.” The elder leaned against the wall as he peered out the window in the pre-room, shoulder to the window frame. “What do you know of your curse?”

“Now? You want to talk about this now?”

“Tomorrow night, Beatrice and I will be taking you to my favorite ritual site. She’s told me some, about the curse’s nature, but I need to know more before I let you in.”

Let him in? It really was like some sort of twisted cult.

“You want to know about the Strix.”

It was Jacob’s turn to snarl. “Striges are a menace. They have visited this city once before, and they were ... difficult to remove, at best.”

“What do they want? What do they do?”

The Nosferatu shrugged and gestured to the city before them. “We thought the city, but we were wrong. Their attack was ... strange, and insidious. They instigated violence for its own sake, as far as I can tell. But!” He clapped his hands together. “My concern is not with them, but with you. If this curse is some vestigial remnant of the Strix, I need to know what dangers it poses to me and mine.”

“It’s just an ... amplification, of the Beast, Jacob. All instinct and hunger and rage.”

“Hmm. That lends a hint to the goal of the Strix, when they created the curse, I suppose. Is that all?”

“That’s all.”

“You said that awfully fast.”

Damn it, that was true. The quick denial was often the mark of a liar.

Jack snarled at the man a little louder, and stepped in a little closer. “It’s fine, Jacob. You want to find the hunters, I want to find the hunters, and so does this curse. It wants to do everything it can to find them, and kill them. So just point me in the right direction, and I’ll get them.”

Jacob raised a brow, high enough it was blatant over his eye bandage. “Confident.”

“Yes, I am.”

The old man laughed and pat him on the shoulder. “Very well. Tomorrow, dusk, go to Three Kings Cemetery. And make sure you’re fed.” With that, the bastard nodded, and headed for the elevator. But not before he stuck his head back into the apartment, and waved to his mom. “I’m off, Miss Terry. I do hope to see more of you in the future.”

“Oh!” Samantha said, sitting up with a jolt on Jack’s couch. “Um, yes, I’d like that. Goodbye, Mister Jacob.”

Jack frowned around Jacob's shoulder. There should have been fear and some nervousness on his mom's face, not intrigue. But that was definitely her intrigued face.

---

---

~~Natasha~~

“W-We're going to ... what?”

Matt chuckled, and grinned at her over his shoulder. “Take you into the Hisil.”

She stared at his large back, and Art's too, processing the words the werewolf had just said. Visiting the Hisil, what the Uratha called the Shadow Realm, had been one of her secondary goals for a while now. Dealing with the hunters was still her primary goal, but no one had found any signs of them since the night Jack had captured Sándor. The Invictus and the Carthians were sweeping the city almost constantly now, and had expanded the groups to include any Kindred over five years old.

It was one of the great things about Dolareido, now that the Lancea et Sanctum had been removed. The Invictus and Carthians got along well enough that they could trust each other to work together in removing the hunter threat. Mostly. Maria and Michael would never expose their backs to Garry, and vice versa, but exposing all their underlings' backs was a step in the right direction, a display of trust. As long as no one took advantage and stabbed an exposed back, everything would go smoother.

She walked along the sidewalk with her two boyfriends, slightly behind but mostly between. They were a nice wall between her and the oncoming traffic of bodies; not that she needed a shield, easy as it was to step around the tide of limbs, but it was a fun change to have a couple of bodyguards keeping everyone out of her path. And this deep in South Side, in the center toward the business district, there was no danger of hunters. She was free to relax, and think about what they just said.

“You mean ... n-now? I thought maybe you were t-t-taking me to see Avery, so we could ... p-plan for the future? B-B-But, we’re going ... now?”

“Yeap,” Art said. “Avery’s preparing a crossing tonight, and we’re taking Eric with us.”

“Oh! I w-wonder how he’ll respond.”

“So do we.”

Blinking, she looked down at herself. Jeans and a white sweater, along with some sneakers. It was most definitely not Ordo Dracul clothes, or Invictus clothes. She looked like a Carthian. Considering where Avery and her pack slept, it was potentially a dangerous thing for her to dress up like one of the Carthians; could stir a fight. But, she had to admit, if she was going into a new, dangerous realm, something as casual as jeans and a shirt was decent attire. It didn’t make it easy to hide her silver sword or her pistol though, and she had to strap them to the small of her back so the sweater hid them.

Her boys knew she carried silver. All the werewolves knew at this point, that all Kindred carried some degree of silver with them. The bane of werewolves. Spirits had banes too, and if she was going to run into them, figuring out what those banes were would be an essential skill. But then, the Uratha would probably be doing some sort of tour guide situation, and not letting her or Eric get into any real trouble.

Or maybe, they’d get into a lot of trouble? It was hard to tell with someone like Avery. Her — and Garry — were just as likely to throw someone into the deep end to see if they could swim, as they were to slowly ease someone in. Hard to judge.

“I ... I think I ... w-would have brought more guns, if I had known,” she said. “I thought m-maybe, at the worst, you were j-just going t-t-to show me some ... dangerous spirits or something.”

“We are,” they said in unison.

“B-But I thought you were going t-to ... summon them, into a protected circle ... or...” Like she did with Antoinette. A controlled experiment, with clear and obvious barriers to keep her safe from whatever crazy things existed on the other side of the wall.

“Summoning spirits?” Matt said, blinking over his shoulder at her. “It’s not exactly a common thing to do, summoning spirits. Not like you hear about humans getting summoned to their side of the Gauntlet.”

The other man laughed. “Well...” Shrugging, Art took a corner, guiding them further out from the center of the city, and towards the Carthian half of South Side. “I mean, there are disturbing stories out there, about people disappearing into portals and shit. Lovecraft wrote books about shit like that.”

She froze, and blinked at their backs as they walked on. Lovecraft’s stories about alien creatures that existed on planes above human understanding, were just stories, right? No, of course they weren’t just stories! After seeing things like Black Blood, she had to assume that god monsters as old as time itself existed. Warring alien creatures that lived in higher dimensions probably existed too. Scary things that lived on human souls or something, and beckoned them through portals and whatnot, also probably existed.

Suddenly, she wasn’t feeling so excited about this opportunity to see the other side.

She jogged to catch up to the boys, and fell in between them. “Is Avery really okay w-with this?” It wasn’t exactly unknown that Avery wasn't keen on letting other people in on the secrets of the Uratha. Everything involving spirits, their pack leader wanted to keep out of the vampires' hands. But some months of working together and learning to trust each other must have opened Avery's heart to a little cooperation. A little. A tiny itty bitty little.

"I'd be lying," Art said, "if I said it was her idea. Matt and I pushed for this. We know you well, and in the spirit of getting along, we want to show you the sort of stuff we deal with. You're the only vamp who gets to."

She beamed. The boys knew her too well at this point, how to manipulate her. Make her feel like the special kid in class, and she could be molded like wet clay; and she was fine with that!

"Is it okay if I t-tell the Prince things? I w-work for her, and you know she's ... interested, in these s-sorts of things."

Matt laughed and nodded. "We wouldn't bring you if you couldn't tell your boss about what you see. Not that you'll be able to learn anything dangerous from us, like, how to do anything. We're Uratha, you know? It's all a part of us, not something we do with symbols and rituals."

That did pose a problem for her and the Prince. The werewolves were strange creatures, half flesh, and half spirit, according to Matt and Art. Dealing with spirits, hunting them, or hunting other things that involved themselves in affairs that affected what the Uratha called 'balance', was innate to them. It wasn't written in a book, or drawn on a mural. It was the instinct of a living creature in tune with the environment it lived in.

Kindred didn't work like that. Kindred were the shadows of kine. The werewolves might know how to find North without seeing the stars, or know if an area had a predator nearby by sniffing the rocks, but they didn't know the ebb and flow of humanity. They didn't have an instinct for the human race, for reading kine and guessing their motivations, their weaknesses, or their habits. They didn't know how to walk into a crowd, and know what the humans were doing. They knew what the prey would do, where the weaklings were and the strong were, and they knew how they could herd them or chase them. But they didn't know about the smartphones and which humans were most hypnotized. They didn't know, at a glance, which humans were looking to fuck in a dark corner, or which humans were blazed out of their minds. They didn't know which humans were lovesick, or which were flaunting cleavage in a desperate need to get laid.

Werewolves knew how to hunt, wolves stalking sheep. Vampires knew how to become sheep, like wolves in sheep's clothing.

All of that skill, that innate and natural ability of a vampire to exist among humans, the ability to manipulate and control them, none of that helped at all when presented with unknown circumstances like this. The wolves knew how to hunt among the spirits, and she did not. The best she could do was follow them and stay out of the way; and mentally record everything she could. The more knowledge, the better.

“How's Jessy?” Art said.

“Huh? Um, she's f-fine. Why?”

“Avery wanted to know. Word is she's still fucking Eric when he's transformed, and that puts us all on edge.”

“R-Right.” She shivered at the thought. Uratha when transformed into their war form, were utterly massive, and titans of muscle. Assuming their ... penises, were proportional, it meant Jessy was penetrated by something far too large, regularly. The thought was appealing, though, Jessy underneath a giant beast's body, wriggling and squirming as he mounted and had sex with her. And it was what Eric was doing, from the stories Jessy absolutely insisted on telling her.

Of course, Avery wasn't worried about the proportional mismatch. She was worried about a Gauru, a killing machine riding the edge of a berserk rage, going nuts in the city and drawing the attention of kine, media, and more hunters. Much as the werewolves didn't have a Danse Macabre law, that didn't mean they didn't try and keep their existence a secret.

Natasha shook her head as she considered. "She, um, insists Eric is in control w-w-when they, you know. And, um, if she's r-right, that's s-s-sort of like, training, isn't it?"

"Dangerous training," Art said. "One fuck up and people will die. But Caleb seems to think Eric's fine. Only lost his cool when shit really hit the fan."

Matt shook his head. "Still worried. It's a recipe for a problem."

Her gentle giant, Matthew, was not so gentle when transformed. The man became a raging beast concerned only with violence and destruction when he let out the war form; it probably bothered him. He was always so ice, and tender, but when the wolf came out, the two-legged dangerous one, he seemed to be the most violent of his clan. It must have had something to do with his past, from losing his family when he was young.

And Art, sneaky, witty Art, was always at his side, keeping him from snapping. It must have been quite the story, when they met in Tijuana, and Art joined their pack. What sort of crazy, wacky adventures had these two gone on together over the years, to become as close as they did now? If she got closer to the rest of the pack, maybe she could ask them.

It was a pleasing image, Art and Matt, side by side, covered in cuts and bruises as they fought against the vampires of Tijuana, and deadly spirits. It sent butterflies into her belly as she looked between them. They were so connected, two best friends who'd been with each other day and night for many years. And they were all hers.

Her wandering thoughts had slowed her down. She stepped up to join the two of them again, between them, and smiled up at them. This was her chance to get to know her boyfriends on a personal level, more personal than the stories they told. It was like meeting the parents.

It ... it was like meeting the parents! Oh god, oh god oh god. She hadn't thought of it like that before! Oh no. She squirmed in her shoes as she walked, and her eyes fell to the sidewalk as she tried to wrap her mind around the implications. Soon, she'd be meeting the parents, the family, the brothers and sisters and cousins, in their own home. It was practically like she was visiting for dinner. Maybe that was why they suggested jeans? The Uratha didn't care for suits.

They took her into the apartment she knew Avery and the pack were staying at, save for Clara and Carter, who were staying in Eric's building. Would they be coming?

They guided her into one of the old, dirty apartments, and Natasha blinked as she stepped through the door. Clara was there, and so was Carter, and Avery. And Caleb, and Noah. David, Mason, and a bunch of other wolves she wasn't sure she could remember the name of. Brianna, Erica, and Monica, she thought, and a couple more. All of them.

"Heya," Clara said.

Natasha slowly raised a hand, and offered a small wave. "H-Hi."

"See Eric?" Avery said.

Art and Matt shook their heads.

The pack leader groaned, and started pacing around. “I’m giving that asshole fifteen minutes.”

Now that Tash thought about it, pack leader might not have been the correct way to look at it. As far as she knew, recent studies into wolf behavior suggested they didn’t follow a leader, so much as they were a family, and while a member of the family often took charge, they weren’t a leader in any absolute or military sense. So Avery was more like, the mother of the pack, sort of, maybe. She dared not ask.

So, they waited. Waiting was uncomfortable. The wolves started chatting, and Art and Matt tried to draw her into conversations with the other wolves as they talked about Dolareido, but try as she might, she couldn’t find words. Talking with strangers was difficult enough. Talking with strangers, when surrounded by them, in a small apartment, was Hell. She could feel her skin crawl as she looked around. Every wall, every seat, every corner had a werewolf standing against or sitting on it, and her brain screamed at her to get out to where there were less people.

Before she could find the courage to move from her spot by the door — either deeper in or out of the apartment, she wasn’t sure — a knock at the door ten minutes later announced Eric’s arrival, and Art opened the door for him with a smirk. Like Natasha, he was dressed in casual clothes, jeans and a t-shirt, and Tash could tell he didn’t have any weapons hidden on his body; wearing a tight t-shirt could do that.

“You shave that head every morning?” Avery said, snorting as she stood up from the couch.

Eric raised a brow as he looked to her, and the rest of the crew. “Something against hygiene among wolves?”

Art laughed. He didn’t do much for his hair, but he shaved clean. A lot of the other wolves had gruff on their face, long hair like Art and Matt, and otherwise looked like they’d feel perfectly at home living in the woods with only a knife and a mirror for any sort of grooming.

“Avery’s not a fan of city folk,” Clara said, shrugging. “Makes for soft people.”

Natasha kept her mouth shut. City people were definitely different than people who lived in the country or woods, but soft wasn’t the right word. And when it came to Kindred, living in a city was often more difficult. Fellow predators fought you for resources, and there were far more ways to be sneaky, to manipulate, and back stab. In a city, you had to be intelligent and ruthless to deal with your competition, in a way no other environment could mirror. It was an environment Kindred loved, hard as it was, with all the dark alleys and ways to control kine. The Danse Macabre thrived on cities.

But werewolves? Something told her they’d prefer to live in rural environments, where they could let their woflish instincts go wild. Maybe, seeing Eric survive just fine in a city, even going so far as to have sex while transformed, bothered Avery? Envy? Probably not. Irritation that her previous conclusions may have been incorrect? Probably so.

Eric shrugged and ran a finger along his head and dark skin. “Ladies seem to like it.”

Tash nodded, and froze when Avery snapped her a glare. Well, it was true, she thought. Black men looked nice with shaved heads, especially when they wore suits. Eric wasn’t in his usual work suit, but still.

“Here are the rules of this trip,” Avery said, glaring at the two of them more. “Stay quiet, and stay out of the way, Vola. I’ve agreed to this because you vamps have played nice with us, and I know you dragons are obsessed with getting your hands on any information you can.”

Yeap, that was true. Even before she was a dragon, information was sweet candy, to be savored with the utmost bias. The chance to see the spirit world, the Shadow Realm, and see with her own eyes the crazy things Jack had spoken of? Even better, it was an opportunity to see the world where the creatures Antoinette had summoned came from, creatures like Safe, or that weird eyeball squid thing that liked secrets.

The squid spirit. It'd said Maria was up to something. Maybe she could learn something about that while in the spirit world too, as long as she didn't earn Avery's ire in the process.

"I w-will."

"Good. Eric, we're hunting for an Azlu."

Tash petrified in place, and blinked at the woman several times, before looking to her boyfriends. A moment's wisdom told her to keep her mouth shut, and she did.

"Azlu?" Eric said. He said it like a question, but there was a glint in his eye. Information was rolling around in his head, and Tash raised a brow as she watched him.

"One of the Hosts. These monsters wreak havoc on the balance, and Azlu in particular, sew threads, weaving their webs in the Gauntlet until there's no flow between the two sides at all. That causes problems."

He raised a brow. "We're going into the Hisil to do that?"

Avery nodded. "We're looking for the signs they leave behind. They'll probably be hiding in Gurihal, but we can find areas where there's ... emptiness, you could say. We can find it better in the Hisil, and it'll give us a clue."

Natasha tapped a finger on her chin. If the Hisil world was a sort of reflection of the material world Gurihal, and some sort of barrier came up between them, then it did stand to reason that the Hisil would be affected. She assumed it'd lead to death, like a river suddenly drying up would for the area, but spirits didn't work like biological entities. Emptiness made more sense.

What would happen to the material world in that area? Would it dry up like her original idea, or would people and animals simply leave the area? Would it become still? That was hard to imagine. Graveyards had a certain energy to them even kine were aware of, and so did majestic geography like the Grand Canyon. They were still, but not 'still' still. What would a place devoid of a connection to the spirit world be like, then?

She wanted to ask about all of it, so badly. What was ephemera and how did it work? What was essence? How did Antoinette's strange machinery manage to create, or at least emulate it? How were the physical and spirit world connected, and why? Why was there a wall between them? But the questions could wait until she was alone with Art and Matt, and even then, she got the impression they wouldn't tell her. They hadn't before.

She squeaked as half a dozen of the werewolves began to change. They fell onto their hands, and fur emerged from their bodies, pouring out through their pores and overtaking their clothes, until the fabric vanished beneath their leathery hide. Wolves, enormous and terrifying replaced them, each nearly twice as long as a normal wolf, and thus nearly twice as wide and tall. No one would mistake them for regular wolves. More like, Gmork from The Neverending Story.

She knew the Uratha had five forms: wolf, big wolf, big scary werewolf, beastly man, and man. She'd had sex with Art and Matt once, when they transformed into their beast-man bodies, and that'd been quite a treat. They'd been almost too much to take, but the night had been very satisfying. And Jessy was having sex with one in their full werewolf form. Did they ever have sex in their wolf forms? She knew Jessy could become one, and all the Uratha could, and—that is a strange line of thinking you should probably not go down, Tash.

Avery remained in her human form, as did Clara, Art, and Matt.

“W-Why, um—”

Rolling her eyes, Avery cut her off with a wave of her hand. “Faster, and better noses.”

“Oh, right.” Nodding, she looked up at Art and Matt and—and she squeaked! A white light cut through the air in front of them, as if someone had sliced through it with a sword that could pierce reality. Strange that her mind went to ‘magical sword’ first, but there was no denying the comparison. It really did look as if someone had cut through the air in the center of the shitty apartment’s living room, and had left a tear in the air and whatever else permeated space.

Art took her left hand, Matt took her right, and they walked her toward the light. And she almost screamed. Half because she was about to enter another dimension, again, and that was scary. Half because she wanted to ask a bazillion questions before she did. No one had done anything to create the portal, as far as she could tell. No one waved a wand or slashed a sword, or did anything that drew her eyes. Avery was touching a necklace she had, rubbing it with her thumb, but that hardly seemed like enough to open a portal to another dimension! Antoinette had been working on this for years, decades, maybe centuries, and these werewolves did it as easily as a breathing.

No wonder the Prince and Jacob were so frustrated with them. Both elders had answers they wanted, and both figured they could gain some of them by piercing the Gauntlet on their own terms, and enter the spirit world. Jacob had Black Blood to aid him, and Antoinette had her tools. Both were a pale comparison to what these Uratha could do.

She couldn't feel Art and Matt's hands anymore. When she tried to squeeze her hand, they wouldn't close, indicating the two men's hands were still held between her fingers, at least. The Gauntlet didn't want her to feel, or do anything, apparently; or maybe that was how the Uratha passed through it. She could kind of feel something underneath her, as if she could walk on it, and she was sort of walking, but it was like walking on cloud. Her eyes showed her some depth in the endless white, hinting that it was more than a white sheet burned into her retinas. It was a place, a thing, somewhere she could walk and move around in, even if she couldn't hear or feel or see well.

How many old stories were there, about people walking dangerous paths, and always told the same: don't stray from the path? In newer stories, straying from the path was how you found adventures, and how you grew as a person. In the old tales, Brothers Grimm and before, straying from the path was how you got eaten. She was no fool, and not ignorant of survivor bias. Now was the perfect time to hold onto her boyfriends' hands, and just move the way they moved.

And then, they were back in Dolareido. She blinked and looked around, trying to understand what had just happened. Dolareido? Dolareido. They were in an apartment too. In fact, they were in the apartment Avery considered home, or her den or whatever, and as far as Natasha could tell, it was perfectly normal Dolareido.

She looked around. There was Matt and Art, and Avery and Clara, and the others, many of them still in their giant wolf bodies, all in the apartment with her. This didn't make any sense. If they were in the Hisil now, shouldn't it have been different?

As the silence filled the room, she wiggled her ears a couple times, and looked around. It was quieter, though, in the Hisil. She could hear the breathing of the werewolves, but other than that, it was basically dead silent. That couldn't be right. They were in South Side, and even this far from central, there should still be noise. It was a densely populated city, and while the Carthian half of South Side didn't have the bustling traffic or streetlight of the Invictus half, it still had hundreds of thousands of people. There should have been some noise, like a group of people walking down the street, or a car alarm going off.

Nothing.

“Stay close,” Avery said. “And don't touch anything unless you're ok with it biting your hand off.”

It? Biting? Tash raised a brow, and looked around at the things around her. They did look different, if only slightly. The couch lacked some of the texture detail. The floor and its dirty carpet didn't have stains anymore, but were slightly warped and dirty all over, like a gradient. And the windows showed water dripping down the glass. Except, it wasn't raining.

Avery went out first, opening the door and motioning for everyone to follow. That gave Tash pause for a moment, before she followed after the boys. She almost screamed again as, from across the hall, one of the doors opened an eye. The door itself didn't open, but the cheap white paint was hiding an eye, and the big eye opened to look at the wolves and her. Jack mentioned things like this, but she'd had a hard time believing him, assuming he must have been exaggerating when he said the doors literally looked at him.

It only got weirder when she got outside. The sky didn't look like Dolareido's sky. Weird colors streaked across it, the same sort of colors you might find on the signs above bars and casinos. Black shadows, subtle blobby things moved along the base of buildings.

The streetlights were bent in strange ways. The moon faded in and out like a slow heartbeat. A few of those strange squid things Antoinette had summoned floated by. The windows weren't see-through, not from this side, as if they were one-way, and solid black.

Once the strange details became obvious, it was almost overwhelming. She might as well have been on an alien planet!

Every fiber of her being wanted to pull out her phone and start recording, but she knew Avery wouldn't let her. If she ever wanted to come back here again, she had to play by her rules, and focus on being a quiet bystander who only watched.

She looked over at Eric. While Natasha was doing her best to be invisible, Eric's eyes were wide with wonder as he looked and walked around. The man breathed deep, taking in the sights and smells of the spirit world like it was a magical place; which it was, of course, but for Eric, it was almost as if seeing his hometown again, after being away for decades.

Natasha outright squealed, when a giant wave of water splashed around a distant street corner, and started to come their way. She dug in the balls of her feet, ready to run, but no one else moved, and she forced herself to calm down. Ok, incoming tidal wave in the middle of the street was apparently a common occurrence for the Uratha.

"Calm down," Clara said, chuckling. "If you need to react, we'll let you know."

"Easier f-for you t-t-to say!" It was hard enough to not run away from an oncoming tidal wave in the middle of a street; a street she only just now noticed was completely void of any kine. It was even harder to hold still, as the wave not only grew closer, but grew higher.

The water was pristine, and it shimmered in the light of the stars and moon above, when it really shouldn't have, considering the stars were usually invisible in Dolareido, washed out by the city light. The waves were beautiful, and scary as it was to see a giant wave coming at her, Tash had to admit it was a dazzling sight.

It grew doubly beautiful, when a feminine figure emerged from the water. It had no arms, and instead of legs, the flowing waves beneath it connected at the hip. White wings emerged from the waves, jutting from the spirit's back, like an angel. Mist flowed out from where arms should have been, gorgeous and glittering.

Natasha put her hands to her mouth, and gasped, staring, trying to wrap her mind around the beauty before her. "She's ... it's..."

"This is our pack's totem. Flowing Sanctuary," Avery said, joining the spirit on the sidewalk.

Totem? She'd heard the boys talk about that, but she hadn't really mentally pictured what a totem would be like. There were a lot of similarities between the Uratha, and the beliefs of the Native Americans that lived on the land long before the Colonials came. Flowing Sanctuary could have easily been one of the spirits such people paid respect to. A spirit of the river, maybe? It had something to do with water. But its name suggested more. A spirit of protection?

"H-Hi!" she said at last.

Everyone looked at her, raising eyebrows, before they laughed. Laughing was better than anger, considering she was supposed to stay quiet. And besides, there was no way she could not at least greet something that looked like a literal goddess.

"Hello Kindred," the spirit said. The voice was powerful, with none of the softness Natasha expected of something so sparkly and beautiful. It didn't have a mouth either, face lacking details, with only the subtle shapes of nose and jaw and eyes carved into the flowing water. “And this new Uratha is Eric, I assume?”

“Yes,” Eric said, looking the water waves up and down. Flowing Sanctuary was tall, and most of her mass of water swirled underneath her. But it wasn’t the same amount of water she used to get to where they were. Maybe she should create more water as she moved around, or something? Of course, that made no sense from a physics standpoint, but she doubted anything here did.

“Come on,” Avery said. “This is half about looking for any spots we think the Azlu could be fucking up. Half, to get Eric used to the Hisil. If we’re going to stay in Dolareido, least we can do is help our city expert with hunting in the city’s shadow.”

Eric raised a brow. “Expert?”

“You know the city better than any of us. For a lot of us, Tijuana is the closest comparison, and it’s not a good one.”

“... oh.” He blinked at Avery several times, and the spirit several times more, before nodding.

---

---

~~Eric~~

Light bulb moment. He eyed Avery closely, and looked to Natasha for a moment before back to the pack leader. That was dangerously close to an admission of ignorance, and that she’d need him to help her with hunting in Dolareido. He knew she’d suck at dealing with Dolareido, from her attitude, and how the Kindred were so wary of them. But to actually hear the arrogant woman say that he knew more than her, was a surprise.

Avery didn’t like asking for help, that was obvious. She was used to being in charge. It wasn’t like she hadn’t earned the role, from what he’d seen from her. The pack respected her, trusted her. So maybe it was a respect thing, a face thing, a culture thing. Or maybe it was just like how guys didn't like asking for directions, she didn't like asking for aid.

Avery came up to him and gestured down the street. "We think the Azlu is somewhere in the sewers, same as last time. We have to be careful, exploring, hunting, because the Azlu weave their webs thick in the Gauntlet. If shit hits the fan, we can't jump back to the material world; not that we can do that easily in a fight, anyway." With a snort, she nodded her head toward Art. "At least, most of us can't."

Art smiled, and winked down at Tash. "Irakka got skills," he said, in that silly rapper show-off accent. It was corny as hell, but in typical girlfriend fashion, Natasha squeaked a chuckle.

It surprised him, that she was not only maintaining a relationship with two guys at once, but she seemed happy and delighted with it. Matt and Art must have jived on a friendship level Eric had never seen, for the two of them to be happy with one girl between them. Then again, they both had her at the same time, according to Jessy, so it wasn't like they had her on a timeshare setup.

Those two huge guys with tiny her. No wonder Jessy wanted video evidence.

"So ... what's the plan?" Eric said, shrugging. "Cause, I got no clue on how to fight a spider monster."

"We're not fighting it, not tonight," Clara said. "We need fire to kill it. Avery can use some fire gifts, but it's not really enough to stop an Azlu, especially once it splits apart and scurries."

"Splits apart ... and scurries." Something in his brain told him this was, indeed, what Azlu did. He couldn't wrap his mind around a creature just splitting itself into smaller parts, but hey, he was in a spirit world. Crazy was the name of the game.

Clara nodded, and started walking down the street. “If we have to fight it, we will. We got the pack, and you, and even a vampire. Should be enough to fight it, if we’re forced into the situation. But we’re not hunting to kill, tonight. We’re hunting for information.”

Sighing, he followed after her, grabbed one of his shoulders, and started rotating it, like he was preparing for a fight. A lot of ‘ifs’ in her statements, which, in his experience, meant shit was going to go down. In the past, that meant arguments with the fuck heads that set up fights in the ring. Here, it probably meant people getting sucked into life threatening situations.

But, honestly, he was itching for an opportunity to let the wolf out, and rip something apart. Much as letting out his sexual hunger through the wolf with Jessy was satisfying and fulfilling, he could feel the need in him for the hunt, for violence, for the feel of flesh — animal or spirit — giving way to his fangs. And maybe tonight, he could let a little of that out. Maybe.

Chapter 97

~~Damien~~

A night off, finally. Maria had demanded he take it, after learning of his rather brash encounter with Parker and Vicky. Matt had said his pack were going on a trip and wanted their enforcer along, as well. He didn't like being put off the hunt for a night, when hunters were out there, hiding, sneaking, and planning to kill them all. But he couldn't deny that working nearly every hour of the night, every night, for several weeks, had been taxing.

Best of all, he could spend some time with Fiona.

“Mah apartment!” She swung the door open, and bounced several times as she hopped in, before turning around and grinning at him.

He followed her in, looking around and taking in the sights. It was, to his surprise, utterly normal. Fiona was anything but a normal girl, from her bouncy, cheerful attitude that could not be smothered, no matter how dire things got, to the fact she was also a literal monster. The apartment reflected none of that. No, that wasn't true. As his brain analyzed, it became clear the apartment was, in fact, very cheerful.

It was a studio apartment, so it didn't take long to take in everything. It was a cheap apartment, cheap building, on the edge of South Side near the Carthian district, and Damien found himself smiling as he looked at it. He was so used to the extravagances of the Invictus, and the eccentricities of old vampires like Maria, that he'd almost forgotten most people lived in simple, small apartments, in buildings that barely remained standing. He could almost hear the cockroaches he assumed hid in the walls.

She was messy. Well, maybe messy wasn't the right word; a splattering of random objects on the floor, slippers, a plush toy, a pair of jeans and some socks, wasn't exactly a mess. But her tastes were quirky and eclectic, that was for sure. On the windowsill, she had a couple potted cacti. On the walls, she had several posters of what he could only imagine were K-pop bands; supposedly considered music by the uneducated, to Maria's chagrin. She had a desk in the corner, a small thing of wood, slightly warped with age, and a laptop sat upon it, with pink and blue stickers decorating its white casing. Her bed was a double, with pink sheets and bright blue pillows that reminded him of cotton candy. Several stuffed animals sat on the bed, most of them rabbits with big, child-like black eyes, and long floppy ears.

Maybe that's why she liked bouncing around everywhere? Rabbit envy.

He took off his shoes, set them aside, and couldn't help but laugh when he met her eyes. Sometime, during his analysis, her smile had become a frown, but it was too adorable to not chuckle at.

"Hey! I'm just a young woman trying to survive in a town, living off the wee bits of money I get from my meals. Dinnae make fun of my apartment! Ye wanker!"

He held up his hands in surrender. "I lived in literal holes for fifty years, Fiona. This place looks great to me. Looks like a home."

"It does!" She threw herself onto the bed, and tossed her leather jacket onto the floor. Naturally, he picked it up and hung in the closet by the front door. There was a winter coat inside, along with a rain coat, and different shoes. A lot of different shoes, maybe nine. He was very tempted to tease her about that.

She was in jeans and a white t-shirt, one that hugged her large breasts in a way he couldn't help but notice. Maybe she was wearing one a little smaller than she should have, so he'd notice she was wearing a white bra, one that made everything look so ... bouncy. She was also wearing white socks with little rabbits drawn on them.

“If you wanted, I could set you up with a more expensive place.”

“Ye can?”

“Yeah. Invictus pay well.” He was making six figures, and it was money he didn’t need. Maria considered it a standard pay for someone who put their lives on the line for the Invictus, while also being at the forefront of assaults as a Right Hand, and attempting to revive the Lancea et Sanctum. Perhaps he could put the money toward reviving the Second Estate, but how to do that was the bigger question in that regard.

“Maybe when I’m older. But, living in a nook like this is part of growing up, ye ken?”

Laughing again, he walked over to her and sat on the edge of her bed. “I suppose that’s true.”

“Besides, I like it.”

“I do too.”

She giggled, reached out, and started pulling his trench coat off his shoulders. “Are ye nae hot?”

He helped her, doing his best to ignore the butterflies in his withered stomach at the feel of a woman removing his jacket. Such a simple touch that elicited such a strong response.

“Vampire. Body heat not really a thing.”

“Like a lizard?”

“Sort of. More like, being cold or hot doesn’t really mean anything to me.” Sweltering heat, freezing cold, as long as it wasn’t literally hot or cold enough to damage tissue, it didn't affect vampires.

“Oh. Azamel says ye Kindred are a distant cousin to us Begotten. The same, but different. The Horrors inside ye, ye call them Beasts, affect ye in a different way than us. Ye ken?”

That was an interesting theory. “A better question for the Ordo Dracul, I suppose.”

“But, I thought ye were religious? Like, religious for vampires? Do ye nae have an idea of where ya came from?”

“We do, but for vampires and humans. The Testament of Longinus says little about other paranormals.”

“Are ye nae curious?”

He nodded, took his coat from her, and hung it up in her closet. A sideways glance showed her bathroom door was open, and he could see the curtain of her shower; it was clear, with bright yellow flowers on it.

“I guess. Maybe a little. I try and let faith guide me, when I can, when it comes to questions larger than life.”

“Oh?”

“Mhmm. There are questions out there we can't answer, and while I'll try and keep an open mind to potential explanations”—against Lucas's judgment—“I cannot deny there exists something beyond science.” He gestured to her, and him. Paranormals, magic, spirits and other dimensions, much of it existed outside the purview of science as far as he could tell. “God, or something equivalent, seems a possibility, and a decent one, does he not?”

She thought about that for a moment, tapping a finger on her chin. “As long as God isnae an old man sitting in a chair, judging people for wankin' all the time.”

He choked on a laugh. Oh dear Lord.

“I suppose many Christians believe God is male, with a penis and a white beard, casting judgment for ultimately inconsequential actions and intentions. Lucas was such a vampire.” He came to the bed and sat down, undoing the buttons of his suit jacket as he did. Fiona was quick to shift over to him, take the jacket, and set it on the back of her desk chair. “I’m trying to be a little more open minded than he was.”

“Probably a smart idea.” Giggling, she crawled up behind him, hugged him snug and tight, and set her chin on his shoulder. “Mah parents dragged me to church every now and again, but I dinnae think they really believed it. Think they just wanted to teach me some morals.”

“They failed.”

The beautiful monster erupted into more giggles, and hugged him harder. “I’m a bad lass.”

“No denying that.”

“I should be punished.” She kissed his neck, hugging him tighter, and giggled yet again. She was excited.

“I ... I have trouble believing this is real.”

“Wha?”

“All the Kindred I know, get into relationships in bizarre ways, dramatic ways. They don’t start dating because they just happen to like each other, get along and are attracted to each other.”

“Oh! Drama! I see what ye need, now.” She got up and stomped around a few times, feet hitting her carpet with enough weight to go thud thud. “The world is going to end tomorrow, Damien! We ... we only have tonight. And I cannae die knowing that—”

He reached out, took her hand, and yanked her back onto the bed. With a squeal, she threw her arms around him, and the two of them landed on their sides, facing each other.

“Point made. Drama is dumb.”

“Oh I dinnae know about that. It’s fun, especially for a young lass like me.” Lying there, opposite from him and facing him, she leaned in closer and set a kiss on his chin. “And besides, I think there’s some drama.”

He raised a brow. “Is there?”

“Mhmm. I am just a wee lass, drawn in by the emo vampire.”

Ok, that made him laugh. “Two weeks ago, you tied me up in a giant spider’s web.”

“That was nae me! That was Vrall.”

“You are Vrall.”

Her smile broke for a moment, and she nodded. “Aye.” Sighing, she sat up, and he did along with her, only for her to sneak in behind him again, and start hugging him from behind once more.

“You ... don’t like being Vrall?”

“It’s nae about liking. She and I are the same, but ... like with yer Beast, do ye not sometimes wish yer own feelings were nae so ... fucked with?”

Oh. That. The call of the Beast and its hungers were instinct, a part of him, and after having dealt with them for so long, he barely noticed them anymore. “I suppose it’s a little easier for me to ignore it. It can’t talk to me. Assuming Vrall talks to you?”

“Well, Vrall cannae really talk to me. She is me. I have her memories, and her personality emerges when I’m in mah nightmare.” She hugged him tighter, pressing her body to his back as she squeezed. “I think that’s drama enough. Anymore and it’d be like one of my shows.”

Ah yes, the eternal sin of women everywhere: bad television. He looked over at her laptop, and smiled at the cute animals that danced across it as her screensaver. Undoubtedly, she watched Netflix and whatnot on it, and indulged other wastes of time on the internet. He envied her.

That wasn’t true. Her hungers were far worse than this own, and the dark side of her was a far greater presence than his Beast. And that, put her silly, terribly cute but juvenile home into perspective. He looked around, tilting his head at the pictures on the walls, at the obvious obsession with cute animals and cute musicians she had, and contrasted it against the nightmare horror that lurked inside her. She’d said that, when she was younger, she was haunted by nightmares every night, and that they were always about her being pursued by a creature in the dark, a creature with eight legs.

He turned his head and studied her bubbly smile. For so long, she must have been a fun, simple young girl, who did everything in her power to not let her strange nightmares ruin her. Tragic, he supposed. It must have been horrifying, to be stalked by a creature in her dreams, especially when her life gave no reason for it.

He slid out of her hug, and stepped up to one of the posters.

“Damien?”

“Sorry, just...” It was another cute creature, a ferret, pouncing on a cat, who was delighted to be play fighting. Not a photograph, but something drawn in a cutesy, silly cartoon style.

They’d both had rough lives, and she’d embraced everything fun, silly, bright, and cute she could get her hands on, to keep it from tainting who she was. Considering how powerful a force her horror was, it was a wonder she managed to do that. Most people, him included, would have let it destroy who they were, until they devolved into self-loathing. Moping, brooding, the things he’d done for so many decades.

“Do ye like that one?” she said, eyebrow raised.

He laughed as he smiled at her. “Not for me, no. I like that you like it.” He liked that, unlike him, she had a tenacity to her, a desire to hold onto who she was and what she liked. He’d been a malleable fool when he was her age. She’d stood against something horrible, something she likely hadn’t been able to understand, and didn’t let it break her. She was, by night, a scary as all Hell monster who devoured people and their fears. By day, she was a bouncy, silly girl, that liked rabbits, cats, ferrets, dogs, and likely anything she could hug, pet, feed, and take care of.

He supposed a more cynical view would be that she refused to accept reality. And that was a view he probably would have defaulted to, once upon a time. But, after having spent a couple weeks hunting for hunters with her, he couldn’t deny her optimism and joviality were affecting him. It was contagious.

She blinked at him, obviously confused. That was fine. If she didn’t understand why she did the things she did, all the better. They didn’t need two over-analytical people in the relationship.

“Aye, I do like it!”

“I don’t smell any animals.” With his new insight, it was a surprise he didn’t see at least a cat running around. Any minute now, he expected a small dog to hop out of the bathroom, or maybe for a chinchilla or something equally fluffy to land on the windowsill. Nothing.

“Oh? Oh! A pet, ye mean. I ... I’ve always wanted one, but ... I dinnae know. It might not like me, because of Vrall, ye ken?”

He shook his head as he came back to the bed, and crawled across it to join her. “That is a real possibility, but I think any pet you get and raise from a young age will be fine. That Eric fellow has a cat, and he’s a werewolf.”

She blushed a little at the mention of him. “Right.”

“I ... suppose you saw the cat I’m talking about.” Eric’s cat, a creature Jessie insisted was the most amazing pet in the world.

“I did.”

“Still surprised you’re dating me, not him.”

“Well, like I said, yer both stupid, but a different kind of stupid. I thought I liked him, but I know better now. I like ye a lot more.” She reached down, grabbed the hem of her t-shirt, and pulled it up over her head. Her hair bounced a little, but like her, the frizzy thing was surprisingly resilient.

Damien tried to keep his eyes on her, but when a woman is only a foot away from you, wearing only jeans and a bra, it’s hard to not stare at the chest area. It wasn’t a sexy bra, with special lace or anything. It was a perfectly normal white bra, and she looked amazing in it.

“I, um—”

“Strip!” Giggling, she undid the buckle of her jeans, and wiggled out of them. That warranted some staring as well. “We’re gonna do a lot of firsts today.”

He kept his eyes on her—more like, unable to look away, as he started undoing the buttons of his shirt. “We are?”

“Aye! After all this, I’m still a virgin I’ll have ye know!”

He raised a brow at that. Well, it was true he’d had sex with her horror’s body, not her human body. And apparently, despite her sexual adventures with Eric, they hadn’t ever had sex. It didn’t really matter to him whether they did or not, but it was surprising that someone as assured of herself, and extroverted and outgoing as herself, hadn’t had sex before. Funny that she was the virgin, while the scary monster inside her, had a history of orgies with cultures that worshiped her, centuries ago.

Wearing nothing but her plain white bra and underwear, and her cute socks, she reached out and slid his shirt off his shoulders. He almost didn’t realize she was touching him, as his eyes locked onto the sight of her body. Curvy legs, wide hips, massive breasts, and her thin-but-not-too-thin physique gave her such a soft looking body. Every part of him wanted to pin it beneath him.

He licked a fang, and Blushed Life. He thought about asking first, but stopped himself. It had become clear from their interactions that she wanted him to take charge, to be aggressive with her, to be the beast that hunts the doe. She liked being treated as a cute, innocent little creature, helpless to stop a beast from having its way with her. And, to his surprise, he enjoyed giving into the aggressive desires he normally kept locked deep in his chest.

Once he was out of the shirt, he took her hand, and set it against the fly of his suit pants. He also took her other, and set them against his abdomen, and the many abs carved there. Instant delight in her eyes, and she squealed between giggles as she traced them, while struggling to undo the zipper of his fly. He was being far more playful than he usually was, he knew it, she knew it, and it was fun.

She made him fun.

He helped her get the pants off him, and he made sure the boxers came off with, and his socks, leaving him naked. She licked her lips as she looked him up and down, staying close on her knees, and now using both hands to touch his arms, chest, and abdomen.

“It’s such a shame,” she said.

“Mmm?”

“Ye permanently have such a nice body, all lean and defined and ... mmm.” She almost purred as she came in closer, and set a kiss on his shoulder. “Ye cannae get fat! That’d make any lass die with envy, but, ye cannae eat food. Nae cake or pizza, nothing.”

“Lucas demanded I get into the best shape possible, before ... you know.” He struggled to keep his growl quiet as he looked down at the woman’s body. He was naked, but she still had her underwear and bra on. Not fair. He was blatantly aroused too, cock standing out from the smooth skin of his pelvis, announcing his obvious hunger.

“Oh, ye shaved it,” she said, sliding in closer so his right knee was between both of hers. So close, she set one hand on the small of his back, while the other traced down his abs, then down further to the smooth skin, and to the base of his member.

He shivered as she slowly encased it in her hand. The feel of a hand, fingers, palm, circling his girth in experimental squeezes, drew a quiet growl from him, and Fiona looked up at him with her big doe eyes all the more. She put on that please-don’t-hurt-me-I’m-so-innocent-and-pure face, bit her bottom lip, and continued to idly stroke the base inch of his length in slow pulses.

“I ... thought maybe, since it’s the ‘in thing’ to do in Dolareido, I should?” he said.

She giggled, but her eyes slid down his body with anything but silly laughter. They were hungry. “It looks ... really good ... here.” She let go of his shaft, and slid a finger down from his navel, down the abs beneath, and to where the muscles sat just above his pubic bone.

Listening to his own building hunger, he leaned down over her, reached behind her, and worked the clasp of her bra. It took several seconds longer than he’d have liked, and she giggled into his neck as he struggled. But she let him work, and soon the large piece of white fabric fell off her breasts, and with a little wiggling from her, down her arms.

She blushed a little, and it made her pale skin glow red. “Did ye like the pictures I sent ye?” As she said it, she sat up straight, and hugged her bust, forearms underneath while her biceps pressed them together. They were very bottom heavy, and they weighed down on her forearms as they spilled over them, while her pink nipples poked outward from her swelling areolas.

He stared at them, and gulped. He hadn’t been able to touch Vrrall, being trapped in a web and all. But Fiona was right there, topless, inviting his touch. The last time he’d touched her like this, he’d pounced her, drained her, fingered her, and almost took it a lot further. This time, he could take it much further, all the way, if Vrrall was to be believed; and she was.

He reached out with a hand, and she lowered her arms as he set his palm underneath one of her breasts. Instant tingles coursed through him, and he felt growing heat between his legs, as he marveled at the sensation of her pale breast sitting on his palm. It overflowed his grip completely, and he stared in awe as a small wiggle of his fingers caused it to ripple. He pushed up a little harder, just enough to make it bounce, and Fiona burst into a fit of giggles as she watched him experiment.

“Aye, I think ye did.”

He crawled toward her, but being already so close left her with no choice but to fall back. Her squeak of surprise was intoxicating. She blinked at him, but her surprise faded as he brought his head down over her chest, and set his lips to her breast.

Her squeaks and giggles turned into mewls, and he smiled into her breast as he slowly brought her nipple into his mouth. It was swollen, and instinct told him there was only thing you can do with a swollen nipple: suckle on it. So he did, and he groaned into her body, intoxicated by the sensation of her massive breast’s softness and how it molded to his face.

They could talk later. For now, he was going to do what she kept asking him for, what he wanted to do, and listen to his body’s hungers. Just give in, take her, have her, and drink her.

With him lying on top of her, half his weight on her and half on the bed next to her hip, his arm closer to her was free to find her legs. Smooth, curvy, delicious legs. As he slid his fingers up their contours, he could feel her start to shiver, quivering, but her legs spread without prompting.

He set his hand against her stomach, slid his fingers underneath her underwear, down smooth shaved skin, and down to her sex. Last time he did this, he’d had his fangs in her neck. This time, he wanted to try tenderly licking and suckling on her nipple first, before fangs came into the picture. It sent fire through his body, when he felt some subtle wetness on his fingers as they traced along her sex’s lips. She liked this, a lot. And knowing that she liked it, liked having his body on her, his lips on her breast, and his fingers tickling along her lower lips, was a loud siren in his head demanding for more.

“Damien! Mah tits are sensitive, ye ken? Be ... gentle...”

He lifted his head, but in that moment, found a split second's disappointment on her face. Right, she liked being sweet, docile, but she didn't want him to be like that. She wanted him to ignore her pleas, and have his way with her. He immediately set his lips back onto her breasts, and suckled harder, lifting his head so her breast lifted from her chest with him. She squealed again, and both her hands found his head.

They fell to the blankets, and squeezed her sheets into bundles around her fingers, as his wet fingers began to massage her clitoris.

“Nnn ... mmm.” She wriggled and squirmed a little, pushing her hips toward his hand, even as he devoured her breast. Her nipple swelled more, filling his mouth as he licked it, while his lips suckled, drawing it to his face again as he lifted his head, before his lips let it go. The way it jiggled as it settled against her ribs pulled another growl from him, and he licked his lips as he felt his hunger grow.

He backed up along her bed, slid his hand out from her underwear, and crawled between her legs. With her wanting him to be more and more aggressive, he let his natural desires out a little more; and they wanted to rip her underwear off. He took the fabric apart like it was tissue, leaving her completely naked save for her socks, and earning a squeak from her. He'd shocked her. Good.

He got down onto his stomach, hooked his arms under her thighs, and gazed upon her wet, tiny, glistening slit, before burying it in his mouth. Immediate gasps from her, filling the quiet room, and sending pulsing need through his body. Vrall had made interesting sounds, lovely and hypnotizing sounds, but the way tiny Fiona mewled and whimpered as he buried her clitoris with his tongue, was intoxicating in a way he hadn't expected.

“D-Damien! Please, slow down!” She reached out with both hands and pressed them to his forehead, gently pushing him away. With his arms hooked under her delicious thighs, he had the leeway to reach over her waist, grab her wrists, and pin them to the blankets around her. More squeaks, increasing in volume as she realized she was trapped, unable to stop him, as he devoured her pussy.

Not being able to stop him set her off. Her squirming and wriggling intensified for a second or two, but as it became obvious she couldn't get her hands off the blankets to stop him, it was like gasoline thrown on a fire. Her breathing quickened, her mewls turned into moans, and her legs quivered on his arms and shoulders, as more juices flowed out of her.

When he tightened his grip on her wrists, the reaction was almost visceral. She squealed and arched her back, and he had to fight a little harder to keep her down as she came. He hadn't expected her to cum so quickly; she'd been on the edge of need for days then, like he was.

While he didn't have any sexual history to draw on, he knew how to read, and had done his research. Instead of licking and suckling on her clitoris as she came, he eased up, letting her enjoy the bliss without spoiling it with too much stimulus.

It was his first time, and more importantly, his first time with her. Analysis skills kicked in, and he made mental notes of each and every reaction she made to his touch. First thing he noticed, was how easily she came; sort of made everything feel like cheating. Fiona was hyper into her sexuality, and he got the impression anything he did to her would make her feel good, as long as he held her down when he did it. Second thing, was how she gasped. A lick of his tongue drew a sharp inhale from her, that turned into a long groan as he rested his tongue against her clit, no longer moving it as she continued to climax. She liked being pushed a little further than his reading suggested.

It was like solving a puzzle, a beautiful, writhing puzzle.

He lifted his head and smiled down at her, her panting body, her closed eyes, her smile of pleasure, and her trembling legs. She was coming down from her pleasure high, and she giggled as she stopped trembling.

“Mmmm,” she said, voice a whisper. Once he released her wrists, her hands drifted up and down her body, fingertips teasing along her skin, before they reached out for his waist.

He slid in closer while sitting on his ass. And before Fiona could realize what he was doing, he took her legs, pulled them toward him so they hooked around his hips, and then he took her waist. He pulled her up toward him, and she giggled as she set her hands on his shoulders, sitting between his thighs.

“So romantic!” she said, smile only growing.

He gulped as he looked her body up and down. With her hands on his shoulders, and her sitting between his legs, her legs hooked over his and around behind him, he could feel her body heat. His cock pointed up, aimed at her stomach, only several inches from her and her shivering body. Her heavy breasts, jutting out from her ribs with their bottom-heavy, teardrop shapes, made each breath she took blatant and hypnotic. And the feel of her quivering legs resting on his and his hips, filled him with hunger for more.

He slid his hands under her ass, squeezed the soft meat of her body, and lifted her.

“Oh!” With more squeaking giggles, she helped him align everything, one hand reaching down and grabbing his length. “Be ... be slow, ok? Yer, um, pretty large, ye ken? And I’m ... nae.”

Nodding, he slowly lowered her down, and licked a canine as he felt the wet lips of her slit graze along his glans. He wanted to slam her small body down, feel her tiny walls spread taut around him, and watch her beautiful breasts bounce as he thrust into her. And, considering Fiona's personality, that sort of rough sex was inevitable. But it was a good idea to start slow, like she asked. It gave him time to analyze her more, figure out what she liked from how she responded, and the longer he got to enjoy this, the better.

He lowered her more, and a quiet growl rolled through him as he felt her clenching, wet muscles spread over the sensitive skin of his cock's head. Immediate sparks of pleasure danced down his length, and Fiona giggled and mewled simultaneously as she caught his eyes. He lowered her a little further, and she closed her eyes as she let go of his member, set her hand back on his shoulder, and groaned.

The slow journey of penetrating the feisty redhead, was exquisite torture. She was dripping wet, and boiling hot; combined with how tight and small her insides were, it made each inch he managed to slip into her euphoric. She squeezed in spurts as he went deeper, and gasped every so often, eyes staring down at him as her mouth parted. He tried to look up and meet her gaze, but his eyes couldn't stay away from her body, her breasts rippling with her shudders, and her small pussy spread wide around his girth.

She winced when he started to press against her depths, but wince turned into another groan as she sank another inch onto him, stretching her insides inward as she snuggled her thighs around his waist. As her lips found the base of his cock, and her lovely ass grew snug with his thighs, sitting on them, her hands slid under his arms to hug him. She set her forehead to his, and smiled as she squirmed, getting comfortable.

"No ... longer ... a virgin!" She kissed him, winked, and hugged tighter, pressing her breasts to his chest and setting her chin on his shoulder. "Well, I mean, I used a lot of toys and stuff, but they dinnae count."

He chuckled, but it came out constrained, mixing with a growl as his hunger continued to rise. “Con ... congratulations.”

“I can tell yer hungry,” she said, whispering into his ear, and nudging her body against him. “Ye can drink me, ye ken. Any time ye want.” He shivered as he felt her fingers trace up and down the muscles of his back and spine. “Maybe right now? Cause, yer ... inside me, and we’re all ... snuggly, and ... and I’m all tingly and ... I’d probably cum right easy, aye.”

Drinking her was still a scary thought. He hadn’t done it since the first time, and the strange taste of her blood had been intoxicating, in a bizarre, overpowering way. The heat of it had been powerful, delicious with a kick, and he wanted more.

“Are you sure? I—”

“I trust ye. And ... it ... it was really good.” She squirmed, wriggling her hips left and right. He didn’t know if she knew how good that felt, but good Lord, the way her gripping, dripping insides milked his length as she adjusted her weight, was heaven.

He growled into her ear, breath flowing over her neck, and she whimpered all the more. He couldn’t help it. The Beast wanted to growl, and every time he gave into it, the results it earned were amazing. Muscles squeezed around his girth, hot juices soaked him, and she hugged him tighter, making sure her hard nipples were buried against his chest.

He opened his mouth, kissed her neck until she started whimpering again, and slowly sank his fangs into her.

“Nnn! Nn ... Oh ... dinnae hurt me, ye evil ... horrible ... brute...” She squirmed again, and to his surprise, actually tried to escape. He couldn’t have that.

He put a stop to her escape attempts quickly. His hands reached behind him, grabbed hers by the wrists, and pinned them to her own back instead. With her hands pressed to the small of her back, by his own, she was trapped in his embrace, unable to squirm away, as he was basically free to press on her body, and keep her snug to his. Trapped. Helpless. Defenseless.

“Noo! Please ... please dinnae...” Her legs kicked at the bed, heels digging into the blankets as she tried to find leverage to escape him. Every wriggling motion, every writhing twist of her body, made her insides clench like a vise, squeezing in milking spurts around his length. They were also making her pant and mewl, the friction of her tight depths on his cock pulling intoxicating noises from her.

But all of that became background noise, as he Kissed her. Blood, warm, thick, flowed over his tongue and into his body, filling him with tingling heat that spread throughout his limbs. Electricity coursed through him, and he groaned around her skin as the strange kick of her blood hit him. The Beast in his guts roared pleasure, demanding more, and he gave it, keeping his teeth deep in his prey’s neck as he swallowed down her life essence.

Her struggles continued, legs kicking at the bed, and body wriggling in useless attempts to escape his embrace. Futile. His hands were pressed to the small of her back, pinning her hands there, and keeping her body balls deep on his length. Each of her squirms and wriggles bathed his cock in bliss, and he started to press down on her lower back in a rhythm, a heartbeat pace, forcing her back and forth an inch on his length, as he continued to drain her. He needed more.

She came again. Part of him, a small part buried by everything else at the moment, told him he should be proud of that, delighted that he’d made his sexual partner enjoy herself so much. But right now, a much louder part told him to hold her down, keep her pinned on his cock, and Kiss her more. Hold her, embrace and trap her, drain her, and continue absorbing her exquisite, delicious, precious life blood. And it was delicious, with a flavor far more overwhelming, and an effect far more powerful, than any kine's blood. It had his whole body buzzing in seconds, and soon after, cumming.

“Please! Let ... let me go ... ye ... monster...” Her trembles came and went in waves, and renewed more wet warmth as they returned, until he rolled his eyes up in bliss as he felt her insides spasm in quivering need.

He growled around her neck, and pressed on her hands harder, pushing her body snug to his own as he flooded her insides. His prey squealed, but it was a tired sound, weak, and her kicking legs and wriggling body began to slow. Her insides continued to squeeze, random spurts of muscle clenches working through her pussy, and milking him sporadically. Every moment inside her was bliss, the heat of his cum filling her and demanding he flex his inner muscles, only for her milking grip to coax more of his seed from him.

Soon, Fiona went limp. No longer struggling, the quivering woman leaned against his body, exhausted and spent. It was a signal that he should stop Kissing her; a signal that he desperately wanted to ignore. Despite the annoyed protests of the hungry creature in his soul, Damien forced his lips away from her neck, and licked the puncture marks closed. He let her wrists go, and kissed her jaw as he felt her hands dangle at her sides, fingers grazing the blankets.

He slid her off of him, set her butt against the blankets, and smiled down at her as she fell onto the bed like a bag of sand. Breathing hard, sweating, and quivering, she managed to keep her eyes half open as she looked up at him, but any attempt to move was defeated by her drained state. The blissful release of a post-Kiss coma. And with her legs spread wide around him, Damien was treated to the delicious site of her smooth, pink lips leaking white cum down her lovely thighs and buttocks.

And that was enough to trigger a need for more.

He reached down, and flipped her over. A vampire didn't need to be a Daeva or Nos to summon strength; Daeva and Nos would forever be naturals at summoning insane strength, but a Mekhet was quite capable of tapping into inhuman strength as well. Lifting and turning a small girl like Fiona onto her stomach was easy, and better yet, was the way she lay on the bed on her stomach, breasts squashed and visible along the outside of her ribs.

He reached over for her biggest pillow, and slid it under her hips, so her beautiful, bountiful ass was in the air, and legs together, so he could kneel around them. And, without being nearly as gentle as before, he guided his wet cock to her lips, and sank his length into her.

“Nnn!” The poor creature managed a squeal, but not much else. She was exhausted, trembling, and he could feel her legs struggle to move, but unable. The Kiss coma had rendered her helpless, defenseless, and sensitive.

He shivered as he enjoyed the bliss her quivering depths sent along his length, and he lowered himself onto her. He sank his weight onto his elbows around her torso, and most of his weight onto his hips and pelvis so they pressed snug to her ass. With her ass up on the pillow and legs together, trapped between his own, nothing stopped him from sinking himself down on her with all his weight, and the beautiful monster whimpered into the pillow as he started to thrust.

She managed to turn her head enough so she could rest her cheek to the blankets. Her eyes gleamed, despite still being half closed and struggling to stay that way. Even when he started to thrust harder, hard enough he knew he was hitting her to the base, and hitting places inside her that he probably should have treated more gently, she continued to whimper. Either getting that deep inside her didn't hurt her, or it did, and she loved it anyway. The message was clear: fuck her hard.

He grabbed her wrists again, and pinned them to the blankets around her head. Immediately, as if he'd pressed a magic button, her whimpers turned into moans again, and her clenching depths squeezed until it was hard to keep thrusting. He did though, because, no way could he stop now, with the gorgeous woman trembling underneath him, and leaking more juices onto his length.

And then, he tried something he never thought he'd try, in a million years, ever. He pushed his weight back up onto his knees so he was kneeling straight, looked down, and gave her a slap on the ass.

“Nnnnn!” She clenched on him hard enough to make him wince, before she went limp again, body trembling but unable to move. Her eyes closed, and her panting mewls grew a little louder, as he felt more of her juices trickle down his testicles.

Wow.

He spanked her twice more, each deliberate, each hard enough to make a bit of a sound, and spark a small sting on his palm. Each caused her ass to ripple with the impact, and for her pussy to grip down like her life depended on it, practically crushing his length. He thrust through her vise grip, and shivered at the bliss of her soaked, hot insides milking his glans, sending sparks of pleasure through him. His fingers sank into the curved softness of her ass, and he thrust again, and again, until he felt the pleasure building into heat between his legs.

He pressed his chest down on her back again, lay on her body, pinned her wrists to the blankets again, and started to fuck her hard, driving his hips down upon her. Her bed shook, creaking with each impact, and her mewls mixed with her panting as she struggled to get breath. He didn't let her. He pounded down into her, robbing her of any air she tried to get, as he worked himself up to another orgasm.

He growled into her ear, and came inside her once again. His thrusts slowed, but each was a hard slam into her, causing the bed to bounce a little more violently than was strictly necessary. Neighbors would probably hear, and he didn't care. He smashed her down into the bed with each thrust, until he felt her hot cum renewing. He felt her try and lift her legs, maybe to kick at the bed, but she managed only a small bend of her knee before she collapsed again, closing her eyes as she soaked his cock.

He knelt up straight again, slowing down his thrusts as he focused on the pleasure. Her insides were insanely tight, and he made sure to stay balls deep inside her, as he adjusted his weight on his knees. His hands found her ass again, and he smiled down at her quivering body as he kneaded the large mounds. He slapped one again, and groaned as her insides responded with a hard squeeze, milking him with enough force that it was almost painful. But, to feel her boiling insides massaging every inch of his length with a death grip, was too pleasurable to not do again. Another spank made her shudder, and he groaned as he watched the heavenly mound ripple, and felt her muscles spasm around his cock until she'd managed to milk another few drops of his cum.

He blinked down at himself, and her, as the hunger for blood faded, and the hunger for sex along with it. He inched his legs back, and his cock slid out of her, letting cum spill from her slit and down onto her blankets and pillow. He stared, licking his lips as he took in the sight of her shivering pussy, and how her legs trembled. Good Lord.

Good Lord! He'd ... he'd pinned her down, had rough sex, and spanked her! Spanking. Him?

“Fiona? You, uh ... you alright?”

The redhead managed to a few, quiet whimpering noises, but didn't manage much movement. He touched her leg, shook it a few times, but still only managed a few murrms and meows from her. Even a shake hard enough to make her ass jiggle — damn that was hypnotizing — wasn't enough to stir her from the bed.

So, he pulled the pillow out from under her, let her flatten on the bed, and climbed over to lie beside her. "Fiiiiona." No response, eyes still closed, but breathing. "Fiiiiiona." He reached out for her, pushed her closer shoulder up, and rolled her onto her side, facing him.

Which, of course, put her breasts on display, one half flattening to the bed sheets with its size and weight, the other pressing down on its sister. For a split moment, it made him want cover her up, hide her nudity so that he couldn't see. And then he remembered that, not only did they just have sex, they'd been dating for a little while now, and had had sex a couple weeks ago, sort of. Plus, she'd sent him plenty of pictures of her topless, with full intent on showing off her bust. That meant, he could be more forward, especially since that seemed to be the thing she liked.

And, his stomach was full, flooding his body with energy. The womans' strange blood was empowering, intoxicating, and he could feel it clouding his thoughts. Not drunk, not high, but the waves of tingling energy blood sent through a Kindred's body, didn't normally hit like this. The Kiss was extremely pleasurable, and satisfying hunger was always enjoyable, but Fiona's blood made him want to explode with energy and desire. It made him want to grab her, hold her down, slide his cock into her wet, tight, dripping insides, and keep going.

Fiona was still awake, and sensitive, still trembling with orgasm aftershocks. If he fucked her again, now, she'd cum easier than paper took fire. And his growing erection loved that idea. So, he scooted down a little, got closer, and as he hugged her waist with one arm, he set his lips to one of her breasts. Some more mewls followed, and he smiled into the softness as—

As his phone rang.

---

---

~~Jack~~

Damien had a bounce in his step, and that was weird. Damien didn't bounce. Damien stalked, sneaked, walked with quiet steps, and basically never bounced. Apparently Fiona was rubbing off on him. Or maybe...

“You slept with Fiona, didn't you? I can smell blood on you.”

Damien froze, reached up with a gloved hand for his mouth, and ran a finger along his lips for a moment. Well, that reaction was telling.

“I did. Was it obvious?”

“You're radiating joy.” And it was kind of irritating. Course, Jack didn't say that, but seeing his friend being so damn happy, when everyone else in Jack's world, including Jack, was miserable, was grating. He was happy for his friend, but circumstance made it difficult to not also be annoyed, and envious.

The two of them were underground, walking the tunnels to Azamel's path. Jack would have gone alone, now that he had the power of the curse at his disposal, but it would have annoyed his bosses to break the rules. And, much as he could feel the power coursing through him, the strange and wicked curse ready to unleash its visceral desires on whoever it felt deserved it, he wasn't a god. He almost felt like one, knowing what he could do if the situation demanded, but the elders of Dolareido never stuck their heads out for a good reason: even elders died quick, if you caught them off guard. He was no exception.

It annoyed him, that the elders refused to do things themselves. All that power, and they did nothing but hide in their towers or whatever, telling other Kindred what to do. It also annoyed him that, whenever he broke it down tactically, he couldn't disagree with them. Elders wanted to stay alive, and he couldn't blame them for that. Elders wanted to control their environment, and he couldn't blame them for that. The role of general was the best way to accomplish both those tasks, out of the fight while also controlling it.

One mistake was all it took for any vampire to die, no matter how old. Tony and Viktor were perfect examples of that, dying to something as innocent as a dry fire in an old factory.

That meant that, while he may have gained access to strength that rivaled an elder Kindred, he still had to be careful. And it wasn't like he didn't want to bring Damien, it was just that, a part of him wanted to brood, be angry, and mope. It was hard to do that with his friend vibrating on the happy frequency.

"I ... I've been ... dating her, for a while, I suppose you could say. We just didn't have time to get physical, except for that time with Vrall."

Ah yes, the oddly beautiful spider monster, Fiona's horror. Damien hadn't given him many details, but had given him enough hints for Jack to piece together what happened. Fucking a gorgeous-but-terrifying spider monster in her web, would have been not unlike the times Antoinette had sex with him, when she tied him up so he couldn't move. Except, Jack got to do those things in a nice, quiet, luxurious basement, with lots of soft things to lie on, usually. Sex in a spider web, in a sweltering jungle, in the black of the canopy, with corpses hanging from nearby trees? Eesh.

"Judging by what I'm seeing, I'm guessing your first night with normal redhead Fiona went well."

“Very.” Damien nodded, smile beaming; at least, beaming by Damien standards.

Jack laughed, reached up, and stroked the breast feathers of Mulder. A caw from Scully drew his hand, and he scratched the back of her head a few times, as he continued walking.

“Jacob visited my apartment.”

“Oh?”

“Yeah, and he met my mother. Hell, part of me thinks that was half the reason he went there.”

“And the other half?”

Jack groaned and looked down at the old tracks beneath his feet. “He wants me there, when Triss and him do ... do something, I guess.”

Damien mirrored his groan, shaking his head as he slipped his hands into his trench coat pockets. “That sounds like it could be messy. There’s already been an unusual amount of disappearances in Devil’s Corner. The police are likely going to get involved soon.”

“Not like they’ll catch Jacob in the act.” And, now that Jack and Damien knew the weird sex statues in Devil’s Corner were there because of Jacob, it was easy to put two and two together. “I wonder what other sort of hooks that man has in the city.”

“Plenty, I’m sure, of all sorts,” Damien said. “He’s been here since the beginning. Getting leverage on Vicky and Parker is probably an afterthought to him.”

That was the problem with dealing with elders. They played the long game. Jack, and even Damien, could unfortunately only appreciate actions that had consequences within the year, or decade at most. Jacob had undoubtedly made decisions like sewing seeds, or better, planting trees. Trees took forever to grow, and took centuries to truly grow into towering behemoths, but an elder like Jacob could plant dozens of them, knowing they'd eventually be useful to him.

Sighing, Jack shrugged, and winced as both Mulder and Scully cawed in annoyance at the sudden movement. "He is on our side, I guess," he said.

"Is he? I assumed Jacob was on his own side. No one else's."

"I don't know. There's more to Jacob than that. And besides, these disappearances are to fuel his efforts to find the hunters. I can't fault him for that."

Damien shook his head. "You mean, to fuel Beatrice's efforts. She's not a fledgling. If something goes wrong, she gets blamed. Or, considering the nature of her pursuits, if something goes wrong, she'll probably be the one to die in some Crúac ritual gone bad."

"Then I better do a good job helping her. I'm not letting her die, or get herself killed." It was the least he could do, considering his sire died helping him, leaving her alone and miserable. He felt responsible. Hell, he partly was.

That feeling of guilt was going to haunt him for the rest of his eternal life. Fucking lovely.

"Hey," Jack said. "Sorry for calling you in on this meeting, since you were—"

His friend waved a hand through the air, dismissing him. "This is important. Besides, Fiona's asleep now. It was a good ... great night."

Jack smiled. Ashley and Julee always went to sleep after Jack or Antoinette had had their fun with them, draining them. And occasionally, they continued to do things to the two girls, while they were trapped in that post-Kiss bliss. Fiona likely had a great night.

It was more than just Jack needing a partner for this meeting, though. Damien came because a chat with Azamel and the other Begotten meant the conversation could swing to include the mysterious threat Azamel had warned them about. Damien was in on that, so was Fiona, and Jack wouldn't be surprised if the other nightmare monsters knew too.

The goal of the trip was simple. He had to get an update from Azamel, to see if she had anything to contribute about any of the ongoings. The Invictus and Azamel didn't get along, and it was in everyone's best interest that Jack try and head off any disagreements before they escalated. He also wanted to know if she had any updates about the mysterious threat, because Jack didn't, Damien didn't, and that was nerve wracking.

But, most importantly, he wanted to talk to them about the thing inside him, the thing whispering to him, asking him to kill and slaughter, with far more verbosity than his Beast had ever shown before.

It was always quiet, this deep in the tunnels. Vibrations from the city above, and the sounds they created, were well below what a human could hear, and his Kindred ears struggled to pick up on it. Lights flickered, forever unable to ever be fully maintained by repair crews. At this point, he assumed the nightmare monsters liked it that way, and were thwarting any Kindred attempts to repair the lights. It certainly made things creepier, deep down in the cold, dark depths of the Earth.

Damien looked around, and reached above his head behind the neck.

"You almost look like you could be the sheriff's childe, dressed like that," Jack said. And hey, it was true.

“I ... noticed, that many people consider me in the same light as the sheriff. Perhaps, not with the same fear, but many consider me an assassin nonetheless.” Damien shrugged, tapped the spot behind his neck, inside the large neck of his trench coat, and offered Jack a smaller smile. “I’d be a fool to not at least consider his approach to combat.”

“He keeps the whole city under his thumb, I guess.”

“That he does.”

“I ... I never did ask, about it.”

“It? I—oh, the Purge. Right, because the sheriff ... yeah.”

Wincing, Jack looked ahead, one hand idly stroking the back of each crow’s neck, while he did his best to keep a neutral expression. “People refer to it, talk about it, mention it, but I don’t know much about it.”

“It ... it’s a painful memory.”

“Don’t talk about it if you don’t want to. But, you are one of the few who’s seen the sheriff in action.” And if there was one thing his second life had taught Jack, it was the value of information.

With a long sigh, Damien nodded as he put both his hands back into his coat pockets. “You saw him in action, didn’t you? After ... you know.”

Right, after Jack forced Damien to kill his sire. What a lovely bonding experience for the two of them.

“Using Dominate like that left me completely drained. I barely remember a thing.”

“I see. Daniel is ... able to combine speed with the Cloak of Night, to degrees other Kindred can't. Fighting him is like fighting a ghost.” The Mekhet shuddered, and rubbed his forearms through his coat. “The Prince rarely fought, when she enacted the Purge. Most of the damage was done by Garry, the Carthians at large, and ... Daniel. The sheriff handled the bishops, most of them, and they could do little. Too fast, too difficult to catch, or even see.”

Mekhet didn't have the brute strength of Nos or Daeva; that's why they liked swords. Speed and swords worked well together, and Jack did have a faint memory of the damage Daniel did to the remaining Kindred under Lucas's control, after Damien had cut off Lucas's head. The sheriff had slaughtered Lucas's crew like a scene from a fucking anime, dashing around, a blur of speed and Cloak of Night hiding him from even Kindred eyes, until he was too close to be stopped.

If that was the sort of person Damien wanted to emulate, at least in combat effectiveness, it was a tough goal to reach.

“And,” Damien continued, “I was ... thinking about asking the sheriff for training.”

Pieces snapped into place, and Jack nodded as the image became clear. “Because, if Antoinette's sheriff is deeply involved with you, it'll make your rebirth of the Lancea et Sanctum go smoother.”

“Two birds with one stone.”

“Maria's idea?”

“Yes.”

“She's too damn smart.”

Damien chuckled. “She's ... she's smart, but not the bastion of cold reason and burning wrath people think she is. She wants to cooperate with the Prince to get the Lancea et Sanctum up and running again, because she's a believer."

Maria was Jack's boss too, but Jack never got personal with her, or Michael. Right Hands in the Dolareido Invictus were the only ones to get personal with the council, and usually one on one, Right Hand to their designated council member. Jessy had her sire, Michael. Damien had Maria, two believers of Longinus. And Jack, had no one.

Jack grit his teeth, forced down the rising bile in his guts, and sighed. "Then I hope she's not the one Azamel warned us about."

"As do I. I'd ... I'd hate to kill her."

That, was not the response Jack expected.

"Do you think you can?"

"If I catch her off guard. But again, I do not wish to harm her. She's taught me much, about music, economy, psychology. I have a hard time thinking she's willing to harm the city to revive Lucas, or for any other reason." The Mekhet slowed for a moment, eyes wandering down as his mind dug through his thoughts. "She's well aware Lucas was a menace, and his ... aggressiveness had only grown worse after his torpor."

"I'm still worried. Love makes people do stupid things."

Sighing, Damien started walking again, but his eyes were elsewhere, probably drifting through memories of Maria. "Agreed."

---

Stepping into the lair of monsters was always a frightening affair. It wasn't as scary anymore, now that Jack had the curse, but that didn't change the memories he had of Athalia and Azamel.

Perhaps more frightening, was the inevitable conversation he was going to have with Athalia. It was Jack's job to keep the peace between the groups in Dolareido, and he wasn't sure he'd be able to do that when he saw her. Losing his sister because of her daughter was bad enough, but losing his sire because of her as well, was absurd.

Would Athalia be afraid? Would she care? The only vampire she gave a shit about was the sheriff, and him, supposedly. Did she feel bad about what her daughter did?

He wasn't sure, but he knew how he'd respond if she treated his situation callously. He'd get angry, and he didn't know how that'd go. Maybe anger would trigger the curse, like it had in the past? Maybe he was like, the Hulk now, and he should have been in a monastery or something, somewhere where he could meditate and learn to control his anger.

He sighed, rubbed his head a few times, and stepped around the corner. Stop thinking about the curse. It only ever came out when his life was threatened. There was no reason to think the curse would jump out in a different circumstance. Right?

Athalia sat in a chair on the stage of concrete, not far from Azamel, who sat in her rocking chair as usual. Mark wasn't on the stage, but he was in the room, sitting in a corner by himself with a book in his hand. The room was quiet. They'd heard him coming.

The three monsters looked at Damien, then him, and their eyes went wide. Mark and Athalia both shot up to their feet, and their hands tightened into fists at their sides as they stared at him. Azamel, for all her usual calm demeanor and imposing presence, froze. She put her cigarette down, staring at him, eyes locked and looking at him from head to toe several times.

Damien raised a brow as he looked at him too. From what Jack had seen from other Kindred, since his curse thing awakened, they were able to tell he was different. They could tell his strength had grown, that his Beast and its presence had grown, but he'd never garnered a reaction like he was getting from the Begotten. The monsters were able to see other paranormals in a way Kindred couldn't understand. Whatever it was that made paranormals paranormal, there was no hiding it from the monsters of nightmares.

And the monsters of nightmares were looking at him like he'd just dropped a bomb at their front door.

"Jack," Azamel said, clearing her throat as best she could without breaking into a smoker's cough. "You ... you are different."

These nightmare monsters see far too much. Don't trust them.

Jack winced, and snapped his head to the side.

I trust them more than I trust you.

Because you're an idiot. What I want is obvious. These monsters have desires so much bigger and disgusting.

Don't give me that shit. I remember what my Beast showed me, the memories of Susanna and the carnage she caused with you.

Because she wanted to. These monsters? They do similar because they have to. It's who they are. You remember what Azamel said, about the villages she controlled. You don't think she spun that story to make her sound a bit less horrible? You don't think she slaughtered innocents, hundreds of them, to feed the nightmare inside her?

Jack sighed, and looked to Damien. His friend was dating one of those monsters, and having the time of his second life. It wasn't like the whisper in Jack's ear was entirely wrong, but just as Azamel had probably twisted her story of her past to make her sound less horrible than she was, the curse in Jack's ear was probably doing the same thing. But, it wasn't like the Begotten were horrible. Fiona certainly wasn't. Was she? She'd been killing people as a part of how she hunted before she was told to control herself, and Damien said she had corpses hanging from trees in her jungle nightmare.

Don't throw stones in glass houses.

"I am different," he said. "I assume you've seen the news."

"I did," Athalia said. "I ... I didn't know what to think. What happened to you, Jack?"

Jack stepped forward, and Athalia stepped back. The sight of fear in her eyes sent a thrill up his spine, but he didn't let it make him smile. He wanted to, though. A dark, evil, sinister smile would have gone a long way toward putting her on the defensive. It would have felt good to make her be afraid, to make her fear for her life from the Kindred who'd suffered such atrocities at her daughter's whim. But he wouldn't. That wouldn't help anyone.

Grinding his teeth into powder, Jack stopped walking, and glared. "I wanted to ask you."

"Me? Why? I don't—"

"Did you see anything ... strange, about me, or Julias, or Viktor? I know you Begotten can see things we can't."

A glance to Mark showed the man didn't want to get involved in the conversation. Jack met his eyes, and the man recoiled a little, lowering his gaze back to his book. Another glance to Athalia showed the same thing. They didn't want to meet his eyes.

After a few seconds of silence, Athalia spoke up. "I'm not sure. I didn't see much of Viktor, but you and ... Julias, you both seemed normal."

“Are you sure?”

Azamel started coughing, and everyone looked her way as they waited for her to rip her lungs to shreds.

“There has always been a subtle difference, young Kindred, in your bloodline,” the old woman said. “I saw it as ... chains, bits of metal lost in the shadows of your Beast.”

Jack stepped toward the stage, and Athalia took another step back. But after a moment, she came up to stand beside Azamel, setting a hand on the monster’s chair. She was shaking.

“You saw that my bloodline’s Beast was different than others?” Jack said.

“I did.”

“And you said nothing?”

“You Kindred and your Horrors are wisps of shadow and mist, with many limbs of many forms. What is one more oddity among small Horrors, with such liquid features?”

She was describing the Beast, and she knew what it looked like. So, the strange creature Jack and Beatrice had seen in their minds was what the Begotten could see in them, then. The monsters lived in a plane of dreams. Did the Beast live in such a place as well? Or, was connected to it, somehow?

The idea that Crúac could reach into some other realm, communicate with potentially godly entities like the Crone, and perform magical acts, didn’t seem so absurd anymore.

“Liquid features?” he said.

The old monster nodded as she took another puff of smoke into her lungs. It came out as she spoke, as natural as anything to the ancient creature. “Us Begotten are a little more ... defined. With you vampires, you are small, and adaptable. Like chameleons, you change colors to become one with your environment. Like evolution on fast forward, you grow to fit your surroundings. Adapting, with liquid features that mold to your whim and habitat.” She breathed smoke at him, but he could see the hesitation in her eyes. “Chameleons are minuscule, and usually, beneath our notice.”

“And ... now? What do you see in me now?”

The Begotten looked between each other, as if playing hot potato on who would speak. But Azamel, coughing a couple more times, put out her cigarette, and leaned forward toward him.

“A long time ago, I once met a Begotten, little Kindred, and he reminded me of you. This monster fed on ... I am not sure. To this day, I haven’t been able to discern what this brute craved. All I know is bodies followed in his wake.” Sighing, she shook her head as she fumbled for another cigarette. Athalia helped her, and where Azamel would have probably been annoyed at the assistance in the past, now, she accepted it without issue. “Within the heart of his lair, I found endless corpses, some fresh, some old. Mountains of them, piled high, until they reached the black sky above. The only light was glints of white against the flowing rivers of red.

“And this Horror, little Kindred, was massive, as massive as I. A creature of shadow, with tendrils of obsidian mist that ripped into the endless bodies it rested upon. It had no single face, and no set of limbs I could identify. It was a ... a thing.” She leaned back, and breathed smoke into the air before meeting his eyes again. “I see such a monster, in you, little vampire.”

That was a pretty horrible image, and Jack winced as he met the old woman’s gaze. She wasn’t lying, or exaggerating. Hell, if anything, she was looking at him with pity.

“What happened to him?”

“Slain. The beast was a glutton, and for the Begotten, mindlessly indulging our hungers can leave us ... vulnerable.”

Indulging his Beast its desire to feed and destroy wouldn't make it vulnerable, as far as Jack could tell. Except, indulgence was often the weakness that destroyed many people, and monsters. He didn't think that that was what Azamel meant, but still.

“You heard about what happened?” he said, looking to Athalia.

“ ... we did.”

“You know Angela killed one of our thralls, and my sire?”

Azamel frowned, apparently not happy he'd switched his attention. And in the past, she would have wrestled it back with a sharp remark. Not this time.

“We ... we heard of Julias's death, yes,” Athalia said. “Jack, I—”

“You heard about the crows, that attacked the hospital?”

Athalia lowered her head, turning away from him. “We heard. I thought maybe that was Julias, until Fiona told us what she learned from Damien.”

Jack glanced at Damien. There wasn't anything wrong with Damien sharing with his girlfriend information that was basically public, but Jack did sort of wish the Begotten hadn't gotten to know about his curse until he told them.

Whether they knew or not, their reaction was blatant, and seemed honest. The three monsters were looking at him like he was a threat, like he was dangerous, like he might attack them at any point. Mark had moved to join his companions, and was standing with fists at his side. Athalia had some of her weight braced on the balls of her feet. Azamel had her eyes on him, staring, ready, as if Damien didn't exist.

It made him feel powerful. Ventrue ego swelled, and Jack struggled to keep the growing smile down. Feeling powerful was addicting, he knew that, everyone knew that, and he wasn't going to let it influence his decisions. Besides, it wasn't him, it was the curse, something that he hadn't earned or developed on his own. It was a gift, and a curse, a tool dumped into his lap by a psychopath from hundreds of years ago. He'd be a fool to rely on it.

But god damn it, it was tempting.

"Before I go," he said, "does anyone have an update on the unknown threat?"

They visibly relaxed. Maybe they thought, upon seeing him, that he was going to push for violence because of what happened to his sire. They didn't know him, didn't understand he wouldn't do something so stupid just because he wanted to. And, much as a part of him really wanted to, a larger part of him knew it wasn't their fault, or Athalia's fault.

"No, unfortunately," Azamel said. "With everything that's happening, it's hard to tell what's what, in the mess."

Jack frowned, and idly scratched the neck of Mulder and Scully, along the back, as he pondered. There was someone out there, doing something. The strange portal Fiona had found, that she'd opened and taken him and Damien through into the Shadow Realm, proved it.

"At this rate, I really only have one course of action," he said.

Damien raised a brow. "Which is?"

“Talk to Black Blood, or his rivals.” He was playing diplomat with werewolves and nightmare monsters, why not godly spirits too?

---

---

~~Eric~~

He didn't stay in human form. Urshul was the better form for exploring, a massive wolf that was so absurdly muscular and gigantic, using the form in Dolareido was a recipe for a Masquerade violation. The Prince was as likely to string him up by his guts, as hunters would be to snipe him from a distance, if he ever used this form where anyone could see him. But in a mostly empty city with not a single human presence, the giant wolf body was the way to go.

Most of the pack felt the same way. Everyone shifted into the Urshul form as they got moving, except for Clara. Avery's second in command stayed human, probably for better communication purposes. The Uratha could communicate in wolf form, but it wasn't exactly elegant or precise as far as he could tell. Grunts, howls, yelps, body language, he could understand them more than a human, but it was a far call from a refined language. And the vampire wouldn't be able to understand half as much.

Natasha bounced a few times, made some tiny squeals, and hugged her two wolves by the manes. It was adorable, seeing the tiny girl hug the gigantic beasts, and lose half herself in the depths of their fur. It almost made Eric vomit from cuteness overload, when Natasha climbed onto Matt's back. It wasn't like Matt couldn't handle her size, considering he was utterly massive, even when compared to the rest of the pack. It was just that, he was a wolf, not a horse. No saddle on that back. But Natasha was light enough, and Matt fluffy enough, that she had no trouble holding on.

He'd decided they should head to the center of South Side and start there, since the Azlu had an agenda of blocking the Gauntlet, and essence flowed mostly freely there. Made sense, hopefully.

Avery warned him it'd be dangerous, but she'd agreed with his reasoning. So, off they went, to hopefully not die.

Flowing Sanctuary continued behind them. The best comparison he could think of for her was an angel, except made of water. How did Avery acquire the help of a spirit like that? More than just help, a contractual obligation. That's how spirits worked, as far as Eric knew, and his instincts told him he was right. Spirits were creatures of contract, with rules to follow. They didn't do charity work. If Avery had this deadly entity working for her, she had to have earned it, or maybe forced it.

Flow didn't seem like a pushover. Hell, as they walked along the Dolareido street, spirits gave way, scurrying into shadows or jumping around buildings to hide. They were easy to spot, now that he was in this form; and they were easy to smell. Was it smell? The wolf half of his brain recognized it as smell, but the spirit half recognized it as something different. If there was a word for it, in English or in the language of spirits, he didn't know it, but his body knew how to sense it.

There was a giant crow in the sky, following them. That was fine, no aggression there. There were lots of shadowy blob creatures moving along the shadows provided by buildings and benches, and his nose followed them far more easily than his eyes. A flock of what he could only guess were spirits of vehicles and asphalt came by, each rolling along as a single tire, with wings of asphalt they used to keep balance. Fucking weird.

It only got weirder as they walked along. The rest of the pack took in the insanity like it was normal, but Eric paused, frequently, as he took in the sights. The sky erupted with a lightning crack and storm every so often, something in the distance, something unnatural, but the pack didn't pay it any mind. There weren't any crows except for the huge one following them, which made the city feel just as empty as the lack of humans, but as his senses tuned in to the Hisil, it felt progressively less empty. Where there should have been crows, he noticed little dark wisps flowing around, scattering as the wolves grew closer. Some of them flew, and seemed like they had wings. Some crawled, joined the blobby shadows at the base of buildings, and flowed into the sewers.

The buildings themselves were all crazy reflections of their physical counterparts. A casino, Tesauffer, looked basically the same, but as they grew closer, he could see the front doors waver like liquid, and the sign itself pulsed like a heartbeat. A nearby strip joint did the same. The street lights were twisted and coiling upward, heading toward the casino signs like a vine chasing sunlight in a maze. The lack of cars felt strange, but tides of motion flowing in and around the buildings filled in for the missing vehicles.

A lot of the spirits were pink, or aqua, or bright lime, and a bunch of colors that announced their nature. Sex, entertainment, fun, bliss, joy, the spirits here were the blatant reflection of the mood in Dolareido's South Side central district. They weren't the people themselves, but manifestations of the things that defined the area. Some looked humanoid, many others didn't, with strange shapes, extra eyes, tails, glowing body parts, and flowing lines. If they went into those buildings, he doubted the spirits were sitting around at booths, chatting, eating and drinking, and ogling girls. They'd be doing ... spirit things, which meant feeding off of the resonating essence in the area, while also trying to get a one-up on competition.

Spirits behaved like wild animals in a way, as far as he knew, and as far as the dark matter of his brain was telling him. But, instead of fighting for resources or mates, they fought to grow and spread themselves. If any of the spirits could grow stronger than the others, they might devour them, and grow into something large and multifaceted. A spirit of sex, and gambling, and other vices, could come out of this arrangement, dominating everything else, devouring them, and taking over South Side, then the city.

That was the sort of thing Avery fought to keep under control, that all Uratha fought to prevent. It was the sort of thing they'd want his help with, a supposed expert on city living.

And there was no denying his instincts wanted to do exactly that. Hunt and kill and keep his territory in a healthy state. Another part of him wanted to bring Jessy here, and indulge in the atmosphere he was feeling, the resonance that filled the walls, the street, the signs and streetlights, and the air. It was a place one could easily get lost in a tide of self-destructive fun.

Funny thing was, as strange as it all looked, and smelled, it still felt familiar. This was his world, in a way, he'd just been living on one side of it, the Gurihal side. Here in the Hisil, the emotions, the concepts and ideas, the geography and how it meshed with the humans it guided, it all created literal things in the Shadow Realm. The spirits embodied everything and manifested in as many ways as his mind could consider.

One of the buildings had a red carpet leading up to the door of glass and lights, and he could see the carpet moved and twisted, creating waves on its length that softly rolled toward the building's door that ushered spirits in. One spirit swam through the air past them, slithering left and right. It looked kind of like an eel, but it had large scales that looked like gold coins. Several more of the asphalt spirits drove by again, following after the eels. One spirit, pink and curvy with nothing but flowing lines, emphasizing feminine features to an absurd degree, hovered past them and drifted into one of the buildings, a strip club.

"Spirits don't get along like this," Clara said as she walked up to his side. "Not normally, anyway. There's so many different kinds here, mixing and interacting."

"Is it l-like, a zoo?" Natasha said. "Lots of d-d-different animals, all near each other, m-most in cages."

Avery shifted back into her human form, as smooth as putting on pants, and gestured to one of the casinos. “More like, everything is on a leash. They come here, feed on the essence that seeps in from the other side, and none of them dare step out of line.”

Flow drifted further forward, and the pack spread apart to let the angel of water move between them. Slowly, she drifted toward one of the casinos, but came to a stop as a metal gate began to move.

No, not a metal gate. Something vaguely humanoid made of metal bars approached, each limb a myriad of straight, hard-edge metal pipes. It was seven feet tall, no head, but it did have two legs and arms. Instead of eyes, glowing sparkles dotted various parts of its metal frame. His instinct said they were eyes, but his instinct also told him to not trust what he saw. Spirits could be crafty.

“Uratha not allowed,” it said. “That includes you.” Well, this spirit had guts.

It was a giant thing of metal bars, in a bustling entertainment district where people spent hundreds of thousands of dollars on vices. This was probably some sort of incarnation of the kind of shit Eric did, bouncing for Bloodlust. And many of these places locked up when they were closed, or blocked off paths from customers, using metal gates.

It was a spirit manifestation of a barrier, specific to the environment: casinos and whatnot. Their ban was, naturally, to not let anyone pass who didn't have permission. There was no option in a spirit's will to resist their ban, it was what they were. But what sort of bane would these creatures have? They'd probably take damage from things known for breaking through barriers, especially in this sort of environment. Keycards? Maybe the tools of a professional thief who knew how to pick locks? Blowtorches?

Uratha didn't need to use banes to deal with unruly spirits, but it certainly helped. Against this tin can, any of them could have simply gone Gauru, and ripped it in half. And if Eric's instincts were right, Flow could have done worse to it.

Flow said nothing, not a scoff or chuckle or groan, and floated there in front of the barrier spirit for several moments. She—it was testing the waters probably, no pun intended.

“Scary,” Natasha said, her eyes locked onto the barrier spirit. “Are ... things like that th-the thing ... holding the leash?”

Avery shook her head, and dismissed the barrier spirit with a wrist flick. “Strong, but unable to step outside its narrow purview. It's not why the spirits here are getting along. The war between Black Blood, Street-Tail King, and Red Tide is why.”

Eric's ears twitched, and he turned his head, looking between the various spirits before watching Avery closely.

Natasha blinked, confused, and let her eyes drift back to Avery. “I d-don't understand.”

“The politics of spirits are a giant mess you don't want to get stuck in, vampire,” Avery said. “I—”

The lights went out.

Avery snapped her fingers, pointed at Tash, and stepped toward the center of the street. Tash hopped off of Matt, and moved to the center of the street as well, as all the werewolves collapsed into what Eric could only assume were battle stations. There was no light except for the pulsing moonlight above, but that was plenty for a werewolf.

The spirits around them panicked, and vanished. The sneaking shadows slipped into manholes or alleyways. The barrier spirit stepped back and into the building it was guarding, and the liquid doors of the casino opened for it like oil around water. The spirits driving by on wheels sped off, and the flying eels flew into casinos, bars, strip clubs, and anything that had walls to protect them. In seconds, the place went quiet.

The familiar weight of something alien, something massive, something dark and cold and twisted fell over him, and he snarled through clenched teeth as he backed up closer to the pack. A glance back at Natasha showed she'd pulled a pistol out of her pants, and had a knife in her hand. Silver. She was smart enough to not say anything at least, and draw attention to herself. He grit his teeth and looked away, back to the streets and sky, looking for what could possibly be affecting the area so directly.

“I ain't ever see such a thing,” the darkness said in a Southern drawl. “Bunch of dogs come through my home, with a vampire to boot, and didn't have the sense to ask for permission first?”

Oh shit. Yeah, he really should have listened to Avery and avoided South Side central.

Chapter 98

~~Antoinette~~

“Does he speak?”

“No.”

Antoinette sighed as she glared at the bound man. Two thralls were seeing to his body, cleaning and maintaining Sándor so he did not drown in his bodily fluids, or die of starvation. An unfortunate consequence of keeping a prisoner alive was handling the frustrating elements of biology.

It was not a process she was unfamiliar with. She kept several prisoners in her tower, after all, emergency sources of blood should she or an ally need them. Dealing with biological functions was a necessity. But, with her prisoners, normally they were of no threat, and could be handled easily. The Begotten, on the other hand, was a dangerous foe, and it paid to be wary with such creatures.

She waited until her thralls were done, before she closed the door of the cell, leaving her and Daniel in the dark with the monster. With a sigh, she turned on the light of her phone, and set it in her breast pocket. Its light was plenty for Kindred to see by, despite the fabric covering it.

Sándor’s back, and the symbol carved there, remained unchanged. Frustration coursed through her, and she clenched her fists tight as she glared at the symbol. Natasha was convinced it would heal with time, but without a time frame, the wait was proving infuriating. They needed the knowledge this man could provide to track down and deal with the hunters, and in his current state, he was useless.

“You are still convinced your Auspex cannot unmask the secrets of his mind?”

Daniel nodded, walking around the kneeling creature as he kept his chin between his gloved fingers. “Jack was correct. The seal protects his mind. Only brute force can get through it, and Jack was probably correct about the consequences.”

Not only was Jack likely correct about the consequences, he was the only Ventrue in the city strong enough to attempt such a feat. Viktor could have performed such a task, and so could poor Julias, she was sure. In both circumstances, it seemed like Sándor would have been damaged for the experience, and perhaps rendered useless. If Jack attempted to enter the man’s mind, he was convinced his curse would rip and tear Sándor’s psyche until he was beyond saving.

To know her little Ventrue had been given such power, cursed with it and its baser desires, gnawed at her endlessly. She wanted to help him, save him, free him from his burden. But there was no denying that it was a valuable tool that could spell the end for the hunters, if they could find them. Knowing her love, he would carry his burden, and march into the hunters, wading through fire and bullets until they were defeated.

Defeated, and dead. There was no doubt in her mind that her love would succumb to rage, upon finding the hunters, and that he would destroy everything in his path to exact his revenge. While she could not fault him for that, displays such as his crow summoning at the hospital could not be tolerated. If he brought the eye of the media upon her city a second time with such a reckless display of power, she would be forced to act.

It was difficult to tell, if Jack Terry was someone should could control, if it came to such a circumstance. She was confident that, if she was forced to use might, she could deal with Garry, Maria, and Michael. Jack Terry, on the other hand, was an enigma, now that the curse permeated his being. She could still sense and feel the young Kindred she had first met, but now she could also feel the inflated power his curse provided. Every moment in his presence had her confused, and not sure how to manage the strange presence and its two halves.

Groaning, she shook her head and gestured to the Begotten. “The longer I let this man remain here, the longer he is useless to me. I cannot let this advantage be wasted.”

“Agreed, but I don’t see any other options. And besides, with him trapped here, he can’t help Jeremiah.”

That was true. For all the annoyance it brought her that she could not rip information from the prisoner’s mind, he also could not help his masters while trapped within her tower. That would have to do for now.

She motioned for her sheriff to follow, and stepped out in the long hallway, deep within her labyrinth of black marble. “Are you excited to see Elaine, old friend?”

That earned a pause from the Mekhet, and she struggled to not chuckle at her friend’s discomfort. Earning any reaction from the stone was always something to be cherished.

“Is she here yet?”

“Non. I assume she will arrive within the next few days.”

“I ... see.”

It was too delightful, and she could no longer hold back her chuckles as she started up the stairs. “Daniel, she is a beautiful woman, intelligent, and as devoted to the order as either of us. And she is fun, as devoted to finding joy in our second lives as I ever was. Why do you resist her so?"

The man frowned, but the almost cataclysmic shift of the stars that would lead to a genuine expression on his face, faded away, taking the frown with it, and leaving her with the usual stone face of her friend. As much as she loved Daniel, she could not understand how Elaine could find his concrete-wall personality so enticing. Antoinette trusted him, valued his opinions and wisdom, and enjoyed his company. But she did not wish to smother him with her sexuality, unlike Elaine, who had expressed her desire for Daniel to her on several occasions.

Perhaps she should not have warned Jack of her potential advances? Elaine was difficult to predict. The woman had joined Antoinette on many of her more absurd sexual adventures, while at the same time, had engaged in the occasional, far more reserved relationship.

Thinking of her brought up more than a few wonderful memories, that quickly became bitter. Elaine had joined her several times, when Antoinette dated her childe Tony, and Elaine had long warned her that the man was devolving into a self-involved, destructive twit. Antoinette should have heeded her advice.

"I resist her," he said at last, "because I do not like her. She's ... volatile."

Antoinette sighed and shrugged. "It may surprise you to learn that all women are, perhaps, a touch volatile, old friend." Though that was hardly unique to women, it simply manifested differently compared to men. She knew what Daniel meant though, that he preferred predictable interaction, while Elaine had drifted through England hundreds of years ago, whoring herself for coins, purely for the entertainment of it rather than any need to hunt in such a manner. She had a long history of eccentric pursuits and experiences.

Daniel did not care about the woman's sexual exploits, but he did care about calm waters. Antoinette had long been of the mind that the man could do with a few stones tossed into his waters, to stir and add a ripple here or there, but the man was ancient at this point, and would not budge.

“And Athalia?” she said.

Daniel sighed, adjusted his glasses, and waited for the elevator. “What of her?”

“You pursued her once, did you not?”

“That was—”

“Come, Daniel, do not take me for a fool. She trusted you, and only you, before she met Jack Terry. I saw the look on your face, when you escorted her to my ball. You are interested in her.”

“I...” He was surprised. Good. It served an elder well to be reminded that they did not know everything, and Daniel had not realized how obvious his interest in unstable Athalia was.

“She is far more volatile than Elaine,” she said.

“She's young, and ... and her volatility is not a simple state of her personality. It's a result of her circumstance.”

“You believe that, were her circumstances more stable, she would be as well?”

“I had hoped, but I guess we'll never know.”

She sighed with that, and lowered her head to look at the floor as the two of them stepped onto the elevator. “Indeed.”

There was no denying the inevitable reality. The hunters were going to perish eventually, now that they had both lost their enforcer, and their numbers had dwindled to Jack's assaults. It was simply a matter of time before Angela was dead, and Athalia would become more unstable. Would she strive for revenge, or accept her daughter's necessary death? Antoinette struggled to imagine any parent accepting their child's death, no matter if it were deserved.

"I ... had planned for another ball," Antoinette said, "but I believe it will be best to wait until the hunter threat is eliminated."

"Athalia will not be invited, I presume."

"I do not believe so, no. My childe knows her by name, and what her daughter has done. Were they to meet, I do not believe it would end well, for either of them." Young as Samantha was, a Daeva was a dangerous creature when strength was the deciding factor. Doubly so, for a mother wronged and robbed of her child.

"Your childe, she ... she seems a lot nicer than Tony ever was."

Antoinette smiled at that, and nodded as she touched her lips with a couple fingers. "Not so nice that she would not throw herself at Athalia in a fit of rage, should they ever meet. But yes, Samantha is a breath of fresh air, I must admit. I can now appreciate where my love earned his honest soul."

The doors opened up, and she stepped into her primary meeting room, high in her tower, with Daniel following.

"You think he's being honest?"

Stopping, she turned and looked at Daniel with a raised brow. "You do not think Jack has been honest with me, about the curse?"

"I think he's more concerned with keeping you happy, and safe. What he's shared about his curse, is probably only what he felt necessary.”

With a long groan, she stepped passed the meeting table, and instead took a stand by the grand window overlooking her city. “I suspect you are correct. But do not underestimate my little Ventrue. He will either bear his burden, or expose his need when it is required.” Ventrue hubris would not destroy him, as it had Viktor.

However, she was no fool. For all her lover’s intelligence and tenacity, she could not assume he could predict the future. It was in his, and her best interest, to plan for many outcomes, including the worst.

For now, her primary goal was finding the hunters, and eliminating them. She sat down at the table, and began preparations for the next Primogen meeting. Terra Den continued to push on Invictus corporations, irritating the Invictus and doubtless soon to instigate confrontations in some form or another. And while the two covenants were free to poke and prod each other, jousting as they fought for territory, she had to manage their petty squabbles before they erupted into war.

Insufferable children, honestly.

~~Natasha~~

She slid off of Matt’s back, pulled out her weapons, and started spinning around in a borderline panic. She knew that voice. She didn’t like that voice. And this time, she was in its realm.

Her jaw dropped as her eyes flicked around, spotting movement in the darkness. The only source of light was the moon above, and that was enough to illuminate the pustules of black ooze that started to trickle over the buildings. It seeped down the walls, thick like sludge, and built on itself in heavier, and bigger waves. Soon it fell onto the sidewalks, and filled the cracks and crevices before it started to flow onto the streets.

Natasha looked at the pack, but none of them were moving. Clara and Avery were in human form, and they certainly looked like they were ready for a fight, but they weren't running. Running would have been good. Running would have been smart. If Black Blood had come for them, they didn't have the protection of its limitations in the physical world. They were in the spirit world, and the entity would have no trouble unleashing its full power here, as far as she understood.

But the pack remained. Eric, she could see, was looking quite jumpy, and he backed up into the pack as he snapped his ears around. Well, it was his idea to start here first. He was probably feeling guilty for leading them here. Avery had to know Black Blood's locations though, or at least what it was capable of, and no way would she just blindly follow Eric here if it was too dangerous.

It was hard to imagine Avery being ok with Black Blood's unplanned arrival, but she and Clara folded their arms across their chests, and waited, eyes locked onto the oncoming blobs of black puss that flowed. More of the gross liquid leaked onto the street, the cracks and crevices of the buildings and streets no longer capable of handling its total mass. The air grew cold, and smelled of death; not rotting flesh, but death itself, something she didn't realize was a smell on its own. It was. The city had gone quiet, the chirps, barks, and talking of spirits vanishing into the growing blackness.

"We don't need permission to be here, Black Blood," Avery said, glaring around at the growing pile of obsidian water. "And we're not here for you. Let us pass."

Please don't be mean to the scary alien creature thing, please please.

"I have lain claim to these streets and walls, dog."

Natasha squealed as an arm shot out of the black ooze on the street before them. A huge arm. A huge, absurdly skinny arm. Bones! Natasha gulped as she stared at the arm, and how it managed to reach from the street to the top of one of the casinos, four floors up. It was a skeleton arm, colored black, and dripping with the gross liquid.

Flowing Sanctuary drifted over the asphalt, and set herself between the wolves and the entity crawling out of the pits of Hell. Another arm reached up through the ooze, big enough to crush a bus, and soon the entity's skull emerged as well. Skeleton was right. Natasha froze, unable to gulp or shiver or anything, as her eyes took in the sight of the gigantic thing pulling itself out of the street.

It stopped once it got its ribcage out of the Earth, but that was enough to have the black skeleton towering over them. It placed its elbows on the street, like someone resting at the edge of a pool, skull pointed down at them. Unlike Athalia and the creepy white dots that sat in the center of her skull eye sockets, the giant skeleton was only a skeleton; as much as any human skeleton bigger than any dinosaur could be 'only', with no glowing eye dots. Black ooze dripped from its eye sockets, and trickled down over the colossal bones, into the pool the monster came out of.

The black waves inched closer, but Flowing Sanctuary pushed them away with her body. For a moment, Natasha thought it might have been a sort of attack, but Flow didn't react with anything more than gentle, lapping waves of crystalline clear blue. Black Blood wasn't attacking them. Black Blood was just being itself, a titanic entity of ... she didn't know. But she felt it, felt something horrible, and cold, and heavy pressing down on her, as the skeleton creature's skull blocked out the pulsing moon above.

"You do not own this city," Flow said. Such a beautiful, strong voice. It reminded Natasha of an angel, the sort that could boom their voice in the movies, so entire areas could hear them.

Black Blood laughed, and lowered his head toward the water spirit. “I am this city, Flowing Sanctuary.”

Avery shook her shoulders out a bit, and stepped up to stand beside the water spirit. Flow’s base, the wide splashing waves of clear blue, parted to give Avery a place to walk.

“Not only are you fighting Street-Tail King, and Red Tide for this place, Black Blood, meaning you’re rather busy, but you are, as you said, the city.” She snorted, and rubbed her thumb across her nose once. “Dolareido welcomes all who come searching for cures to what ails them, doesn’t it?”

Black Blood laughed. Southern accents and laughter normally mixed to create a lovely sound; not so with Black Blood. Its big, terrible voice, with strange rasps hidden underneath, made every sound grate on Natasha’s soul, until she could feel ice building in her dry veins.

This thing could kill her. This thing could kill all of them. She’d seen the werewolf pack hunt and fight, and while their strength and endurance were massive, Black Blood could swing an arm and decimate a building. Fighting it made as much sense as a mouse trying to kill an elephant.

Natasha put her knife and pistol away, doing her best to keep her fingers steady as she did.

“You navigate dangerous waters, dog,” Black Blood said.

“Yeah well, we know you as much as you know us.”

The spirit snorted, and leaned in closer, head only a few feet from Flow and Avery. Good god it could have opened its mouth and swallowed them both.

“The protection I provide breaks the moment you cross the line, dog. So you see here. If you or your pack violate any of my rules, be assured I will deal with you personally.”

Natasha blinked. Black Blood apparently considered itself to be the city. Spirits had banes that hurt them, and bans that determined their behavior. If Black Blood, a colossal entity that may as well have been the Devil itself, as far as Natasha could tell, considered itself to be the city, then that had to affect its behavior. So, as long as Avery obeyed the rules of the city, Black Blood couldn't touch her?

She doubted it was that simple, or that limiting to the creature. But she didn't understand how any of this worked, and until she was back in the safety of her boss's tower, she'd keep her assumptions to a minimum. Avery may have been comfortable playing by the spirit's rules, but she wasn't.

“We've violated none of your laws, Black Blood,” Clara said. “Step aside.”

The god of death laughed, quiet and controlled, as it lifted itself up a bit, and leaned over Avery, Clara, and Flow, toward her. Little, itty-bitty her, who was doing her best to disappear into the fur of Matt beside her. Shit.

“I have right over this dominion, dog. And I reckon I have a right to asks questions. Such as to this tiny creature here.” One of those gigantic hands let go of a nearby rooftop, and it came down onto the street to support the god's weight as it leaned in closer. Natasha, or any of the Uratha, could have fit into that hand completely.

“M-Me?” she managed to say, voice cracking and barely getting above a whisper.

“You, little lady.”

Avery growled, walked past the giant arm of black, oozing bone like it didn't matter, and came to stand beside her. "Natasha, be careful with your words. Don't agree to anything. Make no deals. Accept no gifts."

She stared at Avery for a second, before her eyes locked onto the giant onyx skull again. It didn't breathe, but it moved, shifting about with the idle motions of most living entities. Creepy. Very creepy.

But this was Black Blood, an entity that helped Jacob. It'd saved her and the others from Sándor's nightmare. It'd probably been in Dolareido for a long time. Despite how scary it looked, and how hilarious strong it must have been, it wasn't some thug looking to squash her and unleash violence randomly. It was smart. Which, made it scarier.

"W-What do you want t ... t-to know?"

"You're Natasha Vola, right? Yes, I remember you now. I pulled you out of that monster boy's nightmare chamber. Heck of a feat, if I do say so myself."

"R-Right! Um ... thank you, for that." No dealing, no gifts, nothing. Questioning every word she came up with was tiring. She never was any good at the Danse Macabre.

"I understand the kid, Jack Terry, he's unleashed something pretty nasty, hasn't he?"

She froze, and glanced to Clara and Avery. They were looking at her with raised eyebrows. She hadn't told Matt or Art, or any of the pack, not her place. Now was most definitely not the place, but it wasn't like she could just ignore the alien god's request. Could she?

"W-Why do you ... want to know about J-J-Jack?" Ok, answering a question with a question was a recipe for problems, but Avery and Clara seemed alright with it.

“I’ll answer your question if you answer mine, little lady.”

Shit. She looked to Clara and Avery again, but the two werewolves looked pensive. She expected for them to immediately shake their head or something, but apparently a trade of information like this didn’t bother them. Or maybe, they were curious about Jack as well.

“I ... sorry, I c-can’t tell you. Jacob, uh ... he’ll p-probably ... probably tell you. But I w-w-won’t speak ... for my friend.”

Black Blood chuckled, and Natasha did her best to not visibly wince. Something about its voice was terrifying, like she was listening to Death itself; if Death lived in Texas. And the fact she’d just told Death that she wasn’t willing to give it information herself, in an effort to protect her friend, was asking for Death to slap her upside the head.

But it didn’t. It looked at her, as far as she could tell based on where its skull was pointed, and chuckled some more.

“Tough little thing, ain’t ya?”

“I ... I try.”

“This is pointless,” Avery said. She stepped in closer to Tash, stood in front of her, and glared at the enormous creature. “We’re not here for you, Black Blood, or your rivals. We’re here looking for —”

“The Azlu, I reckon.”

Clara stepped up and joined her leader, between Tash and the creature. “You know where it is?”

Having two Uratha between her and Black Blood was enough to let Tash relax, but only a little. Glances around in the dark showed movement, subtle things hiding around the buildings. Some things poked their heads out of manholes, while others peeked over rooftop edges. Spirits were watching, hiding in the dark, hiding behind benches and streetlights, hiding in alleys and behind barriers.

They were afraid of Black Blood, but they respected it. Thin line between fear and respect, she supposed.

“Damn spider is hard to find. It’s hiding, like you figured, but not here. Essence flows here, as you can see, with no trouble. So git, and look elsewhere.”

Matt didn’t like that. The enormous wolf bared his fangs and snarled, body going rigid with tense muscles. Art did the same, coming in closer and standing beside Avery as he matched Matt’s growls. But before any more of the gigantic wolves could start growling and lead to some sort of fight, Avery waved a hand back at the pack.

“Back off guys. You know the deal, he can’t touch us if we obey the rules.”

Another of the wolves began to stand upright. The rest of them looked, and Tash chewed on a lip as she watched Eric reform, his fur disappearing into his clothes as his skeleton adopted the two-legged shape.

Black Blood turned its head down to gaze on the man. “Right, you. I remember you. Another fool that tried to kill that hunter, Jeremiah.”

Eric scratched the back of his neck, and glanced around at the other members of the pack. Other than Avery and Clara, the rest of them remained in their giant wolf forms, still ready to fight based on the muscle tension Natasha could see, and the bared fangs.

“Thanks for that,” Eric said. “But, yeah, I don’t care what beef you have with Avery and her friends. I’m just trying to do a job. Where’s the Azlu?”

Clara and Avery both winced. Apparently, they didn’t like the way Eric was talking to Black Blood. Hell, Natasha didn’t like the way he was talking to Black Blood. If they all kept disrespecting it, would it retaliate? Did its nature allow it to?

The god creature chuckled again, and pushed itself back up to standing straight, lower half of its body still hidden in the pool of black covering the street. “I can respect that, little dog. And I admit, it’s the job of dogs to run off vermin.” The skeleton lowered its mass, until its colossal head was only several feet from Eric. To Eric’s credit, he didn’t step back, but there was no way for anyone to not tremble a little when so close to something like that, even someone as obstinate as Eric. “I wager that pest is hiding in Devil’s Corner.”

Devil’s Corner. Natasha shivered, and looked to Avery to see her reaction. The pack leader groaned, and sighed. Ok, so the pack leader of the deadly Uratha was not happy about her quarry being in Devil’s Corner, which meant Devil’s Corner was probably not a fun place to be in the Hisil.

“ ... thanks,” Eric said.

“Don’t thank me, boy. I hope y’all find yourself at the end of its blades. And better sooner than later.” And with that, the giant skeleton began to ease itself into the ocean of black that coated the street. “Not you though, vampire. No beef with you. Happy trails.”

“W-Wait!” Natasha ran past the wolves, past Clara and Avery and their confused gazes, and past Eric. She stopped in front of Black Blood, hands held in fists at her side, and she glared up at the creature as best as she could manage. It wasn’t a good glare, but it was enough to stop the enormous spirit from its descent.

“Yes, little lady?”

“I ... I ... w-want to know. You’ve b-been working with Jacob for a long t-t-time, haven’t you?”

“Gutsy of you to ask, after shooting me down.” Chuckling, the skeleton lowered its head over her, until she was literally two feet away from its teeth and jaw bone. This close, she could feel the strange cold pouring off its body. Calling it cold wasn’t right, but it was the only way her body could interpret the feeling. Cold and death. If Natasha had been frozen in a block of ice and tossed into a ravine in the Arctic, to wither away to her Beast’s hunger until she fell into torpor, it probably would have felt like this.

“S-Sorry, just, I ... Dolareido’s been going through hard t-times, lately. Everything’s turned upside down in the past couple y-years, and everyone’s looking for someone t-t-to ... blame.” She didn’t want to say that Antoinette suspected Jacob, and Black Blood especially, of doing bad things and perhaps threatening the city. But it was the truth. “Jacob, he ... he trusts you. And I d-d-don’t believe Jacob is ... is...”

“Give it up, Tash,” Avery said, growling as she joined her. “Black Blood couldn’t begin to give a shit about our troubles. All that matters to it is its city, and its ruling of it. Only reason it’s giving us a tip about the Azlu is it wants it gone, not because—”

“You think you know me, dog. You’re just an ant, biting off more than they can chew.” The skeleton god shook its head as it sank deeper into the pool of black at Natasha’s feet. “And if you’re looking to stay alive in the coming tide, little lady, I suggest you trust Jacob a bit more than you have been, and maybe you keep your head down. More than one elder vampire out there, fucking with shit they should know to leave well alone.”

Maria. It was talking about Maria.

She opened her mouth, and closed it. Instead of putting her foot in her mouth and tipping off everyone that she suspected Maria was doing something dangerous, she stayed quiet, and watched the alien disappear into the black Earth. As it left, the tide of oozing black faded away, no longer combating Flow's waves. The giant blobs of onyx drooling down the walls of the buildings around them faded, or sank into the hole with Black Blood. The weight of the cold death went with it, letting its grip on her shoulders go as it sank into the ocean of obsidian.

Once the haze of black that sat on them all was completely gone, all the wolves started breathing again. It was almost a shock, hearing a bunch of lungs kick in like that; she was used to the silence of meeting rooms filled with vampires. But once Black Blood was gone, the wolves all visibly relaxed, or at least stopped looking like they were ready to fight. Considering the size of Black Blood, she had a hard time imagining the Uratha lasting twenty seconds in a tussle. Then again, she doubted the Uratha could only use brute strength. Then again ... again, she doubted Black Blood was really just a giant black skeleton.

“Natasha,” Avery said, “the fuck did I tell you, before we left?”

Uh oh. Natasha shrank, taking a step back from the angry woman. Art and Matt, both still in their Urshul forms, came up behind her, and she set a hand against Matt's shoulder as she put her back to his side.

“T-To ... stay out of the way.”

“Yeah, I did. So the fuck do you think you're doing, talking with—”

Clara threw up a hand and joined them. “Avery, come on, you saw Black Blood engage her first.”

“No reason for her to follow up.” Glaring daggers, Avery pointed a finger at Natasha. “You vampires keep sticking your fingers into shit you shouldn't."

Natasha blinked at her, and struggled to hide the realization that clicked. Avery didn't want her talking to Black Blood, and it wasn't just because she was worried about the old spirit. This was about Minerva.

Tempted, so very tempted, to ask her why she killed Jacob's lover. How could a vampire do something so horrible in their research, that werewolves felt the need to kill her? And it wasn't like Minerva was just someone they could kill without consequence. She'd been Antoinette's friend, and Jacob's love. The only reason Avery was alive was because of her old leader Simon, as far as Natasha knew, and Simon wasn't a factor anymore.

"S-Sorry," she said.

Clara shook her head, and put a hand on Avery's shoulder to drag her back. "Don't be sorry, Tash. We know shit's been crazy in the city since we showed up. Since a year before that, from what we've heard. I'd bet money Black Blood's involved."

Shrugging her shoulder free of Clara, Avery walked toward Eric, and tilted her neck far enough to earn a loud crack everyone could hear. "Let's go."

"Go?" he said.

"To Devil's Corner."

Eric frowned for a moment, and glanced around at the various spirits. The oddities began poking their noses — if they had them — out of their hiding holes, and resumed their hustling and bustling. Natasha had expected spirits to look colorful, and perhaps see-through, but Safe hadn't looked that way, or the spirit of secrets they'd caught. They looked like strange creatures out of fairy tales and childish whimsy, or freakish nightmares. The spirits around her continued the trend of bizarreness.

Good thing those weird wraith things hadn't shown up. She'd never seen one, but Jack had described it to her in one of their little meetings, Matt and Art had mentioned them as well, and it was a scary thing to imagine. She'd almost hoped to see one though, because that spirit of secrets the Prince had captured said Black Blood's wraiths had spoken with Maria. Much as it was in Natasha's best interest to not stick her nose where it didn't belong, she wouldn't be much of a dragon of the Ordo Dracul, if she didn't seek out answers to mysteries whenever she could.

Besides, as much as the thought of Maria still irritated her, the elder had tried to reconcile with Natasha, a little. And Natasha never could hold a grudge.

Shaking his head, Eric nodded in the direction of Devil's Corner. "We've been here for a couple hours already."

"Hunts can last a long time," Avery said. "Let's go. Besides, we're not going to engage."

Natasha sighed, and rubbed her neck into Matt's neck, and Art's. Fluffy, warm, and soft. They both gave her a quick lick, and she giggled as she felt their tongues on her skin. Big, dumb, floppy dog kisses. Art at least tried to be a little artful with his, getting her cheek once, but Matt licked her like an excited Bernese Mountain Dog might. Slobber was inevitable. She giggled again, and climbed up onto the big guy's back.

The whole pack changed into their giant wolf forms, and began the walk to Devil's Corner.

~~Eric~~

He hadn't expected that. Black Blood showing up and causing trouble, he'd partly expected. He hadn't expected the godly entity to leave without causing any real problems, so that was nice. He also hadn't expected Natasha to have the guts to talk to it, which had been impressive from the very tiny woman.

Don't underestimate the tiny vampire, Eric. She went with Jack on that rescue mission for a reason. According to Jessy, she was over fifty years embraced, and was both smart, and deadly quick. He was glad to have her with him on this — hopefully — dry run of hunting an Azlu. Except, now they were going to Devil's Corner, and it wasn't because of her input, but Black Blood's.

He didn't trust it. The pack didn't trust it. Doing anything Black Blood suggested was a bad idea, but at the same time, Black Blood did save his life, Nathasha's too, and Clara's, and Matthew and Arturo's. And Jessy's.

He frowned, and shook his head a few times, causing his ears to flap against his head slightly; he'd changed back once they started moving. The Urshul form was empowering, and it was also clouding his thoughts. Difficult to think about complicated webs of manipulation and deceit, when his wolf brain was focused on tracking down his prey. Focus on that, figure out whether you can trust Black Blood later.

He breathed deep the smell of Dolareido, the spirit half of it anyway, and looked over his shoulder. Everyone was behind him, while Avery walked alongside him, her nose up and taking in the smells, same as him. She was following his lead, but she knew the way to Devil's Corner, same as him.

He didn't like being at the front like this. It'd have been better to have him follow, but she seemed intent on having him drive, and that was weird as fuck. It was almost like a test, to see if he was good enough to join their pack, which he had no intention of doing.

Besides, he hated tests. Always did horrible in high school; test anxiety was a bitch, and cramming the day before certainly didn't help.

So, of course, he was nervous. He had a dozen Uratha behind him, watching his every move, following him and waiting to see what he'd do. No doubt Caleb told them about his fuck up, and how he lost control in their tussle. Well, it was the bastard's fault, pushing him so far. Eric thought he handled himself pretty well when transformed, all things considered.

Naturally, while thinking about being in his true werewolf form, where the aggression exploded and the hunger for action boiled over, he couldn't help but think about Jessy. And in his monster-sized wolf form, that aggression and instinct may have been muffled compared to the Gauru form, but it was still there, and in larger supply than it would be in normal wolf or human form. Thinking about Jessy was a bad idea right now, but god damn, the sight of her ass spreading around his dick as he pinned her to the bed underneath his weight, was burned into his memory. Separating the thrill of his inhuman forms, especially Gauru, with sex, was going to be impossible, thanks to her.

He growled, shaking his head, trying to focus on the task at hand. It earned a look from the wolf next to him, and he kept walking as if nothing had happened, signaling its meaninglessness. Focus, pay attention, look around you.

Dolareido, in the Hisil, was a scary place, largely because he didn't recognize it, but did. Kind of like when you put a scary smile on a teddy bear, it became creepy, sitting somewhere between normal and terrifying. The shadow of Dolareido was like that. He recognized the places, the buildings, but it all felt off and weird.

There were no cars, but there were plenty of those tire asphalt creatures rolling by. Some were chased by creatures that looked like they too were made of asphalt, with bodies that looked more serpent like. The closer they got to Devil's Corner, the less he saw of those flying coin eels; probably spirits of money and spare change, or disposable income. The streetlights, twisted like corkscrews, pointed back the way he came, toward the center of South Side. All roads lead to Rome, he supposed, or in this case, to the money.

The sky pulsed with a moonlight heart beat, mixed with strange colors from chaotic streaks that cut across its black surface. Instinct told him the colors above were spirits of a sort, but it was hard to wrap his mind around what they could be. The buildings around him were tilted and dilapidated, far more than Devil's Corner actually looked; yeah, reflecting how beat up and downtrodden a place Devil's Corner was. Closer to North Side, the people of the Carthian district were hardy and honorable. Devil's Corner, on the other hand, was filled with crime and problems. And the deeper he moved into Devil's Corner, the more he could see that being reflected.

Eyes watched them, from the dark, and there was plenty of dark. The twisting streetlights flickered, and many didn't shine as bright as they should have. Alleyways had shadows that slithered up into the air, and adopted forms like wavy strips of black, with arms, and two, tiny glowing white dots for eyes.

A blurry wisp of blue ran by, and only once it got a little closer could Eric see through its subtle glow, and to the tentacles underneath. It had several eyes, each wide and blinking, and terrified. It sped past them, half hovering half running. Behind the fleeing creature, a hulking, humanoid mass followed, tall and heavy. It had no glow, but instead marched upon two legs that looked like they belonged on Goliath. Its enormous torso held four arms, and the shoulders connected with no head between them. Upon its chest, two small eyes and a giant, shark teeth-filled mouth sat where a stomach should have been. It stood at least ten feet tall, and its skin looked like dirty brown fur.

It would have looked comical, in a cartoon. But standing there only fifty feet away, the creature looked like something out of a nightmare; and he had the experience to make that claim, he supposed, after having met a couple nightmares. It leaned forward, walked like a gorilla, and the mouth on its gross stomach-face drooled as it sauntered. The air around it reeked of rage and strength, and Eric could picture what this monster would do to him if it got a good grip on his body with its four hands: tear him into literal pieces.

The fuck kind of spirit was it? It was chasing something that looked terrified, so, was the thing running away a fear spirit? Or rather, a spirit of being afraid? So maybe the brute chasing it was something that fed on fear then. A bully, maybe, or something more sinister. Devil's Corner had bullies, thugs, and assholes that fed on people's situations.

It turned to look at him, and Eric bared his fangs. Kill? He turned to face the rest of the pack, but Avery shook her head. No kill then. Probably for the best. It looked like it could put up a hell of a fight, and it wasn't like it was screwing over the ecosystem of Devil's Corner. Maybe tilting it in its favor more than Eric would have liked, but Devil's Corner's balance of poverty and crime had remained largely unchanged for a century or more.

Still, it sucked seeing something like that gross monster walk around. If they brought it down, what would happen? Instinct told him its 'influence' would lessen, but he didn't really know how that'd manifest. That's why he was on this trip, to learn about how this shit worked beyond what his new half-spirit-wolf-brain-thing was telling him.

More things he didn't like the look of made an appearance. A gangly, tall, ghost-white humanoid creature sat in one of the alleys, a leg hanging out onto the sidewalk. It had a gray cloak filled with holes, and the creature's face was hidden in a black mask. A plague doctor's mask, with two large, black eyes. More grotesque, was the creature's hands. They would have looked human, barring the size and lanky nature, except the fingers were needles.

Didn't take a genius to figure out what kind of spirit it was.

Growling, Eric began to stand up. His clothes reemerged, muscles shrank, and he growled through the pain as his snout was sucked back into his skull. Transforming didn't hurt as much anymore, but it was still a pain, especially when he rushed it.

He turned to the pack, and Natasha, and gestured to the spirit of drugs and whatnot. "We seriously just going to leave this thing here?"

Clara and Avery transformed once again, far smoother than he could, and stepped up to join him.

"The ecosystem here is stable," Avery said. "I don't see any reason to fuck with it, when we don't know what'll happen."

Clara didn't look too convinced. "I think we could make this city a better place, getting rid of shit like that." Once she pointed a finger at the tall, lanky creature, it got up and bolted into the darkness. Of course it'd be a natural at disappearing, once it was in the spotlight, just like back in the physical world.

Avery sighed, shaking her head as she turned to face her pack mate. "You know it's not that simple. One thing affects another, in ways you might not expect."

"That doesn't mean we can't work at it, and get this shit hole corner of the city up to a better quality of life."

"Antoinette's doing better than most cities. You think you can just fix a complex system like people, by temporarily removing spirits like that?" Avery growled, and jammed a finger against Clara's shoulder. “And you think the Prince would even appreciate us busting our ass for it? Hell, shit could escalate. She might not like our help.”

“That’s never stopped you before.”

“I learned a thing or two since then!”

The argument went on, and on. The pack backed away a little, and Art had the presence of mind to nudge Natasha further away; apparently, these arguments were common. Eric, on the other hand, never had much presence of mind when it came to arguing.

He stepped up to them, and opened his mouth, preparing for a swift death. “I think—”

“I think,” a voice from the darkness said, “that you should leave well enough alone.”

Eric, Clara, and Avery all turned to face the alleyway. The voice was raspy, a loud whisper, and it sent chills up Eric’s body, as if spiders were crawling up his legs. He couldn’t see the source, but his ears told him it wasn’t too far, from the same direction that spirit with the needle fingers ran off to.

Avery and Clara came closer to the alley, and the pack followed, creating a wall of muscle and fangs, a fortress the two women could fall back to.

“Street-Tail King,” Avery said, teeth clenched together. “Christ, everyone’s trying to get in our way tonight. What do you want?”

“To bargain,” the darkness said. “You seek the Azlu. I will give you knowledge, for a price.”

Ok, there was no way this was a coincidence. Street-Tail King, here, now? Eric knew about the three warring spirits of Dolareido, Black Blood, Red Tide, and Street-Tail King, but all he had were names. Were werewolves celebrities, in the Hisil? Judging by the way other spirits reacted to them, avoided them, and glared, the Uratha were at least infamous. But, that probably didn't warrant being visited by both Black Blood and Street-Tail King. Something was going on.

Eric kept his mouth shut, for now. A glance Natasha's way showed her sneaking past her two boyfriends before they could stop her, and she crept closer, eyes wide and scanning. Desperate to see the spirit, probably.

"What makes you think we're here for the Azlu?" Clara said.

"Overheard. I've been following you." A shape moved in the darkness, something wide, and tall. "You are all far too loud for your own good." The darkness that hid the spirit wasn't natural. It was something the creature brought with it then, something heavy and powerful, something that blanketed the alley to the point Eric wouldn't have been able to see into it even if he transformed.

But he could feel the creature, smell it, and his nose was telling him to stay the fuck away from this raspy, hissing voice in the dark. It was a different sensation than Black Blood, who might as well have been the Devil, as far as Eric's instincts could tell. This creature, on the other hand, felt like something weaker, but dirtier. A dirty rat, like in a mob movie, was the closest his brain could associate. The name Street-Tail King didn't exactly counter the assumption.

"You want it gone too," Avery said. "So don't give me this shit."

"Do I?" It came closer, and a silhouette appeared, hinting at fur along a broad shape that reached from wall to wall of the alley. The creature had to be at least ten feet tall, and now that it was closer, the glow of its eyes, catching the streetlights and pulsing moonlight, gave shape to its face.

That was a rat face. A giant rat face. A lot of the details were lost to the darkness, but he saw ears, a bit of the nose, and the beady eyes — massive on its huge body — shining in the darkness. Eric’s gaze snapped downward at the sight of more movement, and he frowned as the tip of the creature’s tail flicked left and right on the edge of the alleyway shadow. It didn’t look like a rat tail, but asphalt instead. A clump of asphalt, as if someone had torn up a piece of the street, and made it long and rope shaped.

The name Street-Tail made a lot more sense. It was almost a laughable idea, a creature having a tail that looked like asphalt, but the spirits were all strange, and dangerous. Now was not the time to underestimate.

“Of course you want it gone,” Clara said. “And besides, now you’re willing to talk to us? The fuck happened?”

The silhouette shook with its cackling laughter. “I am no fool. I will not expose myself to chaos without reason.”

Avery snorted, cracked her knuckles, and came up to the alleyway. She was a tiny woman, and the silhouette was huge. Looking up was inevitable, but she may as well have been looking down, with the condescending glare she had on. Unlike Black Blood, he got the impression she was comfortable with the idea of taking this creature in a fight.

“Talk, then. What do you want?”

More chuckles from the darkness. “I want many things, Uratha, many you could help with.”

“You know there’s certain things we can’t help you with, spirit.”

“Can’t you?” The creature came a little closer, and Eric took a step back. Yeap, that was a giant rat, standing on its legs, but its arms were longer than a rat’s should have been, and muscular as well.

It wasn't the giant rat that made Eric step back though. Sure, it was huge and scary, but something in Eric's mind told him he and the pack could take down this powerful entity in a fight. A baker's dozen Uratha in their war farms, could rip it into chunks without too much trouble. It wasn't the creature that made him nervous, it was the scurrying movement around its feet.

The various blobby creatures that snuck around Dolareido's buildings, along the cracks where sidewalk met street, where streetlights stood on concrete foundations, where benches were old and broken, they all moved closer to Street-Tail King. They swarmed around its feet, still hidden in the shadow, movement flowing and piling over each other like black oil oozing over anything in its path. They made noises, squeaks, and chirps. Some of the blobs were developed enough to have claws, and some had tails.

"Look, Street," said Clara, "we're trying to hunt down this Azlu. We think it's been active, recovered from what we did to it. We know you want it gone, so can't you just tell us where you think it is?"

"There's no trade in that, no bargain." Its voice filled with chitters, and Eric took a step back as he winced. Not a pleasant sound, high pitched and far louder than any normal rat. "I think—"

"I think," Flow said from behind the pack, "that we shall make no bargain, accept no deal, with Street-Tail King. We violate no laws, and you will not stop us." The angel of water passed the alley, and parts of her water body that glowed with light cut through the darkness.

Street-Tail hissed and squeaked, and backed further away into the black, but not before Eric got an eyeful of the enormous creature. Rat was not good enough to describe its shape, now that Eric could see there was more to it than asphalt and a rat body. Bits of what he could only guess were parts of the city were in the rat's fur, shards of concrete and slabs of metal that must have come from benches, and barbed wire that must have come from the rougher parts of North Side.

The enormous rat was carrying the city on its back, or rather, the city was a part of its back. And more than just the inanimate parts. Things scurried across its spine, more of the rat-like blobs that flowed around its feet, but also smaller things that could only have been cockroaches. Almost like a mother spider and her offspring. No wonder it had an unusually muscular form, if it was carrying all that around with it.

Flow moved on by, and darkness once again hid the enormous creature.

“And,” the rat said, “if I said, I could not only tell you where the Azlu is likely hiding, but why it is here?”

Avery raised a brow. “We know why it’s here, why Azlu and the other hosts do what they do.”

Another one of the wolves began to change. David, a big fellow, white, short blonde hair, came up to the alley.

“Y ... You don’t think...”

“Aaah.” Chuckling, the giant rat slapped its tail against the earth beneath its feet. “The Ithaeur knows of what I speak.”

Everyone in the pack turned to look at David, including Flow.

“David?” Clara and Avery said.

“It’s ... the spirits, they ... they say...” The guy didn’t like eye contact, that was obvious. He kept looking at the floor, and fidgeting as he did. A bit like Natasha, except the little vampire was getting over the fidgeting habits Eric recognized on her. This David fellow looked like a bundle of fireworks that might go off if someone poked him the wrong way.

“What, David?” Avery came up and pat him on the back. Apparently, she knew where to not poke.

“Been hearing ... w-whispers. The choirs, they don’t know h-how, but the Azlu, the two ... they came ... not came. They came because ... something ... unnatural.”

Unnatural? It was hard to think of hosts doing anything natural; not that Eric knew how any of that worked, but the hidden knowledge in his brain had trouble considering the hosts as natural in any sense of the word.

“Wait, the Azlu didn’t come here because it was hunting?” Clara said. “Then ... what the fuck? Why did it come here?”

Sighing, Avery shook her head, groaning. “Not it, they. Two fully formed Azlu came. I knew that was weird, but ... Fuck me. David, why you only bringing this up now?”

“C-Chaos,” David said. “So much noise ... The spirits don’t know what happened. But the Azlu didn’t just ... show up. We ... we should find out what we can.”

“Yesss,” the rat said with a serpent-like hiss. “Most unnatural, the appearance of these monsters, the hosts. I will tell you where the second one hides, where I think it hides, and I will tell you about their arrival. If...” The rat went quiet, waiting for someone to ask the obvious question. But apparently the pack weren’t game to be prompted, and said nothing, waiting. Eventually Street-Tail continued with a humph. “If you will pursue that mystery to its end. Dangerous answers await at the end of this road, ones that I would have you deal with, not myself.”

Clara, David, and Avery looked at each other like a bomb had been laid at their feet.

“You ... can’t expect me,” Avery said, “to agree to such an open-ended deal like that.”

“We have to,” David said with a snap. Both women blinked at him, and the split moment of courage — or fear — that drove him to speak up so plainly vanished. “We ... we have to find out.”

Eric looked between the group, and waited. If this were him, he’d have made an impulse decision, when he was younger. Now, he’d have hesitated; the joys of wisdom forged by experience. Make enough mistakes, and you eventually learn something. What would Avery do?

“ ... we’ll talk later, Street-Tail.” Sighing and running her fingers through her hair, the short blonde motioned to the rest of the pack. “Let’s get out of here, and back home.”

Well, anticlimactic. Smart, but anticlimactic. And honestly he was happy for a little anticlimax. A dangerous decision made in the middle of a dangerous place, with no time to consider? Fuck that.

---

They went back to Avery’s apartment, the Hisil version, and jumped back to the physical world from there. Jumping back into the material realm was dangerous business, supposedly. Crossing the Gauntlet was inherently dangerous, though Avery assured them she’d never run into trouble crossing it. The larger issue was arriving in a place where humans could see. A bunch of people stepping out of thin air would be a problem.

According to Clara, people who saw Uratha doing werewolfy things suffered a sort of temporary insanity, lunacy. Eric had to wonder if it was the work of the strange voice, Luna, that spoke to him sometimes in his dreams. If it was some sort of godly entity, and it certainly seemed like one, doing something like inflicting lunacy on people who saw werewolves at large seemed reasonable. Scary thought.

“We didn’t have to leave,” Matthew said, frowning as he sat down on the couch. The hunger for the hunt was on him no doubt, and Eric couldn’t deny he still felt it. But, Avery was smart to stop it when she did.

“Yes, we did.” Noah shook his head, and took a moment to run his fingers along his shaved scalp. Why hadn’t Avery taken a jab at him for the head, like she had Eric? “Spirits are crafty. No deal comes cheap, and spirits are very good at making sure deals land in their favor, whether you realize it or not — saying this for your sake, Eric. Street-Tail Motherfucker threw us a deal that could end horribly for us.”

“Besides,” Caleb said, with a nod to Eric, “the Azlu probably is in Devil’s Corner, like Black Blood said. We don’t need Street-Tail’s help. And I don’t know about you, but meeting two of the three powers fighting for the city, is enough close encounters with trouble for one night.”

Arturo didn’t look convinced. “We want to stay in this city, right? Hunters in Darkness aren’t meant for fucking travel. We got a good thing here, and I’m not just talking about Matt and me.” He grinned down at the vampire beside him, and she smiled brightly, despite her obvious attempts to hide it. “Avery, you’ve been getting closer to Henry, haven’t you?”

The small woman marched up to the big guy, and jabbed him in the chest with a finger, hard enough to make Art stumble back a foot. “Don’t bring Henry into this. Just cause the rest of you let sex cloud your judgment doesn’t mean I will.”

“So there is sex,” Art said. His words got him another harsh jab, in the stomach, and he coughed on his chuckles as he took another step back.

Clara mirrored Avery's groan, but at least she didn't join in the finger stabbing. "I think what these two idiots are trying to say, is that, Dolareido's as good a place as any to stay, even after we've killed those Azlu."

That was an oddly specific sentence. Eric raised a brow and stepped toward the second-in-command. "Is that the only reason you came to Dolareido, for those two Azlu monsters?"

Avery and Clara both looked to David, and the rest of the pack ceased their mumbling as they looked to the fidgeting guy. It probably wasn't the best idea to do that to the poor man, since it was obvious he struggled with crowds, and doubly so with being the center of attention. But after a few seconds, David gulped down whatever was in his throat, and looked to Eric.

"I ... I brought the family here. Whispers guided me, told me that ... that the hosts would do great harm."

"Whispers?" Eric said. "Like ... Cahalith dreams?"

He shook his head. "No. Something else. There ... there were spirits, and they spoke of the spider hosts and the damage they were inflicting. We ... we had no home, and I thought maybe..."

"David gave us an idea," Avery said as she sat on the back edge of her couch, "and I went with it. I'm here, to deal with the Azlu threat, maybe mend some bridges with that eyeless fucker and Prince big-tits, and, just maybe, find a home for the pack. We've been wandering a long time."

"Dolareido's a nice place," Clara said, her eyes drifting for a moment in thought. "But it's a bomb waiting to explode, with all sorts of craziness from the other side. Now that we're here, we're sure we can help, even after the Azlu are dead. David's idea was a good one."

David winced, scratched his neck, and shook his head again. "But Street-Tail King says the Azlu didn't come here normally. The Azlu, they ... they scurry, and bite, and scratch and tear, and weave ... and devour. They're monsters, and they behave in ... monster ways. If Street-Tail King thinks they behaved unusually, then ... then..."

"Then there's a mystery," Avery said. "I didn't want to tell that fucking rat spirit asshole, but it's an intriguing mystery. Stephanie died for this hunt, and if there's more going on, we owe it to her to find out more." That got some murmurs from the pack, nods and affirmations. "But I'll be damned if I make a deal with a fucking spirit, especially one as sneaky as Street-Tail King, without thinking about every single mother fucking detail first. In the mean time, we can pick up the hunt without you Eric."

"With ... without me?"

Avery smirked at him, with that 'I knew it' look. "Got a taste for the hunt already? All we did was a little scouting."

"I guess ... maybe I did. But, fuck me, I have a job bouncing at Bloodlust." And thus, the first real conflict between being a werewolf and working for vampires.

"Strange thing about being a werewolf and not a vampire, Eric. You can hunt during the day."

Goodbye sleep.

"Maybe I can work out a deal with Jessy instead."

"M-Maybe..." Natasha stepped up, and joined Eric, nodding to him before looking to Avery. "Maybe Jessy can come on the next hunt? I know she'd like th-that."

Clara grinned, rolling her eyes, while Avery frowned and growled.

“ ... I suppose the Invictus would want a piece of this pie sooner or later. Fucking money grubbing assholes.”

The little vampire nodded, but her smile only grew. “Y-Yes, they are. But they’re smart, and they’ll s-s-see this as ... building a bridge. M-M-Maybe you should talk to Jack about it?”

~~Jack~~

The journey back home was a slow one. Jack had little to do but ponder, and Damien pondered beside him. Scully had, at some point, decided to hop onto his shoulder, and Damien barely noticed in the darkness of the tunnels.

So Jack said nothing, but offered a small smile when he glanced at his friend.

“I—whoa!” Damien almost jumped, when he returned the glance, but once he understood the situation, he managed a little chuckle, and continued walking along. “Your doing?”

“No. I think Scully likes you. You have a dark, mysterious vampire appeal.” He clucked and chirped at Scully a few times, and his pet returned a few caws. A connection of Animalism turned the innocent sounds into meaning, far more than could be conveyed with just noise or body language.

Images flashed in Jack’s mind. A movie theater. Scully flew inside one at some point. Pictures, flat screen, popcorn on the floors. Sparkling vampires.

Jack choked on laughter, and waved off the connection with several wrist flicks before he broke a rib. “Oh god, she thinks you’re a sparkling movie vampire.”

Damien frowned at him, and then at Scully. “So, is she attracted to me, or shiny things, and she expects me to sparkle like that abomination?”

“Bit of both, I think.”

Damien rolled his eyes, glared at the bird for a second, but sighed and resumed looking ahead. “I’m surprised you brought them down here. We’re underground, after all. I expect most birds would hate this.”

“They weren’t thrilled, but they insisted on coming anyway. After the hospital scene, I think they’re worried about me.” Jack brought up some oats from his pocket for them, and Mulder happily nibbled and pecked. Scully looked torn between her new love interest, and food, so Jack held his palm out toward her so she didn’t have to leave Damien’s shoulder.

“Crows are intelligent animals, and I’m sure they’re quite capable of feeling worried for you.”

“Makes me wonder how many crows, or rats, or other animals are being controlled by Kindred.”

Damien considered that with a nod, smiling as he watched Scully peck at Jack’s palm. “Auspex has allowed me to notice a few crows and rats, every now and then, under the influence of another Kindred, but it’s rare. In today’s world, with digital cameras, satellite surveillance, and what have you, animal companions almost seem obsolete.” Jack grinned, clucked a few times, and Scully fluffed up her breast feathers before biting at Damien’s earlobe. “Ow! Hey!”

“Can’t ask a camera to do that.”

“Then you’re not familiar with the concept of automated turrets.”

“Science fiction. Besides, a crow can go anywhere in this city, and can act independently.” And Jack had spent at least a few minutes each night with Scully and Mulder, teaching them some of the basics of reconnaissance.

And, he'd spent more than a few minutes with them each night, just hanging out. Crows were so damn smart, and like many birds, enjoyed being a part of a flock. He'd sit around with his two pets, and they'd just enjoy each other's company, with a few caws here and there to fill the silence. It was a good time to enjoy his privacy, and contemplate the curse in his guts he assured everyone he could control, when he wasn't entirely sure about that. And it was a good time to cry. His pets didn't mind. Hell, they understood sorrow, and kept telling him in as many ways a crow could, to 'not give into the black'.

He leaned over, kissed Mulder's neck, and the bird responded by rubbing his head into Jack's cheek, before adjusting his wings.

“So,” Damien said, “you're going to try and talk to Black Blood?”

“Yep. I'll probably be seeing him ... it, tomorrow night.”

“But Beatrice and Jacob will be there. Jennifer too, I imagine.”

“Yeah, that'll complicate things.”

“And besides, are you sure you want to? We're supposed to be dealing with the hunters. This threat Azamel warned us about—”

“Is undoubtedly taking advantage of all of us being distracted. Can't have that. We have to juggle the two problems.”

Damien laughed, and scratched Scully on the back of her neck with a gentle finger, like Jack taught him to. “Heh, just two? Tensions are still building with Garry and the Invictus. That move he pulled with Terra Den couldn't be anymore obvious. He's going to make a push against the First Estate."

"Yeah well, he can only push so hard. If he crosses a line, Antoinette will put him down."

"Easier said than done. Garry knows how to fight, has a small army, and we know he has connections to Jacob."

That earned a groan from Jack. If Jacob went to bat for Garry, that'd be a problem. Antoinette ruled because she was strong, absurdly so, and so was Daniel, but that was really the only reason, on the military might front. She didn't have an army of vampires to control, while Garry basically did. If Jacob and Garry fought Antoinette, it wouldn't be so easy for her to deal with. Hell, it might have been impossible, and that was assuming Black Blood didn't get involved, if it somehow could.

Well, tomorrow would be a good opportunity for Jack to learn some things about Jacob, and maybe Black Blood.

"She..." Sighing, Damien scratched the back of his neck, before offering Scully the same pleasure. "She likes pets."

"She? Sh—oh, Fiona. She does? I can imagine a pet tarantula or something. Maybe a—"

"No, not spiders, or anything like that. She ... likes cute things."

Jack raised a brow at that. "Spider monster lady likes cute things? I mean, Fiona's a bundle of sunlight, to the point it's blinding. So I suppose that makes sense. But, it's hard to imagine a Begotten with a pet, especially a cute one."

"Agreed, and she agrees with you. She had no pets of her own. But I saw her apartment, and—" Jack held out his fist, with a small grin to join. His friend rolled his eyes, returned the fist bump, and continued. “And she’s really into cute things. A cat, a dog, maybe a rabbit or two, a business, they’d—”

“Business?”

“What?”

“Business?” Jack said.

“Term for a group of ferrets.”

“W-What? How do you know that?”

Damien pulled out his phone. “Looked up ferrets on the way over.”

Oh god, that was adorable. Jack laughed, and laughed, and laughed. He only got it under control once Scully and Mulder joined him, and the noise became a bit too piercing to keep up.

“I don’t suggest getting her a surprise pet. One of the big ways pets end up abandoned.”

“I see. I suggested she get a pet on her own, but like you said, she’s concerned it won’t take to her.”

“A legitimate concern. But, I bet she’s the kind of girl that could bond with an animal, despite her horror half. I can practically feel myself become a nicer, more social person just by being around her.” Fiona was beautiful and desirable, and she knew it, too. But, it didn’t inflate her ego. She was an honest person, with others and herself.

Jack saw a bit of himself in her, honestly, if someone put sunshine into a needle and injected it straight into his veins. Of course, that’d turn him into a pile of ash, but still. If Jack had grown up less cynical, maybe he'd have ended up like Fiona. Honest to a fault, except, happy to be so.

Now, Jack was getting better, and better at controlling his tongue, controlling his impulse to speak honestly. Lying was getting easier. It didn't grate on his soul the way it used to, and that, he couldn't blame on the curse.

"Damien, this curse. I ... it..." You can tell him, Jack. You can trust him, right? "I was wondering if you'd made any progress finding out about it. I'd love to get it sealed up again." Coward.

"Unfortunately no. I have no contacts outside the city, and within, much of our records were destroyed by Garry, as you know." The man held his chin in his fingers, eyes down, thinking. "I'd hoped to find something in what Maria has secured, but I haven't managed to. Maybe ... maybe I could reach outside the city for help?"

"You mean contact Sanctified from elsewhere?"

"Surely Maria must know someone."

"I mean, maybe. After the purge, would anyone outside want to talk to us? Maybe ... maybe Elaine, actually."

"Elaine?"

---

---

~~Beatrice~~

Jacob returned after a time, and the boys did as well, all separately. Othello came back with his gorgeous ghoul, no doubt intent on finishing the night with sex, and a lot of it. The man had a habit of fucking her until they were both satisfied, then he'd Kiss her, and fuck her some more. Triss usually made sure to not be here when he did that anymore. Painful memories.

Aaron never joined him, which had surprised Triss until that time they all showered together. It turned out, the guy was totally vanilla. Probably considered the doggy position to be kinky; so cute. Jen had joined Othello on several occasions in the past, but always with a ghoul or three between them, never to fuck each other. And since Julias came into the picture, she'd been unusually faithful. Even now, she refused to get involved with anyone else.

That wasn't fair to her. Vampires had sex drives, but Jennifer was horny down to her soul, from before she was a vampire. Her lust was now eternal, captured in the freeze-frame of the embrace, and Triss felt bad that the girl now felt too attached to Triss and her misery to indulge herself. If the girl had never gotten into bed with her, Jen would probably be fucking up a storm right now, probably right next to Othello. Ghouls, thralls, and two vampires, buried in legs and boobs and juices.

Aaron disappeared into his alcove with his books, Othello disappeared into his with his girl, and Jacob disappeared into the tunnels in the back of the huge cave.

"Jen, I'm going to talk to the boss."

"Don't want me to join?" Jen said, standing up.

"It ... it's private. I'll tell you about it later. For now, you can ... watch Othello fuck, I guess? You used to do that a lot."

"I suppose." There wasn't any heart or enthusiasm in her words though, and she only feigned interest until Triss had taken a few steps. A look over her shoulder showed her friend was, in fact, heading toward Aaron's alcove.

"Gonna read a book?"

"I just might."

“Can ... can you read?”

Jen rolled her eyes, but laughed all the same, and climbed into Aaron's cave in a cave. Which almost felt like turning her back on her sex drive, considering Aaron's seemed awfully low, in comparison.

Maybe she'd get back to who she used to be, maybe she wouldn't. Time healed all wounds, and stupid shit like that. The joy of being a vampire was eternal life as long as Triss was cautious with it. Maybe she'd eventually get over losing Superman, maybe not, but she knew Jen would get over it eventually.

Triss stepped into the tunnel that led into Jacob's alcove, and pulled aside the hanging furs. No point in asking if she could come in; Jacob liked it when she was an asshole. And besides, even if she put on her strongest Cloak of Night, she wouldn't be able to sneak up on Jacob.

The man was sitting on another fur, with some strange book in his hand. No pictures in this one, but she recognized the letters at least: Mandarin or something. She knew fuck all about Asian languages, and she expected the same of Jacob; stupid of her to do that. The man was too damn smart.

“Jacob.”

“Beatrice. Come, sit.” He nodded toward the fur and the empty space beside him.

She sat with a heavy thump, and leaned against the stone. The fear she used to feel from being so close to an elder as insane as Jacob had faded to a background sensation. It wasn't good to let her guard down, but it wasn't like Jacob didn't already have every key to every lock she had, physically and mentally. If he wanted to, he could destroy her in so many ways, and he'd done nothing but treat her like the spunky Carthian he saw potential in.

And at this point, she didn't care if she was in danger of getting too close to this man. Whatever, as long Angela got what was coming to her.

She smiled for a moment, before it faded. The Prince had asked her to help her with Jacob, connect with the man, see if she could stop him from going down a bad road. Well, fuck that, bad road was the only road.

"I assume the sacrifices are ready?" she said.

"Yep, seven fuckers just dangling there. And before you ask, yes, I made sure to collect fuckers who deserved it."

She leaned in toward him, squinting, and he leaned in toward her, gray bandage covering his eyes. His eyebrows suggested squinting, but who the fuck knew with this bastard. Trying to read his expression was impossible.

"Seven's a lot."

"Lot of disappearances and deaths happen in Devil's Corner all the time. I should know."

After a heavy sigh, she collapsed back again against the wall, head aimed up at the stone above. "You've been setting up hooks in this fucking city for centuries, plans and schemes, so you can do shit like this, haven't you?"

The Joker smiled a big, scary smile, before looking back down at his book. "If that Fiona girl knew who to target better when she first arrived, she wouldn't have appeared on anyone's radar."

"I suppose she should have asked you."

"Yep. I could have set her up with a better, streamlined supply of sacrifices. Though, I understand her appetite is specific? Probably can't be just anyone.”

“Yeah.”

“And besides, even with millions of people in Dolareido, we can only kill so many before it becomes a problem.”

She raised a brow at that. “How ... how many people have you considered killing at once?” From the way he'd said what he said, it sounded like he'd run into a sort of barrier, a limit that stopped him from doing what he wanted.

“There are whispers of rituals that require inordinate amounts of blood, and vitae. Some, could only be done by bleeding several Kindred dry. Others, could be done with kine, if they were sacrificed by the dozens.”

“Dozens?” Jesus fucking christ. She tried to imagine twenty, thirty, forty kine, dangling from hooks in Jacob's ritual chamber, guts ripped open. The smell alone would have been horrific, let alone the display.

“I try to play nice, to keep Annie happy. Don't need her or that asshole Daniel bleeding down my throat.”

Triss winced at that. She knew the old man had ancient relationships with those two, but to hear him describe the sheriff as ‘asshole’ was a little jarring. A recipe for getting stabbed by the fucker's giant sword, if anyone else said it.

“I ... I wanted to talk about ... you know.”

The man's smile vanished, the electricity of chaos and surprise he always carried with him dissipated, and his shoulders slumped as he closed the book and set it aside. “About Crúac and resurrection.”

“Yes. Black Blood said you guys figured out how, but ... but ... we’ve spent these two weeks trying to track down Elen instead. It’s ... fucking killing me, Jacob. We’re not talking about it, and—”

“We wanted to give you time, to calm down, before we put this at your feet, Triss.” Jacob reached over for one of his books, a large one, black leather bound, and kind of fancy looking.

“I’m calm, I’m fucking calm! I’m ... not calm. I know I’m not calm, but I’m not the wreck I was, ok? I can ... I can think, use my brain, not be impulsive. Trust me.”

Triss had a long history of being impulsive; came with the territory of being a Carthian. She knew it, Jacob knew it, and as far as she knew, Jacob signed on for that impulsiveness when he invited her into his circle. The bastard knew her better than he should have, considering they’d only started hanging out the past year and a bit.

Honestly, if he said she wasn’t ready to talk about this, she’d believe him. For all her impulsiveness, and for all her wariness of Jacob’s motives, the man had that old-man wisdom, times a thousand. He’d seen too much of the world, too much of everything, for her to just ignore his words. And the fact he’d not yet revived Minerva already crushed the idea that she could do what he did, to revive her lost lover.

But Black Blood said they knew how.

“Crúac isn’t simply an act fueled by your blood, Beatrice. It’s a display, a call, a summoning, a hand reaching into the oblivion that separates us and things beyond.” Jacob opened the book, and flipped to a page depicting orbiting spheres. She didn’t recognize the language. “The crazier the shit you’re trying to do, the further you’re reaching outside of our world, and into others.” He set a finger onto one of the spheres toward the center. Earth then, given the context of the conversation.

“These other spheres? That—” She leaned in closer. One of the spheres was pressed up against the sphere Jacob was touching. “Shadow realm, with the spirits and shit?”

“Supposedly.”

“Hmm.” She tilted her head as she looked at the other spheres. They weren’t just sitting around like marbles, but some circled others. Others overlapped, like the one she’d just pointed out. One circle covered it all. “Makes me feel ... small.”

“This world of blood, bones, cocaine, guns, sex and shit and streets and politics, it’s just one small piece of the puzzle. And it’s a piece you should be satisfied with. When you go out hunting in Dolareido’s world, our world, you get lost in the moment. You feel the breeze on your skin, the darkness covering you as you stalk alleyways, and listen to the hunger in your core. You catch some prey, indulge, and slink back into your hole to hide from the sun. It’s a simple life, Triss, and a good one.”

“But...”

“But, people like me, like other witches, and dragons like Annie, we know there’s more out there. There are entire universes, places that are separated from us, but not unreachable. You can see them sometimes, when you dream; though, most can’t dream so deep they can reach such places.”

Her dreams during torpor had been of nothing but Julias lately. That didn’t feel otherworldly. It felt right at home, stabbing her in the fucking stomach over and over.

“You’re saying, if we start doing rituals with Crúac that really reach far...”

“You’ll touch on places your primitive brain can’t even comprehend. Entities that exist beyond life and death, like the Crone herself, or perhaps Luna, that the Uratha believe in. But, more importantly, the idea that a soul exists, that something real and special is out there, in us and humans and even the fucking dogs and monsters, is truth. And ... and hunting for this soul, has been a goal of mine since Minerva's death."

She shivered, and felt her body grow heavy. "An afterlife? One of these realms is an afterlife?"

"Maybe. Neither me or Black Blood have managed to cross that gap. But we're trying."

"Trying? Not ... tried?"

He grinned at her, and flipped to another page. Another picture, obviously of a ritual bowl, the type Jacob was so drawn to, with skulls and whatnot around it. Several corpses lay around it, and a witch figure stood over the bowl, shaking a skull.

"Death creates a hole in the barrier that separates realms. I believe the soul goes through it, going back to wherever souls come from, but the hole is ... tiny, in a sense. I haven't been able to reach through it, but I've peeked, and ... and it was like ... taking a sneak peek at God, Beatrice. It was like seeing into something that should never be seen."

"B-But, you said you knew how to revive Minerva!"

"There are Crúac rituals, and other strange magics, that can recreate bodies, reforge them. But they'd just be a hollow shell, something out of a horror film. There are Crúac rituals that can seek a person's essence, Triss, and it can—"

"Can pull them out, through the hole ... and place it in the forged body."

The eyeless man sighed, nodding. “There are two problems. The first, is to reach into this world beyond worlds, this greater being, to extract the essence of the dead we’re looking for, would require us to enter it, to some degree at least. I can guarantee that that would be instant death, or fracturing for the mind. And...” He looked to her, waiting.

“And ... to ... make the hole big enough, a lot of people would need to die.” The man’s nod confirmed. “How many?”

“I wish I knew. The one time I managed to peek through the temporary hole, I’d killed at least fifty at once.”

“That’s a lot of murder for just a peek at the other side!”

He closed the book slowly, and kept his bandaged gaze upon its cover. “Yes. Yes it is.”

Chapter 99

~~Natasha~~

It was the day after the trip into the Hisil, and Natasha couldn't stop smiling.

“Oh my god oh my god oh my g-god!” She vibrated as she bounced around, almost hitting Matt and Art with each step. “That was so d-d-dangerous!”

Art and Matt both nodded as they stepped up the stairs. They were in front of her apartment building, a place she rarely visited anymore. All those nights at the Prince's, it was easy to forget she had her own apartment, a nice one at that. It wasn't as fancy as Jack's, but it was still a nice, decorative place. They didn't hang in at it often enough.

Plus, she could be herself more in her own apartment, where the walls were hers, and she knew every creak, every inch and corner, every thing. No home like home.

First thing she did was throw open her laptop and send Jessy a quick message. The two of them were still doing their frequent check-ins with each other, and considering yesterday she'd just been in a literal different dimension, this check in would be interesting.

~Back from the Shadow Realm!~

~Eric was telling me about it, and you, you brave little girl.~

~Brave?~

~Talking to Black Blood? Yeah, sounded pretty fucking brave of you. You at home?~

~Yeah.~

Naturally, Tash's laptop started ringing, and she rolled her eyes as she accepted the call. "Hey J-Jessy!"

"Tash, I—oh, is that Matthew and Arturo?" Jessy leaned down toward her laptop and smiled at the camera. Eric was beside her on her couch, dressed in his Bloodlust suit, shirt undone and tie nowhere to be seen. Jessy was in a white tube top masquerading as a tank top with tiny straps, and her leaning forward was purposeful: showing off the cleavage. Not that she needed to, considering the tank top was almost see-through.

"Yeap!" Tash motioned to the boys, and they came to join her at her kitchen counter where she kept the laptop.

The two boys sat around her, and waved. "Hello there," they said together, in unison, with eyes on Jessy's display. So Natasha elbowed each of them in their ribs, because.

Eric caught on, slipped a hand around Jessy's face, and pushed her back into the couch with enough force to make her bounce.

"This line secure?" he said.

Natasha nodded. "Y-Yes. Why? D-D ... Did you want to talk about the trip?"

"I did, yes, assuming Art and Matt don't mind."

Art and Matt shrugged, got up, and started walking around Natasha's kitchen. There was meat and stuff to be found, bought by them and deposited in her fridge and freezer. It was almost like a girl sneak-moving into her boyfriend's apartment, except instead of makeup kits, toothbrushes, and feminine hygiene products, they'd brought food. She couldn't help but giggle at that as she watched them start to cook up a bunch of steaks, with liver and hearts to go with.

“They d-don’t.”

“Right. So, Jessy wants to come on the next trip.”

“She d-does?”

“I do!” Jessy fought to get out from behind Eric’s hand, eventually being forced to push the man off the couch altogether. “Eric was telling me about the things he saw, Black Blood and shit. That sounds fucking freaky, dangerous, and a lot more important to Dolareido than I figured it was.”

“Important?”

Art raised a hand, and reached around to wave it in front of the camera from behind the laptop. “I’m guessing she’s talking about how one world affects the other.”

The Gangrel nodded vigorously. “Yeah! Like, Eric was telling me about the drug spirit he saw. If the wolves killed it, would drug activity drop in Devil’s Corner?”

“Probably,” Matt said, “assuming you could get away with it. Spirits have their own society, you know.” He had some raw steak in his mouth, and he swallowed it down mid sentence. Ugh, like a mom snacking while cooking, except with the stomach of a carnivore, capable of handling nasty bacteria.

“It’s not our j-job,” Tash said, “to police the kine. We’re supposed t-t-to let them d-do what they want, within reason.”

Eric leaned into the camera, and frowned at her. The man usually frowned, but never at people directly. He was the sort of man that frowned at circumstances, situations, never at someone, and never a vampire, from what she knew of him. The hard look on his face was unsettling.

“Not everyone lives the good life in Dolareido, Natasha. Just because it’s a good city on average, doesn’t mean it couldn’t be better.”

That was aggressive. She looked to Matt and Art, and she could see the two men were ready to get between her and the angry man on the other side of the laptop screen, but she gulped and shook her head at them.

“I know it’s n-not perfect, Eric. If you want t-t-to help the less fortunate, maybe ... talk to Garry?”

“Garry? Right, the Carthians. I mean yeah, I guess I could do that, but I’d prefer to put my unique skills to use. If I have to be Uratha, then I should try and do what I can.”

She tilted her head to the side. “I’m n-not—”

“I suppose I’m talking to Matthew and Arturo here. I ... want to try and clean up some the shittier parts of the city.”

“Why?” Art said, without leaving the kitchen so Eric couldn’t see him.

“Because some of us dealt with those streets growing up, grew up on them. I’d like to help the people still dealing with those streets.”

Matt stuck his head over the laptop from behind, so Eric and Jessy would have to look at an upside down face hanging in front of them. “Avery would like to do that too. That’s half the reason we’re hunting this Azlu monster you know. But, the Prince and Jacob both stick their fingers into spirit business, Eric. If you start fucking with things on the other side of the Gauntlet, they’ll find out.”

“Fuck em!” Jessy said. “If Eric wants to be Batman and clean up the streets, I say let him.”

Natasha couldn't help but laugh at that, and her boyfriends did as well.

“We've been there, and we've done that sort of thing in our youth,” Art said, coming around to sit with Natasha. “Now we're part of a family, and if any of us do something that annoys the Prince, we risk getting the boot. Which is why we're helping you guys find the hunters.”

“Buuuut.” Matt set a couple steaks on the burner, hot enough Triss could hear the sizzle. “Eric isn't part of the pack. If he wants to go vigilante, I say go for it. Like Art said, we've all been there. Getting his feet wet could be a good thing.”

Art nodded for the camera. “Next day off we get, Matt and I can show you how to cross the Gauntlet at a locus, and you'll be free to do whatever you want. Just don't come crying to us if you get killed.”

Jessy snorted. Her facial expressions said it all, but Tash couldn't stop her from saying something dumb. “And you two won't tell your mom?”

“Nope.” Art winked for the camera, before he came up behind Natasha, hugged her, and set his chin on her head. Oh dear, PDA! Natasha squirmed and struggled, but Art's grip was absolute. After a few seconds of wriggling, she relented, and set her head back against his chest, while avoiding eye contact with the laptop screen.

“Oh, oh!” Jessy said. “You guys are so fucking cute, it hurts. I'm in literal pain. Did you do that thing that—”

Natasha closed the laptop.

Caught mid-flip of his steak, Matt raised a brow as he looked at her. “Thing?”

“A thing ... it’s a thing. A thing ... she w-wants me t-t-to do.”

Laughing, Arturo leaned down and kissed her head. “If it’s Jessy, I’m assuming this is a sex thing.”

“It’s always a sex thing w-w-with her.” And it was. If Jessy had her way, there’d be two vampires and three werewolves locking legs at that very moment, with a camera set up to stream it for every Kindred and ghoul to watch.

“Well,” Art said, “I’ll have you know, that if it’s with you, I’m down to do whatever you want.” His roaming hands slid down over her suit shirt. Her jacket was put away, and her shirt wasn’t exactly good protection against roaming fingers. She wore no bra underneath, and Art’s fingers didn’t hesitate to massage her chest. “As long as it’s with you and only you.”

The dreamy sigh she tried to suppress escaped her anyway. She slapped at his hands, but all that did was send them down lower. They teased at her stomach, and she rolled her eyes as she relented, leaning her head back against his chest again.

“Yeah,” Matt said while throwing his steaks onto a plate. He was a big man, and once he sat beside her, didn’t waste much time chewing it as he started to ingest. At least he used a knife and fork this time.

She still felt the tingle and zing of new information from yesterday, of expanding her horizons, of going on a dangerous mission and learning lots of tasty details. It may have been a day ago, but she didn’t get to visit an alternate dimension often. It was making her feel bold, and she knew it. Maybe now was the perfect time to exercise that boldness.

“Well, um ... J-Jessy, she suggested an idea. Um...”

Art slid his head down beside hers, chin on her shoulder, and his hands ceased fondling. Instead, he adopted a hug, and buried her in it, holding her to his chest as he swallowed her in his arms. Big, strong arms, that made her feel protected and safe, and warm. And more bold, too. She wasn't meek little Natasha anymore. She was adventurous, daring Natasha! Smart, and fast, and sexy Natasha. Sexy had snuck in there at some point, because of Jessy, and Matthew and Arturo were determined to keep it that way.

“J-Jessy,” she said, “thinks we should ... umm ... uh ... have sex ... w-where someone can see.”

Matt, already finishing his meal, looked at her, surprised. His fork went clink, in the silence. “Really?”

“I know! I kn-kn-know, it's really rude of her! And ... I d-d-d ... d-don't know. It's—”

Art, with his head next to hers still, nodded a few times. Thank goodness he shaved, or sandpaper stubble would have destroyed her face. “Definitely a step outside most people's comfort zone.”

“I ... I know.” Now she was afraid to ask. She wasn't going to ask to have sex in front of Jessy or anything, but there were things and options she had investigated.

“Course,” Matt said as he swallowed the last of his food, “this is Dolareido, city of experimentation. If Tash wants to, I'm down. As long as it's just us under the sheets, I don't mind.”

“Same,” Art said, setting kisses on her neck. Oh no, not the neck. She melted back against his chest, and a soft mewl escaped her as she put her hands on the countertop to keep from falling.

They were ok with it, actually ok with it. They wouldn't mind it if someone else saw them naked, and her naked, and with them inside her. She doubted they'd have troubles with performance anxiety, considering they were Uratha, and bursting with life and hunger. She, on the other hand, knew very well she'd be anxious performing live, terribly so. That was no good. But, if Matt and Art were ok with sharing how intimate and amazing their sexy times together were, she had ideas.

“Ok, um ... uh ... c-come with me.” She slid out of Art's arms, and started toward her bedroom.

The two boys blinked at each other before following after her. “Now?” they said.

“M-Maybe? Get m-m-my laptop.”

Nodding, Matt scooped it up and followed after her. “Wow, brave!”

She giggled as she stepped into her bedroom, motioned Matt to her nightstand, and started digging through her closet. He set the laptop down where she'd pointed, and watched as she began removing things.

Both boys were dumbfounded, looking left and right as Natasha brought out a couple lights on stands, and a light modifier, a big white umbrella shape to guide the light down at her bed. She brought out a camera too, very expensive, and plugged it into her laptop. A few moments and some clicks later, the camera was recording, she could see the video feed, and she started adjusting the lighting.

Art was the first to speak up. “Umm, you've given this some thought.”

“Jessy ... she gave me an idea. I thought, m-maybe, since I d-d-don’t want to do this in person, I could ... make a video? And I n-never half-ass anything!” Nodding, because her perfectionist nature was obvious and everyone should know it, she started adjusting the cameras. Project mode. The world disappeared, time vanished, and all that mattered was her project. It just so happened that this particular project was a sexy project, and one that Jessy, and Antoinette, would no doubt approve of.

Once everything looked perfect, she looked between the boys and the bed, and squirmed. “Are you sure ... you d-don’t ... mind ... if someone ... sees us?” She was almost hoping they’d say no, so she wouldn’t have to go through with this. It was exciting, and terrifying, like skydiving.

The boys shrugged. “Nope,” they said together.

Tash squirmed and wriggled, and eventually nodded as she turned around and set her hands on her wardrobe. “Ok, ok ... I...” This was scary! But it wasn’t as scary as her trip into the Shadow Realm. And besides, she’d get to edit it later, or delete it, if she didn’t like it. That didn’t change that she was shivering at the idea of being filmed while having sex.

Little her, and her two big boyfriends, on camera. Someone was going to get to see her naked, and in all likelihood, having an orgasm, and being doubly penetrated. It was a thrilling idea, she had to admit to herself. Jessy enjoyed being seen, and the Prince enjoyed being seen. And Jennifer certainly enjoyed it, that was for sure.

Live sex was not on the menu, though! It was fun and addictive, doing it with Jessy’s ghouls with her around, but that wasn’t the same. Jessy was her friend, and the ghouls were only there for sex. With Matthew and Arturo, there was a growing emotional connection, and she wasn’t sure she was comfortable with the idea of anyone else being there when she touched them, felt them, and came on them.

But a video was different. She could do a video. She could edit it and make it pretty and artistic and sexy. And she could remove unflattering scenes and stuff. Yes. Perfect plan. If it went well, she could even do it again, and use her growing knowledge of cameras to set up more, for multiple angles and things.

She gulped, nodded, and walked to her laptop on the nightstand. The software was expansive, but she'd swallowed down its details with her nerd obsessiveness, when she'd decided on the project. She could pilot its knobs and dials, and with time, she found good settings for the software.

The boys chuckled as they looked around the room, and touched the various lights and stuff mounted on stands.

“Sure you don't just want to hold a handheld camera?” Arturo said. “Or Matt could, or me, and we can just pass it around, get juicy shots.”

Juicy shots. If she'd been blushing life, her whole body would have lit the room red.

“No! N-No no. If ... if we're going t-to do this, then I ... I w-want to make it ... pretty.”

Matt nodded, but Art laughed and shrugged.

“So Matt and I are porn stars now? In some new age, modern, artistic, femme-friendly porn?”

She frowned at him, but he smiled at her with that charming, infuriating smile as he walked up to her, slid behind her, and set his hands on her hips. It wasn't fair that a touch as innocent as that made her anger melt.

“No, not porn stars. B-But my friends, they ... they w-want me to continue ... growing. D-Dolareido is ... The P-P-Prince has encouraged this city and culture of ... sexual openness. I want t-to try it.” She reached into the wardrobe and started rooting through some things. Something pretty, or dignified, or sexy, or cute, or—

“I think,” Art said over her, hands still on her hips, “you should wear those pink thigh highs you wore that one time.”

“With the n-nightie?”

“But without the nightie. Seeing you and those smooth legs wrapped tight in pink, and they make just a little pinch around your upper thighs? The nightie is super cute, but when you’re naked except for the thigh highs, it’s perfect.” The man groaned, and pulled on her hips a little tighter to squash her butt to his thighs; so tall. “It’s a great balance of girlish innocence, and womanly charms.”

“Girlish innocence ... that shouldn’t b-be erotic!”

“Eh, I dunno.” Matt, sitting on her bed, shrugged as he tilted his head from side to side while looking up at one of the two directional lights. “There’s something really arousing about a young woman, just turned eighteen, who sleeps with stuffed animals and has kittens on her pajamas, having a man in her bed. I guess it’s the contrast.”

She frowned all the more. “P-Perverts.” Ok, so she had both of those things, the thigh highs, stuffed animals, and kitten pajamas. And ok, she did really find the idea appealing, of a man in her bed, surrounded by her stuffed animals, holding her close and gently fucking her. But they weren’t allowed to like it, too!

Sighing, she reached into a drawer, and pulled out the now infamous pink thigh highs, before turning around and glaring up at Art. He smiled. Jackass.

“Ok, so, t-tonight, I’m in charge. You ... d-do what I say, ok? No ... getting out of hand.” At first, no getting out of hand at first. At this point in their relationship, she’d more or less accepted that the boys couldn’t help themselves once they’d been at it for a while.

They nodded, and feigned innocent smiles. Jerks.

Nodding, she walked over to the camera, and adjusted it for the twelfth time. “Ok, um ... get n-naked, and sit on the side of the bed.” She looked at the display on the camera, and lined it up with the bed. Video footage wouldn’t show her face normally; the Beast would find ways to hide it, either by subtly turning her head at just the right angle, or by ensuring scenes with her face had just enough blur to prevent identification. Hopefully, she could keep that Beast reflex suppressed when she wanted the camera to see her.

The boys did as she asked. Wow. A thrill danced up her spine as she watched through the camera display, and adjusted for height and depth. She remembered that time Damien had shown her his telescope, and she’d seen Jessy through her window, getting opened up by four sets of hands. There was a thrill to it, something naughty, something fun, about seeing a sexual act through a window or camera lens.

And of course, her boyfriends were gorgeous. Arturo with his tan skin and dark, sexy, mischievous eyes. Matthew, with his blonde hair and gruff, and heavenly blue eyes. The fact they had the bodies of Olympian strength athletes was undeniably appealing, no matter how much she tried to think she didn’t need a man to have muscles to be attractive. Abs were attractive, the V shape of their wide shoulders and backs connecting to their hips was attractive, and the girth of their arms was attractive. They had the bodies of buff porn stars.

She laughed at that, and the boys raised a brow each, before she dismissed it with a hand wave. “Keep going.”

Shrugging, the two boys got naked, and she licked her lips as they slid out of their jeans. They'd trimmed their pubic hair down to almost nothing at her request, and it exposed more of the hard lower abdomen of the pelvis, the Adonis belt. It also made their members look bigger, and they were already big.

Looking at it through a camera display and doing inventory on their bodies, it really seemed like she was spoiled. Utterly, completely spoiled.

“Ok, that’s good. Y-Yeah, I’ll ... yeah.” Ok, time for the hard part: getting herself on the screen.

With a deep, useless breath, she started to undress. The boys watched, smiling, grinning, and a familiar fire lit in their eyes as she took off her shirt and suit pants. Ever since she'd started dating them, she'd grown more comfortable wearing fancier underwear, and instead of wearing what Jessy referred to as 'granny panties', Tash was wearing some black underwear, panties that bordered on a thong.

The boys whistled. She rolled her eyes and tossed her shirt aside. Bra-less. There was no need with small breasts usually, and unless she Blushed Life, her nipples would remain soft no matter how cold it was. And, considering how many times the three of them had impromptu sex in various places, one less garment between her and their fingers was a good thing.

She smiled at that thought. If Jessy could read her mind, she'd be teasing her incessantly.

As she slid out of the underwear, both men, each facing her, sitting on the bed with a few feet between them, began to masturbate. Their eyes were locked onto her smooth slit, and how its tiny lips were hidden. They used slow, gentle strokes, that soon had the large phalluses standing upright. Were they kine, she'd tell them to stop or they'd ruin things, cumming too soon. But they were Uratha.

Utterly spoiled.

She slid on the pink high thighs, and peeked a glance at her boyfriends as she did. They continued to masturbate, slow but steady, eyes staring at her, her small, thin body, and shaved smooth sex. Every so often, they rumbled, a bass-filled purring sound unique to these wolfish men, and it only grew as she finished putting on the high socks. Both stared at how it pinched slightly halfway up her thigh.

She reached into one of the socks, and snapped it against her skin lightly. Both men groaned.

“That is fucking amazing,” Arturo said, looking her up and down like she was a steak he was about to devour, complete with licking his lips.

“Agreed.” Matthew showed the same behavior, eyes locked onto her legs, her butt, and his stroking hand grew a little faster.

She Blushed Life, and they both rumbled. Instant heat flooded her, hardening her small nipples, and igniting little tingles along the skin between her thighs. The way they looked at her, like they were ready to pounce her, pin her, ravage her, and that her request was the only thing holding them back like a leash, set her skin on fire. If she pushed them too far too fast, they'd give into their instincts again, grab her, hold her, trap her in their embrace, penetrate her, and fuck her until she couldn't feel her legs anymore.

The goal was to see if she could keep them under control for the camera. She fetched some lubricant from the shelf, set it on the bed, and climbed up onto the blankets between the two large men. And, without realizing it until she'd done it, she made sure to move in a more exaggerated way. Instead of just hopping onto the bed, she arched her back, stuck her butt out a bit, and crawled with a little prowl.

Having a camera on her was sending electricity through her body, leaving her surprised. She'd never done anything like this, and that thrill was palpable. Like that first night with Jessy, testing new waters had been an overwhelming experience mixed with so much jittery nervousness, it bordered on fear. And she still felt that, but instead of it burying her in anxiety, she found herself excited.

She wasn't the same woman anymore. A lifetime of keeping her sexual adventures to a couple of very vanilla relationships, and otherwise a bunch of sexual exploration behind closed doors by herself, were days gone. Now, she'd been involved in what could only be called an orgy, on several occasions, with her good friend Jessy. Now, she'd been having threesomes almost every day, for months. Now, she'd given double blowjobs in dark alleys, been fucked on rooftops, spied on her boss giving her lover a tit fuck, and had, despite her best efforts to deny it, enjoyed a multitude of purely anal orgasms.

And now she was creating a sex tape for Jessy — and probably Eric — to watch. Good god what had happened to her?

Dolareido happened to her. Jessy, the Prince, and others who liked to wear their sexuality openly, like Jennifer and Isabella, they happened to her. Confident women who knew what they liked and had no issues pursuing it, women Natasha had never thought to compare herself to, once upon a time.

But now a camera was pointed at her, pointed at the bed at a slight downward angle, and she blushed profusely as she smiled at the lens while telling her Beast to let it get a peek at her. She got comfortable on the edge of the bed, motioned for Art and Matt to sit in closer, and slid a hand down her chest and stomach as they did. Both boys rumbled in their chests once their legs were snug against hers, and she reached out, set her hands onto the base of their lengths, and smiled a tiny, shy smile up at each of them, as she started to stroke them.

Heavy, hard girths filled her small hands, and she shivered as she squeezed lightly. The heat of their flesh sent the butterflies in her stomach into a frenzy, and the way their members, firm and huge, molded slightly to the pressure of her fingers, had her breathing heavy. The boys smelled of sex, and it wasn't long before some drops of precum rose to the tips of their lengths. The camera was having a strong effect on them too, or they were getting into it so quickly because she was. Both, probably both.

Matt's closer hand slid down her body, her breasts and chest, and down between her legs. Without thinking about it, she slowly looked from him to the camera, and smiled again as she inched her thighs apart. His fingers slid down underneath her, found the beginnings of growing wetness, and traced her juices up higher to find her clitoris. It was embarrassing, how quickly she got wet these nights, but embarrassment turned into a satisfied moan, as Matt began to lovingly caress her clitoris.

Art's fingers traced down her back, and a quiet pop told her ears that he'd opened a bottle of lubricant; she always kept some in her bedroom, these days. A few seconds later, he set his fingers back onto the small of her back, and then down further between her butt cheeks, and up, against the small rose of her ass. Lubricant pressed to the skin, and Art massaged it against her entrance until she found herself pushing her ass toward his hand.

She squeezed on their cocks harder, stroking with a little more firmness after spreading their growing precum around their glans. As much as she was already feeling the tingles begin to grow through her body, the boys had been masturbating for a little while already, before she got to touch them. With anyone else, she'd stop, to keep their arousal available. But the werewolves were a bundle of hunger and desire, and a single orgasm was never enough for them.

She was so spoiled.

Matt started to cum first. She let go of Art, and leaned in toward Matt, sneaking in underneath his arm so she could snuggle into his side, as her hand continued to stroke his length. The giant of a man shuddered for a moment, and grinned down at her, no longer stroking her clitoris so he could make room for her under the arm. He hugged her close to him, and she kissed his ribs and the enormous muscles that covered them, as she peeked a glance at the camera, before looking down.

His cum gushed up, announced by the flexing of his girth, and she set her hand over the head of his cock to keep the waves contained. The heat was immense, and she shivered, a small mewl escaping her, as she watched the waves of white fluid fill the crevices between her fingers. So much, always so much. She licked her lips and moaned as she moved her hand down, massaging the thick girth a lot harder with the newfound lubricant, and another wave of cum flowed out of him, slow and thick. With his girth aimed upward, it flowed down and onto her fingers, and she made sure to make a show of it for the camera.

Through all this, Art seemed quite happy to continue fingering her. He sank his large digit deep, to the final knuckle, and wiggled it around, adding more and more lubricant as he needed. It felt wonderful. It wasn't something she could cum with, not this early, and not the right angle, but it still felt great, how he massaged the inside of her ass, probing and prodding, and she couldn't help but wiggle. He earned a few mewls from her too, and she blushed again as she managed another peek at the camera, while still stroking Matthew through his messy orgasm.

“K, Matthew, um ... lie d-down, on your stomach. I w-want ... to sit on you. And Art can ... you know.”

“Yes ma’am.” With a curt nod, Matt slid back onto the bed, and lay down. He was so huge and heavy, he sank the bed considerably, and she giggled as she struggled to not roll with the sudden indent in the mattress.

Art slid back as well, removing his finger from her body. With a little more cat prowl movement than strictly required, she got between Matthew’s knees, her weight on her own knees, and her hands pressed to his lower abdomen. She set her cum-coated fingers around his girth, and her clean fingers too, and started to massage the long shaft again, as she lowered her lips to the tip.

The giant’s reaction was immediate. He growled. She smiled down at the lying beast, and worked her lips back and forth along his glans, as she moved her hair out of her eyes and over her ear with a hand. A small peek to the camera again, before she started to slide more of the enormous girth into her mouth.

She lifted her head with a jolt, and looked over her shoulder, as Art began to sink his cock into her ass. And despite herself, she arched her back downward, pushed her ass upward toward him, and wiggled her butt a little as she peeked back at the camera. Her eyes rolled upward, and she set her head down onto Matt’s thigh, strength leaving her as she felt the length of Art’s member filling her. Deep, deep, and deeper, until she felt the man’s length pressing toward her stomach.

Art reached down, took her shoulders, and pulled her up so she was kneeling upright, back pressed to his chest, and he clutched her body as he began to thrust into her. And that spot, oh god that spot, deep and aching. Delirious with arousal meant that spot, that deep spot, made her body shake when he hit it through the walls of her ass.

“W ... wai...” Her breath was gone, and she struggled to find it. But as Art slid his fingers into her pussy and started to finger her, the tiny amount of air she needed to make sounds fled, and she melted. With his cock hitting that spot deep inside her again and again, while his fingers curled up to press against her g-spot, she could do nothing but tremble.

Matt slid in closer, until his shaft was underneath her and ready to penetrate her wet slit. His right hand took his soaked length, and stroked it as he watched her. She was still on her knees, kneeling upright, so if Art would only lower her down, she would soon be doubly penetrated by her boyfriends; god, she wanted that. But Art didn't lower her. Instead, he continued to finger her, harder, and hit his pelvis against her ass hard enough to make her squeak.

She peeked at the camera again, knowing full well what was about to happen, and being horribly embarrassed about it. Heat flooded her skin head to toe, announcing the blushing she couldn't avoid, and she managed a small smile through the pleasure, as she started to cum. Art removed his fingers from her, but his thrusting didn't stop. Again and again, she felt his hard length hit that aching spot deep inside her, until her muscles clenched down hard. The pleasure coursed through her, rippling out down her legs into her toes, and up through her belly, causing her insides to tighten.

A look down revealed she was dripping. Several drops of her cum leaked out of her, onto the awaiting cock of Matthew. And then more, and more, as Art continued to thrust into her, the copious amount of lube allowing him to fuck her ass with enthusiasm. Only after his thrusts started to slow down, did she realize he'd been cumming inside her as she came.

Matthew groaned, masturbating a little faster as her fluids coated his length. But, he began to slow, eventually only using his hand to keep his length pointed upward, as Arturo started to adjust his position. The man behind her spread his legs, and helped lower her down, and down. She couldn't help him much, trembling as she was and trying to recover from her orgasm, but he kept lowering her anyway. Down, down, and down, onto the awaiting shaft ready to enter her.

As Matt's cock pressed against her tiny, soaked folds, she moaned openly, and forced herself to look at the camera again, as her body began to devour the man's length. A small tap of her fingers against Art's wrists caused him to let go of her, and she leaned forward, pressing her hands down against the giant's abs as she continued to sink downward. His girth spread her taut, and a peek down at her slit showed how wide he was pushing her little labia apart. And as his girth dragged along her g-spot, getting deeper and deeper, she felt his glans press against her depths. The spot was already aching for more, after Arturo's treatment of it, and feeling Matthew's glans press to it as he stretched her deep, was euphoric. Tenderly and gently like this allowed her body to adapt, preventing any pain, and flooding her with sparks of pleasure in her core. She squeezed hard on his girth, earning another groan from the enormous man, as she slowly, very slowly, devoured him to the hilt.

With both men now fully inside her, she took some time holding still, fingers kneading on Matt's abs — too tall for her to easily reach his chest while sitting up — and her ass snug to their pelvises. Arturo's position couldn't have been comfortable, squatting around her, but he seemed ok with it, and he held onto her waist for balance. Both of them, balls deep inside her, stretching her deep and apart, but not moving. Good god.

She looked at the camera, licked her lips, and smiled down at Matthew, as she began to grind her hips back and forth. "Hold still for me, a little longer."

What would Jessy do in this situation? Or Jennifer? What would they do for a camera, with two men inside them? They'd probably get rough, bounce, get things full of tumbling thrusts that had them struggling to stay on the bed. Much as the boys liked to get rough with her sometimes, they never got that rough; she was too small, and stretched to the limit already. And honestly, she wasn't interested in getting tossed around like a ragdoll.

But, she loved the way the two men wanted her, desired her, craved her. She loved it when they lost control, and gave into their animal side; a little, anyway. The way they sometimes stared at her, and she knew they were imagining little her with legs spread wide around them, filled her with tingles.

What would Antoinette do, in this situation? Were it Jack underneath her, she'd probably show off for him, play with her breasts and stuff. Natasha had basically no breasts to speak of, but that didn't deter Matthew or Arturo's obsession with them. They'd covered her chest in their cum a dozen times. What else would Antoinette do? She'd probably...

Natasha sat up straight, reached up with both hands, and combed her long black hair back behind her with her fingers. She spread her elbows out as she did, emphasizing the shape of her torso, of her small, feminine, dainty frame, her tiny pale breasts and swollen, pink nipples. And she offered the camera a seconds worth of bedroom eyes, before she tilted her head up, and kissed the underside of Arturo's jaw.

Both boys groaned. Arturo's hands squeezed her waist with an almost desperate need, and Matthew rubbed her legs where her thighs were spread around him. As their voices faded, she leaned forward again, put her hands back on Matt's stomach, and started to slowly, gently, grind her body back and forth.

"Fucking hell," Art said. "I'm dying here, Tash."

She chuckled, but it came out as squeaks. "You? I ... I'm b-bursting." One of her hands found her stomach, and she pressed down underneath her navel, where the two men were fighting for room inside her. Leaning forward like this meant the bump along her flat, small stomach, that showed just how much she was bursting, was subtle. But she could feel it, the overwhelming pressure and tightness causing each and every inch she moved to fill her with the sensation of flesh rubbing against flesh. Her little clitoris was practically standing up, but it was her insides that were aching beyond reason, more of her juices trickling out of her as her body demanded more heavenly friction and pressure on her depths. The sensation of pressure on her g-spot through the sheer volume of girth filling her had her struggling to keep her eyes open, and the way the both pressed against her depths, stretching her inward, was making her quiver, and whimper.

And the camera was making it worse! Knowing that a lens was on her, that she was being taped, and soon someone else would be seeing her naked, on display between two beautiful men, was overwhelming her with heat. She moved a little faster, posing as she did; she didn't try to, it just happened. Her small frame, lost between all this muscle and testosterone, must have looked good on camera, right? If it didn't, she could edit it, or delete the video. If it did, she could show it to people, show that she was — despite her tiny size — a woman, with curves and a sexual appetite. She was gorgeous!

Antoinette had, apparently, gotten into her head at some point tonight, and started driving.

She reached behind her, took Arturo's left hand, and guided it up to her neck. The instant he squeezed, a solid and firm grip, every part of her wanted to turn into warm goo and melt all over him. She guided his right hand to hook around her waist in a hug; she was small enough, and him large enough, that he almost could hug her waist with nothing but his fingers. With Matt, she took his hands and guided them up onto her hips, so she was covered in palms and fingers, arms, and muscle mass.

She offered the camera another peek, before she whispered to the men around her. “Ok ... f-f-fuck me.”

Like well oiled pistons, or perfectly aligned cogs, or ... experienced porn stars, the two men started to thrust into her body in rhythm with each other. Instant pleasure started to flow through her, more than she could get by moving on her own. Giving into it, especially after having teased them so, was euphoric, and she erupted into tiny squeaks and mewls as the friction of flesh on soaking hot flesh filled her.

She wasn't Natasha anymore. She was someone naughty, and salacious, and comfortable with themselves and showing off. She was someone who could do something as insane as make a sex tape, with two boyfriends, and let people see her when she climaxed. It was like wearing beautiful armor, being like this, confident and happy. It made it so easy to get into it, to let the growing heat spread out from her center and into her limbs, until she couldn't help but move with the two men thrusting into her.

She managed another peek at the camera, before her eyes closed. Clenching muscles and a shortening of her breath announced her orgasm, and the two men slowed down as she started to cum. They slowed, but did not stop. The thrust slower, but deeper, making sure to sink both themselves to the hilt, at the same time, insuring she could barely get a breath, as her juices trickled down onto the beast beneath her.

They rolled over, or rather rolled backward. Soon she was on her back on Art's chest, and Matt was leaning over her, fucking her. He brought his chest down over her, squashed her between him and Art, and he took her thighs, bringing them up to her shoulders. Only then did she remember she was wearing pink thigh highs, and she managed a small giggle between her squeaks.

The only thing the camera would be able to see now, were her pink legs bouncing around, sticking out from between two massive bodies, and two enormous shafts, plunging into her again, and again, and again.

Utterly. Carnal. She could edit it out later. Or, more likely, leave it in.

---

---

~~Jack~~

Three Kings Cemetery. It was a beautiful place, and Jack instantly felt comfortable once he stepped through its gates. The Beast in his guts purred, happy to be surrounded by monuments that respected the dead, especially on a cloudy night with a cool breeze like tonight. It felt normal, felt right, to be walking among enormous tombstones with amazing sculptures upon them, angels and knights, horses and coat of arms, and some reaper-like figures. Some vampires probably lived in cemeteries like this, sleeping in locked mausoleums, and drinking of visitors. He understood.

It was the sort of cemetery that belonged in Paris or London, hundreds of years ago, and it didn't really fit into the modern-rich atmosphere of Dolareido, with its clubs and casinos. But Antoinette and the others had made sure a chunk of South Side was separate from all the money and vices, and Lucas and Maria had made sure to preserve the tradition. It led to things like the Grand Cathedral where Maria slept, and Three Kings Cemetery, where the dead got to indulge in dramatic presentation, and Gothic atmosphere.

The dead, the truly dead, didn't give a shit of course, but the fake dead like Jack couldn't help but be drawn to it. He stood in front of one headstone, with an angel sculpture standing behind it, raised upon a platform, and he smiled as he noticed it was worn with time. The features of the eyes and wings were smoothed out, but the magnificence of it wasn't. Another tombstone had a smaller angel, a baby or cherub or something, floating upon a basket. A child's tombstone.

Graveyards struck the perfect note of sadness and serenity, to soothe any soul, but if he had to guess, vampires probably enjoyed the atmosphere more than anyone else. The only reason Three Kings didn't have Kindred hiding in it right now, was probably because of Maria's nearby presence, or because of the strange shit Jacob did here. Rumor had it the cemetery was haunted, and he was sure that was entirely Jacob. And this far out from South Side central, it was quiet enough that the breeze rustled the leaves of nearby trees, planted in the graveyard. It did feel haunted.

Someone was watching him.

His new strength, powers, abilities, all joined to heighten his senses. It'd be hard for anyone to sneak up on him now. Elders must have walked around like this, like rocket launchers at the ready and held by itchy trigger fingers, knowing full well they could, and should, shoot anything that looked remotely suspicious. It was scary, being this strong now, knowing he could tap into the curse without issue anymore. It was scary, having his Beast whisper to him things he didn't notice before, like the presence of distant kine, the flapping of bird wings, or the fact someone was hidden in their Cloak of Night, and was watching him.

Jack wore his coal suit tonight, with a slick coal business coat. For some reason, he wanted to remind himself that his life didn't have to be about colossal alien entities, ancient curses, and otherworldly realms. He was a vampire first and foremost, and that meant skin, bones, blood, and the hunger for it. He was a walking corpse that looked great in a suit.

He looked over beside him, and the darkness hid his small smile. There was someone over there, a kine, standing at a grave; she wasn't the person who was watching him. Whoever that was remained hidden. The woman, in her forties, was texting on her phone. Attractive, and dressed to please the eye with a coat covered in fluffy white fur, and black high heels visible below.

Jack started toward her, and used a hint of vitae to keep his motions quiet and suppressed. Instinct had kicked in, told him this was a hunt, and he let his instincts guide his actions in a way he never did before. He was over two years embraced now, and hunting prey came easily to him, even without his newly inflated Beast steering him. Walking up to a stranger and initiating conversation would have been a daunting prospect in the past, and it still wasn't a fun time for him, but he could get over that hurdle without too much trouble now.

The woman only noticed him once he was beside her, and she jumped away from him with a startle. Her phone fell, and Jack snatched it out of the air before it landed.

“Oh! Oh Jesus Christ, fuck me, I ... hello,” she said. This close, the darkness peeled away to reveal her long, flowing dark hair, and her dark skin. She reminded him of Athalia, though without the height. “You saved my phone!”

“I shouldn't have startled you,” he said softly as he handed it back to her. No need to talk in hushed tones, but it added to the atmosphere of the moment. It was a graveyard, after all. If he'd been doing this in a library, he'd have done the same thing. No reason to disturb the ghosts.

“No no, it's fine. Surprised to see anyone else out at this hour, in a graveyard.”

He struggled to not grin at that. “Me too.” A glance down at the tombstone showed a man's name, Harry, someone who died a few years ago. “May I ask who this is?”

“My husband.”

“Oh, I’m sorry.” Much as he hated this small talk, it was a skill, and a valuable one. Chewing-the-cud dialogue was as painful as taking a cheese grater to his testicles, which was a big reason he avoided chitchatting with strangers. But in a graveyard, the talk was likely to have a little more depth, or at least, not hop subjects every fifteen seconds.

“It’s fine. He was an asshole. Cheated on me.” Well, that was blunt of her. Her eyes hardened as she looked at the tombstone, and she sent another quick text off. “He doesn’t deserve to be buried here, honestly. Three Kings is too good for him.”

“Why is he?”

“His parents are rich.”

“Yep, that’ll do it in Dolareido.” Where the money runs like blood.

“Oh, I’m sorry, I’m Felicia. And I really shouldn’t be telling this stuff to a stranger.”

“Talking to a stranger can be freeing. And I’m John.” John Smith, naturally. “Hit me.”

“Hit you?”

“With more about”—he glanced down at the tombstone again—“Harry. Or rather, why you’re here visiting him.”

“Heh.” She shrugged and shook her head. “I’m here because I’m dumb. We were in the middle of a divorce when he died. I guess it’s just left me ... left the situation unresolved.”

“I’m guessing there were good times, along with the bad, if you still visit his grave.”

“Of course. I married the fucker, after all.”

“It’s good to have some good memories of the people we lose. They have a habit of sticking around for a long time.”

Why all this small talk? Just take her, drain her, and leave the corpse on her husband’s grave. Perfectly poetic.

Fuck you, I’m not killing her. Kindred in Dolareido don’t kill without reason.

Kindred kill. Kindred are predators. And you even have the Prince’s permission to kill, as long as you don’t violate the Masquerade. Go nuts. Kill her.

No! Fuck off and shut up.

“You ok?”

“What?” He raised his head. He must have lowered it at some point without noticing, probably to hide the expressions on his face; they couldn’t have been pleasant ones. “Y-Yeah, fine. Just thinking about ... an ex-girlfriend. She’s not dead, but we were together a long time, and I don’t know if I’d be doing what you’re doing, if she died.” God damn, lying was easy once you gave yourself over to it. “Needless to say, it did not end well.”

“Ouch. I’m sure you’d feel differently if it happened, though. I mean, at the time I wanted to kill Harry, but now ... seems ... like a waste.” She took a peek at him a few times as she sent off another text, noticing his nice coat and suit. Confidence plus suit plus politeness equals easy hunt.

Maybe turn her, then? You have no thralls or ghouls. A lovely lady like her would be a valuable set of eyes and ears.

I have Scully and Mulder for that.

Then fuck her. Turn her into a ghoul, and make her your personal hole to fuck.

The fuck do you care for sex? If you're ... a voice for the Kindred half of me, or whatever, the fuck does sex mean to you?

Drink her during sex, Kiss her. Make her your own.

I have a lover, the love of my life. Idiot.

She has ghouls, so can you. Grow your army. Start with her. You can drink her and fuck her, and invite that so called Prince.

Jack shook out his head again, but when Felicia caught it, he made sure to catch her eyes. She was intrigued by him, the small guy who showed up out of nowhere, in a graveyard, to talk with her. It wouldn't be hard to turn her into a thrall or ghoul really; a single command and she'd drink his blood. A taste or three, and she'd be a thrall, devoted to him. If he put his will and vitae into it, she'd become a ghoul, devoted to him all the same, and immortal, as long as he kept feeding her the will-infused blood every month.

And she was attractive. Age treated her well; or botox, he wasn't sure. Cosmetic surgery was the norm in Dolareido, with fake breasts and fake butts, worn by fake personalities. That didn't mean Felicia was like that, but considering her fancy coat and heels, in a graveyard no less, she lived the high life. He wouldn't have been surprised if she was one of the couples he noticed fucking on their balconies, doing lines and showing off jewelry naked.

No. Making a thrall was something to be calculated, with an eye for the effects, short and longterm. Would she be valuable? How many secrets could he trust her with? Hell, just telling her he was a vampire was a huge danger, to him and his kin. A ghoul was more reliable, someone that could heal from grave injuries, exercise great strength, and supposedly, even perform some Kindred feats, if they were old and strong enough. To create a ghoul was a major investment, and he wasn't about to do that to a random woman.

The only reason he was even thinking the thoughts, was because he could feel his Kindred instincts kick in in self defense. His sire was dead, and that truth weighed on him until it fucking hurt, until it was breaking his back and pinning him to the ground. He had to be more paranoid, more careful, not let the curse make him do anything stupid, but also plan for the future better than he had been. Kindred caution was telling him that, if he wanted to outlive his sire and grandsire, he had to be better, and build an army.

Julias didn't die because he made a mistake, Jack. He died because you did. The only mistake he made was helping you.

Jack pushed the thoughts away, smiled at Felicia, and reached across the empty space between their eyes with his thoughts. Vitae, the energy in his blood, let him bridge that gap. It was magic, an ancient, disturbing, twisted, dark magic. Blood magic, he supposed. He hadn't thought of it that way before, when he'd first become a vampire. It wasn't magic to him, just an extension of his abilities, same as he had when he was kine. Now, after seeing werewolves, monsters from a literal nightmare realm, rats summoned en masse by Viktor's hand, after seeing Lucas summon a bolt of lightning, and so many other things, magic was the only word he could think to use.

Fucked up, horrible, powerful magic.

Felicia's mouth parted slightly, and her arms hung limp at her sides. The resistance she provided him was beyond small, so small it was like stepping on an ant. Is this what it felt like to be an elder? Using Dominate felt ten times easier now, and apparently, he'd been a natural at it from the start. He could break this woman's mind and turn her into a vegetable, with the smallest modicum of effort. The giant creature in his guts, inflated by the curse he never wanted, was giving him the power to use fully automatic rifles, when he'd only just got comfortable with BB guns.

With great power comes great responsibility, so he'd heard. All he wanted to do with it was get revenge, and then seal it away. Not exactly a superhero, was he?

"Come here," he said, barely more than a whisper. She complied without hesitation, her face blank, and her mind as well. "Come closer. I will drink of you, Felicia." He almost added what would have inevitably been a horrible attempt at the classic Dracula accent.

She succumbed. He breathed in the smell of his meal, her perfume, her flesh, and he gently sank his fangs into her neck as he did. His hands took her in an embrace, and he growled quietly against her skin as he let the thick, warm, divine liquid pour over his tongue. Delicious. It didn't taste like metal, not really, not like a kine would have tasted. To him, it tasted amazing in a way he couldn't put to words. Fulfilling, warm, sweet. Maybe like hot chocolate, but thicker, and the more he drank down, the better he felt, like an energy drink. No, food descriptions didn't work. Kine blood was too amazing, too addicting. He gave up thinking about defining it, and just reveled in the moment of a successful hunt.

Felicia moaned, but he didn't drag the Kiss on. He drank quickly, sucking the blood out of her instead of letting it flow into his mouth slowly. If he was going to turn this into a sexual affair, slow was better, but he'd never do that; not without Antoinette present to enjoy it with him, at least. Done quickly, the Kiss was plenty enjoyable, but Felicia was borderline comatose before she could truly enjoy it. She went limp in his arms, and he gently lowered her down onto the tombstone as her energy vanished. A couple of licks onto the puncture marks in her neck, and they sealed, hiding the evidence of his hunt.

No gods, no alien creatures, no nightmare monsters, no spirits or ghosts or goblins. Just a vampire, having a meal in a cemetery. Long ago, he was terrified of this. Now, it was a moment's reprieve before he was thrust into the insanity awaiting him.

"I can remember," a woman's voice said from the dark, "when you had trouble doing this sort of shit."

He wiped a thumb along his lips, put his hands in his pockets, and looked to the source of the sound. Beatrice was standing beside a sculpture, a huge one, an angel with sword in hand, and she managed a small wave for him as she caught his eyes. She must have been the one hiding with the Cloak of Night, and revealed herself when he was done. The presence of a hiding vampire, one as old and strong as a vampire like her, was something the old him would not have been able to detect. Not true anymore.

"I had people like you to help me," he said. He walked up to her, and managed a small smile once they were a couple feet apart. "Taught me how to hunt, right?"

"How to hunt in alleys and shit, yeah. I didn't teach you how to flirt with strangers."

"That wasn't flirting!"

"Any woman her age who gets approached by a young guy in a great suit, who's making flawless chit chat, is going to assume you're flirting, at least a little. But hey, she looked interested."

He frowned at that, looking down as he held his chin between his fingers. "You're right, I guess. Antoinette has taught me a lot about talking, how to be suave and stuff. And ... Julias did too."

If she was going to flinch, she hid it well. "I'm sure he did. Fucker was a smooth talker." Her smile grew, and Jack matched it. It was a fun memory, thinking of Julias and how frustratingly smooth he could be, when he wanted to. The good memories always last. “You really want to wear that?”

“I ... Shit, is it going to get messy?” He looked down at his nice clothes, frowning all the more.

“Probably.”

“Well, I mean I’d prefer to keep it from a blood soaking, but if it gets ruined, I guess I’ll just replace them.”

“You Invictus fuckers just love to waste money.”

He shrugged, and adjusted the shoulders of the jacket in a very ‘look at me I’m gorgeous’ fashion. “True dat.” Distant noises called his attention, stone shifting on stone, and he looked to the mausoleums in the back of the graveyard. “Jennifer?”

“Good ears.”

“Yeah. This curse comes with benefits.”

She nodded, snake eyes looking down as she ran the toe of a boot back and forth along the path beneath them. “Good. And ... how’s your stomach?”

“My stomach?”

“Going to ask you to do something pretty ... fucking horrible, honestly.”

He closed his eyes, took a deep, useless breath, and nodded. “What is it?”

“We have seven sacrifices waiting downstairs, alive but unconscious.”

“Jesus...”

“Jacob’s down there, preparing, but he doesn’t think it’ll be enough.”

“Enough for what? How’s this going to work? I don’t even know what we’re doing.” And if seven sacrifices wasn’t enough to fuel this ritual, holy fucking shit, how deep did this rabbit hole go?

“Crúac is ... weird. It’s fickle, and it can be random. We’re trying to track down the hunters, right? Jacob knows rituals that can track people down, so do I, but we’re trying to catch a target hiding inside a weird flesh chamber. It’s ... it’s difficult. It’s like we’re digging for items in the sand, except there’s other items in the sand, and some of them are sharp.”

He raised a brow. “That sounds difficult. But, I’m not sure what I can do.”

“We need a new ritual.”

“Sounds tough to do.”

“More than tough, impossible, without a ... a ... sign, I guess.”

“Sign?” He glanced back at the unconscious woman he left, hopefully fine until she recovered in four or eight hours. It was damn unlikely for thieves or whatnot to come visiting Three Kings Cemetery, not after the last time, when a few of them disappeared. Probably sacrifices for Jacob’s disturbing hobbies.

“What we’re doing tonight isn’t a Crúac ritual, not really. It’s an ... offering, to the Crone. For guidance.”

“Guidance...” He winced, and when he met her eyes, she winced. She knew what it sounded like, then. “You believe there’s a Crone ... thing, out there, listening to your prayers?”

“I didn’t, when I first joined the Circle. But after all the shit we’ve seen, Jack, how can you not think there’s something out there, things, listening to us? Big things, godly things, things that look at human existence like flies buzzing around a rotting corpse, and vampires are the cockroaches.”

He couldn’t help but smile at that, and her nasty but effective metaphor. “At least you have a humble view of yourself. Does Jacob share the same view?”

“He does. Hell, much as he likes to act big and tough, I’ve seen him pay more respect to this mythical entity he’s never seen more than I have.”

That was a plus in Jacob’s favor. If he didn’t consider himself to be an important figure in the grand plan — or whatever — of his Crone’s existence and intentions, then it was less likely Jacob was just manipulating Beatrice in a pyramid scheme.

“... I miss the old days,” he said, “when all I had to worry about was working up the courage to talk to strangers.” With a gesture to the unconscious kine behind him, he started pacing, hands in his pockets and head looking down. “Now we’re worrying about hidden gods and scheming devils. Now we’re worrying about alternate fucking dimensions, monsters from literal nightmares, and psychopaths with flesh magic.”

“You’re telling me. Fuck, what I’d give to just curl back up in J ... Julias’s bed, and ... yeah.”

Her eyes fell, avoiding his gaze. If he’d looked at her with sympathy, with any empathy, she’d probably have burst into tears, and left. It was something they had in common, that they didn’t want sympathy, even if it would have been good for them. Nope, fuck that, just power through their misery, even if they broke their nose and bones on every wall in the way.

“So, I’m here. What do you need me to do?”

“Right, right.” She took a breath, licked her crocodile teeth with her long tongue, and looked up at the cloudy sky. “Jacob’s been talking with Black Blood, and they both think we need more ... sacrifices.”

“More?”

“More. We’re trying to summon something’s attention. We think last time, we managed to get somewhere, and this time we have seven sacrifices like I said. But it’s not like we can just linearly scale up how many we sacrifice until the Crone, or whatever’s out there, responds. We’ll run out of people eventually, or the Prince will interfere, or—”

“So you want to sacrifice a lot more people, to make sure this is the one time you need to do it. Prudent, if you were running a business. Psychotic, if you’re, oh I don’t know, killing people.”

Her snake eyes cut into him hard, and she came closer to him as she ground her teeth together. It made her crocodile teeth click as they shifted grooves along each other.

“Dolareido has plenty of people the world won’t mind disappearing.”

“Not so many that you can just wipe out dozens of people. And besides, they’re still people. You’re really ok with slaughtering humans like this?”

In the past, he’d have been afraid. Beatrice was a strong Nosferatu, strong for her age too, a Kindred who’d exercised her powers far more regularly than her fellow Carthians. Jacob recruited her for a reason. Once she was old enough, the whole city would fear her as one of the most powerful elders to ever emerge from its streets. She was strong, good with the Cloak of Night, and he knew she could bestow nightmares if forced, the unique ability of Nosferatu.

But now it was different. He wasn't afraid of her, she was afraid of him, and she was acting aggressive because of it. He didn't want to fight her, and the only thing he was afraid of was accidentally hurting her if it came to that.

"It has to be done!" she said.

He winced, looked down, and gulped. Lot of wincing tonight, and he doubted it'd stop any time soon. "You've killed people, Triss, on hunts and stuff. I've never killed anyone outside of a battle, you know?" When he raised his eyes back to her, she'd taken a step back, and she looked shocked. "I still think about Mrs. Pavala sometimes, and the interviews I saw on TV with her family."

"That ... that's different! She was an innocent, and it wasn't your fault. We're only sacrificing scumbags."

That earned a frown from him. "We're flirting with a line, Triss. I'm terrified of crossing it."

"The fuck? I thought you were willing to do anything to kill Angela."

"Anything except sell my soul down the river."

"... are you going to help or not?"

He sighed, dug up a small smile from somewhere, and nodded. "Yes, I'll help."

Kindred only kill kine when they need to. This was one of those times.

---

Predictably, they went to Devil's Corner, not too far off from the brothels Vicky and Parker ran. Jacob had his fingers in this district, and probably had thralls and ghouls no one knew about, running side businesses and keeping their eyes open. The more he dealt with shit like this, the more he didn't blame the elders for rarely sticking their necks out. One wrong move and an elder could find themselves in the middle of an explosion a rival set up in a random building years before. Boom, gone, no more rival.

He struggled to think Jacob would actually kill Antoinette, but he had to swallow the painful truth that Jacob might, if he could without risk of retaliation. And he definitely would kill any of the other elders if given the chance. They'd probably kill him, too. What about Garry though? He had some sort of relationship with Jacob, but he didn't know the details of it, if it extended to friendship or purely business.

He laughed and rolled his eyes. Kindred instincts were kicking in, warning him of the Danse Macabre, and that he should start playing it. He should be creating thralls no one knew about, setting up spies, surveillance, maybe connecting with some animals. He'd never given Scully or Mulder his blood, but it was a thing he could do, to turn them into devoted servants. The idea irked him, but another part of him said it was just the way the game was played. Animals, kine, they were like money and property, tools to be used to extend his life as long as possible, so the Kindred believed. Ugh.

A glance upward spotted Scully and Mulder, flying from rooftop to rooftop, power line to streetlight. He didn't know if Triss noticed them, but he wouldn't have been surprised if she had. She wasn't a Mekhet, but she was still surprisingly talented for her age, more than she probably realized.

"I'm surprised Jacob isn't doing this himself," he said to Triss as they walked the sidewalk. She had them wrapped in her Cloak of Night, or rather its gentler cousin Face in the Crowd, which let kine see them without actually noticing them. It meant they could walk through the street crowds of Devil's Corner without issue, no one noticing her face, or his suit.

"I guess he'd have a harder time doing this than you. And it's probably a test of your commitment."

"Mmm, love all this cult talk."

"Jack, it's not a cult. You know what's going on."

He shook his head and frowned at her. "I don't know what's going on, and neither do you. You can't honestly believe Jacob or Black Blood are telling you everything."

"They're ... telling me more than I bargained for."

That caused him to raise a brow, especially as she avoided eye contact. He almost followed up with more questions, but her eyes had grown cold, glaring, staring ahead, and he pulled back. No need to be aggressive with her, it wasn't like he was in a position to judge.

"Any ideas where we can pick up people we don't mind killing?"

"Jacob says there's a new fucker pushing in on Devil's Corner, some human with delusions of grandeur, setting up trafficking rings. Innocent people are getting hurt. You know the deal."

"I guess, yeah." He didn't always know the deal. Once upon a time, the idea that humans were capable of killing each other over drugs, or territory, or prostitutes, was alien to him. And his parents thought the city was a safe place to live, according to the statistics. It was, but not nearly as safe as he thought, when he was still alive. Disappearances happened all the time in Dolareido, and the Invictus or the Prince covered it up when it suited their purposes.

"Think you can handle Dominating that many?"

“How many is that many?”

“Probably four of five.”

He shrugged and nodded. “Easily.”

That earned a raised brow from her. “Really?”

“Even without the curse, I’m sure I could convince a few kine to follow us without issue. Maybe not to their deaths, but we could just lie until we knocked them out. Now though? No problem.”

Again, she looked surprised, and her eyes flicked from him to the sidewalk and people ahead of her. “That’s damn impressive for someone your age.”

“I ... had a great teacher.” He didn’t stop to catch her reaction. Better to talk about Julias and move on, not let it weigh them down. “And it was a natural talent, same as my sire and his sire, and I presume his sire and her sire.”

“Still can’t believe you actually got to see a vision of Viktor’s sire, and her sire. What’d they look like?”

“Beautiful women, honestly. Susanna, the ... source of the curse, she was short, slim, long dark hair. Beautiful, in a petite, and maybe a little psycho kinda way. And she sired her childe in the middle of a threesome. Her childe was taller, blonde, very curvy and busty with a slim waist. Definitely got some Jessica Rabbit vibes from her. I ... I saw her siring Viktor, and she was having sex with him against a wall in what I can only assume was a street in 1600s, England.”

That made her laugh, and Jack blinked at her as he waited for her to regain her composure.

“Sex is in your veins.”

“I guess it is.”

---

Finding the people was easy enough. Four tough guys and one punk girl, wearing clothes that were stereotypical. He hated that it was a stereotype, how it gave perfectly nice people a bad image, but there was no denying the baggy clothes and tattoos were common among the worst Devil’s Corner had to offer.

But, that wasn’t a fair analysis. In his world, the biggest scum, the dirtiest fucks, the most horrible people that deserved slow, painful deaths, were often the most well dressed. They enunciated and spoke eloquently. They hosted wine tastings, art showings, and hedged stocks. They wore suits and dresses worth the same as a car, and they were very, very good at hiding how fucking horrible they were.

He was usually surrounded by suits. Being down in the dirt, behind buildings, in dark alleys, and under the homes of pimps, was a change of pace for him. Carthians dealt with this particular half of humans usually, and would be better at recognizing the signs, at knowing which kine were dangerous and which were up to no good. All he had to go on was whatever Beatrice told him.

“I’m looking for Clarence,” Triss said.

“You found him.” One of the kine stood up, and the rest of the group followed, each reaching behind their back, but leaving their hands hooked behind and out of sight. Hands on their pistols, no doubt.

Jack took a step forward, made eye contact with each of them, and sighed. “Leave your weapons behind, don’t say a word, and come with me.”

The more complicated the instruction, the more difficult it was to get across. Three commands was tough, but doable. Doing it to five kine at once was very tough for any neonate Ventrue, especially one as young as him. His natural talent, and his powerful bloodline helped, but it was the curse that made it easy. Their minds broke like twigs. Not a hint of resistance. He had to pull back, yank on the reins of the force that flowed out of him and crashed into their minds, or he'd have damaged them. They were open to him, and he could turn them into his puppets with ease. He could rewrite their memories until they were empty pawns.

They set their pistols down, and walked up to him, eyes void of anything.

“You ... you hit them hard,” Beatrice said.

“Yeah, too hard. I'm still trying to get used to this.”

“I didn't realize you could just use this curse thing on command, so easily.”

“I couldn't before, and I wish I couldn't now. But, it's like someone took my toy gun and gave me a rocket launcher, and didn't bother to teach me how to use it.”

“That sounds dangerous.”

“Yeap. I'm a menace to everyone around me.”

They both laughed. It was good to laugh, like laughing at death. Helped alleviate the cruel, cold truth of reality that he was walking out from behind a building with a bunch of kine that were going to be dead before the night was over.

“Before you say it,” Triss said, “yes, I do wonder what Julias would say right now. I'm guessing he'd be pretty upset we're doing this.”

Ouch. Jack looked back at the criminals, and checked for a reaction. Normally he'd have to be careful to not let them know what he was doing, if he was going to make them do something they didn't want to do. If a kine realized the orders they were following were dangerous, or suicidal, they'd try and fight to escape his control. This wasn't that. This was full on hypnosis with layers of memory wiping. He had damaged these kine. If they managed to get free somehow, he doubted they'd get full function of their minds back for days.

Christ, in the past using Dominate was like trying to smash through drywall. Sure it was tough, but certainly not impossible. Breaking these kine had been like trying to smash through a glass wall, with a tank. It'd been a struggle to stop his forward momentum, and not accidentally topple the whole house.

He waited a minute before nodding. "Yeah, he would be upset. Julias loved the kine."

"Yeah, fucker did, just like Superman." Her voice choked for a second, and she looked away as she took a deep breath. "He was envious of them, of how they enjoyed life in the moment, you know?"

"Yeah, I know."

"And here we are, performing rituals to dark gods so we can win a war for our survival, and revenge. And after that, we'll be continuing our stupid games with the covenants, and other shit. It's comical."

"Yeah, it is." He looked back at the group following him again. Triss had extended her Cloak of Night enough to hit all of them, since its weaker form Face in the Crowd was easy to use. Anyone watching would have seen them and their strange group, but no one would care.

"How's Sándor?" she said.

“Still a vegetable. I think I could break into his mind, but it’d be like building up pressure on a dam to break it.”

“It’d ... break everything behind it once the dam went down.”

“Yeap,” he said. “No one has any ideas of how to get the seal off him. Best I can figure is we kill Elen.”

Triss shook her head. “We want to capture her. If we kill her, it might not break the seal. If we capture her, maybe we can force her to remove it.”

“Or better yet, maybe if we capture the flesh mage, we can have her do all sorts of crazy shit for us.” He made sure the sarcasm was dripping.

“You know everyone wants her. Jacob isn’t alone in that. Your bosses want her, and so does your girlfriend.”

“Yeah, I know. But I’ve already fucked up twice with these hunters. I’m not going to make a mistake and let them escape again, because our bosses are elders and obsessed with getting their hands on every angle of power they can.” He glared at her, squinting until she was forced to look away. “We’ll capture her if we can, Triss, but if you had to pick between that, or killing Angela, which would you take?”

“Not even a fucking question ... unless...”

“Unless?”

Triss rubbed the back of her neck. Something was bothering her, for sure. It squirmed out of her, making her fidget until she broke.

“Jacob and I have been talking ... about ... resurrection.”

Full stop. Jack blinked at her, several times, before looking back to the group following him. “Forget this conversation ever happened.” They nodded in unison, his faithful zombies, and Jack looked back to his friend with wide eyes. “You can’t be serious.”

“We don’t need Elen, but I’ve seen the sort of shit she can do, in that weird flesh chamber. It ... it’s ... possible, that maybe she could do something. Maybe she could help us revive people? Julias, Mary, and I’m sure the others would—”

“Don’t.”

“What?”

“Don’t. Just don’t. There’s no reviving the dead, Beatrice. We can’t get them back. Christ, how many movies, how many stories, how many fucking comic books do we have now showing how bad an idea that is?” He turned and pointed at his zombies. “Any of you got a car?”

“Yeah,” the woman said.

“Take us to it.”

She nodded, stepped up, and guided them down a different street.

“The fuck we need a car for?” Triss said. “Let’s just carry them and run to Three Kings.”

“Easy for you to say. Even with this curse, I’m still short and light. Physics are a thing. And don’t change the subject! You can’t honestly expect this resurrection idea is possible. We have some of the oldest, strongest vampires in this city, and two of them have been fucking with shit well beyond our understanding for centuries. If it could be done—”

“It can be done! It can, it fucking can. It can it can it...” She came in closer to him, shoulder to shoulder. If she’d wanted to, she was close enough to hit him, and she sounded like she wanted to, but she sighed and just shook her head. “It is possible, but doing it is insanely hard. It’s just not feasible unless you’re ready to cause a biblical catastrophe.”

Wait, what? He put every shred of control he had into his poker face, and kept his eyes ahead of him as he walked. “Biblical catastrophe?”

“I’m trusting you with a huge secret, Jack. Swear you’ll keep the ... the little I tell you, to yourself.”

Good fucking god. This was not good, not good at all, but he needed to know. He ground his teeth until he felt his jaw bone threaten to crack.

“I swear.” Fuck. Fuck fuck. He meant it when he made an oath, and she knew it too. Fuck.

“Jacob knows a way to at least attempt resurrection, but he hasn’t tried it, because it’d pile the bodies to the sky. Fucked up as he is, he won’t try that.”

Jack looked to Triss, and he knew he wore shock on his face. She’d think he was shocked that Jacob had actually learned of a way to resurrect someone. He was shocked because holy fucking shit that fit so damn well into Azamel’s warning that it made him want to scream. No. No no no, oh fucking god no.

“You’re ... sure he wouldn’t try it?”

“Pretty damn sure, Jack. Jacob’s a twisted bastard but he loves this city. There’s a reason he calls it his, instead of Antoinette’s.”

That was true. Jacob did love the city, in his own strange way, in an Erik and Christine sort of way; Dolareido being Christine in that fucked up relationship. And Minerva died a long time ago. If Jacob was willing to destroy the city in order to revive Minerva, he'd have done so already. Right? On top of that, Dolareido was his source of food and shelter. Kindred spent centuries setting up their nests to be safe and sustainable. It made no sense for Jacob to ruin that.

But, what about Maria? Her lover had only recently died, and more than few things pointed to her being up to something. If Jacob knew how to resurrect someone, and wasn't willing to do it, was Maria?

Kine are sheep, Jack. Any elder will gladly sacrifice tens of thousands of them to bring back a loved one.

There are millions of people in Dolareido!

The number is meaningless. Susanna piled the bodies high, because kine are nothing more than bags of blood that inconveniently move around.

Jack squeezed his eyes tight, and forced the voice away. "You trust Jacob?"

"I ... I do, more than I should, but I do."

"Alright then. When it comes to Jacob, I'll trust you, Triss. If you tell me I don't have to worry that he's going to do something insane, I'll take your word for it. But promise you'll tell me if that ever changes."

"Promise."

Chapter 100

~~Beatrice~~

They walked through the cemetery gates, and stepped among the tombstones, a bunch of brainwashed kine behind them. She tried to not show it, but she was a little scared. Not of Jacob and the madness he pursued; that ship had sailed. No, she was afraid of Jack.

He'd accidentally hurt these kine, their brains, with how easily he'd dominated. Accidentally performed an act most ancilla Ventrue would have struggled to perform, let alone a neonate, no less. And he wasn't lying about it, either. The kine behind them were thoroughly brain fucked. She could have turned around, slit the throat of one of them, and the others would have barely reacted. Normally, a kine brainwashed by a Ventrue's Dominate, could break free if the stimulus they were exposed to was too extreme, or if they thought their orders went against their beliefs, or self preservation.

These five might as well have been wearing blindfolds and drugged to hell, with how little they were thinking. A blessing in disguise, she supposed. Killing an animal was easier when it didn't display signs of intelligence.

The woman Jack had left unconscious was still there, on the ground and sleeping against a tombstone, untouched. She'd be fine. No kine came to the cemetery with ill intent, not with people like Jacob and Black Blood haunting it. In the past, the kid would have felt horrible about leaving a kine unconscious and unguarded like this, but Jack walked past her, sparing only a quick glance and frown. He probably still felt bad, but didn't let it stop him. Sad. Every night was turning the kid more and more into a typical Kindred.

What would Julias say about that? He was the one Kindred in the whole city who tried to keep his humanity, keep thinking about kine as more than food, and tried to keep the peace between Kindred. Superman, a real white knight, who would tell Jack he should find a better place to let the kine woman sleep off the Kiss coma. He was dead, and Beatrice was about to kill a dozen kine in a prayer offering to the Crone, in hopes of learning a Crúac ritual to hunt down the hunters.

Depressing.

She guided Jack to the mausoleum in the back of the cemetery. They said nothing. This wasn't a fun time, and it wasn't a chatty time. It was a shit time, and she was about to expose Jack to a side of it she'd prefer to not.

The journey through the tunnel was gloomy as all hell. The warning sign above remained, Jacob's sign, and Jack took note of it, but he'd seen this tunnel before, from that time Black Blood rescued him. Black Blood, and Jacob. The kine behind followed. Some managed a glance up at the sign, but where there should have been fear, she saw only numb faces. And when it got too dark for human eyes, they started feeling along the stone walls to guide them. Sheep to the slaughter.

"Clarice! How nice of you to join us. And five more? The Crone will be pleased."

The sight was horrific. The seven kine Jacob had prepared dangled from hooks over the bowl, alive, and unconscious. Triss didn't know if the Crone cared about pain, beyond what the Kindred had to suffer to learn Crúac, or if Jacob had ever indulged in torturing his sacrifices, but she was thankful he'd never done that with her around.

The elder stood by the giant bowl, dressed in his black robes and black eye bandage. Jennifer was there, wrapped in a black cloak as well, and her eyes were wide, locked onto Jack and the offerings he brought.

“You did this?” she said.

Jack nodded to her, frown deepening, before he turned to the people following. “Do whatever they tell you to.” And the five kine nodded, like ants obeying the word of their queen, off to die without a thought.

“Excellent,” Jacob said. “Nice to see you putting that gift to use.”

“Gift?” Jack walked up to Jacob, glared up at his bandaged eyes, and grit his teeth. “Don’t. Just don’t. I’m here so we can find the hunters. I’m not helping you beyond that, and it’s not a gift. It’s a curse, treat it as such.”

Jacob’s smile grew, but the ice behind it was growing, too. Gulping, Triss and Jen both took a step back as they looked between the two men; so much for Jack being a kid. Two men fighting, two rather strong Kindred evidently, was not something she wanted to be near when it started.

“Curses can be gifts, Jack. Problems can be opportunities. You think so small! Give it a few hundred years, and you’ll learn to see the bigger picture.” Jacob stepped around the bowl, put it between him and Jack, and gestured to the enormous metal sacrificial altar. “Now, since your sacrifices seem to be thoroughly under your control, I won’t bother with drugs.”

Beatrice raised a hand. “We could—”

“Nonsense! Come, you, you, you, you, and you, stand over the bowl, and lean forward.” If Triss could have seen Jacob’s eyes, they’d no doubt be wide with madness. Jennifer was in awe over Jack’s abilities, impressed by his ridiculous power of Dominate, and Jacob was getting giggly over the power of it.

“How is this going to play out?” Jack said.

With a menacing grin, Jacob shrugged, and walked up to the first kine, the woman. “I have prepared the altar, and Black Blood has assisted. All that’s left now, is to prove our commitment, before I make the prayer.”

The slaughter commenced.

Beatrice forced herself to watch, but Jennifer had to look away. Triss didn’t blame her, honestly. If it were any other circumstance, Triss wouldn’t watch either, but the murder happening in front of her was her fault, her choice. Jacob may have been the one pulling the trigger, but she pushed for it, asked for it, and now she was neck deep in death because of it. Thankfully, Jacob wasn’t asking her to do the killing. Maybe he was protecting her, or maybe he liked killing kine and wanted to do it himself. Either way, she was more than fine with letting the old man do it for her.

Except, she would have killed them in a less messy method. A knife in the skull was instant death in almost all cases, and she knew Jacob had knives. The elder, on the other hand, never killed cleanly, as if the act of spilling blood needed to be as gory as possible. Maybe it had to be, for Black Blood to do whatever it was that Black Blood did. The spirit wasn’t in the room with them, far as Triss could tell, but that didn’t mean it wasn’t.

Jacob ripped the girl’s throat out, literally. The shower of blood into the empty, rusty bowl, and the struggles of the dying woman, were enough to stir reactions from the other sacrifices. If given time, they’d have probably broken free from Jack’s brainwashing, with the threat of imminent death weighing on them. But Jacob worked fast, spending no more than two seconds per sacrifice. The first one was still alive, by the time he’d ripped the throat out of the last one.

With each disgusting mess of murder and blood, he tossed the bits of throat into the bowl; blood and flesh were a part of the sacrifice, too. He let the writhing, silent sacrifices fall to the floor, where they bled out onto the Earth and stone, but not after having lost a gallon of blood into the bowl.

“Not exactly kosher, are they?” he said as he looked down at their bodies. His smile was gone, replaced by something else, something strange and twisted. Not a grin, or a grimace, but something Triss didn’t recognize, something between intrigue and resolution. Her boss was making jokes, but he didn’t mean them.

Jack turned his back to the slaughter, and stepped clear. For a second, Triss figured he was going to walk out, but he didn’t. Like her, he probably felt committed to being present for the results of his actions. Unlike her, he couldn’t stomach seeing such a horrible death.

Once upon a time, she couldn’t have either. Even at her worst, when she hated life and killed scum to vent, she didn’t delight in gore. This was disgusting. This was the road she was going down, if she wanted revenge. And it was the road she’d continue going down, if she ever wanted to see Julias again. Hell, this was a small taste of the Hell that she’d be treading on, a road paved in blood and murder, if she ever wanted to see him again.

Stop thinking about that, Triss. For now, just focus on catching the hunters. Killing some fucking shithead kine that were bad for the city, in pursuit of catching the hunters, was a perfectly reasonable action to take. Vampire lives came first.

Julias wouldn’t agree. Julias, was dead.

The blood poured, and only got worse when Jacob hopped up onto the edge of the bowl, reached out for a person hanging over it, and continued with the same process. These sacrifices didn’t squirm, and only swung mildly, giant hooks snug under the bindings on their wrists. Unconscious, they went to death with all the fight of a stone. Blood gushed from their ripped open throats, down into the bowl, and onto the bits of throat from the other sacrifices.

The longer she watched, the more it felt like she was watching chickens, cows, or pigs being slaughtered. Now she knew why some people became vegetarians after visiting slaughterhouses. She grit her teeth, forced herself to keep her eyes on the murder, and waited until Jacob was done.

It only got worse. Jacob slipped each dangling kine off their hooks, and set them in the bowl, piling them on each other. Then he reached down and tossed the five dead into the bowl as well. A pile of death, limbs, flesh and blood, that was their offering to the Crone.

Jack turned around eventually, and winced as he stared at the pile of empty vessels. “And what if this doesn’t work?”

“Then we’ll try something else,” Jacob said.

“Until you’ve gone through all your ideas, like checking things off a list?”

“We’re dealing with gods and demons, aliens and angels, really fucked up shit, Jack. It isn’t about business, or checking things off a list, it’s about commitment, and intent.”

“Intent? I—”

Jacob walked over to him, and this time Jack backed up. The Nosferatu was soaked in blood, mostly at the hands, but every motion the elder made splattered blood around him. It got onto Jack’s suit coat, and his face, but it was a pale comparison to the rivers of red that coated Jacob’s sleeves.

“You Invictus are all the same. You live inside numbers, and you treat respect like a currency. You’re so blind to the greater mysteries, God could come up to you and kiss your forehead and you wouldn't even notice. He could take off your sandals, wash your feet, and you'd try and quantify, identify, qualify, and turn it into a footnote for your books." The chuckling vanished. Jacob snapped his hands out, and grabbed Jack by the collar, splattering more blood everywhere. "You're swimming in the blood of a bleeding universe, walking on the ashes of dead deities, and you're too scared to even consider what could possibly exist beyond your insignificant, immortal lifespan."

For a second, Beatrice was almost impressed with the metaphor. But as she looked at Jacob, watched him clutch Jack as if desperate to get his point across to a boy who was desperately trying to stay grounded in the real world, she knew he'd been literal. Where had Jacob been in his life, what places had he visited, what entities had he talked to, to think like that? He was good friends with what might as well have been a deity, and he spent his time reading ancient manuscripts and sacrificing kine — and his own vitae — to a hidden god.

She came up to him, set an arm on his cloaked, dripping wrist, and nudged it off of Jack. Jacob turned his head to her, sighed, and stepped back, joining her at the bowl. When she looked back at Jack, she found the man looking down at the ground, caught between a frown and seeming genuinely hurt.

"I..." Jack stirred, still looking down and staring at the mess of blood the witches walked through. It was everywhere, flooding the cracks of the cave, until it sparkled like rivers in the candlelight. "I ... I'm terrified, Jacob."

The three witches froze, and stared at him.

"What?" Jacob said. And for the first time, Triss heard the sound of complete, total, genuine shock from her boss.

“I’m scared shitless. I’ve lost my sister. I’ve lost my sire. Now I’m carrying around something inside me straight from a horror movie, something that belongs in a fucking tome of dark rituals, not in my chest. And now we’re slaughtering people while we make prayers to dark gods. You might think this is all just another day, or maybe you’re excited to see things get shaken up, get fucked up and twisted, but every fucking day all I can do is hope and push for a time when things are back to the way they were. The sooner we can stop all this, the better. I’m hanging on by a thread here, and everywhere I look, all I see is shit that makes immortal bloodsucking vampires look blasé. So yeah, excuse me if I resist the idea of killing twelve people for a fucking prayer.”

All eyes fell to Jacob. Beatrice had never expected Jack to pour his heart out like that, especially not to Jacob. Maybe he felt like he could trust Jacob because Triss said he could. Or maybe he just couldn’t hold it in anymore. Whatever it was, Jacob didn’t look at him, keeping his head turned toward the bowl in front of him instead.

“Down here in the dark,” Jacob said, voice calm and almost soothing, “it gets pretty frightening. We’re buried in corpses and struggling to keep from drowning. Sometimes, you can hear the voices, and feel their fingers trying to drag you down.” Sighing, he shook his head, and motioned for Triss and Jennifer to step in toward the bowl with him. “Don’t worry, you’ll do better than most.”

“Better than most...” Jack lifted his eyes back up to the bowl, sighed, and stepped in closer. “So how does this prayer work?”

Jacob smiled, and pulled out a knife. “The sacrifice has been prepared. The three of us are going to imbue the sacrifice with our vitae. And then, we shall burn the corpses, a signal, to whoever’s watching.”

“Burn? There’s limited oxygen down here. The fire will die out.”

Chuckling, Jacob shook his head again, even as he slit his wrist. A thick, heavy glob of Kindred blood pooled at the wound, before eventually falling onto the corpses. Normally they'd use a single drop in their rituals, but Jacob forced out another, and another, each large and landing with enough impact they could hear it in the silence. Once he'd lost enough blood to make a kine lightheaded, the knife was passed around. Triss took it and did the same. Jack met her eyes, and she held a smile for him, a warm one, hoping it'd lessen his worry, as she bled into the bowl. Jennifer did the same, without the smile, and grimaced as she forced out her blood; poor girl was too soft for this insanity.

Jacob walked to the back wall, and disappeared into the heavy, unnatural shadow that covered it. Triss knew what was back there, the body parts and tools of torture, the symbols drawn on the walls, and the overwhelming dread, but it was better to not let Jack see it.

“Is Black Blood here tonight?” Jack said. The silence was absolute, and his soft voice echoed.

Some things went clank and clunk in the black. “He’s watching,” Jacob said, “from the other side. His followers help him perform their own rituals.”

“Followers?” Jack began to pace side to side, chin in his fingers. The look on his face was obvious: should he play his hand and let Jacob know more information. Triss would have probably said no, but she was curious. “You mean his red wraiths.”

Jacob came back out of the darkness holding a torch, unlit, and a strange smile on his face. “Your visit to the Hisil was informative. Black Blood wasn’t too happy that you left before he got to chat with you.”

“I imagine it wanted to know how I got there.”

Triss and Jen both looked between the two men, and Triss felt horribly lost. What the fuck were these two talking about, and what had they been up to?

“Yes, he, did.” With a head motion that suggested eye rolling, Jacob stepped up to the bowl, plucked a lighter out of his robes, and lit the torch. Fire, Kindred’s bane, lit the room a hundred times more than the couple candles they had, and everyone but Jacob covered their eyes until they adjusted.

Jacob tilted his head upward, as if in prayer, raised his slit wrist over the fire, and forced another large drop of his dark vampire blood from the wound. It splashed over the flame, and for a moment, nothing happened. But with time, and an unending smile from the Nosferatu, the flame changed color. He’d done this last time, with their first attempt at a sacrifice and prayer. Black flame.

It was a Crúac ritual, to create the flame, one Beatrice had no idea how to perform. Whatever the flame did, Jacob insisted it was a helpful step in bridging the communication gap between their pitiful little physical world, and the great beyond. Smoke signals, was the analogy he used. But like all things Crúac, it wasn’t as simple as a drop of blood on a torch.

Jacob tossed the torch into the bowl of blood and death, and without so much as a flicker, the massive bowl, sat upon dozens of carved skeletons below, erupted in flame.

The fire was huge, far bigger than last time, and Triss and Jen both jumped back, jaws hanging. Jack wasn’t near the bowl, but he stepped back too, eyes wide and hand raised to block the light that did not come. The flame was black. Like as if she was staring into a void, Triss gazed into the black flame that devoured light, and found herself lost in it.

It danced, swaying left and right, and as seconds rolled by like eternities, faces appeared in the flame. Eyes, mouths, wisps of definition that came and went as the obsidian fire moved about in its deadly waltz, she stared at them all with wonder. They never held still, but she recognized them in the split moments they made themselves visible; the faces of the bodies in the bowl.

Then the howls began. As the fire swayed and flowed, devouring the bodies and disintegrating them, noises echoed within the metal walls of the sacrificial altar. Wails, like banshees crying out for their lost loved ones as they roamed graveyards, filled the cave the four vampires stood in. The sound had nowhere to go, so it echoed against the stone and metal, until it sank into the walls, and into the graves above. Three Kings Cemetery was a haunted graveyard, after all.

Beatrice raised her hand to her mouth, covering it, feigning surprise, but hiding an annoyed smile; annoyed with herself. Hanging out with Jacob had made her thoughts oddly macabre and poetic lately, and she couldn't help but indulge the drama of it all in her mind. No wonder vampires indulged in Gothic aesthetics and poetry, she was doing it and she wasn't even trying. Must have been a natural side effect everyone suffered, when they lost the things most precious to them in the world.

The fire rose higher, and higher, until it licked at the ceiling. It melded into the shadows, creating them and hiding more of the candlelight. The banshee cries and ghostly wails were persistent, but not loud enough to bother the ears. Background noise, the sort a psychopath killer might play as a lullaby before bed.

Jacob waved a hand through the flame before looking at Jack, and nodding to the boy. No damage came to the elder vampire, or his robe, despite how quickly the black flame was eating the bodies. Before Jack could respond, Jacob looked back to the flame, and began to speak.

“Oh Crone, it is I, Malachi, your acolyte, oh Crone. I and my fellow witches offer you this sacrifice. No blood was taken from them. Every drop has been saved, and spilled for you. Three witches have spilled their own blood for this sacrifice, so that we may hear from you, oh Crone. Send us a sign, teach us a way for us to hunt down our adversary, and bathe in their blood.”

He was hamming it up. He was really hamming it up, the bastard. Beatrice smiled at the man, if only because he'd adopted the voice of a preacher, saying a prayer to God in front of his congregation. The Crone, according to Jacob, didn't care about words; if anything, platitudes would offend her. What the Crone cared about, was intent, desire, and action. She cared about death and sacrifice. She cared about blood.

Hopefully, she'd care about them enough to answer their call.

The flames danced and swayed, howls and wails quiet but piercing, and the gentle roar of the fire the choir to their song. The bodies in the bowl were cooking, and the sound of crackling fat and blood grew louder. It smelled horrific. She stepped in closer, and ran her hands through the flame. It did not harm her.

This needed to work. Please, work. She had to find the hunters. She had to kill them. The thirst for revenge was coursing through her, devouring her, demanding she pursue it until the end, whatever end that may be. It was consuming her, down to her soul.

No wonder some vampires became obsessed with revenge, or obsessed with anything, really. She had eternity ahead of her. If she wanted to spend the next thirty years plotting the perfect revenge against someone who wronged her, it was perfectly reasonable for a vampire to do just that. If she wanted to spend the next two hundred years preparing the perfect ritual to resurrect someone, she could do just that. She had all the time in the world. And she'd do anything to make that happen, to—“Come closer, child.”

Everyone froze, before they started looking around. Jacob? Jen? Jack? No, none of them. And it wasn't Black Blood either. That was not a familiar voice. It was quiet, a whisper, hidden in the muted banshee cries, and the gentle roar of the flame. And it sounded feminine.

After a small gasp, Jacob stepped away from the fire, and bowed his head. He said nothing, and he was trembling. Not a big tremble, not shaking in his boots or anything, but even a small tremble from her boss was enough to make her take notice. Jack was frozen like a statue, eyes on the fire, and Jennifer had taken several steps back, taking her cue from Jacob and bowing her head as well. She was trembling too, and a lot more than Jacob was.

“I said,” the whisper continued, “come closer, child.”

The fire, the faces in the flame, they turned and looked at her. Not Jacob or the others, but her, Beatrice.

“I...” It was talking to her. The things in the flame, the flames themselves, were talking to her. Oh fuck. “Me? Not Jac—Malachi? I mean, I—”

“Now, child of the night. Come to me.”

She did as instructed. In for a penny, in for a soul. If she was willing to go this far, kill this many people and dedicate her existence to the purpose of revenge, talking to an ancient god entity seemed par for the course. Was this how Jacob felt, the first time he talked to Black Blood? No, Jacob was already an elder when he came to Dolareido, and a devoted servant to the Crone. He must have been used to sticking his toes into dark water. She, on the other hand, was not.

“Closer...”

With a deep gulp, Beatrice set her hands on the bowl, and leaned in. The black flames and the faces within accepted her without pain, as before and as with Jacob, but this time, they responded to her. They bent around her, looked at her, enveloped her, and their banshee wails quieted. A second later, the room was deadly silent, and all Triss could see was the black flames flowing over her eyes.

“Yesss ... my child...”

“I—”

“Silence,” the fire whispered. “Let me ... see ... you...”

Oh fucking god, it was examining her. She was being examined by something, something in the flames. Was it the Crone? Who the fuck else could it be? She forced herself to look down, into the burning corpses and the ashes piling up, and she regretted it instantly. The corpses were moving, writhing, slowly twisting. If it was from the force of chemical reactions from the fat sizzling and blood boiling, she had no idea, but several of the dozen bodies tilted their heads to face her.

“I know your pain, child.” The corpses were talking. Oh fucking shit the corpses were the source of the whispering voice, and the now silent wailing.

“You do?”

“I ... know this ... pain. Let him go, child.” The bodies continued to twist, as if in agony, but the voice was calm and eerie. Death was whispering to her, sharing its secrets with her. “He ... is beyond ... your reach.”

She ground her teeth, and glared down at the talking corpses in the black flames. “But not your reach.”

“Let him go, child.” The voice started to grow quiet, and the bodies began to grow still. “Let him go.”

“But, that’s not what ... not what we made this sacrifice for!” She clenched hard on the bowl until she felt her claws fight to penetrate the metal. “We need to find the hunters, to kill them.”

The corpses renewed their writhing with all the hurried pace of the typical zombie. The only noise she could hear anymore was the roar of the fire, and the cooking of human meat.

“You ... desire ... a tool for revenge.”

“Yes.”

“Were ... it not for Luna, and her meddling, I ... would leave you to your battle, child. I have no use ... for children who are weak.”

“Luna? As ... as in...”

“The moon aids one of the Uratha, more than ... she should. This human city ... sits on a border ... and Luna ... takes advantage, to voice her ... concerns ... Ask the child of the moon, if you wish to know more.”

Ok, so one of the Uratha was being spoken to by the fucking moon. The. Fucking. Moon. Yeah, nothing crazy about that. But then, she had her head in black fire, was watching burning corpses squirm and whisper, and was apparently speaking to the Crone herself. Who the fuck was she to judge insanity, at this point?

“I ... I need your help. Please, I ... I have to ... I have to get them. If I can’t have him back, the least I can do is make them suffer. They might run, or try to escape, or—”

“How much ... are you willing to suffer ... child, to see your revenge ... a reality?”

She snarled into the fire, and glared. “Anything.”

One of the corpses snapped out their arm, grabbed her face, and the room filled with screams of agony. Her screams.

---

---

~~Jack~~

“Holy shit!” Jack ran forward and reached for Beatrice, but Jacob jumped between them. “Get the fuck out of my way!”

“No.”

“What? Move, fucker!” Jack pushed forward, but Jacob remained in front of him. Tempted, so very tempted, to try and Dominate him, or maybe even just punch him, but Jack wasn’t that stupid, even in a panic. Now wasn’t the time to test his curse against Jacob’s years.

He glared up at the eyeless fucker, and tried to get around him, but Jacob, grinning a wicked bastard grin, stepped side to side to keep him from getting to Beatrice.

“Jack,” Jennifer said from the other side of the bowl. She had to yell to get over Beatrice’s screams. “This is ... the way.” His fellow Ventrue’s eyes were wide, staring at the horrific display. If it was the way, she certainly didn’t seem comfortable with it.

A corpse had literally reached out from the pile, grabbed Triss’s face, and was squeezing. Whatever it was doing, was making his friend scream like she was being burned alive. Her arms were locked, flexing, hands gripping the giant bowl’s edge. Her mouth was open wider than a human’s could, showing her enormous crocodile teeth, and her long tongue was bouncing around in there like she was being electrocuted. Her eyes were wide, and staring straight ahead into the black flames.

Jack stepped back again, glaring harder at Jacob with each step. “If she dies, you die next, Jacob.”

“Oh ho, big threats from the little Ventrue.” Sighing, but never losing his big grin, Jacob shook his head and gestured to the dancing flames. “Look, Clarice. Look at her. She’s communing with the Crone herself.”

“She’s getting her brain felt up by a fucking flaming zombie!” He wasn’t trying to be funny, but Jacob laughed at him anyway, a deep hearty laugh anyone would make when they heard a great joke. “How can you be so calm? She’s your student! She could—”

“I’ve been on this Earth for longer than you could ever appreciate, Jack. I’ve tasted black waters and I’ve swam in the blood of the dead. I’ve spoken to many creatures, many entities, and I have spoken to the Crone in this manner once before; if she is truly the Crone.”

“If?”

He shrugged, and gestured to the display behind him, at the burning bodies and the dancing flames. The quiet shrieks of ghosts and the damned resumed, but they were nothing compared to the cries of pain from Jack’s friend.

“There are many entities out there, floating around in realms beyond our understanding. How they operate is knowledge I cannot begin to fathom. I have spoken to these flames once before, and I can only guess that they were indeed the Crone. But perhaps they are someone else. Or perhaps they are a part of her. Perhaps all Beatrice is speaking to is the Crone’s pinky finger.” Jacob came in closer to him, smiling all the way, until he was only a foot from him. “We’re talking about gods, Jack. Gods. For all I know, the Crone, or Luna, or whoever else out there listening, is an entity with a thousand parts, a thousand voices, a thousand imitations, a thousand versions.” Shrugging, he slowly reached out, and set a hand on Jack's shoulder. "Whoever this entity is that we have summoned, that has graced us with their presence, she did not steer me wrong last time."

"Last time..." Jack glared at the man, but gave up after a while. You can only glare for so long before it becomes meaningless. "Is this how you—"

Beatrice's screams and cries stopped, and the poor woman collapsed onto the floor of the cave. Jen ran over to her, and Jacob, after giving a small grin and nod to Jack, went to join her.

"Triss, you ok?" Jennifer said. "You—"

"I ... have honored ... your sacrifice," the fire said, deadly, soft voice cutting Jack to his guts. "Go ... and bathe the world in ecstasy ... and blood."

Boom. The fire exploded outward, engulfing everyone in flowing wind that swarmed around the cave, trapped. The black flame hit all of them, but did nothing. Whatever Jacob did to the flame, it didn't care about Jack, the other Kindred, or their clothes. Not true for the people in the sacrificial altar bowl. The exploding fire took the ashes with it, mixed it into the air, and littered cave with the black soot of the murdered.

Jack thought he was tainted before this ritual started. Now, he was covered in the blood and ashes of the people he'd helped sacrifice to some sort of god creature. Fucking hell.

"I'm fine," Triss said after a few minutes. "I'm ... fine..."

Jacob nodded, standing up and helping Triss do the same. "What did you learn?"

"She ... it ... showed me a way to ... to ... open those doors. Elen's doors, the flesh doors."

“Shit, really?” Jack came in as well, dusting the ash off himself as best he could. Considering how much blood Jacob got on him, he’d have an easier time removing tar. “You mean the weird ritual Angela did to create a new one?”

“N-No.” Shaky, Triss reached out for support. Jack went to help, but Jacob got there first. The eyeless bastard’s snarky smile vanished, for a second anyway, as he helped Triss keep her footing. “It showed me ... how to open ... an active one. The Crone, it ... she ... showed me, what Elen is doing, the strange blood magic she’s doing. She’s burrowing around in some sort of ... I don’t know, pocket dimension? The flesh room I fought Sándor in isn’t in the real world, I guess, or at least not completely. It moves around, and it has multiple doors in the city. It’s only connected to one of them at a time.”

Jennifer came up behind Triss, replacing Jacob, and slipping underneath her friend’s arm. “And you think you can open one of these doors?”

“If we can find one that’s active. Last time, we found one that was open, but there’s no way Elen will make that mistake again.”

“I’m surprised she made that mistake at all,” Jack said.

Triss shrugged, but almost fell for the effort. Poor girl was wiped. “Must take a lot of ... I dunno, magical energy or some bullshit, to open and close the active door. Last time, she flooded the whole place with thousands of gallons of blood, to get us out, before closing the door.”

Jack shook his head. “I know what it takes to open one of those doors. It takes a sacrifice. That’s why Angela killed the thrall we had in the hospital. That was a fresh door, but ... I wouldn’t be surprised if they had to do that every time they opened a door.”

After a long sigh, Triss nodded, but smiled at Jack once she managed to lift her head again. “We won’t need one this time.”

That was good. That was very good. All the killing was starting to make him sick.

Learn to enjoy it, vampire. It’s a part of who you are, no matter how much you deny it.

Jack grit his teeth, clenched his eyes tight, and forced the voice down into the recesses of his mind. “So, what now?”

“Recon,” Jacob said. “Maria and Michael and Garry are all still working together, like sweet little doggies, trying to catch the hunters. Someone needs to find one of the gateways the hunters use, one that’s active. They’ll close it, and Beatrice will force it open.”

Beatrice managed a thumbs up, before her arm fell limp at her side. “Jen, let’s get back. I need to rest.”

Jennifer nodded, adjusted her spot under Triss’s arm, and started the walk back out of the cave.

“Jacob, I want to talk to you, in private,” Jack said. Triss and Jen looked over their shoulders at him, but he smiled and shooed them off. “Don’t worry.”

They both frowned, but after a few seconds, continued on. Once they were a ways away, and Jack could no longer hear their shuffling, he let out a long sigh, and started walking around the now empty bowl. Good fucking god, that strange black fire had completely devoured the bodies. Fire didn’t do that; there’d be no need for crematories otherwise. There weren’t even any bones.

“Clarice Clarice, forever the investigator. Searching for clues?” Chuckling, Jacob walked around the bowl, staying opposite of Jack.

“Just marveling at how fucked up this all is. I heard what the flame said about Luna, and I’ve heard the Begotten talk about someone they call the Dark Mother.”

“All women!” Laughing, Jacob slapped the bowl’s edge a few times, like playing a drum. “Women are pretty amazing, aren’t they?”

The way Jacob had looked — or probably looked — at his mother reignited in Jack’s mind, and he glared at the eyeless bastard hard enough to light him on fire. Or not, since he didn’t, but he tried.

“And this weird thing you did with your vitae, to make the fire black. You used that to first speak with Black Blood?”

“Oh, smart, aren’t ya?” They circled each other, keeping the bowl between them. “Like I said, it sends smoke signals. Humans might be blind to this stuff, but the spirits are not.”

“And you’ve been sacrificing people since—”

“Since before I came to Dolareido, Clarice. It’s one of the reasons Black Blood and I get along. Black Blood is a kindred spirit to this Kindred.”

“Uh huh.” Jack stopped circling, and thus Jacob stopped circling, like a twisted mirror. The elder Nosferatu enjoyed doing things that put people off guard, got under their skin, and annoyed them. He was doing it as a reflex probably, not even thinking about it. How anyone could stand Jacob for more than five minutes, he couldn’t fathom. Minerva must have been an interesting woman.

“And you—”

“I want to talk to Black Blood.”

“Do you? Then make a sacrifice. It will beckon him.”

Of course it would, because the only way anyone was doing any of this dark ritual shit was on the backs of corpses, floating in an ocean of blood.

“Yeah, I’m not going to do that.”

“Ha, you think your Prince doesn’t? She’s talked to Black Blood on her own, on several occasions.”

Muscles in Jack’s body tightened as he glared at the man. “I ... won’t judge her, for that. I can’t.”

“And you judge me?”

“I’m trying not to, Jacob. But throw me a bone here. I just watched you kill twelve people, and I helped. I’m willing to help you with the twisted fucking shit you do in the dark, ok? So just ... let me talk to Black Blood. Your its friend. You don’t need to sacrifice anyone to talk to it.”

Jacob’s smile softened, and he stepped away from the bowl. “Him. I can summon him.”

“Him, fine.” Spirits didn’t have genders or sexes or whatever, but if Black Blood insisted on being considered male, fine.

“I can summon him because he’s my friend. He’ll need a corpse to work with, if we’re to physically interact, but if you’re only looking to chat, then—”

“Then I reckon I better make an appearance.”

Jack spun around, looking left and right and scanning the floor and ceiling. That was the spirit’s voice all right, heavy and filled with bass, and rasp, layered and inhuman. The Southern accent on top of it almost made it comical, but the cold weight that fell onto Jack’s shoulders for the second time that night wasn’t comical at all.

The walls began to bleed.

“You ... you were eavesdropping,” Jack said.

As the thick, black ooze dripped from the cracks on the cave walls, and the symbols drawn upon them, it began to pool around their feet. The onyx color dripped from the ceiling, and from the eyes of the skeletons holding up the giant bowl. One god left, another one arrived, and both were dressed in black. No more black flame, but now it was black blood, a thick liquid that flowed over everything until Jack could have swam; if the liquid had any consistency. For all its thickness, it didn't have weight or texture to it. But as it slowly overwhelmed Jack's body, as patient as Death, Jack could feel the cold inevitably of the monster's presence.

This god that sat on Jacob's shoulder was as sick and twisted as the Crone. No wonder it got along so well with Jacob.

“Indeed I was, little vampire. Why, I ain't ever seen a creature like this Crone, reach across the stars and air, earth and black fire, to make an appearance. Truly a blessed night.” The creature's voice was far too smooth for how terrifying a noise it was.

“You ... look up to the Crone.”

“When I was nothing more than a tiny black ball of decay and murder, before Malachi and his friends ever came to this place, people worshiped creatures of the dark, little vampire.” The ooze flowed up and around, engulfing everything and everyone. Jack knew to let it do its thing; it was how Black Blood filled an area with its—his presence. If the spirit wanted to kill Jack, it'd be easier to now, but it wasn't like he didn't have the opportunity to kill Jack multiple times before.

And besides, apparently the spirits knew about him. Maybe they liked him? Or found him interesting enough to keep alive.

“Other witches?” Jack said.

“Yes, but not Kindred. Oh, the murder that happened on the soil beneath your feet would make your skin crawl. Sins my simple existence did not know could exist at the time. The pain and death dripped down into the world, and into me.” Black Blood laughed, and the black water rippled around them all. Jack couldn’t feel it, but he could see how the waves distorted his vision, bending it.

Jack ran a hand over his buzzed head. “Trying to understand you is difficult. The other spirits I’ve seen—”

“Are defined,” the flowing onyx said. A glance toward Jacob showed the Nosferatu nod, holding a small grin for Jack, but the old man seemed content to listen to the conversation.

“I ... had a question for you.”

“Bless your heart, little vampire, thinking you can just ask me a question.”

Growls filled the room. It took Jack a moment to realize they were his own. Growling at an entity that might as well have been a god, was not a smart thing to do. But the curse inside him disagreed. It growled, and Jack had to bite down to suppress it.

“You want to make a deal.”

“Now don’t you fret none. I’m a fair spirit. You ask a question, and then I’ll ask one.”

“And if I lie?”

“Well, certainly possible, little vampire. But break a deal with a spirit at your own risk. If I find you’ve been steering me wrong, I will gut you and your precious mother, and spread your ashes across my city as warning. Can’t let nobody think they can get away with breaking a deal with me, even if they are carrying some ancient curse.”

“No lying then.” And information was the most valuable commodity, to Kindred and to anyone who knew a thing or two about the seedy underbelly of Dolareido. Answering a question could be his undoing, for all he knew. But he needed to know. “When I was in the Hisil, we were attacked by these ... red wraith things, that I’m pretty sure work for you. They wanted flesh. Why?”

“Ah yes, my friends on the other side.” The black mist lifted, swirled upon itself within the sacrificial altar, and something resembling a human stood within, with only the most vague features, like a cloud of obsidian. “As you have seen tonight, there is more to flesh than simple meat and bones. That Elen witch knows this. My old friend Malachi knows this. Flesh is a machine with power, meant to carry a soul. Learn to bend it, work it, shape it, and a host of options come up.”

Of course the ancient entity of death and murder and dark magic and only God knew what else would want to develop an understanding of flesh magic. If spirits embodied their intentions, then Black Blood likely had parts to him that existed in a weird, ‘I am witchcraft and flesh ritual’ sort of way. No wonder he was so strange compared to other spirits.

“This flesh magic,” Jack said, “is pretty fucked up shit, you two. Even worse than sacrificing people to perform rituals.”

Jacob set his hip against the side of the bowl, head pointed at him and arms folded across his chest. “Oh?”

“Yeah. I saw the shit Elen did to track me and Eric down. She figured out how to use flesh like ... like ... fuck me, I don’t know. It was sickening, the things she’d drawn, analyzing skin and muscle and ... and ... tapping into something that let her learn about me, and Eric. And now you’re telling me you two have been trying to do the same thing? You must have been pursuing this for a while, if there are literal incarnations of this fucked up desire wandering the Shadow half of Dolareido, ready to attack my friend, for a chance to see her guts!” Again, the curse took a joyride on Jack’s behalf, and announced his words as a shout. Jack didn’t mind this time.

Jacob looked to the mist, and the mist looked — probably — at Jacob; hard to tell where mist was looking.

“Don’t go walking where you ain’t welcome, boy,” Black Blood said. “There’s alligators in them waters. Don’t come visiting my realm unless I’m there to oversee it. Something might bite you.”

This conversation was quickly making it apparent, that Jack had a lot of growing up to do. He wanted to argue, spit bile, throw a fit, and maybe even challenge them. This curse made him feel like he could do it, too. To set aside the impulse, ignore it, let the emotion pass and then default to a logical decision, was a skill he prided himself on, but no one could do that easily when frustrated. His poker face was shattered, and he fucking knew it. Regain control, pause, let the bubbling rage settle, and then speak.

“You live in the Shadow Realm, Black Blood, but it’s not yours. Besides, we used a door that someone else put there. Your doing, I assume?” No point in keeping the Begotten’s ability to open inter-dimensional doors a secret, not after Black Blood had rescued them, and watched the Begotten leave the strange in-between realm on their own. He no doubt knew Fiona had been the one to open the portal to take Jack and Damien into the Shadow Realm. Maybe Jack could learn about the portal Fiona had found, and—

“That’s a second question,” Black Blood said, chuckling.

Jack bit down again. “Shit.”

“My turn for a question,” Black Blood continued, “about this curse of yours.”

“Of course you’d want to talk about the curse.”

The black mist leaned forward toward him. Dark fog flowed from its body, and dripped off of it like dye dispersing in liquid. “Don’t be getting too big for your britches, boy.”

“Sorry,” he said through clenched teeth. Like fucking hell he was sorry, but he had to play nice. God, he sucked at the Danse Macabre.

“Right you are. Now, the curse, explain to me the ritual that your ancient sire performed. Every detail now.”

Fuck. If they learned about the details, they could perform it. But it wasn’t like there were any Strix in Dolareido; that he knew of, anyway. And that tree at the bottom of some ancient cave seemed to be important, too. He had no idea where it was, and he had no idea if Black Blood could leave Dolareido. He seemed awfully attached to it, connected even.

“I guess Triss told you.”

“Yes,” Jacob said, “but what you told her was vague. Give us details.”

Frowning at Jacob the whole time, Jack recounted the tale. He did his best, and extrapolated where he thought it was safe. Susanna and Diablerie, how she performed it on someone who was likely a family member, and how she’d rubbed the ashes into the old, dead tree. How the Strix, the whole flock of striges, descended upon her, and filled her with the curse.

It was not a fun memory to go dancing through.

Jacob laughed, holding his face in his hand as his cackles filled the cave. “The amount of sins that woman committed in a single night, is astronomical. Your great great grandsire makes me seem tame by comparison, Jack, even when compared to my most wild nights.”

Well, that was a good thing, if Jacob was telling the truth.

“I have another question,” Jack said.

“Shoot,” the darkness replied.

Ok, time to be smart about this. He couldn't just outright ask if Black Blood knew about some mysterious force conspiring to destroy the city. If Jacob or Black Blood were actually that force, perhaps pursuing resurrection or something, him tipping off his hand could get him killed. Back to the portal question then. Hopefully it wouldn't give him away.

“When we visited the Shadow Realm, we came through a portal, some sort of cut that went from one world to the other. Your doing?”

“I reckon it was. Few of them are my projects, and I'd appreciate it kindly, if you let em be.”

Finally, progress. If that one was Black Blood's doing, the others Fiona said were found in Dolareido probably were, too. Someone was cutting, or tearing, holes in the fabric of reality, and that someone was Black Blood; or at least, was Black Blood in several instances.

Fabric of reality. He almost laughed. It was like out of a fucking comic book. No, it wasn't the general fabric of reality being cut up. Be specific Jack. Black Blood was somehow creating holes from his world to theirs, and was probably doing other things, too.

“And you, boy, answer me this. What have you learned about that tart Maria?”

Jack blinked at the misty ghost, and glanced between him and Jacob. “Uh ... Madam Turio? Why do you want to know—”

“Them’s ain’t the rules, little vampire. Answer the question. What have you learned about Maria? And you know damn well what I’m referring to.”

Shit. Fucking shit fuck.

“Maria ... There’s evidence and rumors, that she’s been ... trying to ... Well, we don’t know. She might be trying to resurrect Lucas, but it might be something else. Maybe she just wants to talk to him?” He managed a shrug, but it wasn’t a very convincing follow up. “From what I’d heard, she was seen talking to spirits at some point.” A little prodding had garnered that information from Natasha, and now he regretted it. It was information he had to share, to uphold the deal.

Both Jacob and Black Blood made some weird grumbling sounds. Either they didn’t know that, or they did, and weren’t happy Jack knew about it.

Why though? Why would Maria be talking to the spirits? If they were Black Blood’s wraiths, and had become weird flesh-obsessed creatures because that’s what Black Blood was into, what did that mean? He wanted to ask. Christ, he wanted to ask. But if he gave Black Blood another question, he’d have a chance to ask Jack about anything. He might ask Jack a leading question, and Jack would unintentionally expose his motives about looking for the reason for Azamel’s warning.

“I ... think I’m done,” Jack said.

“Very well,” Black Blood said.

Jacob nodded, and so did the mist. But as Jack walked away, Jacob held up a hand.

“Do try and keep Elen alive, Jack. You owe me and Black Blood a favor.”

“Favor...”

The eyeless bastard grinned at him. “For saving your lives, lest you forget.”

Fuck.

~~Damien~~

Damien sat within Maria’s abode, deep underneath the Grand Cathedral of Dolareido. Nearby, Maria Turio sat at her piano, and played music with the delicate exactness of a virtuoso. Near her, her large, hunched ghoul swept the floor, tended the candles, and wiped the shelves. Damien sat at a desk with two laptops, and perused some ancient texts, looking to cross reference with the book that sat between the two screens.

Curses and Rituals, a Summary, by Sir Isaac Landers. There were many such texts in the world, of people attempting to decipher magical concepts, and many more that were tomfoolery — as Maria would put it — or just fiction. It was all worthless, except for a few texts that the Lancea et Sanctum held.

Whoever Sir Landers was, Damien didn’t know. A vampire probably, based on the way the man approached concepts like blood and sunlight, without ever actually saying the word vampire or Kindred. Learning to read old English was a pain in his ass, but slowly, Damien was discovering how to understand Landers’s words.

“I assume,” Maria said, without ceasing her quiet playing, “that you research such old knowledge, to help your friend.”

“Indeed.” The internet, for all its infinite wisdom, was full of shit. It was taking ages to find credible researchers, and those he did manage to find, had their careers silenced, delayed, or unfulfilled. Research into the dark arts of Crúac, he could understand being stonewalled. But Theban sorcery, he hadn’t expected to be so closed off and buried. It was damn secretive.

A mention of a concept here, an altar there, a long lost manuscript in a foreign tongue with a shoddy sketch, it was all so difficult to dig through.

“Though...” He groaned, ran his palms over his face and fingers through his hair, before he turned to Maria. “I’m hitting a wall. Trying to make sense of all this chaos is difficult.”

“Lucas spent centuries researching this material, Mister Burksen. And we have only a fraction of what he originally once had, due to Garry’s sabotage.”

“Do you have any insight to offer, Madam Turio? Jack says that his curse was originally sealed away by a Sanctified. I can only assume it was a spell of some sort, meant to seal away whatever sorcery the striges cast upon his great great grandsire.”

“I am afraid I do not.” She stopped playing, set down the cover on the grand piano’s keys, and walked over to his desk. Her white dress flowed on the mist that seeped from her skin, and Damien did his best to pretend he didn’t notice that. It wasn’t real, just an illusion, something her Kindred vitae perpetuated through her Nosferatu curse. Real or not, it, along with her cracked and destroyed skin, made her look like a ghost. No, a ghost would have been envious of how terrifying she looked.

He was getting used to it though, being around her as often as he was. Behind the cracked skin and cold mist, Maria was a woman, a heartbroken woman who refused to let her woes prevent her from doing her job. Admirable. She scooped the book off his desk, and began to examine its texts. She could read the old language far more easily than he, no doubt.

“Maybe the Prince’s friend Elaine will know something,” he said.

“Elaine? Elaine is visiting?” Maria leaned her hip on his desk as she flipped through the pages of the ancient text.

“So says Mister Terry. You know her?”

Rolling her eyes, Maria continued flipping through the pages. “The woman is strange, even by Kindred standards. She is like fire; a breeze may settle her or have her blazing.”

“Volatile then?”

“In a way. And no doubt she will indulge the Prince’s sexual appetite. I expect the white-haired one to host a ball soon, similar to last, with flesh on display and blood to be shared.”

Damien offered his mentor a knowing smile. He didn’t mind the sexual displays anymore, uncomfortable as they made him, but he knew Maria did. She wasn’t Lucas, but she still hated such blatant, sinful indulgences.

“Do you trust her?”

Maria shook her head. “Never trust a dragon, Mister Burksen. They hold their pursuit of knowledge above all else. They’re the sort to read an ancient tome bound in human skin, in a room filled with dangling hooks and skeletons, and smile with delight as they accidentally summon Death herself. Knowledge for knowledge’s sake. Such types would destroy a world, if only to learn whether it was possible.”

An oddly powerful, and frightening description of Antoinette and her order. Damien looked down, the images of such ideas stirring up his imagination. He could understand Jacob pursuing deadly rituals in his desire to expand the reach of his power, but for someone to perform dark arts to learn if they could, seemed even worse.

“In ... one of the rooms,” he said, “in the Elysium tower, I saw some strange symbols drawn upon the floor and walls.”

“When was this?”

“When I assaulted the building.”

“Ah.” She nodded again, and stopped walking in front of one of her hanging drapes along the cave wall. A beautiful tapestry of blood red and gold embroidery. She pushed it aside, exposing one of her paintings. Jesus Christ, being stabbed by a spear, wielded by a soldier.

She normally left it covered. Perhaps the image bothered her. But then, why keep it and expose it occasionally, if it did? He'd found her staring at it on several occasions, when she was in thought. Something was on her mind, something about the Second Estate.

Maybe she was prompting him, to inquire specifically about the Lancea et Sanctum? He hadn't done a good job pursuing anything in that region of his job; far too busy dealing with hunters and searching for a cure to Jack's curse. But, the least he could do was inquire.

“Have you spoken with the Prince about our desires?” he said.

“The next Primogen meeting is soon. I will speak with her then, as unfortunately, reviving the Second Estate will require the ears of all Primogen. Antoinette will have the last word, but the others must have their say as well.” With a tired groan, she gave him back the book, and began to pace about, hugging her chest and chin in hand.

“You believe the Prince will resist.”

“Undoubtedly. But, time has settled her rage. With Lucas ... gone, and with you being a valuable asset to the city, I feel I can convince her that a small revival of the Second Estate is warranted, and earned.”

“Me, a valuable asset?” He blinked at that.

“You are her lover’s friend, and have helped him in multiple situations. You have also helped in general, Mister Burksen. Do not sell yourself short.”

That was true, in a sense. Damien had become an active member of Dolareido in the months since his return, and since Lucas’s death. He aided the Invictus, fought monsters in the sewers, helped Jack on a rescue mission, and aided the Prince when Jack summoned the crows at the hospital. Go him.

“Thank you, Madam Turio. But I worry not only for the Prince’s resistance, but Garry Tones’s as well. He despised the Lancea et Sanctum as much as she did, when my sire was Archbishop.”

“Indeed.” The corpse woman walked about, chin in her fingers, eyes up. Her pondering stance. “We will need to convince him that things will be different this time. I trust Mister Terry and yourself to handle such a discussion.”

“Oh? Not at the Primogen meeting...”

“No. Speak to the man on his property. I trust Mister Terry to handle the conversation with delicacy, and I trust you to explain the desires of the Lancea et Sanctum, Mister Burksen.”

Wonderful. Sweeps for hunters already devoured much of his time, and now he had to prepare for a personal meeting with the strongest Carthian in the city.

“Should I—”

“Wait until our Primogen meeting is done. I will report the ... temperature, of the idea. Act accordingly.” She nodded, and he nodded. Silence fell, a comfortable silence, filled only with the swish swish of the ghouls’ broom, and—”How goes your relationship with the Begotten?” Whoa, what?

“My—oh, Fiona. It goes well, it does. She’s a delightful person, and I can’t help but be happier in her presence.”

Maria smiled, but continued to walk around, likely juggling two thoughts: the Primogen meeting, and for some reason, Damien’s relationship. But, if she wanted to talk about his romantic situation, he could oblige her. She knew more about romance than he did, and honestly, he felt happy knowing he was making her happy.

How much had the elder changed, since she betrayed Natasha?

~~Natasha~~

If the sex went on much longer, she’d have run out of space on her SSD. Apparently, the boys and their libidos agreed with being filmed, far more than she could have anticipated.

She stepped out of the shower, wrapped her hair in a towel, and started on the rest of her. The shower wasn’t big enough for three people, so they took turns; naturally she went first. Soon she was out and walking around her room wearing a towel on her head and a towel wrapped around her.

She looked at herself in the mirror hanging on the back of her bedroom door; without any makeup on, and the blush of life turned off, she was as white as a sheet. No makeup meant her lips were a pale, dull pink, and her eyes had no pop. Human women would have to deal with all the skin blemishes and discoloration caused by frequently putting on and taking off makeup, but at least vampire skin didn't do that. It was just pale, smoothly pale.

Matt stepped behind her, and hugged her from behind, her head pressing to his chest.

"You look like a queen," he said.

She laughed and rolled her eyes. She could have covered herself in dirty rags and mud, and they'd say she was beautiful. They meant it, too. As for a queen, she had her long black hair all done up in the towel, so it did kind of look like a tall crown.

Matt was in his jeans and nothing but. His hair was still a bit wet, and it fell heavy around his head, long blonde dirty air that matched the gruff on his face. A big, handsome lumberjack of a man. She doubted he'd ever used a computer in his life except to browse YouTube and send e-mails. How did she end up with someone like him, and Arturo?

"I c-can't ... b-b-believe you told Eric to ... to do whatever he wanted. If he were Kindred, w-we'd have him ... under scrutiny, you know? We c-can't let Kindred j-j-just do whatever they want. It could violate the M-Masquerade."

"I guess we play a little fast and loose with the rules. Not all Uratha packs do that. The Iminir — Storm Lords — are practically a military cult. They'd put Eric in chains if they had to."

"And ... y-you? You call yourselves, um, Hunters in D-Darkness."

"Mhmm. The Meninna."

"W-What are you known for?"

His grip around her body tightened, and he squashed her to his chest harder. The giant, solid wall of muscle was steel, and she froze, like a deer in headlights. His head came down lower, and lower, until she could feel the warmth of his breath on her ear, and feel his heartbeat against her back.

“Meninna pay respect to the Black Wolf, who gives the Meninna his favor. We Meninna guard our territory with total commitment, and protect what is ours.” His grip tightened a little more again, and she found her legs wavering, as Matthew, gentle giant Matthew, smiled at her in the mirror. It was Matthew’s smile, but it had more edge to it, more animal hunger, more aggression.

And it was not good that she liked it! This was obviously a case of Stockholm Syndrome, because a massive man had his hands around her, trapping her, and was implying that she was his and he’d protect her like property, and she liked it. Nope, not good. Definitely bad thing. Bad bad. Toxic relationship!

Matt kissed her on the head, picked her up, and set her on her bed. “A lot of us have been setting up roots here. Whether or not David learns about what happened that led to the Azlu situation, or if that has any effect on why we came, a lot of us will want to stay. I know Art and I will want to stay for you.”

Awww. She squirmed on her bed, thankful she wasn’t Blushing Life, cause every time Matt or Art talked romantic talk, she could feel herself getting ready to blush blood red.

“W-Would you ... really stay for me?” She almost stopped herself when she heard the shower turn off. Art would be coming out any minute, and she wasn’t sure if she could say this to both of them at the same time.

“You don’t ... want us to?” Matt backed up against a wall, hands in the small of his back. He tried to look at her, but his eyes fell away after a second. From aggressive and possessive one minute, to uncertain the next.

When it came to wolfy things, guarding territory and protecting pack mates, Matt was comfortable. Not only comfortable, he was skilled and confident. She could throw dangerous hunters or deadly monsters at him, and Matt wouldn't blink. But, if she said something romantic to him, how would he react? If his averting gaze was any indication, he might be sheepish, or even shy. Hard to picture Matthew as shy, but she was picking up those vibes now.

“Of c-course ... I want you to. Y-You and Arturo. I ... have b-been ... getting rather ... attached, t-to you two, you know?” She held out her palms toward him, and made grabby hands, like a toddler. With a growing smile, Matthew walked over to her, and got down on his knees in front of her. Sitting on the bed meant she was in a perfect position to hug him, and kiss him, and nudge her nose into his.

He met her kiss, hands roaming down her body and squeezing her waist through her towel. It was a good thing she'd just drained them — sexually speaking — minutes before, or Matt would have pinned her down and started fucking her again, no doubt.

“Hey,” Art said from her bedroom door, “I'm getting jealous watching this.”

“S-Sorry!” She said, gently pushing Matthew away by the shoulders. “W-We were ... getting a little ... um ... I d-don't want you to leave Dolareido.” And now the cat was officially out of the bag.

“Oh?” And of course, unlike Matthew who didn't have a deceiving bone in his body, Arturo was a deceitful, manipulative bastard. His smile said it all. He knew she had feelings for him, and Matthew, and he was going to dangle—“I don't want to leave Dolareido, and I don't want to leave you. I like you, a lot.” Grinning the whole time like Loki would, Arturo, also only dressed in his jeans, sat down beside her on the bed, leaned down over her, and started kissing her.

She frowned into his kisses, and punched him in the chest a few times. Pointless. The man may not have been as big as Matthew, but he was still huge. Might as well have been punching her door frame. One of his arms slipped behind her, half hugging her, and he continued to kiss her, until she relented. Ok, much as she wanted to punch him, Arturo was a really good kisser.

Like peeling a delicate gift, Matthew pulled the towel on her body apart, and groaned at the sight of her naked body, one of those happy groans Natasha made when drinking. “It’s not just us, either,” Matthew said. “Avery is getting in comfy with some human dude. Clara and Carter are sitting pretty in that tower. Mason and that Carthian chick are together all the time. And there’s a rumor Clara’s been having some fun with a bunch of guys.”

Natasha laughed, before sucking in her breath quick, as Matthew started to kiss her neck, under the jaw and opposite of Arturo. She tried to push him away, but it didn’t last long, and Matthew’s hands roamed up to caress her breasts as he kissed her. He gently pressed his thumbs into them, and she could feel him smile against her neck, as his fingers tenderly massaged their softness. Small as her breasts were, the big man seemed perfectly content to obsess over them.

“I ... w-wonder, about Clara,” she said, little mewls slipping into her words and between Arturo’s lips.

Arturo kissed her again, sighing into her kiss as he closed his eyes. “Why?”

“I still think she likes ... J-J-Jack. She—” She squeaked, reached out, and pressed both hands on Matt’s face. “If you d-don’t stop, I’ll drain you until y-you can’t get up!”

“Don’t threaten me with a good time.”

She rolled her eyes, and wiggled away from the two men. If that went on any longer, it'd have led to more sex, and it'd barely been more than an hour since they finished up. Kindred healed quick, and she probably could go again if she really wanted, but it wasn't good to get addicted. It was a wonder the Uratha didn't spend literally every waking moment fucking each other, if they could all recover this quickly. It wasn't like they could simply not Blush Life, to prevent arousal.

Maybe she should drain them both of blood? She'd Kissed them just yesterday! But if she drained them both to the point they went comatose, or at least close to it, maybe it'd get their sex drives under control for a little while. Not that she minded. She wouldn't be able to make a sex tape if they weren't such bundles of testosterone and desire.

Thinking of sex tapes, she walked over to the laptop. She'd stopped the recording, but she hadn't had an opportunity to actually examine the footage yet. Unable to suppress her grin, she scanned through the video quickly, to make sure they never fell out of frame. And she muted the video ahead of time, because she knew she got all squeaky during sex. Didn't want to trigger her boyfriends' hunger right now. Maybe later.

Oh god! That was her! Little her, on her back on Art's chest. Her pink-clad legs were sticking out from between the two titans, and the camera was pointed three quarters at her ass, showing what the two men were doing to her. How did all that fit inside her?

Shock over, she shifted herself a bit, to keep the camera screen out of sight of the boyfriends. Couldn't have them see it! Not until she edited it and got it all pretty. It was her project, and it had to be perfect before anyone could see it. Only then, she'd show them, and as long as they said it was good, she'd show Jessie too. And maybe Antoinette?

“You think Clara still likes Jack?” Matthew said. He’d joined Arturo on the bed, and both of them were staring at her. Oh, right, the towel. She closed the laptop, yanked on the towel, and pulled it out from underneath Matt’s ass.

“I d-do. She, she um ... she’s getting d-distracted, right now. B-But that’s just sex. So unless s-someone else comes along, I ... d-don’t see her just giving up on Jack.”

The two men nodded, each lifting a hand to hold their chin, in unison, like a choreographed maneuver.

“Know any vampires who’d like a strong-headed woman like her?” Art said. “Clara’s fun on the outside, but once you get to know her, she’s damn stubborn.”

“Um ... I d-don’t, no. I mean, there are lots of single K-Kindred in Dolareido. Does ... does it n-n-need to be Kindred? You said Avery is d-dating a man named Henry.” And there was no vampire named Henry, unless the Prince’s opening of siring had led to a new Kindred with such a name.

“True,” Art said, “but Avery’s Avery. Sometimes I think she’d prefer to just walk away from all this, and live a quiet life with a baker named Henry, Henry McBoring”

Giggling, she tied the towel tight around her, and came over to sit on Matthew’s lap. She snuggled back into his chest, turned so she could press her cheek against it, and set her legs on Art’s lap.

“She ... d-doesn’t want to be Uratha?”

Art shook his head. “More like, she’s paid her dues, and she wants to live a quieter life. Still be Uratha, still hunt, but not at the front of the pack, and not into life-threatening danger.” His hands found her legs, and traced fingers up and down her skin. “Sometimes I think that's half the reason she came to Dolareido, to settle an old score so she could relax for the first time in her life."

"First t-time?"

"I think Art's right," Matt said, kissing the top of her towel crown. "Avery found us after she left Dolareido, but we can tell she's been carrying scars. She's been fighting and hunting for a very long time."

"W-What kind of scars?"

"Well," Matt continued, "as far as we can tell, she and her pack got pretty upset about what happened in Dolareido, about killing Minerva. They must have done something reckless since then, because her old leader Simon is dead, and her old totem is dead. Flowing Sanctuary was a spirit she befriended not long before she met me."

Art nodded, and started to massage her calves. "She's been through hell, but she doesn't talk about it, with anyone. We just know about Minerva, and Jacob, and the shit that went down here in Dolareido. When David said the spirits were pointing to this city, she was ... excited, in a way. Or terrified maybe. We could tell she wanted to come here, but..."

"But," said Matt, "she seems to be happier, now that she's here. She's dating, and we think she's going to try and reconcile with Jacob again."

Natasha looked down at her lap, frowning. The idea of Jacob ever forgiving someone a major transgression was difficult to imagine, but the death of his love Minerva, she couldn't see him forgiving anyone for that, ever. Avery had a long battle ahead of her.

~~Antoinette~~

Come dusk, she sat upon her throne in the primary meeting room of her headquarters, her Elysium Tower, and waited. With Daniel at her side, standing and still, an eternal gargoyle guarding over her, she feared no vampire. As Maria, Michael, Garry, and Jacob stepped into her room, she offered each a small nod, a knowing nod, a ‘this is my city, obey me’ nod. Only Jacob, and his eyeless gaze, offered anything resembling defiance, subtle motions hidden in his body language.

Would her old friend ever calm himself? Would he ever be her friend again? Doubtful, and tragic.

“Report,” she said. It was a formality of course, to ask for redundant information. And yet, there was always the possibility for misunderstandings to be cleared, or for the Primogen to announce newly developed issues they’d yet to share with her. Hopefully they would not, but it was better to brave such waters immediately.

“The sweeper teams have found nothing,” Garry said. “Couple of the Uratha say they get close to finding something, but however this Elen woman is getting around is throwing them for a loop.”

Michael nodded, and tossed a few pictures onto the glass table. “We’ve found more remnants of those burned symbols, the ones we think Elen uses as a portal. The hunters are clever, but they seem to be on the run. Or at least licking their wounds.”

“Mister Terry,” Maria said with a small smile, “has done them far more harm than any of us could have predicted. Were it not for him, I fear more than Berry Tellern and Julias Mire would have died. The hunters are indeed hurting, and we must take advantage of this as soon as possible.”

Jacob chuckled, but nodded, saying nothing. Garry, on the other hand, leaned back in his chair and donned the expression he always wore when ready to speak, like an aggressive, barking dog. Forever a child, this man.

“But he and no one else has managed to find the hunters, since he captured the monster,” Garry said. “We’re running out of time. Sooner or later the hunters are going to strike again.”

“Indeed,” Jacob said. “Jeremiah and his hunters will do anything to obtain revenge against Azamel, and the longer we wait, the longer we allow him to recover. Let’s not forget, their shaman can hunt down individuals, using some form of haruspex.”

Haruspex. To know that such magics could actually be done, using flesh and sacrifice, was an unsettling truth to discover. Valuable information, but the sort that haunted her dreams. What madness could this Elen witch unleash with her mastery of flesh? What dark gods did she pray to?

“Agreed,” Antoinette said. “But until we learn of a way to defeat Elen and her magic, they will continue to be cockroaches.”

Jacob leaned forward over the table, smiling his deadly smile. Dressed in his usual black robes that he insisted on wearing to these meetings, he looked less a modern vampire, and more an ancient relic of magic and mystery. He found it fun, no doubt, while she considered it nothing more than quaint.

“I may be able to help with that. My fellow witches and I have been doing all we can, to find a way to beat Elen at her own game. We might be onto something.”

Antoinette frowned at her old friend, and tapped a finger against the glass table. “You are the cause for the disappearances in Devil’s Corner as of late.”

“I am.”

“You kill too many, Jacob. If this continues, you will summon yet more of these infernal cockroaches to my city.”

Her words earned nothing more than an annoyed smirk from the man.

“And what progress have you made, in catching Jeremiah and Angela, hmm? Got that Begotten locked up downstairs, but has he told you anything?”

The game, once again, began. Jacob would take a jab at her, a verbal lunge, and subtly imply she was not suitable to lead the city. She would defend herself, assert dominance, and Jacob would retreat with all the regret of a mischievous child. Why did he insist on these stupid games, this pointless jousting?

“No, he has not. He will eventually break free of Elen’s spell, but I imagine it will be too late by then.”

Michael lifted a finger from the table. “But, without Sándor, she can’t escape into the nightmare, correct?”

Jacob shook his head. “Jeremiah broke into the dream realm on his own before, the same night he kidnapped Jack. We don’t know if he used Sándor to do that or not, but considering the magical handcuffs, and the strange glowing knives we’ve seen, I wouldn’t put it past him to have done it without the gargoyle monster.”

Far too many unknowns. The hunt for the hunters grated on her, irritated her beyond belief, a grain of sand that refused to be banished.

“Jacob,” she said with a sigh, “Elen and her strange magics are beyond the reach of the Invictus and the Carthians. And though I loathe to say it, such ... an obsession with flesh, is not my forte. In matters of Elen and this strange chamber of flesh that she hides her hunters with, I will defer to you.”

The eyeless man winked at her, only noticeable through the small flex of his eyebrow. “Like I said, already on it.”

“If I may,” Maria Turio said, “I would like to speak of the Lancea et Sanctum.”

Of course she would, because each grain of sand these children slid into her shoes was a victory for them.

Antoinette did her best to not roll her eyes. “I have already allowed Burksen to preach to any who wish to learn of Longinus.”

“Yes, but you limited our freedom to speak of this. And, I am ... seeking, to reestablish the Second Estate, in its entirety.”

She glared at Maria, but said nothing, slowly tapping a finger against her table, while Garry began to boil.

“So we can kill all of you again?” the Gangrel said. “Learn from the past, for fuck’s sake.”

“It will not be as last time!” Maria slammed both hands on the table. It survived. For all her obvious frustration with the Carthian, Maria was not the sort to let her emotions get the best of her. She could control herself. But, could she control herself in matters connected to Lucas?

Garry, unlike Antoinette, did roll his eyes. “You say that, but all I see is Lucas’s woman wanting to take up the mantle.”

It was tempting, to interrupt this squabble and prevent escalation. But it was better to see how the Nosferatu would respond to this verbal torture.

“In fact, I wish to do exactly that, except without the man’s eyes for conquest.”

“The fuck does that mean?”

“It means, Mister Tones, that I wish ... to leave my position as council member for the First Estate. Should I be given permission to do so, I will create the Second Estate as a child branch of the First Estate, until such time that we can be considered a separate covenant unto ourselves.”

That was not what Antoinette had expected to hear. “Are you serious, Madam Turio?”

“She is,” Michael said. “I will rule the Invictus, and Turio and I will be partners. We expect the Second Estate to rely on the first for all resources, until such a time they can stand on their own.”

Maria raised a hand before Garry could speak up. “And before you seek battle, Mister Tones, allow Mister Terry and Mister Burksen to prove to you that this is not a bid to grow our influence.”

The Carthian ground his teeth until everyone present could hear, but after a time, leaned back in his chair, and sighed. “As long as it’s just the Church fuckers existing within the Invictus, I guess it doesn’t matter much.”

Antoinette smiled, a subtle smile, but one that earned a frozen look from the corpse woman. “Very well, Maria Turio. For now, you may act as leader of the Lancea et Sanctum, provided you remain within the confines of the Invictus. We will see, with time, if you remain true to your intentions.”

Unless Antoinette’s ears were deceiving her, tonight’s meeting sounded like progress.

Chapter 101

~~Jack~~

The sweeps continued. Until someone managed to find a hint of the hunters, they had no choice but to continue them. But as time went on, Jack's mom started asking about their old home, about visiting it, and getting things they might want. He had a free night tonight, so, time to take a trip through memory lane, knowing full well the hell it'd be.

"You ready for this?" he said.

"I ... I don't know." His mom looked at the door, the front door, the threshold, the gate, the barrier between her new life and her old life, and trembled. "I don't know what I'll find."

"A lot of pain, Mom." Not the nicest way to start, but he had to be honest. "I ... I've only looked through the windows of this place, and it's always been painful."

"You never snuck in?"

"Hell no." Laughing, he shook his head, and rested his back against the front door of his old house. It was raining, pouring even, as if someone decided this night was the perfect night to dial up the drama. Visiting his old home in the rain was such a perfect balance of sad atmosphere that he couldn't help but be moved. Though, if someone started playing some depressing music, he'd probably kill them.

And, he probably should have brought a partner on this trip. It was the rule, to always travel in pairs when not in the dead center of South Side. His mom didn't exactly count as a partner, considering she'd only been Embraced for a month. But he was strong enough to make up for that weakness.

Ventruue hubris.

“B-But, I thought you had a friend, that Damien fellow, and he could hide things in plain sight?” His mom was dressed in a business suit, the same sort he was, and wearing a long trench coat meant to protect it from the rain. Her umbrella protected her wavy hair. He was in a coat too, but no umbrella of his own. They'd shared. He knew they would.

“Cloak of Night? Yeah, Damien can do that. So can Natasha, and Beatrice. But, the issue was never being stealthy. It ... it hurt, you know? Seeing you, and Mary. I never got to say goodbye, and I...” He grit his teeth, turned around, and unlocked the door. Getting the key had been easy enough. After the incident at the hospital, the Invictus had confiscated Mary's stuff, and his mother's. If he wanted to, the Invictus could confiscate the house too. But, no, better to let it go up for sale at some point.

“What, Jack?”

“Nothing.”

Samantha sighed, the usual sigh she made when she knew he was just ending a conversation he didn't want to have. They'd had this dance a thousand times, after his dad died. And, stepping into the kitchen of his old home, the muscle memory, patterns, and habits of his old life kicked in as if he'd never left. No doubt, they'd have more conversations where they fell into bad habits, the sort that had led to their distancing. But, he'd try to catch them when he could.

He didn't want to enter the house. It was his old house, but he felt something different about it, something off, something bleak and mean. It was an empty house, scarred by the loss of its family, all four of them. There was a shadow, something dark and heavy about it now, something that had never been there before, as if it was angry at him for coming back dead instead of alive.

He set his hand down against the counter next to the door, the first thing he always noticed when he came home, back when he was alive. It's where he'd throw his keys, and set his headphones. It felt cold, colder than the ambient temperature would have suggested. But, worse than that, was how quiet it was. He was surprised to hear the hum of the fridge; guess no one had bothered to empty it and turn off non-essential circuits or something, since the Invictus had closed the house off. But other than that, it was deathly quiet.

It was a decent house, middle class, with a family room, living room, a few bedrooms, and a couple bathrooms. A four-level split, with a basement split in half for storage and a movie room. The side door they took went into the kitchen, where they were surrounded by cupboards and drawers. Without hesitation, Jack rubbed his shoes back and forth on the old brown mat, and started to undo his shoelaces

He blinked down at his fingers, laughed, stood back up, and walked into the kitchen, shoes still on. No point. No point at all.

“Jack! Take off your ... your ... oh.” His mom laughed as well, quieter, sadder, before she followed him.

He smiled at the tile, white, with little black flowers. He smiled at the cupboards, brown wood, and the slot where a microwave sat above a counter. He smiled at the counters too, and their muted white marble coloring.

The house really was colder than he was used to. He wasn't Blushing Life, so the temperature difference didn't bother his skin so much, but he could tell it was off. Colder in the house than it was outside. Strange. Darker too. It must have been his imagination, or a trick of the light his Kindred eyes were picking up.

No, it was probably the depressing thoughts running through his mind by entering his old home that was doing the trick. It was the home he'd left behind, the home where he left two women shattered and depressed. Fuck him, he could practically feel the misery permeating the walls, made worse by his memories, when he spied on his mom and sister through the windows. Dad dead, him missing, his mom and sister had only each other to recover from that mess.

Jack, give yourself a break. None of it, absolutely none of it, is your fault. You were involved, but none of it happened because of you.

Easy to think the logical thoughts. Harder to internalize them and turn them into a feeling. Deep down, he knew damn well he blamed himself for Mary's death, and nearly losing his mother. It was beyond frustrating, knowing a truth, but not being able to accept it.

He took a deep breath, and let his memories guide him. Before he knew what he was doing, he opened the fridge. It was a nice fridge, big, with a bottom freezer drawer. A little digging exposed some ice cream, and he laughed as he showed it to his mom.

"The super low cal high protein ice cream?"

"Hey! It tastes good."

"And costs five times as much as regular ice cream."

Frowning and scrunching up her nose, she took the ice cream and put it back in the freezer. "I look good, don't I? I had to give up the delicacies to lose the weight."

"You do look good."

She beamed with the compliment, and he rolled his eyes. She was too damn sweet.

“I ... I don’t know if there’s anything I ... I should take. Antoinette says I should be careful. If I take memories with me, it’ll ... it’ll be hard, to move on.”

Yeah, that was true. He nodded, affirming as he moved past the counter and into the kitchen. There was a wood table, one of those you could pull apart and slip some wood planks into the center to make bigger. The patio doors beside him showed the pouring rain falling onto the wood, and the bench on the patio. On the wall was a painting he did, from his high school days. Apples on a plate, of course.

“But if you take nothing, it might make it harder to hold onto what keeps you human,” he said.

“Antoinette said that too. And she ... she um ... told me about what happened to Mrs. Pavala.”

Jack froze, eyes locked onto the painting. What a lovely juxtaposition, a painting he did when he was barely more than a kid, against the words his mom just said.

“That is a good example, of why you don’t want to let the Beast inside you get too strong. You go hungry, and it gets a hold of you. You get too ... horrible, and bloodthirsty, and it can come out that way, too. So, it might be a good idea to ... grab something that reminds you of being human. Maybe not something as hurtful as a picture of Mary, but maybe something with some—”

“Jack.”

“What?” He turned and faced her, but it was a bad idea. She had that look, the ‘I know you’re hurting please talk to me’ look, and he almost recoiled at the sight of it.

Grinding his teeth, his looked down and away, before he stepped under a small arch of drywall, and into the living room. The front door connected to this room, and hardwood floors greeted him. She'd changed the carpet out, sometime after he disappeared. The couches were changed too, no longer boring, pale colors, but slick and inviting blues. Went nice with the floor.

"I was going to renovate the kitchen," she said. "New ... new beginnings, right?"

"Right, right." He looked at the corner of the room by the fake fireplace, and smiled as the warm memories drifted through him. Decorating the Christmas tree, watching the fake fireplace fake burn fake wood, making real emotions and memories, opening presents, the smell of cookies. He completely blamed his mother for his candy obsession, that she also shared.

"Come on Jack, talk to me."

"Talk about what?"

"About anything? Every time I look at you, you look so much older than you used to. I can see the weight of the world on your shoulders." She shook out the umbrella and set it on the counter, before following him into the living room. "Antoinette hasn't told me much. She insists you should tell me yourself."

That earned a smile from him. He could trust Antoinette with his personal information, and she was smart enough to realize the more painful conversations between him and his mother, should be between them alone.

"I'm surprised she didn't come," he said.

"She ... she told me, I should talk to you, privately, about things. She'll come another time."

"You already know about Mrs. Pavala. It was horrible. I had to clean up a corpse on my first night of being Kindred. It was rough. I got over it.” He shrugged, and looked up the stairs. The bedrooms were up there. They could wait. He started down the stairs into the family room, and looked around at the couches and TV.

He wasn’t sure what he was looking for. A lost memory, perhaps. It felt important to visit, and that’s why he was doing it, but he couldn’t exactly figure out the real why, other than it was important to help his mother move on.

His mom followed after him. “You always do that.”

“Do what?”

“Act like you have to bear these burdens. Like no one can help.”

“I ... I do act like that, don’t I?” For a second, he almost fell into the old habit, dismissing her with some quip like ‘everyone has to bear their burdens’. Not tonight.

He continued down into the basement, flipped on the light, and melted into a pot of nostalgia. The boxes and shelves, the old toys collecting dust, a wall his dad built to cut the basement in half, so they had another room where they could watch movies. But his dad wasn’t exactly a carpenter, and the door never closed right; they had to slam it.

The room was cold. The basement was always cold, but this felt weird. Painful tingles danced up his spine, and he found himself looking over his shoulders, checking the area for anything unusual.

“Yes, you do act like that,” his mom said. “And I can’t imagine how big a burden it is! With all these things that’s happened to you, it must be ... be horrible...”

He stopped in the door frame of the built wall, and put his hands out to grab onto it. His head fell forward, facing away from her, and he squeezed the frame.

“I have friends, and Antoinette. I have people I do rely on.”

“But not your mother?”

“It’s only been a month since you were sired, Mom. I’m not going to dump a world of hurt on you already.”

She set a hand on his shoulder, standing behind him. “Jack, it’s not about that. It’s about ... It’s about me, having a son, ok? Call it selfish, but I want my son back.”

That, he should have guessed. It wasn’t about her wanting to help him; though, that had to be part of it. But she’d lost her children, and he wasn’t doing a good job of letting her be a mom to him. He wanted to protect her from the shit raining down on him, and she was probably spending every moment of the night wishing she had a way to help him with his pain. She was driven to do so, because she was his mother. He could throw her that bone, at least.

“It’s been rough,” he said. “A lot more has happened than Mrs. Pavala. I’ve killed a ... a lot of people, now. Hunters, mostly.”

“Mostly? I—oh ... M-More people like Pavala?”

“No, thank god. But, it’s been tough, you know? And I didn’t want to put that on you. You’ve got your hands full, getting used to your new life. No need for me to add onto—”

She embraced him, tightly, and buried her face against the back of his head. “I can’t believe this is happening.”

“Being a vampire is—”

“Not that. I mean, that is pretty hard to believe, but I mean ... all of this, happening to you. Antoinette’s told me you’ve become sort of a celebrity, but because horrible things keep happening to you.”

“It ... it’s ... it’s been ... rough.” It was hard to not cry. He was kind of sick of crying, after Julias died. But being in his old home, seeing all the things he’d abandoned, and being hugged by his mom, who only wanted to help him like the old days, was digging up those emotions again. He took a deep, useless breath, and pushed them back down.

“How rough?”

Time to open up. Hopefully it wouldn’t scar her.

“I’ve been ... tortured. I’ve had to kill hunters in horrific ways.” I’ve sacrificed thieves to a dark, ancient god. “And I ... I learned that something is inside me, something that affects my Beast. It’s like an amplifier on all my Beast’s urges, and strengths. We call it the curse. It’s inside me, eating away at me all the time, demanding I kill without justification.” He turned around as her arms fell away, and he managed a weak smile for her. Her jaw was hanging open. “But all that is background noise, to how horrible I feel, that my sire, my best friend, the closest thing I’ve had to a dad in a long time, is dead. It wasn’t just Mary who died because I hurt the hunters, and left an opening for them to hurt me. My friend is dead, too. He died because I wasn’t going to let the hunters get you. He died helping me, knowing damn well it was a fool mission. The only reason he died, is because I was too emotional to just let you die.”

Every word he said, was a knife to his mom’s gut. He could almost see the blades skewering her, and the life draining from her eyes with every wound.

“And ... that’s why,” he said, “I haven’t been telling you these things. I hurt you, by letting Mary down and getting her killed. I hurt you, by letting Angela nearly kill you. And now I’ve hurt you again, because hey, now you know a man you barely knew died to save you. He had a girlfriend who loved him dearly. He was one of the best Kindred in the city, who strived for peace, and wanted Kindred to treat kine with respect.”

“B-But ... those things ... aren’t your fault.”

“I know, I know.” He slipped around her, and started up the stairs out of the basement. “I keep telling myself that, too. Doesn’t seem to help.”

He could almost feel her frown, drilling into his back. He could hear her sniffles.

“I had ... no idea. So many things...”

“It’s not everything, either, but more stuff in the same vein. It’s been ... rough, like I said. Not gonna lie.”

“You said ... there’s a curse, inside you?”

He nodded as he worked his way up to the family room, then the living room, and then up to the bedrooms. Except, he didn’t get very far. There was a wall between him and the hallway, something he couldn’t see, but he could feel it. A wall he’d put up in his mind and his past, the part of him that knew better than to include his old life in his new life. The wall was still there, even with Mary gone, and his mother behind him, a vampire too.

He tried to walk past it, to reach the bedrooms, but his legs didn’t want to move. Someone had tied weights to them, vast, cold weights, that demanded he turn around and run away. So, coward that he was, he walked into the bathroom instead, which wasn’t so far down the hall. The upstairs bathroom had the tub, while the downstairs one had a small shower. Over time, he’d stuck to using the downstairs bathroom, while Mary and his mom used the upstairs bathroom usually.

Two toothbrushes.

He leaned onto the counter, set his fingers on it by the sink, and stared down at the subtle stains building on the otherwise clean, beige bowl. “Yeah, something in my bloodline. Apparently I’m the first to break the seal someone put on it hundreds of years ago; or at least, Viktor and Julias never did. So now, it’s awake, inside me, and it’s hungry for ... for all the things the Beast hungers for. It’s strong, and it gives me strength, but it’s got its own desires, fighting to get out.” A side glance showed his mother was standing in the doorway of the bathroom, eyes locked onto him like he was a baby bird with a broken wing. “Sorry. I dumped a lot of stuff on you there.”

“N-No, it’s ok. I ... asked for it.” She came up beside him, and looked at the big mirror on the wall, before looking down at the toothbrushes too. Guilt was gnawing at her, about Julias probably. “Vampires show up in mirrors,” she said, obviously trying to find some words to fill the silence. “I guess we don’t need to brush our teeth anymore.”

“Don’t need to brush your teeth, or wash any part of you, really, unless you spill stuff on you.” Yes, this was easier, talking about vampire things. Teaching his mom what sort of things Kindred dealt with from day to day, was better than handling the avalanche of things he’d just dumped on her. “You can get a tattoo if you want. A little mental effort every night, and it’ll be permanent. Cut your hair, same thing.”

“Y-Yes. Antoinette told me.” Nodding, she came in closer, until her shoulder was touching his, before she turned and hugged him again. It wasn’t a motherly hug this time either, but something tight and desperate. “It’s killing me, that you have to deal with all this.”

“Well, you’re a vampire now, like me. It’s not all bad. We get to live forever, if we’re smart about it. All this shit, it’ll pass.” He returned her hug, but when she didn’t let go, he had to wriggle free. A gentle push on her shoulders managed to get the message across. “And I have a lot of help, the best and brightest minds in the city.”

Not to mention, Antoinette and I really do love each other, and she's the Prince of the city. I'm not alone in this."

"Good! Good, good." Nodding, but obviously not entirely convinced, she stepped back out of the bathroom and waited for him to follow. "Antoinette is ... smart, and beautiful."

"Very." He followed after her, but hesitated at the door frame. If he followed her any further, they'd be going toward the bedrooms, and the cold weight that idea pushed onto him was blatant.

And more than that, there was a darkness in the house, something he couldn't quite see, but it was pushing against him. They turned on a couple of the lights as they moved through the house, but the darkness never seemed to go away. It felt wrong, as if the house were offended that he had the audacity to come back to it at all.

"She's so tall! And, um, curvy."

Oh god. Jack laughed, and buried his face in a palm as he shook his head. "Aha, yeah. She has white hair and red eyes too, in case you didn't notice."

"I did! I assumed they were fake, at first."

"They're not. Antoinette isn't sure why she's built the way she's built. She thinks, maybe, hundreds of years ago, she did experiments on herself. The Ordo Dracul have a habit of doing that."

"Experiment on herself? Why?"

"A guess? To make herself more beautiful than humanly possible."

"That ... that sounds..."

“Vain, doesn’t it?” He stepped back into the hallway, looked toward the bedroom doors, and sighed. Just do it. Just do it. Ok, he could check Mary’s room last. First room, Mom’s. “We’re young and stupid, Mom, you and I. And Antoinette was too, once upon a time, I’m sure. A young Daeva with the ability to make herself inhumanly beautiful for eternity? Hell, I might have risked it, too.” Maybe Elaine might know more about it?

“And she really can’t remember her past?”

“From hundreds of years ago? Just blurry images, according to her.” He pushed on his mom’s door. It wasn’t closed, like usual. The double bed within was made, and a nightstand stood beside the head of the bed in the unassuming room. A lamp, and a book sat upon it. His mom got the double bed after his dad died, replacing the old queen bed. There was a desk dresser with a mirror, with random things on it. A cute toy. A jewelry box. A snow globe. A picture of all four of them together when they were alive, James, Samantha, Mary, and Jack. God damn, they were so young.

“I don’t know what to take.” His mom ran a finger over the picture, smiled down at it, and moved onto her jewelry box. It made a tiny creak when she opened it. “Maybe the earrings your dad bought for me? Or a necklace, from your sister.”

“Take whatever you want. The whole box, the clothes, the blankets. Hell, take the bed if you really want it.”

With a weak laugh, she started digging through the jewelry, looking at old things she’d stopped wearing by the time Jack knew what jewelry was. “All of this seems so cheap, compared to what Antoinette has.”

“You’re her childe now, Miss Daeva. I’m sure she’ll lend you whatever you want, or buy you everything she doesn’t have to lend.”

Laughing louder, his Mom turned around, and showed him a necklace around her neck. Fake pearls probably, something very nineties, meant to go with church clothes or something.

“She probably has real pearls, doesn’t she?”

“Pearls, diamonds, rubies, uranium, whatever rock is worth a lot, I’m sure she has it in abundance.”

“Uranium?”

“Heh, nevermind.” He walked over to the window, and slid aside the curtain. It was a nice neighborhood. Not expensive, not cheap, with nearby schools and parks. Apartment buildings were on the other side of the neighborhood, and malls and grocery stores were shared by both, closer to the main road. He could still remember making trips to the nearest store, to buy candy.

“Hey,” she said, “what do you know about that ... Jacob fellow?”

Oh no, not this conversation. “He has no eyes under that bandage, Mom.”

“That’s fine! Antoinette told me about Nosferatu and their deformities. That one doesn’t sound so bad.”

“They look like they were removed with a serrated spoon.”

“That’s ... less fine, but still fine! He seemed charming.”

Jack leaned forward until his forehead was pressed to the glass. And then he started dragging it left and right, so it bounced numerous times against the glass with the friction. “He’s an elder Nosferatu, Mom.”

“So? Your girlfriend is an elder Daeva.”

Touché.

“He’s dangerous.”

“So’s your girlfriend.”

“He’s in charge of a cult.”

“So’s your girlfriend”

God damn it.

“The Ordo Dracul are more of a secret organization than a cult. Like, secret organization inside a secret organization. But, my point is, Jacob’s a weird, twisted man, Mom. He’s—”

“Antoinette says he’s saved you once, from the hunters.”

“That’s ... true.” Trying to drive home his point was getting harder and harder. “He’s into dark, occult stuff, Mom! Like, the witchy witch kind of stuff, and it gets pretty dark.”

“You don’t think he’s a good man?”

“I think ... he’s ... chaotic neutral.”

She tilted her head to the side, and blinked at him. “What?”

“He’s ... he’s ... really hard to predict. He cares for the city, and he cares for his fellow witches, but he’s done nasty stuff, Mom. He’s older than dirt. He’s killed kine by the hundreds, thousands.”

“For fun?”

“I ... don’t think he’s killed kine for fun. He’s killed them because he’s a witch, and is trying to expand the reaches of his power. He ... does stick to only killing those most Kindred would say deserve it. Killers, rapists, dealers, and stuff.” But Jack had no idea if he’d always done that.

She tapped her chin a few times, but he knew his mom. She wasn't a thinker. The chin tap thing was a feint, a thing she picked up when she knew he wanted her to think about something, demanded it, and she tapped her chin to appease him. What a sneaky woman.

"Let's go check your room. Maybe there's something you want to bring, too?"

"Y-Yeah, maybe." This was not going to be fun. He took yet another deep, useless breath, and followed his mom into his room. When he had moved out and started his own life, she hadn't touched it. He wished she had. It'd have been so much easier to forget his family and move on, if they hadn't been so insistent that he always had a place back at home.

He stood by his bed, and sighed. Blue blankets on a double bed, with a big fluffy pillow and side mattress, because he liked to sleep on his side. At least, he used to. Now he slept in whatever way was comfortable with Antoinette, often holding her; easy to do, when sunrise guaranteed he fell asleep instantly.

In the corner of the room was a corner desk meant for computers; no computer though. He'd brought it when he moved out. The walls were blank as well, and the nightstand by his bed was nothing more than a box of wood he could put his phone on for his alarm when he went to bed.

"Jeeze, I never cared for decorating, did I?"

"Nope. I always thought this room needed some flair. I thought maybe you were depressed. But, when you were on your computer, listening to music and stuff, you seemed happy, so I let it be." She slid open the closet, and laughed as she started digging through his clothes. "This all looks so ... so..."

"Juvenile?" He plucked out a t-shirt from the closet. "Cheap?"

“Now that’s not very nice. I was going to say more homely, or normal. All I ever see you wear is expensive suits now, and the Prince is always wearing a suit or dress of some kind.”

“Speaking of suits and the Prince, do you plan to invite her to your funeral?”

Her laughing regrew, until she couldn’t stand anymore. She sat on his bed, shaking, laughing, and wiping away laughter tears that never came. “How many people get to do that? Invite people to their own funeral?”

He laughed with her. Yeah, it was funny, in that strange sort of ‘rock bottom’ way. Like, if a man loses everything, and all he has left is his house, and then aliens come and blow up his house, guaranteed the man would laugh.

“It’s Mary’s funeral, too,” he said. “Antoinette was worried you might not want her there.”

“No no, I want her there. She’s been nothing but nice to me, and she’s taken great care of you. And she’s your wife, right?”

Jack raised a brow, and looked at his fingers. “Invisible ring?”

She punched him in the shoulder. “Why haven’t you proposed to her?”

“Because she’s Kindred! We’re Kindred. Marriage is ... a tricky proposition, you know. We live forever, and a lot of what makes marriage work — when it does — for humans, isn’t as strong a force for vampires.”

Poor Mom. She frowned at him a while longer, before looking down, kicking her feet back and forth. “I’m not sure I like that.”

“If it’s any consolation, Antoinette and I plan to stay together. We love each other, a lot, but we don’t belong to the same covenant, and Kindred are solitary creatures by nature. I fully expect her and I to be an item for centuries, Mom. But marriage, I—”

“What about ... this Vinculum thing? I hear that—”

He turned to face her, and grabbed her shoulder with his closer hand. “Don’t.”

“But—”

“Don’t. Drinking another vampire’s blood doesn’t make you love them, Mom, it makes you infatuated. Don’t drink another vampire’s blood.”

“Is it that bad?”

“It’s...” How to word this, how to word this. “It can be horrible, or it can be a bittersweet thing. Antoinette’s ghouls knew what they were getting into before they took her blood. They knew they’d have their minds altered for drinking of her, but they also knew of the perks. But then, plenty of thralls were turned into thralls without them even knowing what was happening. They’re dedicated to their masters.” Some thralls were created using the Vinculum, and others were created using Dominate or Majesty; many were created using both. But no sense getting her more confused.

“Sounds like we treat humans as less than us.”

“We do. We’re vampires, not humans.”

“But...”

Laughing weakly again, he pat her on the same shoulder, stood up, and started back for the hall. “But why did I and Antoinette tell you to not forget the human part of you? Because that’s what it means to be Kindred, Mom. Balancing on a knife's edge between the human part of you, and the Beast." With a shrug, he headed toward Mary's room, and waited for his mom to join him. "You'll get used to it. You have a great teacher."

He set his hand on the doorknob, and froze. Tingles, the painful kind, the ones you get from sticking your hand into ice water, ran up his limb and into his shoulder. He stepped back, and blinked at the white paint of the door.

It was the same feeling again, that feeling that coursed through him when he first entered the house. The strange sensation crept up his spine, prickled, needles in his skin, until it stirred a headache, throbbing in his skull. Kindred didn't get headaches.

"Do you ... feel that?" he said.

"It's cold. B-But, I ... it's ... it's not normal cold, right? What is it?"

He didn't like this, didn't like it at all. If his mom could feel it, then something was definitely up. He ran a finger down the closed door, and again felt the cold surge cut through him, until it hurt. Wincing and sucking in his breath through his teeth, he tried again.

This wasn't a new sensation. He'd felt it before, when Black Blood was around, when the Crone came, and when he was in that room where Elen had performed her haruspex. Cold, but not cold, a heavy weight, oppressive and suffocating, as if he was drowning. But Black Blood wasn't here, was it? There wasn't any black fog or liquid around.

"I ... I'm not sure ... we should..." His arm ached, touching the door, but he kept it there, determined to let the sensation either pass or build until he could bear it no more. The cold ache continued, but didn't rise above a pain he couldn't handle. He wasn't sure it even was pain. Something cold, and cruel, and sad, pulsed through the door and into his limb.

If it'd been the old him, he'd have fled. The old him had never felt this sensation before. The old him was a young vampire that didn't have his strength and abilities now. The old him would have been terrified by anything like this, that felt like the depressive arms of Black Blood, or the creeping bleakness he knew permeated cemeteries. The old him was smarter.

“Mom, stay behind me.”

“B-But, maybe we should—”

“It's our home, Mom, and something's happened to it. I'm sure you noticed, when we first came in.”

His mom took a small step back, before coming in closer and getting behind his right arm. “I thought maybe someone had shut off the heat.”

No one had shut off the heat. The Invictus had kept their home untouched, until Jack and Samantha were ready to deal with it. Even if they had, this cold was painful, and Kindred didn't mind the cold unless it was literally freezing.

Someone had done something to his home. Someone, had entered his home.

“Black Blood,” Jack said, loud enough to penetrate the door, “if this is you, show yourself.”

Silence.

“Black Blood?” his mom said.

“A spirit.”

“Spirit!?”

He shook his head. Black Blood would probably respond to being called out, unable to avoid taunting Jack in return. And, much as he wanted to blame this strange aura on Black Blood, this did feel colder, and harsher.

Gritting his teeth through the strange pain, he turned the doorknob, and pushed the door open.

Both him and his mother stiffened, chilled to the bone, as the cold atmosphere overwhelmed them. Like hitting a nerve on something hard, the penetrating sensation dug into him, up through his limbs, and into his guts. There was fog on the floor, and it seeped out of the room, inching over their shoes and into the hallway. Jack stared down at it, sure it'd be the black fog he was used to seeing now, whenever Black Blood was making an appearance. It wasn't black. It was the same, gray color of fog that anyone would see on a cold, humid day.

Was it Maria? No, the corpse woman was nowhere to be seen, and he trusted his new Kindred strength to be able to at least partly sense the disguised presence of a hiding vampire, no matter their age. And while her Nosferatu mutation made her sort of leak mist everywhere, this was different.

“Oh my god,” his mother said, looking down at the mist that seeped out into the hall, and then out further, into the other rooms, and down the stairs. It were as if they'd opened the cage, let something out, and now it had free rein to explore.

He waited for something to happen. Maybe something would jump out of the closet, or his Kindred senses would tell him something or someone was hiding. Nothing happened. He took a step into Mary's room, and the mist parted around his legs, swirling and mixing before settling once again. The cold numbness did not abate.

Mary's room was different than his, in a predictable manner. Jack kept his thoughts and emotions in his head, and that expressed itself in the most common way: by living on a computer. Mary was far more extroverted. She had posters up from various movies she enjoyed, some romance, some action, and she had fancy pillows. One stuffed animal, a white fluffy bear, and a bunch of pillows and blankets. There was a dresser with a mirror, smaller than his mom's, and there was a small desk for her laptop. It was plugged in, closed, and probably in sleep mode; no matter how much he complained, his sister refused to ever properly shut off any electronic.

Jack and his mom stood in the middle of her room, slowly turning around, and she kept her back to his. Something or someone was in the room with them, but neither of them could see it. The silence was deafening. Mist filled the room unendingly, replenishing even as it flowed out into the hall. Mary's window, with its white blinds pulled up, was covered in frost. The tiny cactus on the windowsill was dead.

"I don't understand," his mom said. "What's ... going on? I—"

Jack held up a hand slowly, and brought a finger to his lips. Thankfully his mom caught on quick, and glued to him a little harder as Jack roamed his dead sister's bedroom. The closet? He slid it open, but nothing waited inside.

"... hello?" he said.

"What?"

God damn it, Mom. Jack shook his head at his mom again. Not so quick. Shhh.

The silence continued for a time. Jack stepped out of the bedroom after a while, and his mom let out a small squeak as she dashed after him to catch up. She grabbed his right arm with both her hands, and followed after him, peeking around him as he walked through the hallway.

It was, just a few minutes ago, his old home, a house he recognized. But it wasn't his home anymore, or hers. He still recognized it, but the atmosphere, the nostalgia, the old memories and comforting presence, they were all gone.

It was when the lights they'd turned on, all turned off, that Jack and his mom both gasped. He flicked the hallway light switch, but nothing happened.

If he'd still been alive, and if he'd let out a breath, it'd have come out fog. The windows were frosted, and the mist permeated everything. It'd grown so thick, each step he took caused it to swirl around his ankles. And the weight of the cold, more than temperature, continued to press down on him.

Standing in the living room, he looked out the window. The streetlights beyond were muted, as if the windows themselves were fighting to keep any light out. Considering the lights in the house weren't working anymore, everything was dark. If he wasn't a vampire, it'd have been hard to walk around.

"... I know someone's there," he said. The slight tremble of his voice betrayed him, and he clenched his jaw for a moment until it settled. "Show yourself."

"J-Jack, maybe we should ... should..." His mom's voice trailed off, as a new noise finally penetrated the silence.

Wails. Cries. Screams. The noise wasn't loud, but it was everywhere, filling the air until it was almost palpable, and every step felt like pushing through a choir of dead. He slowly turned around and around, and his mom followed, staying behind him and clutching his arm as he scanned for any movement.

He knew this sound better than he wanted to. It was like being in Jacob's cave again. It was the sound the dead made, when they got to make some. How they could do that, he had no idea, and if he'd known he'd find this at his old home, he'd probably have asked Jacob or Black Blood about it. Hindsight was twenty twenty. But at least at Jacob's underground sacrifice pit, there was a reason for the sound, for the whimpering, crying, shrieking voices to echo for all time. Why here though?

His old home had become a graveyard. Every step made it more apparent that the dead were here, or something similar was. Maybe that was it, a spirit from the Shadow had come. But there wasn't any reason for that, and how they would even know where he lived? He gulped as he felt his mother's grip shake, but forced himself to stay calm.

They moved to the kitchen, slowly, each step a labor, each filled with the gnawing cold and growing fear. A vampire, afraid of the dark? Yep, that's what was happening. He was growing more and more afraid, and that meant his mother was probably terrified. She never could handle a horror film.

It only got worse when he tried to push open the side door, and couldn't. He tried harder, and still it refused to open. He kicked the damn thing, and it refused to open. He kicked it again, putting all his weight into it, his Kindred strength, and the strength of his curse. Physics being physics, the act sent him sprawling to the floor. The door swung open, door frame tearing apart at the lock, but before he could move through it, the door slammed closed with more force than Jack kicked it open with. Bang. His mom, after squealing several times, tried to open it again. It did not budge.

“Jack! Jack, oh god, are you ok?”

“Fine, fine.” Growling, Jack forced himself back to his feet, and held his hand out for his mother. She took it, getting behind him once again, as the two began to creep around the dark house. The wailing continued, louder, but as Jack listened to the piercing cries, something became apparent. Unlike the choir of voices in Jacob's cave, there was only one voice in the old home, a woman's voice.

He knew that voice.

“ ... Mary?”

The cupboards flew open, all of them, at the same time. The wood slammed against itself, multiple times, until Jack and Samantha both covered their ears with their palms. Noise ripped through the cold air, followed by plates, glasses, and bowls. Jack ducked as one of the dishes flew at him, shattering against the fridge. A plate drifted out of the cupboard, floated in the air a moment, began to vibrate violently, and launched itself at Jack. Again, he had to move, diving to the side and barely escaping the oncoming dish.

“What's going on?” his mom said. “I don't understand!”

Jack looked up from the floor to his mother, expecting her to have to dive out of the way. She stood there, eyes wide, jaw dropped, hands at her chest. Terrified.

But she didn't have to. The cupboards swung open and slammed closed. The drawers slid open and slammed closed. The door flew open, and slammed closed. The house shook, rumbling, noise rising to a crescendo as the kitchen decided it didn't like them anymore. But, nothing flew at Jack's mom.

Oh fucking god, this couldn't be happening. It had to be a prank or something. Something or someone was in his house, and was acting like a fucking ghost, and the more he tried to figure out who it could be, the more his mind came up blank. It couldn't be Mary! It couldn't. It fucking couldn't.

His mom turned around in place, frozen, horrified, hands up to her lips. The utensils and plates and glasses didn't come for her, though. Metal and glass flew up in the air, and headed toward Jack with straight force, like someone firing a bullet. He rolled to the side as plates smashed into a million pieces, white porcelain raining in the floor. Glass exploded, tearing his suit and cutting his skin. Metal forks and knives stabbed into the floor and walls, penetrated drywall and tile flooring alike.

Whatever it was, it was focused on him. It didn't care about his mom. Good, he could focus on just keeping himself alive for the next few minutes, but if a lucky knife came at him and cut off his head, no curse was going to save him from that. And more were coming. He grabbed the frame of the archway that led to the living room, and threw himself into through it, as more utensils peppered the floor and nearest wall.

The cold pressure only grew, until every motion felt like slogging through a swamp. It pulled on him, tried to drag him down, demanded he give in and lie down in the oppressive weight of the invisible blizzard. The mist swirled, scattering around him and his panicked motions, and reformed within moments. Any second now, rotting fingers or bones would reach up, and yank him under the rising mist.

Luckily no fingers rose from the fog, but the sound of utensils stabbing the walls, each intended for him, continued as he ran into the living room.

“You,” the fog said, “you ... stole ... my ... my...”

“Please, stop!” His mother ran into the living room to join him, but something heavy, large, and invisible, blew through the room. The cold mist swirled again, making way for the incoming force that slammed into his mother, and threw her into a couch. She tried to get up, but it held her down, rendering her struggles, even the strong struggles of a Daeva, futile.

“Jack ... Jaaack...”

More whispers in the dark, from the grave, in the shadow and the endless obsidian that seemed to haunt him wherever he fucking went. And he knew that voice, better than he knew the screams. The banshee wails continued, rolling over the fog around him, but a woman’s voice rose above it all, thundering through the house. The closet door nearby vibrated, and Jack could hear the hangers inside hitting each other furiously. A louder vibration sound drew his eyes, and he realized the couches were shifting along the floor with the power of the voice, wooden legs hidden in the mist.

“Tell me,” he said, grabbing the staircase railing, “who you are? You ... you sound like Mary!”

“I am Mary!”

Stupid question to ask. The couch his mom wasn’t sitting on vibrated like it was angry, and then launched at him. He managed to twist out of the way of the railing and the stairs that led up, but the couch hit him anyway, and he flew through the air as he was sent downstairs instead. The family room had carpet, but it was thin, and didn’t do much to soften the impact of his skull as he slammed against it.

He grabbed a nearby couch — not the one thrown at him — and forced himself back to his feet. The mist leaked down over the stairs, a slow and endless tide of cold and death, come to hurt him. A nameless wave of—no, not nameless. It was Mary. The voice, the anger, the presence. It was Mary.

But Mary was dead.

“I don’t ... understand,” he said to the mist. “I never stole anything from Mary!”

The fog parted as something descended the stairs. He stared at what could only have been invisible legs, steps of a walking gait, someone coming down the stairs to join him.

“You stole my memory!”

A hint of silhouette formed in the mist, a woman, a little taller than him. She was wearing normal clothes, but it was hard to tell, the details lost to the fog and to the shimmering illusion. It couldn’t have been Mary. No, it was a trick. This was Black Blood’s doing, or the hunters’ somehow.

“Memory? I—”

The couch flew at him again, and he wasn’t prepared, mind digging through the past for what the voice could possibly mean. Distracted meant easy target, and he screamed as the couch smashed his legs into the TV stand behind him. His scream ended when a second couch, one of the couches already down in the family room, smashed into his chest, and drove his back and skull into the TV. Glass showered over him, tore through his scalp, and shredded his suit until shards of plastic lodged themselves in his shoulders.

“Stole it! You were alive. Alive. And you stole that memory!” The banshee, or ghost, or what the fuck ever it was, floated off the last stair, and hovered over the mist, two feet above the floor. He could see through her, directly through her, like she was nothing more than a thin silk curtain. Shoulder-length dark hair, and a soft face, details he recognized, but were lost to the harsh cold of her new form. She was so pale, and all color from her clothes gone, except for hints of cold blue, and deadly white.

He pushed the couches away. No blood followed his wounds, and the pain was minor, compared to the hell he’d been through the past couple years. But no matter how minor the lacerations were to his Kindred body, it was Mary that had hurt him, and wanted to hurt him. An ache bubbled in his withered guts, and he grit his teeth as he did his best to ignore it. He knew what she was talking about.

“Mary, please, stop.” It wasn’t her. It wasn’t her! It was some after image, some scar left behind, not the real Mary. Mary was dead, and this ghost creature wasn’t her.

No, Jack, you idiot. It’s her.

He should have known this would happen. But how the fuck was he supposed to know about ghosts? They were nothing but a whispered rumor, something Kindred said existed, but never spoke of, never recounted meeting one, never discussed. He should have known, the moment he set foot into his old home, and felt the frigid bite of death in the air, that something was going on.

If there was one way he was going to die, it’d be to the sister he got killed.

“And now Mom! Mom’s like you! What have you done!?” The shrieks rose higher, piercing Jack’s skull until he felt vitae throb through his brain to heal the wound. His eardrums threatened to pop, until vitae protected them.

“Mary, stop! Stop, it’s—”

The lights flickered on again, but off a second later, only to be followed by darkness beyond what was possible. Black fell upon him, buried him and the large room, blocking out the small windows at the top of the walls in the semi basement. The blinds trembled, and the mist began to rise, flowing along the walls, until he might as well have been in the eye of a tornado.

But the mist was still visible. It almost looked like a lava lamp in the dark, except instead of wax, it was mist. The gray fog glowed until it was white, but did not illuminate the walls. Mary's ghost moved over top it, a black outline he could see through, against the white death around her. Her eyes were empty, completely empty, like a skull, and she stared at him as she screamed. The darkness hid everything. The couches, the carpet, the windows, the ceiling, it all disappeared into endless oblivion, except for the glowing white fog, and the eyeless gaze of the shrieking creature hovering toward him.

Her face was twisted and warped, cheeks sunken in, and her hair was frayed and wet. Her mouth was wide open, exposing teeth, and a black hole that he couldn't see through, same as her eyes. She came closer, and closer, screaming endlessly. Every foot she gained, he could feel the chilling ache pulse through him, tear at him, and it made him feel heavier, heavier, and heavier.

The curse didn't have anything to contribute; ghosts were outside its purview, apparently. Fucking useless.

“You were alive! Stole my memory! And now I'm ... I'm...”

He knew what this was about. This was about the time he ran into her, not long after his Embrace. He'd run into her randomly, and had to wipe her memory of the encounter to keep the Masquerade safe. He'd violated her mind, tore something from her, and now she knew about it. Then, it had to be Mary. Oh fuck.

“I'm sorry, Mary, I had to!”

“If I knew, maybe I'd still be alive!”

He sucked in his breath, and stared at the ghost as she came closer, frozen. Mary wouldn't talk like that. But, this Mary, was different.

“Mary, please listen. I didn't have a choice. I—”

The world turned into a blur. Something grabbed him, something enormous, heavy, and invisible. The mist exploded outward as if in a panic, desperate to get away from the maelstrom of effort as something squeezed him, and threw him toward the stairs again. The couches and the TV went with him. The ghost wanted him low, deep down in the Earth, and threw him toward the doorway that held the final stairway down into the final basement; the door frame was the only thing that saved him from the incoming TV and couches.

The lowest floor again, and it greeted him far more harshly this time than last. He cracked against the metal support beam in the center of the first room, the storage half, and slumped to the floor as a shower of glass followed him from the TV that couldn't fit through the door. More of that thin carpet that might as well have been concrete caught his weight, and he groaned as he pressed his palms against it. Broken ribs, lovely.

The mist was already down in the basement, thick and smothering. The room almost looked like a different place, with white fog up to his knees, and he clutched the support beam as he looked around desperately. He had to stop this, before the spirit brought the house down.

Mary followed him down, slow and wavering, body dipping left and right over the fog. She never blinked, just glared at him, and her mouth hung open between shrieks, like a zombie that didn't know how to close its mouth after groaning. Down and down she came, until she was only a few feet from him. He had no where to run. All he could do was look up at the ghostly face of his sister, and sigh.

“Mary, what do you want from me? I regret that you ... died, but I don't regret doing what I had to do to preserve my secrecy. I had to wipe your memory, or—”

She pointed a palm out at him. This close, he could see her clothes, the casual clothes she wore when she was out shopping, jeans and a jacket; guess she didn't like hoodies anymore. There were holes in the jacket, a lot of them, slits that had the same darkness to them that her mouth and eyes did. Stab wounds.

The world turned upside down, and gained warp speed. No, that was him. Reality caught up a second too late, when he felt his body crash into some shelves. Cans of food went flying, some split open from the impact, and the crunch of the chest freezer denting against the impact of his head was the climax of the new hurricane of pain. He liked that freezer. His mom used to hide treats in there, ice cream and stuff, buried underneath frozen fish and liver, where no child would look; smart woman, his mom.

The mix of nostalgia and pain was not a pleasant one. A desire to scream coursed through him, but the world wouldn't stop spinning, putting a halt to any immediate attempt to make noise. The floor, basement, cans and shelves, and fog were covered in the endless, overwhelming, cold, white fog, glowing in the darkness but providing no light. It was all he could see until he pushed himself up onto his palms again, and peeked his head over the mist.

“Mary ... don't...”

“A stranger on the street stabbed me to death! And now Mom's like you!” Wails and shrieks mixed into her words, layering over each other. It wasn't an echo, it was extra voices, all hers, pouring over and overwhelming the basement, and the whole house. Her voice had the cans vibrating along the floor, and the shelves, and whatever else was hidden beneath the fog.

He'd already be dead if he wasn't a vampire. She'd have killed him already. Good fucking god, his sister would have killed him. Revenge, a dish best served cold, right? He managed a small chuckle, clearly delusional as he struggled to understand the situation, and the absurdity of it all. What a way to learn ghosts were real.

“A stranger! I saw what happened. I watched! I watched!” Again she pointed her palm at him, and again the world stopped making sense. Gravity reversed, and he fell into the air, crashing into the exposed wood beams underneath what would have been the kitchen floor. He hit the ceiling hard enough that half of him lodged between the wood beams, and he gasped, a reflex that mixed with the crunch of bone. Pain followed a second later, and it only grew worse as the upward force driving him into the ceiling continued. Finally, he could start screaming.

“I watched! Mom fell, and some people came, and took us to the hospital. I was dead! Dead! I watched them put my body on a gurney!” Again an invisible force found him, and decided he was better off a painting on the wall. She threw him toward the wall his dad built, and he went through it, drywall and then the studs. More bones broke, but he was too busy trying to figure out up from down to notice; plus he was already screaming in pain.

“I ran home! It ... it was dark ... everywhere. But I could see home! Home ... home ... It’s not dark here. I can see, and I can ... I can feel things, touch things.” Her mouth opened wide, wider than it should have been able to, and her empty black eyes stared through him with all the tenderness of a bullet. “And then I remembered! I found my missing brother! But you stole that memory! Took it from me! Took it! Took it! Took it!”

He managed to lift his head, and gaze back through the hole in the wall she’d made with his body. Pieces of his suit lined the broken wooden studs, and so did pieces of his skin and Kindred blood. They burned away to ash in moments, lighting the room with small red cinders, before the only thing visible was the glowing fog once again.

Mary came through the doorway, glaring at him like he was the one who destroyed her life, and all she could think about was revenge. It was like looking into a mirror and seeing how he felt about himself. The more those eyes tore into his soul, the more he found himself agreeing with her. Angela came for her because of him, because he fucked up and failed to kill her when he had the chance. His war spilled over into the kine world, and he was stupid to think that psychopath woman wouldn't go for his weak spot. And it was a weak spot, as it must have been for any Kindred his age; a neonate, barely older than a fledgling, still fresh from the Embrace, and still struggling to let his old life go.

But just because he felt like it was his fault, didn't mean it was. He knew that, and he wasn't going to let a stupid thing like crippling depression and self doubt change that reality.

"It wasn't my fault!" he screamed back at the shrieking banshee. "Blame Angela, and the other hunters. You could have lived your life free of all this if it wasn't for her."

"And who says I wanted to live that life, with Dad dead, and my little brother missing? Mom and me didn't know what happened! We cried almost every night for a year!"

Up again he went, lifted by the invisible hand of the dead, and thrown. There was another couch and TV down here, a smaller room meant for watching movies and stuff. The shattering of glass was the first sensory input Jack received, to let him know he'd been thrown into it. Like an old friend who refused to let go, pain flooded him, renewed, and came at him from new places. He'd have bled out a dozen times over if he was alive.

"P-Please, Mary, I couldn't let you know." His voice came out broken, between groans and sobs. Sobs? Right, of course, he was crying. Only a little, and not about the pain. Somewhere inside him, he knew he was talking to his dead sister. Every word she said ripped at him until it felt like his fucking insides were bleeding. “There’s rules! A secret society. I wasn’t allowed to bring you into it, and even if I could, I wouldn’t have!”

Slowly, he managed to get a sense for his surroundings. Glass was sawing into his stomach, fighting against his suit and penetrating his abdomen. He couldn’t see anything, not even the fog. So, his head was in the wall behind the flatscreen TV, and his torso was in, or through, the TV. It’d have been comical, if it was a cartoon. Turns out, getting rammed through a TV screen so hard you go through it and into the wall behind it, is blindingly painful.

He pushed himself out, or tried, but a second later he didn’t need to. The invisible grip of his sister’s rage grabbed him, and threw him back and away into the opposite wall. Again he felt parts of his body crumple to the impact, but since they were in the lower basement, the outer wall was thick and reinforced; more than strong enough to stop him, his body just broke against the studs of the wall instead.

He pushed himself out of the wall, and fell onto the couch beneath him. His Kindred body repaired itself quickly, far quicker than it would have in the past. Much as he’d prefer to keep the curse out of his life, it was terrifyingly useful, and it pulsed vitae through him at an unprecedented speed. Bones snapped back into place. Joints slid back into their sockets. Skin closed on itself, and began to mend, preventing any more of his stubborn Kindred blood from leaking out.

Ventrue were hard to kill, and with the curse, he was probably as hard to kill as Viktor; maybe he could regrow half his head if someone blew it off, too. But he couldn’t use his abilities against a ghost, that much he could tell every time he made eye contact with the black voids of Mary’s eyes. Summoning animals to his aid would require some time as well, and Mary wasn’t going to give him that; not like an army of rats would be useful right now anyway. The only thing he had was his Ventrue resilience, and all that did was let Mary indulge in breaking him.

So, he sat on the couch, ready to let his dead sister beat on him some more.

“I’m sorry ... for everything,” he said. “I didn’t want any of this to happen.”

“Sorry? You’re sorry!?! I died, Jack! I died because—”

“Mary Julia Terry, stop that this instant!”

The fog, high and swirling around Mary, settled down instantly. Mary herself froze, before slowly lowering her outstretched hand, as she turned to face their mom. Samantha stood in the doorway, hands in fists at her side, and eyes wide as she glared at the floating ghost.

“M ... Mom?” Realization dawned on the dead woman’s face. Her massive, empty eyes shrank to something resembling normal size, and her mouth closed into a grimace. “Mom, I ... I...”

“Mary! Look at what you’ve done to my house! You’ve put holes in the walls. You’ve destroyed shelves, the freezer, windows, both televisions, and the couches. You’ve ruined the kitchen and all the utensils. You destroyed all the plates and bowls!”

“But ... but I...”

Jack stared at the hovering ghost, and his lips parted. Every moment their mom yelled at her, Mary looked less and less like the hovering maelstrom of rage and death, and more like Mary. The heavy darkness that buried everything faded away, and the mist became nothing more than a quiet gray around his ankles.

He looked at his mom. Her eyes were hard, glaring, and doing her angry mom face. Sadness danced in her gaze as well, but she wiped it away on her sleeve, before she pointed at Jack, still glaring at Mary.

“Your brother doesn’t deserve this! None of this is his fault. He did what he had to!”

“But he—”

“But nothing! After we were attacked, your brother put himself in danger to save me! His best friend died to save me! And if you had been alive too, I’m sure they would have done the same.” She looked down, ground her teeth, and started to tremble. Crying, as a vampire, was always a strange sight, with the lack of tears. But she was crying, sobbing, and half screaming, as sorrow and frustration poured through. “A man died to save me! Jack’s friend! If anything could have been done, if they had any idea what would happen, people would have been there to save us!” His mom marched toward the ghost, and glared up at her hovering body, straight in the eyes. The fact she was crying didn’t seem to affect her ability to talk. Maybe she was more used to it than he was.

“He ... he stole my ... memory...”

“He did it to protect you! He’s a vampire, and he has to protect that world, and protect you from it!”

“But—”

“And it’s not his fault a horrible, horrible woman brought us into it! This is her fault, and not Jack’s! Now apologize, right now!”

The silence that followed, was horrifying. Mary’s image continued to fall lower and lower, until she was standing on the mist-covered floor. She lowered her gaze to the carpet, and hugged herself, before she started to tremble, too.

“Jack, I ... I’m...” She fell to her knees. The mist spread out from her, exposing the hard carpet and how she knelt upon it. Still hovering, but only a single inch above the floor. “It’s ... it’s ... not ... me...”

He tried to sit up. Mistake. Much as his new regenerative powers were putting in work, he could feel dozens of bones still broken. Aligned, but broken. He could move if needed, but he’d need a day’s sleep before he felt normal again. But it didn’t matter. He had to fix this, fix the mess, fix the whole god damn fucking horrible situation.

“It’s ok,” he said, choking on a small sob. With another shove, he managed to get off the couch, and onto his knees, down in the mist with the ghost.

“No, it’s not!” The ghost’s shriek pierced the air, and both vampires reeled back a bit at the explosion of sound. When she screamed, her mouth and eyes opened inhumanly wide, exposing the endless void of black within. It was like the Scream painting by Edvard Munch, without any of the color. “I’m sorry! I’m sorry I’m sorry I’m sorry I’m sorry I’m sorry I’m—”

Jack tried to reach out to her, but there was still a few feet between him and her, and his body didn’t want to listen. Bones ground on each other, and limbs threatened to bend in places where they shouldn’t. His mom, on the other hand, fell to her knees beside the ghost, and tried to hug her. Her arms passed through her, just like the mist that inched around their hands and feet.

So, the three of them knelt in the mist, and cried. Jack recovered quickly; weeks of misery had basically maxed him out on how much he could cry. His mom, on the other hand, had sorrow in limitless supply. She tried to touch Mary again, and failed, finding only a hazy image that bent and dispersed around her fingers.

“Oh my baby! I’m so sorry this happened. I’m so sorry!”

Accepting that ghosts exist came faster to Jack than he thought it would, if ever confronted with a ghost. It made sense in hindsight, with all the other things he'd seen. Vampires and werewolves were normal. Spirits and nightmare monsters were still weird, but not so weird. Ghosts fit well into that spectrum. But his sister?

“Why, Mary?” he said. “Why ... why are you here? Is it even you?”

“I don't know!” An explosion of anger swept out from the ghost, pushing the mist back, and the two vampires. A cold wave, something that shocked Jack to his guts, and ripped out any heat he had. If he'd been alive, it would have felt like someone, or something, was sucking the life out of him. The lights were off, and down in a basement it was pretty damn hard to see, even as a Kindred. But when Mary screamed, the darkness grew until Jack could barely see his nose, before some small light returned.

Their mom shook their head, and wiped away at her eyes at tears that never came. “What do you mean, is it her? Jack, it's—”

“Sorry,” he said, “just trying to be sure. I don't know anything about ... ghosts...”

“Ghost.” Mary looked at him, glaring, as if someone had just ripped out her soul. “Ghost. I'm ... a ghost ... Dead people are ghosts.”

He stared at her, unable to look away from the black void in her eyes. “Yes. You're ... a ghost.”

She looked down, and started to cry, louder than before. Black tears ran down her cheeks, and Jack gulped as he watched them drip onto the floor, before vanishing into the shallow mist. It was the same sort of liquid Black Blood frequently made with its presence.

Black Blood wasn't a ghost. Black Blood was a spirit from the Shadow Realm ... wasn't it—he? The spirit was strange, even compared to other spirits, in how he seemed to embody Dolareido, and Dolareido's fucked up past from before the vampires came: flesh, witchcraft, and death. He also identified with a gender, though based on his accent and the time line, it was one he adopted. Was Black Blood a ghost, and not a spirit? Fuck, they were questions for the Uratha, because he sure as fuck had no idea. Would the Begotten know, maybe?

Focus, Jack. Your dead sister is sitting in front of you, a ghost, and crying her guts out.

"Mary," he said. He had to raise his voice a bit, to get over the sounds of both women still crying; it also helped to keep himself from crying anymore. "Mary, please, try to remember what happened. Not ... Not about before your death. Do you remember what happened after? You said you ... you ran home?"

"Home!" She continued to stare at him, without blinking. Her face looked like it was caught between Mary's face, and a skull. "I couldn't touch anything! No one could hear me!" Jack winced and pulled back from her shrieks, but she did not relent. "I ... I could feel myself ... fading. B-But, I could feel ... home. Mom would come back! She survived, and she would come back!" Her sobs grew, until they were again the banshee wails that penetrated wall and bone. "We could be a family again."

Jack looked at his mom. She was still crying, and Mary's words were only making it worse. There was no helping it though. His mom, their mom, had been on the edge and ready to break down the moment any conversation turned to Mary, and this situation was acid in the wound.

"And then," Mary continued, "I remembered ... w-what Jack did to me. The memory, it came back. I didn't understand! I didn't know! But ... you came ... home. You're different, Jack! You, and Mom, and ... and I'm ... I'm..." She couldn't finish. Screams flowed out of her, causing the fog around her to rise and ripple, before settling down again as her high-pitched shrieks died away.

“We’re vampires,” he said.

The ghost looked at him. “Vampires?” Her eyebrows suggested a blink, but her empty eyes didn’t seem to have eyelids. “You mean like ... like in Twi—”

“Don’t say it,” he said, smiling as he put up a hand. “No, not like that. Mostly. But we are undead. We drink blood, we hide from sunlight, we have powers. It’s how I was able to ... to wipe your memory, of our encounter. I have to keep our existence secret.”

“Vampires ... and a ghost...” Mary clutched her legs to her chest, and started rocking back and forth, sobbing but no longer shrieking. “Real. It’s real. Dark things, bad things, all real.”

Trying to find something to say to soothe her was pointless. She was a ghost, dead, and there was no fixing that.

Or was there? Everyone seemed to be talking about resurrection these days, with pointed fingers and deadly rumors. And Beatrice straight up admitted that it was something she and Jacob had talked about.

No. No no. The road to Hell was paved with good intentions, and a lot of corpses.

“I still don’t understand,” he said. “You ... you died, Mary. I ... visited you, in the morgue.”

“You did?”

Smiling at the ghost, he raised a hand and showed two fingers. “Twice. I don’t understand why you’re still here, among the living.”

“After I ... got my memory back, I couldn’t leave! I was so angry, I ... couldn’t ... leave...”

The three of them sat in the cold, dark basement, and waited. Mary’s sobs and wails quieted until they were gone, and their mom’s quieted soon after.

“And now?” his mom said.

“Now I ... I’m still angry! But I understand. I understand.” Understand she may, but she kept rocking back and forth, head turning about in quick snaps and random directions. She was upset, and unstable. Hell, she was a ghost, haunting the home she grew up in. Ghosts weren’t known for being calm, or logical.

How much of the ghost lore he knew about applied to real life? Holy artifacts, sunlight, silver, did any of that affect ghosts? And ghosts, as far as he knew, stuck around for unfinished business. As far as the conversation suggested, he was that unfinished business.

“Mary,” he said, “you ... can’t stay, you know.”

“This is home! My home!” The mist began to rise once again, and Mary forced herself up onto her feet, before she began hovering higher. “I’m not leaving! I will not leave!”

“Jack,” their mom said, standing up, and helping him up. “If Mary wants to stay, she can stay.”

“No, no you don’t understand, Mom. Mary, you ... you can’t ... be happy like this, can you?” He had to stop this before it got worse. Mary was dead, and he could already see the desperation in his mom’s eyes as she looked between him and her. This wasn’t fair to their mom, dragging out hope like this, when they all knew how this had to end. “If you’re ... a ghost, it means something went wrong. This isn’t good Mom, and Mary, you need to understand that.”

This was sick, cruel punishment. This was ripping his mom apart, letting her think she could have something of her old life back. And to make matters worse, it was making him think that. The fuck did he know about ghosts? Maybe Mary could just ... haunt the old house, and exist as a ghost for as long as she wanted? Maybe she could be the next Casper, and spend her days and nights hanging out here. Maybe he could find a way to move her, so she could haunt a more lively place, and be a part of their lives?

Or, in the most likely case, she was going to be trapped in this state of anger and misery, until she let go, and moved on. Every moment she was here was pain for her, for him, and a thousand fold worse for their mother, who was probably thinking far better thoughts than him. She was probably thinking she had her daughter back, and that she'd regained the most precious thing she'd ever lost.

"It's not fair!" Mary flew around the room, literally. The ends of her jeans broke away, her feet disappeared, and Jack stared up at her circling form. Now she looked like a classic ghost, the sort that soar around in only tattered clothes and mist at their base, instead of feet.

"I know it's not fair," he said.

"No!" Their mom stomped her feet once, wiped her non-existent tears away again, and glared at him. "No, you leave her alone, Jack. If she wants to be—"

"Mom, stop it. She's a ghost! She's dead. You think we wouldn't know of a way to make a good thing out of this, if there wasn't a way? Christ, I'm close to two"—unfortunately that included Jacob—"of the oldest vampires around, and neither of them have ever suggested anything good could come of this."

"I'm here!" Mary screamed down at him, and her eyes opened wide once again, beyond what a human should be able to. "I'm here!"

In my home! I'm not dead if I'm here! I won't go away into the beyond!"

"Jack, please, just ... just..." His mom reached out and grabbed his shoulders, shook him, and stared into him until he felt his heart break. "Just leave her be for now, ok? If something needs to happen, if she has to move on, it can come later. For now, just let me talk to my daughter, ok?"

"Mom, I ... you know I love her, ok? I love her, almost as much as you do, but—"

"You..." Mary, who had begun screaming and shrieking again, stopped. The mist settled again, and her eyes and mouth returned to a normal shape. Even her feet returned, as she lowered herself down from the ceiling, and stood before him. "You love me?"

"What? Mary, of course I love you. You're my sister. How ... how could you ask me that?"

"You never talked to me!"

"I never talked to anyone! I'm sorry, I ... I was an asshole of a brother." Even if this wasn't Mary, even if it was a remnant, a faded image of a soul that already left, it was good to say this, and have his mother hear it. And if it was Mary, if a ghost was actually a person's soul, well, this was an opportunity to fix the things he never got to fix.

"I'm so sorry," he continued. "Christ I'm so sorry. When Dad died, I just kinda ... turned inward, you know? I stopped letting anyone get in, and ... Fuck me, I never stopped loving you, Mary. When I wiped your memory of me, that hurt, a lot. A real fucking lot, ok? I didn't want to do it."

Mary sniffed, wiped some of the strange, black tears from her empty eyes, and nodded. "I know ... about, I mean, after Dad died, how you closed up. I thought maybe, maybe you didn't want us anymore."

He slapped himself in the forehead. "It was never like that. I was just being an asshole, focused on myself and no one else. I've grown up a bit since then, I think. Not a night goes by I don't regret leaving you two behind, and not making amends. And since ... you died, not a night goes by that it doesn't fucking kill me, Mary, that I couldn't fix that."

The ghost of Mary smiled at him. "I ... I'm glad ... that you ... told me that. You always did like to fix things."

The coldness and darkness that permeated the house, began to lift more. Some lights turned on, and Samantha flicked on the one in the movie room they were in; it didn't flicker. The dread in his guts abated, and he sighed as the growling pain subsided. Whether that was guilt washing away, his wounds healing, or a tangible effect from Mary no longer being mad with rage, who could tell. But god damn, it felt good to get to say that to her.

"So what now?" his mom said. "Mary's ... I can't believe she's here. She's here, and she's ... she's a ghost. Oh my baby, I'm so sorry this happened. I should have—"

Mary shook her head, hard, but it didn't make her hair bounce like it should have. "No, don't. When ... when I think about it, I get ... angry. Everything becomes a blur, and I ... I ... need to lash out!" Her hands tightened into fists, and she almost started screaming again, but she caught herself. "I don't want to think about it anymore. I've been thinking about it for ... for ... how long have I been ... dead?"

"A month," he said.

"A month? Feels like ... it was ... yesterday." She drifted down and over to their mom, and stayed close to her, soft smile fighting the rage he could see bubbling inside her. “A month. I ... I...”

She started to fade. Jack stared, eyes wide, and their mom almost screamed when she noticed it too.

“Baby, are you—”

“I’ll ... be here, Mom, Jack.” Her voice grew quieter as well. “I’ll be here. I’m not going to leave ... just ... yet. Come visit me, ok? Please. It’s lonely here ... in the dark...”

“We will! Of course we will, baby.” Samantha got in close enough to touch her, and whimpered as her hand passed through her daughter.

“I’m ... tired ... B-But, I’ll be here! I love you Mom! Jack. Just need ... to ... rest...”

And like morning mist fading in the rising sun, she disappeared. The cold weight of the room went with her, mostly, and the oppressive darkness vanished entirely.

Jack and his mom hugged each other, and despite his hardest efforts, Jack couldn’t help but smile a little. This whole ghost situation was bound to end in more tears, more pain, but at least for the moment, it was good to get to say the things he’d wanted to say.

“Let’s go talk to Antoinette. She deals with this sort of stuff. She might have an idea. But—”

“I know,” she said, “I know. I ... I won’t get my hopes up. B-But, it was good to talk to her again, right?”

“Yes, it was.”

Chapter 102

~~Antoinette~~

High within her tower, Antoinette perused the latest information she had acquired through her network of spies. Pictures of Terra Den and its enforcers were cropping up, far more than she wished, as were pictures of the various Xnomina thralls and ghouls, moving against them during daylight. Forever a frustration, that a Kindred's movements and actions were limited to the night, while their far less capable thralls and ghouls could move about freely whenever they desired. Every night come dusk, she had to examine the latest reports, and see what silly maneuvers the enthralled humans performed while she slept.

Garry, was likely the reason Terra Den continued to be aggressive toward Invictus and Xnomina. If this aggressiveness continued unabated, soon thralls would be shooting each other. Once that occurred, the insulted covenant would argue it was damaged property, and demand recompense. The other would not agree, and make a similar argument. Kindred would argue with each other in dark alleys and behind closed doors about the loss, and these disagreements would escalate into violence. The moment a Kindred died, it would escalate further, to skirmishes; nothing more than an appetizer to outright war.

As she acquainted herself with the details of the previous twenty-four hours, thralls had appointments to visit her. Each night, several of her thralls stepped into her office, eyes down in reverence, and she performed the routine of maintaining them as a resource. Those she had bound with the Vinculum were given a taste of her blood, to ensure the addiction and affection continued. Some were bound with only Majesty, though these thralls could not be trusted with vital information, or more impressive weaponry. Some were bound with both, those she trusted with handling the most deadly weaponry and deadlier information.

None of them were told anything about her experiments. Let them live in ignorance of it, lest an unruly thrall divulged information they should not. For all the squabbles of the covenants, and her need to manage them, they were secondary to her true goals of mastering the rules of ephemera, spirits, and what else may lay beyond.

Sometimes she still wondered if it would be better to leave Dolareido, continue her experiments where no one knew her, and no one knew what sort of science she pursued. Jack would be with her of course, and her new childe.

Samantha Terry. Antoinette smiled as she brought up yet another report about covenant activity; Samantha was not in the report, and yet Antoinette's mind drifted to her nonetheless. Her childe had departed to visit her old home, and say her farewells. Jack had gone with her. She had been tempted to join them, but no, it was far too personal. Let the two of them bond, reforge their relationship, and move on from the death of daughter and sibling. Antoinette would be there when it was time for Samantha's funeral. A month was quite a length of time to wait for such an event, but Samantha's new life took precedence.

Bless her heart, Samantha was simply too adorable. While mother and child shared much in common, such as their penchant for honesty, Samantha was soft, resilient in that she would bend when forced, but far too passive to strike back at whatever bent her. The sort of woman who would stay with her husband, even if the man proved abusive and aggressive. Delightfully fortuitous of the woman, to have wed a loving husband and bear two loving children. Or perhaps, not fortuitous, but diligent, to have raised her children as she did, to have raised Jack into the man he had become.

Daniel stepped into the office, and she gestured to him with a gentle hand as she leaned back upon her throne. “I assume you know of Terra Den’s new aggression. They continue to poke at Xnomina.”

“Did it come up at the Primogen meeting?”

“It did, but Garry did not admit to the severity of his actions, and the Invictus refused to admit how damaging those actions are. Strange, is it not? It is usually Garry who refuses to show weakness, while the Invictus claw at his domain.”

“It is strange. The power balance has been upset, and Garry continues to take advantage.”

Sighing, Antoinette caressed her jaw with a single finger, and scrolled through the various pictures her thralls had taken. Garry’s thralls were never subtle. While the Invictus knew to operate quietly, in secret, establishing many plots with a dozen avenues each, the Carthians were content to operate openly, burning down whatever they felt was an obstacle. In the past, Garry would force himself to hold back on his more reckless Carthian urges, due to the dual power of the First and Second Estate. His rise to greater power continued after the purge, and had only continued to grow in more earnest after the death of Viktor and Tony. Naturally, now that Maria had decided to focus her efforts on the revival of the blasted Lancia et Sanctum, leaving much of the Invictus duties in Michael’s lap, Garry would continue to push to expand his territory, in retribution for the Mirrden district, but also with an inevitable desire to rule the city for himself.

Perhaps, instead of fleeing Dolareido for a more private life, she should simply kill all the Carthians and Invictus in her beloved city? A tempting thought, but ultimately it would undermine her goals. If she wanted Kindred to cooperate in preparation for the future, Dolareido and the truce it maintained between covenants were her greatest chance.

“The Uratha,” she said, “are a factor in this. Garry feels comfortable being aggressive, because the infuriating Gangrel is friends with Avery. How far have the Invictus come in ... seducing, the werewolves into their arms?”

“Not very.” Shrugging, Daniel walked behind her to stand at the enormous window looking over her city. “Clara and Carter continue to sleep in the Invictus hotel, and while the First Estate has offered other incentives to the Uratha, Avery has been slow to take the bait.”

“She is intelligent. I ... have to respect that.”

“She killed Minerva,” he said.

“She killed Minerva at Simon’s order, and because my ... old friend, had crossed a line.” A line of which she had yet to be informed of. “You do not trust her.” She could practically see the frown through the back of Daniel’s head. Which was quite surprising, considering how rarely the man frowned.

“I think ... you have been unusually forgiving, as of late.”

This again. Antoinette sighed, got up from her chair, and joined her old friend at the window.

“Did you enjoy the purge, sheriff? Did you enjoy walking in the ashes of dozens of Kindred?”

“We have a responsibility to the Ordo Dracul, Ann. Being Voivode of this city has provided you with the resources to pursue your experiments.”

“You know very well my goal is not only my experiments with ephemera, Daniel.”

She expected a sigh, but that was her mistake; Daniel rarely made such noises. He stared out the window, adjusted his glasses, and shook his head.

“You expect too much. The Carthians will stir violence with the Invictus, sooner or later, and Jacob will throw gasoline onto that fire. The werewolves will get involved. And, because tragedy is an avalanche that does not stop until it has destroyed everything, the Begotten will become involved. Do you not remember the damage Azamel caused the last time she was here?”

“I ... cling to the peace we have. It is the only hope our kind has, Daniel.”

As if God had decided to make a statement, Daniel did indeed, sigh. “Then you have more hope for these Kindred than I. It will come to violence, Ann.”

“You believe we will be forced to choose between the Carthians and the Invictus?”

“No. I believe, when the time comes, everyone will be at each other’s throats. We will be forced to leave, or...”

Or kill them all, and purge her city of all meddling forces. The issue with that approach, was that, for all the strength she possessed, her and Daniel, it would not be possible for them two of them to defeat two hundred Kindred in battle, when the enemy would have the support of several ancilla, Maria, Michael, Garry, and now perhaps the Uratha. In the worst case scenario, Jacob would become an issue, and that was not a battle she was sure she could win.

She was more confident that she could defeat the Uratha, than she could Jacob. But then she remembered Simon, and the others of his pack, and the powers they possessed. While all Uratha could transform into fierce beasts of legend, it was the Uratha that wielded special abilities upon that, that were truly frightening. Some could disappear, in a similar manner to Kindred. Some could summon flames to their claws, which would be especially problematic for her kind. And some, she knew, could unleash roars that could render even a Kindred catatonic.

Daniel was right, of course. With time, the habits of Kindred would lead to violence, and Avery would find herself involved; Azamel as well, considering Dolareido's luck of late. All of this, and they still had the hunters to deal with.

"No," she said at last. "If it comes to it, we will act with violence, but not only do I believe these Kindred can learn to coexist, but that you and I can deal with the troubles that arise in pursuit of coexistence."

Large words. She had become more passive, accepting, and forgiving of the transgressions of her fellow paranormals as of late. The sheriff and her had had this conversation before, and at the time, she had felt that perhaps her relationship with Jack had softened her; Daniel felt the same way. With time, she was not so sure it was simply her being in a loving, healthy relationship that had softened her heart, but hope. Hope that, perhaps, the covenants could grow to cooperate, and the Lancea et Sanctum, with the reforged Burksen within, could become something healthy for her city, instead of the ludicrous traditionalism and totalitarianism of Lucas's approach.

Alas, perhaps she was being naive. Perhaps, given time, Daniel would prove to be correct, and the two of them would be forced to deal with the covenants, the Uratha, and the Begotten. She had measures in place, should such a battle happen upon the horizon, but she would not engage such tools unless absolutely necessary.

Her phone began to ring. Only her two ghouls, Jack, the sheriff, Natasha, and Samantha, could pull a ring from her phone, and she smiled as she reached for it upon her desk. She had chosen a gentle song to play, when Samantha called; it fit her.

“Yes, my childe?”

“Antoinette, I ... um ... something’s happened.”

Antoinette froze, and felt her fingers tighten on the phone. How long had it been since she felt the fear of a guardian, that perhaps something horrible had happened to someone she cherished? Not since the death of her previous ghouls, at Lucas’s hand. Tony’s death had been a sad night, but not for the same reasons.

“What has happened, Samantha?”

“Um ... it’s personal. Can we talk, in person? It ... might involve some of the things we ... we do.”

Without Antoinette saying a word, Daniel nodded to her, and left, leaving the Prince smiling at his back. Her old friend was far too wise.

“Oui. Come, see me in my main office.”

---

Samantha came to her tower, alone. Jack had dropped her off, and had sent her a text explaining that he had to meet with the other Right Hands to pursue covenant business. She acknowledged, and watched through her window as her love walked off. How she wished she could help him with the weight on his shoulders. Her poor little Ventrue.

She trusted him to manage the stress being laid at his feet. And at the moment, she had her own situations to manage.

“Samantha, my dear childe, come sit.” She gestured to one of the chairs near her desk. There was no glass table in this office room. Instead, there were several large, cushioned chairs, black leather.

With trembling hands, Samantha sat down, and slid in closer to Antoinette’s desk. She had a wooden box in her hand, a foot wide and a few inches thick, with a split down the center. A jewelry box?

“Something ... happened, at the house.” The look of fear on her face was blatant. If Jack wore his emotions on his sleeve, something he struggled to manage, Samantha put them up in lights.

“Are you alright, my childe?”

“I think so. I didn’t know what to take, so I grabbed my old jewelry box; lots of gifts from my family in here. Some things from James and Mary, and Jack. Other people too. Some of them are ... important to me, in memory, you know?”

Antoinette smiled. “I know indeed. But, I do not understand. You look as if you have seen a ghost.”

Her childe blinked at her, several times, and clutched the box tight on her lap. “That’s ... that’s what happened.”

“Excusez-moi?”

“Jack and I, we were walking around the house. It was cold, strangely cold, and it got dark, and it felt strange, and ... heavy.”

“That does sound unusual.”

“And ... and then...” Samantha looked down, and her shoulders started to shake. “She attacked Jack.”

“Someone attacked Jack? But, I witnessed the boy’s departure moments ago. He looked unharmed.” But then, as she examined the memory, she did notice he looked heavy. She had thought it was the stress her poor little Ventrue must bear, but perhaps it was more?

“He says it’s the curse. It heals him pretty quick. He’s still hurt, but he’s up and moving around.”

So Jack had confessed to his mother of the curse. Smart of the boy to break the news to her himself, before a ruthless rumor did it for him.

“I do not understand. Who would attack Jack in such a location? Was it the hunters?”

“No! No no, it was ... it was ... Mary.”

Antoinette peered at Samantha closely, squinting for a moment as she sifted through the emotions pouring out of her childe. “Your daughter.”

“My daughter. She ... she’s a ghost ... and she’s haunting our home.”

So, she had seen a ghost, then. Were the situation not so terrible, she would have laughed at her previous deduction. “I ... I do not know what to say, Samantha. That is an extreme situation to be caught in, and one I have not seen in many decades. I cannot imagine the horror of seeing your daughter return in such a fashion.”

“It was ... it was hard. She attacked Jack, because Jack wiped her memory of an encounter they once had. To preserve the Masquerade, you know?”

“Indeed.”

“And, and ... Mary remembered it, as a ghost, I guess.”

That was a disturbing portion of knowledge to discover, that a ghost could recall memories they had lost in life, those wiped away by a Ventrue. It stirred questions about memories, about the soul, and whether the two were connected. Her experiments suggested events left lasting impacts on ephemera, that could manifest given the correct stimuli, but memories were a different creature, than events themselves.

“I calmed her down, and she apologized,” Samantha continued, voice wavering. “It was really her, Prince! My daughter, a ... a ... ghost. Oh, it was terrifying. She was so angry, and not ... not herself.” Slowly, Samantha opened the box, exposing some of her old jewelry. It was delightfully juvenile, old fashioned and inexpensive, necklaces with broaches and pictures, bulky gold rings, and loop earrings.

“I can only imagine, if she felt the need to attack her brother.”

“She threw him around! It was like that movie Carrie, you know? She threw Jack around, and plates, knives, and the couches. Two couches were ruined, and both televisions.”

“That ... is a powerful ghost, my childe.” For a ghost to lash out with destruction force of such magnitude was rare. Normally they haunted an area, but their influence was subtle, distorting paintings or knocking over glasses. Their occurrence was so rare that sometimes she wondered if her few encounters with spectral entities in the past couple centuries had actually been, indeed, ghosts at all.

Nodding, Samantha set the box on Antoinette’s desk, and withdrew one of the necklaces. A thin gold chain, one of the more elegant pieces, and timelessly fashionable.

“Mary got me this.” Ah, yes, it made sense that it was the daughter that acquired the jewelry that a mother would wear. Bless the men and their failed attempts at purchasing jewelry; twice bless her silly childe, for keeping the gifts, and not trading them for store credit. Juvenile, and ultimately emotions misplaced. But then, she was not Samantha. Do not judge, Antoinette.

“It is lovely.”

“Thank you!” Samantha, still shaking with what must have been the aftereffects of overwhelming fear, elation, and heartbreak, beamed. Forever weak to compliments, her childe, a weakness Antoinette was hesitant to train out of her. “I ... I ... I don’t know what to do! My baby girl is back, Antoinette. She’s back. She called me Mom.” The word ‘Mom’ had her shaking all the more, and she had to clutch the necklace on her lap before she could settle. “Jack insisted this is bad, that she shouldn’t be a ghost, that ... that...”

“Your son is wise, Samantha.”

“I ... know.”

Antoinette took a deep breath, and sighed. “I had not foreseen this, but perhaps I should have.”

“You said you hadn’t seen something like this in decades. You’ve dealt with ... ghosts, before?”

Nodding, Antoinette got up, and walked over to her window, before gesturing for Samantha to follow. She did a moment later, necklace still in her hands. The two Daeva stared out over the city, and Antoinette held her hands behind her, in the small of her back, as she considered her words.

“I have had the good fortune of never having to deal with a specter from someone I knew, my childe. But, a couple times, ghosts have likely haunted places in my city. They hide well, and only expose themselves when they feel the need. Normally they hide in Twilight, and only emerge either to pursue resolution, or to let their emotions boil over into the real world.”

Samantha looked from the city to her, eyes widening, and lips parting. “You know a lot about this sort of stuff.”

“That I do, my childe. Studying aspects of Twilight, and the peculiar entities that lurk within, and beyond, is what I do for the Ordo Dracul.” And for herself, naturally.

Samantha gasped. It was so joyfully typical, it were almost if Samantha did stock sounds for old television.

“You’ve never told me about what you do, for the Ordo. Not in depth, I mean. You mentioned spirits before, but I ... didn’t really know what that meant.”

“With this unexpected situation, perhaps it is time that changed.”

---

She guided Samantha down into the depths of her tower. Her childe had her own room within the maze and luxuries of her tower’s underside, but Samantha did not have the courage to explore without Antoinette to guide her. Perhaps that would change, if the woman began to feel a connection to her new role.

It was Antoinette’s duty as sire to teach her childe the basics of her covenant. An easy task for the Carthians or the Invictus, whose purposes were clear, and who dealt with tiers of information as many normal societies did: with rank, or respect. An even easier task for the Lancea et Sanctum, who felt content to strip away skepticism and critical thinking from their recruits, and only give them enough information to pull them deeper into the pyramid scheme.

She frowned at herself as she walked. Her opinion of the Second Estate did not need to be so harsh, but it was difficult to release. Not all who were devoted to religion were needlessly traditional, and blind to scientific reason, or weighing evidence, or pragmatic conclusions. Perhaps Damien could be such a soul, or Maria could learn to be.

To learn the basics of the Circle of the Crone, to enter its dark embrace, would not be as easy as the first three. They did not have the mindless worship mentality of religion, but that did not change that they were a dark cult that encouraged treating each other as a family. They openly pushed for their members to go out, explore, dive deep into dark arts, and to test the limits of pleasure and pain. It was not a group you could test the waters with first. You must dive in deep, and learn to swim.

The Ordo Dracul, on the other hand, were different. Everything was about a Kindred's ability to learn, decipher, and adapt. The Ordo used mentors to prepare students for the many phases of rising through the ranks of the secret organization. It was not dissimilar to a secret university, with ranks of knowledge and mastery, with students pursuing doctorates in specific topics. The topics ranged from learning how to read society at large and how it responded to various zeitgeists, to more arcane or deadly interests, such as her own.

Some of the more brutal Kogaion demanded studying dragons performed heinous acts, in order to observe the change, and master the art of study. Kill one of the kine, and document the results, analyze the fallout, and report. She felt no need for such a barbaric tactic to teach Kindred how to analyze.

Tonight, she would test some waters with her childe, and see if the ripples piqued Samantha's interest. Perhaps she would be interested, or perhaps she would not be. Natasha had been terrified of the secrets Antoinette offered, once upon a time. Lesson learned then, to go slow with Samantha. Not everyone devoured this knowledge with the voracity of Minerva.

Deep within the tunnels of her tower, surrounded by black marble and metal, she opened the door to her primary experiments room. She motioned for her childe to follow her, and smiled back over her shoulder, as she watched Samantha's jaw drop.

"Wow." Samantha stepped over to the table with the tablets, the laptops, and the various artifacts sitting about. Above her hung the chandelier, though it cast no light at the moment, room lit with the usual white LEDs within the ceiling. They did not rob from the majesty of the chandelier, the priceless artifacts, or the many symbols drawn into the floor, the walls, and ceiling.

Unlike Jacob and his archaic ritual symbols, Antoinette had found patterns that allowed her to peer into Twilight. Trial and error, hundreds of years of experimentation, and reading through every ancient text she could find. Information had to be assembled painfully, pieces of a million-piece puzzle, of which she did not have a final image for reference. It would have been easier to complete a puzzle of featureless glass.

The discovery of Twilight was not the highlight of her career. The concept of ghosts and other creatures that hid in a realm between, but were part of the physical world in sense, was an idea as old as time. But that she could touch its hidden depths, test them, and fish for interaction through a combination of mathematical patterns, symbols, resonance, and light spectrums, was her contribution to the Ordo. Since she first proposed the idea, and demonstrated repeatable results in the past century, visiting members of the Ordo took to her idea, and had begun to explore it as well. Perhaps Elaine would ask for an update on her progress?

"I have mentioned that I explore the existence of other realms before, have I not?" Antoinette, smiling at her childe, stepped out onto the giant, spiraling circle within the center of the floor.

“Y-Yes, but I didn’t really ... know what that meant.”

“As a Kogaion for the Ordo Dracul in Dolareido, all dragons in this city must report to me. But I also pursue my own interests, as a Sworn of the Dying Light. Perhaps, in the future, these titles will mean something to you, but for now simply listen and absorb what you can.”

“Yes ma’am.”

Delightful.

“The Ordo Dracul pursue mastery of many facets of existence, as I have explained before. I have dedicated much of my second life to experimenting with Coils focused on exploring the soul, as well as that of the flesh, particularly vampire flesh.”

“Right, yeah. I don’t really know what Coils are, though.”

“Coils are techniques you may learn, that draw upon your abilities as a vampire to summon forth. With willpower, you may perform acts outside the realm of standard Disciplines, and the Coils are unique from Disciplines in that they do not drain your vitae to enact. Some may resist the damage of sunlight. Others resist the nightmares of torpor. And others may allow your blood to be more addictive, so you may bind others to your will far more quickly than normal.” How and why coils behaved the way they did, when performed by Kindred, was a great riddle that the Ordo explored with utmost conviction. An answer to the question ‘what are the Coils’ still remained a mystery, however.

“Wow.” Such an interesting student, her childe. Whereas Natasha would absorb information, and then question what she did not understand, Samantha listened and absorbed what she could, which, did not seem like all that much. Bless her heart, teaching her to master the Coils would be difficult.

“But tonight, it is not the Coils I wish to explore with you. Due to your encounter with your daughter, I believe it will be of ... value to you. Ultimately, you do not need to join the Ordo Dracul, my childe, or become one of the Sworn, but perhaps tonight will intrigue you.” She held out her palm, smiled at Samantha, and nodded to the necklace in her hand.

Samantha raised a brow, blinked at her several times, and handed her the small chain. “Why wouldn’t I join?”

“The Ordo explores the mysteries of existence, my childe. Many of these mysteries are terrifying. I do not blame others for preferring to keep their feet firmly upon the Earth. But for those who acquire a taste for secrets, they often become quite addicted.” She set the necklace upon the center of her summoning circle, and rejoined Samantha at the table. Nodding to her childe, she grabbed the primary control tablet, and used it to turn off the lights, turn on the chandelier and its unusual blue light, and turn on the resonance machine and its gentle hum.

Such objects normally only left an imprint on Twilight ephemera, if the emotions suffered by those near it were extreme. Samantha was the sort to overflow with emotion though, and perhaps something as simple as a gift from her daughter would affect it.

She gave the tablet to her childe, and pointed at the summoning circle within the center of the room. “Using the resonance tool, select the filter, and observe the circle through the device.”

“Ok.” Obviously confused, Samantha managed a small shrug, and did as instructed. Soon she was looking through the orange filter of the tablet, aiming the large device toward the center of the room, and her necklace, sitting under the chandelier.

Samantha gasped, as if the woman had seen far too many soap operas. She opened her eyes as wide as they could go, lowered the device, peered at the necklace and blue light, and raised the device again.

“Oh my god! That’s ... that’s ... that’s me, and Mary!”

Antoinette suppressed her grin. It was true then, that Samantha overflowed with such emotion, that something as simple as receiving a necklace from her daughter would leave an imprint. Stepping around the desk and looking through the screen did indeed show a woman, hugging another woman. The hazy images were blurry, without as much definition as she found on artifacts oriented around murders of passion, or the collapse of civilizations, but that did not detract from the power of the scene.

“This necklace must be important to you.”

“It ... it’s ... a gift Mary got me, not long after she came back from running away. See? She looks shorter than ... than ... she is now. Was ... now.” Samantha pointed at the tablet, and beamed up at Antoinette with a precious smile. “Is this real?”

Antoinette returned the smile as she analyzed the two women on the screen. “In a sense. It is what we call ephemera.”

“Ephemera...” Samantha tapped her nose several times, before smiling at the repeating image of her past self hugging her daughter.

“A material, no different than solids, liquids, or gasses. It exists in many manifestations, but most importantly, it hides among us and the physical, in a place, or state, that some call Twilight.”

“Right, you mentioned Twilight. Is it like that—”

“No, silly childe, not as per the books or movies.” Forever she would be tormented by such media. “It is a place that surrounds is, permeates us, but we cannot touch. Spirits from other realms hide within its shadows; the werewolves hunt them. Ghosts rest within, and emerge when disturbed. Understanding the nature of ephemera is one of my goals.”

Nodding to her child, Antoinette walked over to the circle, and stepped next to the necklace. Samantha blinked at her, but looked down at the tablet, and gasped once again.

“W-What? They ... they see you! But I don’t understand. I thought we were looking at a memory.”

“The nature of ephemera is strange. It feeds on essence, an invisible energy that I also study to understand. Ephemera seems capable of evolving into entities, or perhaps essence itself is what births ephemera into an entity, I do not know. Such are the mysteries I explore. A property of ephemera that I have researched to a grand degree, is what you see, that it seems capable of both retaining the details of powerful events, but also capable of interacting with the physical present.”

“Wow. I thought ... the Ordo Dracul would be focused more on things like, vampire stuff.”

“Many are, and many explore the boundaries of our existence. There are realms beyond our borders, Samantha Terry, entire realms, filled with alien entities upon the edge of reason. I spend much of my time exploring how our physical realm interacts with our sister realm, that we call the Shadow Realm. The werewolves, Uratha, call it the Hisil.” She left the circle, and by the time she returned to Samantha and peered upon the tablet, the ghostly images were repeating their everlasting moment of joy as if Antoinette had not disturbed them.

“Ephemera can act like ... like it’s alive, but it’s really just replaying memories?”

“Indeed.” She sat with her childe, and watched the painful realization dawn upon Samantha’s face.

“So, the ghost at my home ... might just be a memory of Mary, and not actually Mary.”

“It is a grand, difficult question, my childe, and one other dragons have attempted to answer. Attempted, and failed. For all our knowledge, centuries upon centuries of research and experiments, no one has ever managed to define a soul. We have evidence the soul exists, but what a soul entails, is beyond our current sum of knowledge. Whether this ghost is your daughter’s soul, or a rather powerful memory of her, I do not know.”

“That’s ... painful to hear.” Her childe forced down an oncoming sob, but soon a bittersweet smile sat upon her lips once again, as she watched the precious past through the tablet. “I should have listened to Jack.”

Antoinette shook her head. “My love is doing his best to protect you from the unusual circumstances that surround him. From what you have said, this ghost has demonstrated far more emotion and awareness than any ephemera I have exposed with objects such as your necklace.”

That earned a larger smile from her childe. “I think it’s her. But ... but, she’s still a ghost. She’s still dead.”

“That she is, my childe. And the unfortunate reality, is that no one has ever managed to achieve resurrection. Or if they have, it has been kept secret.” She loathed to mention the word ‘resurrection’ to her childe, for fear of implanting the idea at all, but it was better to crush any hope she had, before hope shattered into destructive remorse. If only Maria, and the witches could understand that.

“What do we do?”

“Ghosts are a conundrum, my childe. Dealing with them can often simply be a case of ignoring them, and letting them fade. I suspect such is how most are dealt with. But the few I have been forced to deal with, their ends did not come lightly. In the circumstances I can remember, one of the specters had to achieve revenge on who murdered him; I was but a distant witness to this event. The other two, I was forced to destroy the building they haunted.”

“Destroy!?”

“Indeed. Though, I suspect it was not destroying the building itself that dispersed the specter, but the fire destroying an object the ghost was connected to.” She shrugged, and held out a hand. With a sigh of disappointment, Samantha handed the tablet to her, and Antoinette turned off the resonance machine before setting the lights back to normal.

“What happens to ghosts destroyed like that?”

“I do not know, little Daeva. If they are ephemeral remnants, memories left behind by powerful moments, then I assume they were destroyed completely. If they are, instead, the souls of those who have died, I believe they are forced to move onto wherever it is that souls normally arrive upon death.”

Samantha nodded, looking down, lost in thought. “That does sound like a mystery I’d like to know the answer to.”

“Oh?” Smiling wider, Antoinette leaned in closer to the small woman. “Such secrets do not frighten you?”

“They do. But, it’s better to know, right?”

“You do not consider it blasphemy?”

“Blasphemy? No. It’s just knowledge, right? What’s wrong with learning about things?”

There were many things wrong with knowledge, in the grand scheme of things. Samantha's naivety was quite cute though, and Antoinette could not help but chuckle at how adorable it was.

"Indeed, knowledge is knowledge, a tool. Sometimes it is a deadly tool, but only a fool blames the tool for the intent of those who wield them. And yet, sometimes a tool is an accident waiting to happen, my sweet childe. Kingdoms have been lost in calamity, to the wandering fingers of curious souls."

Samantha nodded, smiling some more. Antoinette's words were going in through one ear and out the other, mostly, but perhaps traces of them would be left behind, grains of sand Samantha could ponder upon until they became pearls. She truly was Natasha's opposite.

"Prince."

"Samantha?"

"Jack, he um ... told me about a lot of things at the house, before Mary attacked him. He told me about ... Julias."

"That is a sad story, my childe, and I am saddened that you had to learn the details of it. But please, do not feel guilty. Julias Mire made his own choice."

"And ... he also told me about something people call the curse?"

"Yes, as you mentioned. Of that, I am quite surprised he shared with you."

She frowned at Antoinette. "I'm his mother."

As expected, the fledgling was more than capable of summoning some fierceness to her, if her children were in danger. A useful trait, but not well managed.

“You are his mother, but that was a previous life, Samantha Terry. You must accept that your role has changed.”

“I ... don't think I can do that.”

Again, Antoinette laughed, and offered her childe a more gentle smile. “You would not be you if you could, my childe. As for Jack and his curse, it is a strange circumstance your son has found himself in. We do not know what will happen to him, but I trust him and his friend Damien to monitor the situation closely.”

---

---

~~Damien~~

The sheriff left the Elysium tower, and Damien followed. He tapped deep into his vitae, summoned excessive amounts of it, of willpower, of determination, and hid himself with the Cloak of Night. While Daniel walked the sidewalk of South Side, surrounded by people, Damien kept to the rooftops. Following him in the crowd would be both easier, due to all the bodies, and harder, due to the needed proximity for visual contact. Up here, he could follow the man from a distance. Even if Daniel managed to sense him, Damien was nothing but a black silhouette at the edge of rooftops.

He wasn't sure why he was doing this. Perhaps if he managed to sneak up on the sheriff, he could prove worthy of training? It was an absurd notion, that he could convince the sheriff to train him, but Maria saw the value in it. It was a way to maintain peace between the reborn Lancea et Sanctum, and the Prince. It was also a way for Damien to acquire skills no other Mekhet in the city was old enough to teach. Those reasons didn't resonate with him though.

Daniel was the sheriff, a man who'd killed dozens of Kindred and many bishops during the purge. He defeated Lucas's rebellion, but only after Natasha was safe from Lucas's clutches, a place Damien had put her. In the end, Daniel had spared him when he had every reason to kill him.

Perhaps all Damien wanted to do was apologize? He'd seen the error of his ways, and was turning over a new leaf. But the thought felt shallow. Words, were shallow. Actions spoke loud, and Damien thought he had acted in the best interest of the covenants since Lucas's death. Twice now, he had fought alongside Jack, once against a strange monster, and another time against hunters. He had rushed to Jack's aid when the man had summoned an army of crows to the hospital.

Perhaps all Damien wanted, was simply a mentor, a fellow Mekhet and someone he could talk to about the trials and tribulations of their blood clan. There were Mekhet older than Damien in the Invictus and Carthian covenants, one each he believed, but neither had acquired the experience Damien had. The Kindred of Dolareido were soft.

Daniel wasn't soft. Daniel was a brutal, efficient killer. An assassin, a perfect example of a Mekhet at the height of their power. And Damien looked up to him. Perhaps that was the reason then, simple idolism.

Damien froze, and stared through his binoculars at the sheriff. Keeping track of someone among hundreds of shifting bodies was difficult, but Daniel had stopped moving, making trapping him much easier. Any moment now, the elder was going to look Damien's way, and catch him in the act.

Except, no. Daniel was looking at something ahead of him, or someone. He recognized the someone. Athalia.

Right, Daniel knew Athalia. Apparently, the two knew each other from before Angela's arrival at the city. Romance? Judging from the way Athalia was glaring at him, probably not. If only he could read her lips. It was a skill he should have developed, considering his many decades of observation, but he hadn't.

The two were exchanging words, and Athalia seemed heated. She was always heated. There was an appeal to her, dark skin, long, smooth black hair, tall and thin. Unfortunately, he'd never seen Athalia not look upset, and if he had to pick between the fieriness of someone like Athalia, or the joviality of someone like Fiona, there was no question which he found more appealing.

His phone buzzed. Cursing under his breath, he pulled out his phone and turned off the ring and buzz. Who had messaged him? Ah, Fiona, speak of the devil. And she'd sent him a picture.

Look at the picture, or focus on the mission. A terrible, difficult, horrible choice to make.

He looked at the picture.

Fiona, on her bed, wearing some purple boy shorts, and nothing but. She was facing the camera, kneeling on the bed, and cupping each breast as she smiled for the picture; a picture taken by her laptop, apparently. There were multiple pictures, and each had Fiona exploring her body with increasing indecency. She knew she had large breasts, and she enjoyed showing them off. She knew she had a large butt, and she enjoyed showing that off as well.

He forced down the rising urge to indulge, and quickly texted her. ~Please stop, you're killing me. I'm on a mission.~

A moment later, he received another picture. Fiona stood in front of her laptop, leaning forward, frowning. The angle caused her breasts to hang heavy underneath her, and in her hand, she held a vibrator. Good Lord, give him strength.

He put the phone away, and looked back to the street. Naturally, Daniel had vanished. He could see Athalia, walking off, and he could see her frown steering nearby pedestrians clear of her path, but Daniel was nowhere to be seen.

“Why are you following me?” The sheriff’s voice came from behind him, quiet, and cold, maybe slightly irritated.

Damien turned his head enough to see that a long sword was being held an inch from his throat. He had half expected this excursion to end like this, with Daniel sneaking up on him, turning the tables; it did nothing to ease the shock of being ambushed. He hadn’t expected Daniel’s sneak attack to succeed because he was distracted by his sex life. And damn, he was happy to have a sex life, but not happy to have a sword at his neck.

“Sheriff. I was ... limit testing.”

“Limit testing?”

“I wanted to know if I could follow you without being spotted.”

Daniel stared at him through his glasses, a stone, without emotion or surprise. His right hand still held the sword, and he used his left to adjust his glasses, pushing on the bridge to get them closer to his eyes.

“I’m almost half a millennium old, Mister Burksen. You’re what, fifty-one-years embraced?”

“And that’s ... part of the reason I’m following you.” Damien stood up, and Daniel kept the sword where it was. The blade was steady, and Damien frowned for a moment as he checked the metal. Zero adornments of any kind, a blade meant for killing and nothing else. “Maria tells me she’s announced the revival of the Lancea et Sanctum officially, and that she’s going to be running it. I’m going to be her right hand, her sword, and ... I wanted your help.”

“My help?” With brow raised, a moment of emotion Damien had not expected from the statue, Daniel slipped his sword into his jacket into a hidden sheath starting behind his neck. His face returned to its stone solidity in seconds, and he stared at Damien with all the interest and urgency of a wall.

“Yes, your help. There aren’t any Mekhet I can come to for training.”

“Training.” Daniel stared at him, a blank expression Damien could only assume was the man’s surprised face, before he started walking away. “Are you serious?”

Damien followed after him. When they got to the edge of the rooftop, Daniel dropped off it, as casual as walking down the stairs. He landed like a feather. Daniel was a tall man, a bit lanky, but big enough to hit with impact, except he didn’t. He didn’t make a noise, didn’t roll with the impact, he simply landed, and started walking. And it was a five-floor drop.

Damien tried to mimic him. It was stupid, juvenile, and very much not like him to do something like this, but he tried. His Kindred body could handle the impact without too much issue, but he heard the sound of his boots hitting the concrete of the dark alley, plenty loud. And it hurt, falling that far. It took a few moments for the shinsplints pain to pass, before he limped, and then walked after the sheriff.

“Yes, I’m serious.”

“Why should I do that?”

“Why did you spare me?”

The two Mekhet merged into the crowd. Daniel moved through it like water, turning his shoulders only just enough to graze by the dozens, hundreds of people walking past. If Daniel collided with a single shoulder, Damien didn't notice it.

“Natasha wanted to spare you.”

“And you agreed.”

“I ... did not see Lucas, in you.”

“Exactly.” Damien forced himself in close so the two of them could talk, getting in behind the man until his nose was almost touching the back of Daniel's neck. “You trusted me enough to leave me alive, even after everything that happened, everything I did.”

“If you need training, ask Mister Templeman.”

“Ryan is ... ancilla, but he hasn't developed the skills I'm looking for, the skills everyone knows you possess.”

“And?”

“And I'm asking, help me. I am a valuable asset to the city, and to the Prince's efforts.” Maybe some cold reasoning would be the way to sway this man of stone.

The sheriff looked over his shoulder at him. The expression was unreadable, as it almost always was with the man.

“How are you a valuable asset?”

“Because I'm doing all I can to catch these hunters. And because I don't want the Second Estate to be what Lucas wanted it to be. I ... I am against the idea, in its entirety. And if Maria ever pushes it toward Lucas's end goals, I'll steer her back, or refuse to help her.”

And it was true. As much as he believed Maria's views on the Lancea et Sanctum were far less conservative and vile than Lucas's, that did not mean she wasn't capable of pushing the Second Estate toward a totalitarian regime with aspirations of domination. He didn't want that. He was happy with the way things were going, with his role as Maria's Right Hand, but also with the truce the city was experiencing. Dolareido was a good place for a Kindred to live, he'd come to realize, and he was willing to fight to keep it that way.

"Natasha was right about you."

"She was." Maybe a little confidence would also help convince Daniel. Or it would backfire horribly. "And, honestly, things are going to get bad. You know they are, and I know they are. Something's going to happen, and I want to be prepared. I'll be a lot more help than most Kindred in this city." He was tempted to ask about Athalia as well, but there wasn't any need to pull at that thread.

Daniel pulled into another alley, Damien followed, and the two of them came to a stop once they were in the darkness, away from the street light, the vibrant lights of casinos, and the bustling noise of the crowds.

"If it weren't for the Prince," Daniel said, "and her goals for this city, I would say no. As far as I'm concerned, we dragons have our own goals, and this city provides us with the resources to pursue them, nothing more." He adjusted his glasses again, and looked to the crowd walking past as he set his back against the brick wall. "But my friend is convinced we can keep the peace, and make something of this. Alright Damien, I will train you."

Progress. Damien did his best to suppress his smile, but a small one came through. Maybe in a few hundred years, he'd be as cold as the sheriff, but even Damien, who he knew some considered a cold person, experienced emotions in abundance. Maybe Daniel did as well, and was simply better at hiding them.

"Thank you."

“I have a few hours to spare every Tuesday, at dusk.”

“I’ll be there. Can I tell anyone about this?”

“Maria only, and Jack.”

“I see. Very well.”

Daniel sighed, a small thing, terribly out of place on him, and he even shrugged a little. “This is highly unusual, Mister Burksen. If I suspect that you are abusing my kindness in any form, I will not hesitate to scatter your ashes to the wind. Understood?”

“Understood.” Damien suppressed his smile. This was going to be like boot camp. Daniel was going to be harsh with him, cruel, intense, and try to break him. Damien would survive, as he always did, and would come out of their exchanges stronger for it.

Or he was going to die.

~~Beatrice~~

Slowly but surely, she could feel her sex drive returning. That sucked, because she didn’t plan to sleep with anyone for a long time. Othello felt differently of course, and he and his ghouls were fucking up a storm almost every night. He pulled the hanging furs closed though, in respect for her. But tonight, she didn’t feel like being so lonely, so she pulled the fur aside.

Maybe if Jen was around, Triss might have slept with her, enjoyed a quick orgasm, and gotten back to working on her ritual. But Jen was out on a hunt or something, making connections, getting to know some kine probably. Doubtful that she was sleeping with any of them. The girl seemed honest about her reluctance to return to her old sex life, and any time the conversation turned to Julias, she seemed genuinely bothered. Not as sad as Beatrice, but sad nonetheless.

“Triss,” Othello said. It was just him and his ghoul in his alcove, carved into the cave wall. As usual, they were having anal sex, with his dark-skinned, beautiful ghoul sitting on his lap, facing away from him. She had her legs spread, and was masturbating, while Othello choked her. Madison was a gorgeous woman, with her super short curly hair, and her tremble breasts on display.

“Othello. Madison. Don’t mind me, just ... yeah, keep going.”

Madison may have, once upon a time, been shy about the whole situation with Othello, but that had long passed. She was a regular in their dark cave of occult wonders, knew about vampires, and Othello made sure she enjoyed herself any night she was around. Such a beautiful woman, and Othello had probably seduced her using his Discipline Majesty the first time he met her. Or maybe he didn’t, and had seduced her with his natural, I’m-a-lazy-fun-loving-idiot charm.

That presented an interesting question. What sort of man was Othello? She never really hung out with him; hell, she hung out with him even less than Aaron. He was a handsome man, handsome as fuck, tan skin, average height or maybe a little taller, shredded and covered in muscle. With his long dark hair, she wouldn’t have been surprised to see him surfing on a beach closer to the equator, drawing onlookers over his beauty. His brown eyes looked like they held depth, but what little she knew of him suggested otherwise. He was a pretty boy, a pretty dumb boy.

He had a huge dick though, and Madison was enjoying it thoroughly.

“Othello,” Triss asked, “who sired you?”

The man raised a brow, but didn't stop fucking his ghoul. Sex was in the man's genes, probably. "Why do you want to know?"

"No reason, really."

"I was sired by a woman, a hundred years ago, not far from Puerto Rico."

"Tropical weather? You must miss it."

He shrugged, let go of Madison's neck, and slid his grip down her body to her breasts. Cupping them, he tweaked her nipples, hard enough to earn a squeak from the woman, before softening his touch. The bastard knew what he was doing. Madison didn't stand a chance, and she leaned back against Othello's big chest as she writhed in orgasm. Her slit dripped a couple drops of juices onto the furs, and Triss breathed the smell of sex and life. It was making her hungry, for blood and sex.

"Sometimes."

"Why'd you come up here?"

"My sire did. I followed, and joined the Carthians. She left after a few decades, annoyed with the Invictus and the Lancea et Sanctum. I stayed."

Ah, things were starting to fall into place. She was surprised he was telling her all this so freely. Then again, the Circle really was a family, in a twisted sort of way, why wouldn't they share information like this readily?

"Jacob picked you up, then?"

"Yeah."

"Hard to imagine a lover boy like you, getting into witchcraft."

Othello laughed, and gently pushed Madison forward until she fell to her hands and knees, facing Triss. A moment later she collapsed, shoulders and cheek to the furs, ass in the air. Othello sank his grip into her hips, and continued to fuck her, thrusting in hard, but pulling out slow. Each thrust made the trembling ghoul squeak or groan, and her toes curled as she kicked the furs a few times, before succumbing. Well, Othello had been fucking her for quite a while. Poor girl was lit like a match. Gotta love that vampire stamina.

“Sometimes,” Othello said, “I think I’m just here, in the Circle, because no one tells me what to do.”

“Understandable. Much as Garry was my friend, it was a pain having a boss.”

“Exactly.” Grinning, Othello smacked Madison’s ass. It jiggled, in a very pleasing way. Madison wasn’t shredded like Triss or Othello. She had a touch of softness to her, just a bit, just enough to make a toned ass particularly large, and hypnotizing. It rippled with each impact, and Triss licked her lips as she watched.

“Though, I’m surprised Jacob let you stick around, if you all do is lounge about.”

Othello shrugged, reached down, and grabbed Madison’s wrists. God, the sight of Madison being pulled up, torso suspended by the tension of Othello holding her arms back, was candy for the eyes. The girl was in a daze, mouth open, eyes glazed, and head bouncing up and down as Othello fucked her. Watching her breasts bounce around underneath her was amazing, and Triss squatted down so she could get a better look.

If she’d been blushing life, she’d have been soaked. But she didn’t. Without Julias, she wasn’t going to be enjoying sex any time soon, no matter how much her hunger demanded it. Maybe with Jen, but even then it'd have been something short lived, to take the edge off her desires.

“I’ll have you know,” the Daeva said, “that I’ve been Jacob’s eyes and ears for decades. The witchcraft stuff was never important to me, but the freedom of the Circle is. I believe in its views on ... governance...”

Triss raised a brow, and felt herself smile as Othello’s gaze became focused on the whimpering ghoul. He let go of her hands, let her flop down on the furs, and he sank his fingers into her waist as he pulled his cock out of her. Dripping with lube, he set his huge shaft on the girl’s ass crack, and slid his grip down to knead her ass cheeks with his hands, pressing the huge mounds against his cock. Cum gushed down the woman’s back, white fluid along her dark skin, that soon trickled down her spine, between her gorgeous shoulders, and down her ribs to trickle onto her breasts.

Poor Madison. She wasn’t getting rest any time soon. Othello sank his cock back into her ass, pulled her back up to him, and sank his fangs into her neck. The result was instant. Madison shuddered and squirmed, and the juices trickling down her thighs doubled in volume. Triss and Julias used to have fun with the thralls sometimes, but never like this. Seeing the woman cum from the Kiss, from having her blood drained and fangs sunk into her neck, was quite the sight, especially from only five feet away.

Othello, being the sex-obsessed animal that he was, started to fuck his ghoul, as he Kissed her. There’d been times where Triss had Kissed one of Julias’s thralls while Julias fucked her, and good god that’d always been amazing, the combination of sexual bliss with the pleasure of life blood trickling down her throat. But most of all, she missed just being in another person’s arms during sex.

She lightly flicked at the necklace sitting against her sternum, and the crow skull it held. “Thanks.”

“For what?” he said, smiling at her from over Madison’s neck.

“For telling me stuff without me having to pry it out of you like most Kindred. And for letting me watch.”

The man winked at her, and set Madison back down. She collapsed once again, chest down and ass in the air, and her squeaks and groans turned into weak whimpers and mewls as Othello continued to fuck her. Best thing, the absolute best thing about the Kiss, was how it left the target exhausted and sensitive if the vampire didn’t drain them to comatose. Which meant that poor Madison was going to cum until it hurt, as Othello did not stop. Lucky.

Beatrice left, pulling the fur curtain closed as she headed back toward her cave. Except, Aaron crawled in from the tiny entrance of the cave, and made a small wave at her as he headed toward his alcove. She returned it, and followed.

“How goes it?” he said.

Shrugging, she stepped into his alcove, and flopped down onto her back on the furs. “The ritual I was shown is hard to wrap my mind around. Still struggling with how to execute it, without royally fucking myself up.

“I’ll help however I can.” Aaron sat down next to her, back against the cave wall, and a book in his lap. He didn’t pop it open yet though, ready to talk. “But, you and Jacob are the only two witches who have figured out how to use Crúac, in Dolareido at least. Not sure if I can help.”

“I’m surprised you guys stick around if it doesn’t interest you.”

“Who says it doesn’t interest me?” Aaron reached over the small room, under a rug, and pulled out another book.

“Heh, what’s this?” She scooped it up and checked the cover.
“Dark Mysteries?”

“Jacob says it’s one of the more accurate journals, written by a human who discovered some pretty dark stuff back in the 1800s.”

Triss wasn’t a reader, she was a doer. To read about dark magic didn’t hit her with anything, didn’t teach her anything, and she doubted she’d ever be able to get value out of a book like Aaron or Jacob could. And this one didn’t even have pictures, bleh.

“You’re interested, then?”

“In reading about it, sure. Academic interest. But I’ve seen you and Jacob perform some rituals, and I can safely say that it’s not for me. That doesn’t mean I won’t help however I can though. Need anything?”

