

The farmer made it seem as though it would be easy to work in a garden. All they would have to do is keep the pesky rabbits away and gather.

Either the farmer was a liar or oblivious to the hunger of the long-eared intruders that were led by a mother. She was cocky enough to show off to her kids how much could fit in their shockingly spacious guts.

The duo were trying to be careful in feeding the farm animals. After all, they were currently small and didn't want to be mistaken for food or end up accidentally in a trough. So they were caught off guard by chickens out of their coop and fenced in area. The last things they heard from beyond the birds was how he thought it would be healthier for the chickens to be free-range. Clearly, he didn't consider how an animal's innards would be bad for his workers's health.

From time to time, Katojana and Jess would be able to be normal height once they got enough money to pay for growth potions. They thought it would make their job for the farmer less of a hazard. It seemed the horse didn't think the same way.

-GURGLE-

Guarding the sheep was a hazardous job. However, the cat and mouse figured it was because of thieves and wolves. NOT from a sheep being crazy enough to eat them. The stupid lamb didn't think how eating 2 ladies near his size would mean it couldn't walk around, thus needing the farmer to tug him back in the farm to safety....even though the ones in the most danger at the moment weren't being assisted.

Going to the zoo was supposed to be fun and educational for Katojana and Jess. Well, I suppose it was too much of a learning experience. Such as learning how tight an ostrich's throat is and how those birds are opportunistic predators. That information came at a voracious price, sadly.

Katojana and Jess were picking fruit from bushes and vines, making merry the slightly cool evening compared to the blazing hot summer daytime. However, the two were soon scooped up by a brown bear wanting some protein with his berries. Going from a warm maw to a boiling hot tummy, the tinies wished they picked a better spot to relax to avoid all of this.

-TOSS-

Being lost in a big city is scary for someone many feet high. So one can imagine how terrifying it was for Katojana and Jess a few inches tall. They thought they found a local rat that would be willing to show them how they could get out of the city. He had other plans for the two, which required them to be permanent residents on the city rat's waistline.

BRROORRP!

THUMP

BUMPS

GURRRGLE

GRRROAN

The tiny duo were worried about gators and pelicans and catfish possibly eating them during a dip in the river, but were not assuming a cute and playful otter would do something so awful. After all, it just ate a bunch of fish, but it seems the mustelid had room for dessert; curious what mouse and cat tasted like.

:BUMP:

-lick-

Katojana was traveling on a small stick through a swampy pond, searching for her mouse friend that had been gone for most of the day. She asked two fats frogs if they had seen her. She tried to get away at seeing one of their stomach's get struck within and then a muffled shout. Too bad for the cat, the amphibians wanted to eat her....but which one would end up with her?

-fall-

It is wise to avoid night predators by climbing up a tree and seeking a hole to hide in. However, if an angry squirrel has already claimed the hole, one has to think fast. Especially faster than a hungry owl that has all night to hunt down 2 tinies trying to survive.

-flap-

-SWOOSH-

-flap-

GLORP!

BLORP!

A lady that owned a shiba inu was given a bunch of traveling jobs recently by her punk of a boss. She had hired a striped feline to watch her dog, but, when she came back after two weeks, the sitter was missing with a healthy dog surprisingly. She hired a rodent the next time she left, coming back to figured out what happened to the last pet sitter.

