

TSUKITSUNE

The Tsukitsune are a fox-like race that have always led sheltered, secluded lives from other societies, and only in certain parts of the world and the feywild. They are rumored to have descended from foxes imbued with strong magics that evolved to take a humanoid form, known as kitsune. Unlike kitsune, however, tsukitsune have only a single tail, although they tend to still possess some innate magical ability.

Tsukitsune often will avoid drawing attention to themselves in other societies, and as such will keep their ears and tails hidden if possible. That said, when comfortable with who they are around, they can quickly become more outgoing. Alcohol can accelerate this process greatly, as tsukitsune tend to love of sake and wine as much as dwarves love ale.

Tsukitsune live to be about 100, and can be any alignment, though they are slightly more likely to gravitate to chaotic alignments, in-line with the trickster-like nature of their ancestors and deities. That said, many are still raised with a sense of honor, and will attempt to return any favor offered them.

APPEARANCE

Tsukitsune look mostly like normal humans, though are usually fairly lithe and are a few inches shorter on average. In place of humanoid ears, they have two pointed fox ears that stick up atop their head, and a bushy fox tail at the base of their spine. Their eyes tend to reflect light in dim light or darkness and their sharp colors can be a giveaway that they aren't human if they keep their other fox features hidden.
